484. Article 6 (1) declares criminally responsible a person who "(...) or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 (...)". Aiding and abetting, which may appear to be synonymous, are indeed different. Aiding means giving assistance to someone. Abetting, on the other hand, would involve facilitating the commission of an act by being sympathetic thereto. The issue here is to whether the individual criminal responsibility provided for in Article 6(1) is incurred only where there was aiding and abetting at the same time. The Chamber is of the opinion that either aiding or abetting alone is sufficient to render the perpetrator criminally liable. In both instances, it is not necessary for the person aiding or abetting another to commit the offence to be present during the commission of the crime.

485. The Chamber finds that, in many legal systems, aiding and abetting constitute acts of complicity. However, though akin to the constituent elements of complicity, they themselves constitute one of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, particularly, genocide. The Chamber is consequently of the opinion that when dealing with a person Accused of having aided and abetted in the planning, preparation and execution of genocide, it must be proven that such a person did have the specific intent to commit genocide, namely that, he or she acted with the intent to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such; whereas, as stated supra, the same requirement is not needed for complicity in genocide89.

486. Article 6(3) of the Statute deals with the responsibility of the superior, or command responsibility. This principle, which derives from the principle of individual criminal responsibility as applied in the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials, was subsequently codified in Article 86 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 8 June 1977.

487. Article 6 (3) stipulates that:

"The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof".

488. There are varying views regarding the Mens rea required for command responsibility. According to one view it derives from a legal rule of strict liability, that is, the superior is criminally responsible for acts committed by his subordinate, without it being necessary to prove the criminal intent of the superior. Another view holds that negligence which is so serious as to be tantamount to consent or criminal intent, is a lesser requirement. Thus, the "Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949" stated, in reference to Article 86 of the Additional Protocol I, and the mens rea requirement for command responsibility that:

> "[...] the negligence must be so serious that it is tantamount to malicious intent, apart from any link between the conduct in question and the damage that took place. This element in criminal law is far from being clarified, but it is essential, since it is precisely on the question of intent that the system of penal sanctions in the Conventions is based"90.

489. The Chamber holds that it is necessary to recall that criminal intent is the moral element required for any crime and that, where the objective is to ascertain the individual criminal responsibility of a person Accused of crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Chamber, such as genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II thereto, it is certainly proper to ensure that there has been malicious intent, or, at least, ensure that negligence was so serious as to be tantamount to acquiescence or even malicious intent.

490. As to whether the form of individual criminal responsibility referred to Article 6 (3) of the Statute applies to persons in positions of both military and civilian authority, it should be noted that during the Tokyo trials, certain civilian authorities were convicted of war crimes under this principle. Hirota, former Foreign Minister of Japan, was convicted of atrocities - including mass rape - committed in the "rape of Nanking", under a count which charged that he had " recklessly disregarded their legal duty by virtue of their offices to take adequate steps to secure the observance and prevent breaches of the law and customs of war".The Tokyo Tribunal held that:

> "Hirota was derelict in his duty in not insisting before the Cabinet that immediate action be taken to put an end to the atrocities, failing any other action open to him to bring about the same result. He was content to rely on assurances which he knew were not being implemented while hundreds of murders, violations of women, and other atrocities were being committed daily. His inaction amounted to criminal negligence".

It should, however, be noted that Judge Röling strongly dissented from this finding, and held that Hirota should have been acquitted. Concerning the principle of command responsibility as applied to a civilian leader, Judge Röling stated that:

> "Generally speaking, a Tribunal should be very careful in holding civil government officials responsible for the behaviour of the army in the field. Moreover, the Tribunal is here to apply the general principles of law as they exist with relation to the responsibility for omissions'. Considerations of both law and policy, of both justice and expediency, indicate that this responsibility should only be recognized in a very restricted sense".

491. The Chamber therefore finds that in the case of civilians, the application of the principle of individual criminal responsibility, enshrined in Article 6 (3), to civilians remains contentious. Against this background, the Chamber holds that it is appropriate to assess on a case by case basis the power of authority actually devolved upon the Accused in order to determine whether or not he had the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

6.3. Genocide (Article 2 of the Statute)

6.3.1. Genocide

492. Article 2 of the Statute stipulates that the Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for genocide, complicity to commit genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, attempt to commit genocide and complicity in genocide.

493. In accordance with the said provisions of the Statute, the Prosecutor has charged Akayesu with the crimes legally defined as genocide (count 1), complicity in genocide (count 2) and incitement to commit genocide (count 4).

