Tarnopolsky J.A. found that the determination of whether an accused's acts constituted a war crime or a crime against humanity (characterized as a "jurisdictional fact" by the trial judge, in that it had to be proven before the court could assume jurisdiction to try the accused) should properly rest with the trial judge as it is a question of law. It was, therefore, a misdirection for the trial judge to instruct the jury that the Crown had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused must have knowledge of the mental element in relation to "jurisdictional facts".

(iv) Constitutionality of s. 7(3.71)

The majority judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed the reasons of Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. in ruling that the war crimes provisions in the Code do not violate the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, the majority took issue with the characterization of the section as not giving rise to new offences under the Code. This departure from the findings of Callaghan A.C.J.H.C., however, did not affect the ruling with respect to the constitutionality of s. 7(3.71).

page 801

Dubin C.J. also agreed with the reasons of Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. in upholding the constitutionality of the war crimes provisions.

Finally, Tarnopolsky agreed with the rest of the Court of Appeal in affirming Callaghan A.C.J.H.C.'s pre-trial judgment that the war crimes provisions in the Code did not violate the Charter.

(v) Disposition

In the result, the majority of the Court of Appeal dismissed the Crown's appeal from the acquittal of Finta.

Dubin C.J. concluded that the jury was misdirected with respect to the mens rea requirement, and that the trial judge erred in determining what "jurisdictional facts" had to be proven to the jury. On these grounds, and for the other reasons set out, he would order a new trial.

On the basis of the trial judge's rulings concerning jurisdictional facts and the proof required of the essential elements of the war crimes offences, Tarnopolsky J.A. would also order a new trial.

IV. Relevant Legislation

Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, as amended by R.S.C., 1985, c. 30 (3rd Supp.), s. 1:

7. ...

(3.71) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or any other Act, every person who, either before or after the coming into force of this subsection, commits an act or omission outside Canada that

6093 constitutes a war crime or a crime against humanity and that, if committed in Canada, would constitute an offence against the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission shall be deemed to commit that act or omission in Canada at that time if,

page 802

(a) at the time of the act or omission,

(i) that person is a Canadian citizen or is employed by Canada in a civilian or military capacity,

(ii) that person is a citizen of, or is employed in a civilian or military capacity by, a state that is engaged in an armed conflict against Canada, or

(iii) the victim of the act or omission is a Canadian citizen or a citizen of a state that is allied with Canada in an armed conflict; or

(b) at the time of the act or omission, Canada could, in conformity with international law, exercise jurisdiction over the person with respect to the act or omission on the basis of the person's presence in Canada and, subsequent to the time of the act or omission, the person is present in Canada.

(3.72) Any proceedings with respect to an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71) shall be conducted in accordance with the laws of evidence and procedure in force at the time of the proceedings.

...

(3.74) Notwithstanding subsection (3.73) and section 15, a person may be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71) even if the act or omission is committed in obedience to or in conformity with the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission.

...

(3.76) ...

"crime against humanity" means murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution or any other inhumane act or omission that is committed against any civilian population or any identifiable group of persons, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law or is criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

"war crime" means an act or omission that is committed during an international armed conflict, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of the customary international law or conventional international law applicable in international armed conflicts.

page 803

6094

15. No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission in obedience to the laws for the time being made and enforced by persons in de facto possession of the sovereign power in and over the place where the act or omission occurs.
25. (1) Every one who is required or authorized by law to do anything in the administration or enforcement of the law

(a) as a private person,

(b) as a peace officer or public officer,

(c) in aid of a peace officer or public officer, or

(d) by virtue of his office,

is, if he acts on reasonable grounds, justified in doing what he is required or authorized to do and in using as much force as is necessary for that purpose.

(2) Where a person is required or authorized by law to execute a process or to carry out a sentence, that person or any person who assists him is, if that person acts in good faith, justified in executing the process or in carrying out the sentence notwithstanding that the process or sentence is defective or that it was issued or imposed without jurisdiction or in excess of jurisdiction.

(3) Subject to subsection (4), a person is not justified for the purposes of subsection (1) in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm unless he believes on reasonable grounds that it is necessary for the purpose of preserving himself or any one under his protection from death or grievous bodily harm.

(4) A peace officer who is proceeding lawfully to arrest, with or without warrant, any person for an offence for which that person may be arrested without warrant, and every one lawfully assisting the peace officer, is justified, if the person to be arrested takes flight to avoid arrest, in using as much force as is necessary to prevent the escape by flight, unless the escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. [Emphasis added.]

page 804

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

11. Any person charged with an offence has the right

...

(g) not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission unless, at the time of the act or omission, it constituted an offence under Canadian or international law or was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

V. Points in Issue

6095

The Appeal

Did the Court of Appeal err in law in holding that:

(1) s. 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code, is not merely jurisdictional in nature, but rather creates two new offences, a crime against humanity and a war crime, and defines the essential elements of the offences charged, such that it is necessary for the jury to decide beyond a reasonable doubt, not only whether the respondent is guilty of the 1927 Criminal Code offences charged, but also whether his acts constituted crimes against humanity and/or war crimes as defined by ss. 7(3.71) and 7(3.76);

(2) the trial judge did not misdirect the jury as to the requisite mens rea for each offence by requiring the Crown prove not only that the respondent intended to commit the 1927 Criminal Code offences charged, but also that he knew that his acts constituted war crimes and/or crimes against humanity as defined in s. 7(3.76);

3the trial judge did not err in putting the "peace officer defence" embodied in s. 25 of the Criminal Code, the "military orders defence" and the issue of mistake of fact to the jury; and

(b)the trial judge did not misdirect the jury in the manner in which he defined those defences;

[4]the trial judge's instructions to the jury adequately corrected defence counsel's inflammatory and improper jury address so as to overcome the prejudice to the Crown and not deprive it of a fair trial;

page 805

[5] the DALLOS "evidence" (police statement and deposition) was admissible and, in particular, in finding that even though it did not fall within any of the recognized exceptions to the hearsay rule:

(i)it was admissible on the basis that it had circumstantial indicia of reliability;

(ii)there was a necessity to introduce it;

(iii)its admission was necessary to ensure a fair trial and to prevent a miscarriage of justice; and

(iv)it was admissible for the defence even though it would not be admissible for the Crown.
[6] the trial judge's error in calling the DALLOS evidence and the videotaped commission evidence of the witnesses KEMENY and BALLO as his own evidence, thereby denying the Crown of its statutory right to address the jury last, did not result in a substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice; and [7] the trial judge's instructions to the jury relating to the Crown's identification evidence were appropriate and in not finding that he misdirected the jury on the issue of identification ...

The Cross Appeal

[8]Does s. 7(3.74) [and s. 7(3.76)] of the Criminal Code violate ss. 7, 11(a), 11(b), 11(d), 11

6096

(g), 12 or 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[9]If the answer to the question is in the affirmative, [are] ss. 7(3.74) [and 7(3.76)] of the Criminal Code ... reasonable limit[s] in a free and democratic society [justifiable] under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

VI. Analysis

(1) Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of Canadian courts is, in part, limited by the principle of territoriality. That is, Canadian courts, as a rule, may only prosecute those crimes which have been committed within

page 806

Canadian territory. Section 6(2) of the Criminal Code provides that:

6. ...

(2) Subject to this Act or any other Act of Parliament, no person shall be convicted or discharged under section 736 of an offence committed outside Canada.

This rule reflects the principle of sovereign integrity, which dictates that a state has exclusive sovereignty over all persons, citizens or aliens, and all property, real or personal, within its own territory. Indeed, the Permanent Court of International Justice has confirmed that:

... the first and foremost restriction imposed by international law upon a State is that ... it may not exercise its power[s] in any form in the territory of another State.

(The Case of the S.S. "Lotus" (1927), P.C.I.J., Ser. A, No. 10, at p. 18.)

However, there are exceptions to the principle of territoriality. Professor Ian Brownlie has identified several other bases of jurisdiction in his work Principles of Public International Law (4th ed. 1990). According to Gillian Triggs, in "Australia's War Crimes Trials: A Moral Necessity or Legal Minefield?" (1987), 16 M.U.L.R. 382, at p. 389:

[the] principle [of universality] permits the exercise of jurisdiction by a state in respect of criminal acts committed by non-nationals against non-nationals wherever they take place. Jurisdiction is based upon the accused's attack upon the international order as a whole and is of common concern to all mankind as a sort of international public policy. Historically, the universality principle has been employed to prosecute piracy and, more recently, hijacking. Under the principle of universality the criminal act is a violation of national law. International law merely gives states a liberty to punish but it does not itself declare the act illegal.

By contrast, some acts are crimes under international law. They may be punished by any state which has custody of the accused. Examples of this ... basis of jurisdiction include breaches of the laws of war included in the Hague Convention of 1907 and the four Geneva 'Red Cross' Conventions of 1949, torture, apartheid, attacks on diplomatic agents, drug trafficking and terrorism.

page 807

6097

Section 11(g) of the Charter allows customary international law to form a basis for the prosecution of war criminals who have violated general principles of law recognized by the community of nations regardless of when or where the criminal act or omission took place. The use of international legal principles to ground jurisdiction for criminal activity committed outside of Canada has thus been constitutionally permissible since 1982. On February 7, 1985, Order in Council P.C. 1985-348 established the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals (the Deschênes Commission). In its report, the Commission, headed by the Honourable Jules Deschênes, recommended that the Criminal Code be used as the vehicle for the prosecution of "war criminals in Canada". (See Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals Report.) In response to these recommendations, the Code was amended to include ss. 7(3.71) to (3.77). These provisions constitute an exception to the principle of territoriality found in s. 6(2) of the Code.

However, the jurisdiction of Canadian courts to try offences under ss. 7(3.71) - (3.77) is carefully circumscribed. It is only when the following conditions are fulfilled that offences under s. 7(3.71) may be prosecuted in Canada: (1) the act or omission was committed outside the territorial boundaries of Canada; (2) the act or omission constitutes a crime against humanity or a war crime; (3) the act or omission, had it been committed in Canada, would have constituted an offence against the laws of Canada in force at the time; and (4) in the words of the section at the time of the act or omission,

7. . . .

(3.71) . . .

(i) [the accused] is a Canadian citizen or is employed by Canada in a civilian or military capacity,

page 808

(ii) that person is a citizen of, or is employed in a civilian or military capacity by, a state that is engaged in an armed conflict against Canada, or

(iii) the victim of the act or omission is a Canadian citizen or a citizen of a state that is allied with Canada in an armed conflict; or ... [Emphasis added.]

(5) at the time of the act or omission, Canada, in conformity with international law, could have exercised jurisdiction over the person with respect to the act or omission on the basis of the person's presence in Canada and, subsequent to the time of the act or omission, the person is present in Canada.

Thus, there are a number of jurisdictional hurdles which must be cleared before Canadian courts may prosecute offences under s. 7(3.71). How then are these jurisdictional issues to be determined?

This Court considered the issue of jurisdiction and the respective roles of the judge and the jury in determining jurisdictional questions in the case of Balcombe v. The Queen, [1954] S.C.R. 303. In that case, at p. 304, the indictment alleged that the accused committed murder "... at the County of Dundas in the province of Ontario". He was tried and convicted in Ontario by a court composed of a judge and jury. At trial, he sought a directed verdict, arguing that the homicide had occurred in Quebec. The trial judge dismissed the motion and the Court of Appeal affirmed his ruling. In their application for leave to appeal to this Court, defence counsel argued that the question of the situs of the offence was one for the jury to decide, and that the trial judge should have directed them that they had to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the offence was committed within the province of Ontario. This Court dismissed the application for leave to appeal. Fauteux J. stated at p. 305:

6098

The question of jurisdiction is a question of law -- consequently, for the presiding Judge -- even if, to its determination, consideration of the evidence is needed. It is a question strictly beyond the field of these matters which under the law and particularly under the terms of their oath, the jury have to consider. They are concerned only with the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar. Indeed the lawful fulfilment of their duties rests on the assumed existence of the jurisdiction of the Court to try, at the place where it is held, the accused for the crime charged.

page 809

The trial judge in the present case distinguished Balcombe on the basis that the questions of fact raised by some of the jurisdictional requirements in s. 7(3.71) go to the very heart of the moral culpability of Finta's alleged actions. The trial judge put it in this way:

Although Balcombe decided that jurisdictional facts such as situs are decided by the judge and not the jury, the court noted in Balcombe that the facts in issue there did not go to the guilt or innocence of the accused. This is therefore not a case like Balcombe. In this case situs is not in issue. In this case the jurisdictional facts such as enslavement, deportation, persecution or the commission of any other inhumane act by the accused are facts that go to his very guilt or innocence. Such questions are for the jury. They go in this case to the very root of the principle of trial by jury.

This is particularly so when an adverse determination of those jurisdictional facts deprives the accused of important legal rights including Charter rights, special pleas, and the very significant defence of obedience to de facto law.

To take these crucial issues of jurisdictional fact away from the jury would deprive both him and the community of the right to have a jury decide all the facts that go to the guilt or innocence of the accused. Those facts will therefore be decided by the jury.

I agree with this position. There is an important distinction to be made between the jurisdictional issue of situs, which a judge is entitled to determine on consideration of the facts, and the jurisdictional issue as to whether the essential elements of an offence have been proven. The latter must be left to the jury. As Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636, the presumption of innocence demands that the prosecution prove beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of all of the essential elements of the offence -- whether specified in the legislation enacting the offence or constitutionally mandated by s. 7 of the Charter. In subsequent decisions of this Cou the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt was extended to cover collateral factors, excuses and defences. (See R. v. Whyte, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Chaulk, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1303; R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697.) Thus, it matters not whether the additional international elements involved in the offences of crimes against humanity and war crimes constitute jurisdictional factors or excuses. The essential question is not how the elements are characterized, but rather, whether the jury would be forced to convict in spite of having a reasonable doubt as to whether the offences constituted a war crime or a crime against humanity.

page 810

6099

It is the appellant's position that the trial judge would be called upon to make determinations on the balance of probabilities on issues such as whether the accused was responsible for the confinement of 8,716 Jews, whether he was responsible for loading these people into the boxcars and whether the actions were inhumane in the sense that they constituted acts of persecution or discrimination against an identifiable group. The trial judge would also be required to make a decision with respect to the mental element of these offences. It would remain for a jury only to decide whether the accused committed the actus reus and had the requisite mental element required for the acts committed to constitute offences under the Canadian Criminal Code.

This cannot be correct. It is readily apparent that the jury could find that the accused was guilty of manslaughter and yet have reasonable doubts as to whether his actions and state of mind were such that his actions amounted to crimes against humanity or war crimes. If the appellant's submission were accepted, the jury would nonetheless be forced to convict. This would result in a denial both of the accused's right to have the essential element of the charges against him proven beyond a reasonable doubt and of his right to have his guilt or innocence determined by a jury.

page 811

(i) Summary of Jurisdiction

Canadian courts have jurisdiction to try individuals living in Canada for crimes which they allegedly committed on foreign soil only when the conditions specified in s. 7(3.71) are satisfied. The most important of those requirements, for the purposes of the present case, is that the alleged crime must constitute a war crime or a crime against humanity. It is thus the nature of the act committed that is of crucial importance in the determination of jurisdiction. Canadian courts may not prosecute an ordinary offence that has occurred in a foreign jurisdiction. The only reason Canadian courts can prosecute individuals such as Imre Finta is because the acts he is alleged to have committed are viewed as being war crimes or crimes against humanity. As Cherif Bassiouni has very properly observed, a war crime or a crime against humanity is not the same as a domestic offence. (See M. Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law (1992).) There are fundamentally important additional elements involved in a war crime or a crime against humanity.

(2) The Requisite Elements of the Crime Described by Section 7(3.71)

(i) The Physical Elements or Actus Reus

The operative part of s. 7(3.71) is as follows:

6160

7. ...

(3.71) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or any other Act, every person who, either before or after the coming into force of this subsection, commits an act or omission outside Canada that constitutes a war crime or a crime against humanity and that, if committed in Canada, would constitute an offence against the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission shall be deemed to commit that act or omission in Canada at that time if

page 812

It can be seen that the accused, in order to be convicted, must have committed an act that constituted a war crime or a crime against humanity and that the same act would constitute an offence against the laws of Canada in force at the time the act was committed. An integral part of the crime and an essential element of the offence is that it constitutes a crime against humanity. In the mind of the public those persons indicted for having committed crimes against humanity or war crimes stand charged with committing offences so grave that they shock the conscience of all right-thinking people. The stigma that must attach to a conviction for such a crime is overwhelming. Society simply cannot tolerate the commission of such crimes. As well, the nature of the penalty for committing a crime against humanity must be more severe than would be the punishment for an act of robbery, confinement or manslaughter committed in Canada.

What are the additional elements of a crime against humanity or a war crime that distinguish these crimes from other domestic offences such as manslaughter or robbery? Part of the answer to this question is found in the definition of the two terms in s. 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code. They are as follows:

7. ...

(3.76) . . .

"crime against humanity" means murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution or any other inhumane act or omission that is committed against any civilian population or any identifiable group of persons, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law or is criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

"war crime" means an act or omission that is committed during an international armed conflict, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of the customary international law or conventional international law applicable in international armed conflicts. [Emphasis added.]

page 813

Thus, with respect to crimes against humanity the additional element is that the inhumane acts were based on discrimination against or the persecution of an identifiable group of people. With respect to war crimes, the additional element is that the actions constitute a violation of the laws of armed conflict. These elements must be established both in order for a Canadian court to have the jurisdiction to try the accused and in order to convict the accused of the offence.

6/01

(ii) The Mental Element or Mens Rea

The "international element" of the s. 7(3.71) offences is not comprised solely of the actus reus or of the physical quality of the actions. Canada acquires jurisdiction over actions performed in foreign territory only when those actions reach the level of an international crime or when they are "criminal" according to the general principles of international law. A crime is comprised of both a physical and a mental element. As was noted by the majority of the Court of Appeal in the present case, the definitions of war crimes and crimes against humanity found in s. 7(3.76) do not expressly define the mental state which must accompany the facts or circumstances that bring an act within the definition of a war crime or a crime against humanity. Thus, a mental element must be read into those definitions. Indeed, it is now trite law that mens rea has been elevated from a presumed element in offences (R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1299), to a constitutionally required element (R. v. Vaillancourt, supra). Proof of this mental element is an integral part of determining whether the offences committed amount to a war crime or a crime against humanity and thus, whether the court has jurisdiction to try the case.

The appellant contends that the deeming mechanism in the Code provision presently under consideration is such that an accused charged under s. 7(3.71) may be found guilty not of "war crimes" or

page 814

"crimes against humanity" but of "ordinary" Code offences such as manslaughter, confinement or robbery. It is further argued that proof of the mens rea with respect to the domestic offences provides the element of personal fault required for offences under s. 7(3.71). Thus, it is submitted, proof of further moral culpability is not required, since once the necessary mens rea to confine forcibly, rob or commit manslaughter has been proved, it becomes impossible to maintain that the accused was morally innocent.

I cannot accept that argument. What distinguishes a crime against humanity from any other criminal offence under the Canadian Criminal Code is that the cruel and terrible actions which are essential elements of the offence were undertaken in pursuance of a policy of discrimination or persecution of an identifiable group or race. With respect to war crimes, the distinguishing feature is that the terrible actions constituted a violation of the laws of war. Although the term laws of war may appear to be an oxymoron, such laws do exist. War crimes, like crimes against humanity, shock the conscience of all right-thinking people. The offences described in s. 7(3.71) are thus very different from and far more grievous than any of the underlying offences.

For example, it cannot be denied that the crimes against humanity alleged in this case, which resulted in the cruel killing of thousands of people, are far more grievous than occasioning the death of a single person by an act which constitutes manslaughter in Canada. To be involved in the confinement, robbing and killing of thousands of people belonging to an identifiable group must, in any view of morality or criminality, be more serious than even the commission of an act which would constitute murder in Canada.

Therefore, while the underlying offences may constitute a base level of moral culpability, Parliament has added a further measure of blameworthiness by requiring that the act or omission constitute a crime against humanity or a war crime. If the jury is not satisfied that this additional element of culpability has been established beyond a reasonable doubt, then the accused cannot be found guilty of a war crime or a crime against humanity.

6102

page 815

In R. v. Vaillancourt, supra, this Court held that there are certain crimes where, because of the special nature of the available penalties or of the stigma attached to a conviction, the principles of fundamental justice require a mental blameworthiness or a mens rea reflecting the particular nature of that crime. It follows that the question which must be answered is not simply whether the accused is morally innocent, but rather, whether the conduct is sufficiently blameworthy to merit the punishment and stigma that will ensue upon conviction for that particular offence. In the present case there must be taken into account not only the stigma and punishment that will result upon a conviction for the domestic offence, but also the additional stigma and opprobrium that will be suffered by an individual whose conduct has been held to constitute crimes against humanity or war crimes. In reality, upon conviction, the accused will be labelled a war criminal and will suffer the particularly heavy public opprobrium that is reserved for these offences. Further the sentence which will follow upon conviction will reflect the high degree of moral outrage that society very properly feels toward those convicted of these crimes.

In R. v. Wholesale Travel Group Inc., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 154, I suggested the contextual approach for the determination of the appropriate level of fault required for a given offence. The offence must be viewed in the context of the objectives which Parliament attempted to achieve in enacting the provision as well as the competing interests of the individual accused. I think that the context in which the offence or offences are committed must also be taken into account in assigning the appropriate mens rea or mental element to the offence.

page 816

What was the aim of Parliament in passing the section? It was passed following the receipt of the Deschênes Commission Report. In the Parliamentary debates following the tabling of the report, the Minister of Justice observed that Canadians would never be satisfied with the notion that individuals guilty of war crimes during World War II should find a safe haven in Canada.

There can be no doubt that Canadians were revolted by the suffering inflicted upon millions of innocent people. It seems that the section was passed to bring to trial those who inflicted death and cruel suffering in a knowing, pre-meditated, calculated way. The essential quality of a war crime or a crime against humanity is that the accused must be aware of or wilfully blind to the fact that he or she is inflicting untold misery on his victims.

The requisite mental element of a war crime or a crime against humanity should be based on a subjective test. I reach this conclusion for a number of reasons. First, the crime itself must be considered in context. Such crimes are usually committed during a time of war. Wars are concerned with death and destruction. Sweet reason is often among the first victims. The manipulation of emotions, often by the dissemination of false information and propaganda, is part and parcel of the terrible tapestry of war. False information and slanted reporting is so predominant that it cannot be automatically assumed that persons in units such as the Gendarmerie would really know that they were part of a plot to exterminate an entire race of people.

It cannot be forgotten that the Hungarian people were loyal to the axis cause. There was strong pro-German sentiment throughout the country. This was a time of great stress and anxiety as the Russian advance pushed back the German armies towards the borders of Hungary. A newspaper report of the time presented at the trial may give some indication of the feelings of the Hungarian people:

'6/03

page 817

With the war, the front line nearing our borders, the Jewish problem is becoming more and more acute.... this country, girding itself for self-defence, possibly with German help, the internal situation of eight to nine hundred thousand Jews of basically hostile attitude to our military objectives demands new and effective measures....

In his policy-making speech, the Prime Minister expressively stated that the only way open to us in solving the Jewish problem is the deportation.

(Szegedi uj Nemzedék, April 9, 1944.)

Section 7(3.71) cannot be aimed at those who killed in the heat of battle or in the defence of their country. It is aimed at those who inflicted immense suffering with foresight and calculated malevolence.

What then is the nature of a war crime or inhumane act? In addition to the definition provided by the Code itself, the trial judge in this case gave the following definition of an inhumane act to the jury:

Inhumane. Inhuman, uncivilized. Not humane; destitute of compassion for suffering.

Inhumanity. The quality of being inhuman or inhumane; want of human feeling; brutality; barbarous cruelty.

Inhuman. Not having the qualities proper or natural to a human being; especially destitute of natural kindness or pity; brutal, unfeeling.

Brutal; barbarous; cruel.

The trial judge added to his comments that "Inhumanity in this context means some kind of treatment that is unnecessarily harsh in the circumstances". He explained to the jury that one of the ways that the domestic offences of kidnapping, confinement, and robbery could achieve the level of a crime against humanity was if the acts could be considered to be inhumane.

In my view, this is an appropriate characterization which emphasizes that for example robbery, without the additional component of barbarous cruelty is not a crime against humanity. It cannot be inferred that someone who robs civilians of their valuables during a war has thereby committed a crime against humanity. To convict someone of an offence when it has not been established beyond a reasonable doubt that he or she was aware of conditions that would bring to his or her actions that requisite added dimension of cruelty and barbarism violates the principles of fundamental justice. The degree of moral turpitude that attaches to crimes against humanity and war crimes must exceed that of the domestic offences of manslaughter or robbery. It follows that the accused must be aware of the conditions which render his or her actions more blameworthy than the domestic offence.

page 818

6104

I find support for this position in decisions of this Court relating to the constitutional requirements for mens rea. In R. v. Martineau, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 633, the Court struck down s. 213 (a) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34. This section provided that the offence of murder would be committed in circumstances where a person caused the death of another while committing or attempting to commit certain named offences, and meant to cause bodily harm for the purpose of committing the underlying offence or to facilitate flight after committing the offence. Murder was deemed to have been committed regardless of whether the person meant to cause death and regardless of whether that person knew that death was likely to result from his or her actions. The majority of the Court (per Lamer C.J.) affirmed that in order to secure a conviction for murder, the principles of fundamental justice required subjective foresight of the consequences of death. As was noted in R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944, while it is not a principle of fundamental justice that fault or mens rea must be proved as to each separate element of the offence, there must be a meaningful mental element demonstrated relating to a culpable aspect of the actus reus. See also: R. v. Hess, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 906.

page 819

These cases make it clear that in order to constitute a crime against humanity or a war crime, there must be an element of subjective knowledge on the part of the accused of the factual conditions which render the actions a crime against humanity.

Thus, for all of the reasons set out earlier, I am in agreement with the majority of the Court of Appeal's assessment that the mental element of a crime against humanity must involve an awareness of the facts or circumstances which would bring the acts within the definition of a crime against humanity. However, I emphasize it is not necessary to establish that the accused knew that his or her actions were inhumane. As the majority stated at p. 116:

... if the jury accepted the evidence of the various witnesses who described the conditions in the boxcars which transported the Jews away from Szeged, the jury would have no difficulty concluding that the treatment was "inhumane" within the definition of that word supplied by the trial judge. The jury would then have to determine whether Finta was aware of those conditions. If the jury decided that he was aware of the relevant conditions, the knowledge requirement was established regardless of whether Finta believed those conditions to be inhumane.

Similarly, for war crimes, the Crown would have to establish that the accused knew or was aware of the facts or circumstances that brought his or her actions within the definition of a war crime. That is to say the accused would have to be aware that the facts or circumstances of his or her actions were such that, viewed objectively, they would shock the conscience of all right-thinking people.

Alternatively, the mens rea requirement of both crimes against humanity and war crimes would be met if it were established that the accused was wilfully blind to the facts or circumstances that would bring his or her actions within the provisions of these offences.

6/05

page 820

(iii) Summary of the Elements of the Offence Described in s. 7(3.71): The Integral Aspects of the Section

The wording of the section, the stigma and consequences that would flow from a conviction all indicate that the Crown must establish that the accused committed a war crime or a crime against humanity. This is an integral and essential aspect of the offence. It is not sufficient simply to prove that the offence committed in Canada would constitute robbery, forcible confinement or manslaughter. An added element of inhumanity must be demonstrated to warrant a conviction under this section. The mental element required to be proven to constitute a crime against humanity is that the accused was aware of or wilfully blind to facts or circumstances which would bring his or her acts within the definition of a crime against humanity. However it would not be necessary to establish that the accused knew that his or her actions were inhumane. For example, if the jury was satisfied that Finta was aware of the conditions within the boxcars, that would be sufficient to convict him of crimes against humanity even though he did not know that his actions in loading the people into those boxcars were inhumane.

Similarly for war crimes the Crown would have to establish that the accused knew or was aware of facts that brought his or her action within the definition of war crimes, or was wilfully blind to those facts. It would not be necessary to prove that the accused actually knew that his or her acts constituted war crimes. Those then are the requisite elements of the offence and the mental element required to establish it.

(iv)Did the Trial Judge Err in his Charge Regarding the Requisite Mental Element?

The appellant concedes that the trial judge correctly instructed the jury on the mental element of the offences at various points in his charge.

page 821

However it is contended that these instructions were negated by the frequent occasions in the course of his charge when his words could have conveyed the notion that the Crown must prove that the respondent actually knew his conduct constituted a crime against humanity or a war crime or amounted to an act which came within the definition of a crime against humanity or a war crime.

It is apparent that the trial judge made comments during the course of his very lengthy and complex charge which could have been construed as requiring the Crown to prove that the accused knew that his conduct was inhumane. However the charge included several clear directions as to the correct approach. When the charge is looked at as a whole, it is clear that the trial judge did not misdirect the jury on the issue of mens rea. For example, he stated:

The next item is heading No. 9, the mental element for crimes against humanity and simply the Crown has the duty to beyond a reasonable doubt [sic] that the particular offences; robbery, kidnapping, confinement, manslaughter, to the knowledge of the accused had those factual qualities that raise them up to a crime against humanity.

6106

The Crown doesn't have to prove the accused is an international scholar, that he knows the pigeon holes or nooks and crannies of international law. It is sufficient to prove the accused knew his acts had the factual quality of enslavement or persecutorial deportation or racial or religious persecution or inhumanity that raised them up from the level of an ordinary crime to the international level of a crime against humanity.

With respect to proof of the mental element for crimes against humanity, the trial judge instructed the jury that:

The Crown also has to prove the physical and mental element of war crimes and crimes against humanity beyond a reasonable doubt and that knowledge has to be brought home personally to the accused as a factual quality that what he does is a war crime or crime against humanity, that it has those factual qualities.

page 822

Again, he doesn't have to know the nooks and crannies of international law, just has to know what he is doing has the nature and quality factually that makes it a war crime or crime against humanity. Does he know it is deportation for racial persecution? Does he know it is an inhumane act? Does he know it is ill treatment of the civilian population? In the manner I described.

Here again the trial judge made it clear to the jury that the accused simply needed to be aware of the surrounding factual circumstances and the actions which came within the definition of war crimes. The trial judge correctly instructed the jury that the accused need not know that his actions constituted a crime at international law.

The trial judge on several occasion stressed that the test to be applied was an objective one. For example with regard to deportation he stated:

As to the necessary mental element; the accused must intend to deport within the meaning I gave you for a crime against humanity. Apply to this count the issues as I reviewed them. Is the deportation a reasonable temporary measure for public safety, with the bedding and furniture and so forth stored safely for their return; might the accused honestly think so on reasonable grounds. Or would it be clear to any reasonable person that they were being deported because they were Jews or they were being persecuted under inhumane conditions.

With regard to the taking of property he said this:

The second part of that branch is as I have read it before, has the Crown proved beyond a reasonable doubt any reasonable person in the position of the accused would know that the taking had the factual quality of a crime against humanity (see 5) below and the accused personally as a principal or aider or abettor used violence or threats of violence.

The charge made it very clear that the jury had to decide whether Finta was aware of the circumstances that rendered his actions either a crime against humanity or a war crime, and whether he had the requisite mental element for the domestic offences. The jury must have know that, in order to convict, they had to find that Finta knowingly participated in conduct that reached the level of a war crime or a crime against humanity, and that his level of awareness was such that he could be held personally responsible for the crimes that were committed in Hungary at that time. The trial judge stressed that it was not sufficient that the jurors thought that what had happened constituted a violation of the laws of war or were crimes against humanity. Finta himself had to be aware of those conditions and factual circumstances that raised the crimes to the level of crimes against humanity or war crimes.

page 823

6107

It should also be noted that the trial judge instructed the jury that they must find that Finta knew or was aware that he was assisting in a policy of persecution. This is part of the factual circumstances that Finta would be required to have known in order for his actions to fall within the definition of crimes against humanity. Although the Code does not stipulate that crimes against humanity must contain an element of state action or policy of persecution/discrimination, the expert witness, M. Cherif Bassiouni, testified that at the time the offences were alleged to have been committed, "state action or policy" was a pre-requisite legal element of crimes against humanity. Thus, in my view, the trial judge properly instructed the jury that they had to be satisfied that Finta knew or was aware of the particular factual circumstance which rendered the acts he was alleged to have committed crimes against humanity. The trial judge properly distinguished this factor from motive which, he clearly indicated to the jury, the Crown did not have to establish.

The trial judge made every effort to give clear, well-organized instructions to the jury in this long, complex and difficult trial.

page 824

(3) The Defences

Since the integral aspect of the offence is that the crime be against humanity or a war crime, some special defences may be raised with regard to it.

The questions raised with regard to the defences available to the respondent at trial are essentially the following: (1) should the defence of obedience to military orders and the peace officer defence be available to persons accused of offences pursuant to s. 7(3.71); (2) was the trial judge justified in putting the defences of mistake of fact and obedience to superior orders to the jury?

It might be helpful to first consider the defences which may be employed by a person accused of an offence pursuant to s. 7(3.71).

Section 7(3.73) of the Criminal Code provides that those accused of crimes pursuant to s. 7 (3.71) may avail themselves of all of the defences and excuses under domestic and international law. It reads as follows:

7. ...

6108

(3.73) In any proceedings under this Act with respect to an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71), notwithstanding that the act or omission is an offence under the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission, the accused may, subject to subsection 607(6), rely on any justification, excuse or defence available under the laws of Canada or under international law at that time or at the time of the proceedings.

Section 607(6) provides that a person who is alleged to have committed an act or omission outside Canada that is an offence in Canada and in respect of which that person has been tried and convicted outside Canada, may not plead autrefois convict under certain specified conditions.

Section 7(3.74) states that a person may be convicted of an offence referred to in s. 7(3.71) even if the act was committed in obedience to or conformity with the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission.

page 825

Section 25 of the Code provides the accused with a justification for the use of as much force as is necessary to do anything in the administration or enforcement of a law, notwithstanding that the law is defective. It reads as follows:

25. (1) Every one who is required or authorized by law to do anything in the administration or enforcement of the law

(a) as a private person,

(b) as a peace officer or public officer,

(c) in aid of a peace officer or public officer, or

(d) by virtue of his office,

is, if he acts on reasonable grounds, justified in doing what he is required or authorized to do and in using as much force as is necessary for that purpose.

(2) Where a person is required or authorized by law to execute a process or to carry out a sentence, that person or any person who assists him is, if that person acts in good faith, justified in executing the process or in carrying out the sentence notwithstanding that the process or sentence is defective or that it was issued or imposed without jurisdiction or in excess of jurisdiction.

(3) Subject to subsection (4), a person is not justified for the purposes of subsection (1) in using force that is intended or is likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm unless he believes on reasonable grounds that it is necessary for the purpose of preserving himself or any one under his protection from death or grievous bodily harm.

(4) A peace officer who is proceeding lawfully to arrest, with or without warrant, any person for an offence for which that person may be arrested without warrant, and every one lawfully assisting the peace officer, is justified, if the person to be arrested takes flight to avoid arrest, in using as much force as is necessary to prevent the escape by flight, unless the escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. [Emphasis added.]

6/09

page 826

The peace officer defence, set out above, is similar to the defence of obedience to military orders. The latter defence is recognized by most systems of criminal law. (See, e.g., L. C. Green, "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility" (1989), 27 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 167.) It is based on the well-recognized principle that in both the armed forces and police forces commands from superior officers must be obeyed. It follows that it is not fair to punish members of the military or police officers for obeying and carrying out orders unless the orders were manifestly unlawful. In this case, at the time the offences were allegedly committed this defence would have been available to the respondent and therefore, pursuant to s. 7(3.73) of the Code, it was available to him at trial.

The common law defence of mistake of fact is based on the concept that to have a guilty state of mind, the accused must have knowledge of the factual elements of the crime he is committing. In other words, although an accused may commit a prohibited act, he is generally not guilty of a criminal offence where he is ignorant of or mistaken as to a factual element of the offence. (See for example R. v. Prue, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 547.) An accused is deemed to have acted under the state of facts he or she honestly believed to exist when he or she did the act alleged to be a criminal offence. (See Beaver v. The Queen, [1957] S.C.R. 531, and Pappajohn v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 120.) The trial judge also instructed the jury that this defence was available to the respondent.

(A)Should the Defence of Obedience to Military Orders and the Peace Officer Defence be Available to an Accused Under Section 7(3.71)?

The appellant argues that neither the international law defence of obedience to superior orders nor the peace officer defence found in s. 25 of the Canadian Criminal Code should be available to persons charged with offences under s. 7(3.71). It is submitted that, by putting the peace officer and military orders defences to the jury based on Hungarian decrees and orders, the trial judge gave effect to the defence of obedience to the law in force at that time and place. This, it is said, is contrary to Parliament's intention in enacting s. 7 (3.74), and contrary to the principle that an accused cannot plead the laws of the state to justify crimes against humanity and war crimes, when those crimes, by their very nature, must be state sponsored. With respect to s. 25 of the Code the appellant argues that the trial judge having directed the jury, as a matter of law, that the Baky Order, the anti-Jewish decrees and the train schedule document were unlawful, should have found that the s. 25 defence was inapplicable since the respondent's acts could not be said to be "required or authorized by law" as stipulated in s. 25.

page 827

Secondly, the appellant argues, the defence of mistake of fact should not have been put to the jury in conjunction with the defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer defence since the question of what the respondent believed is a separate issue going to mens rea and is irrelevant to a "positive" defence. Additionally, the appellant contends that by putting the defence of mistake of fact to the jury, the trial judge was actually putting the defence of mistake of law to the jury. This, it is said, violates the presumption of knowledge of the law and requires the Crown to prove that the accused knew that his acts fell within the legal definition of the offence charged.

6110

Finally, the appellant argues that the trial judge misdirected the jury in the manner in which h defined those defences. The trial judge incorporated the component elements of crimes against humanity and war crimes into the definition of the defences. This, the appellant argues, was incorrect.

page 828

At this stage it may be appropriate to consider the history of the defence of obedience to superior orders. Whether obedience to superior orders can shield an offender has been a concern of legal writers for centuries. (See for example: L. C. Green, "Superior Orders and the Reasonable Man", in Essays on the Modern Law of War (1985), at pp. 43 and 49.)

(i) Historical Analysis of the Defence of Obedience to Superior Orders

Our principles of criminal law often cannot readily be applied to the military. Our ideas of criminal law have evolved slowly. They involve a concept of equality before and under the law. Everyone is entitled to respect, dignity and the integrity of his or her body. Gradually it became accepted that an accused charged with assault was to be held personally responsible for violating the integrity of another human being. It is difficult if not impossible to apply that concept to the military.

The whole concept of military organization is dependent upon instant, unquestioning obedience to the orders of those in authority. Let us accept that the military is designed to protect the physical integrity of a nation, its borders and its people. The orders of the commander in chief must be carried out through the chain of command. The division commanders must carry out the orders of the army commanders. The regimental commanders must carry out the orders of the divisional commanders, the company commanders those of the battalion commanders, and the men in the platoons those of the lieutenant in charge. This requirement of instant obedience to superior order applies right down to the smallest military unit. Military tradition and a prime object of military training is to inculcate in every recruit the necessity to obey orders instantly and unhesitatingly. This is in reality the only way in which a military unit can effectively operate. To enforce the instant carrying out of orders, military discipline is directed at punishing those who fail to comply with the orders they have received. In action, the lives of every member of a unit may depend upon the instantaneous compliance with orders even though those orders may later, on quiet reflection, appear to have been unnecessarily harsh.

page 829

The absolute necessity for the military to rely upon subordinates carrying out orders has, through the centuries, led to the concept that acts done in obedience to military orders will exonerate those who carry them out. The same recognition of the need for soldiers to obey the orders of their commanders has led to the principle that it is the commander who gives the orders who must accept responsibility for the consequences that flow from the carrying out of his or her orders.

Cherif Bassiouni, supra, has written on the subject of obedience of the military to orders that they receive in this vein at p. 399:

... throughout the history of military law, obedience to superior orders has been one of the highest duties for the subordinate. This obedience exonerates the subordinate from responsibility because of the command responsibility of the superior who issued the order.

6111

This criminal responsibility attaches to the decision-maker and not to the executor of the order who is exonerated. As a counterpart, the subordinate is expected to obey the orders of a superior. This approach to responsibility is predicated on the assumption that the superior can be deterred from wrongful conduct by the imposition of criminal responsibility for unlawful commands. But when this assumption fails, obviously, the overall approach must be reconsidered.

As the author correctly points out, the military leader's defence of obedience to superior orders has been brushed aside at various times throughout history. This has been done where the crimes committed in obedience to superior orders during hostilities were so atrocious that they exceeded the limits of acceptable military conduct, and shocked the conscience of society.

page 830

Both Green (in "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility", supra, at p. 173) and Bassiouni (supra, at p. 416) report that one of the first people to assert the defence of superior orders before a tribunal, Peter von Hagenbach, was denied the protection of command responsibility.

Bassiouni, supra, writes at p. 416:

Perhaps the first person to assert the defense of superior orders before a tribunal was Peter von Hagenbach in the year 1474. Charles, the Duke of Burgundy, appointed Hagenbach the Governor (Landvogt) of the Upper Rhine, including the fortified town of Breisach. At the behest of Charles, Hagenbach, with the aid of his henchmen, sought to reduce the populace of Breisach to a state of submission by committing such atrocities as murder, rape and illegal confiscation of property. Hagenbach was finally captured and accused of having "trampled under foot the laws of God and man". Hagenbach relied primarily on the defense of "obedience to superior orders". His counsel claimed that Hagenbach "had no right to question the order which he was charged to carry out, and it was his duty to obey. Is it not known that soldiers owe absolute obedience to their superiors?" The Tribunal refused to accept Hagenbach's defense, found him guilty, and sentenced him to death.

See also Georg Schwarzenberger, International Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals, vol. 2, (1968), at p. 465, and L. C. Green, "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility", supra, at p. 173.

In the United States, a significant case was tried during the War of 1812. There was then a divergence of opinion as to necessity of the war. In New England, the United States Navy was not very popular. One day while the ship Independence was docked in Boston Harbour, a passerby made some abusive remarks to a marine by the name of Bevans, who was standing guard on the ship. Bevans responded rather violently by driving his bayonet through the man. Bevans was charged with murder and pleaded the defence of obedience to superior orders, claiming that the marines on Independence had been ordered to bayonet whomever showed them disrespect. At trial Story J. instructed the jury that such an order was illegal and void, and if given and carried out, both the superior and subordinate would be guilty of murder. Bevans was convicted (United States v. Bevans, 24 Fed. Cas. 1138 (C.C.D. Mass. 1816) (No. 14,589), although his conviction was later reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court on jurisdictional grounds in United States v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. 336 (1818)).

page 831

Green (in "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility", supra, at pp. 174-75) states that the decision of Solomon J. in R. v. Smith (1900), 17 S.C. 561 (Cape of Good Hope), established the English position. In that case a soldier acting on the orders of his superior during the Boer War, killed a native for not performing a menial task. Although the court acquitted the soldier, it introduced the "manifest illegality" test, stating at pp. 567-68:

... it is monstrous to suppose that a soldier would be protected where the order is grossly illegal. [That he] is responsible if he obeys an order [that is] not strictly legal ... is an extreme proposition which the Court cannot accept.... [E]specially in time of war immediate obedience ... is required.... I think it is a safe rule to lay down that if a soldier honestly believes he is doing his duty in obeying the commands of his superior, and if the orders are not so manifestly illegal that he must or ought to have known that they were unlawful, the private soldier would be protected by the orders of his superior officer.

Bassiouni, supra, at pp. 419-21, recounts:
The issue of "obedience to superior orders" first gained contemporary international significance during the war crimes trials that followed World War I. By virtue of Article 228 of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany submitted to the Allied Powers' right to try alleged war criminals. Although the Treaty originally provided that the trials would be administered by the state against whose nationals the alleged crimes were committed, it was subsequently agreed that the German Reichsgericht

page 832

(Supreme Court) sitting at Leipzig would be the court to preside over these cases. The two most notable cases involving the issue of "obedience to superior orders" during the Leipzig Trials were the Dover Castle and the Llandovery Castle.

In Dover Castle, the defendant, Lieutenant Captain Karl Neuman [sic], the commander of a German submarine, was charged with torpedoing the Dover Castle, a British hospital ship. The defendant claimed that he was acting pursuant to "superior orders", which were issued by his naval superiors who claimed that they believed that Allied hospital ships were being used for military purposes in violation of the laws of war. The Leipzig Court, acquitted the commander holding:

It is a military principle that the subordinate is bound to obey the orders of his superiors ... (w)hen the execution of a service order involves an offence against the criminal law, the superior giving the order is alone responsible. This is in accordance with the terms of the German law, [sect] 47, para. 1 of the Military Penal Code ....

According to [sect] 47 of the Military Penal Code No. 2, a subordinate who acts in conformity with orders is ... liable to punishment as an accomplice, when he knows that his superiors have ordered him to do acts which involve a civil or military crime or misdemeanour. There has been no case of this here. The memoranda of the German Government about the misuse of enemy hospital ships were known to the accused .... He was therefore of the opinion that the measures taken by the German Admiralty against enemy hospital ships were not contrary to international law, but were legitimate reprisals .... The accused ... cannot, therefore, be punished for his conc

613

In the subsequent Llandovery Castle case, the same court did not so readily grant the accused a defense of "obedience to superior orders". In that case, also involving a German submarine attack upon a British hospital ship, the submarine commander ordered his subordinates to open fire on the survivors of the torpedoed Llandovery Castle who had managed to get into lifeboats. The officers who carried out the order, First Lieutenants Ludwig Dithmar and John Boldt, were charged with the killings and pleaded that they followed the orders of their commander, Helmut Patzik (whom the German authorities failed to apprehend after the war). The court, however, rejected this defense and stated:

page 833

The firing on the boats was an offence against the law of nations .... The rule of international law, which is here involved, is simple and is universally known. No possible applicability .... (The commander's) order does not free the accused from guilt. It is true that according to para. 47 of the Military Penal Code, if the execution of an order in the ordinary course of duty involves such a violation the superior giving the order is alone responsible. However, the subordinate obeying such an order is liable to punishment if it was known to him that the order of the superior involved the infringement of civil or military law. This applies in the case of the accused. It is certainly to be urged in favor of the military subordinates, that they are under no obligation to question the order of their superior officer, and they can count upon its legality. But no such confidence can be held to exist, if such an order is universally known to everybody, including also the accused, to be without any doubt whatever against the law.

Nonetheless, the court acknowledged that the defence of obedience to superior orders was a mitigating factor to be taken into account in determining the appropriate penalty, and sentenced the accused to only four years' imprisonment.

Professor Yoram Dinstein, in The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law (1965), analyzed the use of the defence of "obedience to superior orders" at the Leipzig trials and correctly concluded, at p. 19, that:

(I) As a general rule, a subordinate committing a criminal act pursuant to an order should not incur responsibility for it.

(2) This rule is inapplicable if the subordinate knew that the order entailed the commission of a crime, and obeyed it nonetheless.

(3) To determine whether the subordinate was aware of the fact that he had been ordered to perform a criminal act, the Court may use the auxiliary test of manifest illegality.

page 834

The later cases, particularly those involving the hospital ships, reflect the increasing difficulties in determining when the defence of carrying out the order of a superior may be properly considered. In Dover Castle, 16 A.J.I.L. 704 (1921), it would at first blush have been unthinkable that the defence could be utilized in the sinking of a hospital ship. Yet when the evidence established that the German High Command and members of the German Forces believed that hospital ships were being used for purely military purposes, perhaps as troop ships, the defence became one that not only was considered but also properly proved successful at trial. On the other hand the machine gunning and shelling of the survivors in the lifeboats in Llandovery Castle, 16 A.J.I.L. 708 (1921), was such an atrocious act and so adverse to all traditions and law of the sea that it was on its face manifestly unreasonable. As a result, the defence was unacceptable and the conviction correctly resulted. These cases also are an example of the necessity to consider the context in which the acts were committed. They cannot be viewed in any other way. The actions are the product of their times.

6114

The manifest illegality test has received a wide measure of international acceptance. Military orders can and must be obeyed unless they are manifestly unlawful. When is an order from a superior manifestly unlawful? It must be one that offends the conscience of every reasonable, right-thinking person; it must be an order which is obviously and flagrantly wrong. The order cannot be in a grey area or be merely questionable; rather it must patently and obviously be wrong. For example the order of King Herod to kill babies under two years of age would offend and shock the conscience of the most hardened soldier. A very helpful discussion as to when an order is manifestly unlawful can be found in the decision of the Israel District Military Court in the case of Ofer v. Chief Military Prosecutor (the Kafr Qassem case) [Appeal 279-283/58, Psakim (Judgments of the District Courts of Israel), vol. 44, at p. 362], cited in appeal before the Military Court of Appeal, Pal. Y.B. Int'l L. (1985), vol. 2, p. 69, at p. 108, and also cited in Green "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility", supra, at p. 169, note 8:

page 835

The identifying mark of a `manifestly unlawful' order must wave like a black flag above the order given, as a warning saying: `forbidden'. It is not formal unlawfulness, hidden or half-hidden, not unlawfulness that is detectable only by legal experts, that is the important issue here, but an overt and salient violation of the law, a certain and obvious unlawfulness that stems from the order itself, the criminal character of the order itself or of the acts it demands to be committed, an unlawfulness that pierces and agitates the heart, if the eye be not blind nor the heart closed or corrupt. That is the degree of `manifest' illegality required in order to annul the soldier's duty to obey and render him criminally responsible for his actions.

The most significant decisions which dealt with the superior order defence were rendered by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. There, for the first time a rule was set down which addressed the superior orders defence. Article 8 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, provides:

Article 8. The fact that the Defendant acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior shall not free him from responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment, if the Tribunal determines that Justice so requires.

In interpreting and justifying this provision, the Tribunal stated that:

The provisions of this article are in conformity with the law of all nations. That a soldier was ordered to kill or torture in violation of the international law of war has never been recognized as a defense to such acts of brutality, though, as the Charter here provides, the order may be urged in mitigation of the punishment. The true test, which is found in varying degrees in the criminal l[illegible] of most nations, is not the existence of the order, but whether moral choice was in fact possible. [Emphasis added.]

6115

page 836

(Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, vol. 22, (1946) (Official Text in the English Language), at p. 466.)

(ii) The "Moral Choice" Test, Coercion and Necessity

The "moral choice" test used by the International Military Tribunal has been criticized as undermining Art. 8, which effectively requires a subordinate to ignore a manifestly illegal order regardless of the consequences. (See for example: Morris Greenspan, The Modern Law of Land Warfare (1959), at p. 493.) However, other international legal scholars such as Professors Bassiouni (supra, at p. 427) and Dinstein (in The Defence of `Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law, supra, at p. 152) assert that the moral choice test as enunciated by the International Military Tribunal "was meant to complement the provision of Article 8 and not to undermine its foundations". According to this interpretation, Bassiouni, supra, notes at p. 437 that `obedience to superior orders' is not a defense ... to an international crime when the order is patently illegal and when the subordinate has a moral choice with respect to obeying or refusing to obey the order. But, if the subordinate is coerced or compelled to carry out the order, the norms for the defense of coercion (compulsion) should apply. In such cases, the issue is not justification, but excuse or mitigation of punishment.

A person may be compelled to obey superior orders either because of natural causes which place the individual in a condition of danger (necessity) or because of pressure which is brought to bear on him or her by another person (coercion). Bassiouni, supra, at p. 439, explains:

The two sources of compulsion though different may lead a person to harm another in order to avoid a greater or equal personal harm. Both are a concession to the instinct of human survival, but both are limited for policy and moral-ethical reasons, by positive and natural law.

page 837

The defence of obedience to superior orders based on compulsion is limited to "imminent, real, and inevitable" threats to the subordinate's life (The Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 Trials of War Criminals 470 (1948)). As Jeanne L. Bakker has pointed out in "The Defense of Obedience to Superior Orders: The Mens Rea Requirement" (1989), 17 Am. J. Crim. L. 55, the problem is to determine when threats become so imminent, real, and inevitable that they rise to the level of compulsion that disables a subordinate from forming a culpable state of mind.

I agree with Bakker, when she states, at pp. 72 and 73:

... a moral choice is available where subordinates have the freedom to choose between right and wrong courses of conduct without suffering detrimental consequences. Subordinates who choose to obey an illegal order when they could have disobeyed without suffering adverse consequences are guilty of criminal action.

...

6/16

Otto Ohlendorf, commanding officer of one of the notorious Einsatzgruppen (death wagon [sic], executed more than 90,000 "undesirable elements composed of Russians, gypsies, Jews and others" on the basis of an order that he recognized as "wrong", although he refused to consider "whether it was moral or immoral"(.) In view of his acknowledged unwillingness to exercise moral judgment, the tribunal refused him a plea of obedience to superior orders.

Bakker suggests that it is only when the soldier faces an imminent, real and inevitable threat to his or her life that the defence of compulsion may be used as a defence to the killing of innocent people. "Stern punishment" or demotion would not be sufficient. She states at p. 74:

Whether a subordinate's belief in the existence of an imminent, real and inevitable threat to his life is justified should be a function of circumstances surrounding the subordinate faced with an illegal order. A number of circumstances may be considered including age, education, intelligence, general conditions in which subordinates find themselves, length of time spent in action, nature of the hostilities, the type of enemy confronted, and opposing methods of warfare.

page 838

Circumstances that go directly to the state of mind of the offender confronted with a moral choice include the announced penalty for disobeying orders, the probable penalty for disobedience, the typical subordinate's reasonable beliefs about the penalty, the subordinate's belief as to what the penalty is, and any alternatives available to the subordinate to escape execution of the penalty.

The element of moral choice was, I believe, added to the superior orders defence for those cases where, although it can readily be established that the orders were manifestly illegal and that the subordinate was aware of their illegality, nonetheless, due to circumstances such as compulsion, there was no choice for the accused but to comply with the orders. In those circumstances the accused would not have the requisite culpable intent.

I would add this to the comments of the text writers. The lower the rank of the recipient of an order the greater will be the sense of compulsion that will exist and the less will be the likelihood that the individual will experience any real moral choice. It cannot be forgotten that the whole concept of the military is to a certain extent coercive. Orders must be obeyed. The question of moral choice will arise far less in the case of a private accused of a war crime or a crime against humanity than in the case of a general or other high ranking officer.

(iii)Obedience to Superior Orders Constituting Just Another Factual Element to be Taken into Account in Determining Mens Rea

Some writers have concluded that the requirement to obey superior orders should not be characterized as a defence. Rather it is simply one of the many factual circumstances which must be examined in determining whether the accused had the guilty mind required for a conviction.

page 839

6117

Professor Dinstein, at p. 88, states that:

... obedience to orders constitutes not a defence per se but only a factual element that may be taken into account in conjunction with the other circumstances of the given case within the compass of a defence based on lack of mens rea, that is, mistake of law or fact or compulsion.

Professor, later Sir, Hersch Lauterpacht expressed the same view in "The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes" (1944), 21 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 58, stating at p. 73:

... it is necessary to approach the subject of superior orders on the basis of general principles of criminal law, namely, as an element in ascertaining the existence of mens rea as a condition of accountability.
Bakker, supra, at p. 79, also argued, that "obedience to superior orders should be just another factual finding in the search for evidence indicative of the actor's state of mind when carrying out orders." (Emphasis in original.)

(iv) The Canadian Context

Section 7(3.74) of the Canadian Criminal Code provides that:

7. ...

(3.74) Notwithstanding subsection (3.73) and section 15, a person may be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71) even if the act or omission is committed in obedience to or in conformity with the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission.

Section 15 of the Criminal Code provides a defence against conviction when the accused acted "in obedience to the laws for the time being made and enforced by persons in de facto possession of the sovereign power in and over the place where the act or omission occurs".

page 840

It is apparent that s. 7(3.74) was enacted to provide judicial discretion to deny a defence of reliance on laws such as the Baky Order. The section reflects the internationally recognized exception to the rule of international law which provides that states have a duty to refrain from intervention in the international or external affairs of other states. (See Brownlie, supra, at p. 291.) Without this exception, countries such as World War II Germany, whose state policy of persecution was enshrined in national legislation, could effectively claim that the matter was one of domestic concern and that the principle of sovereign integrity prevented other states from interfering with their citizens who carried out their laws which constituted crimes against humanity.

In the absence of this exception, even Hitler could have defended charges against him by claiming that he was merely obeying the law of the country. As a German citizen he too was subject to the laws of the state, and was required to comply with the legislation mandating the "Final Solution". If obedience to de facto law were permitted to be used as an automatic defence then not even the most despotic tyrant, the author and enforcer of the most insidious laws against humanity, could be convicted for the crimes committed under his regime. This would be an unacceptable result. Hence, Canadian courts have the discretion to convict a person of a war crime or a crime against humanity notwithstanding the existence of laws in the country where the offence was committed which justified or even required such conduct.

6/18

The defence of obedience to de facto law is not the same as obedience to superior orders. Although at times, the superior orders which a soldier receives may become part of the domestic legal system, this would not change the nature of the order as far as the soldier was concerned. He or she would still be obliged to follow the order unless it were manifestly unlawful. Thus, the removal of the automatic right to claim obedience to de facto law does not affect the defence of obedience to superior orders.

page 841

It follows that the trial judge was correct in putting the defence of obedience to military orders to the jury. In so doing he was not permitting the respondent to plead obedience to the laws of Hungary in effect at the time of the alleged actions. He reminded the jury of the expert testimony to the effect that the respondent, as a Captain of the Gendarmerie, would have been subject to the orders of General Baky. Then he instructed the jury that the Baky Order was unconstitutional according to Hungarian law, but that their task was to determine whether a reasonable person in the respondent's position would have found that the order was manifestly illegal and whether the respondent would have had a choice to obey the order or not. The trial judge did not characterize the defence as being obedience to laws of Hungary in existence at the time of the alleged offences. Rather, it was properly characterized as obedience to military orders.

I can find no fault in these instructions. Once again the situation must be considered in its context. This was a time of war. The Russian armies were approaching the borders of Hungary. Hungary was in effect an occupied state. German forces were in command and in control of the country. No matter how unlawful the Baky Order was, it was open to the jury to find that it would be difficult to expect a Captain of the Gendarmerie to disobey that order and that to the accused the Baky Order was a military order. It was in that light that his defence of obeying an order from a superior had to be considered.

The appellant argues that the effect of s. 7(3.74), which limits the accused's right to plead obedience to de facto law, is to preclude the use of the peace officer defence under s. 25 of the Criminal Code. The thrust of this argument is that s. 25(2), which permits the accused to rely on the law notwithstanding the fact that the law may be defective, is contrary to the purpose of s. 7 (3.74). However, I am of the view that the trial judge correctly interpreted the application of the peace officer defence in the context of a war crime and a crime against humanity. The purpose of s. 25(2) is to provide legal protection to a police officer, who, acting in good faith and on a reasonable belief that his or her actions are justified by law, later finds out that those actions were not authorized because the law was found to be defective.

page 842

Section 25 is akin to the defence of mistake of fact. Unless, the law is manifestly illegal, the police officer must obey and implement that law. Police officers cannot be expected to undertake a comprehensive legal analysis of every order or law that they are charged with enforcing before taking action. Therefore, if it turns out that they have followed an illegal order they may plead the peace officer defence just as the military officer may properly put forward the defence of obedience to superior orders under certain limited conditions. The qualification is that the military officer must act in good faith and must have reasonable grounds for believing that the actions taken were justified. An officer acting pursuant to a manifestly unlawful order or law would not be able to defend his or her actions on the grounds they were justified under s. 25 of the Criminal Code.

6119

In the case at bar, the trial judge clearly instructed the jury that if the law was manifestly illegal, in the sense that its provisions were such that it had the factual qualities of a crime against humanity or a war crime, then the accused could not rely on the peace officer defence under s. 25 of the Code. The written instructions provided to the jury make it clear that the peace officer defence would not be available if a reasonable person in the accused's position would know that his or her actions had the factual quality of a crime against humanity or a war crime. The peace officer defence would be available only if the law or orders were not manifestly illegal and if the accused honestly, and on reasonable grounds, believed his actions to be justified. For example, the following instructions given to the jury were, in my view, entirely appropriate.

page 843

So it is very important to judge a policeman or soldier, anyone subject to military discipline with the test of whether they acted honestly and reasonably in all the circumstances at that time and in that place.

These defences are limited. They depend on honesty, they depend on reasonable conduct, they depend on not using excessive force. They aren't a licence to commit a crime. They aren't a licence if some government or some deputy minister or some under secretary of state goes off the rails and tells the policeman or soldier to do something that is clearly illegal. These defences are no licence to commit obvious crimes in the name of the government.

These instructions did not permit the accused to plead obedience to the laws of his country.

It is worth noting that s. 7(3.74) is permissive. It provides that a person may be convicted of an offence under s. 7(3.71) even if the actions were taken in conformity with de facto law. Thus, the existence of a law which is not manifestly unlawful and which appears to justify the conduct of the accused may, under certain conditions, be a factor to be considered in determining whether in acting under those laws the officer had the requisite guilty mind. More will be said on this issue when the constitutionality of the provisions is considered.

(B)Whether Mistake of Fact Should Have Been Put to the Jury in Conjunction With the Other Defences and With the Other Elements of the Offences

(i)Whether Mistake of Fact Can be Combined With the Military Orders and Peace Officer Defences

The appellant argues here that the trial judge improperly combined the military orders and peace officer defences with an issue going to mens rea, that is, mistake of fact. The appellant argues that, in effect, the trial judge put mistake of law to the jury. The appellant further argues that the trial judge erred in incorporating into the definition of the defences, the component elements of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

page 844

6120

I cannot accept these arguments. The trial judge correctly instructed the jury that the accused charged with an offence under s. 7(3.71) cannot claim that, although a reasonable person would in the circumstances have known that the actions allegedly performed had the factual quality of crimes against humanity or war crimes, he mistakenly thought that they were lawful and that therefore he was justified in following orders and performing the actions. If this were so then an accused could always claim the defence of obedience to military orders by stating that the illegality of the order simply did not occur to him or her at the time. This would be stretching the defence beyond all reasonable limits. If it were permitted it would require the Crown to establish that the accused knew the orders and his or her actions were manifestly unlawful.

Rather, it is sufficient if it is established that the accused was aware of the factual qualities of his or her actions, provided that the jury finds that those actions come within the definition of crimes against humanity or war crimes and that a reasonable person in his or her position would know that orders to perform such actions would be manifestly unlawful. Further, if it is established that the accused had a valid moral choice as to whether to obey the orders, the accused will not be able to avail him- or herself of the defence of obedience to superior orders regardless of what his or her personal thoughts were concerning the lawfulness of the actions. It is not a requirement that the accused knew or believed, according to his or her own moral code or knowledge of the law, that the orders and his or her actions were unlawful.

These same principles apply with respect to the peace officer defence. As the trial judge correctly stated:

page 845

When the order is clearly unlawful in the sense I have described it [it clearly has the factual quality of a war crime or crime against humanity], there's no defence. No peace officer is required or authorized by law to do anything that is clearly a war crime or a crime against humanity.

He was also correct in instructing the jury that when the order or law is not manifestly unlawful and the peace officer or soldier acts on reasonable grounds, he is justified in using as much force as is required for the purpose even if it is later discovered that the law was defective. He properly told the jury that "[i]f the peace officer or soldier honestly believes the law or order is lawful domestically, he acts on reasonable grounds at the time, he has a right to be wrong even if it turns out later he was, in fact, wrong". In my view, this is a correct instruction on the defence of mistake of fact in combination with the peace officer and military orders defences. Mistake of fact is applicable only in circumstances where the order (in the case of the superior orders defence) or law (in the case of the peace officer defence) is not manifestly unlawful.

In my opinion the trial judge did an admirable job of combining these defences with the elements of the crimes in such a way that the jury was able to follow a logical and legally correct process of reasoning when considering their verdict.

(ii) Summary With Respect to Availability of Defences

6121

The defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer defence are available to members of the military or police forces in prosecutions for war crimes and crimes against humanity. Those defences are subject to the manifest illegality test. That is to say, the defences will not be available where the orders in question were manifestly unlawful. Even where the orders were manifestly unlawful, the defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer defence will be available in those circumstances where the accused had no moral choice as to whether to follow the orders. That is to say, there was such an air of compulsion and threat to the accused that the accused had no alternative but to obey the orders. As an example, the accused could be found to have been compelled to carry out the manifestly unlawful orders in circumstances where the accused would be shot if he or she failed to carry out the orders.

page 846

(iii) Whether the Defences of Mistake of Fact and Obedience to Superior Orders Should Have Been Put to the Jury

The appellant argues that the trial judge erred in putting the defences of mistake of fact and obedience to superior orders to the jury since there was no air of reality to these defences. It is said that because the accused did not testify, nor call any evidence, there was no evidence to support an inference that he mistakenly believed that the Hungarian decrees and orders, particularly the "Baky Order" and the "train schedule", authorized the actions he allegedly took. The appellant further argues that since the respondent's position was that he did not commit the offences, (with the exception of the acts of robbery which he admitted doing but claimed he believed he was authorized to perform) he could not then claim that if it was found that he had committed the offences in question, he was excused because he honestly believed his actions were lawful since he was obeying orders.

It is trite law that a trial judge must instruct the jury only upon those defences for which there is a real factual basis. A defence for which there is no evidentiary foundation should not be put to the jury (Kelsey v. The Queen, [1953] 1 S.C.R. 220). A defence should not be put to the jury if a reasonable jury, properly instructed, would have been unable to acquit on the evidence presented in support of that defence. However, if a reasonable jury properly instructed could acquit on the basis of the evidence giving rise to the defence, then the defence must be put to the jury. It is for the trial judge to decide whether the evidence is sufficient to give rise to the defence as this is a question of law (Parnerkar v. The Queen, [1974] S.C.R. 449; Dunlop v. The Queen, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 881). There is thus a two-stage process to be followed. The trial judge must look at all the evidence to consider its sufficiency. Then, if the evidence meets the threshold, it should be put before the jury which will weigh it and decide whether it raises a reasonable doubt. See: Wigmore on Evidence (1983), vol. IA, at pp. 968-69; R. v. Faid, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 265, at p. 276. This is all that is meant by the requirement of sufficient evidence.

page 847

I cannot accept the appellant's contention that merely because the respondent chose not to testify at trial that the defences of mistake of fact and obedience to superior orders became unavailable to him. It matters not who put forward the evidence which supports the "air of reality" test; the crucial question is whether the evidence is sufficient to support an acquittal. In my view, the respondent has correctly noted that evidence of the following circumstances was entered at trial which gave the defences of mistake of fact and obedience to superior orders an air of reality.

6/22

(1) Finta's position in a para-military police organization;

(2) the existence of a war;

(3) an imminent invasion by Soviet forces;

(4) the Jewish sentiment in favour of the Allied forces;

(5) the general, publicly stated belief in newspapers in Hungary that the Jews were subversive and disloyal to the war efforts of Hungary;

(6) the universal public expression in the newspapers cited by one of the witnesses of approval of the deportation of Hungarian Jews;

page 848

(7) the organizational activity involving the whole Hungarian state together with their ally, Germany, in the internment and deportation;

(8) the open and public manner of the confiscations under an official, hierarchical sanction;

(9) the deposit of seized property with the National Treasury or in the Szeged synagogue.

The evidence of the state of the war, that the country was occupied by German forces, the existence of state-sanctioned conduct by police officers in a state of emergency, and the imminent invasion by the Soviet army which was but 100 km from Szeged was sufficient in my view to give an air of reality to the defence of obedience to superior orders. The evidence from the newspapers of public approval for the deportation, and the open manner in which the confiscations took place could have supported the defence of mistaken belief that the orders to undertake the actions which gave rise to the charges against the respondent were lawful.

Although the respondent only admitted to having taken the property of those people confined in the brickyard, the jury could have found that the respondent aided and abetted the deportation and internment. The fact that the respondent only admitted to confiscating the property did not mean that the jury would believe that that was all he did. Thus, the defenses were properly put to the jury on this basis. Additionally, a war crime and a crime against humanity may be committed by omission as well as by acts. If the jury found that the respondent had committed a war crime or a crime against humanity by having knowledge of the unlawful confinement and kidnapping and doing nothing to stop it, the respondent would be entitled to have the defences put before the jury. Thus, the defences may have been applicable to all counts depending on how the jury viewed the facts. Since there was an air of reality to the defences the trial judge acted properly in putting them to the jury.

page 849

(4) Inflammatory Address

6123

The trial of this matter was long and complex. It raised issues of a highly emotional and dec troubling nature. In this context it is perhaps understandable that both defence and Crown counsel made inappropriate remarks to the jury. Among these were suggestions by defence counsel that the jury should stop what was described as the application of "diabolical" legislation. However, in my view, the errors made by both lawyers were satisfactorily corrected by the trial judge in his charge to the jury. For example, in order to correct the suggestion made by defence counsel that the jury could choose to ignore the law the trial judge stated:

If I make a mistake, it can and will be corrected. If you make a mistake it probably can't be corrected. That is why your task is so important.

The defence counsel in his address predicted accurately I would say something like that. Defence counsel said something that needs to be corrected. He said that that position I just expressed to you is one that most people in hierarchies of command rely on. He said that position is similar to the military where a captain follows the order from a lieutenant-colonel, relying on his superiors, in public acts like the entrainment, and each of us relies on the government's judgment of authority, which might later on turn out to be wrong.

Now, that wasn't a very helpful comparison. You make up your own mind whether a reasonable person in the position of the accused can honestly believe the Baky order or the train schedule order were lawful and did not involve racial or religious persecution or inhumane acts. Don't get the idea you are following orders or I am following orders. There is all the difference in the world between someone following government orders and someone like you and me who has a duty to apply the law in all due process and all the principles of fundamental justice and all the rights of the accused.

You are not following orders in this case from anyone and neither am I. You are independent and so am I. You are judges. We do not follow any orders. We go wherever the path of the law takes us. No matter whether we think it will please someone in authority or displease someone in authority. Your sense of responsibility and [mine] come from our oaths, our knowledge that what we do is the right thing. None of us, you or I, are following government orders. We are going down the path of the law as interpreted by the independent courts of this country. It isn't helpful to draw a parallel between someone following government orders and independent judges like you and me.

page 850

With regard to defence counsel's descriptions of the Code provisions as "diabolical", the trial judge stated:

Defence counsel called diabolical the law which you have a sworn duty to apply. He is entitled to his opinion but I am not sure how helpful his opinion is in the difficult duty you have to perform. It really isn't relevant to your judicial task what you think of the wisdom of the law. As to its fundamental fairness under our constitution, this court, in this case, has given this law a clean bill of health and has said it does comply with the principles of fundamental justice.

You are here to judge the accused; you are not here to judge the law. Judges do judge the law in this country in a system with a lot of safeguards. In Canada courts do not leave it to the government or parliament to decide whether the law conforms with the principles of fundamental justice. I am not here to defend the law and I am not here to criticise the law. Because you near criticized as a diabolical law, I think you are entitled to know this court has ruled the law, which you took the oath to apply, the defence counsel calls diabolical, is constitutionally valid. This court in this case has ruled this law complies with the principles of fundamental justice and our higher courts provide a further safeguard to the accused on that issue.

6/24

The trial judge went on to correct the statements made by defence counsel that the jurors might at some point find themselves on trial for persecution of the accused. He spoke at some length, and in clear and unequivocal terms instructed the jury that they were not to take into consideration any other concerns. They were simply to determine whether the evidence established the accused's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

page 851

In further response to the inappropriate comments on the part of defence counsel he stated: "Your oath requires you to deliver a just and fair verdict on the law and the evidence and not to send a message to one side or the other in some dispute in this country or some other country about what policy should be followed in respect of the suspected war crimes or crimes against humanity". The trial judge's instructions to the jury were clear and unambiguous. They would have greatly assisted the jurors to focus on the task before them and to reach a verdict based solely on the evidence. He discounted any suggestions on the part of defence counsel that the jury ought to take any other improper considerations into account in making their decision.

He also commented on Crown counsel's treatment of some of the evidence in these terms:

While I am on the subject of counsels' addresses, let me also say it didn't seem to me helpful for Crown counsel to refer to the degrading body searches carried out upon the women in the ghetto or other places, or to the cruel comments by that gendarme captain Dr. Uray at a meeting in Munkacs, that the accused did not attend, about putting 100 people in the boxcar packed like sardines and those who couldn't take it, would perish. There isn't a scrap of evidence here, the accused had anything to do with any body searches or he attended that meeting that Dr. Uray made that comment at or that he knew about the comment or heard about it or agreed with it or was even aware of it.

It is most important in this case to separate in your minds the things the accused knew and the things he didn't know and not to attribute to him personally those things about which he personally knew nothing.

Unfortunate statements were indeed made by counsel for the respondent. They were unprofessional and prejudicial. Yet at the conclusion of the jury addresses the trial judge very carefully instructed the jury with regard to all the significant prejudicial statements made by counsel for the respondent. At the conclusion of a long, difficult, and emotional trial it is only natural that a jury would turn to a trial judge as the impartial arbiter for instructions and directions with regard to the case. In this case their trust was well placed. The jury received from the unbiased arbiter, clear, unequivocal directions pertaining to all the improper statements of counsel for the accused. It is those instructions that they would hear last and take with them to the jury room and rely upon during the course of their deliberations. The final instructions of the trial judge are rightly assumed to be of great significance to the jury. That is why these directions are carefully reviewed by appellate courts. Here those instructions were sufficient to rectify any prejudicial effect that may have been caused by the unfortunate statements of counsels in their addresses.

page 852

6/25

Neither counsel was a model of perfection in his address to the jury, although I hasten to add that the remarks of the counsel for the respondent were far more prejudicial. Nonetheless the directions given by the trial judge pertaining to the counsels' addresses remedied any prejudice that might have arisen.

(5) Admissibility of the Evidence of Dallos

The evidence of Dallos came in two forms. The first was a deposition given by him to the Hungarian state police in Szeged on January 16, 1947. On that occasion, Dallos was told of his obligation to tell the truth and advised that he might have to confirm his testimony by oath. Dallos testified that the Commandant of the Gendarmerie guarding the Jews confined in the brickyard was a man by the name of Bodolay. Captain Finta, he said, was in charge of those detained and the taking of their possessions.

The second was a statement made before the People's Tribunal of Szeged in the form of a deposition, in which he stated again that Bodolay was in charge of the brick factory along with another man by the name of Narai. Neither form of evidence was subject to cross-examination. Both contained hearsay. The majority of the Court of Appeal observed that there is an element of fairness arising from the right of confrontation implicit in the adversarial system. However, the majority held that the trial judge did not err in admitting the evidence in light of this Court's judgment in R. v. Khan, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 531. The majority determined that the requirement of necessity was clearly met in this case as the declarant was dead. It also determined that Dallos' statement had the requisite indicia of reliability. It noted, at p. 136:

page 853

The statements were made on a solemn occasion, somewhat akin to a court proceeding, by a person adverse to the party seeking to tender the statement. They appear to have been made by a person having peculiar means of knowledge of the events described in the statement, and the statements themselves distinguish between events within Dallos' personal knowledge and events about which he had merely received information from others.

The majority also determined that the fact that the statements were officially recorded and preserved favoured their admissibility. It held that cross-examination could shed little light on the truth of what Dallos said since only he could testify to that. On this issue they observed, at p. 136:

The cross-examination of which the Crown says it was deprived could only clarify what was said by Dallos. As in the case of a business record, there is little reason here to doubt the accuracy, as opposed to the truth, of what Dallos is reported to have said.

Finally, the majority held that the exception to the hearsay rule in the form of statements made against penal interest by a person who is unavailable could only be invoked by the defence. It concluded that it would be unfair to allow the Crown to prosecute an accused today with the assistance of evidence which had been in existence for some 46 years and which the accused not given the opportunity to challenge.

6126

page 854

In R. v. Williams (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 356, Martin J.A. stated that there is a need for a flexible application of some rules of evidence in order to prevent a miscarriage of justice. He said at p. 378: "It seems to me that a court has a residual discretion to relax in favour of the accused a strict rule of evidence where it is necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice and where the danger against which an exclusionary rule aims to safeguard does not exist." His words are particularly apposite to this case.

In R. v. Rowbotham (1988), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 1, at p. 57, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that the rules of evidence were properly relaxed in order to permit a question to be asked of a witness the answer to which constituted inadmissible hearsay. This was permitted because to do otherwise would have denied the accused the right to make full answer and defence, a right encompassed in the term "fundamental justice" now enshrined in s. 7 of the Charter.

In R. v. Khan, supra, this Court observed that in recent years courts have adopted a more flexible approach to the hearsay rule, rooted in the principles and the policies underlying the hearsay rule, rather than in the narrow strictures of the traditional exceptions. The requirements for the admission of hearsay evidence are that it be necessary and reliable. Necessity may be present where no other evidence is available. The testimony may be found to be reliable when the person making the statement is disinterested, and the statement is made before any litigation is undertaken. It is also helpful if the declarant is possessed of a peculiar or special means of knowledge of the event. See also R. v. Smith, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 915; R. v. B. (K.G.), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 740. The evidence of Dallos meets all these criteria and was therefore admissible.

I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal that there was a firm foundation supporting the trial judge's ruling that the evidence of Dallos was admissible. The importance of putting all relevant and reliable evidence that is available before the trier of fact in order to provide the clearest possible picture of what happened at the time of the offences is indisputable. It would have been unfair to have deprived the respondent of the benefit of having all relevant, probative and reliable evidence before the jury. This is particularly true of evidence that could be considered to be helpful to his position.

page 855

(6) Trial Judge's Calling Evidence of Dallos, Kemeny and Ballo Himself

The trial judge found that the evidence of Dallos was essential to the narrative as he was in a unique position to observe directly the command structure in the brickyard.

With respect to the evidence of Ballo and Kemeny, the trial judge ruled that their evidence was essential to the unfolding of the narrative on which the prosecution was based. In his decision to call the evidence himself he also considered their evidence to be significant in relation to the confinement, to the question as to who was in command of the brickyard, and to the quality of evidence of the other survivors who testified that Finta was the commander.

6127

Additionally, he considered the fact that the evidence of Kemeny and Ballo could potentially support an inference quite different from that left by all the other survivors. Kemeny was the only living witness who, as one of the Jewish leaders, was involved in the administrative centre of the brickyard, including the preparation of the list of names of those who were to be deported from the brickyard. The transcript of her testimony at Finta's trial in Hungary revealed that she could not identify Finta as the commander of the brickyard. Indeed, she went further and said that she never heard his name. Ballo was the only witness who testified regarding the house in the area of the brickyard, guarded by a Gendarme, in which a German officer had his seat. This could have been viewed by a jury as strong evidence that the commander of the brickyard was a German officer.

page 856

The majority of the Court of Appeal held that the evidence of Dallos, Kemeny and Ballo should not have been called by the trial judge, as he was moved to proceed in this way in order to preserve the right of the defence to address the jury last. With respect, I disagree. In a case such as this where the evidence of witnesses is based on events that occurred over 45 years ago, it is essential that all evidence which is relevant, probative and relatively reliable be admitted. The jury must have the benefit of all the testimony pertaining to events which occurred at the time of the alleged offences. Furthermore, it would have been manifestly unfair if the jury had returned a verdict of guilty without having considered the available evidence which suggested that Finta was not the commander of the brickyard. Since such a possibility existed, the trial judge correctly decided to call the evidence on his own behalf since both sides refused to call the evidence themselves. In my view, this was entirely appropriate. What happened to the Jewish people in Hungary was despicably cruel and inhumane. Yet those who are charged with those fearful crimes are entitled to a fair trial. It is the fundamental right of all who come before the courts in Canada. In order to ensure a fair trial for Finta, the evidence of these witnesses had to be presented to the jury.

The evidence was admissible. It was important in determining the outcome of this case. It was known to be available to the court. If a miscarriage of justice was to be avoided then the trial judge was bound to call this evidence. I can see no alternative to that decision. This is one of those rare cases where the residual discretion resting with a trial judge to call witnesses was properly exercised.

(i) Canadian and English Law

It has long been recognized in Canada and in England that in criminal cases a trial judge has a limited discretion to call witnesses without the consent of the parties. This step may be taken if, in the opinion of the trial judge it is necessary for the discovery of truth or in the interests of justice. This discretion is justified in criminal cases because "the liberty of the accused is at stake and the object of the proceedings is to see that justice be done as between the accused and the state" (Sopinka, Lederman and Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (1992), at p. 826).

page 857

6128

The discretion should only be exercised rarely and then with extreme care, so as not to inte with the adversarial nature of the trial procedure or prejudice the accused. It should not be exercised after the close of the defence case, unless the matter was one which could not have been foreseen. (See Sopinka, Lederman and Bryant, supra, at p. 826; Peter K. McWilliams, Canadian Criminal Evidence (3rd ed. 1988), at para. 27:10830 "Right of judge to call witnesses", at pp. 27-15 and 27-16; Cross on Evidence (7th ed. 1990), at pp. 266-68); Phipson on Evidence (14th ed. 1990), at pp. 219-20; Archbold, Pleading, Evidence and Practice in Criminal Cases (45th ed. 1993), at p. 1/555; see also annotation by Philip C. Stenning, "'One Blind Man To See Fair Play': The Judge's Right To Call Witnesses" (1974), 24 C.R.N.S. 49, and Michael Newark and Alec Samuels, "Let the Judge Call the Witness", [1969] Crim. L. Rev. 399.)

There is very little case law on how the discretion should be exercised. In his annotation, supra, Stenning enumerates seven propositions derived from English case law. These propositions were cited with approval as correctly stating the Canadian law in Campbell v. The Queen (1982), 31 C.R. (3d) 166 (P.E.I.S.C.), at pp. 172-75, per Campbell J., and in R. v. S. (P.R.) (1987), 38 C.C.C. (3d) 109 (Ont H.C.), per McKinlay J. (as she then was), affirming decision of Kurisko Dist. Ct. J. A summary of these propositions is as follows:

1.The trial judge may call a witness not called by either the prosecution or the defence, and without the consent of either the prosecution or the defence, if in his opinion this course is necessary in the interest of justice: R. v. Harris (1927), 20 Cr. App. R. 86 at p. 89

page 858

(K.B.); R. v. Holden (1838), 8 Car. & P. 606, 173 E.R. 638; R. v. Brown, [1967] 3 C.C.C. 210, at p. 215, per Hyde J. (dissenting in part on another issue), at pp. 219-20 per Taschereau J. (for the majority); R. v. Bouchard (1973), 24 C.R.N.S. 31, (N.S. Co. Ct.), at p. 46; Campbell v. The Queen, supra, at pp. 172-75; R. v. S. (P.R.), supra, at pp. 111, 119-24; R. v. Black (1990), 55 C.C.C. (3d) 421 (N.S.S.C.A.D.), at p. 425.

2.The right to call a witness after the close of the case of the defence should normally be limited to a case where a matter was one which could not have been foreseen.

3.A witness may be called after the close of the defence not in order to supplement the evidence of the prosecution but to ascertain the truth and put all the evidence before the jury.

4.The trial judge may not exercise his right to call a witness after the jury has retired, even at the request of the jury.

5.In a non-jury case, in the absence of special circumstances, it is wrong to allow new evidence to be called once a trial judge has retired, and probably after the defence has closed its case.

6.A judge ought not to exercise his discretion to call a witness if the defence would in no way be prejudiced by calling the witness. The defence should not be permitted in this way to use the judge to call their witness to give him a greater appearance of objectivity.

7.The calling of the witness after the defence has closed its case is a factor which may be taken into account on appeal.

None of these propositions is really helpful in deciding how the trial judge should have exercised his discretion in this case. In a number of reported decisions, trial judges have called witnesses themselves and either been upheld on appeal, or not appealed. For example in a murder trial, where three doctors examined the body of the deceased and had a difference of opinion, and only two of those doctors were called by the prosecution, the trial judge called the third doctor (R. v. Holden, supra). In a trial for "riot" and wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, the trial judge called two eye witnesses (R. v. Tregear, [1967] 2 Q.B. 574 (C.A.)). In a trial for impaired driving the trial judge called a doctor who could provide the factual basis for earlier expert testimony given on the defence of automatism (R. v. Bouchard, supra). In a trial for indecent assault and sexual assault the accused sought to adduce polygraph evidence and the crown called an expert to testify to the unreliability of such evidence. The accused could not afford an expert to support the opposing position. The trial judge called an expert on the reliability of polygraphs, so the court would have the benefit of hearing evidence on both sides of the issue (R. v. S. (P.R.), supra).

6129

page 859

(ii) American Law

The American law is essentially the same as the Canadian and British law. A trial judge has the discretion to call witnesses whom the parties do not choose to present: McCormick on Evidence (4th ed. 1992), vol. 1, at pp. 23, 26; Annot., 67 A.L.R.2d 538; Annot., 53 A.L.R. Fed. 498. United States v. Lutwak, 195 F.2d 748 (7th Cir. 1952), at pp. 754-55, aff'd 344 U.S. 604 (1952), rehearing denied 345 U.S. 919 (1953), refers to the discretion in these words, at pp. 754-55:

Indeed, it is generally recognized that where there is a witness to a crime for whose veracity and integrity the prosecuting attorney is not willing to vouch, he is not compelled to call the witness, but that the court, in its discretion, may do so and allow cross examination by both sides within proper bounds.

page 860

Another statement of the discretion is found in United States v. Marzano, 149 F.2d 923 (2nd Cir. 1945), at p. 925:

It is permissible, though it is seldom very desirable, for a judge to call and examine a witness whom the parties do not wish to call.... A judge is more than a moderator; he is charged to see that the law is properly administered, and it is a duty which he cannot discharge by remaining inert.

A similar statement was made, obiter, in United States v. Liddy, 509 F.2d 428 (D.C. 1974), at p. 438, certiorari denied 420 U.S. 911 (1975):

The precepts of fair trial and judicial objectivity do not require a judge to be inert. The trial judge is properly governed by the interest of justice and truth, and is not compelled to act as if he were merely presiding at a sporting match. He is not a "mere moderator". As Justice Frankfurter put it, "(f)ederal judges are not referees at prize-fights but functionaries of justice". ... A federal trial judge has inherent authority not only to comment on the evidence adduced by counsel, but also -- in appropriate instances -- to call or recall and question witnesses. He may do this when he believes the additional testimony will be helpful to the jurors in ascertaining the truth and discharging their fact-finding function.

6/30

Some other federal cases recognizing this discretion are: Young v. United States, 107 F.2d 490 (5th Cir. 1939); Estrella-Ortega v. United States, 423 F.2d 509 (9th Cir. 1970); United States v. Pape, 144 F.2d 778 (2nd Cir. 1944); Steinberg v. United States, 162 F.2d 120 (5th Cir. 1947); United States v. Browne, 313 F.2d 197 (2nd Cir. 1963).

It has been observed that appellate courts should be hesitant to interfere in the trial judge's exercise of his discretion:

An appellate court should not interfere with the district court's performance of that sensitive task [exercising the discretion] absent a clear showing of an abuse of discretion, resulting in prejudice to the defendant.

(Estrella-Ortega v. United States, supra, at p. 511.)

page 861

In the United States the trial judge's discretion to call witnesses exists both at common law, and under Rule 614(a) of the Federal Rules of Evidence, which has been held to be declaratory of the pre-existing common law: United States v. Ostrer, 422 F.Supp. 93 (S.D.N.Y. 1976), at p. 103.

(iii)Summary as to the Discretion of the Trial Judge to Call Witnesses and the Exercise of that Discretion in this Case

In order to take this unusual and serious step of calling witnesses, the trial judge must believe it is essential to exercise the discretion in order to do justice in the case. In the case at bar, where the trial judge had decided that certain evidence was essential to the narrative it was a reasonable and proper exercise of the discretion to call the evidence if the Crown refused to do so. It is essential in a case where the events took place 45 years ago that all material evidence be put before the jury. With the passage of time it becomes increasingly difficult to get at the truth of events; witnesses die or cannot be located, memories fade, and evidence can be so easily forever lost. It is then essential that in such a case all available accounts are placed before the court. The majority of the Court of Appeal dismissed concerns about the problems of defending in this case by saying that all cases pose difficulties in presenting a defence. With respect, I think this fails to recognize that this case presents very real difficulties for the defence in getting at the truth which are not comparable to other cases due to the length of time that has elapsed since the events at issue occurred.

The Court of Appeal erred in holding that the trial judge was wrong to take into account the fact that if he did not call the evidence the defence would lose its right to address the jury last. In a case where the trial judge has found that the evidence in question should have been called by the Crown, the issue of who addresses the jury last is indeed relevant. If this were not so it would be open to the Crown not to call certain evidence in order to force the defence to give up its right to address the jury last. I am certainly not suggesting the Crown acted for improper reasons in this case, but it seems to me that the opportunity for such abuse should not be left open. Further, I think the trial judge's concern for the order of addresses to the jury was secondary to his finding that the evidence was essential to the narrative, which was the principal reason for calling the evidence himself.

page 862

6/31

Finally, I do not think the appellant can be correct that the trial judge should have waited until after the defence had decided whether or not to call evidence before he called the evidence in question himself. The trial judge could not do that without risking offending the rule that a trial judge should not call evidence him- or herself after the close of the defence case unless the matter was unforeseeable. If the trial judge had waited, and the defence had elected not to call evidence, the trial judge would have been prevented from calling the evidence, as the matter was readily foreseeable, and calling it at that point would have been prejudicial to the defence.

(7) Jury Instructions on the Identification Evidence

The appellant argues that the trial judge improperly linked the Dallos evidence to the Crown's identification evidence of the respondent, and thereby called into question the Crown's viva voce evidence which identified the respondent as the commander of the brickyard. A witness by the name of Mrs. Fonyo testified that there was someone who looked like the respondent who was not in charge of the brickyard. She stated that Finta was in charge of the brickyard. The appellant argues that the trial judge's linking of Mrs. Fonyo's evidence to that of the witness Dallos may have created a strong impression in the mind of the jury that Finta was the look-alike while a man by the name of Lieutenant Bodolay was the commander of the brickyard. The appellant argues that there was little evidence to support such an inference and the trial judge should have indicated this to the jury.

page 863

A reading of the trial judge's charge to the jury leads me to believe that his instructions on this point were satisfactory. He did not dwell on this connection, and his reference to it was preceded and followed by admonitions to be very cautious about the weight to be attached to the evidence. Furthermore, throughout his charge to the jury, the trial judge reminded the jury that they were the judges of the facts, and that they were free to disregard any inferences which he may have suggested that they make. In other words, they were free to disagree with his conclusions on the evidence and to draw their own inferences based on their perceptions of the strength of the witnesses' testimony and other factors. Thus, in my view, the jury was not misdirected on the identification issue.

Conclusion on the Appeal

For the reasons stated above, I am of the view that the appeal should be dismissed.

The Cross-Appeal (8) and (9)

Leave was granted to the respondent to cross-appeal. The Chief Justice stated the following constitutional questions:

1.Does s. 7(3.74) of the Criminal Code violate ss. 7, 11(a), 11(b), 11(d), 11(g), 12 or 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2.If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, is s. 7(3.74) of the Criminal Code a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society and justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

6132

3.Does s. 7(3.71) read with s. 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code violate ss. 7, 11(a), 11(b), 11(d), 11 (g), 12 or 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

4.If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, is s. 7(3.71) read with s. 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society and justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

page 864

(i)Do Sections 7(3.74) and (3.76) of the Criminal Code Violate Section 7 of the Charter Because These Purport to Remove the Protection of Section 15 of the Criminal Code?

(8)Charter Violation

The respondent argues that the removal of the defence of obedience to de facto law by operation of s. 7(3.74) of the Criminal Code constitutes a violation of the principles of fundamental justice. It is contended that it is reasonable to assume that because Finta acted in obedience to the law (the Baky Order), he did not have the guilty mind required to found a conviction for the offence. In other words, he might well have had an honest, though mistaken belief that the Baky Order was lawful and therefore, if he acted in obedience to the law, he cannot be faulted. I cannot agree.

It was noted earlier that s. 7(3.74) is permissive rather than mandatory. There may well be situations where the law is not manifestly unlawful, and as a consequence the accused may be able to argue mistaken belief in the validity of the law successfully. The existence of a law which is unlawful but not manifestly so will not give rise to a defence of obedience to de facto law per se. Rather, it will be one of the factors that may be taken into account in determining whether the individual had the requisite guilty mind. However if the jury finds that the accused was aware of factual circumstances which would render his or her actions a crime against humanity or a war crime, it would be highly unlikely that a mistaken belief in the validity of a law could provide a defence to the commission of the inhumane acts. However, the removal of the defence of obedience to de facto law does not relieve the Crown of its obligation to prove the requisite mens rea. As well, the accused is entitled to raise any defence that may be appropriate, such as obedience to military orders. The issue was aptly dealt with in Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law (7th ed. 1992), at pp. 261-62, in this way:

page 865

Though there is little authority on this question, it is safe to assert that it is not a defence for D merely to show that the act was done by him in obedience to the orders of a superior, whether military or civil.... The fact that D was acting under orders may, nevertheless, be very relevant. It may negative mens rea by, for example, showing that D was acting under a mistake of fact or that he had a claim of right to do as he did, where that is a defence; or, where the charge is one of negligence, it may show that he was acting reasonably.

6133

I agree with Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. that s. 7(3.74) does not, by permitting the removal of this defence, result in a breach of fundamental justice. In R. v. Holmes, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 914, Dickson C.J. stated that Parliament may re-define the meaning of "excuse", by expanding or narrowing it to include only certain excuses. In R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30, Dickson C.J. explained the rationale for this at p. 70:

The criminal law is a very special form of governmental regulation, for it seeks to express our society's collective disapprobation of certain acts and omissions. When a defence is provided, especially a specifically-tailored defence to a particular charge, it is because the legislator has determined that the disapprobation of society is not warranted when the conditions of the defence are met.

When the Criminal Code provides that a defence is to be expressly excluded it is because Parliament has determined that the criminal act is of such a nature that not only is the disapprobation of society warranted, but also the act cannot be justified by the excluded defence. Such a legislative provision will not generally violate s. 7 when a defence is inconsistent with the offence proscribed in that it would excuse the very evil which the offence seeks to prohibit or punish. For example it would be illogical and senseless to permit an accused to rely on the laws of a sovereign state which violate international law by legislating the commission of crimes against humanity on the grounds that the laws themselves justify criminal conduct. In this case the expert testified that the accused's awareness of his country's directed policy of persecution or discrimination constituted the "international element" of crimes against humanity. Similarly the accused's awareness of his state's conduct of war is the international element of war crimes. The trial judge identified these as essential elements of the offences in question. It follows that just as it is not a violation of s. 7 to prevent drunkenness' being used as a defence to a charge of impaired driving (R. v. Penno, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 865) it is not a violation of s. 7 to limit the use that can be made of the defence of obedience to superior orders.

page 866

(ii)Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate the Charter by Reason of Vagueness?

The respondent argues that s. 7(3.71) and s. 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code violate the principle that there must be no crime or punishment except in accordance with fixed, predetermined law. That is to say the citizen must be able to ascertain beforehand how he or she stands with regard to the criminal law. If the citizen cannot determine the consequences of his or her actions due to the vagueness of the law then to punish the citizen for breach of that law would be purposeless cruelty. Specifically, the respondent argues that the state of international law prior to 1944 was such that it could not provide fair notice to the accused of the consequences of breaching the still evolving international law offences.

Secondly, the respondent argues that the definitions of "war crime" and "crime against humanity" constitute a standardless sweep authorizing imprisonment. He submits that the definition of "crimes against humanity" which includes "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution or any other inhumane act or omission that ... constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law or is criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations" permits the inclusion of any act so long as it is seen by the jury to be "persecution" etc. An accused would have no notice that his or her acts were contrary to international law since the proscribed acts are not adequately defined.

page 867

6134

At the outset it may be helpful to reiterate some of the major points which this Court has established with respect to the issue of vagueness. In the Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1 (1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.) (Prostitution Reference), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123, it was held that it is not fatal that a particular legislative term is open to varying interpretations by courts. In R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606, it was stated that the threshold for finding a law vague is relatively high. There Gonthier J. provided guidance for determining whether a provision is so vague that it violates the principle of legality in these words at p. 639:

A vague provision does not provide an adequate basis for legal debate, that is for reaching a conclusion as to its meaning by reasoned analysis applying legal criteria. It does not sufficiently delineate any area of risk, and thus can provide neither fair notice to the citizen nor a limitation of enforcement discretion.

And later, at p. 643 he stated:

The doctrine of vagueness can therefore be summed up in this proposition: a law will be found unconstitutionally vague [only] if it so lacks in precision as not to give sufficient guidance for legal debate.

In my view, the fact that the entire body of international law is not codified and that reference must be made to opinions of experts and legal writing in interpreting it does not in itself make the legislation vague or uncertain. This material is often helpful in determining the proper interpretations to be given to a statute. Further, the fact that there may be differences of opinion among international law experts does not necessarily make the legislation vague. It is ultimately for the court to determine the interpretation that is to be given to a statute. That questions of law and of fact arise in the interpretation of these provisions and their application in specific circumstances does not render them vague or uncertain. In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, it was recognized at p. 983 that:

page 868

Absolute precision in the law exists rarely, if at all. The question is whether the legislature has provided an intelligible standard according to which the judiciary must do its work. The task of interpreting how that standard applies in particular instances might always be characterized as having a discretionary element, because the standard can never specify all the instances in which it applies.

Thus I agree with the following statement made by Tarnopolsky J.A. in this context, at pp. 64-65:

The fact ... that reference may have had to be made to legal texts and even to the opinions of experts to determine, for purposes of jurisdiction, what constitutes a war crime or a crime against humanity, is not an issue concerning vagueness of a charge, any more than any other piece of new legislation may require legal research and analysis beyond the competence of some accused but not, presumably, that of a lawyer.

6/35

In Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, supra, Gonthier J. distinguished between formal and substantive notice. Formal notice involved an acquaintance with the actual text of a statute. The substantive aspect of notice is described as an understanding that some conduct comes under the law. This is considered to be the "core concept of notice".

Gonthier J., at p. 634, set out an analysis of the concept of notice using the crime of homicide as an example which I think is apposite in this context:

Let me take homicide as an example. The actual provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with homicide are numerous (comprising the core of ss. 222-240 and other related sections). When one completes the picture of the Code with case law, both substantive and constitutional, the result is a fairly intricate body of rules. Notwithstanding formal notice, it can hardly be expected of the average citizen that he know the law of homicide in detail. Yet no one would seriously argue that there is no substantive fair notice here, or that the law of homicide is vague. It can readily be seen why this is so. First of all, everyone (or sadly, should I say, almost everyone) has an inherent knowledge that taking the life of another human being is wrong. There is a deeply-rooted perception that homicide cannot be tolerated, whether one comes to this perception from a moral, religious or sociological stance. Therefore, it is expected that homicide will be punished by the State. Secondly, homicide is indeed punished by the State, and homicide trials and sentences receive a great deal of publicity.

page 869

The same principles must apply with respect to a war crime and a crime against humanity. The definitions of crimes against humanity and war crimes include the gravest, cruellest, most serious and heinous acts that can be perpetrated upon human beings. These crimes, which violate fundamental human values, are vehemently condemned by the citizens of all civilized nations. War crimes or crimes against humanity are so repulsive, so reprehensible, and so well understood that it simply cannot be argued that the definition of crimes against humanity and war crimes are vague or uncertain.

The same considerations apply with respect to the respondent's second argument. So long as the crimes are ones which any reasonable person in the position of the accused would know that they constituted a violation of basic human values or the laws of war, it cannot be said that the crimes constitute a "standardless sweep authorizing imprisonment". The standards which guide the determination and definition of crimes against humanity are the values that are known to all people and shared by all.

I am in agreement with the decision of the Court of Appeal, unanimous on this issue, that the law is not vague.

page 870

(iii)Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate Section 7 and Section 11(g) of the Charter?

The respondent's arguments with respect to ss. 7 and 11(g) relate to the allegedly retrospective character of the impugned provisions. Most nations recognize that a statute can neither retroactively make criminal an act which was lawful at the time it was done, nor impose a penalty for past acts which were not criminal when they were committed.

6136

In an effort to avoid violating the principle against retroactivity, the provisions of the Criminal Code concerning a war crime and a crime against humanity were drafted in such a way that the accused is deemed to have committed Canadian Criminal Code offences which were in existence at the time the actions were alleged to have occurred. Perhaps the drafters hoped that by not creating new offences they could avoid violating the principle against retroactivity.

However, as I have indicated earlier the only constitutionally permissible way to interpret the provisions in question is to conclude that two new offences have been created, namely, crimes against humanity and war crimes. This however, does not result in a violation of the principle that actions cannot be retroactively made criminal.

There are two approaches which have generally been advanced in this debate. There are those who, like Robert H. Jackson J., Chief Counsel for the United States in the Nuremberg prosecution, believe that the humanitarian principles which form the basis of crimes against humanity evolved from the law of war which is itself over 7,000 years old. See Bassiouni, supra, at p. 150. Jackson J., in his report to the President of the United States on June 6, 1945 stated: "These principles (crimes against humanity) have been assimilated as part of International Law at least since 1907" (quoted in Bassiouni at p. 168). Jackson J. thought that the recognition of "crimes against humanity" as constituting violations of the already existing conventional and customary international law was clearly demonstrated by the previous efforts of the international community to prohibit the same kind of conduct which was the subject of Article 6(c) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal. (See also: Egon Schwelb, "Crimes Against Humanity" (1946), 23 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 178.)

page 871

The primary evidence of the prohibition of violations of the laws of humanity (or crimes against humanity) is found in the Preamble of the two Hague Conventions. The preamble to the Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land (Hague Convention IV, 1907) contains a clause known as the Martens clause which states:

Until a more complete code of the laws of war has been issued, the High Contracting Parties deem it expedient to declare that, in cases not included in the Regulations adopted by them, the inhabitants and the belligerents remain under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilised peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience.

With regard to Hague Convention IV, the International Military Tribunal (IMT) at Nuremberg, Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, supra, held at p. 497:

The rules of land warfare expressed in the convention undoubtedly represented an advance over existing international law at the time of their adoption. But the convention expressly stated that it was an attempt "to revise the general laws and customs of war", which it thus recognized to be then existing, but by 1939 these rules laid down in the convention were recognized by all civilized nations, and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war....

6/37

In his article entitled "The Prosecution of War Criminals in Canada" (1989), 12 Dalhousie L.J. 256, W. J. Fenrick notes at p. 261 that "[a]lthough this statement is unsubstantiated in the judgment, it has been unchallenged since it was first uttered". In the German High Command Trial, a U.S. Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg in 1947-48 adopted at vol. 22, p. 497, the IMT position that

page 872

Hague Convention IV of 1907 was binding as declaratory of international law and went on to outline how specific provisions of Hague Convention IV and of the 1929 Geneva Prisoners of War Convention (Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armies in the Field, 27 July 1929, 118 L.N.T.S. 303) were incorporated into customary law.

In 1946, the United Nations General Assembly passed, without dissent or abstention, a resolution reaffirming the principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and the judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal. David Matas in his book Justice Delayed (1987) expressed the view that this universal acceptance gave the Nuremberg trials an authoritative position in international law. Mr. Matas at p. 90 writes:

Its pronouncements on the international law of war crimes and crimes against humanity must be regarded as authoritative. Any statement by a Tribunal whose judgment has been accepted by all nations of the world must carry more weight than any declaration on international law made by the courts of a single state.

The second approach to the problem of retrospectivity is that put forward by people such as Professors Kelsen and Schwarzenberger. Schwarzenberger rejected the argument that the International Military Tribunal's jurisdiction regarding "crimes against humanity" extended to crimes committed against German nationals, other nationals and stateless persons under German control, irrespective of whether such acts were lawful under any particular local law, so long as the war connection existed. He thought that the Nuremberg and Tokyo Charters were not declarative of already existing international law but were merely meant to punish the atrocious behaviour of the Nazi and Japanese regimes because their deeds could not go unpunished. Thus, he stated:

page 873

... the limited and qualified character of the rule on crimes against humanity as formulated in the Charters of the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals militates against the rule being accepted as one declaratory of international customary law. This rudimentary legal system [of international law] does not know of distinctions as subtle as those between crimes against humanity which are connected with other types of war crime and, therefore, are to be treated as analogous to war crimes in the strict sense and other types of inhumane acts which are not so linked and, therefore, are beyond the pale of international law. The Four-Power Protocol of October 6, 1945, offers even more decisive evidence of the anxiety of the Contracting Parties to avoid any misinterpretation of their intentions as having codified a generally applicable rule of international customary law.

[Schwartzenberger, International Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals, supra, at p. 498.]

Similarly, Professor Kelsen is of the view that the rules created by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and applied by the Nuremberg Trial represented "a new law" (Hans Kelsen, "Will the Judgment in the Nuremberg Trial Constitute a Precedent in International Law?" (1947), 1 Int'l L.Q. 153; see also: Hans Kelsen, "The Rule Against Ex Post Facto Laws and the Prosecution of the Axis War Criminals" (1945), 2:3 Judge Advocate J. 8). However, he proposed the following solution to the problem of retrospectivity in his article "Will the Judgment in the Nuremberg Trial Constitute a Precedent in International Law?", at p. 165:

6/38

A retroactive law providing individual punishment for acts which were illegal though not criminal at the time they were committed, seems also to be an exception to the rule against ex post facto laws. The London Agreement is such a law. It is retroactive only in so far as it established individual criminal responsibility for acts which at the time they were committed constituted violations of existing international law, but for which this law has provided only collective responsibility. The rule against retroactive legislation is a principle of justice. Individual criminal responsibility represents certainly a higher degree of justice than collective responsibility, the typical technique of primitive law. Since the internationally illegal acts for which the London Agreement established individual criminal responsibility were certainly also morally most objectionable, and the persons who committed these acts were certainly aware of their immoral character, the retroactivity of the law applied to them can hardly be considered as absolutely incompatible with justice. Justice required the punishment of these men, in spite of the fact that under positive law they were not punishable at the time they performed the acts made punishable with retroactive force. In case two postulates of justice are in conflict with each other, the higher one prevails; and to punish those who were morally responsible for the international crime of the second World War may certainly be considered as more important than to comply with the rather relative rule against ex post facto laws, open to so many exceptions.

page 874

See also: Professor Julius Stone, Legal Controls of International Conflict (1974), at p. 359.

The approach of Professor Kelsen seems eminently sound and reasonable to me. I would adopt it as correct and apply it in reaching the conclusion that the provisions in question do not violate the principles of fundamental justice.

(iv)Did the Pre- and Post-Charge Delay Violate Sections 7, 11(b) and 11(d) of the Charter?

The respondent argues that this Court should extend the principles set out in R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199, to the situation of pre-charge delay. He argues that since 45 years have elapsed between the date of the actions giving rise to the charges and the date of the trial, there is bound to be prejudice. However, in my view Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. was correct in deciding that the trial judge, after hearing all the evidence, would be in the best position to decide whether or not a s. 24 (1) Charter remedy is available (Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863) and therefore that the legislation itself should not be struck down.

page 875

In the present case, I am unable to see any merit in the respondent's arguments that he suffered prejudice as a result of the pre-charge delay. Indeed, it is far more likely that the delay was more prejudicial to the Crown's case than it was that of the defence. Defence counsel was entitled to argue that the witnesses' memories had become blurred with the passage of 45 years. Further, the documentary and physical evidence that the respondent now complains is not available was probably destroyed during World War II. Thus it is difficult to accept the respondent's assertion that any documentary or physical evidence that would have been available within a few years after the war has since been lost. Additionally, any prejudice occasioned by the death of witnesses that could have helped the defence was substantially reduced by the admission of the Dallos statements.

6139

With regard to the post-charge delay, less than a year passed from the time when the legislation was proclaimed in force to when the indictment was preferred. In light of the amount of investigatory work that had to be done before any charges could be laid, this seems to be a minimal and very reasonable period of delay.

(v)Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate Sections 7 and 15 of the Charter?

The respondent argues that the legislation contravenes s. 15 of the Charter because it relates only to acts or omissions performed by individuals outside Canada. Thus, a Canadian who committed a crime against humanity in Canada, arising for example, from the internment of Japanese Canadians, could not be charged under the impugned provisions, whereas someone in the position of Finta who committed the offence outside of Canada could be charged.

In my view, the apparent difference in treatment is not based on a personal characteristic but on the location of the crime. In R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296, it was held that the determination of whether a group falls into an analogous category to those specifically enumerated in s. 15 is not to be made only in the context of the law which is subject to challenge but rather in the context of the place of the group in the entire social, political and legal fabric of our society. The question to be resolved is whether the group represents a discrete and insular minority which has suffered stereotyping, historical disadvantage or vulnerability to political and social prejudice. It was decided that in some circumstances the person's province of residence could be a personal characteristic. However, in this case I do not think that the group of persons who commit a war crime or a crime against humanity outside of Canada could be considered to be a discrete and insular minority.

page 876

The respondent's submission that it is contrary to the principles of fundamental justice to subject an individual to prosecution based on an extension of jurisdiction founded on alleged crimes for which Parliament does not make its own government members and its own people in Canada criminally liable cannot be accepted for the same reasons.

(vi) Do the Impugned Provisions violate Section 12 of the Charter?

No argument was made by the parties with respect to s. 12.

(9) Section 1 of the Charter

As I have concluded that ss. 7(3.74) and (3.76) of the Criminal Code do not violate ss. 7, 11(a), (b), (d) and (g), or 15 of the Charter, it is not necessary to consider the application of s. 1 of the Charter.

6140

Conclusion on the Cross-Appeal

For the reasons set out above, I am of the view that Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. and the Court of Appeal, unanimous on this issue, were correct in their conclusion that the challenged provisions of the Criminal Code do not violate the Charter.

Appeal dismissed, LA FOREST, L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ and MCLACHLIN JJ. dissenting.

page 877

Cross-appeal dismissed. Sections 7(3.74) and 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code do not violate ss. 7, 11(a), (b), (d), (g), 12 or 15 of the Charter.

Solicitor for the appellant: John C. Tait, Ottawa.

Solicitor for the respondent: Douglas H. Christie, Victoria.

Solicitors for the intervener Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association: Tory, Tory, DesLauriers & Binnington, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener League for Human Rights of B'Nai Brith Canada: David Matas, Winnipeg and Dale, Streiman and Kurz, Brampton.

Solicitors for the intervener Canadian Jewish Congress: Davies, Ward & Beck, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener InterAmicus: Ahern, Lalonde, Nuss, Drymer, Montreal.

1- See Erratum, [1994] 2 S.C.R. iv
2- See Erratum, [1994] 2 S.C.R. iv

ANNEX 14:

"Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Children-Impact of Armed Conflict on Children-Note by the Secretary-General", U.N. Doc. A/51/306, 26 August 1996, to which was annexed the Report of the expert of the Secretary General, Ms. Graça Machel, submitted pursuant to General Assembly Resolution 48/157, "Impact of Armed Conflict on Children".

6142

UNITED NATIONS

A

General Assembly

Distr.
GENERAL

A/51/306
26 August 1996

ORIGINAL: ENGLISH

Fifty-first session
Item 108 of the provisional agenda*

PROMOTION AND PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF CHILDREN

Impact of armed conflict on children

Note by the Secretary-General

1. The Secretary-General has the honour to transmit herewith to the General Assembly the study on the impact of armed conflict on children, prepared by Ms. Graça Machel, the expert appointed by him on 8 June 1994, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 48/157 of 20 December 1993. The study was undertaken with the support of the United Nations Centre for Human Rights and the United Nations Children's Fund, as provided for in the resolution, and is the fruit of extensive and wide-ranging consultations.

2. In the study, the expert proposes the elements of a comprehensive agenda for action by Member States and the international community to improve the protection and care of children in conflict situations, and to prevent these conflicts from occurring. The study demonstrates the centrality of these issues to the international human rights, peace and security and development agendas, and should serve to promote urgent and resolute action on the part of the international community to redress the plight of children affected by armed conflicts.

3. The Secretary-General trusts that the General Assembly will give thorough consideration to this study and to the mechanisms required for following up and monitoring the implementation of the conclusions and recommendations it will adopt on this important subject.

* A/51/150.

IMPACT OF ARMED CONFLICT ON CHILDREN

Report of the expert of the Secretary-General, Ms. Graça Machel, submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 48/157

CONTENTS

		Paragraphs	Page
I.	INTRODUCTION	1 - 28	9
	A. The attack on children	1 - 8	9
	B. Course of the study and its methodology	9 - 21	10
	C. Patterns and characteristics of contemporary armed conflicts	22 - 28	13
II.	MITIGATING THE IMPACT OF ARMED CONFLICT ON CHILDREN	29 - 203	15
	A. Child soldiers	34 - 62	16
	1. Recruitment	36 - 43	16
	2. How child soldiers are used	44 - 48	18
	3. Demobilization and reintegration into society	49 - 57	19
	4. Preventing future recruitment	58 - 61	21
	5. Specific recommendations on child soldiers	62	22
	B. Refugees and internally displaced children	63 - 90	22
	1. Vulnerability of children in flight	67 - 68	23
	2. Unaccompanied children	69 - 74	23
	3. Evacuation	75 - 76	25
	4. Children in camps	77 - 80	25
	5. The situation of internally displaced children	81 - 83	26
	6. Asylum and the right to identity and nationality	84 - 86	27
	7. Returning home and durable solutions	87 - 89	28
	8. Specific recommendations for refugee and internally displaced children	90	28

CONTENTS (continued)

		Paragraphs	Page
C.	Sexual exploitation and gender-based violence	91 - 110	29
	1. Gender-based violence: a weapon of war	91 - 95	29
	2. Child victims of prostitution and sexual exploitation	96 - 102	30
	3. Ending impunity	103 - 106	32
	4. Preventing gender-based violence	107 - 109	32
	5. Specific recommendations on sexual exploitation and gender-based violence	110	33
D.	Landmines and unexploded ordnance	111 - 126	34
	1. The threat to children	113 - 118	34
	2. Mine clearance, mine awareness and rehabilitation	119 - 122	36
	3. The need for an international ban	123 - 125	37
	4. Specific recommendations on landmines and unexploded ordnance	126	38
E.	Sanctions	127 - 135	38
	1. Humanitarian exemptions	128 - 130	39
	2. The need for child impact assessments and monitoring	131 - 134	40
	3. Specific recommendations on sanctions	135	41
F.	Health and nutrition	136 - 165	41
	1. Communicable diseases	140 - 142	42
	2. Reproductive health	143 - 144	43
	3. Disability	145	43
	4. Destruction of health facilities	146 - 148	44
	5. Protecting health services and health workers .	149 - 151	44
	6. Disruption of food supplies	152 - 154	45

CONTENTS (continued)

		Paragraphs	Page
	7. Malnutrition	155 - 161	46
	8. Protecting food security	162 - 164	47
	9. Specific recommendations on health and nutrition	165	48
G.	Promoting psychological recovery and social reintegration	166 - 183	49
	1. Psychosocial impact of violence on children	168 - 171	50
	2. Best practices for recovery programmes	172 - 182	51
	3. Specific recommendations to promote psychosocial well-being	183	53
H.	Education	184 - 203	54
	1. Risks to education during conflict	186 - 188	54
	2. Challenges and opportunities	189 - 202	55
	3. Specific recommendations on education	203	58
III.	RELEVANCE AND ADEQUACY OF EXISTING STANDARDS FOR THE PROTECTION OF CHILDREN	204 - 240	59
A.	Humanitarian law	211 - 218	61
B.	Human rights law	219 - 231	62
	1. Convention relating to the Status of Refugees	223 - 225	63
	2. Convention on the Rights of the Child	226 - 231	64
C.	Implementation of standards and monitoring of violations	232 - 239	65
D.	Specific recommendations on standards	240	67
IV.	RECONSTRUCTION AND RECONCILIATION	241 - 252	68
A.	Reconstruction	241 - 246	68
B.	Reconciliation	247 - 252	69

CONTENTS (continued)

		Paragraphs	Page
V.	CONFLICT PREVENTION	253 - 265	71
	A. Education for peace	255 - 258	71
	B. Demilitarization	259 - 262	73
	C. Early warning	263 - 265	74
VI.	IMPLEMENTATION MECHANISMS	266 - 311	74
	A. Follow-up action for Governments	270 - 278	75
	B. Regional and subregional arrangements	279 - 280	77
	C. Responsibilities of the United Nations	281 - 306	77
	1. The United Nations human rights system	285 - 287	79
	2. Institutional arrangements	288 - 302	80
	3. Inter-institutional mechanisms	303 - 306	86
	D. Civil society organizations	307 - 311	87
VII.	CONCLUSION	312 - 318	88
Annex.	Research contributions to the report on the impact of armed conflict on children		94

CONTENTS (continued)

ADDENDUM

Annexes*

I. Statement of the First Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in the Horn, Eastern, Central and Southern Africa (Addis Ababa, 17-19 April 1995)

II. Statement of the Second Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in the Arab Region (Cairo, 27-29 August 1995)

III. Statement of the Third Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in West and Central Africa (Abidjan, 7-10 November 1995)

IV. Statement of the Fourth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Asia and the Pacific (Manila, 13-15 March 1996)

V. Statement of the Fifth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Latin America and the Caribbean (Santafé de Bogotá, 17-19 April 1996)

VI. Statement of the Sixth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Europe (Florence, 10-12 June 1996)

VII. Statement adopted by the World Conference on Religion and Peace: Children and Violent Conflict

VIII. Selected bibliography on children and armed conflict

---

* Annexes I-VIII are contained in A/51/306/Add.1.

IMPACT OF ARMED CONFLICT ON CHILDREN

I. INTRODUCTION

A. The attack on children

1. Millions of children are caught up in conflicts in which they are not merely bystanders, but targets. Some fall victim to a general onslaught against civilians; others die as part of a calculated genocide. Still other children suffer the effects of sexual violence or the multiple deprivations of armed conflict that expose them to hunger or disease. Just as shocking, thousands of young people are cynically exploited as combatants.

2. In 1995, 30 major armed conflicts raged in different locations around the world. 1/ All of them took place within States, between factions split along ethnic, religious or cultural lines. The conflicts destroyed crops, places of worship and schools. Nothing was spared, held sacred or protected - not children, families or communities. In the past decade, an estimated two million children have been killed in armed conflict. Three times as many have been seriously injured or permanently disabled, many of them maimed by landmines. 2/ Countless others have been forced to witness or even to take part in horrifying acts of violence.

3. These statistics are shocking enough, but more chilling is the conclusion to be drawn from them: more and more of the world is being sucked into a desolate moral vacuum. This is a space devoid of the most basic human values; a space in which children are slaughtered, raped, and maimed; a space in which children are exploited as soldiers; a space in which children are starved and exposed to extreme brutality. Such unregulated terror and violence speak of deliberate victimization. There are few further depths to which humanity can sink.

4. The lack of control and the sense of dislocation and chaos that characterize contemporary armed conflicts can be attributed to many different factors. Some observers point to cataclysmic political upheavals and struggles for control over resources in the face of widespread poverty and economic disarray. Others see the callousness of modern warfare as a natural outcome of the social revolutions that have torn traditional societies apart. The latter analysts point as proof to many African societies that have always had strong martial cultures. While fierce in battle, the rules and customs of those societies, only a few generations ago, made it taboo to attack women and children.

5. Whatever the causes of modern-day brutality towards children, the time has come to call a halt. The present report exposes the extent of the problem and proposes many practical ways to pull back from the brink. Its most fundamental demand is that children simply have no part in warfare. The international community must denounce this attack on children for what it is - intolerable and unacceptable.

6. Children can help. In a world of diversity and disparity, children are a unifying force capable of bringing people to common ethical grounds. Children's needs and aspirations cut across all ideologies and cultures. The needs of all children are the same: nutritious food, adequate health care, a decent education, shelter and a secure and loving family. Children are both our reason to struggle to eliminate the worst aspects of warfare, and our best hope for succeeding at it.

7. Concern for children has brought us to a common standard around which to rally. In the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the world has a unique instrument that almost every country has ratified. The single most important resolve that the world could make would be to transform universal ratification of this Convention into universal reality.

8. It was this challenge, of turning good intentions into real change for children, that led the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child in 1993 to recommend to the General Assembly, in accordance with article 45 (c) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, that it request the Secretary-General to undertake a comprehensive study on the impact of armed conflict on children.

B. Course of the study and its methodology

9. At its forty-eighth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 48/157, entitled "Protection of children affected by armed conflicts", in which it requested the Secretary-General to appoint an expert to undertake a comprehensive study with the support of the Centre for Human Rights and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF). The expert was asked to make recommendations in five areas: (1) the participation of children in armed conflict; (2) the reinforcement of preventive measures; (3) the relevance and adequacy of existing standards; (4) the measures required to improve the protection of children affected by armed conflict; and (5) the actions needed to promote the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of children affected by armed conflict.

10. In accordance with the resolution, the expert submitted progress reports to the forty-ninth and fiftieth sessions of the General Assembly (A/49/643 and A/50/537). The expert, Ms. Graça Machel, hereby transmits her final report on the impact of armed conflict on children, pursuant to resolution 48/157. The report sets out the findings and recommendations of the expert, who used the Convention on the Rights of the Child throughout her work as a guiding source of operative principles and standards. The Convention on the Rights of the Child represents a new, multidisciplinary approach to protecting children. It demonstrates the interdependence of all children's rights, and the relevance of those rights to the activities of a whole host of actors at all levels. In accordance with the Convention on the Rights of the Child, this report uses the term "child" to include everyone under the age of 18.

11. In the process of her work, the expert identified a number of particular concerns in addition to those identified in paragraph nine of resolution 48/157, including: the changing patterns of conflict; specific impacts on girls and the children of minority and indigenous groups; economic embargoes; rape and other forms of gender-based violence and sexual exploitation; torture; the inadequate provision of education, health and nutrition and psychosocial programmes; the protection and care of refugee and internally displaced children and other children at particular risk; and the inadequate implementation of international human rights and humanitarian law. Accordingly, with the cooperation of relevant inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations and individual experts, a programme of research into these issues was undertaken through the preparation of twenty-five thematic papers and field-based case studies.

12. Six regional consultations were held to determine regional priorities relating to children in armed conflict and to draw these issues to the attention of Governments, policy makers and opinion leaders. The following consultations took place: First Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in the Horn, Eastern, Central and Southern Africa: Addis Ababa, 17-19 April 1995 (co-convened with the Economic Commission for Africa); Second Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in the Arab Region: Cairo, August 1995 (co-convened with the Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia and UNICEF); Third Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in West and Central Africa: Abidjan, 7-10 November 1995 (co-convened with the African Development Bank, the Economic Commission for Africa and UNICEF); Fourth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Asia and the Pacific: Manila, 13-15 March 1996 (co-convened with UNICEF); Fifth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Latin America and the Caribbean: Bogota, 17-19 April 1996 (co-convened with the Government of Colombia, Save the Children UK, the Fundación para la Educación Superior de Colombia, and UNICEF); and Sixth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Europe: Florence, Italy, 10-12 June 1996 (co-convened with the Government of Italy, the Italian National Committee for UNICEF, the Istitutó degli Innocenti and UNICEF International Child Development Centre).

13. The consultations included Governments, military authorities and legal experts. They also involved human rights organizations, the media, religious organizations, eminent leaders from civil society and women and children directly involved in armed conflicts.

14. The expert personally conducted field visits to areas affected by armed conflicts. Visits were made to Angola, Cambodia, Colombia, Northern Ireland, Lebanon, Rwanda (and refugee camps in Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania), Sierra Leone and various places in the former Yugoslavia. During these visits, she met with Government representatives, non-governmental organizations, community organizations, women's organizations, religious groups, agencies, national institutions and other interested parties, as well as with children and their families. This direct contact has helped ensure that the present report and its recommendations are firmly based on conditions and priorities within countries. It also ensures that the report reflects not only the experience of those most involved in the care and protection of children, but also the immediate concerns of the affected families and children themselves.

15. The expert received guidance from a group of eminent persons representing a variety of political, religious and cultural backgrounds. The members of the group are: Belisario Betancur (Colombia), Francis Deng (Sudan), Marian Wright Edelman (United States of America), Devaki Jain (India), Julius K. Nyerere (United Republic of Tanzania), Lisbet Palme (Sweden), Wole Soyinka (Nigeria) and Archbishop Desmond Tutu (South Africa). In addition, the expert received analysis and guidance from an advisory group of technical experts. The members of the advisory group include: Thomas Hammarberg, Chair (Sweden), Philip Alston (Australia), Rachel Brett (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland), Victoria Brittain (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland), Maricela Daniel (Mexico), Helena Gezelius (Sweden), Jim Himes (United States of America), Duong Quynh Hoa (Viet Nam), Elizabeth Jareg (Norway), Helga Klein (United States of America), Salim Lone (Kenya), Jacques Moreillon (Switzerland), Vitit Muntarbhorn (Thailand), Olara A. Otunnu (Uganda), Sadig Rasheed (Sudan), Everett Ressler (United States of America), Jane Schaller (United States of America), Anne Skatvedt (Norway) and Jody Williams (United States of America). The special advisers are: Ibrahima Fall (Senegal), Kimberly Gamble-Payne (United States of America), Stephen Lewis (Canada) and Marta Santos Pais (Portugal).

16. In all of her undertakings, the expert has enjoyed widespread support from Governments, regional bodies, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as from United Nations bodies, especially the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the Centre for Human Rights and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Inter-agency consultations convened periodically in Geneva and New York were attended by representatives of the following major international bodies: the Centre for Human Rights, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) and their National Societies, the International Labour Organization (ILO), UNICEF, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), UNHCR, the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD), the World Food Programme (WFP) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

17. Working groups on children and armed conflict of international non-governmental organizations (NGOs), particularly the Working Group on Children in Armed Conflict of the New York-based NGO Committee on UNICEF and the SubGroup on Refugee Children and Children in Armed Conflict of the Geneva-based NGO Group on the Convention on the Rights of the Child, provided substantial contributions to the expert's research and mobilization activities. Other international, regional (including the Forum of African Voluntary Development Organizations and the African Network on Prevention and Protection Against Child Abuse and Neglect) and national NGOs also contributed to these activities.

18. Seminars were convened on the role of religious communities in protecting children in situations of armed conflict (in Geneva, in cooperation with the World Conference on Religion and Peace) and on the impact of low intensity conflicts on children (in Belfast, in cooperation with Save the Children Fund-UK and Rädda Barnen (Save the Children Fund-Sweden)). A third seminar was held on landmines, child soldiers and rehabilitation (convened in Stockholm in cooperation with the Swedish National Committee for UNICEF, the Swedish Foreign Policy Office, Rädda Barnen, the Swedish Red Cross and other Swedish NGOs).

19. Beyond collecting information, the expert undertook a widespread and unusual process of sensitization and mobilization. This facilitated the development of new networks and coalitions organized both nationally and regionally, and helped to place the concerns addressed in the present report on political and development agendas. The collaborative nature of this undertaking created an opportunity to develop unique new partnerships across disciplines and interest groups. For example, following the First Regional Consultation in Addis Ababa, a new alliance of children's NGOs was set up to coordinate action on child rights and development in eastern, central and southern Africa; following the Third Regional Consultation in Abidjan, a regional initiative was developed to promote the role of women in peace-building, and another proposal is currently being negotiated to provide child rights and protection training for African Chiefs of Defence Staffs; following the Second Regional Consultation in Cairo, a selected bibliography on children and war in the Arab region was published; and following the field visit to Cambodia, UNICEF was requested to assist the Ministry of Social Affairs in training its personnel in the concrete implementation of the rights of children.

20. The expert wishes to acknowledge the considerable support and financial contributions received from national committees for UNICEF and from Redd Barna (Save the Children Fund-Norway), without which this work would not have been possible. Specifically, she wishes to thank the UNICEF National Committees of Germany, Greece, Hong Kong, Japan, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America.

21. While the present report is formally submitted for the consideration of the United Nations General Assembly and its Member States, it is also addressed to regional institutions, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other competent bodies, including NGOs, relevant special rapporteurs and working groups, intergovernmental bodies and civil society.

C. Patterns and characteristics of contemporary armed conflicts

22. Violent conflict has always made victims of non-combatants. The patterns and characteristics of contemporary armed conflicts, however, have increased the risks for children. Vestiges of colonialism and persistent economic, social and political crises have greatly contributed to the disintegration of public order. Undermined by internal dissent, countries caught up in conflict today are also under severe stress from a global world economy that pushes them ever further towards the margins. Rigorous programmes of structural adjustment promise long-term market-based economic growth, but demands for immediate cuts in budget deficits and public expenditure only weaken already fragile States, leaving them dependent on forces and relations over which they have little control. While many developing countries have made considerable economic progress in recent decades, the benefits have often been spread unevenly, leaving millions of people struggling for survival. The collapse of functional Governments in many countries torn by internal fighting and the erosion of essential service structures have fomented inequalities, grievances and strife. The personalization of power and leadership and the manipulation of ethnicity and religion to serve personal or narrow group interests have had similarly debilitating effects on countries in conflict.

23. All of these elements have contributed to conflicts, between Governments and rebels, between different opposition groups vying for supremacy and among populations at large, in struggles that take the form of widespread civil unrest. Many drag on for long periods with no clear beginning or end, subjecting successive generations to endless struggles for survival.

24. Distinctions between combatants and civilians disappear in battles fought from village to village or from street to street. In recent decades, the proportion of war victims who are civilians has leaped dramatically from 5 per cent to over 90 per cent. The struggles that claim more civilians than soldiers have been marked by horrific levels of violence and brutality. Any and all tactics are employed, from systematic rape, to scorched-earth tactics that destroy crops and poison wells, to ethnic cleansing and genocide. With all standards abandoned, human rights violations against children and women occur in unprecedented numbers. Increasingly, children have become the targets and even the perpetrators of violence and atrocities.

25. Children seek protection in networks of social support, but these have been undermined by new political and economic realities. Conflict and violent social change have affected social welfare networks between families and communities. Rapid urbanization and the spread of market-based values have also helped erode systems of support that were once based on the extended family.

26. Unbridled attacks on civilians and rural communities have provoked mass exoduses and the displacement of entire populations who flee conflict in search of elusive sanctuaries within and outside their national borders. Among these uprooted millions, it is estimated that 80 per cent are children and women.

27. Involving children as soldiers has been made easier by the proliferation of inexpensive light weapons. Previously, the more dangerous weapons were either heavy or complex, but these guns are so light that children can use them and so simple that they can be stripped and reassembled by a child of 10. The international arms trade has made assault rifles cheap and widely available so the poorest communities now have access to deadly weapons capable of transforming any local conflict into a bloody slaughter. In Uganda, an AK-47 automatic machine gun can be purchased for the cost of a chicken and, in northern Kenya, it can be bought for the price of a goat.

28. Moreover, the rapid spread of information today has changed the character of modern warfare in important ways. While the world surely benefits from ready access to information, it will pay a price if it fails to recognize that information is never entirely neutral. International media are frequently influenced by one or another of the parties to a conflict, by commercial realities and by the public's degree of interest in humanitarian action. The result of these influences are depictions that can be selective or uneven, or both. Whether a story is reported or not may depend less on its intrinsic importance than on subjective perceptions of the public's appetite for information and on the expense of informing them. For example, while coverage of the conflicts in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Somalia was extensive, very little has been reported about the conflicts in Afghanistan and Angola. The media is capable of effectively galvanizing international public support for humanitarian action, as it did for Indo-Chinese refugees in the late 1970s and for Somalia in 1992. The threat of adverse international publicity may also be positive, holding the potential for keeping some gross violations of human rights in check. Ultimately, however, while reports of starving children or overcrowded camps for displaced persons may be dramatic, they do little to support efforts for long-term reconstruction and reconciliation.

II. MITIGATING THE IMPACT OF ARMED CONFLICT ON CHILDREN

29. Armed conflicts across and between communities result in massive levels of destruction; physical, human, moral and cultural. Not only are large numbers of children killed and injured, but countless others grow up deprived of their material and emotional needs, including the structures that give meaning to social and cultural life. The entire fabric of their societies - their homes, schools, health systems and religious institutions - are torn to pieces.

30. War violates every right of a child - the right to life, the right to be with family and community, the right to health, the right to the development of the personality and the right to be nurtured and protected. Many of today's conflicts last the length of a "childhood", meaning that from birth to early adulthood, children will experience multiple and accumulative assaults. Disrupting the social networks and primary relationships that support children's physical, emotional, moral, cognitive and social development in this way, and for this duration, can have profound physical and psychological implications.

31. In countless cases, the impact of armed conflict on children's lives remains invisible. The origin of the problems of many children who have been affected by conflicts is obscured. The children themselves may be removed from the public, living in institutions or, as is true of thousands of unaccompanied and orphaned children, exist as street children or become victims of prostitution. Children who have lost parents often experience humiliation, rejection and discrimination. For years, they may suffer in silence as their self-esteem crumbles away. Their insecurity and fear cannot be measured.

32. This section of the report documents some of the most grave impacts of armed conflict on children. The presentation is not intended to be exhaustive, but to signal major concerns and to suggest practical steps for improvement. It attempts to demonstrate that the impact of armed conflict on children cannot be fully understood without looking at the related effects on women, families and communities. It strives to illustrate how children's well-being is best ensured through family and community-based solutions to armed conflict and its aftermath, and that those solutions work best when they are based on local cultures and drawn from an understanding of child development. This section also emphasizes the importance of considerations of age - in particular, that adolescents have special needs and special strengths. Young people should be seen in that light; as survivors and active participants in creating solutions, not just as victims or problems.

33. The discussion that follows necessarily includes specific examples. It is not an effort to single out specific groups, Governments, or non-state entities. Countries are named representatively and on the basis of what is widely known. In reality, the impact of armed conflict on children is an area in which everyone shares responsibility and a degree of blame.

A. Child soldiers

34. One of the most alarming trends in armed conflict is the participation of children as soldiers. Children serve armies in supporting roles, as cooks, porters, messengers and spies. Increasingly, however, adults are deliberately conscripting children as soldiers. Some commanders have even noted the desirability of child soldiers because they are "more obedient, do not question orders and are easier to manipulate than adult soldiers". 3/

35. A series of 24 case studies on the use of children as soldiers prepared for the present report, covering conflicts over the past 30 years, indicate that government or rebel armies around the world have recruited tens of thousands of children. Most are adolescents, though many child soldiers are 10 years of age or younger. While the majority are boys, girls also are recruited. The children most likely to become soldiers are those from impoverished and marginalized backgrounds and those who have become separated from their families.

1. Recruitment

36. Child soldiers are recruited in many different ways. Some are conscripted, others are press-ganged or kidnapped and still others are forced to join armed groups to defend their families. Governments in a few countries legally conscript children under 18, but even where the legal minimum age is 18, the law is not necessarily a safeguard. In many countries, birth registration is inadequate or non-existent and children do not know how old they are. Recruiters can only guess at ages based on physical development and may enter the age of recruits as 18 to give the appearance of compliance with national laws.

37. Countries with weak administrative systems do not conscript systematically from a register. In many instances, recruits are arbitrarily seized from the streets or even from schools and orphanages. This form of press ganging, known in Ethiopia as "afesa", was prevalent there in the 1980's, when armed militia, police or army cadres would roam the streets picking up anyone they encountered. 4/ Children from poorer sectors of society are particularly vulnerable. Adolescent boys who work in the informal sector, selling cigarettes or gum or lottery tickets, are a particular target. In Myanmar, whole groups of children from 15 to 17 years old have been surrounded in their schools and forcibly conscripted. 4/ Those who can subsequently prove they are under-age may be released, but not necessarily. In all conflicts, children from wealthier and more educated families are at less risk. Often they are left undisturbed or are released if their parents can buy them out. Some children whose parents have the means are even sent out of the country to avoid the possibility of forced conscription.

38. In addition to being forcibly recruited, youth also present themselves for service. It is misleading, however, to consider this voluntary. While young people may appear to choose military service, the choice is not exercised freely. They may be driven by any of several forces, including cultural, social, economic or political pressures.

39. One of the most basic reasons that children join armed groups is economic. Hunger and poverty may drive parents to offer their children for service. In some cases, armies pay a minor soldier's wages directly to the family. 5/ Child participation may be difficult to distinguish as in some cases whole families move with armed groups. Children themselves may volunteer if they believe that this is the only way to guarantee regular meals, clothing or medical attention. Some case studies tell of parents who encourage their daughters to become soldiers if their marriage prospects are poor. 6/

40. As conflicts persist, economic and social conditions suffer and educational opportunities become more limited or even non-existent. Under these circumstances, recruits tend to get younger and younger. Armies begin to exhaust the supplies of adult manpower and children may have little option but to join. In Afghanistan, where approximately 90 per cent of children now have no access to schooling, the proportion of soldiers who are children is thought to have risen in recent years from roughly 30 to at least 45 per cent. 7/

41. Some children feel obliged to become soldiers for their own protection. Faced with violence and chaos all around, they decide they are safer with guns in their hands. Often such children join armed opposition groups after experiencing harassment from government forces. Many young people have joined the Kurdish rebel groups, for example, as a reaction to scorched earth policies and extensive human rights violations. In El Salvador, children whose parents had been killed by government soldiers joined opposition groups for protection. In other cases, armed forces will pick up unaccompanied children for humanitarian reasons, although this is no guarantee that the children will not end up fighting. This is particularly true of children who stay with a group for long periods of time and come to identify it as their protector or "new family".

42. In some societies, military life may be the most attractive option. Young people often take up arms to gain power and power can act as a very strong motivator in situations where people feel powerless and are otherwise unable to acquire basic resources. In many situations, war activities are glorified. In Sierra Leone, the expert met with child soldiers who proudly defended the number of "enemies" they had killed.

43. The lure of ideology is particularly strong in early adolescence, when young people are developing personal identities and searching for a sense of social meaning. As the case of Rwanda shows, however, the ideological indoctrination of youth can have disastrous consequences. Children are very impressionable and may even be lured into cults of martyrdom. In Lebanon and Sri Lanka, for example, some adults have used young people's immaturity to their own advantage, recruiting and training adolescents for suicide bombings. 8/ However, it is important to note that children may also identify with and fight for social causes, religious expression, self-determination or national liberation. As happened in South Africa or in occupied territories, they may join the struggle in pursuit of political freedom.

2. How child soldiers are used

44. Once recruited as soldiers, children generally receive much the same treatment as adults - including the often brutal induction ceremonies. Many start out in support functions which entail great risk and hardship. One of the common tasks assigned to children is to serve as porters, often carrying very heavy loads of up to 60 kilograms including ammunition or injured soldiers. Children who are too weak to carry their loads are liable to be savagely beaten or even shot. Children are also used for household and other routine duties. In Uganda, child soldiers have often done guard duty, worked in the gardens, hunted for wild fruits and vegetables and looted food from gardens and granaries. Children have also been used extensively in many countries as lookouts and messengers. While this last role may seem less life-threatening than others, in fact it puts all children under suspicion. In Latin America, reports tell of government forces that have deliberately killed even the youngest children in peasant communities on the grounds that they, too, were dangerous. 9/

45. Although the majority of child soldiers are boys, armed groups also recruit girls, many of whom perform the same functions as boys. In Guatemala, rebel groups use girls to prepare food, attend to the wounded and wash clothes. Girls may also be forced to provide sexual services. In Uganda, girls who are abducted by the Lord's Resistance Army are "married off" to rebel leaders. 10/ If the man dies, the girl is put aside for ritual cleansing and then married off to another rebel.

46. A case study from Honduras illustrates one child's experience of joining an armed group:

> "At the age of 13, I joined the student movement. I had a dream to contribute to make things change, so that children would not be hungry ... later I joined the armed struggle. I had all the inexperience and the fears of a little girl. I found out that girls were obliged to have sexual relations 'to alleviate the sadness of the combatants'. And who alleviated our sadness after going with someone we hardly knew? At my young age I experienced abortion. It was not my decision. There is a great pain in my being when I recall all these things ... In spite of my commitment, they abused me, they trampled my human dignity. And above all, they did not understand that I was a child and that I had rights." 11/

47. While children of both sexes might start out in indirect support functions, it does not take long before they are placed in the heat of battle. Here, their inexperience and lack of training leave them particularly exposed. The youngest children rarely appreciate the perils they face. A number of case studies report that when the shelling starts the children get over-excited and forget to take cover. Some commanders deliberately exploit such fearlessness in children, even plying them with alcohol or drugs. A soldier in Myanmar recalls: "There were a lot of boys rushing into the field, screaming like banshees. It seemed like they were immortal, or impervious, or something, because we shot at them but they just kept coming." 12/

48. The progressive involvement of youth in acts of extreme violence desensitizes them to suffering. In a number of cases, young people have been deliberately exposed to horrific scenes. Such experience makes children more likely to commit violent acts themselves and may contribute to a break with society. In many countries, including Afghanistan, Mozambique, Colombia and Nicaragua, children have even been forced to commit atrocities against their own families or communities.

3. Demobilization and re-integration into society

49. Clearly one of the most urgent priorities is to remove everyone under 18 years of age from armed forces. No peace treaty to date has formally recognized the existence of child combatants. As a result, their special needs are unlikely to be taken into account in demobilization programmes. In Mozambique, for example, where recruitment of children was well known, child soldiers were not recognized in demobilization efforts by the Resistência Nacional de Moçambique (RENAMO), the Government or the international community. Official acknowledgement of children's part in a war is a vital step. Peace agreements and related documents should incorporate provisions for the demobilization of children; without this recognition, there can be no effective planning or programming on a national scale.

50. The process of reintegration must help children to establish new foundations in life based on their individual capacities. Former child soldiers have grown up away from their families and have been deprived of many of the normal opportunities for physical, emotional and intellectual development. As article 39 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child emphasizes, recovery and reintegration should take place in an environment that fosters the health, self-respect and dignity of the child.

51. Reintegration programmes must re-establish contact with the family and the community. Even children who are successfully reunited with their families, however, have little prospect of smoothly taking up life as it was before. A formerly cheerful 12-year-old may return home as a sullen 16-year-old who feels newly assertive and independent. Reunification may be particularly difficult for girl soldiers who have been raped or sexually abused, in part because cultural beliefs and attitudes can make it very difficult for them to stay with their families or to have any prospects of marriage. With so few alternatives, many children have eventually become victims of prostitution.

52. In many cases, reunification is impossible. Families may have perished in the conflict or may be untraceable. For some children, a transitional period of collective care may be necessary. Institutional approaches have proven ineffective, but one way to provide such care is through peer-group living arrangements that are strongly integrated into communities.

53. Effective social reintegration depends upon support from families and communities. But families are also worn down by conflict, both physically and emotionally, and face increased impoverishment. The field visits and research for the present report repeatedly stressed the importance of links between education, vocational opportunities for former child combatants and the economic security of their families. These are most often the determinants of successful social reintegration and, importantly, they are the factors that prevent re-recruitment.

54. Education, and especially the completion of primary schooling, must be a high priority. For a former child soldier, education is more than a route to employment. It also helps to normalize life and to develop an identity separate from that of the soldier. The development of peer relationships and improved self-esteem may also be facilitated through recreational and cultural activities. A difficulty to be faced is the likelihood that former combatants may have fallen far behind in their schooling, and may be placed in classes with much younger children. Specific measures may be required, such as establishing special classes for former child soldiers who can then progressively be reintegrated into regular schools.

55. Many teachers and parents may object to having ex-combatants enrol in schools, fearing that they will have a disruptive effect. Programmes must address these wider community concerns. In some African cultures, strong spiritual convictions hold that anyone who has killed is haunted by the evil spirits of the victims. Thus, to accept a former child soldier into one's village is to accept evil spirits. In such a context, programmes for re-entry into the community have effectively involved traditional healers in "cleansing" and other processes.

56. For older children especially, effective education will require strong components of training in life-skills and vocational opportunity. Preparing older children to find employment will not only help them survive, but may also facilitate their acceptance at home and provide them with a sense of meaning and identity.

57. Child soldiers may find it difficult to disengage from the idea that violence is a legitimate means of achieving one's aims. Even where the experience of participating in "the cause" has been positive, as was often the case for youth who identified with and drew meaning from their part in the struggle against apartheid, the transition to a non-violent lifestyle will be difficult. This is particularly true where the frustrations of poverty and injustice remain. The challenge for Governments and civil society is to channel the energy, ideas and experience of youth into contributing in positive ways to the creation of their new, post-conflict society.

4. Preventing future recruitment

58. The research conducted for this study uncovered many practical steps to be taken to prevent future recruitment. First, Governments should work for the finalization and rapid adoption of the draft optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on involvement of children in armed conflicts. Next, Governments must pay much closer attention to their methods of recruitment, and in particular, they must renounce the practice of forced recruitment. They should ensure that all children are registered at birth and receive documentation of age. To be certain that these measures succeed, Governments must establish effective monitoring systems and back them up with legal remedies and institutions that are sufficiently strong to tackle abuses. For example, in Guatemala in May and June of 1995, the human rights ombudsman's office intervened in 596 cases of forced recruitment of youth. As a result, 148 children under the age of 18 were released.

59. The recruitment of children can be minimized if local communities are aware of national and international laws governing the age of recruitment and if they are sufficiently organized and determined. In El Salvador, Guatemala and Paraguay, ethnic groups and the mothers of child soldiers have formed organizations to pressure authorities for the release of under-age soldiers. NGOs, religious groups and civil society in general have important roles in establishing ethical frameworks that characterize children's participation in armed conflicts as unacceptable. In Peru, it has been reported that forced recruitment drives have declined in areas where parish churches have denounced the activity. Another important preventive measure is the active and early documentation and tracing of unaccompanied children.

60. The United Nations and other international organizations also have important roles in reporting child conscription, raising the issue with those in authority and supporting local groups in their work for the release of children. In Myanmar, protests from aid agencies led to the return of men and boys who had been forcibly recruited from a refugee camp.

61. Armed opposition groups are less amenable to external or formal pressure than government-sponsored armies. Even with such groups, however, Governments and international organizations can exert influence. When Governments ratify the international humanitarian conventions that apply to internal conflicts, then international law holds all armed groups within those countries accountable. In Sudan, humanitarian organizations have negotiated agreements with rebel groups to prevent the recruitment of children. The human rights component within the United Nations Observer Mission in El Salvador (ONUSAL) supported local groups investigating complaints of forced recruitment of minors and raised the issue with authorities. In many cases, United Nations intervention secured the release of the minors involved.

6162

5. Specific recommendations on child soldiers

62. The expert submits the following recommendations on the question of child soldiers:

(a) Building on the existing efforts of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, Rädda Barnen, the Friends World Committee for Consultation (Quakers), UNICEF, UNHCR and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) and their National Societies, a global campaign should be launched, led by those same organizations, aimed at eradicating the use of children under the age of 18 years in the armed forces. The media, too, should be encouraged to expose the use of child soldiers and the need for demobilization;

(b) United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and international civil society actors should begin to pursue quiet diplomacy with Government and non-state forces and their international supporters to encourage the immediate demobilization of child soldiers and adherence to the Convention on the Rights of the Child;

(c) All peace agreements should include specific measures to demobilize and reintegrate child soldiers into society. There is an urgent need for the international community to support programmes, including advocacy and social services programmes, for the demobilization and re-integration into the community of child soldiers. Such measures must address the family's economic security and include educational, life-skills and vocational opportunities;

(d) States should ensure the early and successful conclusion of the drafting of the optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on involvement of children in armed conflicts, raising the age of recruitment and participation in the armed forces to 18 years.

B. Refugees and internally displaced children

63. Armed conflict has always caused population movements. During full-scale conflicts, whether or not they cross national boundaries, people flee in large numbers. Their destinations determine whether those who flee will become internally displaced people 13/ in their own countries or refugees 14/ who have crossed national borders. Africa and Asia have been most affected by massive population upheavals but no region has escaped either the phenomenon itself or its ramifications. Wherever it occurs, displacement has a profound physical, emotional and developmental impact on children and increases their vulnerability. Except where otherwise distinguished in the present report, refugees and internally displaced persons, as well as persons in refugee-like situations, are referred to collectively as displaced persons.

64. At the beginning of the 1980s, there were 5.7 million refugees worldwide. By the end of the decade, the number had increased to 14.8 million, and today there are more than 27.4 million refugees and "persons of concern" to UNHCR, that is, some returnees and people living in "safe havens". 15/

65. According to the report of the Representative of the Secretary-General on Internally Displaced Persons (E/CN.4/1996/52/Add.2), the number of internally displaced people has also escalated in recent years, now reaching an estimated 30 million - more than the number of refugees. The protection and assistance needs of the internally displaced are similar to those of refugees in nearly all respects, and yet their situation can be worse. While refugees have often moved outside the war zone, internally displaced persons usually remain within or close to the scene of conflict and they are often likely to be displaced repeatedly.

66. At least half of all refugees and displaced people are children. At a crucial and vulnerable time in their lives, they have been brutally uprooted and exposed to danger and insecurity. In the course of displacement, millions of children have been separated from their families, physically abused, exploited and abducted into military groups, or they have perished from hunger and disease.

1. Vulnerability of children in flight

67. To flee from one's home is to experience a deep sense of loss, and the decision to flee is not taken lightly. Those who make this decision do so because they are in danger of being killed, tortured, forcibly recruited, raped, abducted or starved, among other reasons. They leave behind them assets and property, relatives, friends, familiar surroundings and established social networks. Although the decision to leave is normally taken by adults, even the youngest children recognize what is happening and can sense their parents' uncertainty and fear.

68. During flight from the dangers of conflict, families and children continue to be exposed to multiple physical dangers. They are threatened by sudden attacks, shelling, snipers and landmines, and must often walk for days with only limited quantities of water and food. Under such circumstances, children become acutely undernourished and prone to illness, and they are the first to die. Girls in flight are even more vulnerable than usual to sexual abuse. Children forced to flee on their own to ensure their survival are also at heightened risk. Many abandon home to avoid forced recruitment, only to find that being in flight still places them at risk of recruitment, especially if they have no documentation and travel without their families.

2. Unaccompanied children

69. Unaccompanied children are those who are separated from both parents and are not in the care of another adult who, by law or custom, has taken responsibility to do so. 16/ Children are often separated from parents in the chaos of conflict, escape and displacement. Parents or other primary care-givers are the major source of a child's emotional and physical security and for this reason family separation can have a devastating social and psychological impact. Unaccompanied children are especially vulnerable and at risk of neglect, violence, military recruitment, sexual assault and other abuses. An essential goal of relief programmes must be to provide assistance to families to prevent separations.

70. The first priority of relief programmes is to identify a child as unaccompanied and to ensure their survival and protection. The next priorities are documenting, tracing and - whenever possible - reunifying families. Most unaccompanied children are not orphans and, even when both parents are dead, often have relatives, bound by custom and tradition, who are willing and able to care for them. In all cases, it is essential to keep siblings together. In the Great Lakes region of Africa, a vast tracing programme was set up in 1994 by ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies, UNHCR, UNICEF, the Save the Children Fund and other NGOs. More than 100,000 children were registered as unaccompanied, both inside and outside their countries of origin. According to UNHCR, by May 1996, more than 33,000 of these children had been reunited with family members. This positive outcome resulted largely because identification and tracing activities were implemented from the outset of the emergency, and because agencies had committed themselves to cooperate together. Many traditional and non-traditional tracing methods were used, including photo tracing programmes.

71. While families are sought, procedures must be set up to prevent further separation and to provide each unaccompanied child with continuous alternative care. Alternative care is most appropriately found with the extended family, but when this is not possible, it can come from neighbours, friends or other substitute families. Nevertheless these arrangements need careful supervision. Many foster families take excellent care of a child, but where economic and social situations have been undermined by war, children may be at risk of exploitation. The situation of a child in a foster family should therefore always be closely monitored through a community-based system. Initiatives of this kind in the Great Lakes region have produced positive results. These programmes have resulted in closing down unaccompanied children's centres and returning children into the refugee community, combining family mediation and projects to support vulnerable families, enabling them to keep their children.

72. Centres for unaccompanied children, such as orphanages or other institutions, cannot fully meet the emotional and developmental needs of children. And there is always the risk that temporary centres may become permanent. The creation of centres may also in itself generate higher numbers of unaccompanied children. During her visit to the Great Lakes region, the expert was deeply concerned that, as a result of media attention, many centres had been created as a way of profiting from humanitarian aid. Such centres may be attractive to parents who are having difficulty feeding their families and who might easily think it best to leave their children where they will be provided with food and health care. This underlines the need to prevent family separation by ensuring that vulnerable families are supported in caring for their children.

73. In response to the many protection and care problems facing unaccompanied children, UNICEF and UNHCR, in consultation with ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies and some specialized NGOs, have jointly developed an emergency kit to facilitate coordination and to enhance the quality of response to the needs of unaccompanied children. The tools included in the kit, such as registration forms and Polaroid cameras, are derived from experiences gained from earlier emergencies. The kit also comes with guidelines on the protection and care of unaccompanied children, and it is essential that these are widely disseminated among and followed by relief workers.

74. At the height of a conflict, tracing is particularly difficult. Precisely because that is the case, unaccompanied children should not be considered available for adoption. Adoption severs family links permanently and should not be considered unless all family tracing efforts have been exhausted. This principle is safeguarded by a recommendation adopted in the Convention on Protection of Children and Cooperation in respect of Inter-country Adoption signed at The Hague on 29 May 1994. 17/

3. Evacuation

75. Parents living in zones of armed conflict can become so concerned for the safety of their children that they decide to evacuate them, sending them to friends or relatives or having them join large-scale programmes. To parents, evacuation may appear at the time to be the best solution, but this is frequently not the case. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, for example, evacuations were often hastily organized with little documentation. Evacuation also poses a long-term risk to children, including the trauma of separation from the family and the increased danger of trafficking or of illegal adoption. On her visit to Bosnia and Herzegovina, the expert was concerned to learn that some evacuations had been organized by groups intent on exploiting adoption markets. In the case of medical evacuations, difficulties often arise when the foster family, thinking the child will have better opportunities in the host country, does not want to allow the child in their care to return to the original family.

76. As is stressed in the Convention on the Rights of the Child, with articles 9 and 10 regarding family unity being of particular note, all such decisions must be based on the best interests of the child and take her or his opinions into account. If evacuation is essential, whole families should move together, and if this is not possible, children should at least move with their primary care-givers and siblings. Great care should also be taken to ensure that any evacuation is properly documented, and that arrangements are made for the effective reception and care for children and for maintaining contact with other family members, as well as for early reunification. Guidelines on these criteria are supported by UNHCR, UNICEF, ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies. Evacuations are sometimes essential, as international agencies concluded in the Great Lakes region when orphanages were being targeted for purposes of ethnic cleansing. In 1992, UNHCR/UNICEF issued a publication on considerations and guidelines on evacuation of children from conflict areas. These require wide dissemination.

4. Children in camps

77. Ideally, camps for refugees or the internally displaced should be places of safety, offering protection and assistance. However, displaced populations are complex societies that often reproduce former divisions and power struggles. At the same time their traditional systems of social protection come under strain or break down completely and there are often high levels of violence, alcohol and substance abuse, family quarrels and sexual assault. Women and adolescent girls are particularly vulnerable and even the youngest children can be affected when they witness an attack on a mother or a sister. The UNHCR guidelines on sexual violence against refugees outline practical protection measures such as careful lighting, arrangement of latrines and the organizing of people into groups for tasks such as gathering firewood. 18/ These and the UNHCR guidelines on the protection and care of refugee children should be applied to all internally displaced women and children.

78. One important aspect of relief that particularly affects women and children is the distribution of resources such as food, water, firewood and plastic sheeting. Control of these resources represents power. Men are usually in charge of distribution and often abuse their power by demanding bribes or sexual favours. This puts women at risk and especially female heads of households. As recommended in the UNHCR Guidelines on the Protection of Refugee Women, UNHCR and WFP should be in the forefront of ensuring that women are the initial point of control in distribution systems and that appropriate support systems are established for female-headed households.

79. The first days and weeks of a mass displacement of people usually result in high mortality rates for children. Among displaced children, measles, diarrhoeal diseases, acute respiratory infections (ARI), malaria and malnutrition account for 60 to 80 per cent of reported deaths. Factors contributing to high mortality include overcrowding and lack of food and clean water, along with poor sanitation and lack of shelter. Pregnant and lactating women require particular attention, as do displaced children living with disabilities. Children coming from armed conflict are likely to have injuries that require special medical attention. In these circumstances, only a multi-sectoral approach to health and nutrition can protect young children.

80. Camp environments are often highly militarized. In some instances, children have been taken, either forcibly or fraudulently, from camps to a third country for "political education" or military training. In several cases, host Governments have recruited refugee children for military service. 19/

5. The situation of internally displaced children

81. Children who are displaced but remain in their own countries face perilous circumstances. They are often worse off than refugees, since they may lack access to protection and assistance. There are an increasing number of situations where families and communities are chronically displaced due to localized, continued armed conflict. Surveys have shown that the death rate among internally displaced persons has been as much as 60 per cent higher than the death rate of persons within the same country who are not displaced. 20/ Even when internally displaced families are housed with relatives or friends, they may not be secure, eventually facing resentment from their hosts because of the limited resources to be shared.

82. Another acute problem for internally displaced children is access to health and education services. In contravention of humanitarian law, the access of internally displaced persons to humanitarian assistance is often impeded. Flight can put them beyond the reach of existing Government or NGO programmes. Even if schools exist, the children may not be able to enrol because they lack proper documentation, are not considered residents of the area or are unable to pay school fees. Feelings of exclusion, as well as the struggle for survival and protection, may lead children to join parties to the conflict or to become street children.

83. While some organizations such as UNHCR, ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) have specific mandates with regard to internally displaced persons, at present there is no clear institutional responsibility for their protection and assistance needs. Organizations with mandates to protect and care for children affected by armed conflicts such as UNICEF, UNHCR and WFP, do not consistently ensure the protection and care of internally displaced children. The expert supports the call of the Representative of the Secretary-General on Internally Displaced Persons for the development of an appropriate legal framework and institutional arrangements to clearly establish assistance and protection responsibilities. The legal framework should be based on the report of the Representative on the compilation and analysis of legal norms applicable to internally displaced persons (E/CN.4/1996/52/Add.2).

6. Asylum and the right to identity and nationality

84. Statelessness is a risk for refugee children as they may have difficulty in establishing their identity and nationality. As article 7 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child provides, all children should be registered and receive citizenship at birth. In the case of refugee children, only the host State is in a position to register the child. It is particularly important for a refugee child, especially if unaccompanied, to be provided with clear documentation concerning the identity of parents and place of birth.

85. Families who reach a border are still very exposed, and young girls and women who have been separated from their families are particularly vulnerable to exploitation and abuse from border guards and others. Even those who succeed in crossing a border have no guarantee of asylum. The 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees may not fully cover those fleeing armed conflict. In cases of mass exodus from countries like Afghanistan and Viet Nam, many Governments were sufficiently flexible to grant temporary refuge. However, since the end of the cold war, many Governments have been more reluctant to grant asylum and have even sought to prevent asylum seekers from reaching their borders. As a minimum, Governments should grant temporary asylum pending the identification of a durable solution.

86. One consequence of current policies is that a number of asylum seekers, including children, are detained while their cases are considered. Seeking asylum cannot be considered an offence or a crime, yet in some cases women and children are incarcerated with criminals. Countries that determine refugee status on an individual basis should under no circumstances refuse access to unaccompanied children seeking asylum. The Statement of the Sixth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Europe stressed that unaccompanied children should have access to asylum procedures regardless of age. Bearing in mind the critical development needs of children, long-term solutions should be found as quickly as possible. In accordance with the Convention on the Rights of the Child and UNHCR guidelines, children should be fully involved in decisions about their future.

7. Returning home and durable solutions

87. Long-term solutions for refugees involve voluntary repatriation, local integration or resettlement into new national communities. Whichever is chosen, procedures should be expeditious and carried out in the best interests of the child. The principles relating to voluntary repatriation and reintegration should also be applied to the return of internally displaced persons. These are to ensure that conditions of safety and dignity as well as national protection are available.

88. For refugee or internally displaced families and children returning to their home communities, reintegration may be very difficult. In countries disrupted by many years of conflict, there are often tensions between returnees and residents. For children in particular, one of the most important measures is to ensure education and the opportunity to re-establish family life and productive livelihoods.

89. Another major difficulty is that female heads of households may, on their return, lose property rights and custody of their children. Loss of property rights may also affect child-headed households. These are usually family units of siblings, children of extended family members, or even unrelated children, headed by a minor, usually an adolescent girl. In September 1995, UNICEF and the Rwandan Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs identified 1,939 children living in child-headed households. Their need for legal and social protection is especially acute; lack of land, property and inheritance rights add to their instability. Child-headed households are particularly vulnerable to exploitative labour and prostitution. Dilemmas have arisen in designing appropriate policy and programme responses, especially around the feasibility of foster arrangements. The principle of family unity, even where there are not parents, as safeguarded in the Convention on the Rights of the Child, must be the basis of all support for these children.

8. Specific recommendations for refugee and internally displaced children

90. The expert submits the following recommendations for refugee and internally displaced children:

(a) As a priority in all emergencies, procedures should be adopted to ensure the survival and protection of unaccompanied children. Family tracing programmes should be established from the outset of assistance programmes;

(b) Unaccompanied children should, wherever possible, be cared for by their extended family and community rather than in institutions. It is essential that donors support this principle. The vast majority of unaccompanied children have some family somewhere. Therefore, no adoptions should be permitted until exhaustive family tracing, including into the post-conflict phase, has been attempted;

(c) Practical protection measures to prevent sexual violence, discrimination in delivery of relief materials, and the recruitment of children into armed forces must be a priority in all assistance programmes in refugee and displaced camps. Such measures should involve women and youth fully in their design, delivery and monitoring and include advocacy and social services to address abuses and violations of children's rights;

(d) The Inter-Agency Standing Committee and its Task Force on Internally Displaced Persons should evaluate the extent to which assistance and protection are being provided to internally displaced children and develop appropriate institutional frameworks to address their needs. In cooperation with the Department of Humanitarian Affairs in its role under the authority of the Emergency Relief Coordinator, and in consultation with other major humanitarian agencies, in each emergency, a lead agency should be assigned overall responsibility for the protection and assistance of internally displaced persons. In collaboration with the lead agency, UNICEF should provide leadership for the protection and assistance of internally displaced children;

(e) The General Assembly, the Commission on Human Rights, as well as regional organizations, should support the work of the Representative of the Secretary-General on Internally Displaced Persons to develop an appropriate legal framework to increase protection for internally displaced persons and to give particular emphasis to the specific concerns of children;

(f) Intergovernmental bodies, UNHCR, the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) and other organizations should support Governments in strengthening national legislative frameworks challenging any aspect of discrimination against women, girls and child-headed households with particular respect to custody, inheritance and property rights;

(g) The expert urges that UNICEF, UNHCR, FAO and ILO give urgent attention to the situation of child-headed households, and develop policy and programme guidelines to ensure their protection and care.

C. Sexual exploitation and gender-based violence

1. Gender-based violence: a weapon of war

91. Rape poses a continual threat to women and girls during armed conflict, as do other forms of gender-based violence including prostitution, sexual humiliation and mutilation, trafficking and domestic violence. While abuses such as murder and torture have long been denounced as war crimes, rape has been downplayed as an unfortunate but inevitable side effect of war. Acts of gender-based violence, particularly rape, committed during armed conflicts constitute a violation of international humanitarian law. When it occurs on a massive scale or as a matter of orchestrated policy, this added dimension is recognized as it was at the most recent International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent, as a crime against humanity. Recent efforts to prosecute rape as a war crime, however, have underscored the difficulties in applying international human rights law and humanitarian law.

92. Women of all ages may be victims of violence in conflict, but adolescent girls are particularly at risk for a range of reasons, including size and vulnerability. Their vulnerability is even greater in some localities where they are considered less likely to have sexually transmitted diseases and the HIV/AIDS virus. Characteristics such as ethnicity, class, religion or nationality may be factors that determine which women or girls are subjected to violence. Women and girls are at risk in all settings whether in the home, during flight or in camps to which they have fled for safety. Children affected by gender-based violence also include those who have witnessed the rape of a family member and those who are ostracized because of a mother's assault.

93. Most child victims of violence and sexual abuse are girls, but boys are also affected and cases of young boys who have been raped or forced into prostitution are under-reported. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, sons and fathers have been forced to commit sexual atrocities against each other. In some cases, boys traumatized by violence have also subsequently been the perpetrators of sexual violence against girls.

94. Rape is not incidental to conflict. It can occur on a random and uncontrolled basis due to the general disruption of social boundaries and the license granted to soldiers and militias. Most often, however, it functions like other forms of torture and is used as a tactical weapon of war to humiliate and weaken the morale of the perceived enemy. During armed conflict, rape is used to terrorize populations or to force civilians to flee.

95. Often, gender-based violence is practised with the intent of ethnic cleansing through deliberate impregnation. The Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the territory of the former Yugoslavia found that this was the case in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Croatia. 21/ The thousands of Korean women forced to serve as military sexual slaves during the Second World War is another example of rape being used as a weapon of war. 22/

2. Child victims of prostitution and sexual exploitation

96. Poverty, hunger and desperation may force women and girls into prostitution, obliging them to offer sex for food or shelter, for safe conduct through the war zone or to obtain papers or other privileges for themselves and their families. Children have been trafficked from conflict situations to work in brothels in other countries, transported from Cambodia to Thailand, for example, and from Georgia to Turkey. In refugee camps in Zaire, the expert heard numerous reports of girls who had been pressured by their families to enter prostitution. Similarly, some parents among the internally displaced communities in Guatemala have been forced to prostitute their children. Other girls have done so in the hope of securing greater protection. In Colombia, for example, there have been reports of girls as young as twelve submitting themselves to paramilitary forces as a means of defending their families against other groups.

97. With time, different forms of gender-based violence experienced during armed conflicts become institutionalized, since many of the conditions that created the violence remain unchanged. Young girls who have become victims of prostitution for armies, for example, may have no other option but to continue after the conflict has ceased. In Phnom Penh, the number of child victims of prostitution continues to escalate with an estimated 100 children sold into prostitution each month for economic reasons.

98. Children may also become victims of prostitution following the arrival of peacekeeping forces. In Mozambique, after the signing of the peace treaty in 1992, soldiers of the United Nations Operation in Mozambique (ONUMOZ) recruited girls aged 12 to 18 years into prostitution. After a commission of inquiry confirmed the allegations, the soldiers implicated were sent home. 23/ In 6 out of 12 country studies on sexual exploitation of children in situations of armed conflict prepared for the present report, the arrival of peacekeeping troops has been associated with a rapid rise in child prostitution.

99. Sexual exploitation has a devastating impact on physical and emotional development. Unwanted and unsafe sex is likely to lead to sexually transmitted diseases and HIV/AIDS, which not only affect immediate health but also future sexual and reproductive health and mortality. In Cambodia, according to a study prepared for the present report, it is estimated that 60 to 70 per cent of the child victims of prostitution are HIV positive. Adolescent girls may nonetheless suffer in silence after the trauma of sexual exploitation; they often fear reprisals from those who attacked them or rejection by their families, not to mention the sheer personal humiliation and anguish which causes so many of them to withdraw into a shell of pain and denial. WHO has found that among rape victims the risk of suicide is high.

100. When a pregnancy is forced, the determination about whether it will be carried to term depends on many local circumstances, including access to and the safety of abortion, community support systems and existing religious or cultural mores. In Rwanda, the expert heard conflicting reports about the numbers of pregnancies that had been terminated or brought to term, abandoned or adopted.

101. All women and young girls who give birth during conflict must contend with the unexpected economic and psychosocial consequences of raising a child without adequate systems of support. The deterioration of public health infrastructure reduces access to reproductive health services, such as family planning, treatment for sexually transmitted diseases and gynaecological complications, and pre- and post-natal care.

102. Complications in pregnancy and delivery are especially likely for children who have children. Owing to their physical immaturity, many pregnant adolescents experience infection as a result of unsafe or incomplete abortion. Victims of repeated rape and young girls who give birth in the absence of trained birth attendants and in unhygienic conditions are at greater risk of chronic pelvic inflammatory diseases and muscle injury that can result in incontinence. Without sensitive, timely and adequate medical care, many of these victims die. Some commit suicide because of the humiliation and embarrassment they suffer.

3. Ending impunity

103. The failure to denounce and prosecute wartime rape is partly a result of its mischaracterization as an assault against honour or a personal attack rather than a crime against the physical integrity of the victim. The International Tribunal established to try war crimes committed in the former Yugoslavia has indicted eight people on specific charges of rape and sexual assault, despite estimates of up to 20,000 victims. This limited result underscores the difficulties in applying international human rights and humanitarian law to rape - difficulties which are reflected both in the codification and interpretation of national, and even international, law.

104. The widespread practice of rape as an instrument of armed conflict and ethnic cleansing must be ended and its perpetrators prosecuted. National and international law must codify rape as a crime against the physical integrity of the individual, national Governments must hold those who commit rape in internal conflicts accountable and must reform their national laws to address the substantive nature of the abuse. Unwanted pregnancy resulting from forced impregnation should be recognized as a distinct harm and appropriate remedies provided.

105. Overall procedures and mechanisms to investigate, report, prosecute and remedy gender-based violations should be reviewed and strengthened, ensuring the protection of victims who report violations. It is encouraging that some organizations are beginning to include trained and qualified personnel in international human rights monitoring, investigation and verification operations to consider issues of gender violence more systematically.

106. As recommended in the Beijing Platform for Action, gender balance must be sought when nominating or promoting candidates for judicial and all relevant international bodies, including the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, the International Court of Justice and other bodies related to the peaceful settlement of disputes. Both legal and medical programme personnel, including medical and relief personnel, prosecutors, judges and other officials who respond to crimes of rape, forced impregnation, and other forms of gender-based violence in armed conflict, should be trained to integrate a gender-specific perspective into their work.

4. Preventing gender-based violence

107. Prevention of gender-based violence should include a role for the military, and United Nations peacekeepers in particular. Senior officers often have turned a blind eye to the sexual crimes of those under their command, but they must be held accountable for both their own behaviour and that of the men they supervise. The 12 case studies on gender-based violence prepared for the present report found the main perpetrators of sexual abuse and exploitation to be the armed forces of parties to a conflict, whether governmental or other actors. Military training should emphasize gender sensitivity, child rights and responsible behaviour towards women and children. Offenders must be prosecuted and punished for acts against women and children.

108. Other preventive measures include the construction of shelter, water and sanitation facilities in camps which must be carefully designed to avoid creating opportunities for gender-based aggression against displaced women and children. In situations of armed conflict, all humanitarian assistance must include community-based psychosocial and reproductive health programmes. Higher priority should be given to addressing the needs of children who have witnessed or been subjected to gender-based violence.

109. Humanitarian responses have been largely inadequate. UNHCR, however, has published guidelines on prevention and response to sexual violence against refugees and guidelines on evaluation and care of victims of trauma and violence. These are important efforts to ensure that relief workers are equipped to respond to the special needs of victims of sexual violence. Some effective programmes do exist, such as the "Women Victims of Violence" project in Kenya. This was initiated by UNHCR following the very large number of rapes committed by bandits and local security personnel in the Somali refugee camps of north-eastern Kenya. During a field visit to Bosnia and Herzegovina, the expert visited a number of community-based programmes, such as "Bosfam" and "Bospo" that provide support for women, including victims of sexual violence, in regaining control over their lives through small-scale income-generating activities. Such programmes have been few and far between, however. To be effective, they should provide comprehensive services including economic assistance and psychosocial support, and they should not overtly identify the women as victims. If such initiatives are to succeed, the local community must be involved in their design and implementation.

5. Specific recommendations on sexual exploitation and gender-based violence

110. The expert submits the following recommendations on sexual exploitation and gender-based violence:

(a) All humanitarian responses in conflict situations must emphasize the special reproductive health needs of women and girls including access to family planning services, pregnancy as a result of rape, sexual mutilation, childbirth at an early age or infection with sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS. Equally important are the psychosocial needs of mothers who have been subjected to gender-based violence and who need help in order to foster the conditions necessary for the healthy development of their children;

(b) All military personnel, including peacekeeping personnel, should receive instruction on their responsibilities towards civilian communities and particularly towards women and children as part of their training;

(c) Clear and easily accessible systems should be established for reporting on sexual abuse within both military and civilian populations;

(d) The treatment of rape as a war crime must be clarified, pursued within military and civilian populations, and punished accordingly. Appropriate legal and rehabilitative remedies must be made available to reflect the nature of the crime and its harm;

(e) Refugee and displaced persons camps should be so designed as to improve security for women and girls. Women should also be involved in all aspects of camp administration but especially in organizing distribution and security systems. Increased numbers of female personnel should be deployed to the field as protection officers and counsellors;

(f) In every conflict, support programmes should be established for victims of sexual abuse and gender-based violence. These should offer confidential counselling on a wide range of issues, including the rights of victims. They should also provide educational activities and skills training.

D. Landmines and unexploded ordnance

111. The spread of light weapons of all kinds has caused untold suffering to millions of children caught up in armed conflict. Many of these weapons have a devastating impact not only during the period of conflict, but for decades thereafter. Landmines and unexploded ordnance probably pose the most insidious and persistent danger. Today, children in at least 68 countries live amid the contamination of more than 110 million landmines. Added to this number are millions of items of unexploded ordnance, bombs, shells and grenades that failed to detonate on impact. Like landmines, unexploded ordnance are weapons deemed to have indiscriminate effects, triggered by innocent and unsuspecting passers-by. 24/

112. Landmines have been employed in most conflicts since the Second World War, and particularly in internal conflicts. Afghanistan, Angola and Cambodia alone have a combined total of at least 28 million landmines, as well as 85 per cent of the world's landmine casualties. Angola, with an estimated 10 million landmines, has an amputee population of 70,000, of whom 8,000 are children. African children live on the continent most plagued by landmines - there are as many as 37 million mines in at least 19 African countries - but all continents are affected to some extent. 25/

1. The threat to children

113. Landmines and unexploded ordnance pose a particular danger for children, especially because children are naturally curious and likely to pick up strange objects they come across. Devices like the "butterfly" mines used extensively by the former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in Afghanistan are coloured bright green and have two "wings". Although they were not designed to look like toys, such devices can still hold a deadly attraction for children. Children are also more vulnerable to the danger of landmines than adults because they may not recognize or be able to read warning signs. Even if they are aware of mines, small children may be less able than adults to spot them: a mine laid in grass and clearly visible to an adult may be less so to a small child, whose perspective is two or three feet lower.

114. The risk to children is further compounded by the way in which mines and unexploded ordnance become a part of daily life. Children may become so familiar with mines that they forget they are lethal weapons. In northern Iraq, children have been known to use mines as wheels for toy trucks, and in Cambodia children have been seen playing "boules" with B40 anti-personnel mines, even beginning their own collections of landmines. 26/ The dangers from unexploded ordnance are very similar, and in many places these weapons are much more numerous. During her field visit to Cambodia, the expert noted that civilians increasingly use mines and other devices for daily activities such as fishing, guarding private property and even settling domestic disputes. Such familiarity dulls awareness of the dangers of these devices.

115. The victims of mines and unexploded ordnance tend to be concentrated among the poorest sectors of society, where people face danger every day when cultivating their fields, herding their animals or searching for firewood. In many cultures, these are the very tasks carried out by children. In Viet Nam, for example, it is young children who look after the family water buffalo, which often roam freely in areas where the ground has been mined or contains unexploded bombs and shells. Many poor children also work as scavengers. In a village in Mozambique in 1995, several children were collecting scrap metal to sell in the local market. When they took it to the market and placed it on a scale, the metal exploded, killing 11 children. 27/ Child soldiers are particularly vulnerable, as they are often the personnel used to explore known minefields. In Cambodia, a survey of mine victims in military hospitals found that 43 per cent had been recruited as soldiers between the ages of 10 and 16.

116. A mine explosion is likely to cause greater damage to the body of a child than to that of an adult. Anti-personnel mines are designed not to kill, but to maim, yet even the smallest mine explosion can be lethal for a child. In Cambodia, an average 20 per cent of all children injured by mines and unexploded ordnance die from their injuries. 28/ For the children who survive, the medical problems related to amputation are often severe, as the limb of a growing child grows faster than the surrounding tissue and requires repeated amputation. As they grow, children also need new prostheses regularly. For young children, this can mean a new prosthesis every six months. The extended medical treatment and psychosocial support that mine injuries demand make them extremely expensive for the families of the victims and for society in general. Girls are even less likely than boys to receive special medical attention and prostheses. The burden and the expense of rehabilitative care should be considered in recovery and social reintegration programmes.

117. Even where children themselves are not the victims, landmines and unexploded ordnance have an overwhelming impact on their lives. Families already living on the edge of survival are often financially devastated by mine incidents. Surveys in Cambodia have revealed that 61 per cent of families with a mine victim to support were in debt because of the accident. Additionally, when a parent is a mine casualty, the lost ability to work can substantially weaken the care and protection available to children. A field survey in Afghanistan reported that unemployment for adult males rose from 6 to 52 per cent as a result of landmine accidents.

118. Indiscriminate weapons also strike at a country's reconstruction and development. Roads and footpaths strewn with landmines impede the safe repatriation and return of refugee and displaced children and their families. Land seeded with millions of landmines and unexploded ordnance is unfit for sowing productive crops, and the threat of mines inhibits the circulation of goods and services.

2. Mine clearance, mine awareness and rehabilitation

119. Protecting children and other civilians from landmines and unexploded ordnance demands rapid progress in four major areas: a ban on landmines; mine clearance that will eventually remove the problem; mine awareness programmes that help children to avoid injury; and rehabilitation programmes that help children recover. The Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat has advanced the relatively new concept of humanitarian mine clearance. The United Nations considers that an area meets safety standards when it is 99.9 per cent free of landmines. Clearing landmines is a long and expensive business: each one takes 100 times longer to remove than to deploy and a weapon that costs $3 or less to manufacture may eventually cost $1,000 to remove. The countries most contaminated by mines are generally among the world's poorest, so there is little prospect that they can afford to finance their own de-mining programmes. Only Kuwait has been able to devote the necessary resources to mine clearance.

120. The United Nations is responding to this problem with the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance. To date, countries have pledged $22 million of the United Nations goal of $75 million, and so far $19.5 million has been received. 29/ The Department of Humanitarian Affairs, as the focal point for mine-related activities within the United Nations system, is developing the Voluntary Trust Fund and de-mining stand-by capacity as quick response instruments to develop national programmes. Protection from landmines is a shared international responsibility and the costs should be borne by the companies and countries that have profited from the manufacture and sale of mines.

121. Far greater attention must be paid to increasing national capacity to address the consequences of landmines and unexploded ordnance. This requires sustainable financial support for mine-clearance teams and medical rehabilitation programmes. It is essential to establish and support local mechanisms for coordination, the open sharing of information and the development of consistent mine awareness messages. Commercial teams often clear only the major roads and generally follow the priorities of central Government or of businesses such as airports and commercial transportation routes. Too often, children's needs are ignored and the areas around schools or rural footpaths are left uncleared. Mine clearance should be adapted to local knowledge and priorities. In the area of medical rehabilitation, the development of local capacity for prosthetics production is essential. This can provide economic opportunity for victims and contribute to their psychosocial well being.

122. Mine awareness programmes help people to recognize landmines and suspected mined areas and explain what to do when a mine is discovered or an incident occurs. These programmes have been undertaken in a number of countries, but for children, they are not as effective as they need to be, making relatively little use of techniques that are interactive or tailored to the needs of different age groups. Often, mine awareness teams simply enter a community, present information and leave - an approach that does not address the behavioural changes an affected community must make to prevent injury. Recent programmes have been more carefully prepared, not merely telling participants about the issues, but trying to involve them in the learning process. For example, a new programme developed by Save the Children Fund - US for Kabul (a city with more than 1 million mines) emphasizes participants' involvement, child-to-child approaches, multi-media presentations, role playing, survivors as educators and the creation of safe play areas.

3. The need for an international ban

123. The immense impact of landmines and the damage they will continue to cause for many years to come has stimulated an international campaign to ban their manufacture and use. In 1992, a global coalition of non-governmental organizations formed the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, and there has been considerable progress since. The Secretary-General has strongly advocated an end to the landmine scourge and, in resolution 49/75 D, the General Assembly has called for their eventual elimination. UNICEF and UNHCR have adopted stringent policies against doing any business with companies or subsidiaries of companies that produce or sell anti-personnel mines. Some 41 countries have now stated that they are in favour of banning landmines and some have already taken concrete steps to ban the use, production and trade of the weapons and have begun to destroy their stocks. The expert urges that all States follow the lead of countries like Belgium and enact comprehensive national legislation to ban landmines.

124. Many legal experts believe that landmines are already an illegal weapon under international law and should be prohibited because they counter two basic principles of humanitarian law. First, the principle of distinction holds that attacks may only be directed against military objectives. Landmines do not distinguish between military and civilian targets. Second, the principle of unnecessary suffering holds that, even if an attack is directed against a legitimate military objective, the attack is not lawful if it can result in excessive injury or suffering to civilians. Thus, the military utility of a weapon must outweigh its impact on civil society, and the long destructive life of a landmine is clearly greater than any immediate utility. These principles apply to all States as part of customary international law.

125. The use of landmines is specifically regulated by Protocol II of the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects. Worldwide pressure resulting from the International Campaign to Ban Landmines led to a call for a review conference on the Convention, which took place between September 1995 and May 1996. While some progress was made in revising Protocol II to the Convention, this legal protection falls far short of even the bare minimum needed to protect children and their families. The expert hopes that the next conference in 2001 will agree on a total ban, at least on anti-personnel mines.

4. Specific recommendations on landmines and unexploded ordnance

126. The expert submits the following recommendations on landmines and unexploded ordnance:

(a) Governments should immediately enact comprehensive national legislation to ban the production, use, trade and stockpiling of landmines. Governments should support the campaign for a worldwide ban, at least on anti-personnel mines, at the next review conference to the Convention on Conventional Weapons in 2001. In order to reduce the threat of unexploded ordnance, the conference should also make concrete proposals to address the impact on children of other conventional weapons, such as cluster bombs and small-calibre weapons;

(b) In reports to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, States Parties, where relevant, should report on progress in enacting comprehensive legislation. Furthermore, they should report on measures being taken in mine clearance and in programmes to promote children's awareness of landmines and to rehabilitate those who have been injured;

(c) Humanitarian mine clearance should be established as a part of all peace agreements, incorporating strategies to develop national capacity for mine clearance;

(d) Governments must provide sufficient resources to support long-term humanitarian mine clearance. Such funding should be provided bilaterally and through international assistance such as the United Nations Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance;

(e) Countries and companies that have profited from the sale of mines should be especially required to contribute to funds designated for humanitarian mine clearance and mine awareness programmes. Measures to reduce the proliferation and trade of landmines, such as consumer boycotts, should be explored;

(f) A technical workshop on mine awareness should be held by the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, UNICEF, UNESCO and involved NGOs. The purpose would be to assess lessons learned, promote best practice in child-focused mine awareness programmes and improve coordination, assessment and evaluation.

E. Sanctions

127. The present report focuses on armed conflict, but a closely-related issue that also has a serious impact on children is the imposition of economic sanctions. In recent years, economic sanctions have been seen as a cheaper, non-violent alternative to warfare. In his follow-up report to "An Agenda for Peace" (A/50/60), the Secretary-General of the United Nations recognized that sanctions raise the ethical question of whether suffering inflicted on vulnerable groups in the target country is a legitimate means of exerting pressure on political leaders. Since 1991, under Article 41, Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the international community has collectively imposed sanctions on Iraq, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Haiti. In addition, countries can and have employed bilateral sanctions. In the post-cold war era, it seems likely that sanctions will play an increasingly important part in international policy. Governments are reluctant to commit troops and funds to international military intervention and see sanctions as a safer recourse that can be applied at lower cost to the embargoing power. While not necessarily the case, sanctions also appear less deadly than military action for the population of the target country.

1. Humanitarian exemptions

128. In theory, most sanctions regimes exempt critical humanitarian supplies from general embargoes. In practice, sanctions have so far proved blunt instruments. Humanitarian exemptions tend to be ambiguous and are interpreted arbitrarily and inconsistently. They often cause resource shortages; disrupt the distribution of food, pharmaceuticals and sanitation supplies; and reduce the capacity of the public health system to maintain the quality of food, water, air, and medicine. Delays, confusion and the denial of requests to import essential humanitarian goods cause resource shortages. While these effects might seem to be spread evenly across the target populations, they inevitably fall most heavily on the poor. Those with power and influence will usually have ways of acquiring what they need, while the general population struggles to survive with what remains. While adults can endure long periods of hardship and privation, children have much less resistance, and they are less likely to survive persistent shortages. Studies from Cuba, Haiti and Iraq following the imposition of sanctions each showed a rapid rise in the proportion of children who were malnourished. In Haiti after 1991, for example, one study indicated that the price of staple foods increased fivefold and the proportion of malnourished children increased from 5 to 23 per cent. 30/

129. Even when exemptions are permitted, the conditions applied may be unacceptable to the Government in power. Indeed, those Governments and authorities against which sanctions are imposed are rarely personally affected and may be precisely those less responsive to the plight of their people. Iraq since 1990 has experienced the most comprehensive regime ever imposed. In order to mitigate some of the effects on health and nutrition, the Security Council adopted resolution 706 (1991) to permit the use of frozen Iraqi funds to purchase food and medicine, stipulating that these supplies had to be purchased and distributed under the supervision of the United Nations. The Iraqi Government considered these conditions unacceptable and only started to discuss them in 1995. Meanwhile, the situation for children has deteriorated. Over the past five years, infant mortality is thought to have tripled. 31/ The "oil-for-food" procedures contained in Security Council resolution 986 (1995) present an opportunity to mitigate the negative impact of sanctions on Iraqi children. To take full advantage of this opportunity, however, all currency generated through oil sales should be dedicated to humanitarian and civilian purposes.

130. In the interests of children, the international community should cease to impose comprehensive economic sanctions without obligatory and enforceable humanitarian exemptions and agreed mechanisms for monitoring the impact of sanctions on children and other vulnerable groups. Any measures taken should be precisely targeted at the vulnerabilities of the political or military leaders whose behaviour the international community wishes to change. These actions could include an arms embargo, the freezing of all corporate and individual overseas assets, the stopping of certain kinds of economic transactions, the suspension of air links and other forms of communication and the isolation of countries from the rest of the world through cultural, academic and economic boycotts.

2. The need for child impact assessments and monitoring

131. Sanctions should be judged against the standards of universal human rights, particularly the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The primary consideration must always be the potential human impact, which should influence the imposition and choice of sanctions, the duration, the legal provisions and the operation of the sanctions regime. Sanctions should not be imposed without advance assessment of the economic and social structure of the target country and the ability of the international community to sustain continuous monitoring.

132. Monitoring systems make it possible to assess the impact of the embargo on health and well-being. At minimum, such assessments should measure changes in access to essential medicines and medical supplies (especially items that may serve both civilian and military purposes such as chlorine for water purification or lab reagents for health screening and testing), water quality and quantity, the nutritional state of children and the infant mortality rate.

133. When targeted sanctions are imposed, humanitarian exemptions should be formulated with clear guidelines. At the same time, in order to help vulnerable groups, the established agencies should formulate appropriate humanitarian assistance programmes. If essential humanitarian goods are denied to the population, the sanctioning powers have a responsibility to assure new sources of supply. When the Security Council imposes sanctions, it should also simultaneously provide resources to neutral, independent bodies to monitor the situation of vulnerable groups. In the event that the position of children deteriorates, the United Nations should assume responsibility for redressing the situation.

134. Since many of the effects of sanctions, particularly the health impact, may only become evident over a period of years, no sanctions regime should be allowed to continue indefinitely. When the Security Council imposes sanctions, it should also clearly define the circumstances under which they should be lifted. If the sanctions fail to produce the desired result within a predetermined period, they should be replaced by other measures.

3. Specific recommendations on sanctions

135. The expert submits the following recommendations on sanctions:

(a) The international community should ensure that whenever sanctions are imposed they provide for humanitarian, child-focused exemptions. The international community should establish effective monitoring mechanisms and child impact assessments. These must be developed with clear application guidelines;

(b) Humanitarian assistance programmes of the United Nations specialized agencies and of NGOs should be exempt from approval by the Security Council Sanctions Committee;

(c) A primary concern when planning a targeted sanctions regime should be to minimize its impact on vulnerable groups, and particularly children. Sanctions or other measures taken by the Security Council should be precisely targeted at the vulnerabilities of those whose behaviour the international community wishes to change;

(d) The Security Council Sanctions Committee should closely monitor the humanitarian impact of sanctions and amend sanctions immediately if they are shown to cause undue suffering to children.

F. Health and nutrition

136. The effects of armed conflict on child development accumulate and interact with each other. The stage of physical, psychosocial, cognitive and moral development that a child has reached directly affects his or her ability to cope with these impacts. Consistent with article 39 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, obliging States Parties to promote the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of children affected by armed conflict, the following three subsections of the report are devoted to health and nutrition, psychosocial well-being and education.

137. Thousands of children are killed every year as a direct result of fighting, from knife wounds, bullets, bombs and landmines, but many more die from malnutrition and disease caused or increased by armed conflicts. The interruption of food supplies, the destruction of food crops and agricultural infrastructures, the disintegration of families and communities, the displacement of populations, the destruction of health services and programmes and of water and sanitation systems all take a heavy toll on children. Many die as a direct result of diminished food intake that causes acute and severe malnutrition, while others, compromised by malnutrition, become unable to resist common childhood diseases and infections.

138. Given their vulnerability, it is no surprise that around 2 million children are estimated to have died as a result of armed conflict in the last decade. 32/ In Mozambique alone, between 1981 and 1988, armed conflict caused 454,000 child deaths, while in Somalia, according to WHO, crude mortality rates increased 7 to 25 times. Some of the highest death rates occur among children in refugee camps. These statistics are in stark contrast to the intent behind article 6 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which asserts that States Parties shall ensure to the maximum extent possible the survival and development of the child. Article 24 states that the child has a right to the highest standard of health and medical care available.

139. Many of today's armed conflicts take place in some of the world's poorest countries, where children are already vulnerable to malnutrition and disease, and the onset of armed conflict increases death rates up to 24 times. All children are at risk when conflicts break out, but the most vulnerable are those who are under five and already malnourished.

1. Communicable diseases

140. Since 1990, the most commonly reported causes of death among refugees and internally displaced persons during the early influx phase have been diarrhoeal diseases, acute respiratory infections, measles and other infectious diseases. Even in peacetime, these are the major killers of children, accounting for some seven million child deaths each year. 33/ Their effects are heightened during conflicts, partly because malnutrition is likely to be more prevalent, thereby increasing chances of infection.

141. Diarrhoea is one of the most common diseases. In Somalia during 1992, 23 to 50 per cent of deaths in Baidoa, Afgoi and Berbera were reported to be due to diarrhoea. Cholera is also a constant threat and, following armed conflicts, it has occurred in refugee camps in Bangladesh, Kenya, Malawi, Nepal, Somalia and Zaire, amongst others. Acute respiratory infections, including pneumonia, are particularly lethal in children and, according to WHO, killing one-third of the children who died in six refugee centres in Goma, Zaire, in 1994. Measles epidemics have been reported in recent situations of conflict or displacement in several African countries - at the height of the conflict in Somalia, more than half the deaths in some places were caused by measles. As tuberculosis re-emerges as a dangerous threat to health the world over, its effect is heightened by armed conflict and disruption. WHO estimates that half the world's refugees may be infected with tuberculosis, as the crowded conditions in refugee camps often promote the spread of tubercular infection. Malaria has always been a major cause of morbidity and mortality among refugees in tropical areas, particularly among people who come from areas of marginal transmission and who move through or settle in endemic areas. Children, as always, are the most vulnerable to these collective assaults on health and well-being.

142. The potential for greater spread of sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS, increases dramatically during conflicts. Population movements, rape, sexual violence and the breakdown of established social values all increase the likelihood of unprotected sexual activity and larger numbers of sexual partners. Reduced access to reproductive health services, including education, increases the vulnerability of adolescents in particular. The breakdown of health services and blood transfusion services lacking the ability to screen for HIV/AIDS also increase transmission. NGOs and agencies such as FAO and UNICEF have noted a dramatic increase in the incidence of child headed households as one of the consequences of HIV/AIDS in parts of Africa. This trend is likely to increase. It is essential that agencies design clear strategies to assist children in these situations without disrupting family unity.

2. Reproductive health

143. In times of conflict, the provision of primary health care in conjunction with interventions to secure clean water, adequate nutrition, shelter and sanitation, will be the priority health agenda. However, reproductive health is also important for the physical and psychosocial well-being of men and women, and particularly of young girls. The reproductive health of pregnant women and mothers is integrally tied to the health of newborns and children. WHO advocates that reproductive health services based on women's needs and demands, with full respect for religious and cultural backgrounds, should be available in all situations. The effects of armed conflicts - family and community breakdown, rapid social change, the breakdown of support systems, increased sexual violence and rape, malnutrition, epidemics and inadequate health services, including poor prenatal care - make it imperative that the right to reproductive health care is given high priority. The problems caused by complications in pregnancy and delivery and by unwanted and unsafe sex can be immediate, as is the case with chronic pelvic inflammatory diseases. They can also adversely effect women's future sexual and reproductive health and that of their children by leading to health conditions such as infertility, paediatric AIDS and congenital syphilis.

144. The insufficient attention paid to reproductive health issues in emergency situations led to the development of the UNHCR/UNFPA Inter-Agency Field Manual on Reproductive Health in Refugee Situations. Reproductive health programmes that involve women and adolescents in their design, implementation and assessment help to build personal capacities, lead to more relevant programmes and can make important contributions to the health and development of young people and women in situations of armed conflict. In South Africa, for example, UNICEF reports that young people have been involved effectively in the design, testing and implementation of youth health situation analyses, and in Ghana, peer educators in health projects for children living or working in the streets, 34/ have improved their programmes by involving young people in assessments.

3. Disability

145. Millions of children are killed by armed conflict, but three times as many are seriously injured or permanently disabled by it. According to WHO, armed conflict and political violence are the leading causes of injury, impairment and physical disability and primarily responsible for the conditions of over 4 million children who currently live with disabilities. In Afghanistan alone, some 100,000 children have war-related disabilities, many of them caused by landmines. The lack of basic services and the destruction of health facilities during armed conflict mean that children living with disabilities get little support. Only 3 per cent in developing countries receive adequate rehabilitative care, and the provision of prosthetics to children is an area that requires increased attention and financial support. In Angola and Mozambique, less than 20 per cent of children needing them received low-cost prosthetic devices; in Nicaragua and El Salvador, services were also available for only 20 per cent of the children in need. This lack of rehabilitative care is contrary to article 23 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which lays out clearly the responsibilities of States Parties for ensuring effective access of disabled children to education, health and rehabilitation services.

4. Destruction of health facilities

146. In most wars, and particularly in internal conflicts, health facilities come under attack, in direct violation of the Geneva Conventions of 1949. During the armed conflict from 1982 to 1987 in Nicaragua, for example, 106 of the country's 450 health units were eventually put out of service as a result of complete or partial destruction, and a further 37 health posts were closed owing to frequent attacks. The intensity of the war also diverted much of the health service to the needs of immediate casualties. Hospitals maintained low occupancy rates in order to be able to receive the injured at short notice and they were forced either to neglect the regular care of patients or to shift them to health centres. Even health facilities that remain open during a conflict offer very restricted service. In Mozambique, between 1982 and 1990, about 70 per cent of health units were looted or forced to close down and the remainder were difficult to reach because of curfews.

147. A concentration on military needs also means that children injured in a conflict may not get effective treatment or rehabilitation. Effects on general health care can be just as severe. Health services suffer from a shortage of personnel as health workers move to other areas or leave the country. After the Khmer Rouge period, for example, Cambodia was left with only about 30 doctors. Restrictions on travel also hamper the distribution of drugs and other medical supplies, and health referral services, supervision and logistic support break down.

148. For children, one of the most dangerous implications of this breakdown is the disruption of rural vaccination programmes. During Bangladesh's struggle for independence in 1971-1972, childhood deaths increased 47 per cent. Smallpox, a disease that had virtually disappeared prior to the conflict, claimed 18,000 lives. By 1973, in Uganda, immunization coverage had reached an all-time high of 73 per cent. After the fighting started in that country, coverage declined steadily until, according to WHO sources, by 1990, fewer than 10 per cent of eligible children were being immunized with anti-tuberculosis vaccine (BCG), and fewer than 5 per cent against diphtheria, pertussis and tetanus (DPT), measles and poliomyelitis. The situation has improved dramatically, but the lessons are clear.

5. Protecting health services and health workers

149. In actions at both global and national level, the health sector should continue to promote children's rights to survival and development while doing all it can to prevent and alleviate their suffering. In the midst of armed conflict, WHO urges that health facilities be respected as safe environments for the care of patients and as safe workplaces for health workers. The delivery of medical assistance should not be prevented or obstructed. Moreover, the health care system and the community should work together, using health care wherever possible as an opportunity to gain access to children for other positive purposes.

150. During times of war, health services should emphasize the need for continuity of care and long-term follow-up. Emergency health relief must be linked with long-term development support and planning that not only permit survival, but also bring about long-lasting positive changes in children's lives. Paediatric and gynaecological care must become a regular component of all relief programmes. In the post-conflict phase, health systems must be sustainable, and programmes must be designed with as much involvement as possible from the affected communities. One obstacle to the full enjoyment of health services is that they are often dominated by men, whether expatriate or from the host country. For cultural or religious reasons, many women and girls underutilize the services despite risks to their health. Governments, United Nations bodies and specialized agencies such as WHO, UNHCR and UNICEF should increase the numbers of female health and protection professionals available in emergency situations.

151. Armed conflict is a major public health hazard that cannot be ignored. Any disease that had caused as much large-scale damage to children would long ago have attracted the urgent attention of public health specialists. When armed conflict kills and maims more children than soldiers, the health sector has a special obligation to speak out. Health professionals must be advocates of the rights of the child.

6. Disruption of food supplies

152. One of the most immediate effects of armed conflict is to disrupt food supplies. Food production is affected in many ways. Farmers, who are often women and older children, become fearful of working on plots of land too far from their homes. They reduce the area under cultivation, and their water sources, systems of irrigation and flood control may also be destroyed. Restrictions on movement limit access to such necessities as seeds and fertilizers and stop farmers from taking their produce to market. Damage to food systems is incidental to conflicts in some cases. In others it is deliberate, as in the early 1980s in Ethiopia, when the Government's scorched earth policies destroyed hundreds of thousands of acres of food-producing land in Tigray. 35/ Both the quantity and quality of available food is affected by damage done to food systems, and even when the conflict subsides, it is difficult to recover quickly. In many countries, mined fields prevent their use as agricultural land. In the Juba valley in Somalia, where people have been returning to their villages since 1993, the continuing lack of security means that the main harvest in 1995 was as much as 50 per cent lower than before the conflict. 36/

153. Warfare also takes its toll on livestock. In the Kongor area of Sudan, for example, a massacre of both people and cattle reduced livestock from around

1.5 million down to 50,000. 37/ This situation creates particular problems for young children who rely on milk as part of their basic diet. Loss of livestock also undermines family security in general, since cattle are frequently used as a form of savings.

154. Most households in developing countries, including many farm households, rely on market purchases to meet their food needs. Economic disruption heightens unemployment, reducing people's ability to buy food. People in cities are sometimes tempted to resort to looting to feed their families, thus escalating the violence. The continuation of conflict also hinders the distribution of relief. In contravention of humanitarian law, warring parties frequently block relief supplies or divert them for their own use. In addition, feeding centres for children and vulnerable groups are frequently bombed or attacked.

7. Malnutrition

155. For the youngest children especially, many health problems during armed conflicts are linked to malnutrition. Before the war in former Yugoslavia, per capita food supplies were relatively abundant, representing 140 per cent of daily requirements compared with 98 per cent in Liberia and 81 per cent in Somalia. The situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina subsequently deteriorated, but still did not reach levels as shockingly low as in Somalia during 1993 or Liberia in 1995. At those times, more than 50 per cent of the children in some regions were suffering from moderate or severe malnutrition. 38/

156. Malnutrition can affect all children, but it causes the greatest mortality and morbidity among young children, especially those under the age of three. In emergencies, very young children may be at high risk of "wasting" or acute malnutrition, a condition indicated by low weight for height. During the 1983 famine in southern Sudan, FAO reported that the prevalence of wasting reached the unprecedented level of 65 per cent. Recent refugee crises have shown how rapidly morbidity and mortality can progress. Malnutrition weakens children's ability to resist attacks of common childhood diseases, and the course and outcome of these diseases are more severe and more often fatal in malnourished children. Malnutrition also has a negative impact on children's cognitive development. In addition to these nutritional hazards, the circumstances of armed conflict greatly increase exposure to environmental hazards. Poor waste disposal and inadequate or contaminated water supplies aggravate the vicious circle of malnutrition and infection.

157. Adequate nourishment also depends on the way food is distributed, the way children are fed, their hygiene and the time parents have available to care for children. Armed conflict puts heavy constraints on the care system, forcing mothers and other members of the family to spend more time outside the home searching for water, food or work. Above all, when the whole family has to take flight, it has little chance to give children the close attention they need.

158. Breastfeeding provides ideal nutrition for infants, reduces the incidence and severity of infectious diseases and contributes to women's health. Infants should be breastfed exclusively for about six months and should continue to be breastfed with adequate complementary food for two years or beyond. During conflicts, mothers may experience hunger, exhaustion and trauma that can make them less able to care for their children. Breastfeeding may be endangered by the mother's loss of confidence in her ability to produce milk. Unless they are severely malnourished, mothers can breastfeed adequately despite severe stress. In addition, the general disruption can separate mothers from their children for long periods. As the conflicts proceed, social structures and networks break down. Knowledge about breastfeeding is passed from one generation to the next and this can be lost when people flee and families are broken up. Artificial feeding, risky at all times, is even more dangerous in unsettled circumstances.

159. In times of armed conflict, it is important to support women's capacity to breastfeed by providing adequate dietary intake for lactating women and ensuring that they are not separated from their children. Unfortunately, during emergencies, donors often respond with large quantities of breast milk substitutes for which there has been little medical or social justification. In July 1996, in response to the increasing prevalence of HIV infection globally and to additional information on the risk of HIV transmission through breastfeeding, the Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS circulated an interim statement on HIV and infant feeding. That statement emphasized the importance of breastfeeding, while highlighting the urgency of developing policies on HIV infection and infant feeding. It provided policy makers with a number of key elements for the formulation of such policies, laying particular stress on empowering women to make informed decisions about infant feeding. 39/

160. Children's health and growth are also affected by the lack of fresh fruits and vegetables, which are good sources of vitamins and minerals. Quality of diet is particularly important for small children, who can only eat small quantities of food at one time. Thus, it is essential to ensure that their food has a high concentration of energy and nutrients or is given frequently. When, during a conflict, the nutritional quality of food deteriorates, the family may not have the necessary means or knowledge to make changes that will assure children an adequate diet.

161. Even when the conflict is over, it may take a long time to return to normal feeding. FAO reports that, in Mozambique, for example, some young couples returning to the country from refugee camps did not know how to prepare any foods other than the maize, beans and oil that had been distributed to them as rations. They were not familiar with traditional foods or feeding practices and did not know which local foods to use during weaning. And where parents or grandparents had been lost, there was no one available to teach them.

8. Protecting food security

162. One of the most common responses to emergencies of all kinds, including armed conflicts, is food relief. It is important to move away from the view that food relief is a solution in itself, and towards the more constructive approach that includes food relief as part of a wider strategy aimed at improving household food security and the general health status of the population. This is particularly crucial in many long-running conflicts, where people need to build up their own capacities to support themselves. In southern Sudan, the short-term distribution of food is now being linked with support for agriculture, livestock and fisheries programmes.

163. In many cases, recourse to outside food assistance is unavoidable. In these circumstances the goal should be to meet the food needs of all persons, including young children, by ensuring access to a nutritionally adequate general ration. When this is not feasible, it may be necessary to establish supplementary feeding programmes for vulnerable groups, but these should be regarded as short-term measures to compensate for inadequate general rations. Dry rations that can be used by families in their own homes are preferable to feeding centres, as WHO surveys suggest that less than 50 per cent of malnourished children actually attend the centres. They may be too far away, and mothers may be reluctant to spend a disproportionate amount of time with a malnourished child over other members of the family. During a field visit to Rwanda, the expert was made aware of how many children from the poorest families did not attend feeding centres. UNICEF staff reported that these families often expressed feelings of shame or spoke of discouragement from better-off neighbours. Moreover, many such programmes have been poorly managed. Overcrowded feeding centres lacking basic sanitation and hygiene, with inadequate water supplies and poorly mixed food, do little for malnourished children and actually lead to the spread of disease.

164. In too many situations, children are considered separately from the family, and feeding programmes for children are established without considering other options that would improve their nutritional status. These options include improving household food security and reducing women's workloads by offering better access to water and fuel. This would clear more time in a woman's day for caring for her children. The Statements of the First and Third Regional Consultations on Africa and the field trips for this study underlined the importance of family unity and of capacity-building for family and community self-reliance.

9. Specific recommendations on health and nutrition

165. The expert submits the following recommendations on health and nutrition:

(a) All parties to a conflict must ensure the maintenance of basic health systems and services and water supplies. Where new programmes must be introduced, they should be based on community participation and take into account the need for long-term sustainability. Special attention should be paid to primary health care and the care of children with chronic or acute conditions. Adequate rehabilitative care, such as provision of artificial limbs for injured and permanently disabled children, should be ensured to facilitate the fullest possible social integration;

(b) Child-focused basic health needs assessments involving local professionals, young people and communities should be speedily carried out by organizations working in conflict situations. They should take into account food, health and care factors and the coping strategies likely to be used by the affected population;

(c) During conflicts, Governments should support the health and well-being of their population by facilitating "days of tranquillity" or "corridors of peace" to ensure continuity of basic child health measures and delivery of humanitarian relief. United Nations bodies, international NGOs and civil society groups (particularly religious groups) should approach and persuade non-state armed entities to cocperate in such efforts;

(d) WFP, in collaboration with WHO, UNHCR and other United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other international organizations, should take a lead role in consolidating current attempts to ensure that emergency food and other relief distribution is structured so as to strengthen family unity, integrity and coping mechanisms. It should be an integral part of a broader strategy for improving the nutrition and health status and physical and mental development of children and the food and health securities of their families;

(e) Parties in conflict should refrain from destruction of food crops, water sources and agriculture infrastructures in order to cause minimum disruption of food supply and production capacities. Emergency relief should give more attention to the rehabilitation of agriculture, livestock, fisheries and employment or income generating programmes in order to enhance local capacities to improve household food security on a self-reliant and sustainable basis;

(f) The expert urges WHO, in collaboration with professional, humanitarian and human rights organizations such as the International Paediatric Association, Medecins Sans Frontières and Physicians for Human Rights, to encourage doctors, paediatricians and all other health workers to disseminate child rights information and report rights violations encountered in the course of their work.

G. Promoting psychological recovery and social reintegration

166. Armed conflict affects all aspects of child development - physical, mental and emotional - and to be effective, assistance must take each into account. Historically, those concerned with the situation of children during armed conflict have focused primarily on their physical vulnerability. The loss, grief and fear a child has experienced must also be considered. This concern is reflected in article 39 of the Convention of the Rights of the Child, which requires States Parties to take all appropriate measures to promote children's physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration. This is best achieved by ensuring, from the outset of all assistance programmes that the psychosocial concerns intrinsic to child growth and development are addressed.

167. In a survey of 3,030 children conducted by UNICEF in Rwanda in 1995, nearly 80 per cent of the children had lost immediate family members, and more than one third of these had actually witnessed their murders. These atrocities indicate the extremes to which children have been exposed during conflicts. But apart from direct violence, children are also deeply affected by other distressing experiences. Armed conflict destroys homes, splinters communities and breaks down trust among people, undermining the very foundations of children's lives.

The impact of being let down and betrayed by adults is measureless in that it shatters the child's world view.

1. Psychosocial impact of violence on children

168. The ways in which children respond to the stress of armed conflict will depend on their own particular circumstances. These include individual factors such as age, sex, personality type, personal and family history and cultural background. Other factors will be linked to the nature of the traumatic events, including their frequency and the length of the exposure. Children who suffer from stress display a wide range of symptoms, including increased separation anxiety and developmental delays, sleep disturbances and nightmares, lack of appetite, withdrawn behaviour, lack of interest in play, and, in younger children, learning difficulties. In older children and adolescents, responses to stress can include anxious or aggressive behaviour and depression.

169. Relatively little is known about the psychosocial long-term effects of recent lengthy civil wars. The loss of parents and other close family members leaves a life-long impression and can dramatically alter life pathways. During the events marking the fiftieth anniversary of the Second World War, many people recalled the pain and sorrow they suffered as children at the loss of loved ones and described how such losses continue to affect them.

170. All cultures recognize adolescence as a highly significant period in which young people learn future roles and incorporate the values and norms of their societies. The extreme and often prolonged circumstances of armed conflict interfere with identity development. As a result, many adolescents - especially those who have had severely distressing experiences - cannot conceive of any future for themselves. They may view their lives very pessimistically, suffer from serious depression or, in the worst of circumstances, commit suicide. They may not wish to seek help or support from adults. Moreover, sudden changes in family circumstances, such as the death or disappearance of parents, can leave youth without guidance, role models and sustenance. During conflicts, some adolescents become responsible for the care of younger siblings. Youth are also often under pressure to actively join in the conflict, or are threatened with forced recruitment. Despite all of this, adolescents, during or after wars, seldom receive any special attention or assistance. This is a matter of urgent concern.

171. In addition to the suffering they undergo as a result of their own difficult experiences, children of all ages also take cues from their adult care-givers. Seeing their parents or other important adults in their lives as vulnerable can severely undermine children's confidence and add to their sense of fear. When armed conflict causes a change in the behaviour of adults, such as extreme protectiveness or authoritarianism, children find it very difficult to understand.

2. Best practices for recovery programmes

172. All programmes for children should take into account the rights of children and their developmental needs. They should also incorporate best practices that emphasize knowledge and respect for local culture and traditions and ensure ongoing consultation and participation with local authorities and communities. Programmes must have a long-term perspective and be flexible enough to adapt to the changing circumstances of armed conflict. They must also be sustainable and continue well after the conflict.

173. Experience has shown that with supportive care-givers and secure communities, most children will achieve a sense of healing and some will prove remarkably resilient. A large group of unaccompanied boys from southern Sudan, for example, arrived in Ethiopia after a long and harrowing journey on foot. These were boys who had been trained from an early age to survive in harsh conditions, away from home, in nomadic cattle camps. When they reached the relative safety of refugee camps, they were able to recuperate quickly.

174. The ways in which individuals and communities cope with, react to and understand stressful events can differ markedly from one culture to another. Although many symptoms of distress have universal characteristics, the ways in which people express, embody and give meaning to their distress are largely dependent on social, cultural, political and economic contexts. Likewise, the manner in which different cultures deal with manifestations of emotional distress is based on different belief systems. In some eastern spiritual traditions, for example, the body and mind are perceived as a continuum of the natural world. Indeed, in many ethno-medical systems, the body and the mind are always dependent on the actions of others, including spirits and ancestors. In Angola, for example, and in many areas of Africa, the main sources of trauma are considered to be spiritual. If a child's mother dies in armed conflict and the child flees without having conducted the proper burial ritual, the child will live with the strong fear that the mother's spirit will cause harm. Western diagnostic approaches can be ill-suited to a context in which people are more likely to turn for assistance to family, friends and traditional healers than to seek medical help for their problems.

175. Psychotherapeutic approaches based on western mental health traditions tend to emphasize individual emotional expression. This method may not be feasible in all contexts. While many forms of external intervention can help promote psychosocial recovery, experience with war trauma programmes has shown that even those designed with the best intentions can do harm. Some organizations, for example, put a great deal of emphasis on trauma therapy in residential treatment centres. Exploring a child's previous experience with violence and the meaning that it holds in her or his life is important to the process of healing and recovery. However, such an exploration should take place in a stable, supportive environment, by care-givers who have solid and continuing relationships with the child. In-depth clinical interviews intended to awaken the memories and feelings associated with a child's worst moments risk leaving the child in more severe pain and agitation than before, especially if the interviews are conducted without ongoing support for follow-up.

176. Another difficulty is faced when journalists or researchers encourage children to relate horror stories. Such interviews can open up old wounds and tear down a child's defences. Children who are photographed and identified by name can be exposed to additional problems and harassment. Journalists and researchers must carry out their important work with awareness of the ethical issues at stake. For example, there should be an understanding in advance of the kind of information that is confidential and should not be used.

177. Best practice emphasizes that the most effective and sustainable approach is to mobilize the existing social care system. This may, for example, involve mobilizing a refugee community to support suitable foster families for unaccompanied children. Through training, and raising the awareness of central care-givers including parents, teachers and community and health workers, a diversity of programmes can enhance the community's ability to provide care for its children and vulnerable groups. Building expensive facilities and removing children to them is not a sustainable approach. Institutionalizing children and identifying them as traumatized can impose an inadvertent stigma and contribute to isolation and withdrawal. Nor should groups of children who have had especially traumatic experiences, such as former child soldiers or unaccompanied children, be segregated from the community, since this will contribute to further risk, distress and marginalization. At regional consultations in Africa and Europe, as well as during several field trips, the importance of urging Governments, donors and programme practitioners to minimize and actively avoid institutional approaches was emphasized.

178. Those who wish to help with healing should have a deep understanding of and respect for the societies in which they are working. Aside from knowing the basic principles of child development and the way it is understood locally, they should also understand local culture and practices, including the rites and ceremonies related to growing up and becoming an adult as well as those associated with death, burial and mourning. People involved in healing should be aware, for example, of what children are told about the death of their parents, how they are expected to behave when they experience distressing events and what actions might be taken to give "cleansing" to a girl who has been raped or to a child who has killed someone.

179. Integrating modern knowledge of child development and child rights with traditional concepts and practices may take time, but it will result in more effective and sustainable ways to meet children's needs. In research contributed to the present study, the International Save the Children Alliance identified a number of principles and activities that promote healing by fostering a sense of purpose, self-esteem and identity. These include establishing a sense of normalcy through daily routines such as going to school, preparing food, washing clothes and working in the fields. Children also need the intellectual and emotional stimulation that is provided by structured group activities such as play, sports, drawing and storytelling. The most important factor contributing to a child's resilience is the opportunity for expression, attachment and trust that comes from a stable, caring and nurturing relationship with adults.

180. Children who have been continually exposed to violence almost always experience a significant change in their beliefs and attitudes, including a fundamental loss of trust in others. This is especially true of children who have been attacked or abused by people previously considered neighbours or friends, as happened in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia. At a seminar convened on behalf of the study, a Bosnian boy told of this devastation: "We spent our childhood together. I saw him and hoped that he would save my life. He was ready to kill me". Rebuilding the ability to trust is a universal challenge in the wake of conflicts, but it is particularly important for those who are a part of children's daily lives. Establishing good relationships with children involves playing with, listening to and supporting them, as well as keeping promises.

181. Families and communities can better promote the psychosocial well-being of their children when they themselves feel relatively secure and confident about the future. Recognizing that families and communities are often fragmented and weakened by armed conflict, programmes should focus on supporting survivors in their efforts to heal and rebuild their social networks. It is therefore vital that all forms of external help be given in such a way as to enhance people's ability to help themselves. This should include, for example, assisting parents and teachers to communicate with children on difficult issues. Reconstructing a social web and a sense of community helps people act together to improve their lives. It is particularly important that aid programmes include women at an early stage in making decisions about designing, delivering and evaluating initiatives. The process of evaluation can draw upon its relevance for the community, the improved capacities of parents and care-givers to support child development, and the enhanced abilities of children to form relationships and to function well in school and other activities.

182. In order to ensure that their needs are met, young people should themselves be involved in community-based relief, recovery and reconstruction programmes. This can be achieved through vocational and skills training that not only helps to augment their income, but also increases their sense of identity and self-worth in ways that enhance healing. One way in which programmes have succeeded in giving adolescents a sense of meaning and purpose is to involve them in developing and implementing programmes for younger children.

3. Specific recommendations to promote psychosocial well-being

183. The expert submits the following recommendations to promote psychosocial well-being:

(a) All phases of emergency and reconstruction assistance programmes should take psychosocial considerations into account, while avoiding the development of separate mental health programmes. They should also give priority to preventing further traumatic experience;

(b) Rather than focusing on a child's emotional wounds, programmes should aim to support healing processes and to re-establish a sense of normalcy. This should include establishing daily routines of family and community life, opportunity for expression and structured activities such as school, play and sports;

(c) Programmes to support psychosocial well-being should include local culture, perceptions of child development, an understanding of political and social realities and children's rights. They should mobilize the community care network around children;

(d) Governments, donors and relief organizations should prevent the institutionalization of children. When groups of children considered vulnerable, such as child soldiers, are singled out for special attention, it should be done with full cooperation of the community so as to ensure their long-term reintegration.

H. Education

184. Article 28 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child underlines the right to education, and article 29 states that education should develop the child's personality, talents and mental and physical abilities to their fullest potential. Education also serves much broader functions. It gives shape and structure to children's lives and can instil community values, promote justice and respect for human rights and enhance peace, stability and interdependence.

185. Education is particularly important at times of armed conflict. While all around may be in chaos, schooling can represent a state of normalcy. School children have the chance to be with friends and enjoy their support and encouragement. They benefit from regular contacts with teachers who can monitor their physical and psychological health. Teachers can also help children to develop new skills and knowledge necessary for survival and coping, including mine awareness, negotiation and problem solving and information about HIV/AIDS and other health issues. Formal education also benefits the community as a whole. The ability to carry on schooling in the most difficult circumstances demonstrates confidence in the future: communities that still have a school feel they have something durable and worthy of protection.

1. Risks to education during conflict

186. Schools are targeted during war, in part because they have such high profiles. In rural areas, the school building may be the only substantial permanent structure, making it highly susceptible to shelling, closure or looting. In Mozambique, for example, a study prepared for the present report estimated that 45 per cent of primary school networks were destroyed. Often, local teachers are also prime targets because they are important community members and tend to be more than usually politicized. According to the above-mentioned study, during the crisis in Rwanda, more than two-thirds of teachers either fled or were killed. The destruction of educational infrastructures represents one of the greatest developmental setbacks for countries affected by conflict. Years of lost schooling and vocational skills will take equivalent years to replace and their absence imposes a greater vulnerability on the ability of societies to recover after war.

187. Formal education is also generally at risk during war because it relies on consistent funding and administrative support that is difficult to sustain during political turmoil. During the fighting in Somalia and under the Khmer Rouge regime in Cambodia, public expenditure on education was reduced to nearly nothing.

188. It is less difficult to maintain educational services during low-intensity conflicts, as in Sri Lanka and Peru, and schooling is likely to continue during periodic lulls in countries where fighting is intermittent or seasonal. Even where services are maintained, however, education will be of lower quality. Funds will be short and the supply of materials slow or erratic. In addition, fear and disruption make it difficult to create an atmosphere conducive to learning and the morale of both teachers and pupils is likely to be low. Studies in Palestinian schools reported that teachers and students had difficulty concentrating, particularly if they had witnessed or experienced violence or had family members in prison or in hiding. Teachers are also exposed to political pressure: in Kurdish areas in Turkey, for example, teachers have been threatened by non-state forces for continuing to teach the Turkish curriculum. In some countries, teachers have been forced to inform on students and their families. Teachers who go for long periods without salaries are more susceptible to corruption.

2. Challenges and opportunities

189. Though still inadequate, relief programmes direct most attention in times of armed conflict to the education of refugee children. This is partly because, when children are massed together in camps, there are economies of scale and it is easier to approximate a classroom situation. In some countries, this reality simply reflects the dominance of inflexible formal education systems that persist despite growing doubts about their quality, relevance and content. Insufficient attention to the education needs of non-refugees during armed conflict is also attributable to the fact that some of the donors most active during conflicts are constrained by their mandates to work exclusively with refugees. Other donors have been reluctant to use emergency funds for what they have chosen to interpret as long-term development activities.

190. The education needs of children remaining within conflict zones must be met. The expert calls, therefore, for educational activity to be established as a priority component of all humanitarian assistance. Educational administrators who wish to ensure continuity must, when possible, collaborate closely with local political and military authorities and be assured of considerable support from a wide range of community groups and NGOs. Indeed, where public sector agencies are absent or severely weakened, such groups may provide the only viable institutional frameworks.

191. Since schools are likely to be targets, one element of the planning process should be to establish alternative sites for classrooms, changing the venues regularly. In Eritrea in the late 1980s, classes were often held under trees, in caves or in camouflaged huts built from sticks and foliage. Similar arrangements were made during the height of the fighting in many places in the former Yugoslavia, where classes were held in the cellars of people's homes, often by candlelight. During the field trip to Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, many people stressed to the expert the importance of maintaining education, no matter how difficult the circumstances.

192. Education can also incorporate flexible systems of distance learning after the conflict has ended, which can be cost-effective when school facilities have been destroyed and teachers have been lost. These involve home or group study using pre-packaged teaching materials complemented by broadcast and recorded media. Such systems are particularly valuable for girls when parents are reluctant to have them travel far from home. The statement of the Second Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in the Arab Region emphasized the importance of such programmes and called upon Governments, educators, NGOs and concerned international bodies to ensure that formal, non-formal and informal education interventions are delivered through a variety of community channels.

193. When children have been forced to leave their homes and are crowded into displaced persons camps, establishing schooling systems as soon as possible reassures everyone by signalling a degree of stability and a return to normal roles and relationships within the family and the community. Such education requires only the most basic materials. One important innovation in recent years has been the development by UNESCO and UNICEF of a teacher's emergency pack (TEP), otherwise known as "school-in-a-box". The pack contains very basic items including a brush and paint for a blackboard, chalk, paper, exercise books, pens and pencils. It was first used in Somalia in 1992 and further refined in the refugee camps in Djibouti. The packs were widely used for the rapid establishment of schools for Rwandan refugees at Ngara in Tanzania, where children attended primary grades in tents on a shift basis. Agreements with a number of international NGOs have led to several programmes in which the distribution of TEPs has been linked with teacher training and other initiatives. The TEP is intended to cover the first few months of emergency schooling. Longer-term initiatives require the development of materials tailored to specific groups of children.

194. Notwithstanding the success of initiatives like TEP, the expert was particularly concerned to discover the lack of meaningful educational activity for adolescents, particularly at secondary school level. In situations of armed conflict, education can prove particularly effective in assisting the psychosocial well-being of adolescents and keeping them out of military service.

195. Many modern educators prefer non-competitive learner-centred approaches that help foster self-confidence in children and develop a wide range of skills. The expert agrees, but cautions that such methods are still unfamiliar in many countries and must be introduced carefully in programmes so as not to disempower local teachers or confuse pupils. Special care should also be taken to adapt the methods and content of education to the social context. At the Second Regional Consultation in the Arab Region, it was suggested that local relevance could be facilitated by allowing parents, communities and children to play more active roles in the design, content and implementation of curricula and in flexible education methodologies. Youth volunteers and local community leaders should be involved in baseline assessments, which are a necessary first step in identifying the educational strengths and weaknesses that are available for those planning educational services in communities affected by conflict. During her field visit to Sierra Leone, the expert was encouraged by the enthusiasm shown for innovative educational alternatives, particularly for the training and deployment of mothers, adolescents and other non-traditional teachers in emergency programmes.

196. Apart from emergency education programmes in camps, refugee children can sometimes attend regular schools in host countries, though very few get the opportunity to do so. Host States can be reluctant to allow refugee education, fearing that this will encourage refugees to remain permanently on their territory. The denial of education clearly contravenes both article 22 of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and article 28 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which require that States Parties provide refugee children with the same treatment as is accorded to nationals with respect to elementary education. The expert noted with grave concern that some host Governments refuse to provide, or to allow international agencies to provide, educational activity for refugee children. Despite active intervention and strong protests, UNHCR has sometimes proven unable to persuade Governments that such action is destructive to children. The expert calls upon the international community to support the efforts of United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other organizations to meet more effectively the international standards for the care, protection and welfare of children. Further, host Governments, international agencies and other educational providers are urged to work more closely with the World Bank, UNICEF, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and UNESCO to ensure that education services are part of both relief and immediate reconstruction activities. Upon their return home, children should be provided with access to continued schooling of a consistent level and quality.

197. When international agencies and partners operate programmes for refugees in remote locations, there is a danger that the education standards will be higher for the refugees than for the local population. Clearly, local children should also be educated to at least a similar standard. This requires greater collaboration among international agencies, NGOs and host Governments.

198. When refugee children attend local schools, they may need special programmes to help them fill knowledge gaps and learn the language. Even when language is not a barrier, children may still suffer harassment, discrimination or bullying unless school staff take preventive measures.

199. Even when educational opportunities exist, parents may be reluctant to send their children to school during armed conflicts. Some need their children to work to contribute to the family economy; others are worried about what their children will learn. During the conflict between the Muslim and Croat factions in Bosnia and Herzegovina, for example, refugee parents were worried about the content of education, particularly in subjects like history, geography and literature. Some parents have religious objections to girls and boys attending school together after a certain age. The recent decision of the Taliban in Afghanistan to curtail girls' access to education in the areas under their control has been of particular concern for United Nations specialized agencies and NGOs. The expert commends the difficult decisions taken by NGOs and agencies such as UNICEF to stop working in the affected areas until there is the possibility of equality of opportunity between girls and boys, and of implementing the agreed principles of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the World Declaration on Education for All and Framework for Action to Meet Basic Learning Needs adopted at Jomtien, Thailand, in 1990.

200. The expert supports the call from the 1996 Inter-Agency Consultation on Education for Humanitarian Assistance and Refugees that post-conflict educational planning be initiated during emergencies with local, national and regional educational and resource actors, including the World Bank and others who are currently only involved in reconstruction efforts. Education has a vital role to play in rehabilitation, yet is rarely considered a priority in relief programmes. Educational initiatives developed for conflict situations should therefore be designed to allow for easy integration in the post-conflict period.

201. Many Governments and specialized agencies have given easy priority to the physical reconstruction of schools, but rather less attention to teacher training and the development of new curricula and teaching methods. Even where the critical political will to invest in education has been present, education systems often suffer from a persistent shortage of funds.

202. Countries that host refugees often lack resources; most host Governments in Africa have yet to achieve universal primary education for their own populations. Investment in education requires political commitment from Governments. The declaration of the 1990 World Conference on Education for All noted that many developing countries spent more on average on the military than on education and health combined. If countries continue to employ four times as many soldiers as teachers, education and social systems will remain fragile and inadequate and Governments will continue to fail children and break the promises made to them through ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. At the World Conference on Education for All, UNESCO, UNICEF, UNDP and the World Bank, called on Governments to adapt their spending priorities so as to achieve basic education for 80 per cent of the world's children by the year 2000, and equality of educational opportunity for girls and boys. The expert fully supports this call and, further, wishes to encourage those bodies to reorder their own spending priorities, operational policies and partnerships to help ensure that the right to education is fulfilled for children caught up in situations of armed conflict.

3. Specific recommendations on education

203. The expert submits the following recommendations on education:

(a) All possible efforts should be made to maintain education systems during conflicts. The international community must insist that Government or non-state entities involved in conflicts do not target educational facilities, and indeed promote active protection of such services;

(b) Preparations should also be made for sustaining education outside of formal school buildings, using other community facilities and strengthening alternative education through a variety of community channels;

(c) Donors should extend the boundaries of emergency funding to include support for education. The establishment of educational activity, including the provision of teaching aids and basic educational materials, should be accepted as a priority component of humanitarian assistance;

(d) As soon as camps are established for refugees or internally displaced persons, children should be brought together for educational activities. Incentives for attendance should also be encouraged through, for example, measures to promote safety and security. Special emphasis should be placed on providing appropriate educational activities for adolescents. Besides promoting access to secondary education, the expert urges Governments, international agencies and NGOs to develop age-appropriate educational programmes for out of school youth, in order to address their special needs and reflect their rights to participation;

(e) Support for the re-establishment and continuity of education must be a priority strategy for donors and NGOs in conflict and post-conflict situations. Training should equip teachers to deal with new requirements. These will include recognizing signs of stress in children as well as imparting vital survival information on issues such as landmines, health and promoting respect for human rights;

(f) The expert urges the Committee on the Rights of the Child to issue strong guidance to States Parties on the interpretation of articles of the Convention on the Rights of the Child relating to their responsibility to provide education to children.

III. RELEVANCE AND ADEQUACY OF EXISTING STANDARDS FOR THE PROTECTION OF CHILDREN

204. Through the Convention on the Rights of the Child, now ratified by nearly all countries, the world has recognized that the rights of children include the right to have their basic needs met. It is a basic need of children to be protected when conflicts threaten and such protection requires the fulfilment of their rights through the implementation of international human rights and humanitarian law.

205. States Parties to the Convention on the Rights of the Child are responsible for all children within their territory without discrimination. In accepting the role of the Committee on the Rights of the Child in monitoring the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, States Parties have also recognized that the protection of children is not just a national issue, but a legitimate concern of the international community. This is especially important since many of the most serious violations of children's rights are taking place in situations of conflict, such as Liberia and Somalia, where there is currently no functioning national Government. National and international strategies to protect children must empower and build the capacities of women, families and communities to address the root causes of conflict and strengthen local development.

206. Increased efforts are needed to ensure that relief and protection measures specifically include child-centred actions. During the expert's field visits and regional consultations, she found that many relief organizations offer assistance without taking into account the broader needs of children or ensuring effective cooperation. Moreover, in many cases only cursory attention was given to developing appropriate emergency responses that take age and gender into consideration.

207. One of the greatest challenges in providing protection is to ensure safe access. Formerly, hospitals and refugee camps were considered miniature safe havens, but this is no longer the case. Humanitarian activities from relief convoys to health clinics have all become targets, imperiling families, children and those who try to assist them - particularly locally recruited staff. Many governmental and non-governmental agencies have been least able to assist internally displaced children and their families and to help those who are living in besieged communities.

208. In some conflicts, temporary cessations of hostilities have been negotiated to permit the delivery of humanitarian relief in the form of "corridors of peace" and "days of tranquillity". In El Salvador, Lebanon and Afghanistan, for example, these agreements were supported by all warring parties to permit the vaccination of children. In the case of Operation Lifeline Sudan, such arrangements were made to deliver relief supplies and vaccines during relative lulls in the conflict. The precedents set by these child-centred agreements are useful models to relate practical protection measures to the implementation of humanitarian and human rights law.

209. Thus it is that we seek to have protection framed by the standards and norms embodied in international law, national legislation and local custom and practice. Politicians and soldiers have long recognized that they can achieve many of their objectives if they fight within agreed standards of conduct. Considerations and concerns in the area of protection have led to the development of two main bodies of law, humanitarian law and human rights law, that form the legal bases that afford children protection in situations of armed conflict.

210. Many aspects of both bodies of law are relevant to the protection of children in armed conflict. The Convention on the Rights of the Child is of special note, as it is one of the most important bridges linking two bodies of law whose complementarity is increasingly recognized. Building on this complementarity, the international community must achieve the fullest possible protection of children's rights. Any purported mitigating circumstances through which Governments or their opponents seek to justify infringements of children's rights in times of armed conflict must be seen by the international community for what they are: reprehensible and intolerable. The next section of this report highlights features of the standards of humanitarian and human rights law and assesses their adequacy for meeting present needs.

A. Humanitarian law

211. The international humanitarian law of armed conflict, usually referred to simply as international humanitarian law 40/ limits the choice of means and methods of conducting military operations and obliges belligerents to spare persons who do not, or who no longer, participate in hostilities. These standards are reflected in the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and the two 1977 Protocols Additional to these Conventions.

212. The Fourth Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War is one of the main sources of protection for civilian persons, and thus for children. It prohibits not only murder, torture or mutilation of a protected person, but also any other measures of brutality whether applied by civilian or military agents. The Fourth Geneva Convention has been ratified, almost universally, by 186 States.

213. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 have been considered to apply primarily only to conflicts between States. However, the Conventions also include common article 3 which applies also to internal conflicts. This article enumerates fundamental rights of all persons not taking an active part in the hostilities, namely, the right to life, dignity and freedom. It also protects them from torture and humiliating treatment, unjust imprisonment or being taken hostage.

214. In 1977, the Geneva Conventions were supplemented by two additional Protocols that bring together the two main branches of international humanitarian law - the branch concerned with protection of vulnerable groups and the branch regulating the conduct of hostilities.

215. Protocol I requires that the fighting parties distinguish at all times between combatants and civilians and that the only legal targets of attack should be military in nature. Protocol I covers all civilians, but two articles also offer specific protection to children. Article 77 stipulates that children shall be the object of special respect and shall be protected against any form of indecent assault and that the Parties to the conflict shall provide them with the care and aid they require, whether because of their age or for any other reason. Article 78 deals with the evacuation of children to another country, saying that this should not take place except for compelling reasons, and establishing some of the terms under which any evacuation should take place.

216. Non-international armed conflicts, that is to say, conflicts within States, are covered by Protocol II. Protocol II supplements common article 3 and provides that children be provided with the care and aid they require, including education and family reunion. However, Protocol II applies only to a restricted category of internal conflicts: they must involve conflicts between the armed forces of a High Contracting Party and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups. According to this criterion, it can be argued that Protocol II would not apply to the majority of current civil wars. The reason is obvious: few Governments (High Contracting Parties) are likely to concede that any struggle within their borders amounts to an armed conflict. Protocol II does not apply to an internal disturbance or tension, a riot or isolated acts of violence. Naturally, for children who are victims of such struggles, it makes little difference that the violence to which they are subject does not rise above this minimum threshold.

217. While the Fourth Geneva Convention has been almost universally ratified, the Protocols have been ratified by far fewer States. To date, 144 States have ratified Protocol I, and those absent include a number of significant military powers; of Gulf War combatants, for example, the United States of America, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, France and Iraq have yet to ratify Protocol I. The situation with Protocol II is even less satisfactory: only 136 have ratified.

218. In general, humanitarian law represents a compromise between humanitarian considerations and military necessity. This gives it the advantage of being pragmatic. It acknowledges military necessity yet it also obliges armed groups to minimize civilian suffering and, in a number of articles, requires them to protect children. However, these articles cannot be considered adequate to ensure the safety and survival of children trapped in internal conflicts.

B. Human rights law

219. Human rights law establishes rights that every individual should enjoy at all times, during both peace and war. The obligations, which are incumbent upon every State, are based primarily on the Charter of the United Nations and are reflected in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (General Assembly resolution 217 A (III)).

220. In formal legal terms, the primary responsibility for ensuring human rights rests with States, since they alone can become contracting parties to the relevant treaties. It follows that opposition groups, no matter how large or powerful, cannot be considered directly bound by human rights treaty provisions. It is significant, however, that the situation is precisely the opposite in relation to the application of international humanitarian law to non-state entities in internal conflicts. This relative inconsistency between the bodies of law is further ground for insisting that non-state entities should, for all practical purposes, be treated as though they are bound by relevant human rights standards. Nevertheless, just as the international community has insisted that all States have a legitimate concern that human rights be respected by others, so too it is clear that all groups in society, no matter what their relationship to the State concerned, must respect human rights. In relation to non-state entities, the channels for accountability must be established more clearly.

221. Although human rights law applies both in peacetime and in war, there are circumstances where the enjoyment of certain rights may be restricted. Many human rights treaties make allowance for States to derogate from their obligations by temporarily suspending the enjoyment of certain rights in time of war or other public emergency. However, human rights law singles out certain rights that can never be subject to derogation. These include the right to life; freedom from torture and other inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment; freedom from slavery; and the non-retroactivity of penal laws. In relation to rights from which derogation is permitted, strict conditions must be met: the emergency must threaten the life of the nation (and not merely the current Government's grip on power); the relevant international bodies must be notified; any measures taken must be proportionate to the need; there must be no discrimination; and the measure must be consistent with other applicable international obligations. International bodies such as the Commission on Human Rights, the Human Rights Committee and the Committee on the Rights of the Child carefully scrutinize the assertion by any Government that derogation is necessary and justified.

222. Human rights law has a number of specialized treaties which are of particular relevance to the protection of children in armed conflict. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (General Assembly resolution 2200 A (XXI)) covers many rights including the right to life and the right to freedom from slavery, torture and arbitrary arrest. The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (General Assembly resolution 2200 A (XXI)) recognizes the right to food, clothing, housing, health and education. The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (General Assembly resolution 34/180) is of particular note. In addition, there are treaties that deal with particular themes or groups of people, covering such issues as genocide, torture, refugees, and racial discrimination. In the context of this report, the most notable specialized treaty is the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

1. Convention relating to the Status of Refugees

223. As armed conflicts frequently produce large numbers of refugees, refugee law is of particular relevance. In its work, UNHCR relies principally on the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees adopted on 28 July 1951 and its Protocol of 1967. These instruments provide basic standards for the protection of refugees in countries of asylum; most important is the principle of non-refoulement. The 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol are complemented by regional refugee instruments - notably, the Organization of African Unity Convention Governing the Specific Aspects of Refugee Problems in Africa of 1969 and the Cartagena Declaration on Refugees of 1984. States have primary responsibility to ensure the protection of refugees within their boundaries. UNHCR is mandated to provide international protection for refugees and to find permanent solutions to refugee situations.

224. Many refugees fleeing armed conflict have reason to fear some form of persecution on ethnic, religious, social or political grounds at the hands of one or more of the parties to a conflict, but others are fleeing the indiscriminate effects of conflict and the accompanying disorder, including the destruction of homes and food stocks that have no specific elements of persecution. While the latter victims of conflict require international protection, including asylum on at least a temporary basis, they may not fit within the literal terms of the 1951 Convention. States Parties and UNHCR, recognizing that such persons are also deserving of international protection and humanitarian assistance, have adopted a variety of solutions to ensure that they receive both. This is most recently exemplified by the regime of "temporary protection" adopted by States in relation to the conflict in former Yugoslavia.

225. The standards of the Convention on the Rights of the Child are also of particular relevance to the refugee child. Through its guidelines on the protection and care of refugee children, UNHCR seeks to incorporate the standards and principles of the Convention into its protection and assistance framework.

2. Convention on the Rights of the Child

226. The most comprehensive and specific protection for children is provided by the Convention on the Rights of the Child, adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 44/25 in November 1989. The Convention establishes a legal framework that greatly extends the previous recognition of children as the direct holders of rights and acknowledges their distinct legal personality. The Convention on the Rights of the Child has, in a very short space of time, become the most widely ratified of all human rights treaties. Currently, only six States have not ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child: Cook Islands, Oman, Somalia, the United Arab Emirates, Switzerland and the United States of America.

227. The Convention recognizes a comprehensive list of rights that apply during both peacetime and war. As stressed by the Committee on the Rights on the Child (A/49/41) these include protection of the family environment; essential care and assistance; access to health, food and education; the prohibition of torture, abuse or neglect; the prohibition of the death penalty; the protection of the child's cultural environment; the right to a name and nationality; and the need for protection in situations of deprivation of liberty. States must also ensure access to, and the provision of, humanitarian assistance and relief to children during armed conflict.

228. In addition, the Convention on the Rights of the Child contains, in articles 38 and 39, provisions specifically related to armed conflict. The former article is of major significance because it brings together humanitarian law and human rights law, showing their complementarity. Its provisions require that States Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for rules of international humanitarian law applicable to children in armed conflicts, and paragraph 4 states that:

> "In accordance with their obligations under international humanitarian law to protect the civilian population in armed conflicts, States Parties shall take all feasible measures to ensure protection and care of children who are affected by an armed conflict."

229. If the Convention on the Rights of the Child were to be fully implemented during armed conflicts, this would go a long way towards protecting children. Children's right to special protection in these situations has long been recognized. The Convention on the Rights of the Child has no general derogation clause and, in light of this, the Committee on the Rights of the Child stresses that the most positive interpretation be adopted with a view to ensuring the widest possible respect for children's rights. In particular, the Committee has stressed that, in view of the essential nature of articles 2, 3 and 4, they do not admit any kind of derogation (A/49/41).

230. As with other human rights treaties, the Convention on the Rights of the Child can only be formally ratified by States. Nevertheless, it is well worth encouraging non-state entities to make a formal commitment to abide fully by the relevant standards. Many non-state entities aspire to form governments and to invoke an existing Government's lack of respect for human rights as a justification for their opposition. In order to establish their commitment to the protection of children, non-state entities should be urged to make a formal statement accepting and agreeing to implement the standards contained in the Convention on the Rights of the Child. There are encouraging precedents here. In 1995 in Sudan, for example, several combatant groups became the first non-state entities to commit to abide by the provisions of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Significantly, once the commitments were enacted, the non-state entities immediately put information, reporting and complaint systems in place.

231. While the Convention on the Rights of the Child offers comprehensive protection to children, it needs strengthening with respect to the participation of children in armed conflict. The Committee on the Rights of the Child has recognized the importance of raising the minimum age of recruitment to 18 years, and in 1994 the Commission on Human Rights established a working group to draft an optional protocol to the Convention to achieve this. The scope of the draft text has been significantly broadened to include articles on non-state entities, on rehabilitation and social reintegration of child victims of armed conflicts, and on a procedure of confidential enquiries by the Committee on the Rights of the Child. Despite the progress that has been made, there continues to be resistance on the issue of voluntary recruitment and on distinguishing between direct and indirect participation. The argument that the age of recruitment is merely a technical matter to be decided by individual Governments fails to take into account the fact that effective protection of children from the impact of armed conflict requires an unqualified legal and moral commitment which acknowledges that children have no part in armed conflict.

C. Implementation of standards and monitoring of violations

232. Standards will only be effective, however, if and when they are widely known, understood, and implemented by policy makers, military and security forces and professionals dealing with the care of children, including the staff of United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and humanitarian organizations. Standards should also be known and understood by children themselves, who must be taught about their rights and how to assert them. Everyone professionally concerned with the protection of children during armed conflict should familiarize themselves with both humanitarian and human rights law.

233. International peacekeepers in particular, must be trained in humanitarian and human rights law and, particularly, about the fundamental rights of children. The Swedish Armed Forces International Centre has developed a training programme for peacekeeping regiments which includes components on child rights as well as rules of engagement, international humanitarian law and ethics. Child rights components, developed in collaboration with Rädda Barnen, provide an orientation about the impact of armed conflict on children and situations that peacekeepers are likely to encounter that would require a humanitarian response.

234. Human rights and humanitarian standards reflect fundamental human values which exist in all societies. An aspect of implementation requiring greater attention is the translation of international instruments into local languages and their wide dissemination through the media and popular activities such as expositions and drama. In Rwanda, Save the Children Fund-US, Haguruka (a local NGO) and UNICEF supported the development of an official Kinyarwanda version of the Convention on the Rights of the Child. This has been adopted into Rwandan law and projects are being developed to implement its provisions widely.

235. An effective international system for the protection of children's rights must be based on the accountability of Governments and other actors. This in turn requires prompt, efficient and objective monitoring. The international community must attach particular importance to responding effectively to each and every occasion when those involved in armed conflicts trample upon children's rights.

236. Within the organs of the United Nations, the principal responsibility for monitoring humanitarian violations rests, in practice, upon the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission can receive information from any source and take an active role in gathering data. The latter role is accomplished through a system of rapporteurs and working groups, whose reports can be an effective means of publicizing violations and attempting to persuade States to change their policies. The reports of each of the rapporteurs and working groups should reflect the concerns of children in situations of armed conflict.

237. Another dimension of monitoring by international bodies relates to the supervision of treaty obligations. Each of the principal human rights treaties has its own monitoring body composed not of formal representatives of States, but of independent experts. The various committees and, in particular, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, should embark upon more concerted and systematic monitoring and reporting to protect children in situations of armed conflict. They should also assist States in translating their political commitment to children into action, consequently elevating the priority accorded to this concern.

238. The Geneva Conventions entrust to ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies the mandate to monitor respect for international humanitarian law. ICRC, IFRC and their National Societies report breaches of international humanitarian law and makes concrete recommendations on how to end breaches and prevent their recurrence. As has been noted, international humanitarian law also recognizes a role for other humanitarian organizations.

239. Where protection of children is concerned, much broader participation in the monitoring and reporting of abuses is required. Many of those working for relief agencies consider that reporting on infractions of either humanitarian or human rights law is outside their mandate or area of responsibility. Others are worried that they will be expelled from the country concerned or have their operations severely curtailed if they report sensitive information. But a balance must be struck. Without reports of such violations, the international community is deprived of vital information and is unable to undertake effective monitoring. Appropriate public or confidential channels should be established nationally through which to report on matters of grave concern relating to children. The High Commissioner for Human Rights, national institutions and national ombudspersons, international human rights organizations and professional associations should be actively utilized in this regard. The media should also do more to raise awareness of infringements of children's rights.

D. Specific recommendations on standards

240. The expert submits the following recommendations on standards:

(a) The few Governments which have not become Parties to the Convention on the Rights of the Child should do so immediately;

(b) All Governments should adopt national legislative measures to ensure the effective implementation of relevant standards, including the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and their Additional Protocols and the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its Protocol;

(c) Governments must train and educate the judiciary, police, security personnel and armed forces, especially those participating in peacekeeping operations, in humanitarian and human rights law. This should incorporate the advice and experience of ICRC and other humanitarian organizations and, in the process, undertake widespread dissemination;

(d) Humanitarian organizations should train their staff in human rights and humanitarian law. All international bodies working in conflict zones should establish procedures for prompt, confidential and objective reporting of violations that come to their attention;

(e) Humanitarian organizations should assist Governments in educating children about their rights through the development of curricula and other relevant methods;

(f) Humanitarian agencies and organizations should seek to reach signed agreements with non-state entities, committing them to abide by humanitarian and human rights laws;

(g) Civil society should actively disseminate humanitarian and human rights law and engage in advocacy, reporting and monitoring of infringements of children's rights;

(h) Building on existing guidelines, UNICEF should develop more comprehensive guidelines on the protection and care of children in conflict situations;

(i) Particularly in the light of articles 38 and 39 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Committee on the Rights of the Child should be encouraged to include, in its report to the General Assembly, specific information on the measures adopted by States Parties to protect children in situations of armed conflict.

IV. RECONSTRUCTION AND RECONCILIATION

A. Reconstruction

241. The task of rebuilding war-torn societies is a huge one that must take place not only at the physical, economic, cultural and political, but also at the psychosocial level. Reconstruction must relate to the child, the family, the community and the country. Rebuilding need not simply mean returning to the way things were, but can offer opportunities to leap into the future rather than follow a slow but steady path of progress. Programmes designed during reconstruction can lay foundations for child protection and strengthen social infrastructures, particularly in relation to health and education. Children are rarely mentioned in reconstruction plans or peace agreements, yet children must be at the centre of rebuilding.

242. Part of putting children at the centre means using youth as a resource. Young people must not be seen as problems or victims, but as key contributors in the planning and implementation of long-term solutions. Children with disabilities, children living or working in the streets and children who are in institutions as a result of conflict should all become essential participants in post-conflict planning and reconstruction. In countries emerging from conflict, agencies such as ILO have a key role to play through skills and entrepreneurship training programmes that address youth. The international community has an important responsibility for sharing technical skills and knowledge as well as financial resources.

243. The challenges facing communities attempting to rebuild are enormous. As a consequence of scorched-earth policies, communities often have little from which to reconstruct. In many countries, landmines restrict the use of roads and agricultural lands. "Donor pullout" can leave populations struggling to survive, particularly if humanitarian assistance has been structured in ways that encourage dependency rather than build family and community strength and integrity. For these reasons, the seeds of reconstruction should be sown even during conflict. Particularly for children, emergency aid - investment that secures their physical and emotional survival - will also be the basis for their long-term development. In this sense, emergencies and development should never be arbitrarily or artificially separated.

244. As daunting as reconstruction is the task of restoring family livelihood. UNHCR and others have developed a form of reintegration assistance known as "quick impact projects". These are simple, small-scale projects designed to act as bridges between returnees and residents while bringing immediate, tangible economic and social benefits. They involve the beneficiary community in determining priorities and implementation. One version of the quick impact projects gives female-headed households special consideration and provides loans and credits to enable them to form cooperatives and open small businesses. Before the conflict, women may have been less involved than men in economic activity, but armed conflicts can change this pattern dramatically. These projects have been particularly successful in Central America. However, not all quick impact projects have managed to involve local communities meaningfully, and some have been criticised for offering quick fix approaches which fail to benefit the community in the long term.

245. Such bridging programmes are crucial in providing a more formalized transition from the emergency phase to the longer-term reconstruction phase. In Cambodia, the expert was told that the phasing out of UNHCR has left a gap in support for many children and families. Agency staff argue that more defined programming, using development principles for a transitional rehabilitation phase would promote the rebuilding of a cohesive, caring social network supportive of women and children. The memoranda of understanding recently agreed between agencies such as UNHCR and UNICEF should be of help in establishing clearer directives for transition planning between agencies, but such planning needs to involve a variety of agencies and NGOs.

246. Education for children must be a priority in all reconstruction. For refugee children, it is important that their home countries recognize the schooling they have undertaken in the country of asylum. To facilitate this process, students should be provided with appropriate documentation of courses and qualifications. The recovery and reintegration of children will affect the success of the whole society in returning to a more peaceful path. To some extent, returning to non-violent daily activities can start the process of healing and national reconciliation, but communities must also take positive steps that signal to children the break with the violence of the past. In the demilitarization of communities, eroding the cultures of violence that conflict has engendered must be an important priority. Women's groups, religious groups and civil society all play key roles in this area.

B. Reconciliation

247. Truth commissions, human rights commissions and reconciliation groups can be important vehicles for community healing. To date, 16 or more countries in transition from conflict have organized truth commissions as a means of establishing moral, legal and political accountability and mechanisms for recourse. In South Africa and Guatemala, the commissions are aimed at preserving the memory of the victims, fostering the observance of human rights and strengthening the democratic process. In Argentina, where there was an assumption that offenders would receive punishment, there have subsequently been amnesties to the consternation of the human rights community.

248. It is difficult, if not impossible, to achieve reconciliation without justice. The expert believes that the international community should develop more systematic methods for apprehending and punishing individuals guilty of child rights abuses. Unless those at every level of political and military command fear that they will be held accountable for crimes and subject to prosecution, there is little prospect of restraining their behaviour during armed conflicts. Allowing perpetrators to benefit from impunity can only lead to contempt for the law and to renewed cycles of violence.

249. In the case of the gravest abuses, including but not limited to genocide, international law can be more appropriate than national action. In view of this, the Security Council has established International Tribunals to punish perpetrators of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. The expert welcomes these tribunals, but is concerned that they may have neither the resources nor the powers to fulfil their objectives. They deserve greater financial support and more determined political backing. The expert supports the proposed creation of an international criminal court, which would have a permanent prosecutor's office to try cases of genocide and other violations of international law.

250. One of the most disturbing and difficult aspects of children's participation in armed conflict is that, manipulated by adults, they may become perpetrators of war crimes including rape, murder and genocide. As of June 1996 in Rwanda, 1,741 children were being held in detention in dreadful conditions. Of these, approximately 550 were under 15 years, and therefore beneath the age of criminal responsibility under Rwandan law. The Government of Rwanda has transferred responsibility for the cases of young people who were under the age of 15 at the time of the genocide from the Ministry of Justice to the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. They were subsequently released into newly established juvenile or community detention facilities. For the estimated 1,191 children who are in detention and deemed criminally responsible, UNICEF, through the Ministry of Justice, provides legal assistance for their defence. It is also advocating special provisions for the trial of these adolescents. The dilemma of dealing with children who are accused of committing acts of genocide illustrates the complexity of balancing culpability, a community's sense of justice and the "best interests of the child".

251. The severity of the crime involved, however, provides no justification to suspend or to abridge the fundamental rights and legal safeguards accorded to children under the Convention on the Rights of the Child. States Parties should establish a minimum age below which children are presumed not to have the capacity to infringe penal law. While the Convention does not mention a specific age, the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (The Beijing Rules) stress that this age shall not be fixed at too low a level, bearing in mind the child's emotional, mental and intellectual maturity. The Committee on the Rights of the Child states that the assessment of the children's criminal responsibility should not be based on subjective or imprecise criteria, such as the attainment of puberty, age of discernment or the child's personality. 41/ Those children who have been deemed criminally responsible should, as article 40 of the Convention asserts, be treated with dignity, and have their social reintegration taken into account. Children should, inter alia, be given the opportunity to participate in proceedings affecting them, either directly or through a representative or an appropriate body, benefit from legal counselling and enjoy due process of law. Deprivation of liberty should never be unlawful or arbitrary and should only be used as a measure of last resort. In all instances, alternatives to institutional care should be sought.

252. The prime responsibility for consistent monitoring and prosecution of violations rests with the national authorities of the State in which the violations occurred. Whether justice is pursued after the conflict depends largely on the prevailing social and political environment. Even when there is a willingness to prosecute offenders, the country may not have the capacity to do so adequately, since the system of justice itself may have been largely destroyed. Following the conflict in Rwanda, for example, only 20 per cent of the judiciary survived, and courts lacked the most basic resources. 42/ At the Fourth Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in Asia and the Pacific it was proposed that the reconstruction of legal systems must be viewed as an urgent task of rebuilding and that substantial international assistance may be required.

V. CONFLICT PREVENTION

"Children are dropping out of childhood. We must envision a society free of conflict where children can grow up as children, not weapons of war." 43/

253. Much of the present report has focused on methods by which children can be protected from the worst impacts of armed conflict. However well such measures are implemented, clearly the most effective way to protect children is to prevent the outbreak of armed conflicts. The international community must shatter the political inertia that allows circumstances to escalate into armed conflict and destroy children's lives. This means addressing the root causes of violence and promoting sustainable and equitable patterns of human development. All people need to feel that they have a fair share in decision-making, equal access to resources, the ability to participate fully in civil and political society and the freedom to affirm their own identities and fully express their aspirations. Such ideas have been eloquently expressed, with analytic power that cannot be attempted here, in such texts as The Challenge to the South: The Report of the South Commission and the report of the Commission on Global Governance entitled "Our Global Neighbourhood".

254. Preventing conflicts from escalating is a clear responsibility of national Governments and the international community, but there is also an important role for civil society. Religious, community and traditional leaders have often been successful at conflict management and prevention, as have scholars and NGOs involved in mediation and capacity building. Women's organizations, too, have been very influential, promoting the presence of women at the negotiating table, where they can act as their own advocates and agents for peace. One example is African Women in Crisis, a UNIFEM programme working to strengthen the capacity of women's peace movements throughout Africa. The statement of the Third Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children in West and Central Africa recommends that peace missions, reconciliation forums and all peace-building efforts should incorporate women as key members of negotiating teams. The expert agrees.

A. Education for peace

255. All sectors of society must come together to build "ethical frameworks", integrating traditional values of cooperation through religious and community leaders with international legal standards. Some of the groundwork for the building of "ethical frameworks" can be laid in schools. Both the content and the process of education should promote peace, social justice, respect for human rights and the acceptance of responsibility. Children need to learn skills of negotiation, problem solving, critical thinking and communication that will enable them to resolve conflicts without resorting to violence. To achieve this, a number of countries have undertaken peace education programmes. In Lebanon, the expert visited the education for peace programme, jointly undertaken in 1989 by the Lebanese Government, NGOs, youth volunteers and UNICEF and now benefiting thousands of children nationally. In Liberia, the student palaver conflict management programme employs adolescents as resources in peer conflict resolution and mediation activities in schools. In Northern Ireland, the expert was informed about initiatives aimed at the universal inclusion of peace education elements in school curricula. Similarly in Sri Lanka, an education for conflict resolution programme has been integrated into primary and secondary school education. An innovative element is the programme's use of various public media to reach to out-of-school children and other sectors of the community. While such initiatives are not always successful, they are indispensable to the eventual rehabilitation of a shattered society.

256. The statement of the Second Regional Consultation on the Impact of Armed Conflict in the Arab Region called for a comprehensive review of the content, process and structure of peace education programmes (sometimes called "global education" or "education for development" programmes). The review was to include an assessment of best practice and coordination, the promotion of effective evaluation techniques and an exploration of stronger methods of involving and responding to local needs, aspirations and experiences. The consultation also emphasized the importance of integrating peace education principles, values and skills into the education of every child.

257. Adults are just as much in need of conflict management skills and human rights education as children and youth. Here, the most difficult challenge is to achieve tolerance not just between individuals, but also between groups. The media can play an important role by helping readers and viewers to enjoy diversity and by promoting the understanding that is needed for peaceful co-existence and the respect that is required for the enjoyment of human rights. The media's role as mediator has been explored in South Africa, where some journalists have been trained to use their access to both sides of conflict in order to help bring about national consensus on divisive issues.

258. Current levels of animosity in the former Yugoslavia, which had a long-running peace education programme, illustrates that programmes promoting respect for human rights and teaching conflict management skills are not enough on their own. Also essential are clear and strong mechanisms for reconciliation, the protection of minorities and access to social justice. Governments can specifically outlaw the kinds of discrimination that breed resentment. The persistent violation of the rights of minority and indigenous groups has helped generate the conditions that lead to armed conflict.

B. Demilitarization

259. In addition to pursuing equitable patterns of development, Governments can lower the risk of armed conflict by reducing levels of militarization and by honouring the commitments made at the World Summit for Social Development to support the concept of human security. Towards that end, Governments must take firm action to shift the allocation of resources from arms and military expenditures to human and social development. Sub-Saharan Africa, for example, is heavily militarized: between 1960 and 1994, the proportion of the region's gross domestic product (GDP) devoted to military spending rose from 0.7 per cent to 2.9 per cent. The region's military expenditure is now around $8 billion, despite the fact that 216 million people live in poverty. South Asia is another region that spends heavily on arms. In 1994, it spent $14 billion on the military although 562 million South Asians live in absolute poverty. 44/ Governments worldwide should take uncompromising steps to demilitarize their societies by strictly limiting and controlling access to weapons.

260. At the international level, Governments must exercise the political will to control the transfer of arms to conflict zones, particularly where there is evidence of gross violation of children's rights. The United Nations must adopt a much firmer position on the arms trade, including a total ban on arms shipments to areas of conflict and determined efforts to eliminate the use, production, trade and stockpiling of anti-personnel landmines. The United Nations Register of Conventional Arms should be expanded to include more types of weapons and mandatory reporting should be required.

261. Donors and development agencies should give priority to programmes that include conflict prevention components designed to help manage diversity and reduce economic disparities within countries. Economic development in itself will not resolve conflicts. However, unless the reduction of economic disparities becomes an essential ingredient in all programmes, human development will be constantly thwarted by violent conflict. Donors should make stronger efforts to ensure that a greater percentage of their funding is aimed directly at social infrastructures and programmes for children.

262. In a report on strengthening of the coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance (A/50/203-E/1995/79), the United Nations Secretary-General estimated that spending on refugees doubled between 1990 and 1992, that the cost of peace operations increased 5-fold in the same period and 10-fold in 1994 and that spending on humanitarian programmes tripled from $845 million to $3 billion between 1989 and 1994. Significantly, official development assistance (ODA) figures for 1994 were at their lowest point for the past 20 years amongst the world's richer countries - just 0.3 per cent of combined gross national product (GNP), rather than the 0.7 per cent agreed by the Development Assistance Committee of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and endorsed by the General Assembly. Decreasing levels of aid and increasing costs of emergencies have a negative impact on aid for long term development, despite growing awareness that longer term development may be one of the more effective methods of preventing conflicts and rebuilding communities.

C. Early warning

263. Improvements in early warning systems and stand-by capacity are necessary to reduce the dangers of armed conflict for children. On numerous field visits, it was stressed to the expert that, although massive displacement and threats to children had been anticipated in a region, they had not been sufficiently taken up by the international community. Recent efforts of the international humanitarian community to establish improved early warning systems and contingency planning have included NGOs and local institutions. Noting the rare inclusion of child-specific expertise in stand-by arrangements, the expert recommends the full consideration of children's rights and needs in the development of early warning systems and contingency planning. The media can alert the international community to child rights violations, but early warning must be linked to early action to be of any use. The escalation of conflict in the Great Lakes region of Africa is a clear example of the failure to link early warning with preventive measures and early action.

264. The burden and consequences of armed conflict usually have transborder impacts, diverting energy and resources from all countries in the region and leading to increased impoverishment. Civil society and international NGOs can mitigate these impacts by providing their own early warning, advocating international and local human rights standards, promoting community-level peace-building and offering mediators. Action can also come from regional organizations such as the Organization of American States (OAS), the League of Arab States, the Organization of African Unity (OAU), OECD and the European Union (EU), as well as those assembled for particular projects, such as the former Contadora Group, which was related to the central American peace process, and the Economic Community of West African States Military Observer Group (ECOMOG), related to peacekeeping in Liberia. The capacity of regional bodies, which differ greatly in their experience and resources, should not be overstated, but they can engender frank and open discussion among neighbouring governments. Regional organizations, NGOs and other actors have a number of preventive diplomacy instruments open to them, including grass roots dialogues, mediation, human rights missions, peacekeeping and peace-building.

265. In the long run, conflict prevention is everyone's responsibility. It requires action at local, national and international levels to remove both the underlying causes of conflict and the immediate provocations for violence. Ultimately, the failure to achieve comprehensive peace-building, the failure to settle disputes peacefully and the failure to prevent child rights violations each represent a collapse of moral and political will.

VI. IMPLEMENTATION MECHANISMS

266. To keep these issues very high on the international human rights, peace, security and development agendas, the expert believes that it is essential to ensure a follow-up to the present report. She recommends the establishment of a special representative of the Secretary-General on children and armed conflict.

267. The special representative would act as a standing observer, assessing progress achieved and difficulties encountered in the implementation of the recommendations presented by the present study. The representative would raise awareness about the plight of children affected by armed conflict and promote information collection, research, analysis and dissemination at the global, regional and national levels. The representative would encourage the development of networking to exchange experiences and facilitate the adoption of measures intended to improve the situation of children and reinforce action undertaken to such a purpose and would also foster international cooperation to ensure respect for children's rights in these situations, contribute to the coordination of efforts by Governments, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies, and other competent bodies, including NGOs, regional organizations, relevant special rapporteurs and working groups, as well as United Nations field operations.

268. The special representative would prepare an annual report to be submitted to the General Assembly as well as to the Commission on Human Rights. The report would contain information received from all relevant sources, including Governments, United Nations bodies, specialized agencies, NGOs and other competent bodies, on progress achieved as well as on any other steps adopted to strengthen the protection of children in situations of armed conflict.

269. The special representative would work closely with the Committee on the Rights of the Child, relevant United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other competent bodies, including NGOs. The representative would also maintain close contact with Department of Humanitarian Affairs and members of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, and would make use of the mechanisms established by the Administrative Committee on Coordination for inter-agency follow-up to recent global conferences. The representative would be supported in her/his work, including financial support, by the United Nations system and, in particular, by the High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights, UNICEF and UNHCR.

A. Follow-up action for Governments

270. Governments bear the primary responsibility for protecting children from the impact of armed conflict, and indeed, for preventing conflicts from occurring. While this report provides testimony of the efforts of Governments, United Nations bodies and civil society to protect children from the atrocities of war, it is ultimately a testimony of their collective failure to do so. Governments have clearly failed to harness the necessary financial and human resources or to demonstrate the compassion, the commitment and the tenacity required to fulfil their moral, political and social obligations to children. The following recommendations are addressed to all Governments. Improvement in the situation of children affected by armed conflicts requires improved international cooperation, political commitment and action not only on the part of Governments within whose borders conflict exists, but also on the part of those Governments whose citizens are indirectly responsible for inciting or protracting conflicts for economic or political gain.

271. All States Parties are encouraged to implement the Convention on the Rights of the Child in times of peace and conflict, inter alia, through legislative, administrative, budgetary, judicial, educational and social measures. In addition, States Parties should engage in international cooperation through bilateral and multilateral actions and by providing and facilitating humanitarian assistance and relief programmes during conflict situations.

272. Governments that have not yet ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child should do so. All States should support the adoption of the proposed draft optional protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on involvement of children in armed conflicts, and adhere to it as soon as possible. In addition, they should support the international ban on landmines and other weapons deemed to have indiscriminate effects. Governments should also ratify and implement other relevant instruments, such as the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols; the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; and other specific regional undertakings that address children's rights.

273. Governments must give priority to preventive measures by ensuring balanced economic, social and human development through capacity building, the promotion of a child-centred culture and the equitable reallocation of resources, including land. States must enact measures to eliminate discrimination, particularly against children, women, indigenous and minority populations, and must carry out their responsibilities to ensure protection for refugee and internally displaced children.

274. Governments should recognize that economic and social disparities, neglect and patterns of discrimination contribute to armed conflict, and should consequently review their national budgets with a view to reducing military expenditure and redirecting those resources to economic and social development. Child development and child rights indicators should form the basis for national strategies for children which assess progress and indicate policy and programme reforms. Governments should also ensure that, on matters affecting the child, children's views are taken into account.

275. Governments must create enabling environments within which civil society can work on issues related to armed conflict and child rights. Governments should actively encourage and support coalitions that represent the views of parliamentarians, the judiciary, religious communities, educators, the media, professional associations, the private sector, NGOs and children themselves. Such coalitions will facilitate service delivery, social mobilization and advocacy for children affected by armed conflicts. The establishment of national ombudspersons, national human rights commissions, international courts and other institutions should be explored. So should long-term measures designed to ensure respect for children's rights.

276. Immediately following conflicts and during periods of transition, Governments must ensure that health, education and psychosocial support are central to reconstruction efforts. Demilitarization, the demobilization of all armed groups, de-mining, mine awareness and the control of the flow of arms within and outside of national borders must become immediate priorities. To achieve justice and reconciliation, it is essential for Governments to engage in national-level dialogues with the military, to strengthen their judicial systems, to carry out human rights monitoring and to establish investigative mechanisms, tribunals and truth commissions that consider violations of children's rights.

277. Multilateral, bilateral and private funding sources should be committed to the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child as part of the process of development and post-conflict reconstruction. In the light of article 4 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, States Parties should commit themselves, with regard to economic, social and cultural rights, to the maximum extent of their available resources and, where needed, within the framework of international cooperation. This means that those countries with greater resources have an obligation to support the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child in those countries with fewer resources.

278. States should use the collective authority of their intergovernmental (such as the Commonwealth secretariat), regional and subregional bodies to support region-wide initiatives for conflict prevention, management and resolution.

B. Regional and subregional arrangements

279. Regional organizations, such as OAU, OAS, EU and the Asia-Pacific Regional Cooperation Framework (APEC), economic commissions, development banks and subregional organizations, such as the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN), the Southern African Development Community (SADC) and the Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development (IGADD), should be encouraged to work with national organizations and Government entities to formulate plans of action to protect children. The work should be undertaken within the framework of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and other relevant international and regional treaties, declarations and guidelines that emphasize children's rights. These include the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, the European Convention on Human Rights and the Santiago declaration.

280. In seeking to promote peace and stability within regions, regional and subregional organizations are encouraged to share information and develop common preparedness measures, early warning systems and rapid-reaction responses that use child rights indicators and are sensitive to children's needs. The organizations should convene meetings with the military and its chiefs of staff to develop systems of accountability and measures to protect children and civilians in conflict situations. Such measures may include, for example, human rights training and monitoring, the creation of regional mine-free zones, "days of tranquillity", "corridors of peace" and the demobilization of child soldiers.

C. Responsibilities of the United Nations

281. The Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Conference on Human Rights (A/CONF.157/24 (Part I) chap. III) recommended that matters relating to children's rights be regularly reviewed and monitored by all relevant organs and mechanisms of the United Nations system and by the supervisory bodies of the specialized agencies, in accordance with their mandates. The protection of children must be central to the humanitarian, peacemaking and peacekeeping policies of the United Nations, and should be given priority within existing human rights and humanitarian procedures.

282. Humanitarian concerns are increasingly an important component of the Security Council's international peace and security agenda. In recent years, the Council has authorized United Nations operations which support political, military and humanitarian objectives. 45/ Consistent with this trend, the Council should therefore be kept continually and fully aware of humanitarian concerns, including child specific concerns, in its actions to resolve conflicts, to keep or to enforce peace or to implement peace agreements. When taking up issues such as demobilization, the Council should bear in mind the very special situation of child soldiers. Where appropriate, the protection of children should be considered in comprehensive resolutions which set out peacekeeping and demobilization mandates reflecting considerations such as monitoring adherence to human rights, the establishment and maintenance of safe areas and humanitarian access. With regard to the issue of landmines, the Security Council is encouraged to consider their particular threat to children. In circumstances where a lack of political stability and peace hinder the provision of humanitarian assistance, the expert urges the Security Council to take up requests for the provision of such assistance to children and other vulnerable groups.

283. The Economic and Social Council requested, in its resolution 1995/56 of 28 July 1995, that certain issues pertaining to humanitarian assistance be reviewed in anticipation of a more general analysis of institutional needs. Many of these issues, such as resource mobilization, internally displaced persons, coordination, relief, rehabilitation, development and local coping mechanisms, relate to the situation of children affected by conflict situations. Working groups in these areas should ensure that the particular needs of children are included in recommendations presented to the Economic and Social Council and that this subject should become one of the main themes for discussion.

284. Within their respective mandates, the executive boards of relevant United Nations specialized agencies and other competent bodies should consider the recommendations contained in this report and inform the Secretary-General of the ways and means that they can contribute more effectively to the protection of children in armed conflict. Particular emphasis should be placed on systematically addressing these concerns in field activities, monitoring and reporting, the development of preventive measures and post-conflict recovery. The Department of Humanitarian Affairs, UNICEF, UNHCR, UNDP, WHO, FAO, WFP, UNFPA, UNIFEM, the High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights and other United Nations bodies must treat children affected by armed conflicts as a distinct and priority concern. Such treatment should result in the establishment of the mechanisms necessary for reporting on violations of children's rights.

1. The United Nations human rights system

285. The Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Conference on Human Rights recommended that matters relating to human rights and the situation of children be regularly reviewed and monitored by all relevant organs and mechanisms of the United Nations system and by the supervisory bodies of the specialized agencies, in accordance with their mandates. Children's rights must become distinct and priority concerns within all United Nations human rights and humanitarian monitoring and reporting activities. Within the framework of their mandates, all special rapporteurs and working groups for countries or themes should consider the situation of children affected by armed conflict and should suggest measures to prevent children's involvement in conflicts and to promote the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of those who are affected. The legal framework to increase the protection provided for internally displaced persons that is being developed by the Representative of the Secretary-General on Internally Displaced Persons should be supported and endorsed by the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly as a matter of priority.

High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights

286. The General Assembly, in resolution 48/141, recognized the responsibility of the High Commissioner for Human Rights for the coordination of the human rights promotion and protection activities throughout the United Nations system. In addition, the World Conference on Human Rights considered that the Centre for Human Rights should play an important role in coordinating system-wide attention to human rights. The High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights are encouraged to consider children's rights in conflict situations by institutionalizing cooperation in agreements with UNICEF, UNHCR, UNDP, and UN Volunteers. The Centre must be given the necessary resources and qualified staff to carry out these functions in a way which does not compromise the mandate which it has been given to fulfil. The priority of children's rights within human rights field operations in conflict areas should be ensured through the training of human rights officers and peacekeepers, and attention to these concerns should be given when defining relevant mandates and manuals of field operations.

International treaties and their monitoring systems

287. The Committee on the Rights of the Child, the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Committee Against Torture, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women should consider the situation of children affected by armed conflicts when reviewing States Parties reports and when requesting information from States Parties. The meeting of chairpersons of the monitoring treaty bodies should periodically assess the progress achieved in the protection of children in situations of armed conflict, as well as any additional measures required to improve the level of implementation of their fundamental rights. More specifically, the Committee on the Rights of the Child should:

(a) Continue to monitor the measures adopted by States Parties to ensure compliance with the principles and provisions of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, giving particular consideration to steps undertaken to promote respect for children's rights and to prevent the negative effects of conflicts on children, as well as to any violation of children's rights committed in times of war;

(b) Assess, in the light of article 41 of the Convention, the measures adopted by States Parties which are even more conducive to the realization of children's rights than those prescribed by the Convention;

(c) Include, in its reports to the General Assembly, specific information on the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child of relevance to the protection of children's rights in times of armed conflict;

(d) In the light of article 45 of the Convention, strengthen its role as a focal point for children's rights, thus ensuring a multidisciplinary and holistic approach to the United Nations system-wide action. It should also encourage and foster international cooperation, particularly with United Nations bodies, specialized agencies and other competent bodies, including NGOs, to improve the situation of children affected by armed conflicts, to ensure the protection of their fundamental rights and to prevent their violation, whenever necessary, through the effective application of relief programmes and humanitarian assistance.

2. Institutional arrangements

288. In armed conflicts, everyone concerned with children must practice a consistent set of principles, standards and guidelines. All United Nations field personnel should follow principles similar to those proposed in the operational guidelines for the protection of humanitarian mandates. This should include the situation of conflict-affected children, the human rights of children, and violations of their rights. For these purposes agencies should ensure access to relevant training. Recognizing the crucial role that women play in situations of armed conflict, and the ways in which women and children are rendered vulnerable in situations of armed conflict, humanitarian assistance should be gender and age specific. This should apply to needs assessments, as well as to preparedness and post-conflict reconstruction activities.

289. United Nations field personnel and the staff of humanitarian relief organizations must treat children in armed conflict as a distinct and priority concern. This principle applies to staff in all sectors - military, political, humanitarian, human rights, electoral and administrative - and in all their monitoring and reporting activities. In the light of article 45 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights, all such sectors should establish mechanisms to assess and to report on the implementation of the Convention in areas falling within the scope of their activities.

290. Governments bear the primary responsibility for protecting children in situations of armed conflict and in preventing those conflicts from taking place. The present report documents the magnitude of the task and the need for civil society and United Nations bodies and the specialized agencies to support these efforts. Through her work, the expert has come to believe that the singular capacity of a number of United Nations and specialized agencies bodies provides significant hope for the protection and care of children affected by armed conflicts. Indeed, the expert came to believe that their contributions posited one of the strongest hopes for the future. In both the short and long-term, the principle aim of these contributions must be to strengthen the capacity of Governments to fulfil their obligations to children, even in the most difficult circumstances. The present report describes many of the excellent initiatives on the part of United Nations bodies and specialized agencies while at the same time acknowledging that many of the United Nations bodies and specialized agencies themselves are far from satisfied with their results overall. With this in mind, the expert has chosen to be particularly forthright in making recommendations about future activities and priority actions. The following recommendations are addressed to related United Nations bodies, programmes and funds, specialized agencies and other autonomous bodies and the Bretton Woods Institutions.

Department of Humanitarian Affairs

291. The rapid response, assessment, policy planning, training and evaluation activities of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs should ensure a child and gender focus. This will require the development of new indicators to be used in information gathering and in training and evaluation programmes. The Department's mine-awareness and rehabilitation activities should emphasize age- and gender-appropriate design and delivery. On behalf of UNICEF, UNHCR and other relevant bodies, the Department should request the Department of Political Affairs and Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat to identify ways in which military and civilian defence assets (logistics, supplies, equipment and specialist personnel) can offer better protection for children. Through the framework for coordination established by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, the Department of Political Affairs and the Department of Humanitarian Affairs and in collaboration with the High Commissioner for Human Rights/Centre for Human Rights, guidelines, accountability mechanisms and systematic training in humanitarian and human rights instruments for peacekeepers should be developed with an emphasis on child rights. As Chair of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee's Task Force on Internally Displaced Persons, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs should ensure the development of an appropriate institutional framework to address the special needs of internally displaced children.

United Nations Children's Fund

292. UNICEF's anti-war agenda is a reflection of the agency's commitment to reaching children affected by conflict and the recently approved policy on child protection is an important step in giving greater impact to the agenda. Within this framework UNICEF needs to accelerate development of policy and programme guidelines specifically designed for the protection of children in situations of armed conflict, with special attention given to measures for the recovery and development of those children who are displaced or separated from their families, who are living with disabilities, who have been sexually exploited or unlawfully imprisoned or conscripted to armed groups. UNICEF should also accelerate the development of programming for adolescents, including opportunities for their participation in programme design, implementation and evaluation and reflecting the importance of education, sport and recreation in adolescent recovery and development. UNICEF should ensure that all these concerns are incorporated into inter-agency consolidated appeals. In addition, the agency should establish channels through which its personnel can report on violations of children's rights. In collaboration with other specialized agencies and NGOs, UNICEF should develop a set of indicators based on child rights that will guide assessment and country programming. In cooperation with the Department of Humanitarian Affairs and with major humanitarian organizations, UNICEF should provide leadership for the protection and care of internally displaced children. UNICEF should pay special attention to the situation of women and girls affected by armed conflict, ensuring a gender-sensitive approach to emergency assessments, programme planning, design and implementation - and offer appropriate training in this and other child rights areas for field and headquarters staff. UNICEF should ensure that peacemaking and peacekeeping actions take into account the needs of children - through the Department of Humanitarian Affairs/Department of Political Affairs/Department of Peacekeeping Operations framework for coordination and by monitoring Security Council meetings.

Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

293. Relying on strong policy guidelines, particularly the Guidelines on the Protection and Care of Refugee Children, UNHCR needs to ensure that gender and age related principles and standards are consistently implemented in all country programmes and agreements with implementing partners. This will require further development of its response capacity and training programmes for staff and implementing partners. Recognizing that UNHCR is often first to respond to emergencies, it is essential that it deploys qualified staff in the initial emergency phase to ensure that assessments and programme responses are gender and age appropriate. Among other matters, this would entail the systematic inclusion of issues relating to sexual violence in health and psychosocial programmes, and practical prevention measures identified for camp design, security and distribution processes. UNHCR should ensure a psychosocial focus from the outset of an emergency, taking into account local community and social networks. Building upon its experience with returnees, local capacity building and institution strengthening, UNHCR should ensure that the protection and assistance needs of women and children, in particular, custody, property and inheritance issues for female- and child-headed households, are fully addressed in repatriation and reintegration programmes.

World Health Organization

294. At all stages of conflict, WHO should promote emergency preparedness and responses in relation to child health and development. The organization should design indicators and instruments which would enable other organizations and specialized agencies to rapidly assess, plan and implement essential and priority child health activities, involving affected communities. WHO should produce materials for children of differing ages and stages of development in situations of armed conflict. Reflecting WHO's definition of health as encompassing physical, mental and social well being, the organization should increase its collaboration with UNICEF, UNHCR, the World Bank and UNDP in multi-sectoral programming for children and in strengthening public health infrastructures in the reconstruction of conflict-affected countries. This would include provision of substantial technical support through technical guidelines and planned work on child health, plus technical support and training materials to assist countries and NGOs in the prevention and management of health issues related to violence against women and girls during armed conflict. These issues should be reflected in WHO's humanitarian and consolidated emergency appeals. Inter-agency collaboration in a critical appraisal of best practice in conflict situations could lay the foundation for improved programming for children and adolescents. WHO should provide reproductive health expertise in emergency responses and develop the inclusion of gender and women's perspectives into health policies and programmes. WHO should take a lead role in training for all health workers in children's human rights. At the same time it should establish and promote appropriate child rights monitoring and reporting mechanisms for health professionals. While these are not new ideas or policies, WHO is encouraged to give priority to their implementation.

United Nations Development Programme

295. UNDP is encouraged to give greater priority to the special needs of children and women in special development situations. UNDP's efforts to reduce regional, political, economic and social disparities through country programmes should emphasize a preventative approach through, for example, measures to prevent discrimination against women, minorities and indigenous communities. Within the resident coordinator system, UNDP has a responsibility to ensure that children are central to the overall programme framework for national and international action. UNDP should consider the restoration of health, education and judicial services, as well as economic and national institutions, to be essential elements of post conflict recovery. UNDP's support for the role of women in rebuilding institutions and improving governance should be strengthened, as should its support for the work of UNIFEM in these areas. Throughout its multi-sectoral country and regional programmes, UNDP should integrate measures designed to prevent conflict, namely, through the strengthening of civil society.

World Food Programme

296. Food aid can be a powerful instrument in the rehabilitation process, not only as a practical matter in providing a nutritional supplement, but also as a resource to be used in recovery. WFP should encourage community participation in the design and delivery of food aid and, in particular, ensure that in refugee and internally displaced persons camps women are the initial point of control for distribution systems. WFP should collaborate with other United Nations specialized agencies and with NGOs in combining food aid with programmes designed to strengthen family unity, integrity and coping mechanisms. Food aid programmes such as "food for guns" should be linked to health, education and other development activities in recovery and reintegration, particularly for adolescents and former child combatants.

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations

297. Given the importance of FAO's work in early warning systems and food security assessments and analysis, the organization should, during armed conflicts, incorporate data and information that identify the particular vulnerabilities of children. FAO should provide technical expertise and advice in the design of programmes, such as food security programmes that disproportionately benefit children, and projects for demobilized child soldiers that offer alternative livelihoods and promote social integration. Having identified a growing number of child-headed households through its work with rural farmers, FAO should develop, implement and share guidelines on appropriate support with other specialized agencies. FAO should work with WFP, UNICEF, UNHCR and WHO, among others, to strengthen the capacity of families to care for their children, and to ensure that these programmes are linked to development activities in the areas of agriculture, fisheries and forestry.

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

298. Education has a crucial preventive and rehabilitative part to play in fulfilling the needs and rights of children, particularly those in conflict and post-conflict situations. UNESCO's expertise in educational curricula development and teacher training should be utilized in support of educational programmes run by operational agencies in all phases of conflict, but especially during emergency situations and in the critical period of rehabilitation and reconstruction. UNESCO is encouraged to collaborate with ILO, UNICEF, UNHCR, UNDP and relevant specialized agencies, as well as with international and national NGOs, in the more rapid development of appropriate activities and programming for adolescents, particularly former child combatants. Such activities could include the development of communication, sports and recreation as opportunities to develop life-skills and promote health. In collaboration with the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, UNICEF and involved NGOs, UNESCO should produce and promote mine-awareness materials through a technical meeting to identify best practices and evaluate mine-awareness programmes for children. UNESCO should also assist other United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, NGOs and educational systems in peace education, identifying best practice, developing strong evaluation mechanisms, assessing programmes and better coordinating principles and materials.

United Nations Development Fund for Women

299. UNIFEM should work closely with UNICEF in expanding its support for girls and women in crisis situations. It should also expand its women's peace-building and peacemaking activities. UNIFEM should take the lead in ensuring that system-wide emergency assessments, guidelines, training and evaluation are gender sensitive. UNIFEM should develop and promote training in women's human rights for the military and judicial systems. In cooperation with UNFPA, WHO and UNICEF, UNIFEM should ensure that all humanitarian responses address the special reproductive health needs of girls and women, and should develop guidelines for reporting on gender-based violations. Further, the Fund should facilitate access to appropriate legal and rehabilitative remedies for victims of gender-based violence and sexual exploitation.

The Bretton Woods Institutions

300. The momentum of collaboration between Bretton Woods Institutions and the specialized agencies of the United Nations system should help to make available the resources that are needed to address the issues of children affected by armed conflict. The World Bank is encouraged to pay increasing attention to the preservation and development of human capital in conflict-affected countries, particularly children and youth. Post-conflict recovery initiatives that are not fundamentally linked to relief, especially in the area of education, will ultimately undermine any potential benefit. Macroeconomic initiatives cannot sustain peaceful reconstruction without equivalent attention to micro-level cooperation. The World Bank can make an important contribution overall by evaluating the preventive value of development aid, and by ensuring a better coordinated and funded response to the needs of conflict-affected countries. Within these parameters, the Bank's emerging work in education, mine clearance and demobilization should provide an even greater focus on children.

Other related organizations

301. There are some organizations of the United Nations system that have mandates closely related to many of the concerns raised in the present report. The International Labour Organization's (ILO) standards, for example, in areas such as vocational rehabilitation, the employment of disabled persons, special youth employment and training schemes and human resource development, should form the basis of innovative rehabilitation and social reintegration programmes for adolescents in post-conflict situations, especially for former child soldiers, children with disabilities and children who have missed educational opportunities. The United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) should increase its collaboration with operational agencies to ensure that the reproductive health needs of girls and women are fully addressed in emergency and post-conflict situations. Furthermore, the role of the International Organization for Migration (IOM) in refugee and migration activities is increasingly important. As a special intergovernmental agency, IOM is encouraged further to develop its role in the care and protection of internally displaced children, in particular to ensure that the special concerns of children are incorporated in its activities of evacuation, transportation and processing. The expert also wishes to call attention to the work of the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development's (UNRISD) war torn societies project, recognizing its potential to draw attention to the needs of children in post-conflict recovery.

International Committee of the Red Cross, the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and National Societies

302. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) and National Societies have a special mandate and unique contribution, including emergency medical assistance, the reunification of separated families, and access to the internally displaced. The resolutions adopted at the twenty-sixth International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent, in particular resolution 2, and the plan of action for child victims of armed conflict should be implemented throughout the movement. The role of the Central Tracing Agency of ICRC is vitally important in the reunification of children and families. The expert urges continued and expanded cooperation in tracing and reunification programmes with UNHCR, UNICEF and specialized NGOs. As a critical contribution to prevention and to promoting the practical application of humanitarian law, the ICRC's advisory services to Governments should be strengthened with special attention to children. Dissemination should be extended to civil society and other humanitarian agencies. The development of the guidelines for United Nations forces regarding respect for international humanitarian law is especially welcome.

3. Inter-institutional mechanisms

303. Further discussion of inter-institutional mechanisms is needed to ensure that sufficient priority is given to the dimensions of peacekeeping and humanitarian operations that involve children.

Department of Peacekeeping Operations/Department of Political Affairs/Department of Humanitarian Affairs: framework for coordination

304. In 1994, a framework for sharing information was established by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, the Department of Political Affairs and the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat. In consultation with members of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, the United Nations Emergency Relief Coordinator must ensure that special consideration for children affected by conflict is incorporated in United Nations peacekeeping and humanitarian planning, advice, recommendations and proposals presented to the Security Council. In this context, the role of peacekeeping forces in promoting and respecting children's rights should be emphasized, with special attention to the demobilization and social reintegration of child soldiers. The Emergency Relief Coordinator should insist that the situation of conflict-affected children is addressed in all country level activities as well as in United Nations field operations mandated by the Security Council, the General Assembly or the High Commissioner for Human Rights. The Coordinator should also ensure priority consideration for programmes that support the needs of conflict-affected children and their primary care providers in the preparation of the inter-agency consolidated appeals.

Inter-Agency Standing Committee

305. Emanating from General Assembly resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991, the Inter-Agency Standing Committee was established to ensure a coordinated policy and operational response to emergency issues. Concerned agencies such as UNICEF should develop generic inter-agency guidelines regarding conflict-affected children to be used in the consolidated inter-agency appeal process. The substance of the guidelines should be reflected in the terms of reference for resident and humanitarian coordinators and those with political responsibilities, such as special representatives of the Secretary-General.

Administrative Committee on Coordination and Consultative Committee for Programme and Operational Questions

306. The Administrative Committee on Coordination and its subsidiary machinery, namely the Committee for Programme and Operational Questions should discuss ways to link child-related rehabilitation and development activities with relief and recovery, and ensure that all relevant guidelines and strategy proposals reflect the specific needs of war-affected children. The Administrative Committee on Coordination should endorse the principles and guidelines that result from this process, and use them as a model for incorporating child-related concerns into inter-agency assessments, consolidated appeals, round tables and consultative group meetings. In addition, the Administrative Committee on Coordination should be informed periodically by the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, UNICEF and UNHCR about developments relating to children's issues. Special areas of concern should be considered by the various working-groups established by the Administrative Committee on Coordination for Inter-Agency follow-up to recent global conferences, and as a part of the peace-building, conflict-resolution and national reconciliation activities of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa. In other words, children in conflict must be a regular part of the agenda of the Administrative Committee on Coordination.

D. Civil society organizations

307. In the course of the regional consultations, field trips and research undertaken by the expert, civil society organizations have contributed an enormous range of knowledge and expertise in children and conflict issues. Many of these organizations have been central in spreading the message of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and in implementing its principles. They have shown themselves willing and able to break new ground in developing programmes, to be daring in advocacy and to take risks in protecting and promoting the rights of children in situations of conflict. From international federations of religious groups and national development organizations to local service delivery projects, civil society organizations continue to demonstrate their critical role in promoting the rights and ensuring the well-being of children and families. Many of these groups have helped develop the issues and recommendations contained in the present report. The role of civil society will be crucial in implementing these recommendations and in assisting Governments and international agencies to fulfil their obligations to children.

308. Civil society organizations play a fundamental role in preventing conflicts, protecting children and in reconstructing conflict-affected societies. They do so through advocacy, research and information, human rights monitoring, programme interventions, training and humanitarian assistance. Because of their importance, it is essential to have lively dialogue and cooperation between and among all groups and with regional bodies, national institutions and the international community. NGOs, religious communities, cultural organizations, educators, professional and academic networks and associations and the media are encouraged to use international standards relating to the protection of children's rights as the framework for their work, and to continue to bring these issues of concern to the attention of the international community.

309. Organizations dealing specifically with women, family and communities are especially important. While women's roles in protecting and sustaining children and families are well recognized, their participation in the economic, political and security arenas is less well acknowledged and supported. Women have been active agents of peace-building and conflict resolution at the local level and their participation at the national, regional and international levels should be increased. Governments, agencies and other civil society actors must utilize the ideas, knowledge and experience women have gained from protecting their children, maintaining families and sustaining communities, often in perilous or insecure circumstances. Women's organizations and networks should be strengthened at all levels as one way to maximize women's contributions to child protection, peace, social justice and human development.

310. Civil society organizations are encouraged to develop capacities, at national, regional and global levels, to undertake relevant research; form alliances, networks and campaigns on key issues such as child soldiers; and to assist in creating an enabling environment for child rights activities.

311. With support from the international community, the expert encourages civil society organizations to prepare an international meeting on children's rights and armed conflict. Such a meeting might be held in September 2000, 10 years after the Convention on the Rights of the Child went into force and world leaders met at the World Summit for Children. The meeting should evaluate progress achieved globally subsequent to the tabling of the present report, as well as future ways and means to continue to improve the situation of children affected by armed conflict. While it may be thought that this is an unusual recommendation for the expert to make, it must be realized that we are dealing with often desperate circumstances for children, and the ongoing role for civil society is crucial for their rescue and well-being.

VII. CONCLUSION

"We want a society where people are more important than things, where children are precious; a world where people can be more human, caring and gentle." 46/

312. The present report has set forth recommendations for the protection of children during armed conflict. It has concentrated on what is practical and what is possible, but this cannot be enough. In considering the future of children, we must be daring. We must look beyond what seems immediately possible and find new ways and new solutions to shield children from the consequences of war and to directly address the conflicts themselves.

313. There is a clear and overwhelming moral case for protecting all children while seeking the peaceful resolution of wars and challenging the justification for any armed conflict. That children are still being so shamefully abused is a clear indication that we have barely begun to fulfil our obligations to protect them. The immediate wounds to children, the physical injury, the sexual violence, the psychosocial distress, are affronts to each and every humanitarian impulse that inspired the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The Convention commits States to meet a much broader range of children's rights, to fulfil the rights to health, to education and to growth and development within caring and supportive families and communities.

314. The report has shown how all rights to which children are entitled are consistently abused during armed conflict. Throwing a spotlight on such abuses is one small step towards addressing them. Exposure challenges perpetrators to face up to their actions and reminds defenders of children's rights of the enormity of the task ahead. The only measure by which the present report can be judged is the response it draws and the action it stimulates. To some extent, both are already under way: the report has in many ways broken new ground, focusing not just on the debate or resolution that form the final product, but on a process of consultation and cooperation among Governments, international agencies, NGOs and many other elements of civil society. Above all, the report has engaged families and children in explaining their situations and asserting their rights.

315. The present report's mobilization work is ongoing. Commitments have already been made, at national and regional levels, to hold meetings that will begin to implement the report's conclusions. Further publications are planned, including a book, a series of research papers, information kits and a popular version of the report. In the preparation of the report, there were many other issues that could not be covered in the time available, and that demand further investigation. These include: operational issues affecting the protection of children in emergencies; child-centred approaches to the prevention of conflict and to reconstruction and development; the treatment of child rights violations within existing human rights mechanisms; the role of the military in protecting child rights; child rights issues in relation to peace and security agendas; special programming for adolescents in conflict situations, and particularly child-headed households; the role of women in conflict prevention, management and resolution; community and regional approaches to humanitarian relief; and the development of effective training programmes in the area of child rights for all actors in conflict situations. In following up the present report, it is recommended that each of these issues be pursued through research and other means.

316. The flagrant abuse and exploitation of children during armed conflict can and must be eliminated. For too long, we have given ground to spurious claims that the involvement of children in armed conflict is regrettable but inevitable. It is not. Children are regularly caught up in warfare as a result of conscious and deliberate decisions made by adults. We must challenge each of these decisions and we must refute the flawed political and military reasoning, the protests of impotence, and the cynical attempts to disguise child soldiers as merely the youngest "volunteers".

317. Above all else, the present report is a call to action. It is unconscionable that we so clearly and consistently see children's rights attacked and that we fail to defend them. It is unforgivable that children are assaulted, violated, murdered and yet our conscience is not revolted nor our sense of dignity challenged. This represents a fundamental crisis of our civilization. The impact of armed conflict on children must be everyone's concern and is everyone's responsibility; Governments, international organizations and every element of civil society. Each one of us, each individual, each institution, each country, must initiate and support global action to protect children. Local and national strategies must strengthen and be strengthened through international mobilization.

318. Let us claim children as "zones of peace". In this way, humankind will finally declare that childhood is inviolate and that all children must be spared the pernicious effects of armed conflict. Children present us with a uniquely compelling motivation for mobilization. Universal concern for children presents new opportunities to confront the problems that cause their suffering. By focusing on children, politicians, Governments, the military and non-State entities will begin to recognize how much they destroy through armed conflict and, therefore, how little they gain. Let us take this opportunity to recapture our instinct to nourish and protect children. Let us transform our moral outrage into concrete action. Our children have a right to peace. Peace is every child's right.

Notes

1/ Smith, Chris and D. Henrickson, "The Transformation of Warfare and Conflict in the Late-Twentieth Century", London, Centre for Defence Studies, King's College, 1996, p. 50.

2/ United Nations Children's Fund, State of the World's Children 1996, Oxford, Oxford University Press, p. 13.

3/ Brett, Rachel, Margaret McCallin and Rhonda O'Shea, "Children: The Invisible Soldiers", Geneva, Quaker United Nations Office and the International Catholic Child Bureau, April 1996, p. 88.

4/ Ibid., p. 23.

5/ Ibid., p. 33.

6/ Ibid., p. 34.

7/ Ibid., p. 53.

8/ Ibid., p. 31.

9/ Ibid., p. 52.

10/ Almquist, Kate, Robbie Muhumuza and David Westwood, "The Effects of Armed Conflict on Girls", Geneva, World Vision International, May 1996, p. 21.

11/ Brett, Rachel, Margaret McCallin and Rhonda O'Shea, "Children: The Invisible Soldiers", Geneva, Quaker United Nations Office and the International Catholic Child Bureau, April 1996, p. 84.

12/ Ibid., p. 53.

13/ See E/CN.4/1996/52/Add.2. The Representative of the Secretary-General on Internally Displaced Persons has developed the following working definition of internally displaced persons: "Persons who have been forced to flee their homes suddenly or unexpectedly in large numbers as a result of armed conflict, internal strife, systematic violation of human rights or natural or man-made disasters, and who are within the territory of their own country".

14/ Article 1A, paragraph 2, of the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees defines a refugee as someone who, "owing to well founded fear of being persecuted for reason of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside of the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country, or who, not having nationality and being outside of the country of his former habitual residence, as a result of such events, is unable or unwilling to return to it".

15/ United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, State of the World's Refugees 1995: In Search of Solutions, New York, Oxford University Press, 1995, p. 248.

16/ United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Refugee Children: Guidelines on Protection and Care. Geneva: UNHCR, 1994.

17/ See also General Assembly resolution 41/85 entitled Declaration on Social and Legal Principles relating to the Protection and Welfare of Children, with Special Reference to Foster Placement and Adoption Nationally and Internationally.

18/ United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Sexual Violence Against Refugees: Guidelines on Prevention and Response. Geneva: UNHCR, 1995.

19/ United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children: The Refugee and Displaced Children Dimension, Geneva, 1996, p. 36.

20/ Ibid., p. 53.

21/ See E/CN.4/1996/63.

22/ See E/CN.4/1996/53/Add.1.

23/ Schade, Ernst, "Experiences with regard to the United Nations Peace-keeping Forces in Mozambique", Norway, Redd Barna, 1995.

24/ Statistics from the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs.

25/ Williams, Jody, "The Protection of Children Against Landmines and Unexploded Ordnance", Washington, D.C., Viet Nam Veterans of America Foundation, p. 1.

26/ Ibid., p. 12.

27/ Ibid.

28/ Ibid., p. 13.

29/ Information obtained from the United Nations Department of Humanitarian Affairs.

30/ Garfield, Richard, "The Impact of Economic Sanctions on the Health of Women and Children", New York, Columbia University, April 1996, p. 9.

31/ Ibid., p. 11.

32/ Ibid., p. 13.

33/ United Nations Children's Fund, State of the World's Children 1995, New York, Oxford University Press, p. 20.

34/ Youth for Population Information and Communication, "Improved Quality of Life, Empowerment and Development for Street Youth in Kumasi", Ghana, Youth for Population Information and Communication, 1996.

35/ United Nations Children's Fund, State of the World's Children 1996, Oxford, Oxford University Press, p. 20.

36/ Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, "Report of the Study on the Nutritional Impact of Armed Conflicts on Children", Rome, 1996, p. 16.

37/ Ibid., p. 18.

38/ Ibid., p. 10.

39/ Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS, "HIV and Infant Feeding: An Interim Statement", Geneva, July 1996.

40/ The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) and the National Societies have adapted the following as a full definition of international humanitarian law: "international rules, established by treaties or custom, which are specifically intended to solve humanitarian problems directly arising from international or non-international armed conflicts and which, for humanitarian reasons, limit the right of parties to a conflict to use the methods and means of warfare of their choice or protect persons and property that are, or may be, affected by conflict".

41/ Committee on the Rights of the Child, CRC/C/46, paras. 203-238.

42/ United Nations Research Institute for Social Development, States of Disarray: The social effects of globalization, Geneva, 1995, p. 112.

43/ Devaki Jain speaking at the Eminent Persons Group meeting for the United Nations Study on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children, Tarrytown, New York, 9 May 1995.

44/ United Nations Development Programme, Human Development Report 1996, New York, Oxford University Press, 1996, p. 72.

45/ See E/AC.51/1995/2.

46/ Archbishop Desmond Tutu speaking at the Eminent Persons Group meeting for the United Nations Study on the Impact of Armed Conflict on Children, Tarrytown, New York, 9 May 1995.

Annex

RESEARCH CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE REPORT ON THE IMPACT OF ARMED CONFLICT ON CHILDREN

(Unpublished manuscripts)

Adam, Hubertus and Joachim Walter et al., "Refugee Children in Industrial Countries - Reports of the Psychosocial Situation and Case Studies in the United Kingdom, Germany and South Africa", University Clinics of Hamburg, Germany, 1996.

Almquist, Kate, Robbie Muhumuza and David Westwood, "The Effects of Armed Conflict on Girls", Geneva, World Vision International, May 1996. The paper draws on the work of more than 15 World Vision country offices and was prepared in consultation with other international non-governmental organizations.

Balian, Hrair, "Armed Conflict in Chechnya: Its Impact on Children", Covcas Center for Law and Conflict Resolution, Virginia, November 1995.

Barnes, Catherine, ed., "The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children from Minority and Indigenous Communities: Four Case Studies on the Experiences of Jumma, Mayan, Roma and Somali Children", United Kingdom, Minority Rights Group International, May 1996. Three of the case studies for this report were prepared with local non-governmental organizations.

Boyden, Jo and Sara Gibbs, "Vulnerability and Resilience: Perceptions and Responses to Psycho-social Distress in Cambodia", United Kingdom, May 1996. This report was prepared in cooperation with other United Nations agencies, UNICEF and UNRISD in particular, and a local working group on psychosocial vulnerability and coping strategies in Cambodia.

Boyden, Jo and Paul Ryder, "The Provision of Education to Children Affected by Armed Conflict", April 1996.

Brett, Rachel, Margaret McCallin and Rhonda O'Shea, "Children: The Invisible Soldiers", Geneva, Quaker United Nations Office and the International Catholic Child Bureau, April 1996. The report is the result of the Child Soldiers Research Project of the Sub-Group on Refugee Children and Children in Armed Conflict of the Group for the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Many of the 24 case studies were prepared by local non-governmental organizations. Rädda Barnen was a major funding partner of the study on the impact of armed conflict on children and will publish a more detailed study later in 1996.

Cohn, Ilene, "Verification and Protection of Children's Rights by United Nations Human Rights Missions (MINUGUA and ONUSAL)", Guatemala, May 1996.

Djeddah, Carol and P. M. Shah, "The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children: A Threat to Public Health", Geneva, World Health Organization, Family and Reproductive Health and Division of Emergency and Humanitarian Action, June 1996.

Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, "Report of the Study on the Nutritional Impact of Armed Conflicts on Children", Rome, 1996.

Garfield, Richard, "The Impact of Economic Sanctions on the Health of Women and Children", New York, Columbia University, April 1996.

Hamilton, Carolyn and Tabatha Abu El-Haj, "Children and War: Humanitarian Law and Children's Rights", United Kingdom, University of Essex, May 1996.

Hampson, Françoise J., "Legal Protection Afforded to Under International Humanitarian Law", United Kingdom, University of Essex, May 1996.

Kadjar-Hamouda, Eylah, "An End to Silence: A Preliminary Study on Sexual Violence, Abuse and Exploitation of Children Affected by Armed Conflicts", Geneva, International Federation Terre des Hommes and Group for the Convention on the Rights of the Child, July 1996. This study was based on 12 case studies prepared by a number of contributing local and international non-governmental organizations.

Kur, Dengtiel A., ed. and Larjour Consultancy, "The Impact of War on Children and the Role of Traditional Values and International Humanitarian Principles in South Sudan", Nairobi, South Sudan Law Society, June 1996.

Marcelino, Elizabeth Protacio et al., "Community Participation in the Recovery and Reintegration of Children in Situations of Armed Conflict (The Philippine Experience)", contribution to the Asia Pacific Regional Consultation of the study on the impact of armed conflict on children, Philippines, University of the Philippines, 1996.

Marcelino, Elizabeth Protacio, "Torture of Children in Armed Conflict", Philippines, Center for Integrative and Development Studies, 1996.

Monan, Jim, "The Impact of Landmines on Children in Quang Tri Province - Central Viet Nam", report prepared for the Asia Pacific Regional Consultation of the study on the impact of armed conflict on children, Hanoi, Viet Nam Veterans of America Foundation and UNICEF, 1995.

Save the Children Alliance Working Group on Children Affected by Armed Conflict and Displacement, "Promoting Psychosocial Well-Being Among Children Affected by Armed Conflict and Displacement: Principles and Approaches", Working Paper No. 1, March 1996. The paper was based on the experience of a number of international and local professionals with over 15 Save the Children field programmes.

Smith, Chris and D. Hendrickson, "The Transformation of Warfare and Conflict in the Late-Twentieth Century", London, Centre for Defence Studies, King's College, 1996.

Thinh, Nguyen Tien, "The Impact of Herbicides and Defoliants on Vietnamese Children", report prepared for the Asia Pacific Regional Consultation of the study on the impact of armed conflict on children, Hanoi, UNICEF, 1996.

United Nations Centre for Human Rights, "The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children: A Survey of Existing Standards and of their Relevance and Adequacy", Geneva, 1996.

United Nations Development Fund for Women, "Women in Crisis Situations Resulting from Armed Conflict", UNIFEM contribution to the study on the impact of armed conflict on children, New York, March 1996.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, "Refugee and Displaced Children", Geneva, 1996.

Williams, Jody, "The Protection of Children Against Landmines and Unexploded Ordnance", Viet Nam Veterans of America Foundation, International Campaign to Ban Landmines, April 1996.

ANNEX 15:

Security Council Resolution 955 (1994), 8 November 1994.

United Nations

S/RES/955 (1994)

8 November 1994

RESOLUTION 955 (1994)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 3453rd meeting, on 8 November 1994

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 3 of resolution 935 (1994) of 1 July 1994 (S/1994/879 and S/1994/906), and having taken note of the reports of the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (S/1994/1157, annex I and annex II),

Expressing appreciation for the work of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994), in particular its preliminary report on violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda transmitted by the Secretary-General's letter of 1 October 1994 (S/1994/1125),

Expressing once again its grave concern at the reports indicating that genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law have been committed in Rwanda,

Determining that this situation continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security,

Determined to put an end to such crimes and to take effective measures to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for them,

Convinced that in the particular circumstances of Rwanda, the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law would enable this aim to be achieved and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace,

Believing that the establishment of an international tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for genocide and the other above-mentioned violations of international humanitarian law will contribute to ensuring that such violations are halted and effectively redressed,

 6239

Stressing also the need for international cooperation to strengthen the courts and judicial system of Rwanda, having regard in particular to the necessity for those courts to deal with large numbers of suspects,

Considering that the Commission of Experts established pursuant to resolution 935 (1994) should continue on an urgent basis the collection of information relating to evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and should submit its final report to the Secretary-General by 30 November 1994,

Acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations,

1.Decides hereby, having received the request of the Government of Rwanda (S/1994/1115), to establish an international tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 and to this end to adopt the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda annexed hereto;

2.Decides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 28 of the Statute, and requests States to keep the Secretary-General informed of such measures;

3.Considers that the Government of Rwanda should be notified prior to the taking of decisions under articles 26 and 27 of the Statute;

4.Urges States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute funds, equipment and services to the International Tribunal, including the offer of expert personnel;

5.Requests the Secretary-General to implement this resolution urgently and in particular to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the International Tribunal, including recommendations to the Council as to possible locations for the seat of the International Tribunal at the earliest time and to report periodically to the Council;

6.Decides that the seat of the International Tribunal shall be determined by the Council having regard to considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, including access to witnesses, and economy, and subject to the conclusion of appropriate arrangements between the United Nations and the State of the seat, acceptable to the Council, having regard to the fact that the International Tribunal may meet away from its seat when it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions; and decides that an office will be established and proceedings will be conducted in Rwanda, where feasible and appropriate, subject to the conclusion of similar appropriate arrangements;

7.Decides to consider increasing the number of judges and Trial Chambers of the International Tribunal if it becomes necessary;

8.Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

Annex

Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

Having been established by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 (hereinafter referred to as "the International Tribunal for Rwanda") shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 1

Competence of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 2

Genocide

1.The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing genocide as defined in paragraph 2 of this article or of committing any of the other acts enumerated in paragraph 3 of this article.

2.Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

(a)Killing members of the group;

(b)Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

(c)Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

(d)Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

(e)Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

3.The following acts shall be punishable:

(a)Genocide;

(b)Conspiracy to commit genocide;

(c)Direct and public incitement to commit genocide;

(d)Attempt to commit genocide;

(e)Complicity in genocide.

Article 3

Crimes against humanity

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for the following crimes when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds:

(a)Murder;

(b)Extermination;

(c)Enslavement;

(d)Deportation;

(e)Imprisonment ;

(f)Torture;

(g)Rape;

(h)Persecuti ons on political, racial and religious grounds;

(i)Other inhumane acts.

Article 4

Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva

Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:

(a)Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

(b)Collective punishments;

(c)Taking of hostages;

(d)Acts of terrorism;

(e)Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

(f)Pillage;

(g)The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples;

(h)Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

Article 5

Personal jurisdiction

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 6

Individual criminal responsibility

1.A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2.The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3.The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4.The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the International Tribunal for Rwanda determines that justice so requires.

Article 7

Territorial and temporal jurisdiction

The territorial jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall extend to the territory of Rwanda including its land surface and airspace as well as to the territory of neighbouring States in respect of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed by Rwandan citizens. The temporal jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall extend to a period beginning on 1 January 1994 and ending on 31 December 1994.

Article 8

Concurrent jurisdiction

1.The International Tribunal for Rwanda and national courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction to prosecute persons for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

2.The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have primacy over the national courts of all States. At any stage of the procedure, the International Tribunal for Rwanda may formally request national courts to defer to its competence in accordance with the present Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

Article 9

Non bis in idem

1.No person shall be tried before a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law under the present Statute, for which he or she has already been tried by the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

2.A person who has been tried by a national court for acts constituting serious violations of international humanitarian law may be subsequently tried by the International Tribunal for Rwanda only if:

(a)The act for which he or she was tried was characterized as an ordinary crime; or

(b)The national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility, or the case was not diligently prosecuted.

3.In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 10

Organization of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall consist of the following organs:

(a)The Chambers, comprising two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber;

(b)The Prosecutor; and

(c)A Registry.

Article 11

Composition of the Chambers

The Chambers shall be composed of eleven independent judges, no two of whom may be nationals of the same State, who shall serve as follows:

(a)Three judges shall serve in each of the Trial Chambers;

(b)Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber.

Article 12

Qualification and election of judges

1.The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law.

2.The members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 (hereinafter referred to as "the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia") shall also serve as the members of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

3.The judges of the Trial Chambers of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall be elected by the General Assembly from a list submitted by the Security Council, in the following manner:

(a)The Secretary-General shall invite nominations for judges of the Trial Chambers from States Members of the United Nations and non-member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters;

(b)Within thirty days of the date of the invitation of the Secretary-General, each State may nominate up to two candidates meeting the qualifications set out in paragraph 1 above, no two of whom shall be of the same nationality and neither of whom shall be of the same nationality as any judge on the Appeals Chamber;

(c)The Secretary-General shall forward the nominations received to the Security Council. From the nominations received the Security Council shall establish a list of not less than twelve and not more than eighteen candidates, taking due account of adequate representation on the International Tribunal for Rwanda of the principal legal systems of the world;

(d)The President of the Security Council shall transmit the list of candidates to the President of the General Assembly. From that list the General Assembly shall elect the six judges of the Trial Chambers. The candidates who receive an absolute majority of the votes of the States Members of the United Nations and of the non-Member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters, shall be declared elected. Should two candidates of the same nationality obtain the required majority vote, the one who received the higher number of votes shall be considered elected.

4.In the event of a vacancy in the Trial Chambers, after consultation with the Presidents of the Security Council and of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General shall appoint a person meeting the qualifications of paragraph 1 above, for the remainder of the term of office concerned.

5.The judges of the Trial Chambers shall be elected for a term of four years. The terms and conditions of service shall be those of the judges of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. They shall be eligible for re-election.

Article 13

Officers and members of the Chambers

1.The judges of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall elect a President.

2.After consultation with the judges of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the President shall assign the judges to the Trial Chambers. A judge shall serve only in the Chamber to which he or she was assigned.

3.The judges of each Trial Chamber shall elect a Presiding Judge, who shall conduct all of the proceedings of that Trial Chamber as a whole.

Article 14

Rules of procedure and evidence

The judges of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall adopt, for the purpose of proceedings before the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the rules of procedure and evidence for the conduct of the pre-trial phase of the proceedings, trials and appeals, the admission of evidence, the protection of victims and witnesses and other appropriate matters of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia with such changes as they deem necessary.

Article 15

The Prosecutor

1.The Prosecutor shall be responsible for the investigation and prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

2.The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source.

3.The Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia shall also serve as the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. He or she shall have additional staff, including an additional Deputy Prosecutor, to assist with prosecutions before the International Tribunal for Rwanda. Such staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General on the recommendation of the Prosecutor.

Article 16

The Registry

1.The Registry shall be responsible for the administration and servicing of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

2.The Registry shall consist of a Registrar and such other staff as may be required.

3.The Registrar shall be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the President of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. He or she shall serve for a four- year term and be eligible for reappointment. The terms and conditions of service of the Registrar shall be those of an Assistant Secretary-General of the United Nations.

4.The staff of the Registry shall be appointed by the Secretary-General on the recommendation of the Registrar.

Article 17

Investigation and preparation of indictment

1.The Prosecutor shall initiate investigations ex-officio or on the basis of information obtained from any source, particularly from Governments, United Nations organs, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. The Prosecutor shall assess the information received or obtained and decide whether there is sufficient basis to proceed.

2.The Prosecutor shall have the power to question suspects, victims and witnesses, to collect evidence and to conduct on-site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor may, as appropriate, seek the assistance of the State authorities concerned.

3.If questioned, the suspect shall be entitled to be assisted by counsel of his or her own choice, including the right to have legal assistance assigned to the suspect without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it, as well as to necessary translation into and from a language he or she speaks and understands.

4.Upon a determination that a prima facie case exists, the Prosecutor shall prepare an indictment containing a concise statement of the facts and the crime or crimes with which the accused is charged under the Statute. The indictment shall be transmitted to a judge of the Trial Chamber.

Article 18

Review of the indictment

1.The judge of the Trial Chamber to whom the indictment has been transmitted shall review it. If satisfied that a prima facie case has been established by the Prosecutor, he or she shall confirm the indictment. If not so satisfied, the indictment shall be dismissed.

2.Upon confirmation of an indictment, the judge may, at the request of the Prosecutor, issue such orders and warrants for the arrest, detention, surrender or transfer of persons, and any other orders as may be required for the conduct of the trial.

Article 19

Commencement and conduct of trial proceedings

1.The Trial Chambers shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and that proceedings are conducted in accordance with the rules of procedure and evidence, with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses.

2.A person against whom an indictment has been confirmed shall, pursuant to an order or an arrest warrant of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, be taken into custody, immediately informed of the charges against him or her and transferred to the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

3.The Trial Chamber shall read the indictment, satisfy itself that the rights of the accused are respected, confirm that the accused understands the indictment, and instruct the accused to enter a plea. The Trial Chamber shall then set the date for trial.

4.The hearings shall be public unless the Trial Chamber decides to close the proceedings in accordance with its rules of procedure and evidence.

Article 20

Rights of the accused

1.All persons shall be equal before the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

2.In the determination of charges against him or her, the accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to article 21 of the Statute.

3.The accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the provisions of the present Statute.

4.In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a)To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he or she understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him or her;

(b)To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence and to communicate with counsel of his or her own choosing;

(c)To be tried without undue delay;

(d)To be tried in his or her presence, and to defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(e)To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her;

(f)To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the International Tribunal for Rwanda;

(g)Not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt.

Article 21

Protection of victims and witnesses

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall provide in its rules of procedure and evidence for the protection of victims and witnesses. Such protection measures shall include, but shall not be limited to, the conduct of in camera proceedings and the protection of the victim's identity.

Article 22

Judgement

1.The Trial Chambers shall pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties on persons convicted of serious violations of international humanitarian law.

2.The judgement shall be rendered by a majority of the judges of the Trial Chamber, and shall be delivered by the Trial Chamber in public. It shall be accompanied by a reasoned opinion in writing, to which separate or dissenting opinions may be appended.

Article 23

Penalties

1.The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda.

2.In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3.In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chambers may order the return of any property and proceeds acquired by criminal conduct, including by means of duress, to their rightful owners.

Article 24

Appellate proceedings

1.The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:

(a)An error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or (b)An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2.The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers.

Article 25

Review proceedings

Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known at the time of the proceedings before the Trial Chambers or the Appeals Chamber and which could have been a decisive factor in reaching the decision, the convicted person or the Prosecutor may submit to the International Tribunal for Rwanda an application for review of the judgement.

Article 26

Enforcement of sentences

Imprisonment shall be served in Rwanda or any of the States on a list of States which have indicated to the Security Council their willingness to accept convicted persons, as designated by the International Tribunal for Rwanda. Such imprisonment shall be in accordance with the applicable law of the State concerned, subject to the supervision of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

Article 27

Pardon or commutation of sentences

If, pursuant to the applicable law of the State in which the convicted person is imprisoned, he or she is eligible for pardon or commutation of sentence, the State concerned shall notify the International Tribunal for Rwanda accordingly. There shall only be pardon or commutation of sentence if the President of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, in consultation with the judges, so decides on the basis of the interests of justice and the general principles of law.

Article 28

Cooperation and judicial assistance

1.States shall cooperate with the International Tribunal for Rwanda in the investigation and prosecution of persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law.

2.States shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including, but not limited to:

(a)The identification and location of persons;

(b)The taking of testimony and the production of evidence;

(c)The service of documents;

(d)The arrest or detention of persons;

(e)The surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

Article 29

The status, privileges and immunities of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

1.The Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations of 13 February 1946 shall apply to the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the judges, the Prosecutor and his or her staff, and the Registrar and his or her staff.

2.The judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar shall enjoy the privileges and immunities, exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic envoys, in accordance with international law.

3.The staff of the Prosecutor and of the Registrar shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded to officials of the United Nations under articles V and VII of the Convention referred to in paragraph 1 of this article.

4.Other persons, including the accused, required at the seat or meeting place of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall be accorded such treatment as is necessary for the proper functioning of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

Article 30

Expenses of the International Tribunal for Rwanda

The expenses of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall be expenses of the Organization in accordance with Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations.

- 6252

Article 31

Working languages

The working languages of the International Tribunal shall be English and French.

Article 32

Annual report

The President of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall submit an annual report of the International Tribunal for Rwanda to the Security Council and to the General Assembly.

ANNEX 16:

Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, U.N. Doc. S/2000/915, 4 October 2000.

United Nations S/200

Security Council

Distr.: General
4 October 2000

Original: English

Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone

I. Introduction

1. The Security Council, by its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, requested me to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court (hereinafter "the Special Court") to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, as well as crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone.

2. The Security Council further requested that I submit a report on the implementation of the resolution, in particular on my consultations and negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone concerning the establishment of the Special Court. In the report I was requested, in particular, to address the questions of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court; an appeals process, including the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of an appeals chamber in the Special Court, or of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda; and a possible alternative host State, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside the seat of the Court in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require.

3. Specific recommendations were also requested by the Security Council on the following issues:

(a) Any additional agreements that might be required for the provision of the international assistance necessary for the establishment and functioning of the Special Court;

(b) The level of participation, support and technical assistance of qualified persons required from Member States, including, in particular, States members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Commonwealth, and from the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) that would be necessary for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court;

(c) The amount of voluntary contributions of funds, equipment and services, including expert personnel from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations;

(d) Whether the Special Court could receive, as necessary and feasible, expertise and advice from the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.

4. The present report, submitted in response to the above requests, is in two parts. The first part (chaps. II-VI) examines and analyses the nature and specificity of the Special Court, its jurisdiction (subject-matter, temporal and personal), the organizational structure (the Chambers and the nature of the appeals process, the offices of the Prosecutor and the Registry), enforcement of sentences in third States and the choice of the alternative seat. The second part (chaps. VII and VIII) deals with the practical implementation of the resolution on the establishment of the Special Court. It describes the requirements of the Court in terms of personnel, equipment, services and funds that would be required of States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, the type of advice and expertise that may be expected from the two International Tribunals, and the logistical support and security requirements for premises and personnel that could, under an appropriate mandate, be provided by UNAMSIL. The Court's requirements in all of these respects have been placed within the specific context of Sierra Leone, and represent the minimum necessary, in the words of resolution 1315 (2000), "for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court". An assessment of the viability and sustainability of the financial mechanism envisaged, together with an alternative solution for the consideration of the Security Council, concludes the second part of the report.

00-66177 (E) 041000

5. The negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone, represented by the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice, were conducted in two stages. The first stage of the negotiations, held at United Nations Headquarters from 12 to 14 September 2000, focused on the legal framework and constitutive instruments establishing the Special Court: the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and the Statute of the Special Court which is an integral part thereof. (For the texts of the Agreement and the Statute, see the annex to the present report.)

6. Following the Attorney General's visit to Headquarters, a small United Nations team led by Ralph Zacklin, Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs, visited Freetown from 18 to 20 September 2000. Mr. Zacklin was accompanied by Daphna Shraga, Senior Legal Officer, Office of the Legal Counsel, Office of Legal Affairs; Gerald Ganz, Security Coordination Officer, Office of the United Nations Security Coordinator; and Robert Kirkwood, Chief, Buildings Management, International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. During its three-day visit, the team concluded the negotiations on the remaining legal issues, assessed the adequacy of possible premises for the seat of the Special Court, their operational state and security conditions, and had substantive discussions on all aspects of the Special Court with the President of Sierra Leone, senior government officials, members of the judiciary and the legal profession, the Ombudsman, members of civil society, national and international non-governmental organizations and institutions involved in child-care programmes and rehabilitation of child ex-combatants, as well as with senior officials of UNAMSIL.

7. In its many meetings with Sierra Leoneans of all segments of society, the team was made aware of the high level of expectations created in anticipation of the establishment of a special court. If the role of the Special Court in dealing with impunity and developing respect for the rule of law in Sierra Leone is to be fully understood and its educative message conveyed to Sierra Leoneans of all ages, a broad public information and education campaign will have to be undertaken as an integral part of the Court's activities. The purpose of such a campaign would be both to inform and to reassure the population that while a credible Special Court cannot be established overnight, everything possible will be done to expedite its functioning; that while the number of persons prosecuted before the Special Court will be limited, it would not be selective or otherwise discriminatory; and that although the children of Sierra Leone may be among those who have committed the worst crimes, they are to be regarded first and foremost as victims. For a nation which has attested to atrocities that only few societies have witnessed, it will require a great deal of persuasion to convince it that the exclusion of the death penalty and its replacement by imprisonment is not an "acquittal" of the accused, but an imposition of a more humane punishment. In this public information campaign, UNAMSIL, alongside the Government and non-governmental organizations, could play an important role.

8. Since the present report is limited to an analysis of the legal framework and the practical operation of the Special Court, it does not address in detail specifics of the relationship between the Special Court and the national courts in Sierra Leone, or between the Court and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission. It is envisaged, however, that upon the establishment of the Special Court and the appointment of its Prosecutor, arrangements regarding cooperation, assistance and sharing of information between the respective courts would be concluded and the status of detainees awaiting trial would be urgently reviewed. In a similar vein, relationship and cooperation arrangements would be required between the Prosecutor and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission, including the use of the Commission as an alternative to prosecution, and the prosecution of juveniles, in particular.

II. Nature and specificity of the Special Court

9. The legal nature of the Special Court, like that of any other legal entity, is determined by its constitutive instrument. Unlike either the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were established by resolutions of the Security Council and constituted as subsidiary organs of the United Nations, or national courts established by law, the Special Court, as foreseen, is established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and is therefore a treaty-based sui generis court of mixed jurisdiction and composition. Its implementation at the national level would require that the agreement is incorporated in the national law of Sierra Leone in accordance with constitutional requirements. Its applicable law includes international as well as Sierra Leonean law, and it is composed of both international and Sierra Leonean judges,[1] prosecutors and administrative support staff.[2] As a treaty-based organ, the Special Court is not anchored in any existing system (i.e., United Nations administrative law or the national law of the State of the seat) which would be automatically applicable to its non-judicial, administrative and financial activities. In the absence of such a framework, it would be necessary to identify rules for various purposes, such as recruitment, staff administration, procurement, etc., to be applied as the need arose.[3]

10. The Special Court has concurrent jurisdiction with and primacy over Sierra Leonean courts. Consequently, it has the power to request at any stage of the proceedings that any national Sierra Leonean court defer to its jurisdiction (article 8, para. 2 of the Statute). The primacy of the Special Court, however, is limited to the national courts of Sierra Leone and does not extend to the courts of third States. Lacking the power to assert its primacy over national courts in third States in connection with the crimes committed in Sierra Leone, it also lacks the power to request the surrender of an accused from any third State and to induce the compliance of its authorities with any such request. In examining measures to enhance the deterrent powers of the Special Court, the Security Council may wish to consider endowing it with Chapter VII powers for the specific purpose of requesting the surrender of an accused from outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

11. Beyond its legal and technical aspects, which in many ways resemble those of other international jurisdictions, the Special Court is Sierra Leone-specific. Many of the legal choices made are intended to address the specificities of the Sierra Leonean conflict, the brutality of the crimes committed and the young age of those presumed responsible. The moral dilemma that some of these choices represent has not been lost upon those who negotiated its constitutive instruments.

III. Competence of the Special Court

A. Subject-matter jurisdiction

12. The subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court comprises crimes under international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law. It covers the most egregious practices of mass killing, extrajudicial executions, widespread mutilation, in particular amputation of hands, arms, legs, lips and other parts of the body, sexual violence against girls and women, and sexual slavery, abduction of thousands of children and adults, hard labour and forced recruitment into armed groups, looting and setting fire to large urban dwellings and villages. In recognition of the principle of legality, in particular nullum crimen sine lege, and the prohibition on retroactive criminal legislation, the international crimes enumerated, are crimes considered to have had the character of customary international law at the time of the alleged commission of the crime.

1. Crimes under international law

13. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should include crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. Because of the lack of any evidence that the massive, large-scale killing in Sierra Leone was at any time perpetrated against an identified national, ethnic, racial or religious group with an intent to annihilate the group as such, the Security Council did not include the crime of genocide in its recommendation, nor was it considered appropriate by the Secretary-General to include it in the list of international crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court.

14. The list of crimes against humanity follows the enumeration included in the Statutes of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were patterned on article 6 of the Nürnberg Charter. Violations of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and of article 4 of Additional Protocol II thereto committed in an armed conflict not of an international character have long been considered customary international law, and in particular since the establishment of the two International Tribunals, have been recognized as customarily entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused. Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), though it is not yet in force, they are recognized as war crimes.

15. Other serious violations of international humanitarian law falling within the jurisdiction of the Court include:

(a) Attacks against the civilian population as such, or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities;

(b) Attacks against peacekeeping personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or a peacekeeping mission, as long as they are entitled to the protection given to civilians under the international law of armed conflict; and

(c) Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

16. The prohibition on attacks against civilians is based on the most fundamental distinction drawn in international humanitarian law between the civilian and the military and the absolute prohibition on directing attacks against the former. Its customary international law nature is, therefore, firmly established. Attacks against peacekeeping personnel, to the extent that they are entitled to protection recognized under international law to civilians in armed conflict, do not represent a new crime. Although established for the first time as an international crime in the Statute of the International Criminal Court, it was not viewed at the time of the adoption of the Rome Statute as adding to the already existing customary international law crime of attacks against civilians and persons hors de combat. Based on the distinction between peacekeepers as civilians and peacekeepers turned combatants, the crime defined in article 4 of the Statute of the Special Court is a specification of a targeted group within the generally protected group of civilians which because of its humanitarian or peacekeeping mission deserves special protection. The specification of the crime of attacks against peacekeepers, however, does not imply a more serious crime than attacks against civilians in similar circumstances and should not entail, therefore, a heavier penalty.

17. The prohibition on the recruitment of children below the age of 15, a fundamental element of the protection of children, was for the first time established in the 1977 Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, article 4, paragraph 3 (c), of which provides that children shall be provided with the care and aid they require, and that in particular:

> "Children who have not attained the age of fifteen years shall neither be recruited in the armed forces or groups nor allowed to take part in hostilities".

A decade later, the prohibition on the recruitment of children below 15 into armed forces was established in article 38, paragraph 3, of the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child; and in 1998, the Statute of the International Criminal Court criminalized the prohibition and qualified it as a war crime. But while the prohibition on child recruitment has by now acquired a customary international law status, it is far less clear whether it is customarily recognized as a war crime entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused.

18. Owing to the doubtful customary nature of the ICC Statutory crime which criminalizes the conscription or enlistment of children under the age of 15, whether forced or "voluntary", the crime which is included in article 4 (c) of the Statute of the Special Court is not the equivalent of the ICC provision. While the definition of the crime as "conscripting" or "enlisting" connotes an administrative act of putting one's name on a list and formal entry into the armed forces, the elements of the crime under the proposed Statute of the Special Court are: (a) abduction, which in the case of the children of Sierra Leone was the original crime and is in itself a crime under common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions; (b) forced recruitment in the most general sense — administrative formalities, obviously, notwithstanding; and (c) transformation of the child into, and its use as, among other degrading uses, a "child-combatant".

2. Crimes under Sierra Leonean law

19. The Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should also include crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone. While most of the crimes committed in the Sierra Leonean conflict during the relevant period are governed by the international law provisions set out in articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, recourse to Sierra Leonean law has been had in cases where a specific situation or an aspect of it was considered to be either unregulated or inadequately regulated under international law. The crimes considered to be relevant for this purpose and included in the Statute are: offences relating to the abuse of girls under the 1926 Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act and offences relating to the wanton destruction of property, and in particular arson, under the 1861 Malicious Damage Act.

20. The applicability of two systems of law implies that the elements of the crimes are governed by the respective international or national law, and that the Rules of Evidence differ according to the nature of the crime as a common or international crime. In that connection, article 14 of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to proceedings before the Special Court, and that the judges shall have the power to amend or adopt additional rules, where a specific situation is not provided for. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the 1965 Criminal Procedure Act of Sierra Leone.

B. Temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court

21. In addressing the question of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court as requested by the Security Council, a determination of the validity of the sweeping amnesty granted under the Lomé Peace Agreement of 7 July 1999 was first required. If valid, it would limit the temporal jurisdiction of the Court to offences committed after 7 July 1999; if invalid, it would make possible a determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court at any time in the pre-Lomé period.

1. The amnesty clause in the Lomé Peace Agreement

22. While recognizing that amnesty is an accepted legal concept and a gesture of peace and reconciliation at the end of a civil war or an internal armed conflict,[4] the United Nations has consistently maintained the position that amnesty cannot be granted in respect of international crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity or other serious violations of international humanitarian law.

23. At the time of the signature of the Lomé Peace Agreement, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sierra Leone was instructed to append to his signature on behalf of the United Nations a disclaimer to the effect that the amnesty provision contained in article IX of the Agreement ("absolute and free pardon") shall not apply to international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. This reservation is recalled by the Security Council in a preambular paragraph of resolution 1315 (2000).

24. In the negotiations on the Statute of the Special Court, the Government of Sierra Leone concurred with the position of the United Nations and agreed to the inclusion of an amnesty clause which would read as follows:

> "An amnesty granted to any person falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Court in respect of the crimes referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall not be a bar to prosecution."

With the denial of legal effect to the amnesty granted at Lomé, to the extent of its illegality under international law, the obstacle to the determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court within the pre-Lomé period has been removed.

2. Beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction

25. It is generally accepted that the decade-long civil war in Sierra Leone dates back to 1991, when on 23 March of that year forces of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) entered Sierra Leone from Liberia and launched a rebellion to overthrow the one-party military rule of the All People's Congress (APC). In determining a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court within the period since 23 March 1991, the Secretary-General has been guided by the following considerations: (a) the temporal jurisdiction should be reasonably limited in time so that the Prosecutor is not overburdened and the Court overloaded; (b) the beginning date should correspond to an event or a new phase in the conflict without necessarily having any political connotations; and (c) it should encompass the most serious crimes committed by persons of all political and military groups and in all geographical areas of the country. A temporal jurisdiction limited in any of these respects would rightly be perceived as a selective or discriminatory justice.

26. Imposing a temporal jurisdiction on the Special Court reaching back to 1991 would create a heavy burden for the prosecution and the Court. The following alternative dates were therefore considered as realistic options:

(a) 30 November 1996 — the conclusion of the Abidjan Peace Agreement, the first comprehensive Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF. Soon after its signature the Peace Agreement had collapsed and large-scale hostilities had resumed;

(b) 25 May 1997 — the date of the coup d'état orchestrated by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) against the Government that was democratically elected in early 1996. The period which ensued was characterized by serious violations of international humanitarian law, including, in particular, mass rape and abduction of women, forced recruitment of children and summary executions;

(c) 6 January 1999 — the date on which RUF/AFRC launched a military operation to take control of Freetown. The first three-week period of full control by these entities over Freetown marked the most intensified, systematic and widespread violations of human rights and international humanitarian law against the civilian population. During its retreat in February 1999, RUF abducted hundreds of young people, particularly young women used as forced labourers, fighting forces, human shields and sexual slaves.

27. In considering the three options for the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, the parties have concluded that the choice of 30 November 1996 would have the benefit of putting the Sierra Leone conflict in perspective without unnecessarily extending the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court. It would also ensure that the most serious crimes committed by all parties and armed groups would be encompassed within its jurisdiction. The choice of 25 May 1997 would have all these advantages, with the disadvantage of having a political connotation, implying, wrongly, that the prosecution of those responsible for the most serious violations of international humanitarian law is aimed at punishment for their participation in the coup d'état. The last option marks in many ways the peak of the campaign of systematic and widespread crimes against the civilian population, as experienced mostly by the inhabitants of Freetown. If the temporal jurisdiction of the Court were to be limited to that period only, it would exclude all crimes committed before that period in the rural areas and the countryside. In view of the perceived advantages of the first option and the disadvantages associated with the other options, the date of 30 November 1996 was selected as the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court, a decision in which the government negotiators have actively concurred.

28. As the armed conflict in various parts of the territory of Sierra Leone is still ongoing, it was decided that the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court should be left open-ended. The lifespan of the Special Court, however, as distinguished from its temporal jurisdiction, will be determined by a subsequent agreement between the parties upon the completion of its judicial activities, an indication of the capacity acquired by the local courts to assume the prosecution of the remaining cases, or the unavailability of resources. In setting an end to the operation of the Court, the Agreement would also determine all matters relating to enforcement of sentences, pardon or commutation, transfer of pending cases to the local courts and the disposition of the financial and other assets of the Special Court.

C. Personal jurisdiction

1. Persons "most responsible"

29. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the personal jurisdiction of the Special Court should extend to those "who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of the crimes", which is understood as an indication of a limitation on the number of accused by reference to their command authority and the gravity and scale of the crime. I propose, however, that the more general term "persons most responsible" should be used.

30. While those "most responsible" obviously include the political or military leadership, others in command authority down the chain of command may also be regarded "most responsible" judging by the severity of the crime or its massive scale. "Most responsible", therefore, denotes both a leadership or authority position of the accused, and a sense of the gravity, seriousness or massive scale of the crime. It must be seen, however, not as a test criterion or a distinct jurisdictional threshold, but as a guidance to the Prosecutor in the adoption of a prosecution strategy and in making decisions to prosecute in individual cases.

31. Within the meaning attributed to it in the present Statute, the term "most responsible" would not necessarily exclude children between 15 and 18 years of age. While it is inconceivable that children could be in a political or military leadership position (although in Sierra Leone the rank of "Brigadier" was often granted to children as young as 11 years), the gravity and seriousness of the crimes they have allegedly committed would allow for their inclusion within the jurisdiction of the Court.

2. Individual criminal responsibility at 15 years of age

32. The possible prosecution of children for crimes against humanity and war crimes presents a difficult moral dilemma. More than in any other conflict where children have been used as combatants, in Sierra Leone, child combatants were initially abducted, forcibly recruited, sexually abused, reduced to slavery of all kinds and trained, often under the influence of drugs, to kill, maim and burn. Though feared by many for their brutality, most if not all of these children have been subjected to a process of psychological and physical abuse and duress which has transformed them from victims into perpetrators.

33. The solution to this terrible dilemma with respect to the Special Court[5] could be found in a number of options: (a) determining a minimum age of 18 and exempting all persons under that age from accountability and individual criminal responsibility; (b) having children between 15 to 18 years of age, both victims and perpetrators, recount their story before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission or similar mechanisms, none of which is as yet functional; and (c) having them go through the judicial process of accountability without punishment, in a court of law providing all internationally recognized guarantees of juvenile justice.

34. The question of child prosecution was discussed at length with the Government of Sierra Leone both in New York and in Freetown. It was raised with all the interlocutors of the United Nations team: the members of the judiciary, members of the legal profession and the Ombudsman, and was vigorously debated with members of civil society, non-governmental organizations and institutions actively engaged in child-care and rehabilitation programmes.

35. The Government of Sierra Leone and representatives of Sierra Leone civil society clearly wish to see a process of judicial accountability for child combatants presumed responsible for the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was said that the people of Sierra Leone would not look kindly upon a court which failed to bring to justice children who committed crimes of that nature and spared them the judicial process of accountability. The international non-governmental organizations responsible for child-care and rehabilitation programmes, together with some of their national counterparts, however, were unanimous in their objection to any kind of judicial accountability for children below 18 years of age for fear that such a process would place at risk the entire rehabilitation programme so painstakingly achieved. While the extent to which this view represents the majority view of the people of Sierra Leone is debatable, it nevertheless underscores the importance of the child rehabilitation programme and the need to ensure that in the prosecution of children presumed responsible, the rehabilitation process of scores of other children is not endangered.

36. Given these highly diverging opinions, it is not easy to strike a balance between the interests at stake. I am mindful of the Security Council's recommendation that only those who bear "the greatest responsibility" should be prosecuted. However, in view of the most horrific aspects of the child combatancy in Sierra Leone, the employment of this term would not necessarily exclude persons of young age from the jurisdiction of the Court. I therefore thought that it would be most prudent to demonstrate to the Security Council for its consideration how provisions on prosecution of persons below the age of 18 — "children" within the definition of the Convention on the Rights of the Child — before an international jurisdiction could be formulated.[6] Therefore, in order to meet the concerns expressed by, in particular, those responsible for child care and rehabilitation programmes, article 15, paragraph 5, of the Statute contains the following provision:

> "In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk, and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability."

37. Furthermore, the Statute of the Special Court, in article 7 and throughout the text, contains internationally recognized standards of juvenile justice and guarantees that juvenile offenders are treated in dignity and with a sense of worth. Accordingly, the overall composition of the judges should reflect their experiences in a variety of fields, including in juvenile justice (article 13, para. 1); the Office of the Prosecutor should be staffed with persons experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice (article 15, para. 4). In a trial of a juvenile offender, the Special Court should, to the extent possible, order the immediate release of the accused, constitute a "Juvenile Chamber", order the separation of the trial of a juvenile from that of an adult, and provide all legal and other assistance and order protective measures to ensure the privacy of the juvenile. The penalty of imprisonment is excluded in the case of a juvenile offender, and a number of alternative options of correctional or educational nature are provided for instead.

38. Consequently, if the Council, also weighing in the moral-educational message to the present and next generation of children in Sierra Leone, comes to the conclusion that persons under the age of 18 should be eligible for prosecution, the statutory provisions elaborated will strike an appropriate balance between all conflicting interests and provide the necessary guarantees of juvenile justice. It should also be stressed that, ultimately, it will be for the Prosecutor to decide if, all things considered, action should be taken against a juvenile offender in any individual case.

IV. Organizational structure of the Special Court

39. Organizationally, the Special Court has been conceived as a self-contained entity, consisting of three organs: the Chambers (two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber), the Prosecutor's Office and the Registry. In the establishment of ad hoc international tribunals or special courts operating as separate institutions, independently of the relevant national legal system, it has proved to be necessary to comprise within one and the same entity all three organs. Like the two International Tribunals, the Special Court for Sierra Leone is established outside the national court system, and the inclusion of the Appeals Chamber within the same Court was thus the obvious choice.

A. The Chambers

40. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda should be addressed. In analysing this option from the legal and practical viewpoints, I have concluded that the sharing of a single Appeals Chamber between jurisdictions as diverse as the two International Tribunals and the Special Court for Sierra Leone is legally unsound and practically not feasible, without incurring unacceptably high administrative and financial costs.

41. While in theory the establishment of an overarching Appeals Chamber as the ultimate judicial authority in matters of interpretation and application of international humanitarian law offers a guarantee of developing a coherent body of law, in practice, the same result may be achieved by linking the jurisprudence of the Special Court to that of the International Tribunals, without imposing on the shared Appeals Chamber the financial and administrative constraints of a formal institutional link. Article 20, paragraph 3, of the Statute accordingly provides that the judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the Yugoslav and the Rwanda Tribunals; article 14, paragraph 1, of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Rwanda Tribunal shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the proceedings before the Special Court.

42. The sharing of one Appeals chamber between all three jurisdictions would strain the capacity of the already heavily burdened Appeals Chamber of the two Tribunals in ways which could either bring about the collapse of the appeals system as a whole, or delay beyond acceptable human rights standards the detention of accused pending the hearing of appeals from either or all jurisdictions. On the assumption that all judgements and sentencing decisions of the Trial Chambers of the Special Court will be appealed, as they have been in the cases of the two International Tribunals, and that the number of accused will be roughly the same as in each of the International Tribunals, the Appeals Chamber would be required to add to its current workload a gradual increase of approximately one third.

43. Faced with an exponential growth in the number of appeals lodged on judgements and interlocutory appeals in relation to an increasing number of accused and decisions rendered, the existing workload of the Appeals Chamber sitting in appeals from six Trial Chambers of the two ad hoc Tribunals is constantly growing. Based on current and anticipated growth in workload, existing trends[7] and the projected pace of three to six appeals on judgements every year, the Appeals Chamber has requested additional resources in funds and personnel. With the addition of two Trial Chambers of the Special Court, making a total of eight Trial Chambers for one Appeals Chamber, the burden on the Yugoslav and Rwanda Appeals Chamber would be untenable, and the Special Court would be deprived of an effective and viable appeals process.

44. The financial costs which would be entailed for the Appeals Chamber when sitting on appeals from the Special Court will have to be borne by the regular budget, regardless of the financial mechanism established for the Special Court itself. These financial costs would include also costs of translation into French, which is one of the working languages of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals; the working language of the Special Court will be English.

45. In his letter to the Legal Counsel in response to the request for comments on the eventuality of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the two international Tribunals with the Special Court, the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia wrote:

> "With regard to paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 1315 (2000), while the sharing of the Appeals Chamber of [the two International Tribunals] with that of the Special Court would bear the significant advantage of ensuring a better standardization of international humanitarian law, it appeared that the disadvantages of this option — excessive increase of the Appeals Chambers' workload, problems arising from the mixing of sources of law, problems caused by the increase in travelling by the judges of the Appeals Chambers and difficulties caused by mixing the different judges of the three tribunals — outweigh its benefits."[8]

46. For these reasons, the parties came to the conclusion that the Special Court should have two Trial Chambers, each with three judges, and an Appeals Chamber with five judges. Article 12, paragraph 4, provides for extra judges to sit on the bench in cases where protracted proceedings can be foreseen and it is necessary to make certain that the proceedings do not have to be discontinued in case one of the ordinary judges is unable to continue hearing the case.

B. The Prosecutor

47. An international prosecutor will be appointed by the Secretary-General to lead the investigations and prosecutions, with a Sierra Leonean Deputy. The appointment of an international prosecutor will guarantee that the Prosecutor is, and is seen to be, independent, objective and impartial.

C. The Registrar

48. The Registrar will service the Chambers and the Office of the Prosecutor and will have the responsibility for the financial management and external relations of the Court. The Registrar will be appointed by the Secretary-General as a staff member of the United Nations.

V. Enforcement of sentences

49. The possibility of serving prison sentences in third States is provided for in article 22 of the Statute. While imprisonment shall normally be served in Sierra Leone, particular circumstances, such as the security risk entailed in the continued imprisonment of some of the convicted persons on Sierra Leonean territory, may require their relocation to a third State.

50. Enforcement of sentences in third countries will be based on an agreement between the Special Court[9] and the State of enforcement. In seeking indications of the willingness of States to accept convicted persons, priority should be given to those which have already concluded similar agreements with either of the International Tribunals, as an indication that their prison facilities meet the minimum standards of conditions of detention. Although an agreement for the enforcement of sentences will be concluded between the Court and the State of enforcement, the wishes of the Government of Sierra Leone should be respected. In that connection, preference was expressed for such locations to be identified in an East African State.

VI. An alternative host country

51. In paragraph 7 of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of a possible alternative host State be addressed, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside its seat in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so required. As the efforts of the United Nations Secretariat, the Government of Sierra Leone and other interested Member States are currently focused on the establishment of the Special Court in Sierra Leone, it is proposed that the question of the alternative seat should be addressed in phases. An important element in proceeding with this issue is also the way in which the Security Council addresses the present report, that is, if a Chapter VII element is included.

52. In the first phase, criteria for the choice of the alternative seat should be determined and a range of potential host countries identified. An agreement, in principle, should be sought both from the Government of Sierra Leone for the transfer of the Special Court to the State of the alternative seat, and from the authorities of the latter, for the relocation of the seat to its territory.

53. In the second phase, a technical assessment team would be sent to identify adequate premises in the third State or States. Once identified, the three parties, namely, the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and the Government of the alternative seat, would conclude a Framework Agreement, or "an agreement to agree" for the transfer of the seat when circumstances so required. The Agreement would stipulate the nature of the circumstances which would require the transfer of the seat and an undertaking to conclude in such an eventuality a Headquarters Agreement. Such a principled Agreement would facilitate the transfer of the seat on an emergency basis and enable the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement soon thereafter.

54. In the choice of an alternative seat for the Special Court, the following considerations should be taken into account: the proximity to the place where the crimes were committed, and easy access to victims, witnesses and accused. Such proximity and easy access will greatly facilitate the work of the Prosecutor, who will continue to conduct his investigations in the territory of Sierra Leone.[10] During the negotiations, the Government expressed a preference for a West African alternative seat, in an English-speaking country sharing a common-law legal system.

VII. Practical arrangements for the operation of the Special Court

55. The Agreement and the Statute of the Special Court establish the legal and institutional framework of the Court and the mutual obligations of the parties with regard, in particular, to appointments to the Chambers, the Office of the Prosecutor and the Registry and, the provision of premises. However, the practical arrangements for the establishment and operation of the Special Court remain outside the scope of the Agreement in the sense that they depend on contributions of personnel, equipment, services and funds from Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. It is somewhat anomalous, therefore, that the parties which establish the Special Court, in practice, are dependent for the implementation of their treaty obligations on States and international organizations which are not parties to the Agreement or otherwise bound by its provisions.

56. Proceeding from the premise that voluntary contributions would constitute the financial mechanism of the Special Court, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include in the report recommendations regarding the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the Special Court, contributions in personnel, the kind of advice and expertise expected of the two ad hoc Tribunals, and the type of support and technical assistance to be provided by UNAMSIL. In considering the estimated requirements of the Special Court in all of these respects, it must be borne in mind that at the current stage, the Government of Sierra Leone is unable to contribute in any significant way to the operational costs of the Special Court, other than in the provision of premises, which would require substantial refurbishment, and the appointment of personnel, some of whom may not even be Sierra Leonean nationals. The requirements set out below should therefore be understood for all practical purposes as requirements that have to be met through contributions from sources other than the Government of Sierra Leone.

A. Estimated requirements of the Special Court for the first operational phase

1. Personnel and equipment

57. The personnel requirements of the Special Court for the initial operational phase[11] are estimated to include:

(a) Eight Trial Chamber judges (3 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge in each Chamber) and 6 Appeals Chamber judges (5 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge), 1 law clerk, 2 support staff for each Chamber and 1 security guard detailed to each judge (14);

(b) A Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor, 20 investigators, 20 prosecutors and 26 support staff;

(c) A Registrar, a Deputy Registrar, 27 administrative support staff and 40 security officers;

(d) Four staff in the Victims and Witnesses Unit;

(e) One correction officer and 12 security officers in the detention facilities.

58. Based on the United Nations scale of salaries for a one-year period, the personnel requirements along with the corresponding equipment and vehicles are estimated on a very preliminary basis to be US$ 22 million. The calculation of the personnel requirements is premised on the assumption that all persons appointed (whether by the United Nations or the Government of Sierra Leone) will be paid from United Nations sources.

59. In seeking qualified personnel from States Members of the United Nations, the importance of obtaining such personnel from members of the Commonwealth, sharing the same language and common-law legal system, has been recognized. The Office of Legal Affairs has therefore approached the Commonwealth Secretariat with a request to identify possible candidates for the positions of judges, prosecutors, Registrar, investigators and administrative support staff. How many of the Commonwealth countries would be in a position to voluntarily contribute such personnel with their salaries and emoluments is an open question. A request similar to that which has been made to the Commonwealth will also be made to the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS).

2. Premises

60. The second most significant component of the requirements of the Court for the first operational phase is the cost of premises. During its visit to Freetown, the United Nations team visited a number of facilities and buildings which the Government believes may accommodate the Special Court and its detention facilities: the High Court of Sierra Leone, the Miatta Conference Centre and an adjacent hotel, the Presidential Lodge, the Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison), and the New England Prison. In evaluating their state of operation, the team concluded that none of the facilities offered were suitable or could be made operational without substantial investment. The use of the existing High Court would incur the least expenditure (estimated at $1.5 million); but would considerably disrupt the ordinary schedule of the Court and eventually bring it to a halt. Since it is located in central Freetown, the use of the High Court would pose, in addition, serious security risks. The use of the Conference Centre, the most secure site visited, would require large-scale renovation, estimated at $5.8 million. The Presidential Lodge was ruled out on security grounds.

61. In the light of the above, the team has considered the option of constructing a prefabricated, self-contained compound on government land. This option would have the advantage of an easy expansion paced with the growth of the Special Court, a salvage value at the completion of the activities of the Court, the prospect of a donation in kind and construction at no rental costs. The estimated cost of this option is $2.9 million.

62. The two detention facilities visited by the team were found to be inadequate in their current state. The Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison) was ruled out for lack of space and security reasons. The New England Prison would be a possible option at an estimated renovation cost of $600,000.

63. The estimated cost requirements of personnel and premises set out in the present report cover the two most significant components of its prospective budget for the first operational stage. Not included in the present report are the general operational costs of the Special Court and of the detention facilities; costs of prosecutorial and investigative activities; conference services, including the employment of court translators from and into English, Krio and other tribal languages; and defence counsel, to name but a few.

B. Expertise and advice from the two International Tribunals

64. The kind of advice and expertise which the two International Tribunals may be expected to share with the Special Court for Sierra Leone could take the form of any or all of the following: consultations among judges of both jurisdictions on matters of mutual interest; training of prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff of the Special Court in The Hague, Kigali and Arusha, and training of such personnel on the spot by a team of prosecutors, investigators and administrators from both Tribunals; advice on the requirements for a Court library and assistance in its establishment, and sharing of information, documents, judgements and other relevant legal material on a continuous basis.

65. Both International Tribunals have expressed willingness to share their experience in all of these respects with the Special Court. They have accordingly offered to convene regular meetings with the judges of the Special Court to assist in adopting and formulating Rules of Procedure based on experience acquired in the practice of both Tribunals; to train personnel of the Special Court in The Hague and Arusha to enable them to acquire practical knowledge of the operation of an international tribunal; and when necessary, to temporarily deploy experienced staff, including a librarian, to the Special Court. In addition, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has offered to provide to the Special Court legal material in the form of CD-ROMs containing motions, decisions, judgements, court orders and the like. The transmission of such material to the Special Court in the period pending the establishment of a full-fledged library would be of great assistance.

C. Support and technical assistance from UNAMSIL

66. The support and technical assistance of UNAMSIL in providing security, logistics, administrative support and temporary accommodation would be necessary in the first operational phase of the Special Court. In the precarious security situation now prevailing in Sierra Leone and given the state of the national security forces, UNAMSIL represents the only credible force capable of providing adequate security to the personnel and the premises of the Special Court. The specificities of the security measures required would have to be elaborated by the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and UNAMSIL, it being understood, however, that any such additional tasks entrusted to UNAMSIL would have to be approved by the Security Council and reflected in a revised mandate with a commensurate increase in financial, staff and other resources.

67. UNAMSIL's administrative support could be provided in the areas of finance, personnel and procurement. Utilizing the existing administrative support in UNAMSIL, including, when feasible, shared facilities and communication systems, would greatly facilitate the start-up phase of the Special Court and reduce the overall resource requirements. In that connection, limited space at the headquarters of UNAMSIL could be made available for the temporary accommodation of the Office of the Prosecutor, pending the establishment or refurbishment of a site for the duration of the Special Court.

VIII. Financial mechanism of the Special Court

68. In paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include recommendations on "the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the special court, including through the offer of expert personnel that may be needed from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations". It would thus seem that the intention of the Council is that a Special Court for Sierra Leone would be financed from voluntary contributions. Implicit in the Security Council resolution, therefore, given the paucity of resources available to the Government of Sierra Leone, was the intention that most if not all operational costs of the Special Court would be borne by States Members of the Organization in the form of voluntary contributions.

69. The experience gained in the operation of the two ad hoc International Tribunals provides an indication of the scope, costs and long-term duration of the judicial activities of an international jurisdiction of this kind. While the Special Court differs from the two Tribunals in its nature and legal status, the similarity in the kind of crimes committed, the temporal, territorial and personal scope of jurisdiction, the number of accused, the organizational structure of the Court and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence suggest a similar scope and duration of operation and a similar need for a viable and sustainable financial mechanism.

70. A financial mechanism based entirely on voluntary contributions will not provide the assured and continuous source of funding which would be required to appoint the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, to contract the services of all administrative and support staff and to purchase the necessary equipment. The risks associated with the establishment of an operation of this kind with insufficient funds, or without long-term assurances of continuous availability of funds, are very high, in terms of both moral responsibility and loss of credibility of the Organization, and its exposure to legal liability. In entering into contractual commitments which the Special Court and, vicariously, the Organization might not be able to honour, the United Nations would expose itself to unlimited third-party liability. A special court based on voluntary contributions would be neither viable nor sustainable.

71. In my view, the only realistic solution is financing through assessed contributions. This would produce a viable and sustainable financial mechanism affording secure and continuous funding. It is understood, however, that the financing of the Special Court through assessed contributions of the Member States would for all practical purposes transform a treaty-based court into a United Nations organ governed in its financial and administrative activities by the relevant United Nations financial and staff regulations and rules.

72. The Security Council may wish to consider an alternative solution, based on the concept of a "national jurisdiction" with international assistance, which would rely on the existing — however inadequate — Sierra Leonean court system, both in terms of premises (for the Court and the detention facilities) and administrative support. The judges, prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff would be contributed by interested States. The legal basis for the special "national" court would be a national law, patterned on the Statute as agreed between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone (the international crimes being automatically incorporated into the Sierra Leonean common-law system). Since the mandate of the Secretary-General is to recommend measures consistent with resolution 1315 (2000), the present report does not elaborate further on this alternative other than to merely note its existence.

IX. Conclusion

73. At the request of the Security Council, the present report sets out the legal framework and practical arrangements for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone. It describes the requirements of the Special Court in terms of funds, personnel and services and underscores the acute need for a viable financial mechanism to sustain it for the duration of its lifespan. It concludes that assessed contributions is the only viable and sustainable financial mechanism of the Special Court.

74. As the Security Council itself has recognized, in the past circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in that country. In reviewing the present report and considering what further action must be taken, the Council should bear in mind the expectations that have been created and the state of urgency that permeates all discussions of the problem of impunity in Sierra Leone.

Notes

[1] At the request of the Government, reference in the Statute and the Agreement to "Sierra Leonean judges" was replaced by "judges appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone". This would allow the Government flexibility of choice between Sierra Leonean and non-Sierra Leonean nationals and broaden the range of potential candidates from within and outside Sierra Leone.

[2] In the case of the Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, the non-inclusion in any position of nationals of the country most directly affected was considered a condition for the impartiality, objectivity and neutrality of the Tribunal.

[3] This method may not be advisable, since the Court would be manned by a substantial number of staff and financed through voluntary contributions in the amount of millions of dollars every year.

[4] Article 6, paragraph 5, of the 1977 Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions and Relating to the Protection of Non-international Armed Conflicts provides that:

> "At the end of hostilities, the authorities in power shall endeavour to grant the broadest possible amnesty to persons who have participated in the armed conflict, or those deprived of their liberty for reasons related to the armed conflict, whether they are interned or detained."

[5] The jurisdiction of the national courts of Sierra Leone is not limited by the Statute, except in cases where they have to defer to the Special Court.

[6] While there is no international law standard for the minimum age for criminal responsibility, the ICC Statute excludes from the jurisdiction of the Court persons under the age of 18. In so doing, however, it was not the intention of its drafters to establish, in general, a minimum age for individual criminal responsibility. Premised on the notion of complementarity between national courts and ICC, it was intended that persons under 18 presumed responsible for the crimes for which the ICC had jurisdiction would be brought before their national courts, if the national law in question provides for such jurisdiction over minors.

[7] The Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has so far disposed of a total of 5 appeals from judgements and 44 interlocutory appeals; and the Appeals Chamber of the Rwanda Tribunal of only 1 judgement on the merits with 28 interlocutory appeals.

[8] Letter addressed to Mr. Hans Corell, Under-Secretary-General, The Legal Counsel, from Judge Claude Jorda, President of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, dated 29 August 2000.

[9] Article 10 of the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government endows the Special Court with a treaty-making power "to enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court".

[10] Criteria for the choice of the seat of the Rwanda Tribunal were drawn up by the Security Council in its resolution 955 (1994). The Security Council decided that the seat of the International Tribunal shall be determined by the Council "having regard to considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, including access to witnesses, and economy".

[11] It is important to stress that this estimate should be regarded as an illustration of a possible scenario. Not until the Registrar and the Prosecutor are in place will it be possible to make detailed and precise estimates.

Annex

Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone

Whereas the Security Council, in its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, expressed deep concern at the very serious crimes committed within the territory of Sierra Leone against the people of Sierra Leone and United Nations and associated personnel and at the prevailing situation of impunity;

Whereas by the said resolution, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes committed under Sierra Leonean law;

Whereas the Secretary-General of the United Nations (hereinafter "the Secretary-General") and the Government of Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Government") have held such negotiations for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court");

Now therefore the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone have agreed as follows:

Article 1
Establishment of the Special Court

1. There is hereby established a Special Court for Sierra Leone to prosecute persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

2. The Special Court shall function in accordance with the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. The Statute is annexed to this Agreement and forms an integral part thereof.

Article 2
Composition of the Special Court and appointment of judges

1. The Special Court shall be composed of two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber.

2. The Chambers shall be composed of eleven independent judges who shall serve as follows:

(a) Three judges shall serve in each of the Trial Chambers, of whom one shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and two judges appointed by the Secretary-General upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General;

(b) Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber, of whom two shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone and three judges shall be appointed by the Secretary-General upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General.

3. The Government of Sierra Leone and the Secretary-General shall consult on the appointment of judges.

4. Judges shall be appointed for a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment.

5. In addition to the judges sitting in the Chambers and present at every stage of the proceedings, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate an alternate judge appointed by either the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General to be present at each stage of the trial and to replace a judge if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Article 3
Appointment of a Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor

1. The Secretary-General, after consultation with the Government of Sierra Leone, shall appoint a Prosecutor for a four-year term. The Prosecutor shall be eligible for reappointment.

2. The Government of Sierra Leone, in consultation with the Secretary-General and the Prosecutor, shall appoint a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor to assist the Prosecutor in the conduct of the investigations and prosecutions.

3. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence and extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecution of criminal cases. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be independent in the performance of their functions and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by such Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently.

Article 4
Appointment of a Registrar

1. The Secretary-General, in consultation with the President of the Special Court, shall appoint a Registrar who shall be responsible for the servicing of the Chambers and the Office of the Prosecutor, and for the recruitment and administration of all support staff. He or she shall also administer the financial and staff resources of the Special Court.

2. The Registrar shall be a staff member of the United Nations. He or she shall serve a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Article 5
Premises

The Government shall provide the premises for the Special Court and such utilities, facilities and other services as may be necessary for its operation.

Article 6
Expenses of the Special Court[a]

The expenses of the Special Court shall ...

Article 7
Inviolability of premises, archives and all other documents

1. The premises of the Special Court shall be inviolable. The competent authorities shall take whatever action may be necessary to ensure that the Special Court shall not be dispossessed of all or any part of the premises of the Court without its express consent.

2. The property, funds and assets of the Special Court, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be immune from search, seizure, requisition, confiscation, expropriation and any other form of interference, whether by executive, administrative, judicial or legislative action.

3. The archives of the Court, and in general all documents and materials made available, belonging to or used by it, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be inviolable.

Article 8
Funds, assets and other property

1. The Special Court, its funds, assets and other property, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process, except insofar as in any particular case the Court has expressly waived its immunity. It is understood, however, that no waiver of immunity shall extend to any measure of execution.

2. Without being restricted by financial controls, regulations or moratoriums of any kind, the Special Court:

(a) May hold and use funds, gold or negotiable instruments of any kind and maintain and operate accounts in any currency and convert any currency held by it into any other currency;

(b) Shall be free to transfer its funds, gold or currency from one country to another, or within Sierra Leone, to the United Nations or any other agency.

Article 9
Seat of the Special Court

The Special Court shall have its seat in Sierra Leone. The Court may meet away from its seat if it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions, and may be relocated outside Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require, and subject to the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone, on the one hand, and the Government of the alternative seat, on the other.

[a] The formulation of this article is dependent on a decision on the financial mechanism of the Special Court.

Article 10
Juridical capacity

The Special Court shall possess the juridical capacity necessary to:

(a) Contract;

(b) Acquire and dispose of movable and immovable property;

(c) Institute legal proceedings;

(d) Enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court.

Article 11
Privileges and immunities of the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar

1. The judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, together with their families forming part of their household, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities, exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic agents in accordance with the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. They shall, in particular, enjoy:

(a) Personal inviolability, including immunity from arrest or detention;

(b) Immunity from criminal, civil and administrative jurisdiction in conformity with the Vienna Convention;

(c) Inviolability for all papers and documents;

(d) Exemption, as appropriate, from immigration restrictions and other alien registrations;

(e) The same immunities and facilities in respect of their personal baggage as are accorded to diplomatic agents by the Vienna Convention;

(f) Exemption from taxation in Sierra Leone on their salaries, emoluments and allowances.

2. Privileges and immunities are accorded to the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar in the interest of the Special Court and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves. The right and the duty to waive the immunity, in any case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded, shall lie with the Secretary-General, in consultation with the President.

Article 12
Privileges and immunities of international and Sierra Leonean personnel

1. Sierra Leonean and international personnel of the Special Court shall be accorded:

(a) Immunity from legal process in respect of words spoken or written and all acts performed by them in their official capacity. Such immunity shall continue to be accorded after termination of employment with the Special Court;

(b) Immunity from taxation on salaries, allowances and emoluments paid to them.

2. International personnel shall, in addition thereto, be accorded:

(a) Immunity from immigration restriction;

(b) The right to import free of duties and taxes, except for payment for services, their furniture and effects at the time of first taking up their official duties in Sierra Leone.

3. The privileges and immunities are granted to the officials of the Special Court in the interest of the Court and not for their personal benefit. The right and the duty to waive the immunity in any particular case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded shall lie with the Registrar of the Court.

Article 13
Counsel

1. The Government shall ensure that the counsel of a suspect or an accused who has been admitted as such by the Special Court shall not be subjected to any measure which may affect the free and independent exercise of his or her functions.

2. In particular, the counsel shall be accorded:

(a) Immunity from personal arrest or detention and from seizure of personal baggage;

(b) Inviolability of all documents relating to the exercise of his or her functions as a counsel of a suspect or accused;

(c) Immunity from criminal or civil jurisdiction in respect of words spoken or written and acts performed in his or her capacity as counsel. Such immunity shall continue to be accorded after termination of his or her functions as a counsel of a suspect or accused.

Article 14
Witnesses and experts

Witnesses and experts appearing from outside Sierra Leone on a summons or a request of the judges or the Prosecutor shall not be prosecuted, detained or subjected to any restriction on their liberty by the Sierra Leonean authorities. They shall not be subjected to any measure which may affect the free and independent exercise of their functions.

Article 15
Security, safety and protection of persons referred to in this Agreement

Recognizing the responsibility of the Government under international law to ensure the security, safety and protection of persons referred to in this Agreement and its present incapacity to do so pending the restructuring and rebuilding of its security forces, it is agreed that the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone shall provide the necessary security to premises and personnel of the Special Court, subject to an appropriate mandate by the Security Council and within its capabilities.

Article 16
Cooperation with the Special Court

1. The Government shall cooperate with all organs of the Special Court at all stages of the proceedings. It shall, in particular, facilitate access to the Prosecutor to sites, persons and relevant documents required for the investigation.

2. The Government shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance by the Special Court or an order issued by the Chambers, including, but not limited to:

(a) Identification and location of persons;

(b) Service of documents;

(c) Arrest or detention of persons;

(d) Transfer of an indictee to the Court.

Article 17
Working language

The official working language of the Special Court shall be English.

Article 18
Practical arrangements

1. With a view to achieving efficiency and cost-effectiveness in the operation of the Special Court, a phased-in approach shall be adopted for its establishment in accordance with the chronological order of the legal process.

2. In the first phase of the operation of the Special Court, judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar will be appointed along with investigative and prosecutorial staff. The process of investigations and prosecutions and the trial process of those already in custody shall then be initiated. While the judges of the Appeals Chamber shall serve whenever the Appeals Chamber is seized of a matter, they shall take office shortly before the trial process has been completed.

Article 19
Settlement of disputes

Any dispute between the Parties concerning the interpretation or application of this Agreement shall be settled by negotiation, or by any other mutually agreed-upon mode of settlement.

Article 20
Entry into force

The present Agreement shall enter into force on the day after both Parties have notified each other in writing that the legal instruments for entry into force have been complied with.

DONE at [place] on [day, month] 2000 in two copies in the English language.

For the United Nations | For the Government of Sierra Leone

Enclosure

Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone

Having been established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone pursuant to Security Council resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court") shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 1
Competence of the Special Court

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

Article 2
Crimes against humanity

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed the following crimes as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population:

(a) Murder;

(b) Extermination;

(c) Enslavement;

(d) Deportation;

(e) Imprisonment;

(f) Torture;

(g) Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy and any other form of sexual violence;

(h) Persecution on political, racial, ethnic or religious grounds;

(i) Other inhumane acts.

Article 3
Violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed or ordered the commission of serious violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include:

(a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

(b) Collective punishments;

(c) Taking of hostages;

(d) Acts of terrorism;

(e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

(f) Pillage;

(g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples;

(h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

Article 4
Other serious violations of international humanitarian law

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed the following serious violations of international humanitarian law:

(a) Intentionally directing attacks against the civilian population as such or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities;

(b) Intentionally directing attacks against personnel, installations, material, units or vehicles involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, as long as they are entitled to the protection given to civilians or civilian objects under the international law of armed conflict;

(c) Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

Article 5
Crimes under Sierra Leonean law

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who have committed the following crimes under Sierra Leonean law:

(a) Offences relating to the abuse of girls under the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1926 (Cap. 31):

(i) Abusing a girl under 13 years of age, contrary to section 6;

(ii) Abusing a girl between 13 and 14 years of age, contrary to section 7;

(iii) Abduction of a girl for immoral purposes, contrary to section 12.

(b) Offences relating to the wanton destruction of property under the Malicious Damage Act, 1861:

(i) Setting fire to dwelling-houses, any person being therein to section 2;

(ii) Setting fire to public buildings, contrary to sections 5 and 6;

(iii) Setting fire to other buildings, contrary to section 6.

Article 6
Individual criminal responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2. The official position of any accused persons, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Special Court determines that justice so requires.

5. Individual criminal responsibility for the crimes referred to in article 5 shall be determined in accordance with the respective laws of Sierra Leone.

Article 7
Jurisdiction over persons of 15 years of age

1. The Special Court shall have jurisdiction over persons who were 15 years of age at the time of the alleged commission of the crime.

2. At all stages of the proceedings, including investigation, prosecution and adjudication, an accused below the age of 18 (hereinafter "a juvenile offender") shall be treated with dignity and a sense of worth, taking into account his or her young age and the desirability of promoting his or her rehabilitation, reintegration into and assumption of a constructive role in society.

3. In a trial of a juvenile offender, the Special Court shall:

(a) Consider, as a priority, the release of the juvenile, unless his or her safety and security requires that the juvenile offender be placed under close supervision or in a remand home; detention pending trial shall be used as a measure of last resort;

(b) Constitute a "Juvenile Chamber" composed of at least one sitting judge and one alternate judge possessing the required qualifications and experience in juvenile justice;

(c) Order the separation of his or her trial, if jointly accused with adults;

(d) Provide the juvenile with the legal, social and any other assistance in the preparation and presentation of his or her defence, including the participation in legal proceedings of the juvenile offender's parent or legal guardian;

(e) Provide protective measures to ensure the privacy of the juvenile; such measures shall include, but not be limited to, the protection of the juvenile's identity, or the conduct of in camera proceedings;

(f) In the disposition of his or her case, order any of the following: care guidance and supervision orders, community service orders, counselling, foster care, correctional, educational and vocational training programmes, approved schools and, as appropriate, any programmes of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration or programmes of child protection agencies.

Article 8
Concurrent jurisdiction

1. The Special Court and the national courts of Sierra Leone shall have concurrent jurisdiction.

2. The Special Court shall have primacy over the national courts of Sierra Leone. At any stage of the procedure, the Special Court may formally request a national court to defer to its competence in accordance with the present Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

Article 9
Non bis in idem

1. No person shall be tried before a national court of Sierra Leone for acts for which he or she has already been tried by the Special Court.

2. A person who has been tried by a national court for the acts referred to in articles 2 and 4 of the present Statute may be subsequently tried by the Special Court if:

(a) The act for which he or she was tried was characterized as an ordinary crime; or

(b) The national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted.

3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the Special Court shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 10
Amnesty

An amnesty granted to any person falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Court in respect of the crimes referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall not be a bar to prosecution.

Article 11
Organization of the Special Court

The Special Court shall consist of the following organs:

(a) The Chambers, comprising two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber;

(b) The Prosecutor; and

(c) The Registry.

Article 12
Composition of the Chambers

1. The Chambers shall be composed of eleven independent judges, who shall serve as follows:

(a) Three judges shall serve in each of the Trial Chambers, of whom one shall be a judge appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and two judges appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations (hereinafter "the Secretary-General");

(b) Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber, of whom two shall be judges appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone, and three judges appointed by the Secretary-General.

2. Each judge shall serve only in the Chamber to which he or she has been appointed.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber and the judges of the Trial Chambers, respectively, shall elect a presiding judge who shall conduct the proceedings in the Chamber to which he or she was elected. The presiding judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be the President of the Special Court.

4. In addition to the judges sitting in the Chambers and present at every stage of the proceedings, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate an alternate judge appointed by either the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General, to be present at each stage of the trial, and to replace a judge, if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Article 13
Qualification and appointment of judges

1. The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. They shall be independent in the performance of their functions, and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

2. In the overall composition of the Chambers, due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law, criminal law and juvenile justice.

3. The judges shall be appointed for a four-year period and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Article 14
Rules of Procedure and Evidence

1. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda obtaining at the time of the establishment of the Special Court shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the conduct of the legal proceedings before the Special Court.

2. The judges of the Special Court as a whole may amend the Rules of Procedure and Evidence or adopt additional rules where the applicable Rules do not, or do not adequately, provide for a specific situation. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1965, of Sierra Leone.

Article 15
The Prosecutor

1. The Prosecutor shall be responsible for the investigation and prosecution of persons most responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes under Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Special Court. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source.

2. The Office of the Prosecutor shall have the power to question suspects, victims and witnesses, to collect evidence and to conduct on-site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leonean authorities concerned.

3. The Prosecutor shall be appointed by the Secretary-General for a four-year term and shall be eligible for reappointment. He or she shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence and have extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecution of criminal cases.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor, and by such other Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently. Given the nature of the crimes committed and the particular sensitivities of girls, young women and children victims of rape, sexual assault, abduction and slavery of all kinds, due consideration should be given in the appointment of staff to the employment of prosecutors and investigators experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice.

5. In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability.

Article 16
The Registry

1. The Registry shall be responsible for the administration and servicing of the Special Court.

2. The Registry shall consist of a Registrar and such other staff as may be required.

3. The Registrar shall be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the President of the Special Court and shall be a staff member of the United Nations. He or she shall serve for a four-year term and be eligible for reappointment.

4. The Registrar shall set up a Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry. This Unit shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court and others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witnesses. The Unit personnel shall include experts in trauma, including trauma related to crimes of sexual violence and violence against children.

Article 17
Rights of the accused

1. All accused shall be equal before the Special Court.

2. The accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to measures ordered by the Special Court for the protection of victims and witnesses.

3. The accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the provisions of the present Statute.

4. In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, he or she shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a) To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he or she understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him or her;

(b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence and to communicate with counsel of his or her own choosing;

(c) To be tried without undue delay;

(d) To be tried in his or her presence, and to defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(e) To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her;

(f) To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the Special Court;

(g) Not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt.

Article 18
Judgement

The judgement shall be rendered by a majority of the judges of the Trial Chamber or of the Appeals Chamber, and shall be delivered in public. It shall be accompanied by a reasoned opinion in writing, to which separate or dissenting opinions may be appended.

Article 19
Penalties

1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Article 20
Appellate proceedings

1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by a Trial Chamber or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:

(a) A procedural error;

(b) An error on a question of law invalidating the decision;

(c) An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chamber.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. In the interpretation and application of the laws of Sierra Leone, they shall be guided by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone.

Article 21
Review proceedings

1. Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known at the time of the proceedings before the Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber and which could have been a decisive factor in reaching the decision, the convicted person or the Prosecutor may submit an application for review of the judgement.

2. An application for review shall be submitted to the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber may reject the application if it considers it to be unfounded. If it determines that the application is meritorious, it may, as appropriate:

(a) Reconvene the Trial Chamber;

(b) Retain jurisdiction over the matter.

Article 22
Enforcement of sentences

1. Imprisonment shall be served in Sierra Leone. If circumstances so require, imprisonment may also be served in any of the States which have concluded with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda or the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia an agreement for the enforcement of sentences, and which have indicated to the Registrar of the Special Court their willingness to accept convicted persons. The Special Court may conclude similar agreements for the enforcement of sentences with other States.

2. Conditions of imprisonment, whether in Sierra Leone or in a third State, shall be governed by the law of the State of enforcement subject to the supervision of the Special Court. The State of enforcement shall be bound by the duration of the sentence, subject to article 23 of the present Statute.

Article 23
Pardon or commutation of sentences

If, pursuant to the applicable law of the State in which the convicted person is imprisoned, he or she is eligible for pardon or commutation of sentence, the State concerned shall notify the Special Court accordingly. There shall only be pardon or commutation of sentence if the President of the Special Court, in consultation with the judges, so decides on the basis of the interests of justice and the general principles of law.

Article 24
Working language

The working language of the Special Court shall be English.

Article 25
Annual report

The President of the Special Court shall submit an annual report on the operation and activities of the Court to the Secretary-General and to the Government of Sierra Leone.

ANNEX 17:

Letter dated 22 December 2000 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General, U.N. Doc. S/2000/1234, 22 December 2000.

6284

United Nations S/2000/1234

Security Council

Distr.: General
22 December 2000

Original: English

Letter dated 22 December 2000 from the President of the Security Council addressed to the Secretary-General

The members of the Security Council have carefully reviewed your report of 4 October 2000 on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (S/2000/915). The Council members wish to convey their deep appreciation for the observations and recommendations set forth in your report.

The members of the Security Council reaffirm their support for resolution 1315 (2000) and its reiteration that the situation in Sierra Leone constitutes a threat to international peace and security. With the objective of conforming to resolution 1315 (2000) and related concerns, and subject to the agreement of the Government of Sierra Leone as necessary and appropriate, the members of the Council suggest that the draft Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and the proposed Statute of the Court be amended to incorporate the views set forth below.

1. Personal jurisdiction. The members of the Security Council continue to hold the view, as expressed in resolution 1315 (2000), that the Special Court for Sierra Leone should have personal jurisdiction over persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of crimes, including crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, as well as crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone. The members of the Security Council believe that, by thus limiting the focus of the Special Court to those who played a leadership role, the simpler and more general formulations suggested in the appended draft will be appropriate. It is the view of the members of the Council that the Truth and Reconciliation Commission will have a major role to play in the case of juvenile offenders, and the members of the Security Council encourage the Government of Sierra Leone and the United Nations to develop suitable institutions, including specific provisions related to children, to this end. The members of the Security Council believe that it is the responsibility of Member States who have sent peacekeepers to Sierra Leone to investigate and prosecute any crimes they may have allegedly committed. Given the circumstances of the situation in Sierra Leone, the Special Court would have jurisdiction over those crimes only if the Security Council considers that the Member State is not discharging that responsibility. Therefore, Council members propose the inclusion of language in the Agreement to be concluded between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and in the Statute of the Special Court to that effect.

00-81277 (E) 221200
0081277

2. Funding. Pursuant to resolution 1315 (2000), members of the Security Council support the creation of a Special Court for Sierra Leone funded through voluntary contributions. Such contributions shall take the form of funds, equipment and services, including the offer of expert personnel that may be needed from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations. It is understood that you cannot be expected to create any institution for which you do not have adequate funds in hand for at least 12 months and pledges to cover anticipated expenses for a second year of the Court's operation.

In order to assist the Court on questions of funding and administration, it is suggested that the arrangements between the Government of Sierra Leone and the United Nations provide for a management or oversight committee which could include representatives of Sierra Leone, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Court and interested voluntary contributors. The management committee would assist the court in obtaining adequate funding, provide advice on matters of Court administration and be available as appropriate to consult on other non-judicial matters.

3. Court size. The members of the Security Council do not believe the creation of two Trial Chambers and the use of alternate judges as proposed in your report is necessary, at least not from the very outset. The Special Court should begin its work with a single Trial Chamber, with the possibility of adding a second Chamber should the developing caseload warrant its creation. Council members also question the provision in the draft Agreement and Statute calling for alternate judges. It should be noted in this connection that neither the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia nor the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda employs alternate judges.

The members suggest the following further adjustments of a technical or drafting nature to the Agreement: Add an express provision to article 13 as a new subparagraph (d) under paragraph 2, concerning immigration restrictions; to article 14 concerning witnesses and experts; and to article 4 (c) of the Statute of the Court, modifying it so as to conform it to the statement of the law existing in 1996 and as currently accepted by the international community.

The members of the Security Council express their hope that you will concur with the proposals outlined above and adjust the draft Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and the Statute of the Court as expeditiously as possible, along the above lines and as indicated in the attached annex.

(Signed) Sergey Lavrov
President of the Security Council

ANNEX 18:

Letter dated 12 July 2001 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, U.N. Doc.S/2001/693, 13 July 2001.

United Nations S/2001/693

Security Council

Distr.: General
13 July 2001

Original: English

Letter dated 12 July 2001 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council

Members of the Security Council will recall that, following the submission of the report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (S/2000/915) on 4 October 2000, letters were exchanged between the Council and the Secretary-General on 22 December 2000 (S/2000/1234), 12 January 2001 (S/2001/40) and 31 January 2001 (S/2001/95), which led to modifications in the text of both the draft Agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone and the draft statute of the Court. The Government of Sierra Leone was consulted on these changes and by letter of 9 February 2001 to the Legal Counsel expressed its willingness to accept the texts.

As agreed, however, between members of the Council and the Secretary-General, implementation of the revised Agreement would commence only after it could be ascertained that sufficient contributions were in hand to finance the establishment of the Court and 12 months of its operation, and pledges equal to the anticipated expenses of the following 24 months. At that time also, the Secretary-General and the Government of Sierra Leone would conclude the Agreement on the Establishment of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, thus establishing the legal framework for the commencement of the operation.

On 23 March 2001, I launched an appeal to all States to make contributions in funds, personnel and services to the Special Court for Sierra Leone. The estimated requirements for the establishment and first year of operation of the Court and for the following 24 months, based on the application of the United Nations Financial Regulations and Rules and the Staff Regulations and Rules, amounted to $30.2 million and $84.4 million, respectively, and a total of $114.6 million.

With the start of the appeal period of 60 days, a process of regular informal consultations between the Secretariat and a group of interested States was initiated by the Legal Counsel. The purpose of those consultations was to discuss the practical arrangements for the establishment and operation of the Special Court, in particular the establishment of a Management Committee, elements of the budget estimates, the level of posts and scale of salaries for international and local personnel, and premises for the Court. In the course of these meetings it became apparent that the financial parameters had been substantially reduced, and that the amount of contributions likely to be made available for the start-up phase and the first year of operation of the Court would range between $15 million and $18 million only.

01-45550 (E) 130701
0145550

Concerned about the viability of a Special Court budgeted at a reduced level, I invited the 15 members of the Security Council to an informal meeting on 1 June 2001. Different views were expressed at that meeting on the need to downsize the operation of the Special Court commensurate with the amount of funds likely to be made available. Members of the Council reiterated their understanding that, without prejudice to the independence of the Prosecutor, the personal jurisdiction of the Special Court remains limited to the few who bear the greatest responsibility for the crimes committed. At my suggestion, it was agreed to continue the discussion on revising the concept of operation of the Special Court in a small working group consisting of interested States and a Secretariat team. On 14 June 2001, the Secretariat presented to the group of interested States revised budget estimates amounting approximately to $57 million for the first three years of operation of the Court, with $16.8 million for the first year.

The revised budget estimates reflect a scaled-down operation of the Special Court, while maintaining its nature and sui generis character, international standards of justice and the applicable law. A combination of factors including a different basis for calculation of salaries, a reduction in the normal rates of programme backstopping and contingency requirements, as well as a reliance on Sierra Leonean institutions and personnel, and on UNAMSIL administrative and security capacity, at least in the initial start-up phase, resulted in the reduction of the budget estimates.

On the basis of the revised budget, I renewed on 18 June 2001 the appeal for States to indicate by 29 June 2001 what contributions in funds, personnel, equipment and services they would be willing to make for the establishment and first 12 months of operation of the Special Court, and pledges for the following 24 months. In that appeal, I underlined the importance of appointing a Prosecutor, prosecutorial and investigative staff, a Registrar, and Judges for the Trial and the Appeals Chambers. Nominations or contributions of any or all such personnel were welcomed.

As at 6 July 2001, the Secretariat has received indications of contributions in funds for the first year of operation of the Special Court in the amount of $15 million — a shortfall of approximately $1.8 million — and pledges for the following 24 months in the amount of approximately $20.4 million — a shortfall of approximately $19.6 million for the second and third years. Very limited contributions of personnel have been offered. In addition, one State offered an in-kind contribution of furniture.

Considering that the amount of contributions obtained is sufficient to commence the establishment and operation of the Special Court according to the scaled-down concept of operation, I intend to circulate a letter to the countries which have made pledges for the first three years of operation of the Special Court, and request that they deposit their contributions for the first year into a Trust Fund within 30 days. When funds are available in the pledged amount in the Trust Fund, I will ask the Legal Counsel to conclude on behalf of the United Nations the Agreement on the Establishment of the Special Court with the Government of Sierra Leone. I also intend to dispatch a planning mission to Freetown to discuss with the Sierra Leonean authorities the practical implementation of the Agreement and the kind and scope of contributions expected in Sierra Leonean personnel and services, and to lay the ground work for the arrival of the advance elements of the Special Court, consisting of the nucleus of its administrative and prosecutorial staff.

In ascertaining the sufficiency of funds to commence the establishment and operation of the Special Court, I remain conscious of the difficulties inherent in securing funding on the basis of voluntary contributions. I therefore reserve the right to revert to the Council at any time in the course of the operation of the Special Court and ask it to reconsider alternate means of financing the Court. Once the Special Court is established, Member States have a responsibility to ensure that sufficient resources are available to secure the completion of proceedings against those indicted.

I would appreciate the concurrence of the Council with the proposed approach.

(Signed) Kofi A. Annan

ANNEX 19:

Resolution of the Plight of African Children in Situation of Armed Conflicts (CM/Res.1659 (LXIV) REV.1, adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its 64th Ordinary Session from 1-5 July 1996.

6292

COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

Sixty-Fourth Ordinary Session
1-5 July 1996
(LXIV)
Yaoundé, Cameroon

CM/Res. 1647-1680

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE SIXTY-FOURTH ORDINARY SESSION OF THE COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

6293

RESOLUTION OF THE PLIGHT OF AFRICAN

CHILDREN IN SITUATION OF ARMED CONFLICTS

The Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity meeting in its Sixty-Fourth Ordinary Session, in Yaounde, Cameroon, from 1 to 5 July, 1996,

Having carefully listened to the report of the Secretary-General on conflict situations in Africa, and to the UNICEF statement on the Situation of Children under Armed Conflicts and its Anti-War Agenda,

Noting with deep concern that the negative effects of armed conflicts are jeopardizing the survival and development of African children and hence the future of the continent,

Painfully aware that civil strife and armed conflicts have been impeding the tangible progress achieved through Member States' programmes on child survival, protection and development,

Recalling the strong commitment of African Heads of State and Government towards the eradication of wars and armed conflicts in Africa as demonstrated by the establishment, within the OAU General Secretariat, in 1993, of a Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution, Convinced that dialogue is one of the most effective tool for creating conditions of peace, security and stability on the continent;

Mindful that Africa has committed itself to ensuring its children's welfare on the occasion of the World Summit for Children in 1990 as well as the OAU International Conference on Assistance to African Children, and through adopting several declarations and resolutions on child survival, protection and development, including the Consensus of Dakar and the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child;

1. TAKES NOTE of the UNICEF Anti-War Agenda, aimed at protecting children and women from the scourge of armed conflicts;

2. APPEALS to OAU Member States which have not yet done so to sign and ratify the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child;

3. APPEALS FURTHER to OAU Member States to fulfill their commitments to children by fully implementing the Consensus of Dakar and the Convention on the Rights of the Child especially the articles on the protection of children under armed conflicts;

4. CALLS ON UNICEF and the international community as a whole to assist African countries concerned in clearing land-mines, and in rehabilitating people and lands affected by these deadly weapons;

5. EXHORTS all African countries, in particular the warring parties in those countries embroiled in civil wars, to keep children out of war situations and to refrain from recruiting children under the age of 18 in armed conflict or violent activities of any kind whatsoever;

6. URGES all the warring parties, Governments and others release child combatants from the army and give them adequate education and training, rehabilitate and reintegrate them in civil society so as to make them once more productive and responsible citizens of their respective countries;

7. REAFFIRSM that the use of children in armed conflicts constitutes a violation of their rights and should be considered as war crimes;

8. REQUESTS the Secretary-General, in cooperation with international organizations and NGOs to consider modalities for organizing regional training programmes for members of the armed forces relating to the respect of basic human rights and international humanitarian law and to the protection of civilians, most of whom are children and women, during military operations;

9. RECOMMENDS that, zones and corridors of peace be established during armed conflicts to protect children and mothers in order to facilitate both the delivery of humanitarian aid and the provision of social services, such as education and health, and, in particular immunizations;

10. INVITES warring parties to pay special attention to the protection of girls and women;

11. REQUESTS ONE MORE, the UNICEF and the OAU General Secretariat to recommit themselves to the existing Cooperation Agreement as well as all earlier Resolutions which all upon UNICEF to assist the OAU with the necessary financial, logistical as well as material support aimed at promoting the welfare, survival, protection and development of African Children;

12. COMMENDS the active participation of children in the 1996 celebration of the Day of the African Child, and recommends that an Annual Children's Parliamentary Session to be held in each OAU Member States, for the Day of the African Child, in order to enable children discuss issues not only affecting their welfare, but also their respective countries;

13. CALLS UPON the Secretary-General of the OAU to follow-up closely the working relations between UNICEF and OAU and to submit a Report relating to the implementation of this resolution to the Council of Ministers as appropriate.

ANNEX 20:

Security Council Resolution 935 (1994), 1 July 1994.

6298

UNITED NATIONS

S

Security Council

Distr.
GENERAL

S/RES/935 (1994)
1 July 1994

RESOLUTION 935 (1994)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 3400th meeting, on 1 July 1994

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions on the situation in Rwanda,

Reaffirming, in particular, resolutions 918 (1994) and 925 (1994), which expanded the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR), and stressing in this connection the need for early deployment of the expanded UNAMIR to enable it to carry out its mandate,

Recalling the statement by the President of the Security Council of 30 April 1994 (S/PRST/1994/21) in which the Security Council, inter alia, condemned all breaches of international humanitarian law in Rwanda, particularly those perpetrated against the civilian population, and recalled that persons who instigate or participate in such acts are individually responsible,

Recalling also the requests it addressed to the Secretary-General in the statement by the President of the Security Council of 30 April 1994 and in resolution 918 (1994), concerning the investigation of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in Rwanda during the conflict,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General of 31 May 1994 (S/1994/640), in which he noted that massacres and killings have continued in a systematic manner throughout Rwanda and also noted that only a proper investigation can establish the facts in order to enable the determination of responsibility,

Welcoming the visit to Rwanda and to the region by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and noting the appointment, pursuant to resolution S-3/1 of 25 May 1994 adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, of a Special Rapporteur for Rwanda,

Expressing once again its grave concern at the continuing reports indicating that systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law, including acts of genocide, have been committed in Rwanda,

Recalling that all persons who commit or authorize the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible for those violations and should be brought to justice,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to establish, as a matter of urgency, an impartial Commission of Experts to examine and analyse information submitted pursuant to the present resolution, together with such further information as the Commission of Experts may obtain through its own investigations or the efforts of other persons or bodies, including the information made available by the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda, with a view to providing the Secretary-General with its conclusions on the evidence of grave violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda, including the evidence of possible acts of genocide;

2. Calls upon States and, as appropriate, international humanitarian organizations to collate substantiated information in their possession or submitted to them relating to grave violations of international humanitarian law, including breaches of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, committed in Rwanda during the conflict, and requests States, relevant United Nations bodies, and relevant organizations to make this information available within thirty days of the adoption of the present resolution and as appropriate thereafter, and to provide appropriate assistance to the Commission of Experts referred to in paragraph 1;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Council on the establishment of the Commission of Experts, and further requests the Secretary-General, within four months from the establishment of the Commission of Experts, to report to the Council, on the conclusions of the Commission and to take account of these conclusions in any recommendations for further appropriate steps;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General and as appropriate the High Commissioner for Human Rights through the Secretary-General to make the information submitted to the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda available to the Commission of Experts and to facilitate adequate coordination and cooperation between the work of the Commission of Experts and the Special Rapporteur in the performance of their respective tasks;

5. Urges all concerned fully to cooperate with the Commission of Experts in the accomplishment of its mandate, including responding positively to requests from the Commission for assistance and access in pursuing investigations;

6. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

6300

ANNEX 21:

General Assembly Resolution 50/46, 18 December 1995.

.6301

UNITED NATIONS A

General Assembly

Distr.
GENERAL

A/RES/50/46
18 December 1995

Fiftieth session
Agenda item 142

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

[on the report of the Sixth Committee (A/50/639 and Corr.1)]

50/46. Establishment of an international criminal court

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 47/33 of 25 November 1992, in which it requested the International Law Commission to undertake the elaboration of a draft statute for an international criminal court,

Recalling also its resolution 48/31 of 9 December 1993, in which it requested the International Law Commission to continue its work on the question of the draft statute for an international criminal court, with a view to elaborating a draft statute for such a court, if possible at the Commission's forty-sixth session in 1994,

Recalling further that the International Law Commission adopted a draft statute for an international criminal court 1/ at its forty-sixth session and decided to recommend that an international conference of plenipotentiaries be convened to study the draft statute and to conclude a convention on the establishment of an international criminal court, 2/

Recalling its resolution 49/53 of 9 December 1994, in which it decided to establish an ad hoc committee, open to all States Members of the United Nations or members of specialized agencies, to review the major substantive and administrative issues arising out of the draft statute prepared by the

---

1/ Official Records of the General Assembly, Forty-ninth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/49/10), para. 91.

2/ Ibid., para. 90.

International Law Commission and, in the light of that review, to consider arrangements for the convening of an international conference of plenipotentiaries,

Noting that the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court has made considerable progress during its sessions on the review of the major substantive and administrative issues arising out of the draft statute prepared by the International Law Commission,

Noting also that the States participating in the Ad Hoc Committee still have different views on major substantive and administrative issues arising out of the draft statute prepared by the International Law Commission and that, therefore, further discussions are needed for reaching consensus on the above issues in the future,

Noting further that the Ad Hoc Committee is of the opinion that issues can be addressed most effectively by combining further discussions with the drafting of texts, with a view to preparing a consolidated text of a convention for an international criminal court as a next step towards consideration by a conference of plenipotentiaries,

Noting that the Ad Hoc Committee recommends that the General Assembly take up the organization of future work with a view to its early completion, given the interest of the international community in the establishment of an international criminal court,

Noting also that the Ad Hoc Committee encourages participation by the largest number of States in its future work in order to promote universality, Expressing deep appreciation for the renewed offer of the Government of Italy to host a conference on the establishment of an international criminal court,

1. Takes note of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 3/ including the recommendations contained therein, and expresses its appreciation to the Ad Hoc Committee for the useful work done;

2. Decides to establish a preparatory committee open to all States Members of the United Nations or members of specialized agencies or of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to discuss further the major substantive and administrative issues arising out of the draft statute prepared by the International Law Commission and, taking into account the different views expressed during the meetings, to draft texts, with a view to preparing a widely acceptable consolidated text of a convention for an international criminal court as a next step towards consideration by a conference of plenipotentiaries, and also decides that the work of the Preparatory Committee should be based on the draft statute prepared by the International Law Commission and should take into account the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and the written comments submitted by States to the Secretary-General on the draft statute for an international criminal court pursuant to paragraph 4 of General

---

3/ Ibid., Fiftieth Session, Supplement No. 22 (A/50/22).

Assembly resolution 49/53 4/ and, as appropriate, contributions of relevant organizations;

3. Also decides that the Preparatory Committee will meet from 25 March to 12 April and from 12 to 30 August 1996 and submit its report to the General Assembly at the beginning of its fifty-first session, and requests the Secretary-General to provide the Preparatory Committee with the necessary facilities for the performance of its work;

4. Urges participation in the Preparatory Committee by the largest number of States in order to promote universal support for an international criminal court;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-first session an item entitled "Establishment of an international criminal court", in order to study the report of the Preparatory Committee and, in the light of that report, to decide on the convening of an international conference of plenipotentiaries to finalize and adopt a convention on the establishment of an international criminal court, including on the timing and the duration of the conference.

87th plenary meeting
11 December 1995

4/ A/AC.244/1 and Add.1-4.

6304

ANNEX 22:

Security Coucil Resolution 1072 (1996).

6305

UNITED NATIONS

S

Security Council

Distr.
GENERAL

S/RES/1072 (1996)
30 August 1996

RESOLUTION 1072 (1996)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 3695th meeting, on 30 August 1996

The Security Council,

Reaffirming all its previous resolutions and statements by its President on the situation in Burundi,

Recalling the statement by its President of 24 July 1996 (S/PRST/1996/31) in which the Council strongly condemned any attempt to overthrow the legitimate Government of Burundi by force or coup d'état, and recalling also the statement by its President of 29 July 1996 (S/PRST/1996/32) in which the Council condemned the actions that led to the overthrow of constitutional order in Burundi,

Deeply concerned at the continued deterioration in the security and humanitarian situation in Burundi that has been characterized in the last years by killings, massacres, torture and arbitrary detention, and at the threat that this poses to the peace and security of the Great Lakes Region as a whole,

Reiterating its appeal to all parties in Burundi to defuse the present crisis and to demonstrate the necessary cohesion, unity and political will to restore constitutional order and processes without delay,

Reiterating the urgent need for all parties in Burundi to commit themselves to a dialogue aimed at establishing a comprehensive political settlement and the creation of conditions conducive to national reconciliation,

Recalling that all persons who commit or authorize the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible for such violations and should be held accountable, and reaffirming the need to put an end to impunity for such acts and the climate that fosters them,

Strongly condemning those responsible for the attacks on personnel of international humanitarian organizations, and underlining that all parties in Burundi are responsible for the security of such personnel,

Emphasizing the urgent need to establish humanitarian corridors to ensure the unimpeded flow of humanitarian goods to all people in Burundi,

Taking note of the letter from the Permanent Representative of the United Republic of Tanzania of 2 August 1996 (S/1996/620, annex and appendix),

Taking note also of the note from the Secretary-General transmitting a letter from the Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity of 5 August 1996 (S/1996/628, annex),

Reiterating its support for the immediate resumption of dialogue and negotiations under the auspices of the Mwanza Peace Process facilitated by former President Nyerere and the Joint Communiqué of the Second Arusha Regional Summit on Burundi of 31 July 1996 which seeks to guarantee democracy and security for all people in Burundi,

Determined to support the efforts and initiatives of the countries in the region, which were also supported by the Central Organ of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution aimed at returning Burundi to a democratic path and contributing to stability in the region,

Underlining the importance it attaches to the continuation of the efforts of the OAU and its Observer Mission (MIOB),

Welcoming the efforts made by interested Member States and by the European Union to contribute to a peaceful solution of the political crisis in Burundi,

Underlining that only a comprehensive political settlement can open the way for international cooperation for the reconstruction, development and stability of Burundi, and expressing its readiness to support the convening, when appropriate, of an international conference involving the United Nations system, regional organizations, international financial institutions, donor countries and non-governmental organizations aimed at mobilizing international support for the implementation of a comprehensive political settlement,

Recalling its resolution 1040 (1996) of 29 January 1996, in particular paragraph 8, in which the Council declared its readiness to consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General of 15 August 1996 (S/1996/660),

A

1. Condemns the overthrow of the legitimate government and constitutional order in Burundi and condemns also all those parties and factions which resort to force and violence to advance their political objectives;

2. Expresses its strong support for the efforts of regional leaders, including at their meeting in Arusha on 31 July 1996, of the OAU and of former President Nyerere, to assist Burundi to overcome peacefully the grave crisis which it is undergoing, and encourages them to continue to facilitate the search for a political solution;

3. Calls upon the regime to ensure a return to constitutional order and legality, to restore the National Assembly and to lift the ban on all political parties;

4. Demands that all sides in Burundi declare a unilateral cessation of hostilities, call an immediate halt to violence and assume their individual and collective responsibilities to bring peace, security and tranquillity to the people of Burundi;

5. Demands also that the leaders of all parties in Burundi ensure basic conditions of security for all in Burundi by a commitment to abstain from attacking civilians, to ensure the security of humanitarian personnel operating in the territory they control, and to guarantee the protection within Burundi and safe passage out of the country for the members of President Ntibantunganya's government and the members of parliament;

6. Demands also that all of Burundi's political parties and factions without exception, whether inside or outside the country and including representatives of civil society, initiate unconditional negotiations immediately, with a view to reaching a comprehensive political settlement;

7. Declares its readiness to assist the people of Burundi with appropriate international cooperation to support a comprehensive political settlement resulting from these negotiations and, in this context, requests the Secretary-General in consultation with the international community to undertake preparations when appropriate for the convening of a pledging conference to assist in the reconstruction and development of Burundi following the achievement of a comprehensive political settlement;

8. Encourages the Secretary-General in consultation with all those concerned, including the neighbouring States, other Member States, the OAU and international humanitarian organizations, to establish mechanisms to ensure the safe and timely delivery of humanitarian relief throughout Burundi;

9. Acknowledges the implication of the situation in Burundi for the region and underlines the importance of convening at an appropriate time a Regional Conference of the Great Lakes Region, under the auspices of the United Nations and the OAU;

B

10. Decides to re-examine the matter on 31 October 1996, and requests that the Secretary-General report to the Council by that time on the situation in Burundi, including on the status of the negotiations referred to in paragraph 6 above;

11. Decides, in the event that the Secretary-General reports that the negotiations referred to in paragraph 6 above have not been initiated, to consider the imposition of measures under the Charter of the United Nations to further compliance with the demand set out in paragraph 6 above; these may include, among others, a ban on the sale or supply of arms and related matériel of all types to the regime in Burundi and to all factions inside or outside Burundi, and measures targeted against the leaders of the regime and all factions who continue to encourage violence and obstruct a peaceful resolution of the political crisis in Burundi;

12. Reiterates the importance it attaches to the contingency planning called for in paragraph 13 of resolution 1049 (1996) of 5 March 1996 and encourages the Secretary-General and Member States to continue to facilitate contingency planning for an international presence and other initiatives to support and help consolidate a cessation of hostilities, as well as to make a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or a serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Burundi;

13. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

6309

ANNEX 23:

Security Council Resolution 865 (1993).

6310

UNITED NATIONS

S

Security Council

Distr.
GENERAL

S/RES/865 (1993)
22 September 1993

RESOLUTION 865 (1993)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 3280th meeting, on 22 September 1993

The Security Council,

Reaffirming its resolutions 733 (1992) of 23 January 1992, 746 (1992) of 17 March 1992, 751 (1992) of 24 April 1992, 767 (1992) of 27 July 1992, 755 (1992) of 28 August 1992, 794 (1992) of 3 December 1992, 814 (1993) of 26 March 1993 and 837 (1993) of 6 June 1993,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General (S/26317) of 17 August 1993,

Stressing the importance of continuing the peace process initiated by the Addis Ababa agreement and in this connection welcoming the efforts of African countries, the Organization of African Unity, in particular its Horn of Africa Standing Committee, the League of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference, in cooperation with and in support of the United Nations, to promote national reconciliation in Somalia,

Stressing the commitment of the international community to help Somalia regain a normal, peaceful life, while recognizing that the people of Somalia bear the ultimate responsibility for national reconciliation and reconstruction of their own country,

Expressing its appreciation for the improvements in the overall situation, which have been achieved by the United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II), in particular, eradication of starvation, establishment of a large number of district councils, opening of schools and resumption by the Somali people in most areas of the country of their normal lives,

Recognizing the continuing need for broadbased consultations and consensus on basic principles to achieve national reconciliation and the establishment of democratic institutions,

Calling upon all Somali parties, including movements and factions, to show the political will to achieve reconciliation, peace and security,

Recognizing that the highest priority for UNOSOM II is to assist the people of Somalia in the furtherance of the national reconciliation process and to promote and advance the re-establishment of regional and national institutions and civil administration in the entire country, as set out in resolution 814 (1993),

Noting with great concern, despite the improvements in the overall situation in Somalia, continuing reports of violence in Mogadishu and the absence of law enforcement and judicial authorities and institutions in the country as a whole, and recalling the request to the Secretary-General in resolution 814 (1993) to assist in the re-establishment of the Somali police and the restoration and maintenance of peace, stability, and law and order,

Convinced that the re-establishment of the Somali police, and judicial and penal systems, is critical for the restoration of security and stability in the country,

Gravely concerned at the continuation of armed attacks against the personnel of UNOSOM II, and recalling its resolution 814 (1993) which emphasized the fundamental importance of a comprehensive and effective programme for disarming Somali parties, including movements and factions,

A

1. Welcomes the reports by the Secretary-General and his Special Representative on the progress achieved in accomplishing the objectives set out in resolution 814 (1993);

2. Commends the Secretary-General, his Special Representative, and all the personnel of UNOSOM II, for their achievements in greatly improving the conditions of the Somali people and beginning the process of nation-building apparent in the restoration in much of the country of stable and secure conditions in stark contrast with the prior suffering caused by inter-clan conflict;

3. Condemns all attacks on UNOSOM II personnel and reaffirms that those who have committed or have ordered the commission of such criminal acts will be held individually responsible for them;

4. Affirms the importance it attaches to the successful fulfilment on an urgent and accelerated basis of UNOSOM II's objectives of facilitation of humanitarian assistance and the restoration of law and order, and of national reconciliation in a free, democratic and sovereign Somalia, so that it can complete its mission by March 1995;

5. Requests, in that context, the Secretary-General to direct the urgent preparation of a detailed plan with concrete steps setting out UNOSOM II's future concerted strategy with regard to its humanitarian, political and security activities and to report thereon to the Council as soon as possible;

6. Urges the Secretary-General to re-double his efforts at the local, regional and national levels, including encouraging broad participation by all sectors of Somali society, to continue the process of national reconciliation and political settlement, and to assist the people of Somalia in rehabilitating their political institutions and economy;

7. Calls on all Member States to assist, in all ways possible, including the urgent full staffing of UNOSOM II civil positions, the Secretary-General, in conjunction with regional organizations, in his efforts to reconcile the parties and rebuild Somali political institutions;

8. Invites the Secretary-General to consult the countries of the region and regional organizations concerned on means of further reinvigorating the reconciliation process;

B

9. Approves the recommendations of the Secretary-General contained in annex I to his report of 17 August 1993 (S/26317) relating to the re-establishment of the Somali police, judicial and penal systems in accordance with resolution 814 (1993) and requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps on an urgent and accelerated basis to implement them;

10. Welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to convene at the earliest possible date a meeting of Member States interested in supporting UNOSOM II in the re-establishment of the police, judicial and penal systems, for the purpose of determining specific requirements and identifying specific sources of support;

11. Further requests the Secretary-General to undertake actively and as a matter of great urgency an international recruiting programme for staffing the UNOSOM II Justice Division with police, judicial and penal system specialists;

12. Welcomes the Secretary-General's intention to maintain and utilize the fund established pursuant to resolution 794 (1992) and maintained in resolution 814 (1993) for the additional purpose of receiving contributions for the re-establishment of the Somali judicial and penal systems in addition to the establishment of the Somali police, other than for the cost of international staff;

13. Urges Member States, on an urgent basis, to contribute to that fund or otherwise to provide assistance for the re-establishment of the Somali police, judicial and penal systems, including personnel, financial support, equipment and training to help attain the objectives outlined in annex I to the Secretary-General's report (S/26317);

14. Encourages the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to ensure continuation of the current police, judicial and penal programme from October to the end of December 1993 until additional funding from Member States is forthcoming, and to make recommendations as appropriate to the General Assembly;

15. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Council fully informed on a regular basis on the implementation of this resolution;

16. Decides to remain actively seized of the matter.

6313

ANNEX 24:

List of State parties to Additional Protocol II.

6314

Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II), 8 June 1977.

States parties

Albania		16.07.1993
Algeria		16.08.1989
Antigua and Barbuda		06.10.1986
Argentina		26.11.1986	26.11.1986
Armenia		07.06.1993
Australia	07.12.1978	21.06.1991
Austria	12.12.1977	13.08.1982	13.08.1982
Bahamas		10.04.1980
Bahrain		30.10.1986
Bangladesh		08.09.1980
Barbados		19.02.1990
Belarus	12.12.1977.	23.10.1989
Belgium	12.12.1977.	20.05.1986
Belize		29.06.1984
Benin		28.05.1986
Bolivia		08.12.1983
Bosnia-Herzegovina		31.12.1992
Botswana		23.05.1979
Brazil		05.05.1992
Brunei Darussalam		14.10.1991
Bulgaria	11.12.1978.	26.09.1989
Burkina Faso	11.01.1978.	20.10.1987
Burundi		10.06.1993
Cambodia		14.01.1998
Cameroon		16.03.1984
Canada	12.12.1977.	20.11.1990	20.11.1990
Cape Verde		16.03.1995
Central African Republic		17.07.1984
Chad		17.01.1997
Chile	12.12.1977.	24.04.1991
China		14.09.1983
Colombia		14.08.1995
Comoros		21.11.1985
Congo		10.11.1983
Congo (Dem. Rep.)		12.12.2002
Cook Islands		07.05.2002
Costa Rica		15.12.1983
Côte d'Ivoire	12.12.1977.	20.09.1989
Croatia		11.05.1992.
Cuba		23.12.1999
Cyprus		18.03.1996
Czech Republic		05.02.1993

6315

Denmark	12.12.1977.	17.06.1982
Djibouti		08.04.1991
Dominica		25.04.1996
Dominican Republic		26.05.1994
Ecuador	12.12.1977.	10.04.1979
Egypt	12.12.1977.	09.10.1992	09.10.1992
El Salvador	12.12.1977.	23.11.1978
Equatorial Guinea		24.07.1986
Estonia		18.01.1993
Ethiopia		08.04.1994
Finland	12.12.1977.	07.08.1980
Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia		01.09.1993
France		24.02.1984	24.02.1984
Gabon		08.04.1980
Gambia		12.01.1989
Georgia		14.09.1993
Germany	23.12.1977.	14.02.1991	14.02.1991
Ghana	12.12.1977.	28.02.1978
Greece		15.02.1993
Grenada		23.09.1998
Guatemala	12.12.1977.	19.10.1987
Guinea		11.07.1984
Guinea-Bissau		21.10.1986
Guyana		18.01.1988
Holy See	12.12.1977.	21.11.1985	21.11.1985
Honduras	12.12.1977.	16.02.1995
Hungary	12.12.1977.	12.04.1989
Iceland	12.12.1977.	10.04.1987
Ireland	12.12.1977.	19.05.1999	19.05.1999
Italy	12.12.1977.	27.02.1986
Jamaica		29.07.1986
Jordan	12.12.1977.	01.05.1979
Kazakhstan		05.05.1992
Kenya		23.02.1999
Korea (Republic of)	07.12.1977.	15.01.1982
Kuwait		17.01.1985
Kyrgyzstan		18.09.1992
Lao People's Dem.Rep.	18.04.1978.	18.11.1980
Latvia		24.12.1991
Lebanon		23.07.1997
Lesotho		20.05.1994
Liberia		30.06.1988
Libyan Arab Jamahiriya		07.06.1978
Liechtenstein	12.12.1977.	10.08.1989	10.08.1989
Lithuania		13.07.2000

6316

Luxembourg	12.12.1977.	29.08.1989
Madagascar	13.10.1978.	08.05.1992
Malawi		07.10.1991
Maldives		03.09.1991
Mali		08.02.1989
Malta		17.04.1989	17.04.1989
Mauritania		14.03.1980
Mauritius		22.03.1982
Micronesia		19.09.1995

6317

States Parties and Signatories	Sign.	Ratif./Acc.	Reserve
Micronesia		19.09.1995
Moldova (Republic of)		24.05.1993
Monaco		07.01.2000
Mongolia	12.12.1977.	06.12.1995
Mozambique		12.11.2002
Namibia		17.06.1994
Netherlands	12.12.1977.	26.06.1987
New Zealand	27.11.1978.	08.02.1988
Nicaragua	12.12.1977.	19.07.1999
Niger	16.06.1978.	08.06.1979
Nigeria		10.10.1988
Norway	12.12.1977.	14.12.1981
Oman		29.03.1984	29.03.1984
Palau		25.06.1996
Panama	12.12.1977.	18.09.1995
Paraguay		30.11.1990
Peru	12.12.1977.	14.07.1989
Philippines		11.12.1986
Poland	12.12.1977.	23.10.1991
Portugal	12.12.1977.	27.05.1992
Romania	28.03.1978.	21.06.1990
Russian Federation	12.12.1977.	29.09.1989	29.09.1989
Rwanda		19.11.1984
Saint Kitts and Nevis		14.02.1986
Saint Lucia		07.10.1982
Saint Vincent Grenadines		08.04.1983
Samoa		23.08.1984
San Marino	22.06.1978	05.04.1994
Sao Tome and Principe		05.07.1996
Saudi Arabia		28.11.2001
Senegal	12.12.1977.	07.05.1985
Serbia and Montenegro		16.10.2001
Seychelles		08.11.1984
Sierra Leone		21.10.1986
Slovakia		02.04.1993
Slovenia		26.03.1992
Solomon Islands		19.09.1988
South Africa		21.11.1995
Spain	07.11.1978.	21.04.1989
Suriname		16.12.1985
Swaziland		02.11.1995
Sweden	12.12.1977.	31.08.1979
Switzerland	12.12.1977.	17.02.1982
Tajikistan		13.01.1993

6318

Tanzania (United Rep.of)		15.02.1983
Togo	21.06.1984.	21.06.1984
Tonga		20.01.2003
Trinidad and Tobago		20.07.2001
Tunisia	12.12.1977.	09.08.1979
Turkmenistan		10.04.1992
Uganda		13.03.1991
Ukraine	12.12.1977.	25.01.1990
United Arab Emirates		09.03.1983	09.03.1983
United Kingdom	12.12.1977	28.01.1998
Uruguay		13.12.1985
Uzbekistan		08.10.1993
Vanuatu		28.02.1985
Venezuela		23.07.1998
Yemen	14.02.1978.	17.04.1990
Zambia		04.05.1995
Zimbabwe		19.10.1992

States signatories

ANNEX 25:

R.Boed, "Individual Criminal Responsibility for Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of Additional Protocol II Thereto in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda" (2002) 13 Criminal Law Forum p. 293.

CRIMINAL LAW FORUM Volume 13, No. 3, 2002

Volume 13, No. 3, 2002

CRIMINAL LAW FORUM

An International Journal

Rwanda Tribunal Special Issue

Prepared with the assistance of Roger-Noel Kouambo

ADAMA DIENG / Preface

CÉCILE APTEL / The Intent to Commit Genocide in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

ROMAN BOED / Individual Criminal Responsibility for Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of Additional Protocol II Thereto in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

MAME MANDIAYE NIANG / The Right to Counsel Before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

ELIZABETH NAHAMYA and ROKHAYATOU DIARRA / Disclosure of Evidence Before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

JAMIE A. WILLIAMSON / Command Responsibility in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

Subscription prices year 2002 (Volume 13, 4 issues) including postage and handling: USD 267.00/ EUR 266.00 (print or electronic access), USD 320.40/ EUR 319.20 (print and electronic access). Individuals may subscribe at the reduced rate of USD 84.00/ EUR 84.00 (print only). They must declare that the subscription is for their own private use, it will not replace any institutional subscription, and it will not be put at the disposal of any library.
Subscriptions should be sent to Kluwer Academic Publishers, Sales and Distribution Center, P.O. Box 322, 3300 AH Dordrecht, The Netherlands, or at P.O. Box 358, Accord Station, Hingham, MA 02018-0358, U.S.A., or to any subscription agent. Private subscriptions should be sent direct to the publishers.
Changes of mailing address should be notified together with our latest label.
Periodicals postage paid at Rahway, N.J. USPS No. 018-295.
For advertisement rates, prices of back volumes, and other information, please apply to Kluwer Academic Publishers, Van Godewijckstraat 30, P.O. Box 990, 3300 AZ Dordrecht, the Netherlands.

CRIMINAL LAW FORUM
An International Journal
Volume 13 No. 3 2002

Rwanda Tribunal Special Issue

Prepared with the assistance of Roger-Noel Kouambo

ADAMA DIENG / Preface 271–272

CÉCILE APTEL / The Intent to Commit Genocide in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 273–291

ROMAN BOED / Individual Criminal Responsibility for Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of Additional Protocol II Thereto in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 293–322

MAME MANDIAYE NIANG / The Right to Counsel Before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 323–338

ELIZABETH NAHAMYA and ROKHAYATOU DIARRA / Disclosure of Evidence Before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 339–364

JAMIE A. WILLIAMSON / Command Responsibility in the Case Law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda 365–384

Published by Kluwer Academic Publishers
Van Godewijckstraat 30
P.O. Box 990
3300 AZ Dordrecht
The Netherlands

Sold and distributed in Switzerland, Germany and Austria by Helbing & Lichtenhahn Verlag AG Basel CH-4051 Basel Switzerland

In all other countries, sold and distributed by Kluwer Academic Publishers Van Godewijckstraat 30 P.O. Box 990 3300 AZ Dordrecht The Netherlands

ISSN 1046-8374

Subscription queries should be directed to:
Kluwer Academic Publishers
Sales and Distribution Center
PO Box 322
3300 AA Dordrecht
The Netherlands
Tel +31-(0)78-6576 000
Fax +31-(0)78-6576 254
E-mail orderdept@wkap.nl

Criminal Law Forum is published quarterly.
Subscription prices year 2002 (Volume 13, 4 issues) including postage and handling: USD 267.00/EUR 266.00 (print or electronic access), USD 320.40/EUR 319.20 (print and electronic access). Individuals may subscribe at the reduced rate of USD 84.00/ EUR 84.00 (print only).

Periodicals postage paid at Rahway, NJ, USPS No. 018-295

ADAMA DIENG*

PREFACE

When Raphael Lemkin coined the word "genocide" in 1944, the tragic reality which that concept sought to encompass had nothing in common with the sufferings that certain peoples endured in the course of the history of the human race. The discriminatory atrocities committed against certain human groups on account of their distinctiveness had not always been taken into account in the assessment of the gravity of such acts. The uncompleted persecution and extermination of these groups was always perceived as attacks on the human race, in particular, and as crimes against human civilization or against humanity, as a whole.

History has characterised on hindsight certain tragedies as genocide, whether they be the massacre of the Armenians in 1915, the Cambodians in the seventies; or the extermination of the Jews during the Second World War, or other less well-known physical persecutions of such groups as the Gypsies and the Amerindians. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) – for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 – finally brought the crime of genocide to the limelight and imposed thereon a legal and judicial sanction. A legal definition of the concept had been broached in the 1948 United Nations Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

The ICTR was to confer a new and hitherto unprecedented dimension on the international repression of the crime of genocide. From indictment to conviction for genocide, ICTR case law has paved the way for an organised, systematic and exemplary punishment of this crime in all its manifestations.

The ICTR and the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, as international courts, are trail-blazers in terms of their composition and functioning. Both have had to be innovative in their endeavour in view of the absence of established precedents in law.

* Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations, Registrar of International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda.

The articles published in this issue of Criminal Law Forum are the brainchild of distinguished jurists who have contributed to the emergence of international jurisprudence. They have, individually or collectively, assisted ICTR judges in the preparation of major decisions which have enabled international justice to grow from its initial faltering steps and be transformed into a bulwark of human civilisation.

ICTR case law is credited with upholding some of the principles enshrined in conventions relating to international humanitarian law and enforcing the punishment of violations of human dignity which are crimes under its jurisdiction.

The vacillations in case law are but a reflection of the dimension of the phenomenon and the legal issues that it raises. Proof of "culpable intent" on the part of an individual who seeks to destroy, in whole or in part, a group is by itself an arduous task. Proof of intent to destroy only "part" of a group is equally daunting. Is intent to destroy the whole group not present even if only a part thereof is ultimately destroyed?

In the intent to exterminate a group, in this case the Tutsis and other Hutus who were blacklisted, criminal acts were often carried out on orders. There were those who issued the orders and those who implemented them. The very fact that, in addition to the armed forces with an organised hierarchy, other administrative, political and partisan structures were involved in the conflict raises questions as to the real nature of hierarchical authority and the effectiveness of the subordinate relationship among the authorities, particularly with respect to civilians, and their subordinates.

The innovative and pioneering character of the system adopted by the international court has definitely had an impact on its procedure, particularly with regard to resolving fundamental issues such as the statutory right of the accused to be assigned counsel and inter partes disclosure of evidentiary material.

The internal armed conflict that brought about the serious violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda raises the issue of individual criminal responsibility in regard to serious violations of article 3 common to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II thereto.

ICTR case law has attempted with remarkable analytical discipline to address all of these issues. Its legal rationale, based more on doctrine than on precedent, has averted a trivialisation of these crimes which otherwise would be characterised as ordinary crimes. The ICTR, in that manner, has charted the way forward.

CÉCILE APTEL*

THE INTENT TO COMMIT GENOCIDE IN THE CASE LAW OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

The preamble to the Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide recalls: "At all periods of history genocide has inflicted great losses on humanity."[1] The General Assembly of the United Nations affirmed, when it drafted the Convention, that "genocide is a crime under international law which the civilised world condemns, and for the commission of which principals and accomplices – whether private individuals, public officials or statesmen, and whether the crime is committed on religious, racial, political or any other grounds – are punishable".[2] However, it is only recently that serious efforts have been made by the international community to enforce the Genocide Convention by bringing perpetrators of this crime to justice. The creation of two ad hoc international criminal tribunals by the Security Council of the United Nations in 1993 and 1994,[3] followed by the adoption of the Statute of the International Criminal * Coordinator in the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, formerly Legal Officer, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. Diplôme de l'Institut d'Etudes Politiques (Aix-Marseille III, 1991), Master (College of Europe, Bruges, 1993). The opinions expressed in this article are the author's and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the United Nations.

[1] Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, (1951) 78 U.N.T.S. 277. The Convention came into force on 12 January 1951.

[2] G.A. Res. 96(I).

[3] The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia was established on 25 May 1993 by Security Council Resolution 808 (subsequently amended by U.N. Doc. S/RES/1166, U.N. Doc. S/RES/1329 and U.N. Doc. S/RES/1411 (2002)). The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda was created by Resolution 955 of the Security Council, adopted on 8 November 1994 (subsequently amended by U.N. Doc. S/RES/1165, U.N. Doc. S/RES/1329 and U.N. Doc. S/RES/1411 (2002) and U.N. Doc. S/RES/1431 (2002)). Article 4 of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which is an annex to Resolution 827, and article 2 of the Statute of the Inter

Court,[4] constitute major breakthroughs in the prosecution of perpetrators of genocide.

The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was the first international jurisdiction to try and convict individuals on charges of genocide. On 1 May 1998, an ICTR Trial Chamber found Jean Kambanda, former Prime Minister of Rwanda, guilty of genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, complicity in genocide, and crimes against humanity, after he pleaded guilty to all six counts against him.[5] On 2 September 1998, the ICTR condemned Jean-Paul Akayesu for genocide. Its judgment in Akayesu provides the first comprehensive judicial definition of genocide, complicity in genocide and direct and public incitement to commit genocide.[6] These rulings have been followed by several others at the ICTR, in the cases of Kayishema and Ruzindana,[7] Serushago,[8] Rutaganda,[9] Musema,[10] Ruggiu,[11] and Bagilishema.[12] Similarly, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) has ruled on charges of genocide in the Sikirica,[13] Krstic,[14] and Jelesic cases.[15] The Appeals Chamber, common to both the ICTR and the ICTY, has also further clarified certain aspects of the crime of genocide in decisions on some of [4] The Statute of the International Criminal Court, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/9, often referred to as the "Rome Statute", was adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998 and entered into force on 1 July 2002.

[5] Prosecutor v. Kambanda (Case No. ICTR-97-23-S), Judgment and Sentence, 4 September 1998, paras. 3–4.

[6] Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Judgment, 2 September 1998.

[7] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-T), Judgment and Sentence, 21 May 1999.

[8] Prosecutor v. Serushago (Case No. ICTR-98-39-T), Sentence, 5 February 1999. Omar Serushago had pleaded guilty on 14 December 1998.

[9] Prosecutor v. Rutaganda (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T), Judgment and Sentence, 6 December 1999.

[10] Prosecutor v. Musema (Case No. ICTR-96-13-T), Judgment and Sentence, 27 January 2000.

[11] Prosecutor v. Ruggiu (Case No. ICTR-97-32-T), Judgment and Sentence, 1 June 2000. He pleaded guilty to the two counts against him, one for direct and public incitement to commit genocide, on 15 May 2000.

[12] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema (Case No. ICTR-95-1A-T), Judgment, 7 June 2001.

[13] Prosecutor v. Sikirica et al. (Case No. IT-95-8), Judgment on Defence Motions to Acquit, 3 September 2001, and Sentencing Judgment, 13 November 2001.

[14] Prosecutor v. Krstic (Case No. IT-98-33), Judgment, 2 August 2001.

[15] Prosecutor v. Jelisic (Case No. IT-95-10-T), Judgment, 14 December 1999. Goran Jelesic was acquitted of genocide by the Trial Chamber, but pleaded guilty to crimes against humanity and violations of the laws or customs of war.

the above-mentioned cases.[16] A corpus of international criminal jurisprudence on genocide is thus being developed, leading to a clarification of the constitutive elements of this crime.[17]

Criminal law requires specification of what must be proven for the offence to be established, in regard to both its material element and its mental or moral element. To establish the crime of genocide, article II of the Genocide Convention separates these two elements. On the one hand, it defines the mental element of genocide in its introductory paragraph (or chapeau), as "the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such". On the other hand, the same provision lists five prohibited acts constituting the material element of a crime of genocide: killing; causing serious bodily or mental harm; deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about the physical destruction of a group; imposing measures intended to prevent births; or forcibly transferring children. It is important to note at this juncture that each of these five acts has its own respective mental elements.[18] As noted by the International Law Commission:

[16] To date, the ICTR Appeals Chamber has reviewed the Akayesu, Kambanda, Kayishema & Ruzindana, Serushago, Jelisic and Bagilishema judgments. Only the Kayishema & Ruzindana appeals judgment deals with the issue of the requisite intent for genocide, noting: "Kayishema submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he possessed the requisite mens rea for the crime of genocide, a challenge which is limited to the factual aspects of the Trial Chamber's finding. Accordingly, Kayishema does not take issue with the Trial Chamber's conclusion in respect of how intent may be inferred." Kayishema & Ruzindana v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-95-1-A), Motifs de l'arrêt, 1 June 2001, para. 147. It should be noted that a number of Trial Chambers findings reviewed in this article are still subject to appeal and that the jurisprudence could therefore obviously be modified in the future.

[17] The Statutes of the ad hoc tribunals do not define the elements of the crimes over which they have jurisdiction. It is thereby left to the judges, through jurisprudence, to determine them, if only to conform to the principle of nullem crimen sine lege. This principle, also sometimes referred to as the principle of legality, provides that conduct does not constitute a crime unless it has previously been declared to be so by law and also clearly defined. Paragraph 2 of article 22 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, entitled Nullum crimen sine lege, stipulates: "The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted." For the International Criminal Court, this resulted in the preparation of the Elements of the Crimes, drafted by the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court, U.N. Doc. PCNICC/2000/1/Add.2, para. 3, adopted by the Assembly of States Parties on 30 June 2000.

[18] As Otto Triffterer clearly expresses: "... there are two subjective elements required to establish criminal responsibility for genocide: the mens rea as the pendant to the actus reus and the 'intent to destroy ...'" Otto Triffterer, Genocide, its Particular Intent to Destroy in Whole or in Part the Group as Such, 14 LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 400 (2001).

> The prohibited acts [...] are by their very nature conscious, intentional or volitional acts which an individual could not usually commit without knowing that certain consequences were likely to result. These are not the type of acts that would normally occur by accident or even as a result of mere negligence.[19]

The provisions granting the two ad hoc tribunals jurisdiction over genocide – article 2 of the ICTR Statute, and article 4 of the ICTY Statute – reproduce verbatim the provisions contained in articles II and III of the Genocide Convention.[20] A conviction for genocide by an international tribunal shall accordingly only take place if the two constitutive elements are established beyond reasonable doubt, namely the commission of at least one of the prohibited acts, with the requisite intent. In practice, proving the intent to commit genocide poses serious challenges in a criminal process. This article attempts to present some of these difficulties in reviewing the jurisprudence of the ICTR on the determination of the intent to commit genocide. It focuses on the mental element of genocide per se, and does not discuss the mental element of each of the five underlying acts constitutive of genocide, nor does it address the requisite intent for the ancillary forms of genocide, the forms of participation compatible with the intent to commit genocide.[21] Although the developing ICTY case law on genocide raises a number of interesting issues, this article concentrates on the more expansive ICTR jurisprudence.[22] It studies the components of the "intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such" in the ICTR case-law, before looking into some of the challenges encountered in proving this intent.

[19] Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its forty-eighth session, 6 May–26 July 1996, U.N. Doc. A/51/10, comment no. 5 on article 17 (genocide).

[20] The definition of genocide has remained unchanged over the last fifty years, notwithstanding various attempts at amendment, notably to enlarge the categories of groups protected.

[21] The ancillary forms of genocide – complicity in genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, attempt to commit genocide defined in article III of the Genocide Convention – also form part of the material jurisdiction of the ICTR. In GENOCIDE IN INTERNATIONAL LAW, THE CRIMES OF CRIMES (2000), William A. Schabas indicates that "the considerations concerning the mens rea of genocide [...] should also apply mutatis mutandis to the other acts listed in article III". The jurisprudence of the ICTR, as exposed in the Prosecutor v. Akayesu, with regard the intent to commit complicity in genocide stipulates however that "an accused is liable as an accomplice to genocide if he knowingly aided and abetted or instigated one or more persons in the commission of genocide, while knowing that such a person or persons were committing genocide, even though the accused himself did not have the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such". See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 544.

THE INTENT TO DESTROY

General Intent or Dolus Specialis?

For Hannah Arendt: "[t]he point of [genocide] is that an altogether different order is broken and an altogether different community is violated".[23] Genocide is indeed distinct from other crimes because it targets not only individual human beings, but entire human groups. As indicated by the Trial Chamber in the Kambanda judgment, in which it found the former Rwandese Prime Minister guilty of genocide, sentencing him to life imprisonment:

> The crime of genocide is unique because of its element of dolus specialis (special intent) which requires that the crime be committed with the intent "to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such". [H]ence the Chamber is of the opinion that genocide constitutes the crime of crimes.[24]

Although various ICTR Trial Chambers have referred to the intent required for genocide as a "special intent",[25] a "specific intent"[26] or also a "specific genocidal intent",[27] they unanimously recognise that genocide is characterised by a "dolus specialis".[28]

> Genocide is distinct from other crimes inasmuch as it embodies a special intent or dolus specialis. Special intent of a crime is the specific intention, required as a constitutive element of the crime, which demands that the perpetrator clearly seeks to produce the act charged. Thus, the special intent in the crime of genocide lies in "the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such".[29]

The concept of dolus specialis corresponds to the French legal concept of dol spécial. It is used in certain civil law countries, although its definition is often disputed. In the Akayesu judgment, dolus specialis is described as qualifying the key element of an intentional offence, basically requiring that the perpetrator was clearly seeking to produce the act charged, or that he or she clearly intended the result of the offence:

> Special intent [...] is required as a constituent element of certain offences and demands that the perpetrator have the clear intent to cause the offence charged. According to this

[23] HANNAH ARENDT, EICHMANN IN JERUSALEM: A REPORT ON THE BANALITY OF EVIL 272 (1963).

[24] Prosecutor v. Kambanda, supra note 5, para. 16.

[25] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 498.

[26] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 91.

[27] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 12, para. 55.

[28] See notably Prosecutor v. Kambanda, supra note 5, para. 16; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 498; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 91; and meaning, special intent is the key element of an intentional offence, which offence is characterized by a psychological relationship between the physical result and the mental state of the perpetrator.[30]

Among the recognised authorities on genocide, it has been argued that the intent to commit genocide should not be qualified as a "special or specific intent".[31] The special or specific intent referred to in common law systems, corresponding broadly to the dolus specialis known in the civil law systems, would constitute "a qualified form of intent", which, these writers have argued, is not required – not even mentioned – in the international instruments defining genocide.[32] Professor Otto Triffterer remarks that:

The international jurisprudence establishes quite often that the perpetrator acted with the specific, special intent "to destroy" and that he in fact was aiming at such a destruction. But it nowhere expressly states that this special intent needs a minimum threshold an extremely strong will as an indispensable element and, therefore, has to be denied, if this intensity on the volitive side is lacking.[33]

He argues that a textual approach should be favoured, leading to a narrower interpretation of the intent to commit genocide.[34] With this interpretation, it is sufficient that one of the constitutive or underlying acts be committed with an ordinary intent "to destroy", meaning "that [the perpetrator] accepts that his or her act ought to or most probably might have this additional consequence".[35]

It should however be recalled that the International Law Commission noted, when defining the Code of the Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, and addressing the question of the intent to commit genocide, that:

[A] general intent to commit one of the enumerated acts combined with a general awareness of the probable consequences of such an act with respect to the immediate victim or victims is not sufficient for the crime of genocide. The definition of this crime requires a particular state of mind or a specific intent with respect to the overall consequences of the prohibited act.[36]

30 Ibid., para. 518.

31 See in particular Otto Triffterer, supra note 18; and Alexander K.A. Greenawalt, Rethinking Genocidal Intent: The Case for a Knowledge-Based Interpretation, 99 COLUM. L. REV. 2259 (1999).

32 Otto Triffterer, supra note 18.

33 Ibid.

34 Ibid.

35 Ibid.

36 [illegible]

In any case, the understanding of the concept of "intent" to commit genocide could be further clarified in the jurisprudence of the ICTR, notably by the Appeals Chamber. As noted by Professor William Schabas: "It would probably be preferable to eschew importation of enigmatic concepts like dolus specialis or 'specific intent' from national systems of criminal law."[37] The difficulty in grasping the exact meaning to be accorded to the concept of intent illustrates, however, the concrete problem facing judges who, only equipped with concepts of national criminal law, have to define crimes under international criminal law.

Targeting a Group qua Group

For genocide to be established, one of the underlying acts must be committed against the group qua group, meaning that the act must target members of the group because of their membership to the group. The Genocide Convention protects the groups, and as such, their social fabric. According to the International Law Commission, "[t]he action taken against the individual members of the group is the means used to achieve the ultimate criminal objective with respect to the group".[38] Similarly, a German High Court, in the Jorgic case, found that intent to commit genocide as provided in paragraph 220(a) of the German Criminal Code "means destroying the group as a social unit in its specificity, uniqueness and feelings of belonging".[39]

The Akayesu judgment noted:

In concrete terms, for any of the acts charged under article 2(2) of the Statute to be a constitutive element of genocide, the act must have been committed against one or several individuals, because such individual or individuals were members of a specific group, and specifically because they belonged to this group. Thus, the victim is chosen not because of his individual identity, but rather on account of his membership in a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. The victim of the act is therefore a member of a group, chosen as such, which, hence, means that the victim of the crime of genocide is the group itself and not only the individual.[40]

The Chamber continued: "The perpetration of the act charged therefore extends beyond its actual commission, for example, the murder of a particular individual, for the realisation of an ulterior motive, which is to destroy, 37 William A. Schabas, The Jelesic case and the mens rea of the Crime of Genocide, 14 LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 125 (2001).

38 1996 Report of the International Law Commission, supra note 19, comment no. 6 on article 17 (genocide).

39 State Attorney's Office against Nikola Jorgic, High Court of Dusseldorf, IV – 26/96, in whole or part, the group of which the individual is just one element".[41] This position has been constantly reiterated in the subsequent ICTR case law.

E326

Destroying a Group

In Kayishema & Ruzindana, the Trial Chamber reviewed the question of what constitutes the "destruction of a group". It noted that the prosecution had suggested that the term be broadly interpreted as encompassing acts that are undertaken not only with the intent to cause death but also acts that may fall short of causing death.[42] In Akayesu, acts of sexual violence that occurred in Taba Commune were found to form an integral part of the process of destruction, specifically targeting Tutsi women and contributing to their destruction and the destruction of the Tutsi as a group.

The destruction does therefore not have to be realised for genocide to occur. In the Akayesu judgment, the Trial Chamber recalled that "[c]ontrary to popular belief, the crime of genocide does not imply the actual extermination of the group in its entirety, but is understood as such once any one of the acts mentioned in article 2(2)(a) through 2(2)(e) is committed with the specific intent to destroy 'in whole or in part' a national, ethnical, racial or religious group".[43] Indeed, the actual destruction of the group is not a requirement, to the extent that the physical destruction of all the members of a group – or their definitive eradication, annihilation – does obviously not have to occur. Destruction is therefore a process. It is the aim that the perpetrator intends to achieve.

The destruction of the group "as such" must be intended. Notwithstanding different opinions,[44] the addition of the two words "as such" can be interpreted as an indication that the essential element of the crime is the intentional attack against the existence of a group of human beings. For the International Law Commission, "... the intention must be to destroy the

41 Ibid., para. 522.

42 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 95.

43 Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 497.

44 Commenting on the 1948 Convention, Nehemiah Robinson supported the idea that "the intended destruction must take place on grounds of the national or racial origin, religious beliefs or political opinion of the group's members. In other words, besides the intention of the destruction, there must be a specific motive for the act, deriving from the peculiar characteristics of the group. Thus, the intention to destroy the group would not suffice to represent an act of Genocide if the motives were other than those described above. If the destruction was carried out in the conduct of a war, for instance, or with the intention of robbery, or for motives of profit, or the like, it would not constitute Genocide."

group 'as such', meaning as a separate and distinct entity, and not merely some individuals because of their membership in a particular group."[45]

IN WHOLE OR IN PART

With regard to the interpretation of the words "in whole or in part" contained in the expression "intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such" the Trial Chamber, in the Kayishema & Ruzindana judgment, indicated that

> "in part" requires the intention to destroy a considerable number of individuals who are part of the group. Individuals must be targeted due to their membership of the group to satisfy this definition.[46]

The Trial Chamber cited the Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights[47] before concluding, in quoting the International Law Commission, that "it is not necessary to intend to achieve the complete annihilation of a group from every corner of the globe".[48] Similarly, in Bagilishema, the Trial Chamber found:

> As for the meaning of the terms "in whole or in part", the Chamber agrees with the statement of the International Law Commission, that "the intention must be to destroy the group as such, meaning as a separate and distinct entity, and not merely some individuals because of their membership in a particular group". Although the destruction sought need not be directed at every member of the targeted group, the Chamber considers that the intention to destroy must target at least a substantial part of the group.[49]

This jurisprudence of the ICTR thereby reiterates the well accepted position according to which the destruction should concern a substantial part of the group.[50]

45 1996 Report of the International Law Commission, supra note 19, comment no. 7 on article 17 (genocide).

46 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 96.

47 Ibid. For the Special Rapporteur, "in part" would seem to imply a reasonably significant number, relative to the total of the group as a whole, or else a significant section of a group such as its leadership.

48 Ibid, "the crime of Genocide by its very nature requires the intentic ... destr ... least a substantial part of a particular group".

49 Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 12, para. 64.

50 Nevertheless, when reviewing the notion of "in whole or in part", it ... important ... introduce the notion of attempt to commit genocide, as recalled by Prote... or Daniel D. Ntanda Nsereko: "It is submitted that as long as the perpetrator injures or kills [a person, even if only one] with intent and in execution of a co-ordinated plan to destroy the rest of his victim's group or a substantial part of it, he is guilty of genocide or at least attempt

The exact determination of what amounts to a substantial part of a group is obviously a difficult and relative question. For some writers, "[a]lso qualifying as substantial is a significant section of the group, such as the intelligentsia and the leadership, whose destruction results in a significant reduction of both the quantitative and the qualitative strength of the group".[51] Defining more precisely what constitutes the "substantial" part of a group would result in a crude assessment of the number of victims considered large enough to amount to a crime of genocide.[52] This logic is difficult to follow and it is submitted that there can be no gradation in the horror of a crime such as genocide, which, in any case, is characterised by its intent rather than by the number of victims. As pointed out by Professor Otto Triffterer:

> [F]]or the commission of genocide it is sufficient that the perpetrator merely intended "to destroy, in whole or in part, a ... group, as such". This means that the perpetrator must only intend to achieve this consequence or result ... The appearances of acts of genocide committed on the territory of former Yugoslavia since 1991 and those later committed in Rwanda rather show, as do many others in the world, that it regularly needs a process, continuing for a while, to achieve such a destruction.[53]

On this basis, even when the destruction is not achieved, a crime of genocide is committed as long as the intent was to destroy the group, or part thereof.

The definition of genocide provides that in fact the intent of the perpetrator may possibly be to destroy only part of a given group. In this context, the question has also been raised of whether genocide should be understood as covering acts aiming at the "cultural" destruction of a group, namely at destroying the group not by killing all its members but by killing a few selected individuals chosen so as to ultimately destroy the structure of the group.[54] in SUBSTANTIVE AND PROCEDURAL ASPECTS OF INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW – THE EXPERIENCE OF INTERNATIONAL AND NATIONAL COURT 125 (Gabrielle Kirk McDonald & Olivia Swaak-Goldman, eds., 1999).

[51] Ibid, p. 125.

[52] This exercise would almost surely lead to a difficult position, with possible discrepancies, depending on the "original" size of the group. Indeed, while "destroying" twenty members of a group constituted of millions of people may not be considered as "substantial enough" to constitute genocide, in another situation, the killing of twenty members of a rather limited group constituted of no more than a few hundred persons, could be deemed a substantial number.

[53] Otto Triffterer, supra note 18.

[54] An example of such a "cultural" genocide would be the systematic elimination of the religious leaders of a given religion, which would intentionally aim at destroying the very

As a concluding remark on the issue of destroying a group "in whole or in part", it should be noted that the debate on this point is probably not crucial at the ICTR. The first judgment rendered by this jurisdiction on genocide, the Akayesu judgment, had not even addressed the definition of this expression. The judges may have omitted this question as irrelevant in the context of the massive and widespread character of the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the ICTR.[55]

A NATIONAL, ETHNICAL, RACIAL OR RELIGIOUS GROUP

An interesting and contentious dimension of the ICTR jurisprudence concerns the categories of groups protected by the Genocide Convention and, hence, by article 2 of the ICTR Statute. Despite several attempts since the adoption of the Convention to have the protected categories extended to encompass groups other than the national, ethnical, racial or religious groups, even the Statute of the International Criminal Court provides only for the explicit protection of these four groups. Two main issues are at stake regarding these protected groups: firstly their definitions; and secondly, whether this list should be read stricto sensu or whether the protection provided by the Convention should be extended to other groups.

Defining the Groups

Regarding the definition of the four protected groups expressly mentioned in the Genocide Convention, the ICTR jurisprudence has clearly evolved, from the Akayesu judgment rendered in 1998 to the Rutaganda judgment of 2000. The ICTR Trial Chambers began by defining the four groups in an "objective" manner, which is obviously a very perilous exercise,[56] and later on, adopted a more "subjective" definition.

[55] It is estimated that, at the very least, 500,000 victims died throughout the country, during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda. For certain sources, more than a million perished. This estimate does not even take into consideration the victims of genocide who did not died, but to whom permanent physical or mental harm was caused.

[56] In Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, the Chamber wrote: "Based on the Nottebohm decision rendered by the International Court of Justice, the Chamber holds that a national group is defined as a collection of people who are perceived to share a legal bond based on common citizenship, coupled with reciprocity of rights and duties" (para. 512). "An ethnic group is generally defined as a group whose members share a common language or culture" (para. 513). "The conventional definition of racial group is based on the hereditary physical traits often identified with a geographical region, irrespective of linguistic, cultural, national or religious factors" (para. 514). "The religious group is one whose members share the same religion, denomination or mode of worship" (para. 515). Simi-

The jurisprudence of the ICTR thus illustrates two possible ways for identifying a protected group: an objective or a subjective approach. For the first one, the group should be considered as a social reality, in a stable and permanent way. People are considered as being almost irremediably and automatically members of the group by birth, as inheritance is the key to transmission of membership. For the subjective approach, a group exists insofar as the members perceive themselves as a part of that group (self-identification), or as they are perceived as such by the perpetrator(s) of the crime (identification by others).

The subjective approach was first adopted in the Rutaganda judgment. In Rutaganda, the Trial Chamber did not completely renounce an objective approach, but favoured a combined definition of the group, noting that "the concepts of national, ethnical, racial and religious groups have been researched extensively and that, at present, there are no generally and internationally accepted precise definitions thereof".[57] It continued:

> Each of these concepts must be assessed in the light of a particular political, social and cultural context. Moreover, the Chamber notes that for the purposes of applying the Genocide Convention, membership of a group is, in essence, a subjective rather than an objective concept. The victim is perceived by the perpetrator of genocide as belonging to a group [...]. In some instances, the victim may perceive himself/herself as belonging to the said group.[58]

In the most recent ICTR judgment on genocide, the Bagilishema case, the Trial Chamber noted:

> [T]he concepts of national, ethnical, racial, and religious groups enjoy no generally or internationally accepted definition. Each of these concepts must be assessed in the light of a particular political, social, historical, and cultural context. Although membership of the targeted group must be an objective feature of the society in question, there is also a subjective dimension. A group may not have precisely defined boundaries and there may be occasions when it is difficult to give a definitive answer as to whether or not a victim was a member of a protected group. Moreover, the perpetrators of genocide may characterise the targeted group in ways that do not fully correspond to conceptions of the group shared generally, or by other segments of society. In such a case, the Chamber is of the opinion that, on the evidence, if a victim was perceived by a perpetrator as belonging to a protected group, the victim could be considered by the Chamber as a member of the protected group, for the purposes of genocide.[59]

This combined definition of a protected group is particularly adequate to judicial proceedings, as neither the subjective nor the objective approach, taken exclusively, addresses both the need to ensure that the group targeted is indeed a group protected by the Genocide Convention, and the protection of the rights of the accused (so that her or his mere perception of a group is not unduly presumed).

Extending Protection to Other Groups

The question of whether protection against destruction afforded by the Genocide Convention should be granted only to the four groups expressly mentioned in the Convention remains a source of controversy. Certain groups, such as political groups, were purposely excluded by the drafters of the Convention. However, the question remains open for other groups, especially those which were not known or recognised per se at the time of the adoption of the Genocide Convention. An example is the tribal group, a concept which was not fully developed in the 1940s. When reviewing the provisions applicable to the crime of genocide, the International Law Commission remarked that it "was of the view that the present article covered the prohibited acts when committed with the necessary intent against members of a tribal group".[60] Other groups, such as groups determined by their gender or sexual orientation, were probably not considered by the drafters of the Genocide Convention. Some States have attempted to cure this situation when enacting national legislation on genocide. New groups, such as political, economic or social groups, have been added to the list of groups protected by certain specific national legislation.[61] For example, in the French Code pénal, genocide is defined as the destruction of any group whose identification is based on arbitrary criteria.[62] whose members share a common language and culture; or, a group which distinguishes itself, as such (self identification); or, a group identified as such by others, including perpetrators of the crimes (identification by others). A racial group is based on hereditary physical traits often identified with geography. A religious group includes denomination or mode of worship or a group sharing common beliefs" (para. 98). As noted by Rafaelle Maison: "L'appartenance à un groupe humain ne peut etre qu'une revendication individuelle: rechercher une catégorisation objective revient à employer le schéma d'analyse qui est celui des auteurs des discriminations." Rafaelle Maison, Le crime de génocide dans les premiers jugements du Tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda, 103 REVUE GÉNÉRALE DE DROIT INT'L PUBLIC 137 (1999).

---

57 Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 9, para. 56.

58 Ibid. An additional and interesting dimension of the most recent jurisprudence of the ICTR on this point is found in Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, where the Trial Chamber, in a footnote, indicated that it agrees with the comment of the Commission of Experts on Rwanda that "to recognise that there exists discrimination on racial or ethnic grounds, it is not necessary to presume or posit the existence of race or ethnicity itself as a scientifically objective fact", as cited in V. MORRIS & M. SCHARF I THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL

59 Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 12, para. 65.

60 1996 Report of the International Law Commission, supra note 19, comment no. 9 on article 17 (genocide).

61 See William A. Schabas, supra note 21, p. 5

The ICTR jurisprudence has considered the issue of extending protection afforded by the Genocide Convention to other groups. In Akayesu, the Trial Chamber found:

> On reading through the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention, it appears that the crime of genocide was allegedly perceived as targeting only "stable" groups, constituted in a permanent fashion and membership of which is determined by birth, with the exclusion of the more "mobile" groups which one joins through individual voluntary commitment, such as political and economic groups. Therefore, a common criterion in the four types of groups protected by the Genocide Convention is that membership in such groups would seem to be normally not challengeable by its members, who belong to it automatically, by birth, in a continuous and often irremediable manner.

It continued:

> Moreover, the Chamber considered whether the groups protected by the Genocide Convention, echoed in article 2 of the Statute, should be limited to only the four groups expressly mentioned and whether they should not also include any group which is stable and permanent like the said four groups. In other words, the question that arises is whether, under the Genocide Convention, it would be possible to punish the destruction of a group as such, if the said group, although stable and membership by birth, does not meet the definition of any one of the four groups expressly protected by the Genocide Convention. In the opinion of the Trial Chamber, it is particularly important to respect the intention of the drafters of the Genocide Convention, which according to the travaux préparatoires, was patently to ensure the protection of any stable and permanent group.[63]

Despite the advances realised by the evolving national legislation and the international jurisprudence, the delegates participating to the Rome Conference in 1998, leading to the adoption of the Rome Statute, did not revise the list of groups protected against the crime of genocide. Therefore, the International Criminal Court is left to adjudicate the matter, and it will be interesting to see whether it will adopt a narrow interpretation, as stipulated in its Statute, or whether it will draw upon the case law developed by the ICTR, with the idea that the spirit of the Genocide Convention shall prevail.

[63] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 516. Consequently, the Trial Chamber found: "In the light of the facts brought to its attention during the trial, the Chamber is of the opinion that, in Rwanda in 1994, the Tutsi constituted a group referred to as 'ethnic' in official classifications. Thus, the identity cards at the time included a reference to 'ubwoko' in Kinyarwanda or 'ethnie' (ethic group) in French which, depending on the case, referred to the designation Hutu or Tutsi, for example. The Chamber further noted that all the Rwandan witnesses who appeared before it invariably answered spontaneously and without hesitation the questions of the Prosecutor regarding their ethnic identity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that, in many cases, at the time of the alleged events, the Tutsi did indeed

PROVING INTENT

Demonstrating the intent is the cornerstone of a conviction for genocide. As indicated by Nehemiah Robinson, of particular complexity is the subjective appraisal of the guilt of the culprit, namely, whether the culprit intended to destroy the group or whether the destruction was achieved without such intent, simply as a result of an otherwise intentional action.[64] As the ICTR was the first international jurisdiction to rule on charges of genocide, it is not surprising that its jurisprudence has reviewed the issue and analysed how the requisite intent for genocide is to be proven. What could be considered by the bench as a clear manifestation of intent "beyond reasonable doubt"?

In Akayesu, the Trial Chamber remarked that: "[...] intent is a mental factor which is difficult, even impossible, to determine. This is the reason why, in the absence of a confession from the accused, his intent can be inferred from a certain number of presumptions of fact".[65] The Chamber continued by indicating that: "[...] it is possible to deduce the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership of a particular group, while excluding the members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act."[66]

A similar finding was made in Kayishema & Ruzindana:

[64] Nehemiah Robinson, supra note 44, p. 15.

[65] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 523.

[66] Ibid. See also para. 728: "[T]he Chamber holds the view that the intent underlying an act can be inferred from a number of facts. The Chamber is of the opinion that it is possible to infer the genocidal intention that presided over the commission of a particular act, inter alia, from all acts or utterances of the accused, or from the general context in which other culpable acts were perpetrated systematically against the same group, regardless of whether such other acts were committed by the same perpetrator or even by other perpetrators." Regarding the specific case of the accused Jean-Paul Akayesu, the Chamber found that "regarding Akayesu's acts and utterances during the period relating to the [illegible] alleged in the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, on the [illegible]is of all evidence brought to its attention during the trial, that on several occasions the ac[illegible]ed made speeches calling, more or less explicitly, for the commission of genocide. Th[illegible]hamber, in particular, held in its findings on Count 4, that the accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide. Yet, according to the Chamber, the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide lies in the intent to directly lead or provoke another to commit genocide, which implies

Regarding the assessment of the requisite intent, the Trial Chamber acknowledges that it may be difficult to find explicit manifestations of intent by the perpetrators. The perpetrator's actions, including circumstantial evidence, however may provide sufficient evidence of intent. [...] [T]he intent can be inferred either from words or deeds and may be demonstrated by a pattern of purposeful action. In particular, the Chamber considers evidence such as the physical targeting of the group or their property; the use of derogatory language toward members of the targeted group; the weapons employed and the extent of bodily injury; the methodical way of planning, the systematic manner of killing. Furthermore, the number of victims from the group is also important. In the Report of the Sub-Commission on Genocide, the Special Rapporteur stated that "the relative proportionate scale of the actual or attempted destruction of a group, by any act listed in articles II and III of the Genocide Convention, is strong evidence to prove the necessary intent to destroy a group in whole or in part".[67]

Thus, the ICTR jurisprudence recognises that, apart from direct evidence, such as utterances pronounced or documents written by the accused, which would clearly express or manifest the intent to commit genocide, circumstantial evidence may also be used to establish the requisite intent. The specific genocidal intent may in these conditions be inferred from the circumstances in which the prohibited acts were committed by an accused. These findings rely on factum probandum, or indirect or circumstantial evidence which is factual evidence from which a court may infer the existence of the principal fact at stake.

Whether such a determination of the genocidal intent of an accused, based on the general context of perpetration of crimes, is sufficient to meet the stringent requirements of criminal law remains open for discussion. This question is particularly pertinent in view of the gravity of the crime of genocide and the nature of the required intent to commit genocide.

that is, to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such" (para. 729). The Chamber further noted: "Owing to the very high number of atrocities committed against the Tutsi, their widespread nature not only in the commune of Taba, but also throughout Rwanda, and to the fact that the victims were systematically and deliberately selected because they belonged to the Tutsi group, with persons belonging to other groups being excluded, the Chamber is also able to infer, beyond reasonable doubt, the genocidal intent of the accused in the commission of the above-mentioned crimes" (para. 730). In a similar manner, Prosecutor v. Rutaganda provides that: "in practice, intent can be, on a case-by-case basis, inferred from the material evidence submitted to the Chamber, including the evidence which demonstrates a consistent pattern of conduct by the Accused" (para. 63).

[67] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 93. In this judgment, when reviewing specifically Kayishema's and Ruzindana's intent to destroy in whole or in part the Tutsi group, the Chamber reviewed the accuseds' utterances, their words and deeds, the number of victims, the fact that the latter were killed regardless of gender or age, and the persistent pattern of conduct (the attacks were carried out in a methodical manner, the repetitive character of the planned and programmed massacres, and the constant focus on

A word of caution is added in the Bagilishema judgment, where the Trial Chamber, after quoting the reasoning followed in Akayesu,[68] indicated:

Thus evidence of the context of the alleged culpable acts may help the Chamber to determine the intention of the Accused, especially where the intention of a person is not clear from what that person says or does. The Chamber notes, however, that the use of context to determine the intent of an accused must be counterbalanced with the actual conduct of the Accused. The Chamber is of the opinion that the Accused's intent should be determined, above all, from his words and deeds, and should be evident from patterns of purposeful action.[69]

The concern so expressed is obviously to avoid going beyond the liability or the direct responsibility of a particular perpetrator. As one writer has argued:

The use of circumstantial evidence to demonstrate mens rea is of course nothing new, but the ICTR's standard suggests that courts should presume specific intent largely by virtue of the fact that a perpetrator participates in a genocidal campaign. In this way, it begs the question as to whether the specific intent standard does any work at the individual level.[70]

Although the question raised regarding the applicability of the standard set by the Genocide Convention to criminal proceedings is valid, it is not accurate to indicate that the ICTR findings on intent are presumed from the accused's participation in a genocidal campaign. At this juncture, it is noteworthy that the General Introduction of the draft "Elements of the Crime" of the International Criminal Court provides: "Existence of intent and knowledge can be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances."[71] It is therefore likely that international criminal jurisprudence will continue to develop on this basis, with a cautious use of factum probandum combined with due regard for the highest standard of criminal justice, while concentrating on the direct responsibility of a particular perpetrator.

This leads to another essential question pertaining to the requisite intent for genocide, namely whether this intent should be determined solely at the individual level or also at the "policy" level. In other words, for an individual to have genocidal intent, must he or she have acted with knowledge of a genocidal plan? Both in terms of academic research and of jurisprudence, it is still unclear whether, for an individual to be convicted of genocide, he or she must have had knowledge of a pre-conceived plan to commit genocide. In Kayishema & Ruzindana, it was "the opinion of the Trial Chamber that the existence of such a [genocidal] plan would be strong evidence of the specific intent requirement for the crime of genocide".[72] It continued:

[68] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 6, para. 523.

[69] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 12, para. 63.

[70] Alexander K. A. Greenawalt, [illegible]

> It is also the view of the Chamber that although a specific plan to destroy does not constitute an element of genocide, it would appear that it is not easy to carry out a genocide without such a plan, or organisation. Morris and Scharf note that "it is virtually impossible for the crime of genocide to be committed without some direct or indirect involvement on the part of the State given the magnitude of this crime". They suggested that "it is unnecessary for an individual to have knowledge of all details of the genocidal plan or policy". The Chamber concurs with this view.[73]

Several authors, including authoritative sources, consider indeed that for genocide to take place, there must be a plan. For Professor William Schabas:

> Because of the scope of the crime of genocide, it can hardly be committed by an individual, acting alone. Indeed, while exceptions cannot be ruled out, it is virtually impossible to imagine genocide that is not planned and organized either by the State itself or by some clique associated with it. This is another way of saying that, for genocide to take place, there must be a plan, even though there is nothing in the Convention that explicitly requires this.[74]

He quotes Raphael Lemkin, who is at the origin of the very concept of genocide, as regularly speaking of a plan as a sine qua non condition for genocide.[75] Similarly, for Thomas W. Simon, > genocide has an underlying rationale, a rationale that situates itself both in individuals and in bureaucratic structures that include state-sponsored rules, edicts, and proclamations. Acts of genocide do not occur randomly, accidentally, or indiscriminately. The perpetrator identifies the targeted group in some way, however perverse, generally through accompanying state structures, such as laws, and then fully employs the state apparatus to eliminate members of the group.[76]

It is important to note, however, that, as indicated by the International Law Commission, "[t]he definition of the crime of genocide requires a degree of knowledge of the ultimate objective of the criminal conduct rather that knowledge of every detail of a comprehensive plan or policy of genocide".[77] In the context of the crimes falling within the jurisdiction

[72] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 7, para. 276.

[73] Ibid., para. 94.

[74] William A. Schabas, supra note 21, p. 207.

[75] Ibid., p. 208.

[76] Thomas W. Simon, Defining Genocide, 15 WISCONSIN INT'L L. J. 250 (1996).

[77] 1996 Report of the International Law Commission, supra note 19, p. 90. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY made a finding on the same basis in Jelisic: "[T]he existence of a of the ICTR, the prosecution has been in a position to present overwhelming evidence of the collective and organised nature of the crimes. The Chambers have therefore been able to practically rely on the evidence of the organised and "massive and widespread" character of the crimes committed, including genocide, without resorting to a legal debate to assess in legal terms the importance to be given to the existence of a plan. This issue is however likely to take a tremendous importance with the forthcoming joint trials involving multiple defendants, against whom the Prosecutor alleges that they planned and conspired together to commit genocide.

CONCLUSION

The ICTR jurisprudence has undoubtedly contributed to clarifying the elements of the crime of genocide, in particular as regards its mental or moral element. Certain issues, such as the definition of the protected groups or the fact that the group is targeted qua group, are now well established. However, the question of whether the "intent to destroy" should be construed as a general intent or as a dolus specialis has yet to be resolved. Question marks remain also on the nature of evidence required to prove the necessary intent to commit genocide. Nevertheless, given that the definition of genocide provided in the Statute of the International Criminal Court reflects the one contained in the statutes of the two ad hoc tribunals, the ICTR jurisprudence provides key precedents for the International Criminal Court.

of proving specific intent, the existence of a plan or policy may become an impor actor in most cases. The evidence may be consistent with the existence of a plan or poli r may even show such existence, and the existence of a plan or policy may facilitate proof of the crime." Prosecutor v. Jelisic (Case no. IT-95-10-A), Judgment, 5 July 2001, para. 48. This finding had already previously been made by the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Kayishema &

ROMAN BOED*

INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 1949 AND OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II THERETO IN THE CASE LAW OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

Despite the fact that internal armed conflicts occur with a far greater frequency than international conflicts,[1] enforcement of the international humanitarian law provisions that aim to protect their victims has been largely lacking until recently.[2] This is likely due, in part, to the fact that the two legal instruments specifically designed to protect victims of internal armed conflicts, article 3 common to the 1949 Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims[3] and the 1977 Additional Protocol II thereto,[4] contain no implementation or enforcement provisions.[5] In contrast, the

* Legal Officer-Judgment Coordinator, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. LL.D. candidate, University of South Africa; LL.M., Justice Harlan Fiske Stone Scholar, Columbia University, 1999; LL.M., University of Cambridge, 1998; J.D., with Honour, DePaul University, 1994; B.A., Lawrence University, 1987. The opinions expressed in this article are the author's and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the United Nations.

1 See, e.g., Theodor Meron, International Criminalisation of Internal Atrocities, 89 AM. J. INT'L L. 554, 554 (1995).

2 See, e.g., Daniel Smith, New Protections for Victims of International Armed Conflicts: The Proposed Ratification of Protocol II by the United States, 120 MIL. L. REV. 59, 65 (1988).

3 Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, (1950) 75 U.N.T.S. 31; Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick, and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, (1950) 75 U.N.T.S. 85; Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, (1950) 75 U.N.T.S. 135; Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, (1950) 75 U.N.T.S. 287 (hereinafter the "Geneva Conventions").

4 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts, (1978) 1125 U.N.T.S. 609 (hereinafter "Additional Protocol II").

5 See, e.g., Michael Bothe, Karl Josef Partsch & Waldemar A. Solf, NEW RULES FOR VICTIMS OF ARMED CONFLICTS: COMMENTARY ON THE TWO 1977 PROTOCOLS ADDITIONAL TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 1949, 608 (1982); Stefan Oeter, Civil

portions of the Geneva Conventions applicable to international armed conflicts and Additional Protocol I to the Conventions,[6] which is applicable exclusively to such conflicts, contain express provisions on their enforcement.[7]

In a relatively short span of time, the two United Nations tribunals established to prosecute persons responsible for serious humanitarian violations in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda have demonstrated and affirmed that violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II within their respective jurisdictions are acts carrying individual criminal responsibility.[8] Penalisation of the acts proscribed by these instruments, as developed in the statutes and case law of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)[9] and the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY),[10] engenders individual accountability. This, in turn, promotes enforcement of the provisions of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II and contributes to repression of inhumane treatment of victims of internal armed conflicts. Furthermore, the jurisprudence of the Rights Abuses in Internal Conflicts: A Positivist View, 93 AM. J. INT'L L. 302, 310, 311 (1999); Waldemar A. Solf, The Status of Combatants in Non-International Armed Conflicts under Domestic Law and Transnational Practice, 33 AM. U. L. REV. 53, 58, 59 (1983).

6 Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, (1978) 1125 U.N.T.S. 3 (hereinafter "Additional Protocol I").

7 Note, for example, that Additional Protocol I contains an entire section dealing with repression of breaches of the Conventions and of the Protocol. See Additional Protocol I, supra note 6, part V, sec. II. See also Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, supra note 3, arts. 49–54 (repression of abuses and infractions); Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick, and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, supra note 3, arts. 50–53 (repression of abuses and infractions); Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, supra note 3, arts. 129–132 (repression of abuses and infractions); Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, supra note 3, arts. 146–149 (repression of abuses and infractions). See also Solf, supra note 5, at 55.

8 See, e.g., Erik Mose, The Criminality Perspective, 15 GEO. IMMIGR. L.J. 463, 465 (2001).

9 The Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations established the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 by Resolution 955 on 8 November 1994. See U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (1994).

10 The Security Council established the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed two tribunals has, for the first time, clarified the conditions of applicability of common article 3 and the Protocol as penal instruments.

It is thus the thesis underlying this article that the ICTR and the ICTY have been instrumental in the development of the application of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II and in the elucidation of their elements. Section I of this article will show the development and affirmation of the concept of individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II through the establishment and jurisprudence of the two tribunals. Section II will detail how the ICTR has interpreted the material elements of common article 3 and the Protocol as penal instruments for the protection of victims of internal armed conflicts.

While, as Ratner and Abrams have noted, "[t]he criminality of acts violating the laws or customs of war in non-international armed conflicts has been somewhat obscure until quite recently",[11] the work of the two United Nations tribunals in this area has shown the way for the future. The tribunals' jurisprudence has already had a considerable positive effect, encouraging the inclusion of penal provisions relating to violations of international humanitarian law in internal armed conflicts in the Statute of the International Criminal Court.[12] In the more immediate term, the tribunals' contributions may assist the newly established Special Court for Sierra Leone as well as national courts, and will continue to stimulate discourse on penal repression of breaches of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[13] All of this will, without a doubt, strengthen the still limited regime of international protection for victims of internal armed conflicts.

11 Steven R. Ratner & Jason S. Abrams, ACCOUNTABILITY FOR HUMAN RIGHTS ATROCITIES IN INTERNATIONAL LAW: BEYOND THE NUREMBERG LEGACY, 94 (1997).

12 See Luigi Condorelli, War Crimes and Internal Conflicts in the Statute of the International Criminal Court, in THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A CHALLENGE TO IMPUNITY 107, 109 (2001). Whether provisions covering non-international conflicts should be incorporated in the Statute of the International Criminal Court was one of the most controversial issues. See Thomas Graditzky, War Crime Issues before the Rome Diplomatic Conference on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, 5 U.C. DAVIS J. INT'L L. & POL'Y 199, 208 (1999). The jurisprudence of the ICTR and the ICTY will assist the work of the International Criminal Court. See, e.g., L.C. Green, Enforcement of the Law in International and Non-International Conflicts – The Way Ahead, 24 DENVER J. INT'L L. & POL'Y 285, 319 (1996).

13 See, e.g., Babafemi Akinrinade, International Humanitarian Law and the Conflict in Sierra Leone, 15 NOTRE DAME J.L. ETHICS & PUB. POL'Y 391, 409 (200.); Gabrielle Kirk McDonald, The International Criminal Tribunals: Crime and Punishment in the International Arena, 25 NOVA L. REV. 463, 482 (2001); Sean D. Murphy, Progress and

6334

In sum, the ICTR and the ICTY have established on the international stage the criminality of breaches of humanitarian law applicable to non-international armed conflicts and through their jurisprudence have illuminated the elements of the offences.[14] As the former President of the ICTY, Judge Gabrielle Kirk McDonald, eloquently put it, the judgments of the two tribunals "are evidence of actual enforcement of international norms". These norms are more than promises: in the circumstances where they apply they are the law.[15]

I. INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR BREACHES OF INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW APPLICABLE IN INTERNAL ARMED CONFLICTS

A. ICTR Statute

The Statute of the ICTR expressly grants the Tribunal the power to prosecute persons who have committed or ordered to be committed serious violations of common article 3 and of Additional Protocol II. According to article 4 of the Statute, such violations include, but are not limited to:

(a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;
(b) Collective punishments;
(c) Taking of hostages;
(d) Acts of terrorism;
(e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;
(f) Pillage;
(g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples;
(h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.[16]

[14] On the standard-setting nature of the work of the ICTR and the ICTY in the field of humanitarian law, see L.C. Green, THE CONTEMPORARY LAW OF ARMED CONFLICT 335 (2d ed., 2000).

[15] McDonald, supra note 13, at p. 484.

Moreover, the Statute prescribes that a "person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime" within the Tribunal's jurisdiction "shall be individually responsible for the crime".[17] Finally, the Statute stipulates that the official position of an accused person shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility.[18] Clearly, the principle of individual criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal is firmly embedded in the Tribunal's constitutive instrument. However, in respect of acts falling within Article 4 of the ICTR Statute, that is violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, this principle was not well accepted prior to the establishment of the ICTR and the ICTY.

B. The Situation Prior to the Establishment of the ICTR and the ICTY

Unlike international humanitarian law provisions applicable in international armed conflicts,[19] the normative international instruments dedicated to internal conflicts do not contain enforcement or implementation measures.[20] This is so by design rather than by chance, for states have traditionally sought to limit the reach of international humanitarian law applicable to internal armed conflicts.[21] The motivating factor for this limitation surely was the desire of state actors to safeguard their sovereign prerogative to take action against those who on their territory may take up arms against them.[22] In other words, states have traditionally wanted to [17] Ibid., art. 6(1) (emphasis added).

[18] Ibid., art. 6(2). Indeed, in the case of Prosecutor v. Kambanda, the Tribunal found the former Prime Minister of Rwanda criminally liable on six counts of genocide and crimes against humanity following his guilty plea. Prosecutor v. Kambanda (Case No. ICTR-97-23-S), Judgment and Sentence, 4 September 1998. The Judgment and Sentence have been affirmed by the Appeals Chamber. See Kambanda v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-97-23-A), Judgment, 19 October 2000.

[19] See supra note 7 and accompanying text.

[20] See supra note 5 and accompanying text.

[21] See Meron, supra note 1, at 554. In traditional doctrine, laws of war were conceived to govern relations among states, as sovereign entities and subjects of international law, and were therefore not applicable to internal conflicts. INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS, COMMENTARY ON THE PROTOCOL ADDITIONAL TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 12 AUGUST 1949, AND RELATING TO THE PROTECTION OF VICTIMS OF NON-INTERNATIONAL ARMED CONFLICTS (PROTOCOL II) [illegible] (1987) [hereinafter the "ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II"]. See also Jan E. Aldykiewicz & Geoffrey S. Corn, Authority to Court-Martial Non-U.S. Military Personnel for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed During Internal Armed Conflicts, 167 MIL. L. REV. 74, 105 (2001).

[22] See Meron, supra note 1, at 554. In this respect, the ICTR observed that during keep a relatively free hand to deal with internal armed conflicts, even as they consented to much more extensive limitations on the way they could conduct international conflicts.

One manifestation of this is the fact that the international provisions applicable to internal armed conflicts are excluded from the grave breaches regime set out in the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol I thereto, applicable to international armed conflicts. This regime prescribes effective penal measures, that is, criminalisation of the offences, prosecution or extradition, and punishment of persons responsible for grave breaches of the Conventions and the Protocol.[23] In contrast, common article 3 and Additional Protocol II contain no mention of individual criminal responsibility for breaches of any of their provisions.[24]

Conventions to internal armed conflicts had been treated by many delegations as unfriendly attempts to interfere in the internal affairs of the states . . . ." Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-T), Judgment, 21 May 1999, para. 163. See also David P. Forsythe, Legal Management of Internal War: The 1977 Protocol on Non-International Armed Conflicts, 72 AM. J. INT'L L. 272, 278 (1978) (discussing the negotiating history of Additional Protocol II on this point). Note also that the Additional Protocol II includes an express provision on non-intervention:

1. Nothing in this Protocol shall be invoked for the purpose of affecting the sovereignty of a State or the responsibility of the government, by all legitimate means, to maintain or re-establish law and order in the State or to defend national unity and territorial sovereignty of the State.
2. Nothing in this Protocol shall be invoked as a justification for intervening, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the armed conflict or in the internal or external affairs of the High Contracting Party in the territory of which that conflict occurs.

Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 3. This provision recognises the sovereign prerogative of States to take measures within their territory to maintain law and order, national unity, and territorial integrity. Article 3 of the Protocol was included in the instrument to overcome the fears that Additional Protocol II could be used to violate State sovereignty by intervening in the internal affairs of States parties. See ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at 1362.

[23] See Additional Protocol I, supra note 6, arts. 85–87. See also Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, supra note 3, arts. 49–50; Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick, and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, supra note 3, arts. 50–51; Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, supra note 3, arts. 129–130; Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, supra note 3, arts. 146–147. On the grave breaches regime see generally Rudiger Wolfrum, Enforcement of International Humanitarian Law, in THE HANDBOOK OF HUMANITARIAN LAW IN ARMED CONFLICTS 530–31 (Dieter Fleck, ed., 1995). See also Yves Sandoz, Penal Aspects of International Humanitarian Law, in I INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW: CRIMES 393, 404, 406 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 2nd ed., 1999) (setting out the grave

Until the establishment of the two United Nations tribunals, the ICTR and the ICTY, the customary law position on individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of humanitarian law during internal armed conflicts reflected the conventional position outlined above. In other words, as in conventional law, in custom such acts were not considered to be criminal on the international plane.[25]

The creation of the United Nations tribunals, in particular the ICTR, spurred a major development in the law on this point. As noted above, the ICTR Statute expressly prescribes individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[26] In commenting on this, the U.N. Secretary General reported that the United Nations Security Council included in the jurisdiction of the ICTR international instruments regardless of whether they were considered part of customary international law or whether they have customarily entailed the individual criminal responsibility of the perpetrator of the crime. Article 4 of the [ICTR] statute, accordingly, includes violations of Additional Protocol II . . . and for the first time criminalizes common article 3.[27]

The Schizophrenias of International Criminal Law, 33 TEX. INT'L L.J. 237, 240 (1998); Simma & Paulus, supra note 5, at p. 310.

[25] See, e.g., Ratner & Abrams, supra note 11, at 95; William Schabas, Commentary: Prosecutor v. Akayesu, in II ANNOTATED LEADING CASES OF INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS: THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA 1994–1999 539, 550 (Andre Klip & Goran Sluiter eds., 2001) ("Until the adoption of Security Council resolution 955 creating the Rwanda Tribunal, it was widely believed among specialists in humanitarian law that the very concept of war crimes in non-international armed conflict did not exist."); Meron, supra note 1, at p. 559; Ratner, supra note 24, at p. 240. Ratner and Abrams pointed out that while states prosecuted the acts listed in common article 3 under their domestic criminal laws, "only a few instances are documented of prosecutions for war crimes as such in the context of internal conflicts until the creation of . . . [ICTY and ICTR] in the 1990s". Ratner & Abrams, supra note 11, at p. 95. L.C. Green in a similar vein observed that "[u]ntil the conflicts in Bosnia and Rwanda, no attempt was made to prosecute any accused for any sort of war crime as defined either in the Conventions or in customary Law". Green, supra note 12, at p. 309. And Simma and Paulus wrote that they "know of no case in which a national, let alone an international, tribunal prior to the ICTY's establishment has exercised jurisdiction over war crimes in internal conflicts irrespective of the nationality of the victim and the perpetrator". Simma & Paulus, supra note 5, at p. 312. See also Catherine Cisse, The International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda: Some Elements of Comparison, 7 TRANSNAT'L L. & CONTEMP. PROBS. 103, 116 (1997); Marsha V. Mills, War Crimes in the [illegible] Century, 3 HOFSTRA L. & POL'Y SYMP. 47, 51 (1999).

[26] See ICTR Statute, supra note 16, arts. 4 and 6. In comparison, the ICTY Statute does not expressly refer to common article 3 or Additional Protocol II.

[27] Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 5 of Security Council Resolution 955 (1994), 13 February 1995, U.N. Doc. S/1995/134, para. 12 (1995) (emphasis

Judge Theodor Meron has speculated that perhaps because Security Council members realised that the crimes of genocide and crimes against humanity might not encompass the entire array of offences committed during the conflict in Rwanda in 1994, in the ICTR Statute they opted to recognise individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[28] Whatever the motivation of states may have been, there was no opposition to this development in the Council[29] and the Statute is the first international instrument which expressly attributes individual criminal responsibility to serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, albeit only within the limited jurisdiction of the ICTR.

The promulgation of the ICTR Statute in 1994 may serve as evidence of the opinio juris of states in respect of individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II.[30] The inclusion of these crimes as crimes carrying individual criminal responsibility in the 1998 Statute of the International Criminal Court demonstrates how rapidly the law has developed.[31] Additionally, ICTR and ICTY jurisprudence in this area may stimulate international practice, further confirming that perpetrators of violations of international humanitarian law applicable in internal conflicts may be held criminally liable for their acts under customary law.[32]

C. ICTR Jurisprudence

To date, the ICTR has not convicted any accused person of violations of article 4 of its Statute, that is for serious violations of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II. This is because the elements, or some of them, of the particular offences were from the point of view of the Trial Chambers not proven, not because of any hesitation to recognise that individual criminal liability attaches to acts falling under article 4 of the ICTR Statute.

28 Meron, supra note 1, at 561. Professor Greenwood, on the other hand, has suggested that in granting the ICTR jurisdiction over violations of Additional Protocol II, the Security Council "considered that criminal responsibility for violations of [the Protocol] was implicit in the obligations which it contained ...." Christopher Greenwood, A Critique of the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, in THE CHANGING FACE OF CONFLICT AND THE EFFICACY OF INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW 3, 14 (Helen Durham & Timothy L.H. McCormack eds., 1999).

29 Ibid.

30 See Simma & Paulus, supra note 5, at p. 312.

31 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/9,

From its first judgment following a full trial in the Akayesu case[33] to the most recent, the Tribunal has consistently and unambiguously held that individual criminal responsibility attaches, as a matter of custom, to serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II within its jurisdiction.[34] The Tribunal has based its position[35] on the interlocutory appeal decision on jurisdiction of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the case of Prosecutor v. Tadic.[36]

The Tadic decision involved a claim by the accused that international customary law prohibitions applicable in internal conflicts do not entail individual criminal responsibility.[37] In deciding this matter, the ICTY Appeals Chamber acknowledged at the outset that conventional law, such as common article 3, lacks an explicit reference to criminal liability.[38] The Appeals Chamber however pointed out that the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg (IMT) concluded "that a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provisions on punishment of breaches".[39]

Following the lead of the IMT, the Appeals Chamber set out that the principle of criminal responsibility of persons who breach customary prohibitions may be established where international law and state practice clearly recognise certain rules, with the intention to criminalise their breaches, as evidenced by statements of officials of states and international organisations, and punishment of perpetrators by national and military tribunals.[40] The Chamber then reviewed state practice in respect of criminalisation of breaches of rules of international humanitarian law applicable in internal conflicts, including national legislation, military manuals, and domestic prosecutions.[41] On the basis of this analysis, and taking into

33 Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Judgment, 2 September 1998.

34 Ibid., para. 617; Prosecutor v. Bagilishema (Case No. ICTR-95-1A-T), Judgment, 7 June 2001, para. 98; Prosecutor v. Musema (Case No. ICTR-96-13-T), Judgment and Sentence, 27 January 2000, para. 242; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T), Judgment and Sentence, 6 December 1999, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-T), Judgment and Sentence, 21 May 1999, paras. 156–157.

35 See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 615.

36 Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-1-AR72), Decision on the Defer Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, 2 October 1995. See Christopher nwood, International Humanitarian Law and the Tadic Case, 7 EUR. J. INT'L L. 265 96).

37 Prosecutor v. Tadic, ibid., para. 128.

38 Ibid.

39 Ibid.

40 Ibid.

41 Ibid., paras. 130–132.

account certain resolutions of the United Nations Security Council,[42] the ICTY Appeals Chamber concluded that "customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of common article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflict, and for breaching certain fundamental principles and rules regarding means and methods of combat in civil strife".[43]

Commentators' reaction to the Tadic holding that individual criminal responsibility attaches to serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II has been largely positive[44] and has recognised the weight of the authority of the ICTY Appeals Chamber.[45] Significantly, in ICTR jurisprudence the criminality of serious breaches of the applicable international humanitarian law instruments in internal conflicts seems to be so well settled now that the Trial Chambers uniformly repeat the principle in their judgments without any elaboration.[46]

Simma and Paulus have commented that "widespread acceptance of the jurisprudence of the Tribunals [ICTR and ICTY] represents evidence that the punishment of perpetrators of offenses against international humanitarian law in internal conflicts is nowadays permitted by a general principle of law".[47] In light of the adoption of the ICTR Statute, the Tadic interlocutory appeal decision, and the jurisprudence of the two tribunals, not to mention the provisions of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the implementing legislation of the Statute in many states, all should be on notice that serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II committed in internal conflicts are now regarded as crimes by the international community. Prosecutions of alleged perpetrators of these crimes committed henceforth will therefore not give rise to concerns related to the observance of the nullum crimen sine lege principle.[48]

[42] Ibid., para. 133. The Chamber made particular reference to two resolutions on the situation in Somalia during that country's civil strife in 1992 and 1993. "[T]he Security Council unanimously condemned breaches of humanitarian law and stated that the authors of such breaches or those who had ordered their commission would be held 'individually accountable' for them."

[43] Ibid., para. 134.

[44] See, e.g., George H. Aldrich, Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, 90 AM. J. INT'L L. 64, 69 (1996); Aldykiewicz & Corn, supra note 21, at p. 137; Cisse, supra note 25, at p. 116; Greenwood, supra note 36, at pp. 279–81, 282–83; Simma & Paulus, supra note 5, at p. 313.

[45] That is to say that even those who find the proof of the existence of custom in the decision lacking agree on the significance of the decision. See, e.g., Ratner & Abrams, supra note 11, at pp. 96–97; W.J. Fenrick, International Humanitarian Law and Criminal Trials, 7 TRANSNAT'L L. & CONTEMP. PROBS. 23, 39–41 (1997).

[46] See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 98; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 242; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 90.

[47] Simma & Paulus, supra note 5, at pp. 312–13.

D. Article 4 of the Statute of the ICTR and the Principle of Nullum Crimen Sine Lege

For the Tribunal to have been able to validly exercise its jurisdiction under article 4 of its Statute in respect of serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, however, it first had to satisfy itself that, in 1994 in Rwanda, individual criminal responsibility attached to the conduct proscribed by these instruments. This was necessary in order to ensure that the application of the Statute, which was adopted after the acts which were to be prosecuted under it had been committed, would not violate the principle of nullum crimen sine lege.[49]

It was for this reason that in its first judgment after a full trial, in the Akayesu case,[50] the Tribunal examined the legal basis of the criminality of serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. Because these instruments lack any express provision as to individual criminal liability for their breaches, it could not therefore be maintained that the criminality was based on conventional law. However, as discussed above, the Tribunal satisfied itself that individual criminal responsibility [48] Ratner & Abrams, supra note 11, at p. 98.

[49] See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 86. Nullum crimen, nulla poena, sine lege is a principle of legality which requires that no one may be punished except for a breach of an existing rule of law. See, e.g., Francis G. Jacobs & Robin C.A. White, THE EUROPEAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS 162 (2d ed. 1996); Manfred Nowak, U.N. COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS: CCPR COMMENTARY 274–81 (1993). The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, (1976) 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (ICCPR) contains the nullum crimen principle in article 15 (prohibition of retroactive criminal laws) which reads, in part: "1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time it was committed." See also, e.g., European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, (1955) 213 U.N.T.S. 221, E.T.S. 5, art. 7(1). Upon review of the drafting history of the ICCPR, Professor Nowak has clarified the meaning of this provision as follows: "A person may be held guilty of an act or omission that was not punishable by the applicable national law at the time the offence was committed so long as this was punishable under international tre law or customary international law in force at the time the offence was committed." No , ibid., at p. 276. See also Jacobs & White, ibid., at p. 167. Therefore, the nullum crim nciple is not violated when the act being prosecuted was recognised, at the time of lleged act, as criminal under national law of the State where the alleged act occurre under conventional or customary international law binding on the State in question.

[50] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33.

for serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II was based on customary international law.

Moreover, in the Akayesu judgment,[51] as in every subsequent judgment rendered after a full trial,[52] the Tribunal was further bolstered in its assessment that article 4 of its Statute could be validly applied to the situation in Rwanda in 1994 because of the following factors. First, the Tribunal found that common article 3 and Additional Protocol II were then applicable in Rwanda as a matter of convention and custom.[53] Rwanda became a party to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 on May 5, 1964 through succession[54] and, through ratification, to the Additional Protocol II thereto on November 19, 1984.[55] Second, the offences enumerated in article 4 of the Statute also constituted crimes under the laws of Rwanda.[56] The Tribunal therefore found that the application of article 4 of the ICTR Statute to the situation in Rwanda during the Tribunal's temporal jurisdiction did not violate the nullum crimen sine lege principle.[57]

[51] Ibid.

[52] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34.

[53] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 98; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 242; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 156–157, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 617.

[54] The Geneva Conventions of 1949 entered into force for Rwanda with a retroactive effect as from 1 July 1962, the date of Rwanda's independence.

[55] See <www.icrc.org/ihl.nsf>. The non-governmental party to the conflict, the Rwandese Patriotic Front, had stated to the International Committee of the Red Cross that it was bound by the rules of international humanitarian law. See Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 157.

[56] See, e.g., Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 157, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 617. For example, articles 311–312 of the Rwandan Penal Code in force during the massacres in 1994 proscribed murder, article 316 proscribed torture, article 359 proscribed indecent assault, article 360 proscribed rape, and articles 339–342 proscribed threats to commit any of these offences. See CODES ET LOIS DU RWANDA, titre II (des infractions contre les personnes) 207–12 (Filip Reyntjens et al. eds., 1979). See also Meron, supra note 1, at p. 566; Condorelli, supra note 12, at p. 114 ("[T]he principle of legality is by no means violated when a system of criminal prosecution is organised at the international level to punish acts having a criminal character which the author could not possibly ignore as those acts were clearly and exhaustively defined as criminal offences by the law").

[57] See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 98; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 242; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 90; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 156–157, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 617. See Meron, supra note 1, at pp. 566, 568 (agreeing with this position).

E. Concluding Observations on Individual Criminal Responsibility for Breaches of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Internal Armed Conflicts

In sum, the ICTR is a beacon signalling that serious breaches of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II carry individual criminal responsibility on the international plane. First, the promulgation of the ICTR Statute showed the readiness of states in the United Nations Security Council to recognise this principle, albeit in the specific context of the 1994 conflict in Rwanda. Second, ICTR jurisprudence, following the Tadic interlocutory appeal decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber, has repeatedly confirmed the criminality of serious breaches of humanitarian law applicable to non-international armed conflicts.[58]

As the two ad hoc tribunals have led the way in affirming this principle of criminal responsibility, they have also been instrumental in elucidating the material elements of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II as penal instruments. This is a fundamental contribution to promoting enforcement of the provisions of these instruments and to facilitating repression of inhumane treatment of victims of internal armed conflicts.

II. INTERPRETATION OF COMMON ARTICLE 3 AND ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II BY THE ICTR

In the time before the existence of the ICTR and the ICTY, common article 3 and Additional Protocol II had rarely been enforced in any way and there had been little precedent for their interpretation and application.[59] For example, it has been observed that states had been able to evade the obligations of common article 3 because it was seen as reciting general principles rather than setting out precise standards of conduct.[60]

[58] Common article 3 and Additional Protocol II established international interest in internal armed conflicts, but did not provide any mechanism for interpretation of their provisions. Duncan B. Hollis, Accountability in Chechnya – Addressing Internal Matters with Legal and Political International Norms, 36 B.C. L. REV. 793, 834 (1995). Until the establishment of the ICTR and the ICTY, these instruments were left to the auto-interpretation of states. See ibid. at 832.

[59] See Mariann M. Wang, The International Tribunal for Rwanda: Opportunities for Clarification, Opportunities for Impact, 27 COLUM. HUM. RTS. L. REV. 177, 222 (1995).

[60] See, e.g., ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 2) at p. 1348 ("In the absence of clarity of this concept [a definition of armed conflict], it gave rise to a great variety of interpretations and in practice its applicability was often dem[illegible]"); Forsythe, supra note 22, at p. 273 ("No one has been completely sure as to what factual situations ... [common article 3] applies, and no one has been totally sure exactly what is article 3 and Additional Protocol II in the context of the cases before the Tribunal. The jurisprudence of the ICTR now indicates the material elements of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II as penal instruments aimed at protecting victims of internal armed conflicts. This section will focus on the analysis undertaken by the Tribunal to decide whether particular alleged facts constitute acts punishable under article 4 of its Statute, that is, as serious violations of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II. The analysis consists of examining the nature of the conflict, the application of the instruments ratione loci and ratione personae, and the existence, if any, of a nexus between the alleged acts and the armed conflict. The final steps in the analysis are determining whether the alleged violation was serious and whether the elements of the specific alleged offence are proven.

A. Ratione Materiae: The Nature of the Conflict

Common article 3 and Additional Protocol II are expressly applicable to armed conflicts of a non-international character. The Tribunal therefore had to answer whether the conflict in Rwanda in 1994 was of such a character as to fall within the scope of application of these provisions and, consequently, within the ambit of article 4 of the ICTR Statute.

Common article 3 prescribes: "In the case of armed conflict not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, each Party to the conflict shall be bound to apply, as a minimum, ... [certain] provisions ...."[61] Therefore, common article 3 is applicable to any non-international armed conflict within the territory of a state party. The Geneva Conventions, however, do not define what is meant by "armed conflict not of an international character".[62] In general, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has suggested, non-international armed conflicts referred to in common article 3 are conflicts with armed forces on either side engaged in hostilities that are "in many respects similar to an international war, but take place within the confines of a single country".[63] prohibited in whatever situation it is that is regulated"); Smith, supra note 2, at p. 65. In this regard the ICTR has observed that common article 3 "lacked clarity and enabled the States to have a wide area of discretion in its application". Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 94. See also Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 252.

61 Geneva Conventions, supra note 3, art. 3.

62 See Geneva Conventions, supra note 3, art. 3. See also ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at p. 1348; Geoffrey Best, WAR AND LAW SINCE 1945 177 (1994); Solf, supra note 5, at p. 63.

63 INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS, THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 12 AUGUST 1949 COMMENTARY: IV GENEVA CONVENTION RELATIVE TO THE PROTECTION OF CIVILIAN PERSONS IN TIME OF WAR 36 (1958) [hereinafter "ICRC COMMENTARY: GENEVA CONVENTIONS"].

Additional Protocol II, by its own terms, develops and supplements common article 3 "without modifying its existing conditions of application".[64] Its article 1, however, expands on common article 3 in as much as it sets out that Additional Protocol II covers non-international armed conflicts "which take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organised armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol".[65]

Additional Protocol II represents an attempt to strengthen the protections of common article 3 by setting out objective criteria for determining its applicability.[66] The objective criteria, essentially, are the requirements of a responsible command, control over part of the territory so as to enable insurgents to carry out sustained and concerted military operations, and the ability to implement the Protocol.[67] By adding these criteria to the terms of common article 3, the drafters of Additional Protocol II restricted the applicability of the Protocol to internal conflicts of "a certain degree of intensity".[68] This is confirmed by an express prescription in the Protocol, notably absent from common article 3, that it "shall not apply to situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature, as not being armed conflicts".[69]

The Tribunal has interpreted and applied common article 3 and article 1 of Additional Protocol II, holding that the conflict in Rwanda in 1994 was 64 Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 1.

65 Ibid.

66 See ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at 1348. See also Bothe et al. supra note 5, at 628.

67 See Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 1. See also ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at 1349; Bothe et al., supra note 5, at p. 627.

68 ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at 1349. For a review of the drafting history on this point see Forsythe, supra note 22, at pp. 284–85. See also Bothe et al., supra note 5, at p. 606; Leslie C. Green, International Regulation of Armed Conflicts, in INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW: CRIMES 355, 377–78 (M. Cherif Bassiouni, ed., 2nd ed., 1999) (commenting on the high threshold of application of the Protocol); Richard N. Kiwanuka, Humanitarian Norms and Internal Strife: Problems and Prospects, in IMPLEMENTATION OF INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW 229, 231 (Frits Kalshoven & Yves Sandoz, eds., 1989); Oeter, supra note 5, at pp. 205. Professor Greenwood has commented that Additional Protocol II was "made subject to a definition of internal conflicts which excludes the majority of such conflicts". Greenwood, supra note 29, at p. 19.

69 Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 1(2).

a non-international armed conflict within the scope of these provisions.[70] The Akayesu judgment showed the way for future work in this area when it suggested tests for evaluating whether a conflict is within the scope of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[71]

With respect to common article 3, the Akayesu test focused on the intensity of the conflict and organisation of the parties thereto.[72] The Trial Chamber concluded that armed conflict not of an international character as covered by common article 3 existed in Rwanda at the time of the alleged events.[73] In reaching this conclusion, the Chamber took into account that the evidence presented in the case has shown that there had been a civil war between the governmental forces (FAR) and the insurgent forces of the Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF) and that both groups were well organised to an extent where they were both considered to be "armies in their own right".[74] As for the intensity of the conflict, the Chamber recalled that all observers unanimously characterised the conflict between the FAR and the RPF as a war.[75]

The Akayesu Trial Chamber also found the conflict to have been such as to fall within the scope of Additional Protocol II.[76] The Chamber considered that the FAR and the RPF were engaged in a conflict on the territory of Rwanda and during that conflict the RPF controlled a significant part of the territory.[77] Moreover, the RPF carried out continuous and sustained military operations until the cease-fire. Its troops were disciplined and were under "a structured leadership which was answerable to authority".[78] Finally, the RPF had represented to the ICRC that it was bound by international humanitarian law.[79] The Chamber therefore was satisfied that the facts of the case fell squarely into the categories prescribed in article 1 of Additional Protocol II, the precise terms of which the Trial Chamber recalled in the judgment.[80] This approach to testing the applicability of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II to given [70] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 971; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 436; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 172 and 597; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, paras. 621 and 627.

[71] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, paras. 619–621 and 622–627.

[72] Ibid., para. 620.

[73] Ibid., paras. 621 and 639.

[74] Ibid., para. 621.

[75] Ibid.

[76] Ibid., paras. 627 and 639.

[77] Ibid., para. 627.

[78] Ibid.

[79] Ibid.

conflicts and the consequent findings of the Trial Chamber in Akayesu on this matter were endorsed in subsequent judgments of the Tribunal.[81]

Additionally, the Trial Chamber, in the case of Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana clarified the distinction between international and internal armed conflicts.[82] The Chamber specified that international armed conflicts are conflicts conducted by two or more states, whereas internal armed conflicts are those between a state and a non-state entity.[83]

In sum, it may be observed that while common article 3 and Additional Protocol II have differing thresholds of application,[84] the test employed by the ICTR to assess the applicability of these instruments to concrete situations is based on the same two factors, namely the organisation of the forces and the intensity of the conflict.[85] Additionally, ICTR jurisprudence reflects the higher threshold of Additional Protocol II in the requirement that the insurgent forces control a part of the territory of the state.

The interpretation evident in ICTR judgments may appear to elevate the threshold of applicability of common article 3 which, unlike article 1 of Additional Protocol II, does not prescribe any requirement as to the organisation of the forces or the intensity of the conflict. Such a conception would have no effect on the findings of the ICTR since whenever the Tribunal had considered the nature of the armed conflict in Rwanda in [81] See Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, paras. 250–251 and 256–258; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, paras. 93 and 436; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 172 and 597.

[82] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 170. Note that drawing such a distinction can be exceedingly difficult in practice and that the propriety of drawing such a distinction in the first place has been criticised. Application of Humanitarian Law in Non-International Armed Conflicts: Remarks by W. Michael Reisman, 85 AM. SOC'Y INT'L L. PROC. 83, 85, 87, 88 (1991).

[83] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 170. See also Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36, para. 72; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 247 ("... a non-international conflict is distinct from an international armed conflict because of the legal status of the entities opposing each other: the parties to the conflict are not sovereign States, but the government of a single State in conflict with one or more armed factions within its territory"); ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at 1351.

[84] See, e.g., Bothe et al., supra note 5, at p. 606 (noting that Additional Protocol II has a threshold of application "clearly above that of common Art. 3").

[85] This approach is in line with the general position of the ICTY that an inte armed conflict exists where there is "protracted armed violence between governmental iorities and organised armed groups or between such groups within a State." Prosecut Tadic, supra note 36, para. 70. See also, e.g., Prosecutor v. Furundzija (Case No. IT- 7/1-T), Judgment, 10 December 1998, para. 59; Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-T), Judgment, 16 November 1998, para. 183; Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-1-T),

1789

1994, it has concluded that it fell within the ambit not only of common article 3 but also of Additional Protocol II. However, the proposition that only conflicts of a certain intensity and involving forces with a certain level of organisation are within the scope of common article 3, if accepted and strictly applied, could result in the non-applicability of the protections of the article to other internal armed conflicts that may not rise to the level of carnage that Rwanda suffered in 1994.

Such a result could be at odds with the spirit of common article 3. In its Commentary, the ICRC rhetorically asked whether common article 3 is inapplicable where "armed strife" breaks out in a country, but, for example, does not involve an organised insurgent armed force.[86] The ICRC answered in the negative. "We do not subscribe to this view. We think, on the contrary, that the scope of application of the article must be as wide as possible."[87] With this caution in mind, the jurisprudence reviewed above in respect of determining whether a particular conflict falls within the scope of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II may serve as a useful guide in future cases.

B. Ratione Loci

Common article 3 and Additional Protocol II have no express provisions ratione loci. The ICTR jurisprudence indicates that once the conditions for applicability of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II are satisfied, their scope extends throughout the territory of the state where the hostilities are taking place without limitation to the "war front" or to the "narrow geographical context of the actual theatre of combat operations".[88] Therefore, the Tribunal has considered alleged violations of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II to be subject to its jurisdiction under article 4 of the ICTR Statute so long as they took place in the territory of Rwanda. For future applications what is dispositive, therefore, is not where in the territory the alleged violation occurred, but rather whether it involved a person protected by the instruments.

[86] See ICRC COMMENTARY: GENEVA CONVENTIONS, supra note 72, at 36.

[87] Ibid. See also Kiwanuka, supra note 69, at p. 244 (arguing for a broad application of common article 3: "... where a government takes extraordinary measures, that objectively reveal the existence of a military situation, there is an 'armed conflict' within the meaning of common article 3").

[88] See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 101; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, paras. 283–284; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, paras. 102–103; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 176, 182–183; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, paras. 635–636. This is also the position taken by the ICTY Appeals Chamber: Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36, para. 69. See also ICRC

C. Ratione Personae

1. Victims

Common article 3 extends its protection to "[p]ersons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause".[89] The ICRC Commentary explains this provision as follows:

> ... article 3 has an extremely wide field of application and covers members of the armed forces as well as persons who do not take part in the hostilities. In this instance, however, the article naturally applies first and foremost to civilians – that is to people who do not bear arms.[90]

Additional Protocol II applies to "all persons affected by an armed conflict".[91] The ICRC Commentary included in this category "persons who do not, or no longer take part in hostilities".[92] Article 4(1) of Additional Protocol II further specifies that its guarantees extend to "[a]ll persons who do not take a direct part or who have ceased to take part in hostilities".[93]

In essence, both common article 3 and Additional Protocol II protect persons not taking an active part in the hostilities.[94] The ICTY Appeals Chamber emphasised that common article 3 covers "any individual not taking part in the hostilities".[95] This is also the position taken by the ICTR.[96] The question to be answered simply is whether, at the time of the [89] Geneva Conventions, supra note 3, art. 3.

[90] ICRC COMMENTARY: GENEVA CONVENTIONS, supra note 72, at p. 40 (emphasis added).

[91] Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 2(1).

[92] ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at p. 1359. See also Smith, supra note 2, at p. 66.

[93] Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 4(1).

[94] See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 629. See also Green, supra note 14, at pp. 59, 231, 323, 325 ("In a non-international armed conflict civilians are protected by [common] article 3 ... which ... applies to civilians as well as those hors de combat". Ibid. at 231); Bothe et al., supra note 5, at p. 640; Hans-Peter Gasser, Protection of Civilian Population, in THE HANDBOOK OF HUMANITARIAN LAW IN ARMED CONFLICTS 214 (Dieter Fleck, ed., 1995); International Committee of the Red Cross, Memorandum on Compliance with International Humanitarian Law by Forces, "Operation Turquoise", Geneva, June 23, 1994, reprinted in Marco Sassoli & Antoine A. Bouvier, HOW DOES LAW PROTECT IN WAR?: CASES, DOCUMENTS AND TEACHING MATERIAL ON CONTEMPORARY PRACTICE IN INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW 1307, 1308 (1999).

[95] Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-A), Judgment, 20 February 2001, para. 420 (emphasis in original). Moreover, if there is "doubt as to a person's status, he is to be considered as a civilian". Green, supra note 14, at p. 234.

6342

alleged offence, the alleged victim was directly taking part in the hostilities.[97] If the answer is negative, the alleged victim was a person protected by common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[98]

2. Perpetrators

Until a recent correction by the ICTR Appeals Chamber,[99] the ICTR Trial Chambers had held that the applicability of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II ratione personae must be assessed not only in respect of victims, but also perpetrators.[100] Article 4 of the ICTR Statute provides that the Tribunal "shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of [common article 3 and Additional Protocol II]".

The Trial Chamber in the Akayesu case reasoned that since the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols primarily aim at protection of victims of armed conflicts, they are first of all "addressed to persons who by virtue of their authority, are responsible for the outbreak of, or are otherwise engaged in the conduct of hostilities".[101] Hence, according to this position, the responsibilities prescribed in these instruments normally fall to members of the armed forces, or to "individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 179; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 629.

97 See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 104; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 279; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 100; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 179; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 629. This is also the test used by the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. See Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-1-T), Opinion and Judgment, 7 May 1997, para. 615. The Tadic Trial Chamber noted, at para. 616: "It is unnecessary to define exactly the line dividing those taking an active part in hostilities and those who are not so involved. It is sufficient to examine the relevant facts of each victim and to ascertain whether, in each individual's circumstances, that person was actively involved in hostilities at the relevant time." To take a direct part in hostilities means, for the purposes of these provisions, to engage in acts of war that strike at personnel or equipment of the enemy armed forces. See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 104; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 279; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 100. See also ICRC COMMENTARY: ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, supra note 21, at p. 1453.

98 See Prosecutor v. Tadic, ibid., para. 615.

99 Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-A), Judgment, 1 June 2001, paras. 425–446.

100 See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 628 ("Two distinct issues arise with respect to personal jurisdiction over serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, the class of victims and the class of perpetrators").

to support or fulfil the war efforts".[102] These are the persons who, in the view of the Trial Chamber, constitute the class of potential perpetrators and who are consequently within the personal field of application of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.

The Chamber therefore set out that for Akayesu, a civilian mayor of a commune, to be held criminally responsible under article 4 of the ICTR Statute, the Prosecutor would have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt a link between him and one of the parties to the conflict, that is the forces of the Rwandan Government or the RPF.[103] After reviewing the relevant evidence, the Trial Chamber held that the Prosecutor did not meet this burden.[104] The Chamber found that the Prosecutor did not prove "beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu was a member of the armed forces, or that he was legitimately mandated and expected, as a public official or agent or person otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts".[105] Crucially for its holding, the Chamber did not see "how and in what capacity Akayesu was supporting the Government effort against the RPF".[106] In part because a link between Akayesu and a party to the conflict was not established, the Chamber found that Akayesu could not incur criminal responsibility under article 4 of the Statute for serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[107]

The analysis set out in Akayesu found favour with ICTR Trial Chambers in subsequent cases, until the Appeals Chamber held that the Trial Chamber in Akayesu erred on a point of law in restricting the application of common article 3 to a class of persons with a link to one of the parties.

102 Ibid., para. 631.

103 Ibid., para. 640.

104 Ibid., para. 643. The Chamber took into consideration that Akayesu wore a military jacket, carried a rifle, assisted the military upon their arrival in his commune, and referred to certain individuals as "RPF accomplices". Ibid., para. 641. The Chamber also noted that Akayesu represented the communal authority and that "he held an executive civilian position in the territorial administrative subdivision of [the] Commune". Ibid., para. 642. The Chamber decided, however, that evidence as to the wearing of a military uniform and carrying the rifle as well as that of "the limited assistance" given to the government forces was insufficient to establish that Akayesu actively supported the war effort.

105 Ibid., para. 643.

106 Ibid., para. 642.

107 Ibid., para. 644. The Trial Chamber's holding was criticised for setting and ing a "standard for civilian liability [that] is unduly high, in that it excludes Akayesu, lected official who held chief executive power in his community, who was a local repres ive of the national Government, and who gave some assistance to the Government's wa fort". Diane Marie Amann, Case Note, Prosecutor v. Akayesu, 93 AM. J. INT'L L. 195, 199

In Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, the Trial Chamber, concurred with the approach in Akayesu, opining that the laws of war apply only to members of armed forces and to individuals with a link to the forces.[108] The Chamber reasoned that although Kayishema, a civilian politician, and Ruzindana, a civilian businessman, had carried rifles and participated in massacres, there was no showing of their connection with the armed forces of either side. This position was based on the Chamber's finding that neither the Government forces nor the RPF were involved in the same massacres as Kayishema and Ruzindana.[109] In part because Kayishema and Ruzindana were not members of the armed forces and because the Prosecutor did not demonstrate a link between them and the armed forces, the Chamber held they did not incur criminal liability under article 4 of the ICTR Statute.[110]

The "class of perpetrator" notion from Akayesu also appeared in the judgment in the case of Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, rendered by the same judges who decided the Akayesu case.[111] The Trial Chamber in Rutaganda pointed out that "[u]nder common article 3 . . ., the perpetrator must belong to a 'Party' to the conflict, whereas under Additional Protocol II the perpetrator must be a member of the 'armed forces' of either the Government or of the dissidents".[112] The Chamber, however, proposed that the class of persons should be interpreted as broadly as possible[113] and repeated the test set out in Akayesu.[114] Applying this test to Rutaganda, a civilian [108] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, paras. 175 and 176. The Chamber wrote that the question is "whether the accused falls within the class of perpetrator s who may be held responsible for serious violations of [common article 3 and Additional Protocol II]". Ibid., para. 173. On this point the Chamber expounded that "individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent Parties fall within the class of perpetrators. If individuals do not belong to the armed forces, they could bear the criminal responsibility only when there is a link between them and the armed forces". Ibid., para. 175.

[109] Ibid., para. 619.

[110] Ibid., para. 624. Like the Akayesu holding on this point, this ruling was criticised. See Kelly D. Askin, Judgments Rendered in 1999 by the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda: Tadic; Aleksovski; Jelisic; Ruzindana & Kayishema; Serushago; Rutaganda, 6 ILSA J. INT'L & COMP. L. 485, 502, 504 (2000) ("The not guilty verdicts as to the common article 3 and Additional Protocol II counts were made based on determinations that the Prosecution did not prove that the Accused, both civilians, were suporting the Government efforts against the RPF (the standard seemingly erroneously adopted in Akayesu), and that therefore the Accused did not incur criminal liability for their crimes under article 4 of the Statute." Ibid. at 504).

[111] Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 33.

[112] Ibid., para. 96 (citation omitted).

[113] Ibid.

who was second vice president of Interahamwe, the ruling party's militia, the Chamber found that he "[fell] within the category of persons who can be held individually criminally responsible for serious violations of the provisions of article 4 of the Statute".[115] The necessary linkage between the accused and the government forces was established when the Chamber concluded that Rutaganda exerted control over the Interahamwe who, in turn, supported the effort of the Government forces against the RPF.[116]

Similarly, the Chamber in Prosecutor v. Musema invoked the notion of a class of perpetrators falling within the personal field of application of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II.[117] The Chamber, however, did not have the occasion to apply the test to determine whether a link between the accused and a party to the conflict existed.

Against this current of first instance ICTR jurisprudence,[118] however, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTR recently pointed out that "[a]rticle 4 makes no mention of a possible delimitation of classes of persons likely to be prosecuted under this provision".[119] Common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, like the ICTR Statute, do not specify classes of potential perpetrators; rather they indicate to whom their provisions apply. In the case of common article 3 this is "each Party to the conflict".[120] In respect of Additional Protocol II it is "all persons affected by an armed conflict".[121] The respective provisions of these instruments do not further clarify upon whom the obligation to respect them rests and therefore who could be responsible for their breach.[122]

[115] Ibid., para. 441.

[116] Ibid., para. 439.

[117] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, paras. 264–266. Under this conception, if a person had a link with a party to the conflict he or she "could fall into the class of individuals who may be held responsible for serious violations of internation al humanitaria n law". Ibid., paras. 274–275.

[118] The ICTR Appeals Chamber observed that the issue of a link between a perpetrator and a party to the conflict had arisen only once in ICTY jurisprudence, in a Trial Chamber's judgment in the case of Prosecutor v. Kunarac et al. (Case No. IT-96-23-T & IT-96-23/1-T), Judgment, 22 February 2001, para. 407. Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, 1 June 2001, para. 439. The ICTY Trial Chamber said: "It would appear to the Trial Chamber that common article 3 may also require some relationship to exist between a perpetrator and a party to the conflict." The ICTR Appeals Chamber, however, observed "that this holding finds no support either in Statute or in case law."

[119] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, para. 435.

[120] See Geneva Conventions, supra note 3, art. 3.

[121] See Additional Protocol II, supra note 4, art. 2(1).

[122] The ICRC Commentary on Additional Protocol II simply says that the field of application ratione personae includes "those who must, within the meaning of the Protocol,

Indeed, further clarification in respect of potential perpetrators is not necessary in view of the core purpose of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II: the protection of victims.[123] In the view of the ICTR Appeals Chamber, the protections of common article 3 imply effective punishment of perpetrators, whoever they may be.[124] In its judgment in the Akayesu case, the Appeals Chamber, as noted above, held that the Trial Chamber erred on a point of law when it restricted the application of common article 3 to a certain category of perpetrators.[125] The ICTR Appeals Chamber rejected the notion that a link between the perpetrator and one of the parties to the conflict should be a separate condition for criminal responsibility: "such a special relationship is not a condition precedent to the application of common article 3 and, hence of article 4 of the Statute".[126] The Appeals Chamber reasoned as follows:

> The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the minimum protection provided for victims under common article 3 implies necessarily effective punishment on persons who violate it. Now, such punishment must be applicable to everyone without discrimination, as required by the principles governing individual criminal responsibility as laid down by the Nuremberg Tribunal in particular. The Appeals Chamber is therefore of the opinion that international humanitarian law would be lessened and called into question if it were to be admitted that certain persons be exonerated from individual criminal responsibility for a violation of common article 3 under the pretext that they did not belong to a specific category.[127]

Criminal responsibility for acts covered by article 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal, therefore, does not depend on any particular classification of the alleged perpetrator. Consequently, it is not necessary to adjudicate whether the accused person belonged to any kind of a class of persons who could breach common article 3 or Additional Protocol II, or whether a link existed between him or her and one of the parties to the conflict. The judgment in Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, handed down shortly after the Akayesu appeal, illustrates this point.[128] While the Trial Chamber discussed the ratione personae of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II in respect of victims, the Bagilishema judgment contains no discussion of a class of perpetrators or of a requisite link between the accused and one of the parties.[129]

In conclusion, the ratione personae of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II extends to persons not taking an active part in the hostilities, including civilians and members of armed forces who have laid down their arms or have been placed hors de combat. A link between a perpetrator and any party to the conflict is not a factor in determining the applicability ratione personae of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II. On the other hand, such a link, if it exists, may be a factor in assessing the existence of another element, that of a nexus between the alleged act and the conflict.

D. The Nexus between the Alleged Violation and the Armed Conflict

For an offence to fall within the scope of article 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal, a Trial Chamber must find that there existed a nexus between the alleged breach of common article 3 or Additional Protocol II and the underlying armed conflict.[130] This requirement is best understood upon appreciation of the purpose of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. The purpose of these provisions is the protection of people as victims of internal armed conflicts,[131] not the protection of people against crimes unrelated to the conflict, however reprehensible such crimes may be.

Whether the requisite nexus existed at the time of the alleged offence is a matter for determination on the evidence adduced. It has been the position of both the ICTR and the ICTY that the nexus requirement is met if the alleged offence is "closely related to the hostilities" or is "committed in conjunction" with them.[132] However, in ICTR jurisprudence to date, the [123] See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, para. 442; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, paras. 603, 618, 630. See also Antonio Cassese, The Status of Rebels under the 1977 Geneva Protocol on Non-International Armed Conflicts, 30 INT'L & COMP. L.Q. 416, 418–19 (1981) (The Protocol "has an almost exclusively humanitarian content; in other words, it is primarily designed to protect 'victims' of the armed conflict . . . ." (emphases in original)).

[124] See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, para. 443.

[125] Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, paras. 444–445. Specifically, the category of persons in question in the Trial Chamber's judgment consisted of members of the armed forces "under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or to individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts". See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 631; Prosecutor v. Akavesu. supra note 99, para. 444.

[128] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34.

[129] See ibid., paras. 103–104.

[130] See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 105; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 259; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 104; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 185; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 643. This is also the position taken by the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36, para. 70.

[131] See Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 189.

[132] See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 105 ("The 'nexus' requirement is met when the offence is closely related to the hostilities or committed in conjunction

Trial Chambers have not been satisfied that the alleged offences bore the necessary nexus to the armed conflict.[133]

In Akayesu, the Chamber held that it had not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the alleged acts "were committed in conjunction with the armed conflict".[134] The Chamber reached this decision, without a further discussion, upon the analysis it had carried out to determine whether a link existed between Akayesu and one of the parties to the conflict. This may suggest that the Chamber treated the concepts of a link between the alleged perpetrator and a party to the conflict, and that of a nexus between the alleged act and the conflict, as so closely related that they did not merit distinct analysis. In the circumstances of the case this may have been an acceptable approach, although it is easy to appreciate that in other cases the alleged perpetrator may well have a link to one of the parties yet his or her acts may have nothing to do with the armed conflict. Conversely, although perhaps less likely, the alleged perpetrator could have no link with a party to the conflict, but his or her acts could be committed in conjunction with it.

The Appeals Chamber recognised that the "nexus between violations and the armed conflict implies that, in most cases, the perpetrator of the crime will probably have a special relationship with one party to the conflict".[135] However, since the existence of a link between the alleged perpetrator and a party to the conflict is not a condition precedent to the application of common article 3,[136] the analysis must focus on the nexus of the alleged act to the armed conflict.

In subsequent judgments, the Trial Chambers were more deliberate than in Akayesu in treating separately the issues of a link of the perpetrators and a nexus to the conflict. Before proceeding to evaluate the facts, the Trial Chamber in Kayishema & Ruzindana first highlighted that the aim of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II is to protect victims armed conflict."); Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 104 ("[T]he offence must be closely related to the hostilities or committed in conjunction with them."); Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 186; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 643 ("[I]t has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the acts ... were committed in conjunction with the armed conflict.") This is also the position taken by the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. See, e.g., Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36 ("It is sufficient that the alleged crimes were closely related to the hostilities occurring in other parts of the territories controlled by the parties to the conflict.")

133 See Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 974; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 444; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 623; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 643.

134 Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 643.

135 Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 99, para. 444.

136 Ibid.

of internal armed conflicts[137] and, therefore, stressed the necessity of establishing a nexus between the alleged crimes and the conflict.

> It is important to establish whether all the crimes committed during the non-international armed conflict should be considered as crimes connected with serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. The Chamber is of the opinion that only offences, which have a nexus with the armed conflict, fall within this category. If there is not a direct link between the offences and the armed conflict there is no ground for the conclusion that common article 3 and Protocol II are violated.[138]

The Chamber, however, found that while there was an armed conflict in Rwanda at the time of the alleged events, the massacres in which the accused Kayishema and Ruzindana participated were not committed in "direct conjunction" with the armed conflict.[139] Rather, in the view of the Chamber, the massacres "were committed as part of a distinct policy of genocide; they were committed parallel to, and not as a result of, the armed conflict".[140]

The Trial Chamber in Kayishema & Ruzindana seems to have raised the bar on the proof of nexus between the alleged acts and the armed conflict. Whereas the judgment in the case of Akayesu speaks only about acts being committed "in conjunction" with the conflict,[141] in Kayishema & Ruzindana this test has been set out as acts committed "in direct conjunction" with the conflict.[142] Similarly, while the ICTY Appeals Chamber wrote that it is "sufficient that the alleged crimes were closely related to the hostilities",[143] the judges in Kayishema & Ruzindana were apparently looking for more, that the acts be the "result of" the armed conflict.[144]

This elevated nexus standard makes it more difficult to prove that the acts were within the scope of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II and that as such they are punishable under article 4 of the ICTR Statute. Although the Chamber, in the case of Prosecutor v. Rutaganda,[145] did not repeat the words of the Kayishema & Ruzindana judgment on this point, it is palpable that the Tribunal adhered to a high nexus standard.

137 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 189.

138 Ibid., para. 185.

139 Ibid., para. 623.

140 Ibid., para. 621.

141 See Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 643.

142 Ibid., para. 623 (emphasis added).

143 Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36, para. 70. See also, e.g., Prosecutor v. Ta upra note 97, para. 573.

144 See Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 622. See also osecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 105 ("The Chamber will determine wh ...er the alleged acts were committed against the victims because of the conflict at issue" (emphasis added)).

Rutaganda was second vice president of the Interahamwe militia.[146] The Chamber found that he was in a position of authority vis-à-vis the Interahamwe[147] and that this militia supported the Government forces' war effort against the RPF.[148] Based on this, the Chamber acknowledged that "there is merit in the submission of the Prosecutor that, considering the position of authority of the Accused over the Interahamwe, and the role that the Interahamwe served in supporting the RAF [the Government forces] against the RPF, there is a nexus between the crimes committed and the armed conflict".[149] However, because the Prosecutor did not sufficiently prove that Rutaganda's acts formed part of the support to the Government forces in the conflict against the RPF, in the view of the Chamber, it held that it had not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt that a nexus existed between his acts and the armed conflict.[150]

In Kayishema & Ruzindana the Chamber suggested that no nexus test "can be defined in abstracto".[151] A case-by-case determination on the facts must be carried out.[152] Therefore, it may not be useful to engage in polemics about the precise words used in the various judgments to describe in the abstract the required nexus between the acts and the conflict. This notwithstanding, the ICTR Trial Chambers, thus far, seem to require a very direct conjunction between the alleged acts and the armed conflict. The requirement of showing a nexus between the alleged acts and the conflict is a justified consequence of the purpose of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. However, if the nexus standard is set too high, perpetrators may win impunity in respect of their violations of international humanitarian law applicable to internal armed conflicts.

E. Specific and Serious Violations

The final steps in determining the applicability of article 4 of the ICTR Statute to particular alleged facts are ascertaining whether the alleged violations were serious and whether the allegations prove the specific elements of the offences. As the Tribunal has not yet engaged in the analysis of facts against elements of the offences charged under article 4, much cannot be said on this point. Suffice it to note that the judgments of the Tribunal have laid out the specific elements of murder and rape as crimes against

146 Ibid., para. 441.

147 Ibid., para. 439.

148 Ibid., para. 440.

149 Ibid.

150 Ibid., para. 444. The Chamber's determination of the nexus issue in Rutaganda has been considered "unconvincing". See Askin, supra note 122, at p. 505.

humanity, and that the Trial Chambers consider these elements applicable to the corresponding offences under article 4.[153] Additionally, in the Musema judgment, the Trial Chamber set out the elements of torture, humiliating and degrading treatment, and indecent assault as violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II within the scope of article 4 of the Statute.[154]

Article 4 of the Statute grants the Tribunal jurisdiction over serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. The Tribunal has stated that a serious violation within the meaning of article 4 of the Statute is a breach of a rule protecting important values with grave consequences for the victim.[155] On this basis, the Tribunal has determined that the acts enumerated in article 4 of the Statute constitute serious violations of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II, entailing individual criminal responsibility.[156] Consequently, should the Prosecutor prove that any of the acts set out in article 4 of the Statute have occurred, a Chamber will consider such act to constitute a serious violation within the meaning of article 4.

153 See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 102; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 285; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 107.

154 Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 285.

155 See Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 34, para. 102; Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 286; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 106; Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 184; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 616. This position is based on a decision of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia where the Tribunal stated that "the violation must be serious, that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim". Prosecutor v. Tadic, supra note 36, para. 94.

156 See Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 34, para. 288; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda, supra note 34, para. 106 ("The fundamental guarantees included in article 4 of the Statute represent elementary considerations of humanity. Violations thereof would, by their very nature, be deemed serious."); Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 184; Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 616. For example, in Prosecutor v. Akayesu, supra note 33, para. 616, the Trial Chamber wrote: "The list of serious violations which is provided in article 4 of the Statute is taken from common article 3 – which contains fundamental prohibitions as a humanitarian minimum of protection for war victims – and article 4 of Additional Protocol II, which equally outlines "Fundamental Guarantees". The list in article 4 of the Statute thus comprises serious violations [illegible] the fundamental humanitarian guarantees which, as has been stated above, are recogn[illegible] as part of international customary law" (emphasis in original). Similarly, the Cha[illegible] in Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 34, para. 184 stated: "The list of [illegible]ibited acts, which is provided in article 4 of the ICTR Statute, as well as in common article 3 and in article 4 of Protocol II, undeniably should be recognised as serious violations entailing individual criminal responsibility."

CONCLUSION

We have seen the extent to which the jurisprudence of the ICTR has elucidated the provisions of common article 3 and Additional Protocol II. Until recently common article 3 was seen as so vague that its prescriptions could be hardly ascertained and thus could easily be evaded. Owing in good part to the Tribunal's work, it is now possible to assess whether an alleged factual situation falls within the ambit of international humanitarian law applicable in internal armed conflicts and whether it transgresses the rules enshrined in that law.

Furthermore, as a result of the establishment and jurisprudence of the ICTR and the ICTY, it is now accepted that serious violations of the norms indicated in common article 3 and Additional Protocol II carry individual criminal responsibility. The two United Nations tribunals have highlighted that the law governing internal strife is indeed ascertainable and enforceable. The work of the tribunals has thus shown a way for future penal enforcement of the fundamental norms of international humanitarian law applicable in non-international armed conflicts. Without a doubt, this will contribute to the repression of breaches of such norms and will improve the situation of victims of internal armed conflicts.

Not long ago, Stefan Oeter observed that if international lawyers take seriously the order-preserving role of international law in the world community, > they must set limits on the use of military force in wars as well as in civil wars, and not only on a symbolic level, but also on a practical level. International law must endeavour to implement and enforce these rules, if it wants to be taken seriously as a discipline of law, and may not restrict itself to merely symbolic or programmatic rhetoric.[157]

The judgments of the ad hoc tribunals are evidence that the legal rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflicts are now more than promises or rhetoric, they are law. To the benefit of victims, the international community has shown its growing resolve to enforce this law: first, on an ad hoc basis, in respect of the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia, Rwanda, and Sierra Leone, and globally, through the permanent International Criminal Court.[158]

---

157 Oeter, supra note 5, at 216.

158 The Statute of the International Criminal Court came into force on 1 July 2002, in accordance with article 126 of the Statute, supra note 32. Article 8(2)(c) of the Statute gives the Court jurisdiction over serious violations of common article 3 and article 8(2)(e) gives the Court jurisdiction over "[o]ther serious violations of the laws and customs applicable in armed conflict not of an international character, within the established framework of

MAME MANDIAYE NIANG*

THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was set up to prosecute persons responsible for the most serious crimes the world has ever known, namely genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.[1] The gravity of these crimes combined with the intricacies of the common law procedure largely followed by the ICTR, with which the accused are far from familiar,[2] render the right to counsel a paramount necessity for a full and unfettered defence.

Article 20 of the ICTR Statute, which recites Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, provides that "[t]he accused shall be entitled to . . . defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interest of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it . . ." The Rules of Procedure and Evidence extend this principle of legal assistance of the accused to the mere suspect when the latter is being questioned by the Prosecutor.[3] The ICTR attributes such importance to the right to legal assistance that even when an accused

---

* Legal Officer, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. Master in Private Law [with distinction] 1985, University of Dakar (Senegal); Certificate of Ecole Nationale d'Administration de Magistrature [with distinction] 1987. The opinions expressed in this article are the author's and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the United Nations.

1 Article 1 of the ICTR Statute defines its jurisdiction. Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute set out the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. There is no specific reference to war crimes. However the new and wide definition of war crimes (see Article 8 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court) encompasses violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II.

2 All the persons prosecuted before the ICTR but one have been citizens of Rwanda, a country belonging to the civil law tradition of criminal procedure.

3 According to Rule 42:

> (A) A suspect who is to be questioned by the Prosecutor shall have the following rights, of which he shall be informed by the Prosecutor prior to questioning, in a language he has elected not to defend himself or herself either by self-representation or through defence counsel, choosing instead to boycott the trial, the Tribunal, going beyond its statutory obligations, has deemed it necessary to appoint a counsel to safeguard his or her interests.[4]

As in most of national jurisdictions, the principle of legal assistance in the ICTR texts is designed following a two-fold pattern: the accused or the suspect may retain counsel of choice when he or she can afford the costs involved; in the case of indigence, counsel is assigned at the Tribunal's expense.[5] Thus far, all persons accused before the ICTR have claimed to be indigent.[6] As a result, counsel have been assigned for their defence at the expense of the Tribunal.

Contrary to the saying "he who cannot pay cannot choose", the issue of choice of counsel as well as their removal is a very live issue in ICTR daily practice. Most accused have at least once refused an assigned counsel or have expressed the wish to change the counsel assigned to them.[7] Of course, the issue of assignment or withdrawal of counsel is addressed as it arises.

Difficulties lie in the fact that different organs of the Tribunal may be involved, not always in the most orderly fashion, in dealing with these matters. The Registrar, the President acting under her administrative

(i) The right to be assisted by counsel of his choice or to have legal assistance assigned to him without payment if he does not have sufficient means to pay for it.

[...]

(B) Questioning of a suspect shall not proceed without the presence of counsel unless the suspect has voluntarily waived his right to counsel. In case of waiver, if the suspect subsequently expresses a desire to have counsel, questioning shall thereupon cease, and shall only resume when the suspect has obtained or has been assigned counsel.

[4] Prosecutor v. Barayagwiza (Case No. ICTR-97-19-T), Decision on Defence Counsel Motion to Withdraw, 2 November 2000. A somewhat similar ruling was made in the Milosevic case: Prosecutor v. Milosevic (Case No. IT-99-37-PT), Order Inviting Designation of Amicus Curiæ , 31 August 2001. Rather than appoint defence counsel, the ICTY Trial Chamber asked the Registrar to appoint three amici curiae charged with presenting the arguments that the accused could put forward and exploiting any evidence that might exonerate the accused.

[5] Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 53 S. Ct. 55, 77 L.Ed. 158 (1932).

[6] Roland Amoussouga, La problématique d'appui aux victimes, September 2000.

[7] An internal document produced by the Section of Lawyers and Detention Facilities indicates that of twenty-five accused, only nine have not changed counsel. A dozen have changed counsel more than twice, including: Arsène Ntahobali (three times), Elie Ndayambaje (three times), Georges Rutaganda (three times), Hassan Ngeze (three times), Jean-Bosco Barayagwiza (three times), Joseph Nzirorera (three times), etc. ...

authority, the Bureau,[8] the Judges sitting in Trial Chambers or in the Appeals Chamber, may all at one point in time be called upon to address an issue of assignment or withdrawal of counsel. This inflation of competence over the same subject matter has generated an important body of jurisprudence worthy of examination.

A. STANDARD FOR ASSIGNMENT OF COUNSEL

Assignment of counsel is governed by Rules 44, 44*bis* and 45 of the Rules, complemented by the Directive on the Assignment of Counsel (the Directive) as well as some other regulations issued by the Office of the Registrar.[9] They set forth the criteria for assignment of counsel and the procedure to be followed. Rule 45(A) provides: "A list of counsel who speak one or both of the working languages of the Tribunal, meet the requirements of Rule 44, have at least ten years' relevant experience and have indicated their willingness to be assigned by the Tribunal to indigent suspects or accused, shall be kept by the Registrar." Rule 44, to which reference is made,[10] establishes that to be eligible, a person must be admitted to the practice of law in a state, or be a university professor of law.

The requirements of language ability and willingness to represent indigent persons have not hitherto given rise to any controversy. All counsel registered on the list kept by the Registrar come from English or French speaking countries. The willingness to represent a suspect or an accused may be presumed from counsel's application to be enrolled on the Registrar's list. Besides, before being appointed, counsel reiterate in writing their commitment to represent indigent accused throughout the proceedings. However, the criterion relating to the relevant experience as well as other requirements not specifically provided for in the Rules have been the source of controversy.

[8] Pursuant to Rule 23 of the Rules, the Bureau is composed of the President, the Vice-President and the Presiding Judges of the Trial Chambers.

[9] See the Information Circular on Assignment of Defence Counsel issued by the Office of the Registrar on 22 November 1999.

[10] Rule 44 governs the standard to be applied to counsel engaged and paid by a suspect or an accused. The only requirement under this Rule to qualify to represent an accused or a suspect is to be admitted in a national bar or to be a professor of law, regardless of the length of time during which such an activity has been performed. Surprisingly, Rule 44 bis, governing the assignment of a duty counsel for an indigent accused, sets out the same requirements as Rule 44. It would make more sense to copy the requirements to qualify as duty counsel from Rule 45, which governs the qualifications of assigned counsel. However, in practice all duty counsel enrolled on the Registrar's list satisfy the requirements of

In ICTR practice, counsel have at times seen their application to be enrolled on the list of assigned counsel refused by the Office of the Registrar on the ground that they do not meet the requirements set forth in the relevant texts governing the subject. The reasons exposed in the Registrar's letter of refusal usually resolve the issue, because the applicable test looks straightforward at first glance. However some decisions of the Registrar refusing the appointment of a counsel or a co-counsel have been challenged and have generated interesting developments with respect to the standard to be applied. Two decisions require particular mention.

In Ntakirutimana, lead counsel sought judicial review of the Registrar's denial of his request for the appointment of a specific co-counsel. In part, the Registrar denied appointment on the ground that the person chosen did not meet the requirements of the Rules governing the assignment of counsel. After noting that the candidate did not qualify as a lawyer admitted to the practice of law in a state, nor did he fully establish his activities as a professor of law, a single Judge of Trial Chamber I redefined the standard for assignment, focussing on the rationale which underlies the requirements set forth in the Rules.

"The purpose of these provisions is to ensure assignment of counsel with relevant and extensive expertise at a high level who can mount an effective defence of the accused", the Judge wrote.[11] "Mr. G ... served as a Prosecutor for three years and as a judge, including as Presiding Judge of the Court of Appeals, for sixteen years in Rwanda ..."[12] Accordingly,

> [t]here is every reason to assume that he has valuable experience in criminal proceedings which may be useful for the Defence in the present case. It is also noted that among his publications figure a manual for the police and a commentary on the law of 30 August 1996 concerning the prosecution of crimes constituting genocide and crimes against humanity. Even if he was a visiting-not permanent-professor at academic institutions the Chamber is convinced that his qualifications, seen as a whole, are sufficient to meet the requirements of Rules 44 and 45 and Articles 13 and 15 of the Directive.[13]

In Nyiramasuhuko, the Chamber, in instructing the Registrar to assign a co-counsel, expanded upon the criteria to be taken into consideration, to include "the resources of the Tribunal, competence and recognised experience of counsel, geographical distribution, a balance of the principal legal systems of the world, irrespective of the age, gender, race or nationality of the candidates".[14]

[11] Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana & Ntakirutimana (Case No. ICTR-96-10-T, ICTR-96-17-T), Decision, 13 July 2001, para. 17 in fine.

[12] Ibid, para. 19.

[13] Ibid. (emphasis added).

[14] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko & Ntahobali (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Decision, [illegible]

The standards set out in the Ntakuritimana and Nyiramasuhuko decisions present obvious advantages, as the Chamber, in allowing itself to look into the substantive qualifications of the candidate, may be in a better position to determine the fundamental issue of ability of a person to perform satisfactorily the tasks for which he or she is assigned. However there is a risk involved in embarking on the use of such a wide and hazy test as "valuable experience" or "relevant expertise", as the Chambers did in both decisions. The introduction of subjective elements of assessment may eventually lead to adoption of a position totally contrary to the clear provisions of the Rules. Indeed, in focussing on the allegedly rationale underlying the formal requirements of the Rules, nothing theoretically prevents a Chamber from denying the appointment of a lawyer or professor of law who meets the formal requirements of the Rules, but who the Judges do not find having justified enough practice or enough ability to handle criminal cases.

The piecemeal elements referred to as constituting "relevant expertise" in Ntakirutimana make it difficult to catch the real test being used, particularly in light of the operative part of the Ntakirutimana decision, where the Chamber orders the defence to produce evidence with respect to the candidate's qualification as professor of law. After having dwelt at length on the relevant expertise of the candidate "seen as a whole", did the Chamber simply come back to the criteria set forth in the Rules? Otherwise the order does not make much sense.

The more or less free interpretation of the Rules also raises the question of the limits of the discretion of the Judges. Normally when a rule is clear enough to be understood as it stands, Judges should stick to it. Resort to teleological interpretation is allowed only when the intent of the legislator is not discernable at first glance. To do otherwise amounts to usurping the role of the legislator.[15]

B. PROCEDURE FOR ASSIGNMENT OF COUNSEL

Rule 45 of the Rules entrusts the Registrar with keeping a list of counsel meeting the specified criteria. Once the requirement of indigence is satisfied by an accused,[16] a counsel chosen from the list is assigned. The question of free choice of counsel arises. The litigation arisi[illegible] from [15] Actually, the judges are also the legislators, as far as the Rules are conce[illegible]. But they act in such capacity only when they meet at the plenary session held in a[illegible]dance with Rule 6.

[16] The criteria of indigence as well as the procedure for determining it are set out in Articles 4 through 12 of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel.

6350

the choice is dealt with following a procedure set forth in the relevant provisions of the Rules, the Directive and the Tribunal's case law.

Article 10 of the Directive, indicates that the Registrar, after being satisfied that the suspect or the accused meets the requirement of indigence, "... shall decide ... to assign counsel and choose for this purpose a name from the list drawn up in accordance with Article 13 ..." (emphasis added). This seems to indicate clearly that the Registrar is able not only to appoint counsel but also to choose counsel from the list. Several holdings of Trial Chambers seem to go along with the discretionary power of the Registrar to choose assigned counsel.[17]

However, most of the accused being tried before the Tribunal do not accept that free choice of counsel only applies to those being retained and paid by the accused. The fact that they are indigent should not, they think, deprive them of choosing freely the counsel they want. In some decisions, although the discretionary power of the Registrar was not called into question, it was held that indigent accused should be offered the opportunity of designating the counsel of choice from the list drawn up by the Registrar.[18] In fact, the general practice of the Registrar's Office has always consisted of requesting the indigent accused to choose three names from the list, in order of preference. The Registrar will respect the choice expressed by the accused in appointing counsel, unless he has good reason to do otherwise.[19] The flexibility of the Registry in accommodating the accused has gone even further, when the accused has chosen counsel not on the list. In such cases, the Registrar requests counsel to make a formal application to be enrolled on the list.[20]

Sometimes the Registry and the accused do not agree upon appointment of a particular counsel. The Appeals Chamber has not been entirely clear on the scope of the right of the accused to choice of counsel in case of indigence. In Akayesu, it seemed to recognise such a right deriving from a practice followed by the Registrar. The Chamber held that "... the [17] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Prosecutor v. Bicamumpaka (Case No. ICTR-99-50-I), Decision, 6 October 1999, para. 11.

[18] Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana (Case No. ICTR-96-17-T), Decision, 11 June 1997.

[19] This practice is governed by Information Circular N.2 of 22 November 1999.

[20] The case of counsel for Alfred Musema, Maître Honneger, who was first appointed in Switzerland during the proceedings held before that country's courts. Upon transfer of the accused to Arusha, Musema expressed his wish to be assisted by the same counsel. Honneger was therefore asked to apply to be enrolled on the list kept by the Registry. Thereafter she was formally assigned as counsel for the accused. Jérôme Bicumpaka made a similar request for the assignment of Francine Veilleux: Prosecutor v. Bicumpaka (Case No. ICTR-99-50-I), Decision, 6 October 1999.

Registrar gave the Appellant a legitimate expectation that Mr. ... would be assigned to represent him before the Tribunal".[21]

In recent decisions, a clearer position on this issue has been taken by the Appeals Chamber. Jean Kambanda, who was the first accused to be sentenced by the ICTR, following his guilty plea, challenged his conviction on the question of right to counsel. Kambanda submitted that his defence was vitiated due to the lack of free choice of counsel. The Appeals Chamber, settling definitively this issue, held that an indigent accused has no right to counsel of choice. The judges recalled the jurisprudence of numerous domestic jurisdictions as well as that of the European Court of Human Rights, which has taken the same view.[22]

The Appeals Chamber confirmed this position in dismissing the appeal of Jean-Paul Akayesu. It held that > an indigent accused may choose from among counsel in the list and the Registrar generally takes into consideration the choice of the accused. Nevertheless, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber the Registrar is not necessarily bound by the wishes of an indigent accused. He has wide discretion, which he exercises in the interest of justice (emphasis added).[23]

The limits of the liberty of choice of a counsel by an indigent accused are clearly defined. Thus, the Registrar's discretion is subject to review.

C. THE REVIEW PROCESS ON ASSIGNMENT OF COUNSEL

Article 12 of the Directive distinguishes between the suspect, the accused at the stage of the initial appearance and the accused thereafter. The suspect whose request for assignment of counsel is denied may challenge the decision of the Registrar before the President of the Tribunal. As far as the accused is concerned, depending on the stage of the proceedings, he or she may challenge the Registrar's decision either before the Trial Chamber that sits for the initial appearance, or before the Trial Chamber assigned for the trial, by way of preliminary motion. In the latter case, as it applies to all preliminary motions, the motion to be admissible is to be filed within a prescribed time limit.[24]

[21] Akayesu v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-96-4-A), Decision, 27 July 1999.

[22] Kambanda v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-97-23-A), Judgment, 19 October [illegible].

[23] Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-A), Judgment, 16 May 2001.

[24] Calculation of the deadline appears to be confusing because it is dealt with di[illegible]ntly in two provisions. As a preliminary motion governed by Rule 72 of the Rules, th[illegible]rty-day time limit starts from the disclosure by the Prosecutor to the Defence of the material set forth in Rule 66(A). Article 12 of the Directive provides that the sixty-day time limit

Article 12 of the Directive is silent about the review process open to the accused after the time limit for filing preliminary motions has elapsed, or when the trial has started. This provision was certainly drafted on the assumption that at the trial stage the issue of assignment of counsel cannot arise because the accused must have already been assigned counsel for the defence at the pre-trial stage. However, this assumption may be wrong where the suspect who has later become an accused has consistently waived the right to counsel and has elected to act in his or her own defence,[25] but has a change of mind during the trial when, for the first time, he or she requests that the Registrar assign defence counsel. Apart from this flaw, the review process described in Article 12 seems to be quite complete and clearly set up.

However, the case law on review of decisions of the Registrar in respect of assignment of counsel shows that there is still confusion. First, the Registrar's Office in some cases has contended that it has a discretionary power to assign co-counsel, which should not be subject to judicial review.[26] The Trial Chamber has not upheld this position.[27] On the other hand, the President has been asked to review cases where only a Chamber should be competent to adjudicate. The President has nonetheless exercised jurisdiction.[28] Lastly, although noting that the Directive does not contemplate appeal before the Appeals Chamber, following precedents set by the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY),[29] the Appeals Chamber has consistently held that "... in respect of a decision to assign counsel to represent an Appellant before the Appeals Chamber, a right of recourse to the Appeals Chamber is required for the effective exercise of the Appellant's rights under Article 20(4) of the Statute of the Tribunal ..."[30] The Appeals Chamber's position has widened the scope of the review process and has made it more complicated in the sense that the first review before the [25] The defendant may also have become indigent after having previously retained paid counsel.

[26] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko, supra note 14, para. 8.

[27] Ibid.

[28] Rutaganda v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-96-3-A), President's Review of the Decision of the Registrar in terms of Article 12 of the Directive on the Assignment of Defence Counsel, Decision, 7 July 2000. In retaining the competence of the President, the decision erroneously relied upon Article 12A of the Directive, which only applies to suspects. The proceedings were at the appeals stage, and thus Rutaganda was no longer a suspect.

[29] Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-A), Decision, 6 May 1999, and Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-A), Decision, 24 June 1999.

[30] Akayesu v. Prosecutor, supra note 21. The same position was taken in Barayagwiza

President or the Trial Chamber no longer closes the issue of assignment of counsel. As a result, accused persons have a third level of review open to them by the Appeals Chamber.[31]

D. WITHDRAWAL OF COUNSEL

Rules 45(H), 45 ter(B), 46(C), Article 19 of the Directive, and the jurisprudence of the Tribunal set forth the standard to be applied as well as the procedure to be followed.

1. STANDARD FOR WITHDRAWAL OF COUNSEL

Counsel may be withdrawn for several reasons, but these may be boiled down to two categories,[32] which are not always easy to distinguish: exceptional circumstances and wrongdoing of counsel.

The relevant texts do not specify the meaning or the content of "exceptional circumstances", leaving the definition to the wisdom of those charged to apply the Rules and the other relevant texts. The case law on the notion of "exceptional circumstances" is wide ranging. Some decisions of the Appeals Chamber reduce the notion to nothing, ordering the Registrar to appoint a new counsel without bothering to qualify the "exceptional circumstances" warranting the change.[33] Other decisions elaborate further on the subject. "Exceptional circumstances" were found in cases of non-availability of counsel due either to medical reasons of counsel[34] or [31] The position of the Appeals Chamber might make more sense if once the proceedings reach the appeal stage the review of the Registrar's decision was left to the Appeals Chamber. Unfortunately this is not the case, as reflected in Rutaganda v. Prosecutor, supra note 28, where the President exercised her jurisdiction despite the fact the proceedings were at the stage of appeal.

[32] In setting out the standard for withdrawal of counsel, Article 19 of the Directive distinguishes between: (1) exceptional circumstances, (2) serious violations of the Code of Conduct, (3) misconduct which has resulted in a refusal of audience by a Chamber, (4) where counsel no longer satisfies the requirements of Article 13(i), is no longer admitted to practice law in a State or is no longer a professor of law at a university, and (4) failure to observe the undertaking made pursuant to Rule 45 ter, i.e., availability within a reasonable time upon assignment. Apart from the fourth criterion, that has never been brought into play to the author's knowledge, the other criteria are applied without a clear distinction.

[33] Akayesu v. Prosecutor, supra note 21; Barayagwiza v. Prosecutor, supra note 1.

[34] Prosecutor v. Imanishimwe (Case No. ICTR-99-46-T), Décision de Retrait de la Commission d'office de Maître So'o, conseil adjoint de M. Samuel Imanishimwe, 17 May members of counsel's family[35] or because counsel had given priority to other domestic commitments.[36]

On the other hand, breakdown in communication and loss of confidence have been held to constitute "exceptional circumstances". In several decisions loss of confidence and breakdown in communication were motivated by the ineffectiveness of counsel's assistance, illustrated by unjustified absences of counsel from the proceedings.[37] In Nyiramasuhuko & Ntahobali, the Chamber found that "the breakdown in communication and trust between the accused and his defence team, a situation which the Chamber has even observed in Court on several occasions since the start of the trial of the Accused constitutes exceptional circumstances within the ambit of Rule 45(H) of the Rules."[38] The Chamber conceded that it was unaware of the underlying reasons for the breakdown in communication[39] and somehow suspected the accused bore the responsibility.[40] In an earlier decision in Akayesu, Trial Chamber I found "exceptional circumstances" warranting the change of counsel in the lack of confidence expressed by the accused, without any reasons being given as to the circumstances underlying the loss of confidence.[41]

One may infer from the findings of these two decisions that accused persons run the show. It suffices for them to express their loss of confidence in assigned counsel or to refuse to collaborate with counsel, in order to terminate their assignment.[42] Such power has been expressly recognised in Barayagwiza, where the Chamber, in refusing the withdrawal sought by both lead counsel and co-counsel upon being notified by the accused that he no longer wanted them to represent him in the proceedings, made the following finding:

[35] Prosecutor v. Nteziryayo (Case No. ICTR-97-29-T), Decision of withdrawal of Mr. Richard Perras as co-counsel of the Accused Alphonse Nteziryayo; 15 February 2002.

[36] Prosecutor v. Bagosora (Case No. ICTR-98-41-T), Décision de retrait de la commission d'office de Maître Jacques Larochelle, conseil adjoint de M. Théoneste Bagosora; 8 January 2002.

[37] Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Decision, 31 October 1996; Prosecutor v. Rutaganda (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T), Decision, 31 October 1997.

[38] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko & Ntahobali (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Decision, 22 June 2001, para. 14.

[39] Ibid, para. 15.

[40] Ibid, para. 16.

[41] Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Decision, 20 November 1996.

[42] In some cases, the difficulty in spelling out the reasons underlying the loss of confidence lies with unjustified fears of counsel about breaching lawyer-client privilege. See Prosecutor v. Ngeze (Case No. ICTR-97-27-I), Separate and dissenting opinion of Judge Gunawardana, 29 March 2001. Another consequence of the almost absolute power of the

> This is not an unequivocal termination of Counsel's mandate. Unless Mr. Barayagwiza makes a clear and unequivocal decision to terminate representation, the Chamber has to deny the request for withdrawal (emphasis added).[43]

Some decisions have departed from this approach by refusing withdrawal of counsel when the Registrar or the Judges have found that the difficulty lay with the accused's behaviour.[44] However, attempts to refuse the dictates of the accused have been doomed to failure whenever the accused has persisted in unwillingness to cooperate with assigned counsel.[45] The compromise which the Chambers have come up with seems to be that a request for withdrawal of assigned counsel may be granted even without exceptional circumstances being justified, so long as such withdrawal does not delay the proceedings.[46] This shift in the criteria from "exceptional circumstances" to "request not designed to delay the proceedings" is not consistent with the spirit of Rule 45(H), which does not set up alternate criteria but rather cumulative criteria. However, practical concerns, particularly the need to avoid deadlocks in the conduct of the proceedings, have led to more flexibility in assessing and applying the "exceptional circumstances".

Besides the "exceptional circumstances", wrongdoing of counsel may also lead to withdrawal. Upon his/her assignment a counsel undertakes to be available for the needs of the proceedings before the Tribunal, which take priority over any other domestic commitments. Counsel is also expected to have a certain conduct as an officer of the court. A Code of Professional Conduct for Defence Counsel promulgated by the Registrar on 8 June 1998 sets forth the high standards of professional conduct [43] Prosecutor v. Barayagwiza (Case No. ICTR-97-19-T), Decision, 2 November 2000, para. 27.

[44] Prosecutor v. Ngeze, supra note 42; Prosecutor v. Nzuwonemeye (Case No. ICTR-2000-56-I), Registrar's decision denying Mr. François-Xavier Nzuwonemeye Request for Withdrawal of assignment of his counsel, Mr. François-Xavier Charvet, 24 July 2001; Prosecutor v. Bagambiki (Case No. ICTR-99-46-T), Décision du Greffier rejetant la demande formée par Emmanuel Bagambiki en vue du retrait de la commission d'office de Maître Luc Boutin, 29 May 2001.

[45] In Bagambiki, ibid, the Registrar ended up withdrawing the assignment of co-counsel Luc Boutin due to the persistent refusal of the accused to have any contact with him. In Ngeze, supra note 44, one of the reasons for not granting the accused's request was that the Chamber was not convinced that it was not intended to delay the proceedin[illegible] see the penultimate paragraph on page 4 of the decision.

[46] Prosecutor v. Ntagerura (Case No. ICTR-99-46-T), Oral decision on l[illegible]erura's motion for withdrawal of the Lead counsel Faky Konaté, 18 September 2000. The [illegible]amber found that the exceptional circumstances were not justified. However, given that co-counsel Benoît Henry was ready to proceed with the case, the Chamber ordered the Registrar to withdraw counsel Konaté from the case.

expected from counsel appearing before the ICTR. A counsel remains bound by his or her own domestic codes of practice and ethics in so far as they do not contradict the regulations of the Tribunal.

Failure of counsel to observe one of the above-mentioned requirements has resulted in withdrawal. Unfortunately a number of decisions keep referring to "exceptional circumstances", although in substance, the criteria which have been brought into play are "the breaches of the undertakings made by counsel".[47] However, a few decisions clearly refer to the relevant criteria. In Musema, the Registrar had been instructed to withdraw counsel whose conduct had been found by the Chamber to obstruct the proceedings and to be contrary to the interests of justice.[48] In the Registrar's decision of 5 February 2002, the lead counsel was discharged principally on grounds of financial dishonesty, which constitutes a serious violation of the Code of Conduct for Defence Counsel.[49]

2. PROCEDURE FOR WITHDRAWAL OF COUNSEL

The procedure for withdrawal of counsel is described in Rules 45, 45 ter and Article 19 of the Directive. Two issues may arise from these provisions, the initiative of withdrawal and review of decisions on withdrawal.

There is a correlation between the ground underlying the withdrawal and the procedure to be followed. If withdrawal is based upon "exceptional circumstances", Rule 45(H) provides that the suspect or the accused, or his or her counsel may move for the withdrawal. However, Article 19(ii) of the Directive, narrows the scope of intervention of the accused by allowing only lead counsel to make the request for withdrawal of co-counsel. This [47] Prosecutor v. Rutaganda (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T), Decision 31 October 1997, para. 3; Prosecutor v. Bagosora (Case No. ICTR-98-41-I), Décision de retrait de la commission d'office de Maître Jacques Larochelle, conseil adjoint de M. Théoneste Bagosora, 8 January 2002; Prosecutor v. Nteziryayo (Case No. ICTR-97-29-T), Decision of withdrawal of Mr. Richard Perras as co-counsel of the Accused Alphonse Nteziryayo, 15 February 2002, para. 6.

[48] Prosecutor v. Musema (Case No. ICTR-96-13-I), Decision, 18 November 1997. The decision to refuse further audience to counsel pursuant to Rule 46(C) followed a warning issued on 31 October 1997, following several absences which delayed the initial appearance of the accused. It would have been preferable to base the decision upon the "failure to abide by the undertakings provided for in Rule 45 ter (A)".

[49] Prosecutor v. Nzirorera (Case No. ICTR-98-44-A), Decision, 5 February 2002. Although financial dishonesty was sufficient to sustain the decision, the Deputy Registrar also referred to the breakdown in communication between counsel and the accused as a further argument.

restriction has been the ground for denial of a request for withdrawal of co-counsel made directly by an accused.[50]

A difficulty may arise when the accused intends to seek the withdrawal of both lead counsel and co-counsel on the same ground. It would not make much sense in such circumstances to dismiss the request, as far as co-counsel is concerned, on the mere basis that he is not qualified to seek directly such withdrawal and that this should pass through lead counsel.

In case of a serious violation of the Code of Conduct, the Registrar appears to be entrusted with a discretionary power to decide proprio motu on the withdrawal of counsel, while he is compelled by Article 19(B) to withdraw counsel in other circumstances. Those circumstances are: the decision by a Chamber to refuse audience to assigned counsel for misconduct under Rule 46(A)[51]; where counsel is no longer admitted to practice law in a national bar or is no longer a professor of law; where counsel fails to observe the undertaking of availability made under Rule 45 ter.

The withdrawal of counsel is in principle within the competence of the Registrar.[52] A confusion may arise in respect of the provisions of Rule 45(H), which allow the moving party seeking withdrawal on the basis of "exceptional circumstances" to refer the matter directly for the consideration of the Trial Chamber, while in using Article 19(A)(i) of the Directive, the Registrar adjudicates upon the withdrawal without any interference from the Trial Chamber. In fact, Rule 45 refers to the Registrar but only as an organ enforcing a decision already made by the Trial Chamber. Therefore, one may wonder whether a Registrar's decision on withdrawal rendered upon a Trial Chamber's order issued under Rule 45 can be subject to review, as would be the case for decisions made under Article 19(A) of the Directive. The answer should in our view be negative, given the narrow scope of review drawn by the provisions of Article 19(E).[53] Moreover, to allow such recourse would amount to entrusting the President with the power to review a Trial Chamber's decision. So far this issue has not arisen. However, there have been other difficulties in the review process.

Article 19(E) of the Directive provides: "Where a request for withdrawal made pursuant to paragraph (A) [of this provision] has been denied, the person making the request may seek the President's review of the decision of the Registrar." Since the Registrar does not only act under paragraph (A), the question becomes whether the decisions made under [50] Prosecutor v. Bagambiki, supra note 44.

[51] Supra note 48.

[52] Article 19 of the Directive.

[53] This paragraph refers only to decisions of the Registrar under Article 19(A) as being potentially subject to review.

paragraph (B) can be subject to a review. In fact the issue may arise mainly (only!) with respect to decisions on withdrawal for failure to observe the undertakings of availability made pursuant to Rule 45 ter.[54] Indeed such a decision may be taken by the Registrar proprio motu or upon the accused's or the lead counsel's request, unless Rule 45 ter(B) is held to mean that only a Trial Chamber may adjudicate on the failure of counsel to be available.

On the other hand, even within the narrow scope of review defined in Article 19(E), the case law of the Tribunal reveals some difficulties in applying the proper procedure. Unlike Article 12 of the Directive, which provides for review before different organs of the Tribunal, depending on the stage of the proceedings, in respect of the primary assignment of counsel, Article 19(E) provides for review only before the President. Despite this exclusive jurisdiction with which the President is vested, on several occasions the President has felt that she was not in a position to make any factual determination as to the circumstances underlying the withdrawal sought.[55] As a result, the President has consistently held that consideration of the matter is better left to the Trial Chamber before which the trial is conducted.[56] When trial has started, the Judges conducting the proceedings may well be in a privileged position to assess the quality of the relationship between an accused and his or her counsel.

However, this ought not to lead the President to decline to exercise her jurisdiction. Indeed, the review function is not based on the personal knowledge or experience of the trial judges.[57] Rather, it rests upon the evidence adduced by the parties as well as the grounds (or the lack thereof) set out in the decision challenged. Therefore, the position of the President or the Trial Chamber vis-à-vis the litigants does not seem to justify declining to exercise this jurisdiction. Moreover, nothing would prevent the President, before making her decision, from seeking the opinion of 54 Indeed, the decision on withdrawal following a Chamber's refusal of audience cannot be subject to a review before the President for the reasons set out above.

55 Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko & Ntahobali (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), President's decision on review, in accordance with Article 19(E) of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel, 4 June 2001; Prosecutor v. Nzirorera (Case No. ICTR-98-44-I), President's Decision on review, in accordance with Article 19(E) of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel, 13 June 2001.

56 Ibid.

57 For an example of the difficulty in distinguishing between the personal knowledge the Judges have of the case and the evidence being adduced by the parties, which ought to be the sole basis for the decision, see the decision of Trial Chamber II referred to supra note 38. The Judges stated that they have observed breakdown in communication several times in the court the Chamber or from making any other queries on relevant issues, such as the risks of delaying proceedings in withdrawing a particular counsel at a particular moment of the trial. This would allow an informed decision without departing from the clear provisions of the Directive with respect to jurisdiction.

Lastly, in decisions where the President has expressed her inability to adjudicate on the facts, she has nonetheless "confirmed" the decision of the Registrar.[58] Technically, when a decision is held to be confirmed, the meaning thereof is that the review sought against that decision has been found baseless, or that the reviewer shares the motives set out in the impugned decision. It would therefore be better, for the sake of consistency and clarity, to declare that the review is handed over to the Trial Chamber, rather than confirm the decision after having expressed inability to make any factual findings. But despite these reservations, the Trial Chambers have taken up the reviews "handed over" to them by the President.[59]

In one case, a decision of a Trial Chamber, rendered following the President's decision not to exercise her jurisdiction to review, was challenged before the Appeals Chamber.[60] The Appeals Chamber found the application to be inadmissible, holding that its constructions of the inherent rights of recourse of an accused to the Appeals Chamber[61] only apply where an incidental issue is already pending before the Appeals Chamber, justifying a legitimate interest of the Court in guaranteeing the adequate representation of the accused.[62] Such a holding would normally close the issue. However, the Appeals Chamber went on to address the merits. After having noticed the likelihood of the breakdown in the communication between the accused and counsel, the Chamber instructed the Registrar to investigate the matter further and to take an appropriate decision.

The casuistic approach of the Appeals Chamber has the merit of focussing on the practical aspects of the issues before it. However, it makes it difficult to have an overall understanding of the jurisprudence. Lack of 59 In both cases referred to supra note 55, following the decision of the President, the Trial Chamber before which the trial was being conducted has been asked to adjudicate on the review of the Registrar's decision. However it remains unclear whether the Trial Chamber acted on review or was merely seised under Rule 45(H), which gives it competence to adjudicate directly.

58 Ibid.

60 Nzirorera v. Prosecutor (Case No. ICTR-98-44-A), Decision, 1 February

61 Supra notes 29 and 30.

62 "Considérant que les décisions Akayesu et Barayagwiza ont été rendues sur des requêtes incidentes à d'autres questions dont la Chambre d'appel était saisie et pour lesquelles la Chambre avait un intérêt légitime de garantir la représentation adéquate de [illegible]" clarity in the case law may hinder the task of lawyers and researchers. Case law is not only a question of theoretical interests. All practitioners, particularly in the common law system, make their case with due regard to precedent set in previous decisions. The higher the jurisdiction setting the precedent is in the judicial pyramidal structure, the more important is the authority.[63]

CONCLUSION

The ICTR has made a major contribution to the development of international standards, particularly with respect to the difficult reconciliation between the status of indigent defendants and the need to ensure their right to counsel of their choice. The process has certainly not been straightforward, and some may have found it difficult to see the general trend, particularly when it comes to the procedure to be followed. The ICTR has the means to overcome this difficulty because the Judges are not bound to express themselves solely through judicial decisions. Vested with the power to create and amend the rules governing the conduct of the proceedings, with the contribution of the other organs of the Tribunal,[64] they may take up, in the forum of the plenary session, all issues relating to the review process which are not satisfactorily settled by way of jurisprudence. In this vein, the President's jurisdiction for review when the trial has started may be transferred to the Trial Chamber. The Rules may also grant jurisdiction to the Appeals Chamber when the trial is at the appeal stage.[65] All other gaps,[66] uncertainties and inconsistencies may be remedied in the same way.

[63] In most common law systems the "stare decisis" principle, unknown in civil law, makes a legal finding of the higher jurisdiction binding over the lower jurisdictions.

[64] Supra note 3.

[65] Or when proceedings are pending before the Appeals Chamber.

[66] Supra notes 10, 24 and 25. See also our comments on the initiative for withdrawal of

ELIZABETH NAHAMYA* and ROKHAYATOU DIARRA

DISCLOSURE OF EVIDENCE BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

The fundamental principle of criminal procedural law – lex certa – prescribes that before the trial commences the accused should be cognizant of the charges and case against him or her as well as the applicable procedures. In accordance with this tradition, the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) contains several provisions that set out the basic rights of the accused. Article 19(1) introduces the right to a "fair and expeditious" trial and requires, inter alia, that the proceedings be conducted in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("the Rules"), with full respect for the rights of the accused. Article 20 captures the core and minimum rights of the accused.[1] For the purposes of this paper, the right of the accused to be informed of the "nature and cause of the charges against him or her" and the provision of "adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence" are crucial.[2]

For smooth and effective proceedings, it is essential for the defence to have a clear and cohesive view of the prosecution's strategy in order to prepare its case. The defence must know with certitude and in advance the rules to be applied. Thus there must be no surprises. Scholars who support a liberal defence discovery emphasise the need to make the trial "less a

* Trial Chamber I Coordinator, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. LLB (Honours) (Makerere University, Kampala, Uganda) (1975); Master of Science in Criminal Justice (MSCJ) (University of New Haven, CT, USA) (1980). The opinions expressed in this article are the authors' and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the United Nations.

 Trial Chamber II Coordinator, former Associate Legal Officer in Trial Chambe[illegible] International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. LL.M. (Human Rights Fellow) (Columb[illegible] University School of Law, New York) (2003); DEA. International Law (Hon[illegible] (Rober[illegible] Schuman University, Strasbourg, France) (1995). The opinions expressed in t[illegible] ticle ar[illegible] the authors' and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the Unit[illegible] ations.

[1] See also the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, (1976) [illegible] J.N.T.S. 171, art. 14.

[2] Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 game of blind man's bluff and more a fair contest with the basic issue and facts disclosed to the fullest practicable extent".[3]

The indictment is the basic document that articulates the charges against the accused. Disclosure of all relevant materials by the Prosecutor will substantiate and support the allegations. A general obligation is placed upon the Prosecutor to disclose to the defence prior to the trial evidence that she will rely upon. However, disclosure is limited to materials essential to the preparation of the defence. Although the prosecution has the discretion to decide what is relevant to the case, the ultimate responsibility for the fairness of the trial process lies with the Trial Chamber. When contentious matters on disclosure arise, the Chamber can exercise its discretion in judging the merits of withholding disclosure in any given case.

A. PROVISIONS GOVERNING DISCLOSURE

Disclosure before the ICTR is governed essentially by provisions of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, specifically Rules 66, 67, 68 and 69, together with incidental provisions such as Rules 53, 70, 75 and 94*bis*. A review of the legal constraints affecting the Prosecutor's obligation to disclose will, notably, show how the interests of all the components of a trial are taken into account. The section on remedies discusses the options available to the Chambers in cases where the Prosecutor has failed to disclose. Finally, the concluding part of this article explains the difference between the Prosecutor and the Defence's disclosure obligations.

The purpose of Rule 66 is to prepare a fair and expeditious trial. Although intended to be applied at the pre-trial stage, it has been interpreted as being applicable at the trial stage under some circumstances. Rule 66(C) will be discussed separately, because it deals with a particular aspect of disclosure, which has to be done inter partes. Rules 67 and 68, dealing respectively with the "disclosure" required from the defence, its duty to inform about the line of defence it intends to use, and the disclosure of exculpatory materials, will be discussed in this section since they can be considered as a counterpart and as a prolongation of the disclosure obligation contained in Rule 66.

[3] W. R. LaFave, Jerold H. Israel & Nancy J. King, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE 911

1. RULE 66(A)(I)

Rule 66 (A)(i) is a two-pronged provision concerned with the disclosure of supporting materials that the Prosecutor has relied upon during the confirmation of the indictment[4] as well as the disclosure of prior statements of the accused. This Rule provides > (A) The Prosecutor shall disclose to the defence:

> i) Within thirty days of the initial appearance of the accused copies of the supporting material which accompanied the indictment when confirmation was sought as well as all prior statements obtained by the Prosecutor from the accused.

Disclosure of Supporting Material within Thirty Days

The stipulated time frame is of the essence in disclosing the supporting materials. In the jurisprudence of the ICTR, this has generated many applications challenging the validity of disclosure where the Prosecutor has disclosed such materials belatedly.[5]

Since the term "supporting material" has not been defined under Rule 2 of the Rules,[6] it has to be construed contextually under Rule 47(D) and (E), which makes reference to the Registrar forwarding an indictment and accompanying material to the designated judge. Additionally, the Rule enjoins the reviewing judge to examine each of the counts in the indictment and any supporting materials that the Prosecutor may provide. The purpose of the review is to determine whether a prima facie case exists against the suspect within the ambit of article 18 of the ICTR Statute.[7] Thus, implicitly, whatever the Judges have relied upon during the review of the indictment is part of the "supporting materials". Trial Chamber I, in Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. ("the Media case"), while dealing with another matter, outlined the meaning of "supporting material". The Chamber stated that "within thirty days of Initial Appearance, the accused will be served with the very same information relied upon by the confirming Judge".[8] [4] See Rule 47 of the Rules, which relates to the confirmation of Indictment.

[5] Prosecutor v. Ruggiu (Case No. ICTR-97-32-I), Decision on the Defence Motion for Disclosure of Evidential Material, 16 April 1998.

[6] This provision defines certain terms referred to in the Rules.

[7] Article 18 stipulates: "1. The judge of the Trial Chamber to whom the indictment h been transmitted shall review it. If satisfied that a prima facie case has been established the Prosecutor, he or she shall confirm the indictment. If not so satisfied, the indictme shall be dismissed. 2. Upon confirmation of an indictment, the judge may, at the requ of the Prosecutor, issue such orders and warrants for the arrest, detention, surrender o transfer of persons, and any other orders as may be required for the conduct of the trial."

[8]

6357

Similarly, the ICTY also defined the term as "the material upon which the charges are based and does not include other material that may be submitted to the confirming Judge such as a brief of argument or statement of fact".[9]

Rule 66(A)(i) is, however, unclear as to what happens if the defence fails to raise the issue of incompleteness of the supporting materials within the prescribed time frame or where it requests the Prosecutor to disclose fuller materials. Concerning the latter point, the defence of Ferdinand Nahimana made an oral application requesting the statement of a witness ZC, whom it alleged to be the same person as a prosecution witness called X, in the course of the trial, but long after the initial appearance.[10] That statement formed part of the supporting materials considered in the review of the indictment against Nahimana. The Chamber held that > provision of material in confirmation of the Indictment (or of an amended Indictment) is procedurally separate from disclosure of information to the defence at the post-confirmation stage preceding trial. The two procedures are governed by distinct sets of provisions.[11]

The Chamber was of the view that where supporting materials are disclosed within thirty days of the initial appearance, but the defence wishes to obtain additional materials, such as the full statement of a person referred to in the supporting material, the disclosure of such a statement is not required by Rule 66. The defence is entitled to make a request pursuant to Rule 66(B) (inspection of books), which attracts a reciprocal disclosure obligation from defence to prosecution, in accordance with Rule 67(C). The Chamber concluded that the prosecution is not obliged to disclose "more than that original extract" of a statement contained in the supporting materials, sixty days before the trial, if the Prosecutor does not intend to call the person to testify. There was no evidence that witness ZC was a prospective witness. However, after the examination-in-chief of Witness X, the defence renewed its request. The Chamber was of the opinion that the circumstances had changed because the Prosecutor had disclosed the name and identity of witness X, the testimony had started and the cross-examination was about to begin. The Trial Chamber, therefore, granted the [9] Prosecutor v. Kordic & Cerkez (Case No. IT-95-14/2.PT), Order on Motion to Compel Compliance by the Prosecutor with Rules 66(A) and 68, 26 February 1999, p. 3.

[10] The defence alleged that Witness ZC was known by the Prosecutor since the beginning and was in fact the Witness X, which the prosecution intended to call, and was therefore a [illegible] defense motion for the Prosecutor to disclose whether the pseudonym ZC was used for Witness X in respect of this case.[12]

Prior Statements from the Accused

Under Rule 66(A)(i), the Prosecutor is required to disclose prior statements of the accused obtained by it. Failure to do so is an infringement upon the rights of the accused. Several issues arise in connection with this provision, such as the source of the statements and their form. First, should the statements of the accused be prepared by the Prosecutor? Second, should the statements be in a particular format, that is, given under oath, signed and recognised by the accused? These same issues have been considered by the ICTY. In Delalic, a trial chamber interpreted Rule 66(A)(i) of the ICTY Rules to the effect that the prosecution is required to disclose all statements of the accused that it has in its possession. The was held to be a continuing obligation.[13] In Blaskic, another trial chamber agreed, observing that there is no room for a different interpretation as this "would restrict the rights of the accused as expressly indicated in Article 21 of the Statute".[14] All previous statements of the accused that appear in the Prosecutor's file, whether collected by the Prosecutor or originating from some other source, must be disclosed to the defence immediately.[15]

As already noted, Rule 66(A)(i) principally defines the disclosure at the pre-trial stage, but is not limited to it. As such it is a necessary provision that safeguards the rights of the accused from the outset of the proceedings against him or her. The time period stipulated in this Rule determines another important aspect of the criminal proceedings, the filing of preliminary motions pursuant to Rule 72(A) of the Rules. This Rule provides: "Preliminary motions by either party shall be brought within thirty days following disclosure by the Prosecutor to the defence of all the material envisaged by Rule 66(A)(i)" [emphasis added]. Thus failure to disclose supporting materials and prior statements of the accused, in a timely manner, will frustrate this rule and this will necessitate an extension of time beyond the prescribed period.[16] The fixed time limit may not be extended if there is no infringement upon the rights of accused. In the [12] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 20 February 2002, p. 4.

[13] Prosecutor v. Delalic (Case No. IT-96-21-T), Decision on the Motion by the [illegible]sed Zejnil Delalic for the Disclosure of Evidence, 26 September 1996, para. 4.

[14] Prosecutor v. Blaskic (Case No. IT-95-14), Decision on the Production of [illegible]very Materials, 27 January 1997, p. 14.

[15] Ibid., p. 15.

[16] [illegible]

Ruggiu case, although the Chamber held that the Prosecutor had violated Rule 66(A)(i), it concluded that, in the particular circumstances of the case, failure to disclose to the defence on time had not affected its right to file prescribed motions.[17]

2. RULE 66(A)(II)

Rule 66(A)(ii) consists of two parts; one specifying the period within which to disclose copies of statements of all the witnesses the Prosecutor intends to call at trial, the other concerning extension of time upon showing "good cause". Scrutiny of this rule sheds light on the difficulties that arise regarding definition of the terms "witness statements" and "whom the Prosecutor intends to call to testify at trial".

Disclosure within the Sixty-Day Period prior to Trial

At the pre-trial phase, this rule is crucial for the swift and effective conduct of the proceedings. It enables the defence to properly prepare its case, and in sufficient time. The first important element concerns the date set for trial upon which depends all the disclosures. Having a firm and definitive date is therefore of utmost importance in defining the rights of the accused at this stage. The date of trial is the reference point for the counting of the sixty days and delimits the right of the accused to contest any late disclosures.

In Prosecutor v. Bagosora, the Trial Chamber scheduled a date for the start of the trial. The defence filed a motion challenging disclosure, alleging a breach of Rule 66(A)(ii) because the prosecution was late in disclosing witness statements. The Prosecutor contended that the date "was merely a tactical date dependant on several factors". The Chamber found that "despite the failure of the prosecution to strictly comply with the provisions of Rule 66 of the Rules in furnishing the witnesses' statements to the defence, this Trial Chamber is clearly of the view that the defence will not be prejudiced in any way in as much as the trial of the case has been postponed and the defence will consequently have sufficient time to prepare for the trial".[18] The Chamber directed the prosecution to fulfil its obligation under the Rules.

Considering the Requirements of Rules 47 & 72 and for an Adjournment pro tem of any Decision on any Issue Relevant to this Indictment and for the Relief Pleaded, filed on 16 November 1999. In this motion, the defence sought the disclosure of prior statements of the accused in terms of Rule 66(i) of the Rules. Trial Chamber II decided a similar matter, prior to the amendment of the Rules in June 2000. At that time, the prescribed period was sixty days after disclosure under Rule 66(A)(i). The defence was late in submitting its preliminary motions because of the late disclosures by the Prosecutor. The defence agreed to file a preliminary motion within a forty-day period, provided that the Prosecutor effected the disclosure by a given date. The Chamber granted the defence's request.

In the Niyitegeka case, where no date had yet been fixed for the commencement of the trial, the Chamber held that > this mandatory obligation stated in Rule 66(A)(ii) indicates a final time limit for disclosure. This disclosure process should be regularly updated as the prosecution gathers evidence against the accused during on going investigations. Even if no date for trial has yet been set, the prosecution should not wait for the setting of this date to disclose any evidence relevant to the preparation of the case by the defence.[19]

It is noteworthy that the judges of the Tribunal encourage the parties to cooperate, particularly in disclosure matters. However, this cooperation is elusive, and matters often end up being decided by the trial chambers.

Witnesses' Statements

Pursuant to Rule 66(A)(ii), statements of all the witnesses that the Prosecutor intends to call at the trial must be disclosed sixty days before the trial. The Rules of the ICTR and ICTY do not define the term "witness statement", nor do they specify the form of such documents. Therefore what amounts to "witness statement" is left to judicial interpretation. One textbook definition provides as follows:

(1) a written statement made by the witness that is signed or otherwise adopted or approved by the witness;
(2) a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by the witness that is recorded contemporaneously with the making of the oral statement and that is contained in a stenographic mechanical, electrical or other recording or transcription thereof; or
(3) a statement, however taken or recorded, or a transcription thereof, made by the witness to a Grand Jury.[20]

In the practice of the ICTR, statements have always been recorded by the Prosecutor's investigators and approved by the witness. The ICTY has defined the term "witness statement", holding that "the testimony of another Prosecution witness in another case before the Tribunal is a [18] Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al. (Case No. ICTR-96-7-I), Decision on the Motio he Defence Counsel for Disclosure, 27 November 1997, p. 6.

[19] Prosecutor v. Niyitegeka (Case No. ICTR-96-14-I), Decision on the Defence on for Disclosure of Evidence, 4 February 2000, para. 18.

[20] FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE AND RULES 98 (1996).

statement' of that witness, which must be disclosed to the accused under Rule 66(A)".[21]

Issues concerning prior statements have also arisen before the ICTR. In the Nyiramasuhuko case, the Chamber held that statements made in the course of judicial proceedings by prosecution witnesses expected to testify at trial, regardless of the origin of the said proceedings, are subject to the obligation of disclosure under Rule 66(A)(ii), provided they are within the custody and control of the prosecution. The defence did not bring prima facie evidence to prove that the prosecution was in possession or custody of any such statement. Thus the Trial Chamber dismissed the defence's request.[22] In that case, the Chamber departed from the approach of Trial Chamber III of the Tribunal, which ruled that Rule 66(A)(ii) does not apply to disclosure of statements made by prosecution witnesses to the Rwandan authorities because such statements are not taken by the Prosecutor.[23]

In the Media case, during the testimony of prosecution witness Jose Kagabo, an issue arose about his statement. The Prosecutor identified two documents, namely, a statement dated 22 May 1999, and other documents written by Kagabo, dated 25 April 1999, which pertained to proceedings in France against Ferdinand Nahimana. These documents were handed over to investigators on 26 May 1999. The Prosecutor sought to tender these documents as witness statements and to have them admitted as exhibits in their entirety, in order to expedite proceedings. Upon objection by counsel for the defence, the Chamber ruled that written statements of witness Kagabo could be admitted as part of his oral testimony because the witness had identified their contents and stood by what was contained in them.[24] The same issue arose during the testimony of prosecution witness Georges Ruggiu, whose handwritten organisational chart and another document, disclosed well before, were produced in the course of his testimony in order to be exhibited and to be part of his statement. The defence opposed it on the ground that testimony has probative value only when made under [21] Prosecutor v. Kupreskic (Case No. IT-25-16-T), Decision on the Prosecutor' s Request to Release Testimony Pursuant to Rule 66 of the Rules, 29 July 1998 (Closed Session under Rule 79, ICTY Rules).

[22] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko et al. (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Decision on the Defence's Motion for Disclosure of the Declarations of the Prosecutor's Witnesses detained in Rwanda and All Other Documents or Information Pertaining to the Judicial Proceedings in their Respect, 18 September 2001, para. 9.

[23] Prosecutor v. Bagambiki (Case No. ICTR-99-46-I), Decision on Bagambiki's Motion for Disclosure of Guilty Pleas of Detained Witness and of Statements by Jean Kambanda, 1 December 2000, para. 12.

[24] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et. al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-I), Transcript of 4 April 2001, p. 26.

solemn declaration. The judges admitted them as part of the oral testimony of Ruggiu since he had said, under oath, that these were notes prepared by him, and therefore considered then as his evidence.[25]

In yet another instance, in the Media case, the Prosecutor produced an undated and unsigned statement of prosecution witness GO. The Chamber commented upon the form of witness statements and stated that, although the Prosecutor did not intend to exhibit this statement, she is nevertheless obliged to disclose documents relevant to the case, including unsigned ones. The Chamber also expounded upon the principle behind disclosure, explaining that it aims at putting the defendant on notice to be able to cross-examine the witness. Therefore, the Chamber noted that it was not a question of admissibility but of disclosure and allowed use of the witness statement.[26]

Although the first part of Rule 66(A)(ii) is apparently clear and unambiguous, in practice, the application of this Rule has not been without difficulty. The jurisprudence of the Tribunal has instances where issues have arisen which are connected with premature applications[27] and ongoing investigations. In the case of Prosecutor v. Niyitegeka, the Chamber was of the view that disclosure should be regularly updated according to the results of ongoing investigations.[28]

The expression "statements of witnesses whom the Prosecutor intends to call to testify at trial" (emphasis added) may also prove to be problematic. In the Media case, the Prosecutor filed an ex parte application, under Rule 73*bis*(E) of the Rules, seeking to add to her list a new prosecution witness, called witness X.[29] The Prosecutor contended that pursuant to Rule 66(A)(ii), her obligation to disclose statements concerns only the witnesses she intends to call to testify at trial. The Prosecutor had no such intention with regard to witness X, who decided to testify only after June 2001, after having been convinced to do so, given his importance to ongoing investigations and arrests. In response, the defence argued that the Prosecutor knew about the existence of this witness well before the trial date was fixed. The Trial Chamber found that there was "good cause" in terms of Rule 66(A)(ii) and granted the motion. The Chamber took into account the materiality of the anticipated testimony, the lack of surprise to [25] Ibid., Transcript of 27 February 2002, p. 42.

[26] Ibid., Transcript of 10 April 2001, p. 37.

[27] Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al. (Case No. ICTR-98-41-I), Decision on the Defence Motion for Disclosures, 5 December 2001, p. 2.

[28] Prosecutor v. Niyitegeka, supra note 19.

[29] Rule 73*bis*(E) states: "After commencement of Trial, the Prosecutor may if he considers it to be in the interests of justice, move the Trial Chamber for leave to reinstate the defence and the absence of undue delay, as the witness was anticipated to replace six prosecution witnesses.[30] One of the judges dissented, considering that the prosecution had known of witness X as a potential witness from the beginning and had intended to call him for a long time. There the condition of intention was met. The dissenting judge noted that the Prosecutor, in so doing, had violated the Rule.[31]

Extension of Time within which to Disclose Materials upon Showing Good Cause

The example evoked below is an illustration of how the second part of Rule 66(A)(ii) enables the Chamber to use its discretion to decide whether the prosecution has shown "good cause" to extend the time within which to disclose copies of the witness statements. The Rules are silent on what amounts to "good cause", and judges have approached the matter on a case-by-case basis. In the Media case, the Prosecutor had initially disclosed, well before the trial started, several statements relating to the witnesses she intended to call, in accordance with the Rules. However, several months after the beginning of the trial, it appeared that it was impossible for the prosecution to provide a final list of witnesses, because of ongoing investigations. The Prosecutor therefore presented an oral motion, pursuant to Rule 73*bis*(E) of the Rules in order to amend her initial list of witnesses. She argued that the application would reduce the number of witnesses and would consequently shorten the trial. In determining whether the request was well founded, the judges had to assess whether the "good cause" of Rule 66 outweighs the "interests of justice" of Rule 73*bis*, and whether it was opportune to base such a request on Rule 73*bis* and invoke the "interests of justice". The Chamber opined that, although Rule 66 deals with the pre-trial stage, the factor of "good cause" can also be applied at the trial stage. They decided that > when a Trial Chamber has granted leave to call new prosecution witnesses under Rule 73*bis*, statements of such witnesses will form part of the case against the Accused. It follows that the Chamber in its determination will bear in mind also the question of "good cause".[32]

[30] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to add Witness X to its List of Witnesses and for Protective Measures, 14 September 2001, para. 19.

[31] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Asoka de Z. Gunawardana, 14 September 2001, paras. 8 and 9.

[32] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Prosecutor's Oral Motion for Leave to Amend the List of Selected Witnesses, 26 June 2001, para. 19.

The Chamber attempted to define "good cause":

> In assessing the "interests of justice" and "good cause" Chambers have taken into account such considerations as the materiality of the testimony, the complexity of the case, prejudice to the defence, including elements of surprise, on-going investigations, replacements and corroboration of evidence.[33]

In so doing, the Judges noted that the two notions are interrelated. The Trial Chamber therefore concluded: "The prosecution's duty under the Statute to present the best available evidence to prove its case has to be balanced against the right of the Accused to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his Defence and his right to be tried without undue delay."[34]

The time period specified in Rule 66(A)(ii) is of such essence that this rule is basic and is referred to in several provisions of the Rules. Sometimes, it is referred to as an exclusionary rule where a new time frame for the disclosure of other materials is being stipulated. This is particularly the case in Rule 94*bis*(A), which comprises an exception to Rule 66(A)(ii). It provides: "Notwithstanding the provisions of Rule 66(A)(ii), Rule 73*bis*(B)(iv)(b) and Rule 73*ter*(B)(iii)(b) of the present Rules, the full statement of any expert witness called by a party shall be disclosed to the opposing party as early as possible and shall be filed with the Trial Chamber not less than twenty-one days prior to the date on which the expert is expected to testify (emphasis added)". According to this provision, the sixty-day period mentioned in Rule 66(A)(ii) is vacated where expert witnesses are concerned. The Rule underscores the importance of disclosure to the opposing party "as early as possible" and filing with the Trial Chamber not less than twenty-one days prior to the date on which the expert is expected to testify.

The term "as early as possible" has again no definite meaning. It is usually considered according to the circumstances of each case. In Prosecutor v. Elizaphan & Gerard Ntakirutimana, the Prosecutor had not shown an intention to call any expert witnesses. The defence invoked Rule 94*bis*, emphasising its need to know as soon as possible whether the prosecution will call experts, to be informed of their qualifications and to obtain copies of their reports. The Chamber directed the Prosecutor to clarify her intention as to whether she would call the expert witness and, if so, it required her to make the report "timely available [. . .] in order to avoid complication during [. . .] the presentation of the Prosecutor's case".[35]

[33] Ibid., para. 20.

[34] Ibid.

[35] Prosecutor v. Elizaphan and Gerard Ntakirutimana (Case Nos. ICTR-96-10-T & ICTR-96-17-T), Decision on the Prosecution Motion for Contempt of Court and on Two Defence Motions for Disclosure, 16 July 2001, paras. 18 and 19.

3. THE RIGHT TO INSPECT DOCUMENTS IN THE POSSESSION OF THE PROSECUTOR

Not all materials within the possession of the Prosecutor can and will be used at trial. Therefore, if the defence wishes to rely on any other material besides that which the Prosecutor will use at the trial, the defence has to request it and to show its relevance and materiality. Hence, Rule 66 involves a request "to inspect documents and any tangible objects in the custody or control of the Prosecutor, which are material to the preparation of the defence's case or intended for use by the Prosecutor as evidence at trial or were obtained from or belonged to the accused" (emphasis added). The emphasised portion of the Rule is the "guiding principle of disclosability".[36] It is the responsibility of the defence to demonstrate materiality and it is only when the two parties do not agree on this point, that the judges adjudicate the matter. Rule 66(B) is therefore highly consensual and implies a dialogue between prosecution and defence.

With respect to the request and materiality, the Bagosora case has laid down guidelines to be applied. Specifically, that > the defence must demonstrate prima facie materiality of the evidence in question, and secondly that the said evidence should be in the custody or control of the prosecution. Hence, it is implied therein that the defence Counsel must make specific identification of any requested documentation to enable the Prosecutor to take action.[37]

Although Trial Chambers have discretion to interpret the Rules, they have tended to implicitly agree with this decision. In the Media case, where the trial is related to print and electronic media based upon complex and voluminous documentary evidence, the Chamber has often dealt with Rule 66(B) since problems of disclosure have been recurrent. The defence brought a motion for the complete discovery of materials. In response, the Prosecutor submitted that the defence may not go on a "fishing expedition" to divulge into the Prosecutor's database. The Chamber held that > there is no specific provision in the Rules enabling the defence to request a Trial Chamber to order complete discovery [. . .] of all the evidence regarding the accused, which is in the possession of the Prosecutor. The defence may only receive, from the Prosecutor, evidence that is likely to be used in the case against the accused as well as past statements by the accused and any exculpatory evidence, all the evidence regarding the accused, which may support the defence case, pursuant to Rule 68 of the Rules.[38]

[36] See Lord Mustil's opinion in R. v. Preston, [1993] 4 All E.R. 638 (H.L.).

[37] Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al. (Case No. ICTR-96-7-I), Decision on the Motion by the Defence Counsel for Disclosure, 27 November 1997, p. 6.

[38] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Defence's Motion to Compel Complete Discovery, 16 March 2000, paras. 12 and 13 (emphasis

Another example arose when Counsel for the defence filed a motion complaining that the Prosecutor's disclosure under Rule 66(B) was inadequate. Among the documentary evidence requested were the Belgian investigator's report on the activities of the RTLM, and all evidence and witness statements in the Barayagwiza and Ruggiu cases. The prosecution submitted that although the sources of the broadcast in this case were unspecified, it had nonetheless disclosed all material indicated by the defence. Additionally, the Prosecutor had made the Belgian files available to the defence. The Trial Chamber underscored the need for the defence to show materiality and to specifically identify the object in respect of which the inspection is sought. The Chamber did not order the disclosure of the requested material but obliged the parties to resolve the issue of inspection of documents and materials at a Status Conference.[39]

Furthermore, still in the Media case, a similar problem arose during the testimony of Prosecution witness BU. On that occasion, the defence objected to the production of a diary, allegedly maintained by the witness in 1994, in support of his four statements made to the prosecution investigators. The defence's major complaint was that it had not been accorded an opportunity to examine the document and that this required a lot of time. The Prosecutor explained that she had received the diary only three days prior to the trial and that in any event, the diary was not a statement subject to disclosure under Rule 66(A) but a document to be inspected under Rule 66(B). Thus it was for the defence to inspect the diary, which could be done during a short adjournment. The Chamber held that the diary could be an exhibit and that the Prosecutor should allow the defence to inspect the document, under Rule 66(B), as this is the only obligation placed upon the Prosecutor.[40] In a similar matter, Trial Chamber II, in the Nyiramasuhuko case, stated that "Rule 66(B) of the Rules provides only for the inspection of designated materials [. . .] and this provision articulates a duty to reveal rather than a duty to transmit evidence".[41]

[39] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Defence's Motion for Disclosure in the Case of Ferdinand Nahimana, 29 March 2000, p. 4.

[40] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 20 August 2001, pp. 28 and 29.

[41] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko et al. (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Decision on the[illegible]gent Motion by the Defence for Disclosure of Evidence by the Prosecutor, 1 Novemb[illegible]000 (emphasis added). See also Prosecutor v. Bagambiki et al. and Prosecutor v. Nta[illegible]tra (Case No. ICTR-99-46-T), Decision on Bagambiki' s Motion for Disclosure of th[illegible]lty Pleas of Detained Witnesses and of Statements by Jean Kambanda, 1 Decembe[illegible]00, para. 16. The defendant requested the Chamber to order the Prosecutor "to disclose the audio recordings and transcripts from the questioning of Jean Kambanda." The Chamber Pertaining to the same Rule, an interesting point was raised in Prosecutor v. Kabiligi & Ntabakuze. The defence requested the disclosure of the 1 August 1997 report on the death of the former President of Rwanda, Juvenal Habyarimana. The Trial Chamber held that since the 1 August 1997 report was not in the Prosecutor's possession, Rules 66(B) and 68 were not applicable. However, the Chamber went beyond the legal stipulation and invoked its inherent powers in the "interests of justice" and requested the said report to the President of the Tribunal. The Chamber stated that it was not setting a precedent but limited the decision to the circumstances of that particular case.[42]

4. RULE 67 AND ACTIONS REQUESTED FROM THE DEFENCE

This provision is the main rule that deals with the "disclosure" obligation of the defence. A request by the defence to the Prosecutor under Rule 66(B) triggers a reciprocal request from prosecution under Rule 67(C).[43] However, this reciprocity is not anticipated to be equal to the original obligation of the Prosecutor to disclose under Rule 66(A)(ii). Rule 67(C) provides: "If the defence makes a request pursuant to Rule 66(B), the prosecutor shall in turn be entitled to inspect any books, documents, photographs and tangible objects, which are within the custody or control of the defence and which it intends to use as evidence at the trial."

The issue of what the defence intends to use at trial was raised in the Media case. During the testimony of prosecution witness Jose Kagabo, the defence asked the Prosecutor to enable it to inspect documents, pursuant to Rule 66(B). The Prosecutor agreed but immediately submitted an application under Rule 67(C), which the defence refused to comply with. The defence contended that the rule should be read as referring to documents which the defence had a formed intention of using, which intention it had not yet formed. The judges ruled that the Prosecutor's obligation to disclose is not identical to the obligation that rests on the defence. Whereas the defence's obligation arises only in respect of documents its intend to Prosecutor to permit the inspection. Resorting to the Chamber is permissible only if the request to the Prosecutor is unsuccessful."

[42] Prosecutor v. Kabiligi et al. (Case No. ICTR-97-34-I), Decision on Ntabakuze's use as evidence, the Prosecutor's obligation is to disclose documents which are material to the defence case.[44]

Reciprocal to the prosecution's obligation to disclose materials is the defence's duty to notify the prosecution about the use of a defence of alibi or a special defence. These have been the two most common defences used before ICTR.

Rule 67 (A)(ii) and (B) stipulates:

(A)(ii) The defence shall notify the Prosecutor of its intent to enter:

(a) The defence of alibi; in which case the notification shall specify the place or places at which the accused claims to have been present at the time of the alleged crime and the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the alibi;

(b) Any special defence, including that of diminished or lack of mental responsibility; in which case the notification shall specify the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the special defence.

(B) Failure of the defence to provide such notice under this Rule shall not limit the right of the accused to rely on the above defences.

The Kayishema & Ruzindana case interpreted Rule 67(A)(ii). Trial Chamber II underscored that the aim of this Rule is to put the other party, namely the Prosecutor, in a position of countering evidence put forward by the defence. The judges further stated that, "if the defence of alibi or special defence is contemplated, then this is an opportune moment for the defence to disclose. Disclosure at a later stage will vitiate the spirit of the Statute".[45] The judges also interpreted Rule 67(B) as tending to cancel the requirement for the defence to disclose its intention to rely upon the defences of alibi and special defence.[46]

5. DISCLOSURE OF EXCULPATORY EVIDENCE (RULE 68)

The defence is entitled to know what materials are in the possession of the prosecution the tends to suggest the innocence or mitigate the [illegible]t of the accused, or that may affect the credibility of the prosecution [illegible]idence.

[44] Transcript of 4 April 2001, p. 22.

[45] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-T), Decision on Rule 68 requires that this disclosure shall be made by the Prosecutor "as soon as practicable". In Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, Trial Chamber I analysed Rule 68 and observed that it has two main elements. "Firstly the evidence must be known to the Prosecutor and secondly, it must, in some way be exculpatory". The Chamber equated the term "known" to "custody, control or possession" by the Prosecutor, which are also words used in Rule 66(B) and 67(C).[47]

Trial Chamber I of the ICTR had another opportunity to pronounce itself on the issue of exculpatory materials in the Media case. During an inter partes hearing, counsel for the defence requested the disclosure of the seventeen transcripts of witness X's interview, alleging that they contained exculpatory materials. The Prosecutor submitted that they could not be disclosed as yet because disclosure would impact upon ongoing investigations. The judges directed the Prosecutor to disclose the transcripts to the Chamber only, pursuant to Rule 66(C), to enable the Chamber to review them and determine whether they contained exculpatory materials. In the course of the hearing of the motion, one of the judges requested that the defence submit a document providing examples of exculpatory material contained in the nine transcripts already disclosed to them. After the defence submitted the examples, the judge concluded that the Prosecutor had breached her obligation under Rule 68.[48]

In the meantime, the majority of the Trial Chamber reviewed the seventeen transcripts and found that they contained no exculpatory material, except for one page of one of the transcripts. It ordered that this be disclosed in a redacted form to the defence and that the non-redacted copy of the excerpt be disclosed thirty days before Witness X was to testify at trial.[49]

ICTY Trial Chamber I considered the extent of the applicability of Rule 68 in the Blaskic case. The Chamber held that the Rule extends to such evidence contained in case files of other accused.[50]

[47] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema (Case No. ICTR-96-13-T), Decision on the Request of the Defence for an Order for Disclosure by the Prosecutor of the Admissions of Guilt of Witnesses Y, Z and AA, 8 June 2000, para. 5.

[48] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Asoka de Z. Gunawardana to Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to add Witness X to its List of Witnesses and for Protective Measures, 14 September 2001, paras. 12 and 13.

[49] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Defence's Application for the Prosecution to Disclose Exculpatory Material Contained in the 17 Transcripts of Interview with Witness X, 29 October 2001, p. 2.

[50] Prosecutor v. Blaskic (Case No. IT-95-14), Decision on the Production of Discovery

The ICTR and ICTY have not applied Rule 68 in a vacuum. They have had to consider the rule in light of the facts of a given case and have established some guidelines. In the Blaskic case, the Chamber stated that, "after having previously shown that they were in the possession of the Prosecutor, the defence must present a prima facie case which would make probable the exculpatory nature of the materials sought".[51] In the same case, the Trial Chamber added another dimension to Rule 68, namely "whether the Prosecutor believes that, although she does possess exculpatory materials, Sub-rule 66(C) or any other relevant provision require that their confidentiality be protected".[52]

A deeper analysis of Rule 68 shows, behind the apparent clarity of its wording, ambiguous elements embedded within the term "as soon as practicable". This term may not be straight-forward and connotes an objective consideration on a case by case basis. However, the Prosecutor has to demonstrate "practicability" on each occasion, which will import a subjective test.

B. EXCEPTIONS TO DISCLOSURE

It is the prosecution's responsibility to withhold information, which is clearly irrelevant or privileged, and to delay disclosure to protect witnesses or to complete investigation. Non-disclosure can also be justified when documents are held by a State.

1. COOPERATION OF STATES

An exception to the Prosecutor's obligation to disclose materials in her possession is that she is not expected to seek out material in the hands of third parties. Under the ICTR Statute, pursuant to Article 28, the Tribunal can request the cooperation of States, and they have generally shown their willingness in this respect.[53]

In the Media case, Trial Chamber I, after being requested by the defence, ordered the Prosecutor to make efforts to obtain from t' Govern ment of Rwanda plea agreements, and dates of conviction an sntence with respect to witnesses the Prosecutor intended to call and who were in the custody of Rwanda.[54]

[51] Ibid., para. 49.

[52] Ibid.

[53] See Virginia Morris & Michael P. Scharf, I THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL

> [1] in the interests of justice [...] the Prosecutor bears the responsibility of obtaining the said statements from the Rwandan Authorities and of providing them to the defence pursuant to Rule 66(A)(ii) of the Rules [...] The Chamber [...] requires proprio motu, the Prosecutor to make all efforts to obtain, to the extent possible, the prior statements made before the Rwandan authorities of all detained witnesses and to disclose them to the defence.[55]

Recently, in a similar case, Trial Chamber III requested the Rwandan authorities to provide to the Registry the confessions made to the Rwandan judicial authorities by some Prosecution witnesses.[56]

2. PROTECTION OF WITNESSES

Additionally, the obligations placed upon the Prosecutor to disclose certain materials to the defence may be curtailed in exceptional circumstances as, for example, under Articles 19(1) and 21 of the Statute. Article 19(1) provides that "[t]he Trial Chambers shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and that proceedings are conducted in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses". Article 21 provides:

> The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall provide in its Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the protection of victims and witnesses. Such protection measures shall include, but shall not be limited to, the conduct of in camera proceedings and the protection of the victims identity.

Thus the accused's right to the minimum procedural guarantees as enshrined in these provisions may be encroached upon where issues of witness protection arise. Indeed, the issue of disclosure is logically linked to the issue of the security of witnesses. The disclosure provisions in [54] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. 99-52-T), Oral Decision on he Defence's Motion to Furnish in Respect of Custodial Witnesses, Transcript of 4 September 2001, p. 41.

[55] Prosecutor v. Ndayambaje & Nsabimana (Case Nos. ICTR-96-8-T & ICTR-97-29-A-T), Decision on the Defence Motion Seeking Documents Relating to Detained Witnesses or Leave of the Chamber to Contact Protected Detained Witnesses, 15 November 2001, para. 25.

[56] Prosecutor v. Bagambiki et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-46-T), Decision on Bagambiki's and Ntagerura's Motions for Disclosure of Confessions of Detained Witnesses, 8 March

Rule 66 are subject to the important provisions in Rule 69, particularly Rule 69(A) which provides that "[i]n exceptional circumstances, either of the parties may apply to a Trial Chamber to order the non-disclosure of the identity of a victim or witness who may be in danger or at risk, until the Chamber decides otherwise".

However, at some point, the non-disclosure order has to be lifted to allow for the preparation of the case by either party. For this purpose, Rule 69(C) stipulates that the identity of the victims or witnesses shall be disclosed prior to the trial. In this sense, Rule 67(A)(i), has to be read in conjunction with Rule 69(C), as these provisions are interrelated. Rule 67(A)(i), which completes and reinforces Rule 66(A)(ii), reads: "As early as reasonably practicable and in any event prior to the commencement of the trial: The Prosecutor shall notify the defence of the names of the witnesses that he intends to call to establish the guilt of the accused and in rebuttal of any defence plea of which the Prosecutor has received notice in accordance with Sub-Rule (ii) below" [emphasis added]. Rule 69(C) stipulates that "[s]ubject to Rule 75, the identity of the victim or witness shall be disclosed in sufficient time prior to the trial to allow adequate time for preparation of the prosecution and the defence".

Pertaining to the issue of the protection of witnesses and disclosure, Trial Chamber II in the Nyiramasuhuko et al. case, while commenting on Rule 69, stated:

> It is further noted that a practice has evolved whereby Parties make application to the Tribunal for the implementation of certain protective measures for witnesses and victims. These applications are generally made after the confirmation of the Indictment and after the Initial appearance of the accused where such measures are in fact granted, this has a direct bearing on the timing, nature and extent of disclosure to the defence. It is essential for the proper administration of justice to balance the interests of the victims and witnesses for protection and the rights of the accused for disclosure.[57]

Disclosure under Rule 66(A)(ii) will not be automatically hindered because of the protection of witnesses since, pursuant to Rule 69(A), the Prosecutor is required to make a non-disclosure application only in exceptional circumstances.

Such exceptional circumstances surfaced in the Bagosora et al. case. Trial Chamber III tried to find a balance between the accused's right to a fair trial and the protection of witnesses. It allowed the Prosecutor to disclose, on a "rolling basis", the names of her witnesses thi ive days before being called to testify, and not prior to the trial, although Prosecutor had requested twenty-one days. The judges departed from Rule 69(C) and based their decision on the discretion given to them by Rule 69(A) to decide whether there were exceptional circumstances justifying non-disclosure. The Trial Chamber based its argument on a contradiction in the Rules, particularly between the letter of Rule 69(C) and its object and purpose. The majority decided that thirty-five days before the witness is called to testify is "a sufficient period of advance disclosure to provide the defence with a fair opportunity to effectively exploit the witnesses' unredacted statements and identification data to formulate an effective cross-examination".[58] One of the judges dissented, observing that the right of the accused to the minimum procedural guarantees, that is to a fair trial and to know the case against him, must overweigh the protection of victims and witnesses, as it is "non-negotiable and cannot be balanced against other interests".[59]

[57] Prosecutor v. Nyiramasuhuko et al. (Case No. ICTR-97-21-T), Decision on the Status of the Hearings for the Amendment of the Indictments and for Disclosure of Supporting Material, 30 September 1998, para. 11

3. APPLICATION FOR LEAVE TO DISPENSE WITH DISCLOSURE

Under certain circumstances, the Trial Chamber may authorise the Prosecutor not to disclose information or materials. According to Rule 66(C):

> Where information or materials are in the possession of the Prosecutor, the disclosure of which may prejudice further or ongoing investigations, or for any other reasons may be contrary to the public interest or affect the security interests of any State, the Prosecutor may apply to the Trial Chamber sitting in camera to be relieved from the obligation to disclose pursuant to Sub-Rule (A) and (B). When making such an application the Prosecutor shall provide the Trial Chamber, and only the Trial Chamber, with the information or materials that are sought to be kept confidential. (emphasis added)

In principle, the Rules support the public nature of the hearings and encourage transparency, and the Chambers uphold the same. There have been several applications for disclosure under Rule 66(C). For instance, in the Media case, concerning the ex parte application for the addition of witness X, the Trial Chamber directed the prosecution to provide it with the relevant documents for perusal in order to assess whether the argument of ongoing investigations was valid.[60]

[58] Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al. (Case No. ICTR-98-41-I), Decision and Scheduling Order on the Prosecution Motion for Harmonisation and Modification of Protective Measures for Witnesses, 5 December 2001, para. 22.

[59] Prosecutor v. Bagosora et al. (Case No. ICTR-98-41-I), Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Pavel Dolenc, 7 December 2001, para. 14.

[60] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion to Add Witness X to its List of Witnesses and for Protective Measures, 14

Trial Chamber I was later seized of the Prosecutor's request to continue the temporary redaction of a portion of the transcripts of witness X. The Chamber was provided with the information showing prejudice to the ongoing investigations and, after perusal, allowed the motion.[61] In another instance, the Chamber observed, in its conclusion, that Rule 66(C) envisages that the prosecution may undertake further or on-going investigations. Furthermore, that it would be contrary to this provision to exclude all testimonies unearthed as a result of such investigations. Consequently, the Chamber decided to consider the matter on a case-by-case basis taking into account the materiality of the testimony and the potential prejudice of the late disclosure.[62]

Regarding the same issue but at another instance, Trial Chamber I put a limit on the applicability and scope of Rule 66(C). The Prosecutor requested the Chamber to consider newly-found material under Rule 66(C). In response, the defence requested the Prosecutor to disclose any exculpatory information contained in it. The Chamber directed the Prosecutor to > first begin its work. Review the material, disclose what you determine is relevant, and it is the part that you wish to hold back that you disclose to the Chamber in terms of Rule 66(C).[63]

4. NON DISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL MATERIAL UNDER RULE 70

An important right for the prosecution is to withhold disclosure of certain highly confidential documents, pursuant to Rule 70 of the Rules. This Rule generally bars the Prosecutor from disclosing her investigative notes and similar documents. Like other provisions pertaining to disclosure, Rule 70(A) has been the basis of contentious issues. On several occasions in the Media case, defence counsel have asked the Chamber to order the Prosecutor to reveal her investigative notes. In one instance, the Chamber held:

[61] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on the Prosecutor's Application for Continued Temporary Redaction of One Portion of t[illegible]ranscripts of Witness X, Pursuant to Rule 66(C) of the Rules of Procedure and Eviden[illegible] February 2002, p. 2.

[62] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Decision on t[illegible]rosecutor's Oral Motion for Leave to Amend the list of Selected Witnesses, 26 June 20[illegible], para. 29.

[63] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 20 February

Regarding the request by Counsel for Nahimana for the Prosecutor to disclose a list of questions put to the witnesses by the investigators, the dates and the participants in the Georges Ruggiu interview, the Trial Chamber has considered the provisions in Rule 70 on matters not subject to disclosure, which exclude documents prepared by a Party, its assistants, or representatives in connection with the investigation or preparation of the case from being disclosed. The Trial Chamber directs that the Prosecutor shall not be required to disclose them, as this is a matter for cross-examination at the trial.[64]

Although it was not imperative to disclose her investigative notes, the Prosecutor opted to do so in the exceptional case of prosecution witness AFO.[65] This witness had made statements which went missing. The prosecution decided to use its investigative notes, which were endorsed by the witness and signed as her statement. The defence challenged this. The Chamber held that it would only rely on the oral testimony of the witness and not on the Prosecutor's notes. However, it would consider them as a confirmation of the witness allegations.[66]

An interesting matter to be considered, in light of Rule 70(A), is whether the trial chamber has the discretion to order the defence to disclose to the prosecution a witness's prior statement taken by or on behalf of the defence in anticipation of litigation whether before or after the witness has testified. In Prosecutor v. Tadic, the Prosecutor requested the Chamber to order the defence to disclose the statement of a witness who had already testified. The majority of Trial Chamber II of the ICTY held that such statements were protected by legal professional privilege and thus not available to the prosecution.[67]

C. Remedies For Breach Of The Disclosure Obligations

Discussion on the breach of the discussed provisions concentrates on the Prosecutor since she bears the greatest burden for disclosure of materials. There exists a panoply of trial remedies, which are not specifically stated in the Rules but may be implied in case of failure to disclose by the Prosecutor. The judges possess wide discretionary powers to determine the appropriate remedy depending upon the circumstances of each case.

[64] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Scheduling Order, 6 October 2000, para. 2.

[65] Witness AFO later asked for protection to be lifted and used her real name, Agnes Murebwayire.

[66] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 4 December 2001, pp. 1–9.

[67] Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-I), Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion for Production of Defence Witness Statements, Separate Opinions of Judges Stephen and

The remedial options may include: a stay, adjournment of the trial or hearing of the witness, a specific order for disclosure, extension of time within which to disclose or accord extra time to the defence to prepare for cross examination. Additionally, there is the option of granting the defence a continuance to inspect and respond to evidence lately disclosed. Furthermore, the chambers may caution the Prosecutor or exclude evidence. According to John Theuman, writing of the American context, one of the most important factors considered by the courts in determining whether an exclusionary sanction is appropriate in a particular case has been whether or not the defence has actually been prejudiced in the development and preparation of its case.[68]

Although Theuman's discussion concerns cases falling within American state jurisdictions, his observations are pertinent to the ICTR, which has expressed similar considerations. It is indeed true that non disclosure by the prosecution normally involves an infringement of the rights of the accused to a fair trial.[69] It is usual, in ICTR jurisprudence, for the chambers to remedy non-disclosure by issuing a disclosure order combined with an adjournment or by ordering a total exclusion of evidence. In some instances, the trial chambers have had to caution the Prosecutor. In the Bagosora case, the Prosecutor had disregarded orders of Trial Chamber II in three prior disclosure decisions. The Chamber "deplored the prosecution's non compliance with the Rules and decisions of the Trial Chamber, which could undermine a fair and expedient administration of justice".[70] Similarly, Trial Chamber I, in the Media case, pointed out that as far as disclosure was concerned, "the prosecution has been dilatory in doing so". Although the Trial Chamber did not condone this failure, the judges stated that in their view "the Prosecutor's alleged failure to disclose [. . .] doesn't amount to serious egregious violation of the Rules to warrant severe Sanctions". Consequently, the Chamber concluded that material prejudice to the defence has not been demonstrated, in the sense that the accused had not lost an otherwise available defence. The Chamber also added that in [68] John E. Theuman, Exclusion of Evidence in State Criminal Action fc ailure of Prosecution To Comply with Discovery Requirements as to Physical or nentary Evidence or the Like Modern Cases, 27 AMERICAN L. REPORTS 6 (1984).

[69] Prosecutor v. Bagosora (Case No. ICTR-97-7-I), Decision on the M i by the Defence Counsel for Disclosure, 27 November 1997, p. 4.

[70] Prosecutor v. Bagosora (Case No. ICTR-97-7-I), Decision on the Defence's Motion for Inadmissibility of Disclosure based on the Decision of 11 June 1998, ICT-1996-70, 7 the course of the trial it would be open to the defence to raise objections "every step of the way against the use of undisclosed material".[71]

Regarding the exclusion of evidence, in the Media case, Trial Chamber I disallowed portions of the testimony of prosecution witness FW on the grounds that there was insufficient disclosure of new material, which had come as a surprise to the defence.[72] At the same time, the Trial Chamber had to decide on the next prosecution witness, witness ABH. The Chamber directed that if new information was discovered, the proper procedure would be to record a fresh statement from the witness in respect of the new information. The prosecution decided, as a precautionary step, to obtain the statement of witness ABH, but produced it six months later, on 3 August 2001. Upon an objection from the defence on this delay, the Chamber decided that the defence had had notice as early as 13 February 2001, have not been caught by surprise, and would therefore not suffer any prejudice.[73]

The remedy of stay of proceedings may be ordered in respect of conduct which is so oppressive, vexatious or unfair that it cannot be tolerated.[74] In the Media case, the Chamber stated that "in the event of default of disclosure [...], stay of proceedings and suppression of evidence are drastic sanctions".[75]

In respect of the question of adjournment of proceedings, Trial Chamber I has been seized of various motions. For instance, counsel for Hassan Ngeze requested an adjournment of one year alleging lack of preparation. In an oral decision, the Chamber considered that such an extended adjournment would cause serious prejudice to the co-accused and denied the motion.[76] The Chamber also had to decide three motions based on non-disclosure of evidence, filed on behalf of Ferdinand Nahimana, who sought a stay of proceedings, Jean Bosco Barayagwiza, who asked for suppression of evidence, and Hassan Ngeze, who requested a continuance. The Chamber, after inquiring into whether the prosecution had complied [71] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 26 September 2000. pp. 32, 33 and 35.

[72] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 1 March 2001, p. 38.

[73] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 30 November 2001, p. 57.

[74] See R. v. Larve, (1991) 65 CCC (3d) 1 (British Columbia C.A) or R. v. D.(E.), (1990) 57 C.C.C. (3d) 151, at 160 (Ontario C.A.).

[75] Prosecutor v. Nahimana et al. (Case No. ICTR-99-52-T), Transcript of 26 September 2000, p. 35.

[76] Ibid., p. 39.

with Rule 66 of the Rules, inter alia, held that a substantial volume of disclosure had in fact been completed and denied the motions.[77]

D. Conclusion

It is a fundamental principle that the burden of proving the guilt of the accused, beyond a reasonable doubt, lies upon the Prosecutor. For a trial to be fair, there must be substantial prior disclosure by the Prosecutor. Observably, the accused has no disclosure obligation at all unless an alibi or special defence is sought to be relied upon or unless the reciprocal rights of inspection are activated under Rule 67(C). Even so, "[t]he range is not as extensive because it does not extend, as does Sub-rule 66(B), to that which is 'material to the preparation' of the prosecution case".[78] Indeed disclosure by the defence never involves disclosure of statements of defence witnesses.

It should be noted that the ad hoc tribunal proceedings are basically adversarial rather than inquisitorial in character.[79] The passiveness of the accused is in line with his or her rights as stipulated in article 20(4)(g) of the ICTR Statute, providing that an accused may not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt. Having regard to the general principle of equality of arms, the non-disclosure of certain documents may also constitute an infringement of the right of defence.[80] In fact, one ICTY judge has observed that "the application of the equality of arms principle, especially in criminal proceedings, should be inclined in favour of the defence acquiring parity with the prosecution in the presentation of the defence case before Court to preclude any injustice against the accused".[81]

[77] Ibid., p. 25.

[78] Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-I), Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion for Production of Defence Witness Statements, Separate Opinion of Judge Stephen to Decision on Prosecutor Motion for Production of Defence Witness Statement, 27 November 1996, p. 2. Judge Stephen added that "the accused [...] is under no similar duty of disclosure of evidence, there is no reciprocity of obligation."

[79] V. Morris & M. Scharf, supra note 53, pp. 158 and 181.

[80] Solvay SA v. Commission of the European Communities, [1995] ECR-II 1775, 1802 at 1812–1813, citing the judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities in Case 85/76, Hoffman-La Roche v. Commission of the European Communities, [1979] ECR 461.

[81] Prosecutor v. Tadic (Case No. IT-94-T), Separate Opinion of Judge Jurah on the prosecution motion for the Production of Defence Witness statements, 27 November 1996, p. 3.

In finding remedies, there may exist strong reasons for the strict application of the Rules in several instances. This will lessen the threat of untoward practical ramifications plus any ensuing debate involving the lack of consistency. However, justice is not always encased in a straight jacket, and the interests of justice have to be considered. In applying these options, the chambers must give due regard to the delicate relationship between the continuing obligation of disclosure, ongoing investigations, fair trial and the rights of the accused. Where violations of the rights of the accused occur due to non-disclosure, whatever remedy is ordered by the trial chambers, it should not be crafted to discipline the Prosecutor per se, nor should it allow the Prosecutor to be advantaged by her failure to disclose. Rather, the remedy should be commensurate with the violation in the context of prevailing circumstances.

JAMIE A. WILLIAMSON*

COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY IN THE CASE LAW OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

Since the inception of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), the Prosecutor, through a strategy akin to that of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), has given priority to investigating and prosecuting individuals who held important responsibilities during the massacres which occurred in Rwanda in 1994.[1] As a result, many of the supposed leaders at the time of the events, including ministers of the 1994 interim government, senior military commanders, high ranking central and regional government officials, prominent businessmen, church leaders, intellectuals and other influential figures, are to be tried by the ICTR. Although most of these individuals are accused of having directly participated in the events,[2] by virtue of their positions of authority within the Rwandan hierarchy, they are also charged as superiors pursuant to article 6(3) of ICTR Statute. It provides that superiors have a duty to prevent and punish the criminal acts of their subordinates:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[3]

* Legal Officer, International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, The Hague. LL.M., University of London, England (2000), LL.B. with Honours, Bristol University, England (1995), Diplôme d'Etudes en Droit, Université de Poitiers, France (1994). The opinions expressed in this article are the author's and do not necessarily represent those of the ICTR or of the United Nations.

[1] First Annual Report of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994, U.N. Doc. A/51/399-S/1996/778, 24 September 1996, para. 42.

[2] Article 6(1) of the ICTR Statute reads: "A person who planned, instig , ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or e ution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individual esponsible for the crime."

[3] In effect, article 6(3) introduces a form of liability by way of omission.

Despite superior responsibility[4] being a well-established norm of conventional and customary law, the judgments of the ICTR reveal that its application in practice can still give rise to a number of difficulties. This article, by way of review of selected cases, will discuss how the ICTR has dealt with the issue of superior responsibility, in particular in the case of civilians, and with the specific requirements of article 6(3) which must be met for such responsibility to be imposed, namely, (i) that there existed a superior-subordinate relationship between the accused and the perpetrator of the crime; (ii) that the accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was about to be, was being, or had been committed by subordinates; and , (iii) that the accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or stop the crime, or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY OF CIVILIANS

Initially, the doctrine of command responsibility was applied only in a military context.[5] Recent jurisprudence of both the ICTR and the (ICTY) has recognised that civilians can also incur responsibility as superiors. Despite finally endorsing this principle, the ICTR was initially cautious in applying command responsibility to civilians, and preferred a pragmatic approach to blanket acceptance.

This concern was clearly stated in Akayesu where the Trial Chamber, after reference to the dissenting opinion of Judge Röling in Hirota before the Tokyo Tribunal, held:

> The Chamber therefore finds that in the case of civilians, the application of the principle of individual criminal responsibility, enshrined in article 6(3), to civilians remains contentious. Against this background, the Chamber holds that it is appropriate to assess on a case by case basis the power of authority actually devolved upon the Accused in order to determine whether or not he had the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[6]

Similarly, in Musema, the Chamber remarked that "in view of such disparate legal interpretations, it is disputable whether the principle of individual criminal responsibility, articulated in article 6(3) of the Statute, [4] The terms command responsibility and superior responsibility are used interchangeably throughout.

[5] See V. Morris & M.P. Scharf, I THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA 249–262 (1998).

[6] Prosecutor v. Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Judgment, 2 September 1998, should be applied to civilians".[7] Again, as in Akayesu, the Chamber favoured a case-by-case approach: "Accordingly, the Chamber reiterates its reasoning [...] that it is appropriate to assess on a case-by-case basis the power of authority actually devolved on an accused to determine whether or not he possessed the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish their perpetration."[8]

Despite this apparent reticence to extend the principle of superior responsibility beyond military commanders, the view now prevailing at the ICTR is that civilians can be held responsible under article 6(3). Indeed, in Kayishema & Ruzindana, the Trial Chamber found that "the application of criminal responsibility to those civilians who wield the requisite authority is not a contentious one".[9] This opinion was echoed in Bagilishema where it was stated that "there can be no doubt [...] that the doctrine of command responsibility extends beyond the responsibility of military commanders to encompass civilian superiors in positions of authority".[10] These precedents indeed reflect the current position of the law, inspired from post World War II jurisprudence, to recent rulings from the ICTY, that the doctrine of superior responsibility extends to civilians.[11]

Consequently, whether a person can be held responsible as a superior under article 6(3) of the Statute depends not on any particular military or civilian status, but rather on the degree and nature of authority and control wielded by the individual.[12] In sum, "the superior's actual or formal power

[7] Prosecutor v. Musema (Case No. ICTR-96-13-T), Judgment and Sentence, 27 January 2000, para. 135.

[8] Ibid.

[9] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-T), Judgment, 21 May 1999, para. 213.

[10] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema (Case No. ICTR-95-1A-T), Judgment, 7 June 2001, para. 42.

[11] See for instance Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-T), Judgment, 16 November 1998, para. 363: "[I]t must be concluded that the applicability of the principle of superior responsibility extends not only to military commanders but also to individuals in non military positions of superior responsibility." Germany v. Roechling et al., Indictment and Judgment of the General Tribunal of the Military Government of the French Zone of Occupation in Germany, 14 T.W.C., Appendix B; United States v. Flick et al., 6 T.W.C. 1. Likewise, article 28 of the Rome Statute makes provision for civilians to be held responsible as superiors.

[12] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 216. See also Prosecutor v. Aleksovski (Case No. IT-95-14/1), Judgment, 25 June 1999, para. 76: "Any person acting de facto as a superior may be held responsible under article 7(3). The decisive criterion in determining who is a superior according to customary international law is not only the accused's formal legal status but also his ability, as demonstrated by his duties and of control over his subordinates remains a determining factor in charging civilians with superior responsibility."[13]

EXISTENCE OF A SUPERIOR-SUBORDINATE RELATIONSHIP

Central to the doctrine of superior responsibility is the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship and of a chain of command. However, unlike situations involving military commanders, in a civilian context, obvious chains of command with strict hierarchical requirements can often be difficult to identify. Consequently, in situations of civilian superiors, a position of command cannot be determined by reference to formal status alone.[14] Instead, an assessment must be made of both the de jure and de facto authority of an individual before the imposition of command responsibility.[15] Ultimately therefore, command responsibility is "predicated upon the power of the superior to control the acts of his subordinates".[16]

This approach is particularly relevant in a context such as that which prevailed in Rwanda in 1994, where individuals who possessed formal authority prior to the massacres found themselves devoid of any power when the killings started, and vice versa.[17] For the Chambers therefore, "the power of the superior to control the acts of his subordinates"[18] and "the nature of the authority exercised by an individual"[19] were deemed crucial in establishing whether an accused exercised superior responsibility over individuals said to have committed acts covered by articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute.[20]

In effect, although a formal position could be indicative of authority, for the purposes of findings pursuant to article 6(3), especially in situations involving civilian superiors, it is necessary to assess the actual or real powers of the accused, within the context of the events.[21] Ultimately, whether authority stems from de facto or de jure powers, the decisive criterion in determining a position of command is that of "effective control."[22] That an individual exercises the necessary control to be imposed superior responsibility is an evidentiary question.

Although the Chambers have consistently accepted the "effective control" standard, there exists some divergence within the jurisprudence as to whether de facto powers alone are sufficient to establish a position of command or whether there is also a requirement of de jure authority. It appeared initially that authority could stem from either of the two powers. In Kayishema & Ruzindana, following reference to the Rome Statute, the Chamber was of the opinion that it had to be established that superiors simply exercised "effective control" over subordinates, whether de jure or de facto.[23] After having found that Kayishema "exercised de jure authority over [the] assailants", the Chamber specified that:

13 Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 135. See also Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana (Case No. ICTR-95-1-A), Judgment, 1 June 2001, para. 294: "Il s'agit de rechercher si le supérieur hiérarchique exerçait un contrôle effectif sur les auteurs des crimes allégués. L'existence d'un contrôle effectif peut être liée à la question de savoir si l'accusé avait une autorité de jure mais sans nécessairement en dépendre. Un tel contrôle ou une telle autorité peut revêtir un caractère de facto ou de jure."

14 Prosecutor v. Delalic, supra note 11, para. 370.

15 To date all the accused judged by the Rwanda Tribunal under article 6(3) of the Statute have been civilians: Ignace Bagilishema held the post of mayor (bourgmestre) of Mabanza commune in Kibuye prefecture of which Clément Kayishema was the prefect. Alfred Musema was the director of Gisovu tea factory also in Kibuye prefecture.

16 Prosecutor v. Delalic, supra note 11, para. 376.

17 See also M. CHERIF BASSIOUNI & PETER MANIKAS, THE LAW OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE FORMER YUGOSLAVIA 368–369 (1996): "... thus, a commander in chief despite the title, may fail to exercise the full powers of the office. Conversely, a civilian who occupies a position of military command and control actually may make decision on strategic or tactical matters or both."

18 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 217.

20 This approach was expounded in Prosecutor v. Delalic, supra note 11, para. 370: "While the matter is, thus, not undisputed, it is the Trial Chamber's opinion that a position of command is indeed a necessary precondition for the imposition of command responsibility. However, this statement must be qualified by the recognition that the existence of such a position cannot be determined by reference to formal status alone. Instead, the factor that determines liability for this type of criminal responsibility is the actual possession, or non-possession, of powers of control over the actions of subordinates."

21 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 218. "Therefore, in view of the chaotic situation that which prevailed in Rwanda in these pivotal months of 1994, the Chamber must be free to consider whether Kayishema had the requisite control over those committing the atrocities to establish individual criminal liability under article 6(3), whether by de jure or de facto command." See also Prosecutor v. Delalic, supra note 11, para 377, where the Chamber explained: "[We] must at all times be alive to the realities of any given situation and be prepared to pierce such veils of formalism that may shield those individuals carrying the greatest responsibility for heinous acts."

22 Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 39. See also Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, article 28(b): "With respect to superior and subordinate relationship not described in paragraph (a), a superior shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates [...]"

23 Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, paras. 221–22[illegible] confirmed on appeal, supra note 13, para. 294.

> . . . even where a clear hierarchy based upon de jure authority is not present, this does not prevent the finding of command responsibility. Equally, [. . .] the mere existence of de jure power does not always necessitate the imposition of command responsibility.[24]

For the Chamber, to establish a position of command, it was enough to show that the accused exercised influence over subordinates:

> The Trial Chamber has found that acts or omissions of a de facto superior can give rise to individual criminal responsibility pursuant to article 6(3) of the Statute. Thus no legal or formal position of authority need exist between the accused and the perpetrators of the crimes. Rather, the influence that an individual exercises over the perpetrators of the crime may provide sufficient grounds for the imposition of command responsibility if it can be shown that such influence was used to order the commission of the crime or that, despite such de facto influence, the accused failed to prevent the crime.[25]

It would seem from the findings in Kayishema & Ruzindana that a mere showing of "strong affiliations" is sufficient to establish effective control.[26] In theory therefore, following this reasoning, superior responsibility could be imposed on the basis of de facto powers alone, without de jure requirements. This conclusion however has not been followed in all subsequent judgments.

In Musema, the Chamber stipulated that "a civilian superior may be charged with superior responsibility only where he has effective control, be it de jure or merely de facto, over the persons committing violations of international humanitarian law".[27] The Chamber added that, although a superior's authority may be only de facto, derived from influence or indirect power, the determining question was the extent of the "power of control over persons who a priori were not under his authority".[28] The Chamber suggested that the existence of such control would undoubtedly be linked to influence of the accused in the context of the events:

[24] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 491.

[25] Ibid. para. 492

[26] Ibid. para. 501: "The facts of the case also reflect the de facto control that Kayishema exercised over all of the assailants participating in the massacres. Kayishema was often identified transporting or leading many of the assailants to the massacre sites. He was regularly identified, for example, in the company of members of the Interahamwe – transporting them, instructing them, rewarding them, as well as directing and leading their attacks. The Trial Chamber, therefore, is satisfied that Kayishema had strong affiliations with these assailants, and his command over them at each massacre site, as with the other assailants, was clearly established by witness testimony."

[27] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 141. See also para. 864: ". . . the authority, whether de facto or de jure, or the effective control, exercised by Alfred Musema in the context of the events alleged, may provide the basis for such individual criminal responsibility".

[28] . . . ibility in these circumstances would be through

> The influence at issue in a superior – subordinate command relationship often appears in the form of psychological pressure. This is particularly relevant to the case at bar, insofar as Alfred Musema was a socially and politically prominent person in Gisovu Commune.[29]

The Trial Chamber in Musema, after having examined all the pertinent evidence, found that the accused had "legal and financial control over [his] employees, particularly through his power to appoint and remove these employees from their positions at the Tea Factory",[30] and that he "was in a position, by virtue of these powers, to take reasonable measures, such as removing, or threatening to remove, an individual from his or her position at the Tea Factory if he or she was identified as a perpetrator of crimes punishable under the Statute".[31] It concluded that there therefore existed a de jure superior – subordinate relationship between Alfred Musema and the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory.[32]

However, the Chamber was not satisfied that there existed a superior – subordinate relationship between the accused and members of the population of Kibuye prefecture and thé villageois plantation workers, despite being satisfied that that these individuals perceived the accused "as a figure of authority and as someone who wielded considerable power in the region",[33] and noting that:

> Many of the witnesses testified that Musema was perceived as a figure of authority and considerable influence in the Gisovu region. Witness H stated that Musema was "very well respected" in the locality. Witness W testified that Musema "occupied an important position in Rwanda", and that he occupied a place higher in the regime than others of equivalent or higher age or qualifications. Witness E stated that Musema was considered to have the same powers as a Préfet.[34]

Although the Chamber in Musema premised that effective control could be both de facto and de jure, the findings of the Chamber suggest, unlike the Kayishema & Ruzindana precedent, that the existence of substantial de facto authority and influence is insufficient alone to satisfy the requirements of article 6(3).[35] Rather, it appears from Musema, although not conclusively, that an individual will be labelled a superior only where it

[29] Ibid., para. 140.

[30] Ibid., para. 880.

[31] Ibid.

[32] Ibid., para. 882.

[33] Ibid., para. 881.

[34] Ibid., para. 868.

[35] See also Prosecutor v. Delalic et al. (Case No. IT-96-21-A), Judgn . 20 February 2001, para. 266 where it was held that "customary law has specified a sta . of effective control, although it does not define precisely the means by which the control must be exercised. It is clear, however, that substantial influence as a means of control in any sense can be shown that there prevails some form of de jure authority, which includes legal or financial power.

A more restrictive approach is to be found in Bagilishema, where the Chamber, concurring with Delalic (or "Celebici"), held that the doctrine of command responsibility "extends to civilian superiors only to the extent that they exercise a degree of control over their subordinates which is similar to that of military commanders" (emphasis added).[36] It explained:

> According to the Trial Chamber in Celebici, for a civilian superior's degree of control to be "similar to" that of a military commander, the control over subordinates must be "effective", and the superior must, have the "material ability" to prevent and punish any offences. Furthermore, the exercise of de facto authority must be accompanied by "the trappings of the exercise of de jure authority". The present Chamber concurs.[37]

For the Chamber in Bagilishema, these trappings included factors such as a chain of command, the issuing and obeying of orders, and disciplinary action for insubordination.[38] It then introduced a two-pronged test for determining whether a civilian superior exercises effective control over his or her subordinates. First, it must be established that the trappings of de jure authority exist. Thereafter and where necessary, the extent of de facto control is to be assessed on a case-by-case basis.[39] The Chamber held that without real or contrived de jure authority comparable to that found in a military context, no individual could be considered a superior.[40] As such, by contrast to Musema, a bare legal relationship between an accused and his or her staff would not satisfy the requirements of article 6(3). In applying this test in its findings on communal employees being subordinates of the accused, the Chamber held that:

> Both in law and in practice, therefore, the Accused's formal relationship with his administrative and technical staff, at least until April 1994, appears to have been equivalent to that of a general manager of a public agency focused essentially on social development. This model implies that the Accused's de jure authority over lower-level staff was altogether different from that of a military commander over subordinates.[41] the possession of material abilities to prevent subordinate offences or to punish subordinate offenders, lacks sufficient support in State practice and judicial decisions."

[36] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 42.

[37] Ibid., para. 43.

[38] Ibid. The Chamber added: "It is by these trappings that the law distinguishes civilian superiors from mere rabble-rousers or other persons of influence."

[39] Ibid., para. 152.

[40] That being said, the Chamber did recognise elsewhere in the judgment, at para. 39, that "ultimately it is the actual relationship of command (whether de jure or de facto) that is required for command responsibility"

However, the Appeals Chamber in Bagilishema recently ruled that the Trial Chamber's approach to the principle of 'effective control', namely that the control exercised by a civilian superior must be of the same nature as that exercised by a military commander, was erroneous. For the Appeals Chamber, it suffices that the accused exercises the required "degree" of control over his subordinates, namely, that of effective control. It reiterated that the test in all cases is whether the accused exercises effective control over his or her subordinates, and not just whether he or she had de jure authority.[42]

As can be seen, the jurisprudence of the ICTR has consistently accepted that the level of de jure and de facto authority is crucial in assessing whether there exists a superior subordinate relationship. The judgments have been pragmatic, and were initially content to assess the authority of a superior within the realities of the given circumstances. That which mattered was the position of the superior in casu. Although it is now established that superior responsibility may be applied to civilian commanders, the juris prudence reflects the concern that "great care must be taken lest an injustice be committed in holding individuals responsible for the acts of others in situations where the link of control is absent or too remote".[43]

THE "KNOWLEDGE" REQUIREMENT

In conformity with article 6(3) of the Statute, if a superior is to be held responsible for criminal conduct of subordinates, it must be established that he or she possessed the requisite mens rea, namely that he or she knew or had reason to know of such conduct. It is generally agreed that both direct and circumstantial evidence can be relied upon to prove the "knowledge" of a superior,[44] yet difficulties arise as to the requisite level of proof needed to show that a superior "had reason to know". In addition, it remains unclear whether the ICTR considers the standard applicable to military and civilian superiors to be one and the same.

Distinction between Civilian and Military Superiors

In the two cases that have dealt with the existence of a different mens rea for civilian and military superiors, divergences in the r oning are apparent. It would appear as though different conclusion ave been [42] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema (Case No. ICTR-95-1A-A), Appeal udgement, 13 December 2002, paras 55 and 62.

[43] Prosecutor v. Delalic, supra note 11, para. 377

6374

reached depending on the source of law relied upon in the case. In Musema, the Chamber recognised that article 6(3) "closely resembles in spirit and form" article 86(2) of the 1977 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949.[45] According to article 86(2),

> The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all necessary measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach.

Although noting that the drafters of this article had been of the opinion that a "should have known" standard "was too broad and would subject the commander, a posteriori, to arbitrary judgments", the Chamber offered little guidance as to its understanding of "had reason to know" in the case.[46] That being said, the Chamber considered that the applicable standard for criminal responsibility under article 86(2) does not distinguish between military and civilian superiors.[47]

By contrast, in Kayishema & Ruzindana, the Chamber, basing its findings in part on article 28 of the Rome Statute,[48] held that:

> [...] the distinction between military commanders and other superiors embodied in the Rome Statute [is] an instructive one. In the case of the former it imposes a more active duty upon the superior to inform himself of the activities of his subordinates when he, "knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes." This is juxtaposed with the mens rea element demanded of all other superiors who must have, "[known], or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes".[49]

For the Chamber, as stipulated in the Rome Statute, civilian leaders unlike military leaders should not have imposed "a prima facie duty" to be seised of every activity of their subordinates.[50]

Although the two judgments advance little on whether a distinction is to be drawn between the nature of the duty to inquire of civilian and military leaders, they reflect the fact that the question is still open to debate. This can also be seen in recent ICTY findings. Indeed, in the Delalic appeal, it was noted that: "civilian superiors undoubtedly bear responsibility for subordinate offences under certain conditions, but whether their responsibility contains identical elements to that of military commanders is not clear in customary law".[51] By contrast, in a subsequent judgment, Krnojelac, an ICTY Trial Chamber was of the opinion that the knowledge requirement had been applied uniformly in cases before the ICTY to both civilian and military commanders and accordingly that "the same state of knowledge is required for both civilian and military commanders".[52]

Had Reason to Know

A superior is under a duty to act where he or she "had reason to know" subordinates were about to commit or had committed offences covered by articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute. The ambiguity of this terminology makes it unclear whether, for the purposes of article 6(3), "had reason to know" means only that a superior had information yet failed to act on it or whether it also imposes a positive duty upon the superior to inform himself or herself.

The early ICTR judgments offer little reasoning as to why one standard rather than another was adopted. In Kayishema & Ruzindana, the Trial Chamber simply referred to the positions in Delalic and article 28 of the Rome Statute[53] before coming to the conclusion that a superior would have [45] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 146.

[46] Ibid.

[47] Ibid., para. 147.

[48] "Responsibility of commanders and other superiors. In addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court: 1. A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces, where: (a) That military commander or person either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes; and (b) That military commander or person failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution. 2. With respect to superior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph 1, a superior shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates, where: (a) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes; (b) The crimes concerned activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior; and (c) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution."

[49] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 227.

[50] Ibid., para. 228.

[51] Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., supra note 35, para. 240. The Chamber declined to r on the question of law given that the Trial Chamber had made a factual determination t the accused was not in a position of superior authority in any capacity.

[52] Prosecutor v. Krnojelac (Case No. IT-97-25), Judgment, 15 March 2002, para. 94.

[53] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, paras. 226–228. The Chamber "had reason to know" where he or she "consciously disregarded information which put him on notice that his subordinates had committed, or were about to commit acts in breach" of the Statute.[54] For the Chamber, Kayishema knew or had reason to know that large scale attacks were imminent at Mubuga church:

> First, the Tutsis were the subject of attacks throughout Rwanda by the date of the attack at Mubuga Church, and Kayishema was privy to this information. Second, following Kayishema's conversation with the Hutu priest, witnessed by a number of Tutsis at the Church, the priest refused the Tutsis access to water and informed them that they were about to die. Finally, the attackers included soldiers, gendarmes, and the members of the Interahamwe, all of whom he exercised either de jure or de facto control over.[55]

The Chamber ultimately found that Kayishema was present during the attacks.[56] It may therefore seem to be a redundant exercise for the purposes of the findings on superior responsibility to establish whether he knew or had reason to know that the attacks were imminent.[57] Nevertheless, had Kayishema's presence not been demonstrated, it is arguable whether knowledge of massacres elsewhere in Rwanda and of subordinates being amongst the attackers can be said to have put Kayishema on notice of the killings at the church.[58]

In Musema, again no clear position is set out by the Chamber as to its understanding of "had reason to know" save to note that a "should that some information be available that would put the accused on notice of an offence and require further investigation by him". Then, regarding article 28 of the Rome Statute, the Trial Chamber agreed with the distinction made between military and on-military superiors inasmuch as there is no "prima facie duty upon a non-military commander to be seized of every activity of all persons under his or her control".

54 Ibid., para. 228.

55 Ibid., para. 509.

56 Ibid., para. 404.

57 Kayishema had not been accused of being present during the attacks, which thereby justifies the charge of command responsibility.

58 For instance, at para. 400: "Each one of these eyewitnesses, with the exception of PP, placed Kayishema at the site on at least one day either shortly before or during the attacks of 15 and 16 April." The Chamber also concluded, in para. 400: "It is clear from the evidence presented to the Trial Chamber that of the thousands of Tutsis gathered at Mubuga Church, only a few survived this weekend massacre. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema and his subordinates, including local authorities, the gendarmes, the communal police and the members of the Interahamwe were present and participated at the attacks at Mubuga Church between 14 and 16 April. As aforementioned, Kayishema, is not charged with having been present during the attacks under paragraph 41 of the Indictment. In light of the testimony of the five witnesses the Chamber nevertheless finds that Kayishema was present during the actual attacks. We further find that his presence and the presence and the participation of other local authorities, encouraged the have known" standard may be too broad.[59] For the Chamber to have said so little may seem as an inadvertent lapsus on its part. However, given that Musema's superior responsibility was largely incurred through his actual presence and activity in the build up and during the various attacks involving his subordinates, it appears to have been self-evident for the Chamber to determine that he was fully and directly knowledgeable in the circumstances of their acts.[60] Consequently, the Chamber may not have deemed it necessary to develop the issue of him having or not "had reason to know".[61]

By contrast, Bagilishema offers more insight into the mens rea required under article 6(3) of the ICTR Statute. As a preliminary remark, it is recalled in the judgment that although an individual's command position may be a significant indicator of knowledge, such knowledge cannot be presumed on the basis of position alone.[62] The Chamber then proceeded to explain in which conditions "a superior possesses or will be imputed the mens rea required to incur criminal liability", namely:

> he or she had actual knowledge, established through direct or circumstantial evidence, that his or her subordinates were about to commit, were committing, or had committed, a crime under the Statutes; or,
>
> he or she had information which put him or her on notice of the risk of such offences by indicating the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether such offences were about to be committed, were being committed, or had been committed, by subordinates; or,
>
> the absence of knowledge is the result of negligence in the discharge of the superior's duties; that is, where the superior failed to exercise the means available to him or her to learn of the offences, and under the circumstances he or she should have known.[63]

Thus, the third possibility envisaged by the Chamber introduces a "duty to know" on the part of the superior. Responsibility will be imposed upon the superior where he or she "should have known" of the offences, or, in other words, where he or she was negligent in his or her duty and with the means available to obtain information relevant to the offences.

59 Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 146.

60 Ibid., paras. 894, 899, 905, 914, 919, 924, 945 and 950.

61 If presence and active participation is established, a charge based on superior responsibility may seem unnecessary. See for instance Prosecutor v. Kordic & Cerkez (Case No. IT-95-14/2), Judgment, 26 February 2001, para. 371: "... in cases where the evidence presented demonstrates that a superior would not only have been informed of subordinates' crimes committed under his authority, but also exercised his powers to plan, instigate or otherwise aid and abet in the planning, preparation or execution of these crimes, the mode of criminal responsibility incurred may be better characterised by article 7(1)."

62 Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 45.

63 ...

Accordingly, if a superior is diligent in his or her duty yet remains ignorant of crimes committed or to be committed by subordinates, he or she may not necessarily incur responsibility. The Chamber adopted this mens rea standard basing itself on conclusions of the ICTY Trial Chambers in Aleksovski[64] and Blaskic.[65] This standard is stricter than that proposed in article 28 of Rome Statute for civilian superiors, and reflects instead the one applicable to military superiors. Indeed, in the case of civilian superiors before the International Criminal Court, responsibility will be incurred only if the superior "either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes". By contrast, in the case of military superiors it only needs to be shown that the superior "either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes".

Similarly, the "should have known" standard suggested in Bagilishema may be difficult to reconcile with the Delalic appeal judgment, whereby "a superior will be criminally responsible through the principles of superior responsibility only if information was available to him which would have put him on notice of offences committed by subordinates",[66] and with the recent ICTY judgment in Krnojelac, which held that "it must be proved that [the superior] had in his possession information which would at least

[64] Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, supra note 12, para. 80: "Admittedly, as regards 'indirect' responsibility, the Trial Chamber is reluctant to consider that a 'presumption' of knowledge about a superior exists which would somehow automatically entail his guilt whenever a crime was allegedly committed. The Trial Chamber deems however that an individual's superior position per se is a significant indicium that he had knowledge of the crimes committed by his subordinates. The weight to be given to that indicium however depends inter alia on the geographical and temporal circumstances." Zlatko Aleksovski was a superior of prison guards for all matters relating to their duties in connection with the organisation and functioning of Kaonik prison

[65] Prosecutor v. Blaskic (Case No. IT-95-14), Judgment, 3 March 2000, para. 332: "In conclusion, the Trial Chamber finds that if a commander has exercised due diligence in the fulfilment of his duties yet lacks knowledge that crimes are about to be or have been committed, such lack of knowledge cannot be held against him. However, taking into account his particular position of command and the circumstances prevailing at the time, such ignorance cannot be a defence where the absence of knowledge is the result of negligence in the discharge of his duties: this commander had reason to know within the meaning of the Statute." Tihomir Blaskic was the commander of the Croatian Defence Council armed forces (HVO) in central Bosnia.

[66] Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., supra note 35, para. 241. In other words the superior is not permitted to remain wilfully blind to the acts of subordinates. Although the Appeals Chamber limited its pronouncement to the customary law standard of mens rea as existing at the time of the offences charged in the indictment, it is submitted that this finding is still put him on notice of the risk of such offences, such information alerting him to the need for additional investigation to determine whether such crimes were or were about to be committed by his subordinates".[67]

Although in Bagilishema the Chamber advanced a possible "should have known" standard as a basis for superior responsibility, its findings in relation to the superior responsibility of the accused seem to be based solely on the stricter standard of whether he had information which put him or her on notice of the risk of offences being committed.[68] This reflects the position of the Appeals Chamber in Delalic, whereby "the relevant information only needs to have been provided or available to the superior, or in the Trial Chamber's words, 'in the possession of'. It is not required that he actually acquainted himself with the information."[69] In effect, knowledge is to be presumed only if the superior had the means to obtain it and deliberately refrained from doing so, rather than if he or she fails in his or her duty to obtain the relevant information.[70]

Of course, as noted in Bagilishema, a superior is unlikely to admit being in possession of relevant information if in so doing it would mean incriminating himself or herself. In such situations, and where there is no direct evidence of the superior's knowledge, this may be established by way of circumstantial evidence.[71] To this end, according to Bagilishema, a number of indicia may determine whether a superior possessed the requisite knowledge:

(a) The number of illegal acts;
(b) The type of illegal acts;
(c) The scope of illegal acts;
(d) The time during which the illegal acts occurred;
(e) The number and type of troops involved;
(f) The logistics involved, if any;

[67] Prosecutor v. Krnojelac, supra note 51, para. 94.

[68] The Chamber subsequently reviewed the responsibility of the accused on the basis of negligence for having established or permitted the establishment of a system of roadblocks without adequately supervising its operations. In this section of the judgment, the Chamber dealt not only with the issue of establishing a dangerous system, but also with questions of whether it was foreseeable that an inadequately supervised roadblock might result in deaths (para. 1020) and of whether the accused showed "wanton disregard for high-risk activities at roadblocks" (para. 1021). Findings on these questions are relevant to establishing [illegible] knowledge on a "should have known" basis. Arguably, given that killings were committed [illegible] the roadblocks by at least one [illegible] the accused (para. 973), this section may be perceived as also relating to the [illegible] responsibility of the accused.

[69] Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., supra note 35, para. 241.

[70] Ibid., para. 226.

(g) The geographical location of the acts;
(h) The widespread occurrence of the acts;
(i) The tactical tempo of operations;
(j) The modus operandi of similar illegal acts;
(k) The officers and staff involved;
(l) The location of the commander at the time.[72]

After reviewing the evidence, the Chamber concluded:

> In summary, the indicium of the Accused's contemporaneous presence in the vicinity of the crime in the case of Judith, together with the indicia of geographical location, time and modus operandi in relation to the killings of both Bigirimana and Judith, combined with the fact that no more than two people were killed in a period when attacks on civilians were alleged to be common – telling though these indicia may seem when taken in combination – are in the Chamber's assessment nevertheless not sufficient to prove that the Accused had the requisite mens rea. The findings in Celebici and Aleksovski were made on a much firmer foundation.[73]

As can be seen therefore, the jurisprudence of the ICTR on the mens rea requirements for superiors to incur responsibility is still evolving. Although it appears clear that circumstantial evidence may be used to establish knowledge, the question of whether a "should have known" standard is acceptable under article 6(3) is yet to be satisfactorily resolved.

FAILURE TO PREVENT OR PUNISH

Where it is shown that an individual is a superior for the purposes of article 6(3) of the Statute, subject to the requisite knowledge being established, he or she is then under an obligation "to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof". In other words, a superior has a positive duty to act, in such circumstances where he or she is able to exercise effective control over subordinates and has the material ability to prevent and punish their crimes.[74]

Kayishema was found to have exercised de facto control over all of the assailants participating to the massacres and was in a position of command "over them at each massacre".[75] It was also held that Kayishema played a pivotal role in the massacres and that "the perpetrators committed [72] Ibid., para. 968. Citing Prosecutor v. Delalic et al., supra note 11, para. 386.

[73] Ibid., para. 988.
[74] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, paras. 229 & 230.
[75] Ibid., para. 501. The assailants included armed civilians and militia, gendarmes, and the crimes pursuant to [his] orders".[76] Consequently, given the position of authority of the accused, he was duty bound to take preventive and repressive action, and would incur superior responsibility where he failed in this duty: "In light of this uncontestable control that Kayishema enjoyed, and his overarching duty as Prefect to maintain public order, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that a positive duty upon Kayishema existed to prevent the commission of the massacres."[77]

A superior may be held responsible for failing to take "only such measures that were within his or her powers".[78] Whether the superior possessed such material ability is not an abstract question but is "inherently linked with the given factual situation".[79] It is clear that the impossible cannot be demanded of the superior.[80]

To date, no blanket description is to be found in the ICTR judgments as to what constitutes "necessary and reasonable measures". Instead, the Chambers have adopted a pragmatic approach, evaluating, on the basis of the available evidence, the extent of the control of the superior, and whether he or she could, in fact, have taken such measures as to prevent and punish subordinates. It follows that the extent of the measures to which a superior has recourse depends essentially on his or her position and status within the given circumstances of the case.[81]

In Musema, where the accused was the director of a tea factory, these measures were said to include the threat of or actual disciplinary action over tea factory employees, and restricting the use of certain resources. Indeed, for the Chamber, by virtue of his de jure power and de facto control over the employees of the tea factory, measures at Musema's disposal included "removing, or threatening to remove, an individual from his or her position at the Tea Factory if he or she was identified as a perpetrator of crimes punishable under the Statute" and "attempti[ng] to prevent or [76] Ibid., paras. 504 & 505.

[77] Ibid., para. 513.
[78] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 48. Regarding the meaning of "necessary" and "reasonable", the Chamber stated, at para. 47, that it "understands 'necessary' to be those measures required to discharge the obligation to prevent or punish in the circumstances prevailing at the time; and, 'reasonable' to be those measures which the commander was in a position to take in the circumstances".
[79] Ibid., para. 48 and Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 231
[80] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 511.
[81] See also INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE RED CROSS, COMMENTARY ON THE PROTOCOLS ADDITIONAL TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS OF 12 AUGUST 1949, AND RELATING TO THE PROTECTION OF VICTIMS OF ARMED CONFLICTS para. 3548 (1987), where it is explained that it is matter of common sense that the measures described in relation as feasible measures which the superiors are expected to take under article 86

to punish the use of Tea Factory vehicles, uniforms or other Tea Factory property in the commission of such crimes".[82] In certain circumstances, as noted in Bagilishema, evidence of actions such as the holding of meetings to restore security and ethnic harmony, the issuing of fake identity cards, falsifying resident registers and attempting generally to restore law and order may support a finding that a superior took necessary and reasonable measures to prevent and punish offences.[83]

Of course, where an accused is found to have actively directed and ordered subordinates to commit acts prohibited by the Statute, then it would be difficult to plead inability to prevent or punish them. Effectively, active participation negates any defence of powerlessness.[84] This was alluded to in Kayishema & Ruzindana where, in addition to it being established that the accused had a positive duty to act by virtue of his or her position of authority, it was stated that where the crimes were committed pursuant to the orders of the accused, "it is self-evident [...] that he failed to take reasonable measure to prevent them".[85] Similarly, in Musema it was found that, rather than taking the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the perpetration of acts by his subordinates, by his presence and personal participation at the attack sites, he in effect abetted his subordinates in the commission of those acts.[86]

Conceivably, a superior could contend that despite not being in a position to prevent his or her subordinates from committing offences at the time

[82] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 880. It should be noted that it is unclear from the findings whether the accused would also have been found responsible under article 6(3) had he not been present at the scene of the attacks whilst his subordinates committed crimes. For instance, had the accused come to know of his or her subordinates being involved in massacres, would dismissal or suspension from office be considered as a measure sufficient to exonerate him or her under article 6(3)? It could be contended that the accused had the duty as de jure superior to take the matter further by, for instance, reporting the offender to the police and judicial authorities.

[83] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, paras. 226–303.

[84] As noted elsewhere in the article, article 6(1) charges may be more appropriate than superior responsibility in situations of active participation and presence of the accused during the events.

[85] Prosecutor v. Kayishema & Ruzindana, supra note 9, para. 505.

[86] Prosecutor v. Musema, supra note 7, para. 894: "The Chamber finds that it has also been established that Musema was the superior of said employees and that he held not only de jure power over them, but also de facto power. Considering that Musema was personally present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the opinion that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that the Accused nevertheless failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in the commission of those acts, by his presence and personal participation." See also paras. 905, 914, 919, and 924.

of the events, he or she nevertheless intended to take repressive action at a later date. Such an argument might be raised in circumstances where, had the superior spoken out in the "midst of battle" to prevent subordinates, there might have been a real risk that he or she would be perceived as a traitor and thereby endanger his or her life. According to Bagilishema, such a position is untenable:

> [T]he obligation to prevent or punish does not provide the Accused with alternative options. For example, where the Accused knew or had reason to know that his or her subordinates were about to commit crimes and failed to prevent them, the Accused cannot make up for the failure to act by punishing the subordinates afterwards.[87]

Moreover, where a superior creates an environment of impunity, thereby condoning and encouraging culpable actions by subordinates, he or she may incur criminal responsibility. Thus, a regime implemented by a superior must be such as to effectively deter subordinates from committing offences.

> [I]n the case of failure to punish, a superior's responsibility may arise from his or her failure to create or sustain among the persons under his or her control, an environment of discipline and respect for the law. ... It follows that command responsibility for failure to punish may be triggered by a broadly based pattern of conduct by a superior, which in effect encourages the commission of atrocities by his or her subordinates.[88]

The issue of failing to prevent or punish remains contentious. Indeed, post facto assessments of events within a judicial context rarely allow for a full understanding of past chaotic realities. Likewise it remains difficult to truly comprehend the extent to which a superior could have acted in the given circumstances.[89]

[87] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 49, with reference to Prosecutor v. Blaskic, supra note 64, para. 336.

[88] Prosecutor v. Bagilishema, supra note 10, para. 50.

[89] See in this regard Prosecutor v. Blaskic, supra note 64, para 335 where it was held that "it is a commander's degree of effective control, his material ability, which will guide the Trial Chamber in determining whether he reasonably took the measures required either to prevent the crime or to punish the perpetrator. As stated above in the discussion of the definition of 'superior', this implies that, under some circumstances, a commander may discharge his obligation to prevent or punish by reporting the matter to the competent authorities." There is of course the risk that such an assessment as to whether a superior could have done more may err into the domain of speculation.

CONCLUSION

The application of the doctrine of command responsibility, in particular to civilian authorities, gives rise to a number of complex issues. The ICTR, through its early judgments, has endeavoured to address these to the extent possible, and, despite a case by case approach being favoured, a consistent body of law is slowly being developed. Although initial dicta suggested that the imposition of superior responsibility upon civilians was contentious, it is clear that any individual who possesses the necessary authority and effective control can theoretically be held liable for the acts of subordinates. However, it still remains to be seen whether civilians bear the same standard of responsibility as military commanders. Hopefully, this may be resolved when the ICTR rules in the military cases before it.[90]

[90] The joint "military" trial of of Théoneste Bagasora (Director of Cabinet, Ministry of Defence), Anatole Nsengiyumva (Lieutenant-Colonel), Gratien Kabiligi (Brigadier-General in FAR) and Aloys Ntabakuze (Commander of Battalion in FAR) commenced on 2 April 2002. The second "military trial", which is yet to open, involves Innocent Sagahutu (second-in-command of the Renaissance Battalion), François-Xavier Nzuwonemeye (Commander of the 42nd Battalion) and Augustin Ndindiliyimana (Chief of Staff of Gendarmerie Nationale)

CRIMINAL LAW FORUM
The Official Journal of the International Society for the Reform of Criminal

Criminal Law Forum is a peer-review journal dedicated to the advancement of criminal law theory, practic reform throughout the world. Under the direction of an international editorial board, Criminal Law Forum the global community of criminal law scholars and practitioners through the publication of original contrib and the dissemination of noteworthy public documents.
Criminal Law Forum is published pursuant to an agreement with the International Society for the Refo Criminal Law, based in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada.

Submission of manuscripts. Articles for publication (in triplicate and on diskette) and communic concerning them should be sent to the following address:

Professor William A. Schabas
Director, Irish Centre for Human Rights
National University of Ireland, Galway
Galway, Ireland
Tel: +353 (91) 512103
Fax: +353 (91) 750575
E-mail: william.schabas@nuigalway.ie

Offprints: The author will receive 25 copies of the article without charge. Additional offprints may be on when the proofs are returned. The first-named author of an article receives one copy of the journal.

No page charges are levied on authors or their institutions.

Consent to publish in this journal entails the author's irrevocable and exclusive authorisation of the publish collect any sums or considerations for copying or reproduction payable by third parties (as mentioned in ar 17, paragraph 2, of the Dutch Copyright Act of 1912 and in the Royal Decree of June 20, 1974 (S.351) purs to article 16b of the Dutch Copyright Act of 1912) and/or to act in or out of court in connection herewith.

Instructions for authors can be obtained from our website http://www.wkap.nl.
Criminal Law Forum is indexed/abstracted in ASSIA: Applied Social Science Index and Abstracting; Crin Justice Abstracting.

ANNEX 26:

Akehurst's Modern Introduction to International Law (7th edn Malanczuk (ed.), 1997) [Extract].

AKEHURST'S MODERN INTRODUCTION TO INTERNATIONAL LAW

Seventh revised edition

Peter Malanczuk

Assessor iur., Dr. iur.,
Professor of International Law, Law Faculty, Erasmus University Rotterdam,
Former Legal Assistant to the President of the Iran–United States Claims Tribunal, Counsel, Lalive & Partners, Attorneys-at-Law, Geneva, Member, Tianjin Board of Arbitration, China

London and New York

First published in 1970 by HarperCollins Academic Second edition 1971
Third edition 1977
Fourth edition 1982
Fifth edition 1987
Sixth edition 1987

Reprinted four times
by Routledge
11 New Fetter Lane, London EC4P 4EE

Simultaneously published in the USA and Canada
by Routledge
29 West 35th Street, New York, NY 10001

Seventh edition 1997
Reprinted 1998 (twice) and 1999 (twice), 2000, 2001, 2002

Routledge is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group

Typeset in Ehrhardt by RefineCatch Ltd, Bungay, Suffolk
Printed and bound in Great Britain by T.J. International Ltd, Padstow, Cornwall

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
A catalog record for this book is available from the Library of Congress

ISBN 0–415–16553–9 (hbk)
ISBN 0–415–11120–X (pbk)

3 Sources of international law

The word 'source of law' ('source de droit', 'Rechtsquelle') has a variety of interpretations.[1] The English legal philosopher H.L.A. Hart distinguishes between its use in a 'material' or 'historical sense' and in a 'formal' or 'legal' sense.[2] In the first non-legal sense it refers to a causal or historical influence explaining the factual existence of a given rule of law at a given place and time, for example, to show that a certain contemporary rule of Dutch law may originate from Roman law, or to state that the development of labour law has resulted from the political action taken by trade unions. In the legal sense, the term means the criteria under which a rule is accepted as valid in the given legal system at issue. These criteria distinguish binding law from legally non-binding other social or moral norms and the law de lege lata (the law as it currently stands) from the law de lege ferenda (the law as it may be, or should be, in the future).[3] In this sense, the term 'source' has a technical meaning related to the law-making process and must not be confused with information sources, research sources or bibliographies on international law.[4]

In developed national legal systems there are definite methods of identifying the law, primarily by reference to the constitution, legislation (statutes) and judicial case law. In the decentralized international legal system, lacking a hierarchical structure,[5] the problem of finding the law is much more complicated. There is no authority to adopt universally binding legislation[6] and no compulsory jurisdiction of international courts and tribunals without the consent of states. In this system the same subjects of international law[7] that are bound by international rules and principles have created them themselves.

The most important source of international law for centuries was customary law, evolving from the practice of states.[8] The recent attempt to codify international law and the conclusion of multilateral treaties in many important areas, such as diplomatic and consular relations,[9] the law of war[10] or the law of the sea,[11] have sought to clarify the law and to establish universally accepted norms. But customary law has still retained its predominance over treaty law or other sources in many other areas, such as, for example, state immunity[12] or state responsibility.[13] The changes in international society since 1945 have led to basic disputes on the sources of international law and it must be noted at the outset that they have become an area of considerable theoretical controversy. In particular, the two main traditional elements, custom and treaties, are now often difficult to distinguish clearly. As R. Jennings put it in 1981:

1 Harris CMIL, 23–68; Restatement (Third), Vol. 1, paras. 102–3, 24–39; C. Dominice, Methodology of International Law, EPIL 7 (1984), 334 et seq.; R. Monaco, Sources of International Law, ibid., 424 et seq.; B. Simma/P. Alston, The Sources of Human Rights Law: Custom, Jus Cogens, and General Principles, AYIL 12 (1988/9), 82–108; C. Sepúlveda, Methods and Procedures for the Creation of Legal Norms in the International System of States: An Inquiry into the Progressive Development of International Law in the Present Era, GYIL 33 (1990), 432; O. Schachter, International Law in Theory and Practice, 1991, Chapter III; U. Fastenrath, Lücken im Völkerrecht, 1991; E. Riedel, Standards and Sources. Farewell to the Exclusivity of the Sources Triad in International Law?, EJIL 2 (1991), 58–84; E. Frangou-Ikonomidou (ed.), Sources of International Law, 1992; U. Fastenrath, Relative Normativity in International Law, EJIL 4 (1993), 305–40; G. Tunkin, Is General International Law Customary Law Only?, ibid., 534–41; H.H.G. Post, Some Curiosities in the Sources of the Law of Armed Conflict Conceived in a General International Legal Perspective, NYIL 25 (1994), 83–118.

2 H.L.A. Hart, The Concept of Law, 1961, 246–7. On the meaning of 'sources' see also R.Y. Jennings, International Law, EPIL 7 (1984), 284; I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 4th edn 1990, 1–3, discussing the common distinction between 'formal' sources (legal procedures and methods for creating binding rules) and 'material' sources (providing evidence of the content of rules in the sense of substantive law) which is not clearly applicable in international law.

3 On the need to distinguish clearly between the lex lata and mere propositions on the lex ferenda see R.Y. Jennings, An International Lawyer Takes Stock, ICLQ 39 (1990), 513–29, 514.

6384

> I doubt whether anybody is going to dissent from the proposit[illegible]e has never been a time when there has been so much confusion and doubt about the tests of the validity – or sources – of international law, than the present.[14]

Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice[15] provides:

> The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:
>
> (a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States;
> (b) international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
> (c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
> (d) . . . judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

This provision is usually accepted as constituting a list of the sources of international law.[16] Some writers have criticized it on the grounds that it does not list all the sources of international law, or that it includes aspects which are not genuine sources, but none of the alternative lists which have been suggested has won general approval. It is therefore proposed to examine the sources listed in the Court's Statute before considering other possible sources of international law.

Treaties

The Statute of the International Court of Justice speaks of 'international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states'.[17] The word 'convention' means a treaty, and that is the only meaning which the word possesses in international law, and in international relations generally. This is a point worth emphasizing, because students have been known to confuse conventions with conferences, or to mix up conventions in international law with conventions of the constitution in British constitutional law. Other terms used as a synonym for treaties, or for particular types of treaties, are agreement, pact, understanding, protocol, charter, statute, act, covenant, declaration, engagement, arrangement, accord, regulation and provision. Some of these words have alternative meanings (that is, they can also mean something other than treaties), which makes the problem of terminology even more confusing.

Treaties are of growing importance in international law. The practice of publishing collections of treaties concluded by a certain state or group of states commenced during the second half of the seventeenth century. The most important collection, under various titles, until the Second World War, was started by G.F. von Martens in 1771 with his 'Recueil des principaux traités'. Since 1945, in accordance with Article 102 of the UN Charter, more than 33,000 treaties have been registered with the United 4 An excellent guide to the literature in this respect is Public International Law – A Current Bibliography of Books and Articles, published regularly by the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law in Heidelberg, which evaluates over 1400 journals, in addition to other collected works, and also lists newly published books on all areas of public international law.

5 See Chapter 1 above, 3–5.

6 See O. Schachter, The Nature and Process of Legal Development in International Society, in R.St.J. Macdonald/D.M. Johnston (eds), The Structure and Process of International Law, 1983, 745–808; G.M. Danilenko, Law-Making in the International Community, 1993; K. Skubiszewski, International Legislation, EPIL II (1995), 1255–62..

7 See Chapters 5, 75–90 and 6, 91–108 below.

8 See R. Bernhardt, Customary International Law, EPIL I (1992), 898–905.

9 See Chapter 8 below, 123–9.

10 See Chapter 20, 342–63 below.

11 See Chapter 12 below, 173–5.

12 See Chapter 8 below, 118–23.

13 See Chapter 17 below, 254–72.

14 R.Y. Jennings, What is International Law and How Do We Tell When We See It?, ASDI 37 (1981), 59–88, at 60.

15 Text in Brownlie BDIL, 438.

16 On the practice of the ICJ see M. Mendelson, The International Court of Justice and the Sources of International Law, in V. Lowe/M. Fitzmaurice (eds), Fifty Years of the International Court of Justice, 1996, 63–89.

17 Op. cit. See R. Bernhardt, Treaties, EPIL 7 (1984), 459–64. Further literature is listed in Chapter 9 below, 130, which deals with the law of treaties.

Nations, several thousand of which are multilateral.[18] As collectivism has replaced laissez-faire, a large number of questions have become subject to governmental regulation – and to intergovernmental regulation when they transcend national boundaries. Modern technology, communications and trade have made states more interdependent than ever before, and more willing to accept rules on a vast range of problems of common concern – extradition of criminals, safety regulations for ships and aircraft, economic aid, copyright, standardization of road signs, protection of foreign investment, environmental issues and so on. The rules in question are usually laid down in treaties, with the result that international law has expanded beyond all recognition in the last 140 years (although it must be pointed out that most of the rules are too specialized to be dealt with in ordinary textbooks on international law).

Treaties are the major instrument of cooperation in international relations, and cooperation often involves a change in the relative positions of the states involved (for example, rich countries give money to poor countries). Treaties, therefore, are often an instrument of change – a point which is forgotten by those who regard international law as an essentially conservative force. The general trend, particularly after the Second World War, has been to enhance the role of treaties in international law-making, partly in response to increasing interdependence, partly as a solution to the controversies that exist between diverse groups of states as to the content and validity of older customary rules.

To some extent treaties have begun to replace customary law. Where there is agreement about rules of customary law, they are codified by treaty; where there is disagreement or uncertainty, states tend to settle disputes by ad hoc compromises – which also take the form of treaties. For example, capital-exporting countries have concluded some 1000 bilateral treaties promoting and protecting foreign investment to clarify the relevant legal framework.[19]

Law-making treaties and 'contract treaties'

Treaties are the maids-of-all-work in international law. Very often they resemble contracts in national systems of law, but they can also perform functions which in national systems would be carried out by statutes, by conveyances, or by the memorandum of association of a company. In national legal systems, legislative acts of parliament are regarded as sources of law, but contracts are not; contracts are merely legal transactions. (Contracts create rights and duties only for the contracting parties, who are very few in number, and it is generally agreed that a 'source of law' means a source of rules which apply to a very large number of people.) Some writers have tried to argue that treaties should be regarded as sources of international law only if they resemble national statutes in content, that is, if they impose the same obligations on all the parties to the treaty and seek to regulate the parties' behaviour over a long period of time. Such treaties are called 'law-making treaties' (traités-lois) and their purpose is to conclude an agreement on universal substantive legal principles (i.e. human rights treaties, Genocide Convention).[20] According to this theory, 'contract-treaties' (traités-contrat), that is, treaties which resemble contracts (for instance, a treaty whereby one state agrees to lend a certain sum of mo[illegible]ther state) are not sources of law, but merely legal transactions.

18 United Nations Treaties Series (UNTS); for a good reference work see M.J. Bowman/D.J. Harris (eds), Multilateral Treaties: Index and Current Status, 1984 and 10th cumulative supplement, 1993, with regular cumulative supplements. See also L. Wildhaber, Treaties, Multilateral, EPIL 7 (1984), 480–4; C. Parry (ed.), The Consolidated Treaty Series (CTS), 1648–1918 (annotated); Hudson, International Legislation (1931–1950); C. Parry (ed.), Index to British Treaties (1101–1918); United Kingdom Treaties Series (UKTS) (from 1892); League of Nations Treaty Series (LNTS). International Legal Materials (ILM), which regularly publishes not only treaties but also other important documents relating to international law, is also very useful.

19 See Chapter 15 below, 237.

20 See V. de Visscher, Problèmes d'interpretation judicaire en droit international public, 1963, 128 et seq.

However, the analogy between national statutes and law-making treaties is misleading for two reasons. First, in national systems of law anyone who is contractually competent (i.e. anyone who is sane and not a minor) can enter into a contract, but parliamentary legislation is passed by a small group of people. In international law, any state can enter into a treaty, including a law-making treaty. Secondly, in national systems of law contracts create rights and duties only for the contracting parties, who are very few in number, whereas statutes of national law apply to a very large number of people. In international law all treaties, including law-making treaties, apply only to states which agree to them. Normally the parties to a law-making treaty are more numerous than the parties to a 'contract-treaty', but there is no reason why this should always be so.

The only distinction between a 'law-making treaty' and a 'contract-treaty' is one of content. As a result, many treaties constitute borderline cases, which are hard to classify. A single treaty may contain some provisions which are 'contractual', and others which are 'law-making'. The distinction between 'law-making treaties' and 'contract-treaties' is not entirely useless; for instance, a 'contract-treaty' is more likely to be terminated by the outbreak of war between the parties than a law-making treaty.[21] But it is too vague and imprecise to justify regarding law-making treaties as the only treaties which are a source of international law. The better view is to regard all treaties as a source of law. At any rate, the law of treaties applies to both types of treaties.

Parties to international treaties and 'internationalized contracts'

Only the subjects of international law – states, international organizations, and the other traditionally recognized entities[22] – can conclude treaties under international law. An international business contract concluded between a company based in state A and another enterprise located in state B is subject to one or another national legal system, but it is not a treaty under international law. Similarly, private law contracts between states, i.e. for the sale and purchase of goods, are usually concluded under the national law of one of the parties.

Some interesting problems have arisen in connection with agreements made between states and foreign corporations,[23] especially in the field of oil concessions,[24] permitting a foreign company to explore and exploit oil resources on the territory of the state. Usually, the parties to such agreements consent to a certain national legal system governing the contract. But occasionally, in the case of powerful multinational companies, such contracts have not been, fully or partially, placed under a national law, but under international law, general principles of law or only under the provisions of the contract itself. The reason for concluding such so-called internationalized contracts is to establish a balance between the parties and prevent the state party from evading its obligations under the contract by changing its own internal law. This is mostly secured by an arbitration clause referring disputes under the agreement to an international body.[25] There have been various attempts to find a proper legal classification of 21 See Chapter 9 below, 145–6. Another aspect where the distinction may be relevant is in the interpretation and application of the particular treaty, see Bernhardt (1984), op. cit., 461. See also E. Raftopoulos, The Inadequacy of the Contractual Analogy in the Law of Treaties, 1990.

22 See Chapters 5, 75–90 and 6, 91–108 below.

23 R. Jennings, State Contracts in International Law, BYIL 32 (1961), 156 et seq.; K.-H. Böckstiegel, Der Staat als Vertragspartner ausländischer Privatunternehmen, 1971; D.W. Bowett, State Contracts with Aliens: Contemporary Developments on Compensation for Termination or Breach, BYIL 59 (1988), 49 et seq.; E. Paasivirta, Internationalization and Stabilization of Contracts versus State Sovereignty, BYIL 60 (1989), 315 et seq.; M. Sornarajah, International Commercial Arbitration: The Protection of State Contracts, 1990; G.v. Hecke, Contracts Between States and Foreign Private Law Persons, EPIL I (1992), 814–19; see also v. Hecke, Contracts Between International Organizations and Private Law Persons, ibid., 812–14; A.F.M. Maniruzzaman, State Contracts with Aliens. The Question of Unilateral Change by the State in Contemporary International Law, JIArb. 9 (1992), 141–71; G.R. Delaume, Transnational Contracts – Applicable Law and Settlement of Disputes, 1992.

24 P. Fisher, Concessions, EPIL I (1992), 715–21; A.Z.E. Chiali, Protection of Investment in the Context of Petroleum Agreements, RdC 204 (1987-IV), 13–169.

25 The most important arbitration cases since 1929 are listed in v. Hecke, op. cit.

these internationalized contracts, but the practical relevance of the issue has declined in recent years, as parties now mostly declare a certain national law to be applicable.

The law of treaties is dealt with in Chapter 9 below.[26]

Custom

The second source of international law listed in the Statute of the International Court of Justice is 'international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law'.[27] As confirmed by the ICJ in the Nicaragua case,[28] custom is constituted by two elements, the objective one of 'a general practice', and the subjective one 'accepted as law', the so-called opinio iuris. In the Continental Shelf (Libya v. Malta) case, the Court stated that the substance of customary international law must be 'looked for primarily in the actual practice and opinio juris of States'.[29] The definition has given rise to some vexed theoretical questions, such as: How is it possible to make law by practice? And how can something be accepted as law before it has actually developed into law?[30] But it is nevertheless the established doctrine, accepted by states, international tribunals and most writers alike.

Where to look for evidence of customary law

The main evidence of customary law is to be found in the actual practice of states, and a rough idea of a state's practice can be gathered from published material – from newspaper reports of actions taken by states, and from statements made by government spokesmen to Parliament, to the press, at international conferences and at meetings of international organizations; and also from a state's laws and judicial decisions, because the legislature and the judiciary form part of a state just as much as the executive does. At times the Foreign Ministry of a state may publish extracts from its archives; for instance, when a state goes to war or becomes involved in a particular bitter dispute, it may publish documents to justify itself in the eyes of the world. But the vast majority of the material which would tend to throw light on a state's practice concerning questions of international law – correspondence with other states, and the advice which each state receives from its own legal advisers – is normally not published; or, to be more precise, it is only recently that efforts have been made to publish digests of the practice followed by different states.[31] As far as the latter are reliable as evidence of the law,[32] it must also be taken into consideration that such an expensive enterprise is mostly not undertaken in developing countries and that the empirical basis for analytical generalizations, therefore, is in fact rather limited to the practice of certain countries. Valuable evidence can also be found in the documentary sources produced by the United Nations.[33]

Evidence of customary law may sometimes also be found in the writings of international lawyers, and in judgments of national and international tribunals, which are mentioned as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law in Article 38(1)(d) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.[34]

26 See Chapter 9 below.

27 M. Akehurst, Custom as a Source of International Law, BYIL 47 (1974–5), 1 et seq.; G.M. Danilenko, The Theory of International Customary Law, GYIL 31 (1988), 9 et seq; M.H. Mendelson, The Formation of Rules of Customary (General) International Law, ILA Rep. 1988, 935–59; J.A. Barberis, Réflexions sur la coutume internationale, AFDI 36 (1990), 9–46; J. Kirchner, Thoughts about a Methodology of Customary International Law, AJPIL 43 (1992), 215–39; Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 898–905; K. Wolfke, Some Persistent Controversies regarding Customary International Law, NYIL 24 (1993), 1–16; Wolfke, Custom in Present International Law, 2nd edn 1993; O. Elias, The Nature of the Subjective Element in Customary International Law, ICLQ 44 (1995), 501–20; I. M. Lobo de Souza, The Role of State Consent in the Customary Process, ibid., 521–39; Meron, The Continuing Role of Custom in the Formation of International Humanitarian Law, AJIL 90 (1996), 238–49.

28 Nicaragua v. USA (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, 14, at 97. See Chapters 18, 284, 289 and 19, 311, 317, 319–22 and text below, 41.

29 ICJ Rep. 1985, 29. See also Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ILM 35 (1996), 809, at 826, para. 64. On the case see Chapter 20 below, 347–9.

30 See Restatement (Third), Vol. 1, Reporters' Note to para. 102, at 30.

31 For example, C. Parry/G. Fitzmaurice (eds), British Digest of International Law, British and Foreign State Papers (1812–1970). On United States practice see Moore (ed.), Digest of International Law (1906); Hackworth (ed.), Digest of International Law (1940–1944); M.M. Whiteman (ed.), Digest of International Law (1963–1973); State Department (ed.), Annual Digests of United States Practice in International Law (since 1973); M. Nash (Leich) (ed.), Cumulative Digest of United States Practice in International Law 1981–1988, Book II, 1994; Foreign Relations of the United States, Diplomatic Papers, and Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States (since 1861), and the Restatement (Third). On the practice of France see A. Kiss, Répertoire de la pratique française en matière de droit international public (1962–1972). Furthermore, a number of periodicals provide regular repertories of national state practice, for example, AFDI, AJIL, AYIL, AJPIL, ASDI, BYIL, CYIL, IYIL, NYIL, RBDI and ZaöRV.

Similarly, treaties can be evidence of customary law;[35] but great care must be taken when inferring rules of customary law from treaties, especially bilateral ones. For instance, treaties dealing with a particular subject matter may habitually contain a certain provision; thus, extradition treaties almost always provide that political offenders shall not be extradited.[36] It has sometimes been argued that a standard provision of this type has become so habitual that it should be regarded as a rule of customary law, to be inferred even when a treaty is silent on that particular point. On the other hand, why would states bother to insert such standard provisions in their treaties, if the rule existed already as a rule of customary law? The problem is a difficult one, and one needs to know more about the intentions of the parties to the treaties in question before one is safe in invoking a standard treaty provision as evidence of customary law. Even so, the mere existence of identical bilateral treaties does not generally support a corresponding norm of customary law. At least the network of bilateral treaties must be widespread before it can amount to state practice resulting in customary law.[37]

The case of multilateral treaties is different and may definitely constitute evidence of customary law. If the treaty claims to be declaratory of customary law, or is intended to codify customary law, it can be quoted as evidence of customary law even against a state which is not a party to the treaty. This is so even if the treaty has not received enough ratifications to come into force.[38] It may be asked why states should be unwilling to ratify a treaty if it merely restates customary law. Explanations include inertia and lack of parliamentary time (if ratification requires the participation of the legislature, as it does in many countries). Moreover, only part of the treaty may codify customary law, and a state may refuse to ratify because it objects to other parts thereof.

Good examples are many (but not all) provisions of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[39] Such a state is not bound by the treaty, but by customary law; therefore, if it can produce other evidence to show that the treaty misrepresents customary law it can disregard the rule stated in the treaty. This possibility is not open to states which are parties to the treaty, since they are bound by the treaty in their relations with other parties to the treaty, regardless of whether the treaty accurately codifies customary law or not. But treaty law and customary law can exist side by side. In the Nicaragua case, the International Court of Justice held that its jurisdiction was excluded with regard to the relevant treaty law (in that case the UN Charter), but nevertheless proceeded to reach a decision on the basis of customary international law, the content of which it considered to be the same as that laid down in the Charter (concerning the prohibition of the use of force).[40]

Moreover, there is the possibility that customary law may change so as to conform with an earlier treaty.[41] For instance, the Declaration of Maritime Law issued by the signatory states to the Treaty of Paris 1856[42] altered certain rules about the conduct of war at sea. It prohibited privateering, the capture of enemy goods except contraband on neutral ships, and of neutral goods except contraband on enemy ships. It also required blockades to be effective and supported by a force sufficient to actually prevent 32 See H. Mosler, Repetorien der nationalen Praxis in Völkerrechtsfragen – Eine Quelle zur Erschließung des allgemeinen Völkerrechts?, Receuil d'études de droit international en hommage à P. Guggenheim, 1968, 460–89.

33 For example, UN Juridical Yearbook; UN Legislative Series; List of Treaty Collections; Cumulative Index of the Treaty Series; Repertoire of the Practice of the Security Council (1946–1951, with supplements until 1971); Repertory of Practice of United Nations Organs; Report of International Arbitral Awards (RIAA).

34 See text below, 51–2 and cf. also The Paquete Habana (1900), 175 US 677, 700–1.

35 M.E. Villiger, Customary International Law and Treaties, 1985.

36 See Chapter 7 below, 117.

37 Restatement (Third), Vol. 1, para. 102, 27; B. Kishoiyian, The Utility of Bilateral Investment Treaties in the Formulation of Customary International Law, NJILB 14 (1994), 327–75.

38 On ratification and entry into force of treaties generally, see Chapter 9 below, 131–6.

39 Text in Brownlie BDIL, 388. See Chapter 9 below, 130–46.

40 See Chapters 18, 284 and 19, 311, 317, 319–22 below.

41 For the opposite case see D.W. Bowett, Treaty Revision in the Light of the Evolution of Customary International Law, AJICL 5 (1993), 84–96 and text below, 56–7.

42 See Chapter 2 above, 21–2.

access to the coast of the enemy.[43] As a treaty, it applied only between the parties to it: Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, Turkey and the United Kingdom. Subsequently, however, the rules contained in the Declaration were accepted by a large number of other states as rules of customary law.

Similar problems arise with resolutions passed at meetings of international organizations, particularly resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly which will be discussed separately below.[44]

Finally, it must be noted that the debate on what constitutes proper evidence of customary law needs to be separated from procedural questions, such as the burden of proof or general rules on evidence before international courts and tribunals.[45] It is true that a state seeking to rely on a particular rule of customary law normally has the burden of proving the fact that the relevant state practice exists.[46] But an international judge or arbitrator will not rely on rules of procedure to decide whether a norm exists or not, but will rather make a value judgment.

The problem of repetition

It has sometimes been suggested that a single precedent is not enough to establish a customary rule, and that there must be a degree of repetition over a period of time; thus, in the Asylum case the International Court of Justice suggested that a customary rule must be based on 'a constant and uniform usage'.[47] However, this statement must be seen in the light of the facts of the Asylum case, where the Court said: 'The facts . . . disclose so much uncertainty and contradiction, so much fluctuation and discrepancy in the exercise of diplomatic asylum and in the official views expressed on various occasions . . . that it is not possible to discern . . . any constant and uniform usage, accepted as law.'[48] (In this case, Victor Raúl Haya de la Torre, the leader of an unsuccessful rebellion in Peru in 1948, obtained asylum in the Colombian Embassy in Lima. Peru and Colombia referred to the ICJ the question of whether Colombia had the right to grant asylum and whether he should be handed over to the Peruvian authorities or be granted safe-conduct out of the country.) In other words, what prevented the formation of a customary rule in the Asylum case was not the absence of repetition, but the presence of major inconsistencies in the practice.

In the Nicaragua case, the ICJ held:

> It is not to be expected that in the practice of States the application of the rules in question should have been perfect, in the sense that States should have refrained, with complete consistency, from the use of force or from intervention in each other's internal affairs. The Court does not consider that, for a rule to be established as customary, the corresponding practice must be in absolutely rigorous conformity with the rule. In order to deduce the existence of customary rules, the Court deems it sufficient that the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with such rules, and that instances of State conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule, not as indications of the recognition of a new rule.[49]

In sum, major inconsistencies in the practice (that is, a large amount of 43 Nussbaum, A Concise History of the Law of Nations, 1962, 192. See also Chapter 20 below, 350–1.

44 See text below, 52–4.

45 See M. Kazazi, Burden of Proof and Related Issues. A Study on Evidence Before International Tribunals, Studies and Materials on the Settlement of International Disputes (P. Malanczuk ed.), Vol. 1, 1996.

46 See Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 900–1.

47 Asylum Case, ICJ Rep. 1950, 266–389, at 277. The case gave rise to three decisions by the ICJ, but these decisions are not viewed as giving a precise picture of the nature of diplomatic asylum, see J.A. Barberis, Asylum, Diplomatic, EPIL I (1995), 281–3, at 282; A. Grahl-Madsen, Asylum, Territorial, ibid., 283–7; K. Hailbronner, Haya de la Torres Cases, ibid., 683–5

48 Ibid.

49 Nicaragua v. US (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1986, at 98, para. 186. See H.C.M. Charlesworth, Customary International Law and the Nicaragua Case, AYIL 11 (1984/7), 1–31; H.G. Anthony, Appraisals of the ICJ's Decision: Nicaragua v. United States (Merits), AJIL 81 (1987), 77–183; A. D'Amato, Trashing Customary International Law, ibid., 101–5; F.L. Kirgis, Jr., Custom on A Sliding Scale, ibid., 146–51; J.I. Charney, Customary International Law in the Nicaragua Case. Judgment on the Merits, Hague YIL 1 (1988), 16–29; W. Czaplinski, Sources of International Law in the Nicaragua Case, ICLQ 38 (1989), 151–66; P.P. Rijpkem, Customary International Law in the Nicaragua Case, NYIL 20 (1989), 91–116; J. Crawford, Military Activities Against Nicaragua Case (Nicaragua v. United States), EPIL III (forthcoming). On the relevance of the case for the use of force see Chapter 19 below, 311, 317, 319–22, and on the problem of the jurisdiction of the Court see Chapter 18 below, 284.

6390

practice which goes against the 'rule' in question) prevent the creation of a customary rule. As noted by the ICJ in the Fisheries case, minor inconsistencies (that is, a small amount of practice which goes against the rule in question) do not prevent the creation of a customary rule,[50] although in such cases the rule in question probably needs to be supported by a large amount of practice, in order to outweigh the conflicting practice in question.[51] (The Fisheries case concerned British claims against Norway for introducing national legislation on exclusive fishing rights in the waters surrounding Norway's entire coastline north of the Arctic Circle. The Court upheld the Norwegian method of delimitation of the territorial sea and its fixing of actual baselines.) On the other hand, where there is no practice which goes against an alleged rule of customary law, it seems that a small amount of practice is sufficient to create a customary rule, even though the practice involves only a small number of states and has lasted for only a short time.

There remains the question of what constitutes 'general' practice. This much depends on the circumstances of the case and on the rule at issue. 'General' practice is a relative concept and cannot be determined in the abstract. It should include the conduct of all states, which can participate in the formulation of the rule or the interests of which are specially affected. 'A practice can be general even if it is not universally accepted; there is no precise formula to indicate how widespread a practice must be, but it should reflect wide acceptance among the states particularly involved in the relevant activity.'[52] Therefore, in the law of the sea,[53] the practice of sea powers and maritime nations will have greater significance than the practice of land-locked states, while in the law governing outer space activities,[54] the practice of the United States and Russia will exert a more dominant influence than that of Burundi or Chile. This can also be seen from the Advisory Opinion of the ICJ in the Legality of Nuclear Weapons case in which the Court in discussing whether there is a customary rule prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons, inter alia, found that it could not ignore the 'practice referred to as 'policy of deterrence', to which an appreciable section of the international community has adhered for many years'.[55] Obviously, this refers to the practice of certain nuclear weapons states and not to the practice of the international community at large.[56] However, as observed by Judge Schwebel in his Dissenting Opinion:

> This nuclear practice is not a practice of a lone and secondary persistent objector. This is not a practice of a pariah Government crying out in the wilderness of otherwise international opinion. This is the practice of five of the world's major Powers, of the permanent Members of the Security Council, significantly supported for almost 50 years by their allies and other States sheltering under their nuclear umbrellas. That is to say, it is the practice of States – and a practice supported by a large and weighty number of other States – that together represent the bulk of the world's population. This practice has been recognized, accommodated and in some measure accepted by the international community. That measure of acceptance is ambiguous but not meaningless.[57]

What is certain is that general practice does not require the unanimous

50 UK v. Norway, ICJ Rep. 1951, 116, at 138; see L. Gündling, Fisheries Case (U.K. v. Norway), EPIL II (1995), 381–3 and Chapter 12 below, 181.
51 See Akehurst (1974–5), Custom, op. cit., 12–21.
52 The Restatement (Third), Vol. 1, para. 102, 25.
53 See Chapter 12 below, 173–97.
54 See Chapter 13 below, 201–8.
55 ILM 35 (1996), 830, para. 96. On the case see Chapter 20 below, 347–9.
56 For a criticism see the Declaration attached to the Opinion by Judge Shi Jiuyong, ibid., 832. But see also the Separate Opinion of Judge Fleischhauer, ibid., 834, at 835–6.
57 Dissenting Opinion of Vice-President Schwebel, ibid., 836–7.

practice of all states or other international subjects. This means that a state can be bound by the general practice of other states even against its wishes if it does not protest against the emergence of the rule and continues persistently to do so (persistent objector).[58] Such instances are not frequent and the rule also requires that states are sufficiently aware of the emergence of the new practice and law. Thus, for example, the contention can hardly be sustained that the practice of space powers to launch their space objects into outer space after 1957 by crossing the air space under the sovereignty of other countries developed into custom by the acquiescence of those states.[59] The countries affected simply often lacked the technological capacities to find out.

What states say and what states do

It is sometimes suggested that state practice consists only of what states do, not of what they say. For instance, in his dissenting opinion in the Fisheries case, Judge Read argued that claims made to areas of the sea by a state could not create a customary rule unless such claims were enforced against foreign ships.[60] But in the later Fisheries Jurisdiction cases ten of the fourteen judges inferred the existence of customary rules from such claims, without considering whether they had been enforced.[61] (These two parallel cases dealt with the validity of the establishment by Iceland of a fifty-mile exclusive fishery zone and its effect on the fishing rights of the United Kingdom and Germany which these two states had traditionally enjoyed within this zone.) Similarly, the Nuremberg Tribunal cited resolutions passed by the League of Nations Assembly and a Pan-American Conference as authority for its finding that aggressive war was criminal according to the 'customs and practices of states'.[62] The better view therefore appears to be that state practice consists not only of what states do, but also of what they say.

This becomes even clearer if one takes the fact into account that in the modern world states have found new means of communication. As noted in a recent empirical study on state practice, Zemanek arrives at the following conclusion:

> The beloved 'real' acts become less frequent because international law, and the Charter of the UN in particular, place more and more restraints on States in this respect. And what formerly was confined to diplomatic notes is now often transmitted via new forms of communication, mainly for reasons of domestic or international policy. The present information society forces governments which seek the widest possible support for their stance to resort to publicity.[63]

Finally, state practice also includes omissions; many rules of international law forbid states to do certain acts, and, when proving such a rule, it is necessary to look not only at what states do, but also at what they do not do.[64] Even silence on the part of states is relevant because passiveness and inaction with respect to claims of other states can produce a binding effect creating legal obligations for the silent state under the doctrine of acquiescence.[65]

58 See text below, 46–8.
59 See Chapter 13 below, 206. On the doctrines of acquiescence and estoppel, see Chapter 10 below, 154–5.
60 ICJ Rep. 1951, 116, 191; Gündling, op. cit.
61 UK v. Iceland (Merits), ICJ Rep. 1974, 3, at 47, 56–8, 81–8, 119–20, 135, 161. The remaining four judges did not deal with this issue. See G. Jaenicke, Fisheries Jurisdiction Cases (U.K. v. Iceland; Federal Republic of Germany v. Iceland), EPIL II (1995), 386–9. See Chapter 12 below, 183.
62 AJIL 41 (1947), 172, 219–20. See Chapter 20 below, 354–5 and Nicaragua v. USA, op. cit., 99–104, 106–8.
63 K. Zemanek, What is 'State Practice' and Who Makes It?, in FS Bernhardt, 289–306, at 306.
64 Similarly, the Draft Articles on State Responsibility for Internationally Wrongful Acts adopted by the ILC in its first reading in 1980 (text in Brownlie BDIL, 426), in defining an 'internationally wrongful act', inter alia, refer to 'conduct consisting of an action or omission' that is attributable to the state under international law, draft Article 3(a). See Chapter 17 below, 257–60.
65 See Müller/Cottier, op. cit.

6392

The psychological element in the formation of customary law (op

When inferring rules of customary law from the conduct of states, it is necessary to examine not only what states do, but also why they do it. In other words, there is a psychological element in the formation of customary law. State practice alone does not suffice; it must be shown that it is accompanied by the conviction that it reflects a legal obligation. For instance, there are many international acts performed habitually, such as flag salutes greeting a foreign ship on the high seas, or in the field of ceremony and protocol, which are motivated solely by courtesy or tradition, 'but not by any sense of legal duty'.[66] Such behaviour is based merely on what is called 'comity' or 'courtoisie' in the relations between states.[67]

The technical name given to this psychological element is opinio iuris sive necessitatis (opinio iuris for short).[68] It is usually defined as a conviction felt by states that a certain form of conduct is required by international law. This definition presupposes that all rules of international law are framed in terms of duties. But that is not so; in addition to rules laying down duties, there are also permissive rules, which permit states to act in a particular way (for example, to prosecute foreigners for crimes committed within the prosecuting state's territory) without making such actions obligatory.[69] In the case of a rule imposing a duty, the traditional definition of opinio iuris is correct; in the case of a permissive rule, opinio iuris means a conviction felt by states that a certain form of conduct is permitted by international law.

There is clearly something artificial about trying to analyse the psychology of collective entities such as states. Indeed, the modern tendency is not to look for direct evidence of a state's psychological convictions, but to infer opinio iuris indirectly from the actual behaviour of states. Thus, official statements are not required; opinio iuris may be gathered from acts or omissions.[70] For these purposes, it must be remembered that rules of international law govern the behaviour of states in their relations with other states; it is therefore necessary to examine not only what one state does or refrains from doing, but also how other states react. If conduct by some states provokes protests from other states that such conduct is illegal, the protests can deprive such conduct of any value as evidence of customary law.[71]

Permissive rules can be proved by showing that some states have acted in a particular way (or have claimed that they are entitled to act in that way) and that other states, whose interests were affected by such acts (or claims), have not protested that such acts (or claims) are illegal.

In the case of rules imposing duties, it is not enough to show that states have acted in the manner required by the alleged rule, and that other states have not protested that such acts are illegal. It also needs to be proved that states regard the action as obligatory. Recognition of the obligatory character of particular conduct can be proved by pointing to an express acknowledgment of the obligation by the states concerned, or by showing that failure to act in the manner required by the alleged rule has been condemned as illegal by other states whose interests were affected.

The difference between permissive rules and rules imposing duties can be clearly seen in the Lotus case.[72] The facts of the case were as follows: a 66 North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Rep. 1969, 3, at 44; G. Jaenicke, North Sea Continental Shelf Cases, EPIL 2 (1981), 205–8. See also Chapter 12, 184–91 and text below, 46.

67 See L.D. Paul, Comity in International Law, Harvard ILJ 32 (1991), 1–79; P. Macalister-Smith, Comity, EPIL I (1992), 671–4. See also Chapter 4 below, 73.

68 J.L. Slama, Opinio juris in Customary International Law, Okla. CULR 15 (1990), 603–56; Elias (1995), op. cit.

69 See Chapter 7 below, 110–15.

70 See Restatement (Third), Vol. 1, para. 101, 25.

71 See W. Karl, Protest, EPIL 9 (1986), 320–2.

72 Lotus Case, PCIJ, series A, no. 10, 28 et seq. See K. Herndl, Lotus, The, EPIL 2 (1981), 173–7. See also Chapter 12 below, 190–1.

French merchant ship collided with a Turkish merchant ship on the high seas, and as a result (allegedly) of negligence on the part of Lieutenant Demons, an officer on the French ship, several people on the Turkish ship lost their lives. France had jurisdiction to try Lieutenant Demons for manslaughter, but the question was whether Turkey also had jurisdiction to try him. Turkey argued that there was a permissive rule empowering it to try him; France argued the exact opposite, namely, that there was a rule imposing a duty on Turkey not to try him. The Permanent Court of International Justice accepted the Turkish argument and rejected the French argument because, first, although there were only a few cases in which states in Turkey's position had instituted prosecutions, the other states concerned in those cases had not protested against the prosecutions; and secondly, although most states in Turkey's position had refrained from instituting prosecutions, there was no evidence that they had done so out of a sense of legal obligation.

Moreover, if states are clearly divided on whether a certain conduct (such as non-recourse to nuclear weapons over the past fifty years) constitutes the expression of an opinio iuris (in this case that the use of nuclear weapons is illegal), it is impossible to find that there is such opinio iuris.[73]

Opinio iuris is sometimes interpreted to mean that states must believe that something is already law before it can become law. However, that is probably not true; what matters is not what states believe, but what they say. If some states claim that something is law and other states do not challenge that claim, a new rule will come into being, even though all the states concerned may realize that it is a departure from pre-existing rules.

Customary law has a built-in mechanism of change. If states are agreed that a rule should be changed, a new rule of customary international law based on the new practice of states can emerge very quickly; thus the law on outer space developed very quickly after the first artificial satellite was launched.[74] If the number of states supporting a change, or the number of states resisting a change, is small, they will probably soon fall into line with the practice of the majority. The real difficulty comes when the states supporting the change and the states resisting the change are fairly evenly balanced. In this case change is difficult and slow, and disagreement and uncertainty about the law may persist for a long time until a new consensus emerges, as, for example, in the dispute about the width of the territorial sea.[75] Another example is the case of the Legality of Nuclear Weapons in which the ICJ found:

> The emergence, as lex lata, of a customary rule specifically prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons as such is hampered by the continuing tensions between the nascent opinio juris on the one hand, and the still strong adherence to the practice of deterrence on the other.[76]

'Instant' customary law

A special problem is the existence or non-existence of the category of 'diritto spontaneo' or 'instant customary international law' which has been brought to the forefront by some authors, such as Roberto Ago[77] and Bin

73 See Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, op. cit., 826, para. 67. On this case see Chapter 20 below, 347–9.
74 See Chapter 13 below, 201–7.
75 See Chapter 12 below, 176–82.
76 Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, op. cit., 827, para. 73. However, the Court also noted in this case: 'In the long run, international law, and with it the stability of the international order which it is intended to govern, are bound to suffer from the continuing difference of views with regard to the legal status of weapons as deadly as nuclear weapons. It is consequently important to put an end to this state of affairs; the long-promised complete nuclear disarmament appears to be the most appropriate means of achieving that result.' Ibid., 830, para. 98.
77 R. Ago, Science juridique et droit international, RdC (1956-II), 849–955, at 932 et seq.

Cheng.[78] The result is to deny the significance of state practice and the relevance of the time factor in the formation of customary international law and to rely solely on opinio iuris, as expressed in non-binding resolutions and declarations, as the constitutive element of custom.

It is true that the International Court of Justice has clarified in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases that customary law may emerge even within a relatively short passage of time.[79] It may also be noted that changes in the international law-making process have modified the concept of modern customary law in several respects, including the tendency that it is made with relative speed, written in textual form, and is more elaborate than traditional custom.[80] The possibility of 'instant' customary international law, or 'droit spontane',[81] based upon opinio iuris only and without the requirement of any practice, however, has remained a matter of dispute.[82] In view of the nature of the decentralized international legal system and the elementary role of state practice as the objective element in the formation of customary law, enabling one to distinguish it from non-binding commitments, opinio iuris on its own, even if clearly established for some states as the subjective element, does not suffice to establish general custom in controversial areas. In addition, the very notion of 'custom' implies some time element and 'instant custom' is a contradiction in terms, although it appears that this is more a matter of appropriate terminology than of substance.

This view is confirmed by the jurisprudence of the ICJ. In the North Sea Continental Shelf cases the Court insisted that 'an indispensable requirement would be that within the period in question, short though it might be, State practice, including that of States whose interests are specially affected, should have been both extensive and uniform'.[83] In other words, the reduction of the time-element requirement is carefully balanced with a stronger emphasis on the scope and nature of state practice. An even clearer implicit rejection of the doctrine of 'instant custom' can be found in the following words of the Court in the Nicaragua case:

> The mere fact that States declare their recognition of certain rules is not sufficient for the Court to consider these as being part of customary international law . . . Bound as it is by Article 38 of its Statute . . . the Court must satisfy itself that the existence of the rule in the opinio iuris of States is confirmed by practice.[84]

Bernhardt also denies that under the traditional concepts of international law 'instant' custom is possible, but he can imagine 'exceptional cases and situations in which such instant law is useful or even necessary: If, for instance, the community of States unequivocally and without any dissent considers certain acts, which have not been known before, to be illegal, the opinio juris might suffice even if no practice could evolve.'[85] There may indeed be a need for this, but then it is not custom but some other (new) source of international law.

Universality and the consensual theory of international law

It has already been suggested that the practice followed by a small number of states is sufficient to create a customary rule, if there is no practice 78 B. Cheng, United Nations Resolutions on Outer Space: 'Instant' International Customary Law?, Indian JIL (1965), 23 et seq.

79 ICJ Rep. 1969, at 4.
80 See Jennings (1984), op. cit., 285.
81 For a discussion of the Italian doctrine see F. Münch, A Propos du Droit Spontane, Studi in Onore di Guiseppe Sperduti, 1984, 149–62.
82 See P. Malanczuk, Space Law as a Branch of International Law, NYIL 25 (1994), 143–80, 160–1.
83 ICJ Rep. 1969, 43.
84 ICJ Rep. 1986, 97 et seq.
85 Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 902.

which conflicts with that rule.[86] But what if some states oppose the alleged rule? Can the opposition of a single state prevent the creation of a customary rule? If so, there would be very few rules, because state practice differs from state to state on many topics. On the other hand, to allow the majority to create a rule against the wishes of the minority would lead to insuperable difficulties. How large must the majority be? In counting the majority, must equal weight be given to the practice of Guatemala and that of the United States? If, on the other hand, some states are to be regarded as more important than others, on what criteria is importance to be based? Population? Area? Wealth? Military power? In a different context, the same questions have arisen with regard to the reform of the composition of the UN Security Council currently under discussion.[87]

In the Lotus case, the Permanent Court of International Justice said: 'The rules of law binding upon states . . . emanate from their own free will as expressed in conventions or by usages generally accepted as expressing principles of law.'[88] This consensual theory, as it is called, has been criticized in the West, but it has been accepted with enthusiasm by Soviet lawyers. Soviet doctrine used to teach that international law is the result of an agreement between states, and that the only difference between treaties and custom is one of form, treaties representing an express agreement and custom representing an implied agreement.[89] The merit of this approach is that it explains divergences in state practice; just as different treaties can be in force between different groups of states, so different rules of customary law can apply between different groups of states. The International Court of Justice came some way towards the Soviet approach in the Asylum case, where it recognized the existence of regional customs applying among groups of states in Latin America.[90]

The consensual theory explains divergences in state practice, but it is rather unconvincing when it is applied to new states. The orthodox rule is that new states are automatically bound by generally accepted international law. The problem of the relation of new states to existing international law is primarily a matter belonging to the area of state succession, and will be taken up later.[91] As far as customary law is concerned, the prevailing view is, with different reasoning, that new states cannot in principle escape existing customary obligations. One cannot select rights granted by a legal system 'à la carte' and at the same time reject the duties one dislikes. However, the reservations of the decolonized new states towards the international legal order created by the old colonial powers have had a considerable impact in particular areas, such as international economic law[92] and the law of the sea,[93] which, at a minimum, has led to legal uncertainty. It has become more and more difficult to find the required general practice and opinio iuris for customary international law to retain its universal significance.[94]

The element of consent[95] can also become fictitious when one is dealing with the emergence of new rules of customary law among existing states. The International Court of Justice has emphasized that a claimant state which seeks to rely on a customary rule must prove that the rule has become binding on the defendant state.[96] The obvious way of doing this is 86 See text above, 41–3.

87 See Chapter 21 below, 376–7.
88 PCIJ, series A, no. 10, 18. See text above, 44–5.
89 On Soviet doctrine in general see Chapter 2 above, 23, 33.
90 ICJ Rep. 1950, 266, 277, 293–4, 316. See text above, 41.
91 See Chapter 11 below, 161–72.
92 See Chapter 15 below, 233–40 and Chapter 2 above, 28–30.
93 See Chapter 12 below, 173–97.
94 On regional customary international law see Chapters 1, 2–3 and 2, 30–2 above.
95 B. Simma, Consent: Strains in the Treaty System, in Macdonald/Johnston (eds), op. cit., 485 et seq.; D.W. Greig, Reflections on the Role of Consent, AYIL 12 (1992), 125–76; A. Pellet, The Normative Dilemma: Will and Consent in International Law-Making, ibid., 22–53.
96 Asylum case, op. cit., 276–7; Rights of Nationals of the United States in Morocco case, ICJ Rep. 1952, 176, at 200.

6396

to show that the defendant state has recognized the rule as state practice (although recognition for this purpose may amount to no more than failure to protest when other states have applied the rule in cases affecting the defendant's interests). But it may not be possible to find any evidence of the defendant's attitude towards the rule, and so there is a second – and more frequently used – way of proving that the rule is binding on the defendant: by showing that the rule is accepted by other states. In these circumstances the rule in question is binding on the defendant state, unless the defendant state can show that it has expressly and consistently rejected the rule since the earliest days of the rule's existence; dissent expressed after the rule has become well established is too late to prevent the rule binding the dissenting state. Thus, in the Fisheries case, the International Court of Justice held that a particular rule was not generally recognized, but added: 'In any event, the . . . rule would appear to be inapplicable as against Norway, inasmuch as she has always opposed any attempt to apply it to the Norwegian coast.'[97]

The problem of the 'persistent objector', however, has recently attracted more attention in the literature. Can a disagreeing state ultimately and indefinitely remain outside of new law accepted by the large majority of states? Do emerging rules of ius cogens[98] require criteria different to norms of lesser significance? Such questions are far from settled at this point in time.[99] The view of Charney, who dispenses with the 'persistent objector' altogether, however, is an exceptional one.[100]

General principles of law

The third source of international law listed in the Statute of the International Court of Justice is 'the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations'. (All nations are now considered as 'civilized';[101] the new term is 'peace-loving', as stated in Article 4 of the UN Charter as a requirement for admission to the organization.) This phrase was inserted in the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the forerunner of the International Court of Justice, in order to provide a solution in cases where treaties and custom provided no guidance; otherwise, it was feared, the Court might be unable to decide some cases because of gaps in treaty law and customary law. However, there is little agreement about the meaning of the phrase. Some say it means general principles of international law; others say it means general principles of national law. Actually, there is no reason why it should not mean both; the greater the number of meanings which the phrase possesses, the greater the chance of finding something to fill gaps in treaty law and customary law – which was the reason for listing general principles of law in the Statute of the Court in the first place. Indeed, international tribunals had applied general principles of law in both these senses for many years before the PCIJ was set up in 1920.[102]

According to the first definition (general principles of international law), general principles of law are not so much a source of law as a method of using existing sources – extending existing rules by analogy, inferring the existence of broad principles from more specific rules by means of 97 Fisheries case, op. cit., at 131.

98 See text below, 57–8.
99 See Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 904; O. Elias, Some Remarks on the Persistent Objector Rule in Customary International Law, Denning LJ (1991), 37–51; C. Tomuschat, Obligations Arising for States Without or Against Their Will, RdC 241 (1993-IV), 195–374.
100 J.I. Charney, Universal International Law, AJIL 87 (1993), 529–51, at 538 et seq.; see also ILA Committee on the Formation of Customary (General) International Law, ILA Rep. 1992, 366 et seq.
101 For the historical background see, Chapter 2 above, 12–14.
102 See B. Cheng, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals, 1987; G. Hanessian, 'General Principles of Law' in the Iran–US Claims Tribunal, Colum. JIL 27 (1989), 309; M.C. Bassiouni, A Functional Approach to 'General Principles of International Law', Mich. JIL 11 (1990), 768–818; J.A. Westberg/B.P. Marchais, General Principles Governing Foreign Investment as Articulated in Recent International Tribunal Awards and Writings of Publicists, ICSID Rev. 7 (1992), 453–96; V.-D. Degan, General Principles of Law (A Source of General International Law), FYIL 3 (1992), 1–102; L. Ferrari-Bravo, Considérations sur la méthode de recherche des principes généraux du droit international de l'environnement, Hague YIL 7 (1994), 3–10; H. Mosler, General Principles of Law, EPIL II (1995), 511–27.

inductive reasoning, and so on. According to the second definition of general principles of law (general principles of national law), gaps in international law may be filled by borrowing principles which are common to all or most national systems of law; specific rules of law usually vary from country to country, but the basic principles are often similar.[103]

In reality, the matter is more complicated. Not all general principles applied in international practice stem from domestic legal systems and have been transplanted to the international level by recognition.[104] Some are based on 'natural justice' common to all legal systems (such as the principles of good faith,[105] estoppel[106] and proportionality[107]), others simply apply logic familiar to lawyers (such as the rules lex specialis derogat legi generali, lex posterior derogat legi priori[108]), and another category is related to 'the specific nature of the international community', as expressed in principles of ius cogens.[109] Therefore, a real transplantation of domestic law principles to the international level is limited to a number of procedural rules, such as the right to a fair hearing, in dubio pro reo, denial of justice,[110] or the exhaustion of local remedies,[111] and some substantive principles, such as prescription[112] and liability for fault.[113] The mechanism by which such transformation takes place in practice goes through the mind of the international judge or arbitrator who has to decide a particular case. This is known as the 'creative role' of the judge, which is not at all peculiar to the international legal system.

On the other hand, the difficulty of proving that a principle is common to most or all legal systems is not as great as might be imagined. Legal systems are grouped in families; the law in most English-speaking countries is very similar, simply because the settlers took with them the law they knew, just as the law in most Latin American countries is very similar. Once one has proved that a principle exists in English law, one is fairly safe in assuming that it also exists in New Zealand and Australia. The problem is, of course, what do we do about the other systems in the world. In fact, what sometimes happens in practice is that an international judge or arbitrator makes use of principles drawn from the legal system in his own country, without examining whether they are also accepted by other countries. The practice is obviously undesirable, but it is too common to be regarded as illegal. In the election of the judges of the International Court of Justice, the electors are required to bear in mind that 'in the body as a whole the representation of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the world should be assured'.[114]

General principles of law have proved most useful in 'new' areas of international law. When the modern system of international law was beginning to develop in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, writers like Grotius drew heavily on Roman law,[115] and a Roman ancestry can still be detected in many of the rules which have now been transformed into customary law (for example, concerning the acquisition of title to territory).[116] In the nineteenth century international arbitration, which had previously been rare, became more common, and the need for rules of judicial procedure was met by borrowing principles from national law (for example, the principle that a tribunal is competent to decide whether or not it has jurisdiction in cases of doubt, and the principle that claims 103 On comparative legal studies see Chapter 1 above, 6. On the relationship between international law and national law see Chapter 4 below, 63–74.

104 See H. Mosler, The International Society as a Legal Community, rev. edn 1980, 136 et seq.

105 A. D'Amato, Good Faith, EPIL II (1995), 599–601; J.F. O'Connor, Good Faith in International Law, 1991. In the Nuclear Tests case (Australia v. France), judgment of 20 December 1974 (ICJ Rep. 1974, 268, para. 46), the Court held: 'one of the basic principles governing the creation and performance of legal obligations, whatever their source, is the principle of good faith. Trust and confidence are inherent in international cooperation, in particular in an age when this cooperation in many fields is becoming increasingly essential.' See also Art. 26 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, discussed in Chapter 9 below, 141.

106 See Chapter 10 below, 154–5.

107 See Chapter 1 above, 4 and Chapters 17, 271–2 and 19, 316–17 below.

108 See text below, 56.

109 K.-J. Partsch, International Law and Municipal Law, EPIL II (1995), 1188. On ius cogens see text below, 57–8.

110 S. Verosta, Denial of Justice, EPIL I (1992), 1007–10.

111 See Chapter 17 below, 267–8.

112 See Chapter 10 below, 150–1.

113 See Chapter 17 below, 258.

114 Art. 9, Statute of the ICJ, text in Brownlie BDIL, 438. See Chapter 18 below, 282.

115 D.J. Ibbetson, The Roman Law Tradition, 1994. On Grotius see Chapter 2 above, 15–16.

116 See Chapter 10 below, 147–58.

6398

brought before a tribunal after an unreasonable delay mu[illegible]sed as inadmissible).[117]

In the present century international law, or something closely resembling international law, has come to regulate certain contracts made by individuals or companies with states or international organizations – for example, contracts of employment in international organizations,[118] and oil concessions.[119] Treaties and customary law contain few rules applicable to such topics, and the gap has been filled by recourse to general principles of commercial and administrative law, borrowed from national legal systems. For instance, international administrative tribunals, which try disputes between international organizations and their staff, have consistently applied the principle, borrowed from national law, that an official must be informed of criticisms made against him and must be given an opportunity to reply to those criticisms before the international organization employing him takes a decision to his detriment on the basis of those criticisms.[120] In the case of 'internationalized contracts' between a state and foreign companies, the purpose of referring to general principles in connection with an arbitration clause is primarily (from the viewpoint of the investing company) to prefer to trust the arbitrator's (s') discretion to discover relevant rules of law creatively, rather than being at the mercy of the contracting state's national legislation.[121]

However, it must be remembered that the environment in which international law operates is very different from the one in which national law operates, and principles of national law can be used to fill gaps in international law only if they are suited to the international environment. As noted by Judge McNair in the South-West Africa case:

> The way in which international law borrows from this source is not by means of importing private law institutions 'lock, stock and barrel', ready-made and fully equipped with a set of rules. It would be difficult to reconcile such a process with the application of 'the general principles of law'.[122]

Finally, it should be pointed out that the issue of whether an international court is obliged to fill in gaps in substantive international law in order to provide for the 'completeness' of the legal system, to render a concrete decision and thus to avoid declaring non liquet ('the matter is unclear'), has remained controversial.[123] It is interesting to note that the ICJ in its rather inconclusive Advisory Opinion in the Legality of Nuclear Weapons case did not make any use of the general principles of law recognized in all legal systems.[124] In fact, what the Court has done in this decision is that it pronounced a non liquet on the central issue on the grounds of uncertainty in the current state of international law, and of the facts.[125] It is submitted that the concept of non liquet is an unhealthy one for the judicial function and courts misunderstand their duties if they plead non liquet in any given case. In international law one does not always discover a > clear and specific rule readily applicable to every international situation, but . . . every international situation is capable of being determined as a matter of law.[126]

117 See Chapters 2 above, 20 and 17, 269 and 18, 293–8 below.
118 See Chapters 6, 103 and 21, 381 below.
119 See text above, 38–9.
120 See Chapter 18 below, 289.
121 v. Hecke, op. cit., 818.
122 ICJ Rep. 1950, 148. See also M. Shahabuddeen, Municipal Law Reasoning in International Law, in Lowe/Fitzmaurice (eds), op. cit., 90–103. On the South-West Africa case see Chapters 18, 284 and 19, 328–9 below.
123 See J. Stone, Non Liquet and the Function of Law in the International Community, BYIL 1959, 145; Fastenrath (1991), op. cit.; and compare the Declaration of Judge Vereshchetin in the ICJ's Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, op. cit., 833 with the Dissenting Opinions of Judge Schwebel, ibid., 836, at 840, Judge Shahabuddeen, ibid., 861, at 866, and Judge Koroma, ibid., 925, at 930.
124 See the Separate Opinion of Judge Fleischhauer, ibid., 835.
125 See Dissenting Opinion of Judge Higgins, ibid., 934.
126 R. Jennings/A. Watts (eds), Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, part 1, 9th edn 1992, 13.

Judicial decisions

Article 38(1)(d) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice directs the Court to apply 'judicial decisions . . . as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law'. This direction is made 'subject to the provisions of Article 59', which state that 'the decision of the Court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case'. In other words, there is no formal stare decisis doctrine, as known in common law systems; in international law international courts are not obliged to follow previous decisions, although they almost always take previous decisions into account.[127]

We have already seen that judicial and arbitral decisions can be evidence of customary law.[128] But it is probably true to say that judges can also create new law. The International Court of Justice is particularly important in this respect. Many of its decisions introduced innovations into international law which have subsequently won general acceptance – for instance, the Reparation for Injuries case,[129] the Genocide case[130] and the Fisheries case.[131] There is a very strong probability that the International Court (and other tribunals) will follow such decisions in later cases, since judicial consistency is the most obvious means of avoiding accusations of bias. Thus, it is generally questionable whether at least decisions of the International Court of Justice can in fact still be regarded as only 'subsidiary' means of determining the law.[132]

One aspect which will require more attention in the future arises from the recent proliferation of international tribunals and courts, such as various regional courts, courts on human rights,[133] international criminal courts[134] and the Tribunal for the Law of the Sea.[135] This proliferation is likely to lead to conflicting decisions on international law and there is no ultimate legal authority in the sense of a supreme court to harmonize such conflicts. The ICJ is not in such a position because it lacks any formal relations with other international courts and tribunals.[136]

Judgments of national courts are also covered by Article 38(1)(d); many of the rules of international law on topics such as diplomatic immunity[137] have been developed by judgments of national courts. But judgments of national courts need to be used with caution; the judges may look as if they are applying international law (and may actually believe that they are doing so), when in fact all that they are applying is some peculiar rule of their own national law.[138]

Learned writers

Article 38(1)(d) also directs the Court to apply 'the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law'. The word 'publicists' means 'learned writers'. Like judicial decisions, learned writings can be evidence of customary law, but they can also play a subsidiary role in developing new rules of law.

In the past, writers like Grotius exercised influence of a sort which no writer could hope to exercise nowadays. But writers have not entirely lost 127 See V. Röben, Le Précédent dans la jurisprudence de la Cour internationale, GYIL 32 (1989), 382–407; M. Shahabuddeen, Precedent in the World Court, 1996.

128 See text above, 39.
129 See Chapter 6 below, 93.
130 See Chapter 9 below, 136.
131 See text above, 42 and Chapter 12 below, 181.
132 See Jennings (1984), op. cit., 287; H. Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court, 1982.
133 See Chapter 14 below, 217–19.
134 See Chapter 20 below, 253–61.
135 See Chapter 18 below, 298–300.
136 See R.Y. Jennings, The International Court of Justice after Fifty Years, AJIL 89 (1995), 493–505, at 504.
137 See Chapter 8 below, 123–9.
138 See further K. Doehring, The Participation of International and National Courts in the Law-Creating Process, SAYIL 17 (1991/2), 1–11; R.Y. Jennings, The Judiciary, International and National, and the Development of International Law, ICLQ 45 (1996), 1–12.

64 00

their influence. They still continue to provide the sor- ...ceptual framework which is necessary for any legal discussion; for instance, states had been claiming limited rights in areas adjacent to their territorial sea long before Gidel started writing about such claims, but it was Gidel who produced the concept of the contiguous zone as a framework for discussing the validity of these claims.[139] Moreover, one finds that states in diplomatic controversies still quote profusely from writers (although the quotations are not always acknowledged), because writers provide a comprehensive, succinct and (with luck) impartial summary of state practice. (A summary which is deliberately made as brief as possible, like the Harvard draft conventions, is particularly useful for purposes of quotation.) In a nutshell, writers quote states and states quote writers, at least when it suits their interests.

Generally speaking, in a multicultural world the problem of identifying those 'teachings' of writers which are the most authoritative is no longer likely to lead to easy universal acceptance of certain propositions. This has become difficult also due to the large quantity of publications that are nowadays produced by writers on international law.[140] While international arbitral tribunals frequently cite textbooks and authors,[141] the International Court of Justice refrains from doing so in its decisions,[142] as distinct from the dissenting or concurring opinions of individual judges.[143]

Other possible sources of international law

Having completed our examination of the list of sources in the Statute of the International Court of Justice, we must now examine whether there are any other sources which have been omitted from that list.

Acts of international organizations

The growth of international organizations since the First World War has been accompanied by suggestions that the acts of international organizations should be recognized as a source of international law.[144] But most of the organs of international organizations are composed of representatives of member states, and very often the acts of such organs are merely the acts of the states represented in those organs. For instance, a resolution of the United Nations General Assembly can be evidence of customary law because it reflects the views of the states voting for it; it would probably have exactly the same value if it had been passed at a conference outside the framework of the United Nations, and, if many states vote against it, its value as evidence of customary law is correspondingly reduced.

However, international organizations usually have at least one organ which is not composed of representatives of member states, and the practice of such organs is capable of constituting a source of law. For instance, the United Nations Secretariat often acts as a depositary of treaties and its practice as depositary has already affected the law of treaties on such topics as reservations.[145]

Sometimes an international organization is authorized to take decisions (often by majority vote) which are binding on member states. Apart from 'internal' questions relating to the budget, the admission and expulsion of

139 See Chapter 12 below, 182–3.
140 A. Oraison, Réflexions sur 'la doctrine des publicistes les plus qualifiés des différentes nations', RBDI 24 (1991), 507–80.
141 See C. Gray/B. Kingsbury, Developments in Dispute Settlement: Inter-State Arbitration Since 1945, BYIL 63 (1992), 97, 129.
142 S. Rosenne, The Law and Practice of the International Court of Justice, 2nd edn 1985, 614–6.
143 See Chapter 18 below, 292, 302.
144 For a discussion see K. Skubiszewski, Resolutions of the U.N. General Assembly and Evidence of Custom, in Études en l'honneur de R. Ago, 1987, Vol. I, 503 et seq; B. Sloan, General Assembly Resolutions Revisited (Forty Years After), BYIL 58 (1987), 39 et seq.; C. Economidès, Les Actes institutionnels internationaux et les sources du droit international, AFDI (1988), 142 et seq.; J.A. Frowein, The Internal and External Effects of Resolutions by International Organizations, ZaöRV 49 (1989), 778–90; B. Sloan, United Nations General Assembly Resolutions in Our Changing World, 1991; J.A. Barberis, Les Résolutions des organisations internationales en tant que source du droit de gens, in FS Bernhardt, 21–39; H.G. Schermers, International Organizations, Resolutions, EPIL II (1995), 1333–36.
145 See Chapter 9 below, 136–7.

members, and so on, the only clear example in the United Nations Charter is in Chapter VII, which empowers the Security Council to give orders to states as part of its action to deal with threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression.[146] In some other organizations powers to take binding decisions can be exercised more frequently; this is particularly true of the European Community.[147] But it is questionable whether such decisions should be treated as a separate source of law, because the power to take such decisions is conferred by the constituent treaty of the organization concerned. The same applies to the power of the International Monetary Fund to take binding decisions on the maintenance or alteration of exchange rates or depreciation of currency,[148] or the authority of the International Civil Aviation Authority to adopt binding standards for navigation or qualifications of flight personnel.[149]

Most resolutions have nothing to do with international law; an obvious example would be a resolution recommending research into the causes of cancer. Even when resolutions do touch upon international law, they may simply be recommending changes, and the text of such a resolution clearly cannot be interpreted as representing the existing law; a resolution declaring that X ought to be the law is obviously not evidence that X is the law. If a resolution declares that X is the law, it can be used as evidence of customary law. But the value of such a resolution varies in proportion to the number of states voting for it; if many states vote against it, its value as evidence of customary law is correspondingly reduced.

It has been said that, in the Nicaragua case,[150] the International Court of Justice extensively referred to resolutions of international organizations as a 'source of law',[151] but under the particular circumstances of the case concerning the issue of the jurisdiction of the Court, it is doubtful whether it used these resolutions as sources in the technical sense. A resolution passed at a meeting of an international organization is never conclusive evidence of customary law. It has to be examined in conjunction with all the other available evidence of customary law, and it may thus be possible to prove that the resolution is not a correct statement of customary law.[152] In the end, if there is no corresponding practice, the mere statement on what the law is supposed to be is not sufficient evidence, but nothing more than an attempt on the part of states to clarify their respective positions.[153]

Nevertheless, as stated by the International Court of Justice in its 1996 Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons with reference to the series of General Assembly resolutions since 1961[154] that affirm the illegality of nuclear weapons:

> General Assembly resolutions, even if they are not binding, may sometimes have normative value. They can, in certain circumstances, provide evidence important for establishing the existence of a rule or the emergence of an opinio juris. To establish whether this is true of a given General Assembly resolution, it is necessary to look at its content and the conditions of its adoption; it is also necessary to see whether an opinio juris exists as to its normative character. Or a series of resolutions may show the gradual evolution of the opinio juris required for the establishment of a new rule.[155]

146 See Chapter 22 below, 387–90.
147 See Chapter 6 below, 95–6.
148 See Chapter 15 below, 225–7.
149 See Chapter 13 below, 200.
150 See text above, 39, 40, 41.
151 Noted by Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 904.
152 For further discussion of resolutions of international organizations as evidence of customary law, see Akehurst (1974–5), Custom, op. cit., 5–7.
153 See T. Schweisfurth, The Influence of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea on International Customary Law, ZaöRV 43 (1983), 566–84, 577.
154 UNGA Res. 1653 (XVI) of 24 November 1961.
155 Legality of Nuclear Weapons Case, op. cit., at 826, para. 70.

6402

However, in view of the substantial numbers of ne[illegible]es and abstentions with which several of the General Assembly resolutions on the illegality of nuclear weapons have been adopted, the Court held that they still fall short of establishing the existence of an opinio juris on the illegality of the use of such weapons.[156]

'Soft' law

The controversy on the status of certain declarations and resolutions of international organizations is connected with the phenomenon of 'soft law'.[157] Without being able to enter into the general discussion here, it may be noted that the term 'soft law', as distinct from 'hard law', is not very helpful from a legal perspective. It is known that 'soft law', in the sense of guidelines of conduct (such as those formulated by the United Nations concerning the operations of transnational companies[158]) which are neither strictly binding norms of law, nor completely irrelevant political maxims, and operate in a grey zone between law and politics, is considered a special characteristic of international economic law and of international environmental law.[159] Such provisions can be found, for example, in treaties not yet in force or in resolutions of international conferences or organizations, which lack legally binding quality.

The emergence of 'soft law' also has to do with the fact that states in agreement frequently do not (yet) wish to bind themselves legally, but nevertheless wish to adopt and test certain rules and principles before they become law. This often facilitates consensus which is more difficult to achieve on 'hard law' instruments. A peculiar example of this practice is the Forest Declaration adopted at the 1992 Rio Conference on Environment and Development, which carries the illuminating title 'A Non-legally binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of all Types of Forests'.[160] States may even decide to create international organizations with their own organs and structures to fulfil international tasks without accepting any legally binding obligations, as was done in the case of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe on the basis of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act.[161]

Such guidelines, although explicitly drafted as non-legal ones, may nevertheless in actual practice acquire considerable strength in structuring international conduct.[162] 'Soft law' may also be relevant from a sociological perspective of international law with regard to the process of the formation of customary law or treaty law and the related issue of 'legitimacy' in the international legal system.[163] But the result of this law-making process at any given moment of legal decision is either binding law or not. In essence, under any meaningful concept of law, it remains essential to maintain the distinction between the law de lege lata and the law de lege ferenda,[164] between the codification of existing law and the progressive development of law, between legal norms and non-legal norms as regards their binding effect, and ultimately between the legal system and the political system. Otherwise, it would become rather difficult to distinguish ideologically or politically motivated claims from the accepted rules and principles of international law. However, certain principles and rules which are 156 Ibid., para. 71. See also the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Schwebel, which is much clearer, ibid., 839.

157 R. Bierzanek, Some Remarks on 'Soft' International Law, PYIL 17 (1988), 21–40; C.M. Chinkin, The Challenge of Soft Law: Development and Change in International Law, ICLQ 38 (1989), 850–66; P.-M. Dupuy, Soft Law and the International Law of the Environment, Mich. ILJ 12 (1991), 420–35; H.E. Chodosh, Neither Treaty Nor Custom: The Emergence of Declarative International Law, Texas ILJ 26 (1991), 87–124; W. Heusel, 'Weiches' Völkerrecht: Eine vergleichende Untersuchung typischer Erscheinungsformen, 1991; F. Francioni, International 'Soft Law': A Contemporary Assessment, in Lowe/Fitzmaurice (eds), op. cit., 167–78.

158 See Chapter 6 below, 102–3.

159 See I. Seidl-Hohenveldern, International Economic 'Soft Law', RdC 163 (1979), 165 et seq.; W.E. Burhenne (ed.), International Environmental Soft Law. Collection of Relevant Instruments, 1993; M.A. Fitzmaurice, International Environmental Law as a Special Field, NYIL 25 (1994), 181–226, at 199–201. See Chapters 15, 222–3 and 16, 241–7 below.

160 For the Rio documents see ILM 31 (1992), 818 et seq. See P. Malanczuk, Sustainable Development: Some Critical Thoughts in the Light of the Rio Conference, in K. Ginther/E. Denters/P.J.I.M.de Waart (eds), Sustainable Development and Good Governance, 1995, 23–52. See also Chapter 16 below, 247–8.

161 See T. Schweisfurth, Zur Frage der Rechtsnatur, Verbindlichkeit und völkerrechtlicher Relevanz der KSZE Schlußakte, ZaöRV 36 (1976), 681 et seq.; For a recent analysis, see I. Seidl-Hohenveldern, Internationale Organisationen aufgrund von soft law, in FS Bernhardt, 229–39; T. Schweisfurth, Die juristische Mutation der KSZE – Eine internationale Organisation in statu nascendi, ibid., 213–28; M. Sapiro, Changing the CSCE into the OSCE: Legal Aspects of a Political Transformation, AJIL 89 (1995), 631–7. See Chapter 6 below, 94.

162 See also M. Bothe, Legal and Non-Legal Norms – A Meaningful Distinction in International Relations?, NYIL 11 (1980), 65–95.

163 See Chapter 2 above, 33.

164 See text above, 35.

emerging as new norms in the process of law-making, without yet having become accepted as legally binding, may nevertheless have limited 'anticipatory' effect in judicial or arbitral decision-making as supporting arguments in interpreting the law as it stands.

Equity

'Equity', in the present context, is used not in the technical sense which the word possesses in Anglo-American legal systems in the distinction between law and equity as separate bodies of law, but as a synonym for 'justice'. Moreover, those who look to equity as a source of international law often appeal to natural law[165] in order to strengthen their arguments and to escape accusations of subjectivism. Thus the three terms – 'equity', 'justice' and 'natural law' – tend to merge into one another.

During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries natural law was a major source of international law. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries arbitrators have often been authorized to apply justice and equity as well as international law (such authorizations were more common before 1920 than they are today); even in the absence of such authorization, judges and arbitrators sometimes invoke equitable considerations.[166]

In the River Meuse case (Netherlands v. Belgium) (1937),[167] for example, the Netherlands claimed that Belgium had violated a treaty by building canals that changed the flow of water in the River Meuse. One of the issues was whether the Netherlands had lost the right to bring the claim because of similar earlier conduct by itself. In this connection the Individual Opinion of Judge Hudson recognized the principle of equity as part of international law. He noticed that there was no express authority in the Statute of the PCIJ to apply equity as distinguished from law. But he pointed to Article 38 of the Statute which allowed the application of general principles and argued that principles of equity are common to all national legal systems.

Thus, a judge or arbitrator can always use equity to interpret or fill gaps in the law, even when he has not been expressly authorized to do so. But he may not give a decision ex aequo et bono (a decision in which equity overrides all other rules) unless he has been expressly authorized to do so. Article 38(2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice provides that the list of sources in Article 38(1) 'shall not prejudice the power of the Court to decide a case ex aequo et bono, if the parties agree thereto'. Article 38(2) has never been applied, but other tribunals have occasionally been authorized to decide ex aequo et bono; for instance, two Latin American boundary disputes were decided in this way by arbitrators in the 1930s.[168]

Whatever the position may have been in the past, it is doubtful whether equity forms a source of international law today. It cannot be assumed that a judge is using equity as a source of law every time he describes a rule as equitable or just. Counsel and judges in national courts frequently appeal to considerations of equity and justice when the authorities are divided on a point of law, but that does not lead to equity being regarded as a source of national law; nor should appeals by international lawyers to considerations of equity be interpreted as meaning that equity is a source of international law.

165 See Chapter 2 above, 15–17, 32.

166 See M. Akehurst, Equity and General Principles of Law, ICLQ 25 (1976), 801 et seq.; V. Lowe, The Role of Equity in International Law, AYIL 12 (1988/9), 125–76; C.M. Fombad, Equity in Current International Practice, REDI 45 (1989), 1–27; C.R. Rossi, Equity as a Source of International Law?: A Legal Realist Approach to the Process of International Decision-Making, 1993; M. Lachs, Equity in Arbitration and in Judicial Settlement of Disputes, LJIL 6 (1993), 323–9; T.M. Franck/D.M. Sughrue, The International Role of Equity-as-Fairness, Geo. LJ 81 (1993), 563–95; P. Weil, L'Équité dans la jurisprudence de la Cour Internationale de Justice, in Lowe/Fitzmaurice (eds), op. cit., 121–44; Equity in International Law, EPIL II (1995), 109–13; T.M. Franck, Fairness in International Law, 1995, Chapter 3: Equity as Fairness, 47 et seq.

167 PCIJ, series A/B, no. 70, 76–7.

168 RIAA II, 1307 and III, 1817.

5404

In recent times the meaning of equity in international law has been discussed in two rather different contexts.[169] The first context is the application of equitable principles by the ICJ in the delimitation of maritime boundaries between states.[170] The other area is the controversial claim of developing countries for a new international economic order which should be based on equitable principles to achieve a fairer distribution of wealth between rich and poor states.[171] One of the problems about equity is that it can often be defined only by reference to a particular ethical system. Consequently, although references to equity are meaningful in a national society which can be presumed to hold common ethical values, the position is entirely different in the international arena, where the most mutually antagonistic philosophies meet in head-on conflict.[172]

The hierarchy of the sources

What happens if a rule derived from one source of international law conflicts with a rule derived from another source?[173] Which prevails over the other? Is there an order of application of the sources listed in Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ? In the drafting history of this provision the proposal was made that the sources listed should be considered by the Court 'in the undermentioned order' (a–d). This proposal was not accepted and the view was expressed that the Court may, for example, draw on general principles before applying conventions and customs.[174]

The relationship between treaties and custom is particularly difficult.[175] Clearly a treaty, when it first comes into force, overrides customary law as between the parties to the treaty; one of the main reasons why states make treaties is because they regard the relevant rules of customary law as inadequate. Thus, two or more states can derogate from customary law by concluding a treaty with different obligations, the only limit to their freedom of law-making being rules of ius cogens, which will be discussed below.[176]

But treaties can come to an end through desuetude – a term used to describe the situation in which the treaty is consistently ignored by one or more parties, with the acquiescence of the other party or parties.[177] Desuetude often takes the form of the emergence of a new rule of customary law, conflicting with the treaty.[178]

Thus, treaties and custom are of equal authority; the later in time prevails. This conforms to the general maxim of lex posterior derogat priori (a later law repeals an earlier law). However, in deciding possible conflicts between treaties and custom, two other principles must be observed, namely lex posterior generalis non derogat priori speciali (a later law, general in nature, does not repeal an earlier law which is more special in nature) and lex specialis derogat legi generali (a special law prevails over a general law).

Since the main function of general principles of law is to fill gaps in treaty law and customary law, it would appear that general principles of law are subordinate to treaties and custom (that is, treaties and custom prevail over general principles of law in the event of conflict).

Judicial decisions and learned writings are described in Article 38(1)(d) as 'subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law', 169 See Janis, op. cit.

170 See L.D.M. Nelson, The Roles of Equity in the Delimitation of Maritime Boundaries, AJIL 84 (1990), 837–58; M. Miyoshi, Considerations of Equity in the Settlement of Territorial Boundary Disputes, 1993; B. Kwiatkowska, Equitable Maritime Boundary Delimitation, in Lowe/Fitzmaurice (eds), op. cit., 264–92. See Chapter 12 below, 135–7.

171 See Chapter 15 below, 233–40.

172 See Akehurst (1976), op. cit., C. Tomuschat, Ethos, Ethics and Morality in International Relations, EPIL II (1995), 120–7.

173 M. Akehurst, The Hierarchy of the Sources of International Law, BYIL 47 (1974–5), 273 et seq.; W. Karl, Treaties, Conflicts between, EPIL 7 (1984), 467–73; W. Czapliński/G. Danilenko, Conflicts of Norms in International Law, NYIL 21 (1990), 3–42.

174 See Harris CMIL, 25.

175 For a good discussion see Schachter, op. cit., 70–6, 335–42; Villiger, op. cit.

176 See text below, 57–8.

177 See Chapter 9 below, 141–2.

178 See N. Kontou, The Termination and Revision of Treaties in the Light of New Customary International Law, 1994.

which suggests that they are subordinate to the other three sources listed: treaties, custom and general principles of law. Judicial decisions usually carry more weight than learned writings, but there is no hard-and-fast rule; much depends on the quality of the reasoning which the judge or writer employs.

It is doubtful whether equity is a source of international law at all; even if it is, the existence of such doubts would appear to indicate that it is, at most, a very low-ranking source. (However, when a tribunal is authorized to decide ex aequo et bono, the tribunal is allowed to substitute its own ideas of equity for any and every rule of international law.)

In sum, the different sources of international law are not arranged in a strict hierarchical order. Supplementing each other, in practice they are often applied side by side. However, if there is a clear conflict, treaties prevail over custom and custom prevails over general principles and the subsidiary sources.[179]

Ius cogens

Some of the early writers on international law said that a treaty would be void if it was contrary to morality or to certain (unspecified) basic principles of international law. The logical basis for this rule was that a treaty could not override natural law. With the decline of the theory of natural law,[180] the rule was largely forgotten, although some writers continued to pay lip-service to it.

Recently there has been a tendency to revive the rule, although it is no longer based on natural law; the state most in favour of the rule was the Soviet Union (which would never have supported the semi-religious theory of natural law). Moreover, the rule is now said to limit the liberty of states to create local custom, as well as their liberty to make treaties; the rule thus acts as a check on the tendency of international law to disintegrate into different regional systems.[181] The technical name now given to the basic principles of international law, which states are not allowed to contract out of, is 'peremptory norms of general international law', otherwise known as ius cogens.[182]

Article 53 of the Convention on the Law of Treaties, signed at Vienna in 1969,[183] provides as follows:

> A treaty is void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law. For the purposes of the present Convention, a peremptory norm of general international law is a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.

What is said about treaties being void would also probably apply equally to local custom. The reason why local custom is not mentioned is because the purpose of the Convention was to codify the law of treaties only.

Although cautiously expressed to apply only 'for the purposes of the present Convention', the definition of a 'peremptory norm' is probably valid for all purposes. The definition is more skilful than appears at first sight. A rule cannot become a peremptory norm unless it is 'accepted and 179 Bernhardt (1992), op. cit., 899.

180 See Chapter 2 above, 15–17, 32.
181 See Chapter 2 above, 30–2.
182 P. Weil, Towards Relative Normativity in International Law?, AJIL 77 (1983), 413–42, is critical of the concept of 'ius cogens'. See further J.A. Frowein, Jus Cogens, EPIL 7 (1984), 327, at 328–9; L. Hannikainen, Peremptory Norms (jus cogens) in International Law: Historical Development, Criteria, Present Status, 1988; H.A. Strydom, Ius Cogens: Peremptory Norm or Totalitarian Instrument?, SAYIL 14 (1988/9), 42–58; A. D'Amato, It's a Bird, It's a Plane, It's jus cogens!, Conn. JIL 6 (1990), 1–6; G.M. Danilenko, International jus cogens: Issues of Law-Making, EJIL 2 (1991), 42–65; J. Paust, The Reality of jus cogens, Conn. JIL 7 (1991), 81–5; S. Kadelbach, Zwingendes Völkerrecht, 1992; J. Kasto, Jus Cogens and Humanitarian Law, 1994.
183 Text in ILM 8 (1969), 679; AJIL 63 (1969), 875; Brownlie BDIL, 388. See Chapter 9 below, 140–1, 145.

recognized [as such] by the international community of sta[illegible]ie' – a requirement which is too logical and reasonable to be challenged, but which is well worth stating expressly, because there have already been cases of states trying to evade rules of international law which they found to be inconvenient by arguing that those rules were contrary to some exotic examples of ius cogens; this danger should, with luck, be averted by requiring such states to prove that the alleged rule of ius cogens has been 'accepted and recognized [as such] by the international community of states as a whole'. It must find acceptance and recognition by the international community at large and cannot be imposed upon a significant minority of states. Thus, an overwhelming majority of states is required, cutting across cultural and ideological differences.

At present very few rules pass this test. Many rules have been suggested as candidates. Some writers suggest that there is considerable agreement on the prohibition of the use of force, of genocide, slavery, of gross violations of the right of people to self-determination, and of racial discrimination.[184] Others would include the prohibition on torture.[185] In an obscure obiter dictum in the Barcelona Traction case in 1970, the ICJ referred to 'basic rights of the human person', including the prohibition of slavery and racial discrimination and the prohibition of aggression and genocide, which it considered to be 'the concern of all states', without, however, expressly recognizing the concept of ius cogens.[186] But, apart from the 'basic rights of the human person' mentioned in the Barcelona Traction case, the only one which at present receives anything approaching general acceptance is the rule against aggression.[187] In its Advisory Opinion in the Legality of Nuclear Weapons case, the ICJ did not find a need to address the question whether universally recognized principles of international humanitarian law (applicable in time of armed conflict[188]) are part of ius cogens as defined in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention.[189] It should also be noted that in the preparatory work on Article 53 no agreement was possible on which international norms belong to ius cogens. France even refused to accept the Convention because of Article 53. The vagueness of ius cogens induced Western and Latin-American states to insist on the procedural safeguard in Article 66 lit. a of the same Convention, under which disputes on the application of Article 53 are to be settled by the International Court of Justice or an arbitral tribunal. State practice and international decisions have indeed been cautious in accepting the relevance of the concept.

Although the question is controversial, the better view appears to be that a rule of ius cogens can be derived from custom and possibly from treaties, but probably not from other sources.[190]

Obligations erga omnes and 'international crimes'

The problem of ius cogens is connected with the concept of erga omnes obligations and the acceptance of the notion of 'international crimes' by the International Law Commission in its project codifying state responsibility.[191] Under the international law of reprisals,[192] the general rule is that only the directly injured state is entitled to act against the violation of an international obligation by another state. Obligations erga omnes are concerned 184 A. Cassese, International Law in a Divided World, 1986, 179. The recent study by Hannikainen, op. cit., goes even further.

185 See R. Kühner, Torture, EPIL 8 (1985), 510. See Chapter 14 below, 216–17, 220.
186 Barcelona Traction case (Belgium v. Spain), ICJ Rep. 1970, 3, paras. 33 and 34. See Chapter 14 below, 220.
187 See Chapter 19 below, 309–11.
188 See Chapter 20 below, 342–63.
189 ILM 35 (1996), 828, para. 83 stating that '[t]he question whether a norm is part of the jus cogens relates to the legal character of the norm.'
190 Akehurst (1974–5), Hierarchy, op. cit., 281–5.
191 See Chapter 17 below, 254–6.
192 See Chapter 1 above, 4 and Chapter 17 below, 271–2.

with the enforceability of norms of international law, the violation of which is deemed to be an offence not only against the state directly affected by the breach, but also against all members of the international community.[193]

As noted above, the existence of norms which are 'the concern of all states' was recognized by the ICJ in the Barcelona Traction case in 1970. But the decision also contains a remarkable reservation: 'However, on the universal level, the instruments which embody human rights do not confer on States the capacity to protect the victims of infringements of such rights irrespective of their nationality.'[194] Thus it offers little clarity on the issue of possible reactions by third states to the violation of such erga omnes obligations, the enforceability of which all states have a legal interest in. Although the Court was confronted in a number of other cases with erga omnes obligations, it has so far never addressed the legal consequences of the breach of such an obligation. This has been recently noted by Judge Weeramantry in his Dissenting Opinion in the East Timor case, in which for jurisdictional reasons the Court dismissed the claim of Portugal against Australia for concluding an agreement with Indonesia affecting the rights of East Timor, but confirmed that the principle of self-determination was an obligation erga omnes:

> In the Court's view, Portugal's assertion that the right of peoples to self-determination, as it evolved from the Charter and from United Nations practice, has an erga omnes character, is irreproachable. The principle of self-determination of peoples has been recognized by the United Nations Charter and in the jurisprudence of the Court . . . ; it is one of the essential principles of contemporary international law. However, the Court considers that the erga omnes character of a norm and the rule of consent to jurisdiction are two different things. Whatever the nature of the obligations invoked, the Court could not rule on the lawfulness of the conduct of a State when its judgment would imply an evaluation of the lawfulness of the conduct of another State which is not a party to the case. Where this is so, the Court cannot act, even if the right in question is a right erga omnes.[195]

With reference to the Barcelona Traction case, the International Law Commission (ILC) in its draft on state responsibility has come up with a problematic distinction concerning internationally wrongful acts that can be committed by states: 'international delicts' and 'international crimes'.[196] Article 19 of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility[197] stipulates:

1 An act of a State which constitutes a breach of an international obligation is an internationally wrongful act, regardless of the subject matter of the obligation breached.
2 An internationally wrongful act which results from the breach by a State of an international obligation so essential for the protection of fundamental interests of the international community that its breach is recognized as a crime by that community as a whole constitutes an international crime.
3 Subject to paragraph 2, and on the basis of the rules of international law in force, an international crime may result, inter alia, from:

193 See J.A. Frowein, Die Verpflichtungen erga omnes im Völkerrecht und ihre Durchsetzung, in R. Bernhardt et al. (eds), Festschrift für Hermann Mosler, 1983, 241 et seq.; P. Malanczuk, Countermeasures and Self-Defence in the ILC's Draft Articles on State Responsibility, in M. Spinedi/B. Simma (eds), United Nations Codification of State Responsibility, 1987, 231 et seq.; A.J.J. de Hoogh, The Relationship between jus cogens, Obligations erga omnes and International Crimes: Peremptory Norms in Perspective, AJPIL 42 (1991), 183–214; B. Simma, Does the UN Charter Provide an Adequate Legal Basis for Individual or Collective Responses to Violations of Obligations erga omnes?, in J. Delbrück (ed.), The Future of International Law Enforcement: New Scenarios – New Law?, 1993, 125 et seq.; C. Annacker, The Legal Regime of Erga Omnes Obligations in International Law, AJPIL (1994), 131 et seq.; J.A. Frowein, Reactions by Not Directly Affected States to Breaches of Public International Law, RdC 248 (1994-IV), 345–437; C. Annacker, Die Durchsetzung von erga omnes Verpflichtungen vor dem Internationalen Gerichtshof, 1994; A.J.J. de Hoogh, Obligations erga omnes and International Crimes: A Theoretical Inquiry into the Implementation and Enforcement of the International Responsibility of States, 1996.

194 Barcelona Traction case, op. cit., at 47, para. 91.

195 East Timor case (Portugal v. Australia), judgment of 30 June 1995, ICJ Rep. 1995, 90; ILM 34 (1995), 1581–91, para. 29. See Chapters 18, 286–7 and 19, 331–2 below.

196 See M. Spinedi, Les Crimes internationaux de l'Etat dans les travaux de codification de la responsabilité des Etats entrepris par les Nations Unies, 1984; R. Hofmann, Zur Unterscheidung Verbrechen und Delikt im Bereich der Staatenverantwortlichkeit, ZaöRV 45 (1985), 195 et seq.; M. Mohr, The ILC's Distinction Between 'International Crimes' and 'International Delicts' and its Implications, in Spinedi/Simma (eds), 1987, op. cit., 115; Malanczuk (1987), op. cit., at 230 et seq.; J.H.H. Weiler/A. Cassese/M. Spinedi (eds), International Crimes of States. A Critical Analysis of the ILC's Draft Article 19 on State Responsibility, 1989; G. Gilbert, The Criminal Responsibility of States, ICLQ 39 (1990), 345 et seq; de Hoogh, op. cit. On the ILC see text below, 61.

(a) a serious breach of an international obligation of essential importance for the maintenance of international peace and security, such as that prohibiting aggression;

(b) a serious breach of an international obligation of essential importance for safeguarding the right of self-determination of peoples, such as that prohibiting the establishment or maintenance by force of colonial domination;

(c) a serious breach on a widespread scale of an international obligation of essential importance for safeguarding the human being, such as those prohibiting slavery, genocide and apartheid;

(d) a serious breach of an international obligation of essential importance for the safeguarding and preservation of the human environment, such as those prohibiting massive pollution of the atmosphere or of the seas.

4 Any international wrongful act which is not an international crime in accordance with paragraph 2 constitutes an international delict.

According to the ILC, while an international crime always constitutes the violation of an erga omnes obligation, the breach of an erga omnes obligation does not necessarily imply an international crime. The concept of 'international crimes', therefore, is narrower than the notion of ius cogens.[198] The precise implications of Article 19 in terms of legal consequences remain to be seen when the work of the Commission should reach a more definite stage.[199] Only two remarks may be added here. First, the terminology is unfortunate because it tends to confuse the international criminal responsibility of individuals[200] with the criminal responsibility of states, which, as such, does not exist in international law. Second, the prohibition of the massive pollution of the environment has not been accepted by state practice even as a ius cogens norm.

Codification of international law

Since the end of the nineteenth century there have been public and private attempts to codify customary international law in order to clarify the existing rules and to improve them.[201] The Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907 dealt with the laws of war and neutrality,[202] the 1930 Codification Conference in The Hague under the League of Nations addressed the law of nationality,[203] territorial waters,[204] and state responsibility.[205] But it was largely unsuccessful; agreement was possible only on the law of nationality. In recent years there has been a stronger tendency to codify customary law. Four conventions on the law of the sea were signed at Geneva in 1958;[206] a convention on diplomatic relations and immunities[207] was signed at Vienna in 1961; a convention on consular relations and immunities was signed at Vienna in 1963; conventions on the law of treaties were signed at Vienna in 1969 and 1986;[208] and conventions on state succession were signed at Vienna in 1978 and 1983.[209] A major enterprise in multilateral conference diplomacy has been the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention which took ten 197 Text in Brownlie BDIL, 426. See Chapter 17 below, 255–72.

198 See ILCYb 1976, Vol. 2, part 2, 120.
199 See the criticism by B. Simma, Bilateralism and Community Interest in the Law of State Responsibility, in Y. Dinstein/M. Tabory (eds), International Law at a Time of Perplexity, 1989, 821. In the ILC, Art. 19 and its legal consequences have remained up to now highly controversial, see ILC 48th Session, Provisional Summary Record of the 2452nd Meeting, UN Doc. A/CN.4/SR. 2452, 22 July 1996. See Chapter 17 below, 271–2.
200 See Chapter 20 below, 353–63.
201 S. Rosenne, Codification of International Law, EPIL I (1992), 632–40; M. Schröder, Codification and Progressive Development of International Law within the UN, in Wolfrum UNLPP I, 100–9; A. Pellet, La formation du droit international dans le cadre des Nations Unies, EJIL 6 (1995), 401–25; H. Torrone, L'Influence des conventions de codification sur la coutume en droit international public, 1989.
202 See Chapter 2 above, 21–2 and Chapter 20 below, 344.
203 See Chapter 17 below, 263–6.
204 See Chapter 12 below, 173–4, 176–82.
205 See Chapter 17 below, 255–72.
206 See Chapter 12 below, 173.
207 See Chapter 8 below, 123–7.
208 See Chapter 9 below, 130–1.
209 See Chapter 11 below, 161–2.

years of protracted negotiations to adopt and more than another ten years to enter into force.[210]

There are obvious advantages to be gained from codifying customary law in a treaty. The rules become more precise and more accessible; and new states are more willing to accept rules which they themselves have helped to draft. But, in view of the divergences between the practice of different states, codification often means that a compromise is necessary, and there is a limit to the number of compromises that states are willing to accept at any one time. Consequently, codification will succeed only if it proceeds slowly; acceleration produces the risk of failure, as happened at the codification conference organized by the League of Nations in 1930, and the failure of a codification scheme may cast doubt on customary rules which were previously well established. (This is what happened to the three-mile rule concerning the width of the territorial sea after the failure of the 1930 conference.[211])

The preparatory work for the Geneva and Vienna conventions was carried out by the International Law Commission (ILC), established in 1947 by the United Nations.[212] It is a body of thirty-four (originally fifteen) international lawyers elected by the United Nations General Assembly for a five-year term. The members of the ILC, who serve in their individual capacity, are supposed to represent the world's principal legal systems. The ILC is entrusted not only with the codification of international law, but also with its progressive development (that is, the drafting of rules on topics where customary law is non-existent or insufficiently developed); in practice the distinction between codification and progressive development is often blurred. Special rapporteurs are assigned to propose work programmes and draft articles chosen by the Commission itself or referred to it by the General Assembly.

Sometimes the Commission seeks to codify the law, not by preparing a draft convention, which may be later incorporated into a binding multilateral agreement, but simply by summarizing the law in a report to the General Assembly. Such reports are not binding in the same way as treaties, but they do constitute valuable evidence of customary law; the Commission's members base their work on extensive research and on an attempt to ascertain and reconcile the views of the member states of the United Nations (for example, by circulating questionnaires and by inviting states to comment on their draft reports – the same procedure is followed during the preliminary work on draft conventions). The effectiveness of the work of the ILC has more recently been called into question by some of its own distinguished members,[213] and with regard to the new topics under consideration its working methods may require adjustment to meet acceptance of drafts it produces by the majority of states.[214] However, it is notable that the ILC managed to respond to the request of the General Assembly and complete its draft on the Statute for an International Criminal Court within the short period of 1992 to 1994.[215]

Unofficial bodies have also tried their hand at codification. For instance, Harvard Law School has produced a number of draft conventions; these are not intended to be ratified by states, but are simply used as

210 See Chapter 12 below, 173–5.

211 See Chapter 12 below, 178–80.

212 See S. Goswami, Politics in Law Making: A Study of the International Law Commission of the UN, 1986; I. Sinclair, The International Law Commission, 1987; S. Vallat, International Law Commission, EPIL II (1995), 1208–16.

213 See S. Sucharitkul, The Role of the International Law Commission in the Decade of International Law, LJIL 3 (1990), 15–42; B. Graefrath, The International Law Commission Tomorrow: Improving Its Organization and Methods of Work, AJIL 85 (1991), 595–612; R. Ago, Some New Thoughts on the Codification of International Law, in E.G. Bello/B.A. Ajibola (eds), Essays in Honour of Judge Taslim Elias, 1992, 36–61.

214 See M. Brus, Third Party Dispute Settlement in an Interdependent World, 1995, 159–63.

215 See Chapter 20 below, 360–1.

a convenient means of restating the law. They derive their value from the eminence of the professors who have helped to draw them up. Finally, the private organizations of the Institute of International Law and of the International Law Association, both founded in 1873, should be mentioned.[216]

216 See Chapter 2 above, 22.