Crime of Genocide, punishable under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute

5467

494. The definition of genocide, as given in Article 2 of the Tribunal's Statute, is taken verbatim from Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (the "Genocide Convention")91. It states:

> " Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:
>
> (a) Killing members of the group;
> (b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
> (c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
> (d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
> (e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group."

495. The Genocide Convention is undeniably considered part of customary international law, as can be seen in the opinion of the International Court of Justice on the provisions of the Genocide Convention, and as was recalled by the United Nations' Secretary-General in his Report on the establishment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia92.

496. The Chamber notes that Rwanda acceded, by legislative decree, to the Convention on Genocide on 12 February 197593. Thus, punishment of the crime of genocide did exist in Rwanda in 1994, at the time of the acts alleged in the Indictment, and the perpetrator was liable to be brought before the competent courts of Rwanda to answer for this crime.

497. Contrary to popular belief, the crime of genocide does not imply the actual extermination of group in its entirety, but is understood as such once any one of the acts mentioned in Article 2(2)(a) through 2 (2)(e) is committed with the specific intent to destroy "in whole or in part" a national, ethnical, racial or religious group.

498. Genocide is distinct from other crimes inasmuch as it embodies a special intent or dolus specialis. Special intent of a crime is the specific intention, required as a constitutive element of the crime, which demands that the perpetrator clearly seeks to produce the act charged. Thus, the special intent in the crime of genocide lies in "the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such".

499. Thus, for a crime of genocide to have been committed, it is necessary that one of the acts listed under Article 2(2) of the Statute be committed, that the particular act be committed against a specifically targeted group, it being a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. Consequently, in order to clarify the constitutive elements of the crime of genocide, the Chamber will first state its findings on the acts provided for under Article 2(2)(a) through Article 2(2)(e) of the Statute, the groups protected by the Genocide Convention, and the special intent or dolus specialis necessary for genocide to take place.

Killing members of the group (paragraph (a)):

500. With regard to Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute, like in the Genocide Convention, the Chamber notes that the said paragraph states "meurtre" in the French version while the English version states "killing". The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that the term "killing" used in the English version is too general, since it could very well include both intentional and unintentional homicides, whereas the term "meurtre", used in the French version, is more precise. It is accepted that there is murder when death has been caused with the intention to do so, as provided for, incidentally, in the Penal Code of Rwanda which stipulates in its Article 311 that "Homicide committed with intent to cause death shall be treated as murder".

5465

501. Given the presumption of innocence of the accused, and pursuant to the general principles of criminal law, the Chamber holds that the version more favourable to the accused should be upheld and finds that Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute must be interpreted in accordance with the definition of murder given in the Penal Code of Rwanda, according to which "meurtre" (killing) is homicide committed with the intent to cause death. The Chamber notes in this regard that the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention 94, show that the proposal by certain delegations that premeditation be made a necessary condition for there to be genocide, was rejected, because some delegates deemed it unnecessary for premeditation to be made a requirement; in their opinion, by its constitutive physical elements, the very crime of genocide, necessarily entails premeditation.

Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group (paragraph b)

502. Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group does not necessarily mean that the harm is permanent and irremediable.

503. In the Adolf Eichmann case, who was convicted of crimes against the Jewish people, genocide under another legal definition, the District Court of Jerusalem stated in its judgment of 12 December 1961, that serious bodily or mental harm of members of the group can be caused > " by the enslavement, starvation, deportation and persecution [...] and by their detention in ghettos, transit camps and concentration camps in conditions which were designed to cause their degradation, deprivation of their rights as human beings, and to suppress them and cause them inhumane suffering and torture"95.

504. For purposes of interpreting Article 2 (2)(b) of the Statute, the Chamber takes serious bodily or mental harm, without limiting itself thereto, to mean acts of torture, be they bodily or mental, inhumane or degrading treatment, persecution.

Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part (paragraph c):

505. The Chamber holds that the expression deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part, should be construed as the methods of destruction by which the perpetrator does not immediately kill the members of the group, but which, ultimately, seek their physical destruction.

506. For purposes of interpreting Article 2(2)(c) of the Statute, the Chamber is of the opinion that the means of deliberate inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction, in whole or part, include, inter alia, subjecting a group of people to a subsistence diet, systematic expulsion from homes and the reduction of essential medical services below minimum requirement.

Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group (paragraph d):

507. For purposes of interpreting Article 2(2)(d) of the Statute, the Chamber holds that the measures intended to prevent births within the group, should be construed as sexual mutilation, the practice of sterilization, forced birth control, separation of the sexes and prohibition of marriages. In patriarchal societies, where membership of a group is determined by the identity of the father, an example of a measure intended to prevent births within a group is the case where, during rape, a woman of the said group is deliberately impregnated by a man of another group, with the intent to have her give birth to a child who will consequently not belong to its mother's group.

508. Furthermore, the Chamber notes that measures intended to prevent births within the group may be physical, but can also be mental. For instance, rape can be a measure intended to prevent births when the person raped refuses subsequently to procreate, in the same way that members of a group can be led, through threats or trauma, not to procreate.

Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group (paragraph e)

509. With respect to forcibly transferring children of the group to another group, the Chamber is of the opinion that, as in the case of measures intended to prevent births, the objective is not only to sanction a direct act of forcible physical transfer, but also to sanction acts of threats or trauma which would lead to the forcible transfer of children from one group to another.

510. Since the special intent to commit genocide lies in the intent to "destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such", it is necessary to consider a definition of the group as such. Article 2 of the Statute, just like the Genocide Convention, stipulates four types of victim groups, namely national, ethnical, racial or religious groups.

511. On reading through the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention96, it appears that the crime of genocide was allegedly perceived as targeting only "stable" groups, constituted in a permanent fashion and membership of which is determined by birth, with the exclusion of the more "mobile" groups which one joins through individual voluntary commitment, such as political and economic groups. Therefore, a common criterion in the four types of groups protected by the Genocide Convention is that membership in such groups would seem to be normally not challengeable by its members, who belong to it automatically, by birth, in a continuous and often irremediable manner.

512. Based on the Nottebohm decision97 rendered by the International Court of Justice, the Chamber holds that a national group is defined as a collection of people who are perceived to share a legal bond based on common citizenship, coupled with reciprocity of rights and duties.

513. An ethnic group is generally defined as a group whose members share a common language or culture.

514. The conventional definition of racial group is based on the hereditary physical traits often identified with a geographical region, irrespective of linguistic, cultural, national or religious factors.

515. The religious group is one whose members share the same religion, denomination or mode of worship.

516. Moreover, the Chamber considered whether the groups protected by the Genocide Convention, echoed in Article 2 of the Statute, should be limited to only the four groups expressly mentioned and whether they should not also include any group which is stable and permanent like the said four groups. In other words, the question that arises is whether it would be impossible to punish the physical destruction of a group as such under the Genocide Convention, if the said group, although stable and membership is by birth, does not meet the definition of any one of the four groups expressly protected by the Genocide Convention. In the opinion of the Chamber, it is particularly important to respect the intention of the drafters of the Genocide Convention, which according to the travaux préparatoires, was patently to ensure the protection of any stable and permanent group.

5457

517. As stated above, the crime of genocide is characterized by its dolus specialis, or special intent, which lies in the fact that the acts charged, listed in Article 2 (2) of the Statute, must have been "committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such".

518. Special intent is a well-known criminal law concept in the Roman-continental legal systems. It is required as a constituent element of certain offences and demands that the perpetrator have the clear intent to cause the offence charged. According to this meaning, special intent is the key element of an intentional offence, which offence is characterized by a psychological relationship between the physical result and the mental state of the perpetrator98.

519. As observed by the representative of Brazil during the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention,

> "genocide [is] characterised by the factor of particular intent to destroy a group. In the absence of that factor, whatever the degree of atrocity of an act and however similar it might be to the acts described in the convention, that act could still not be called genocide."99

520. With regard to the crime of genocide, the offender is culpable only when he has committed one of the offences charged under Article 2(2) of the Statute with the clear intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a particular group. The offender is culpable because he knew or should have known that the act committed would destroy, in whole or in part, a group.

521. In concrete terms, for any of the acts charged under Article 2 (2) of the Statute to be a constitutive element of genocide, the act must have been committed against one or several individuals, because such individual or individuals were members of a specific group, and specifically because they belonged to this group. Thus, the victim is chosen not because of his individual identity, but rather on account of his membership of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. The victim of the act is therefore a member of a group, chosen as such, which, hence, means that the victim of the crime of genocide is the group itself and not only the individual100.

522. The perpetration of the act charged therefore extends beyond its actual commission, for example, the murder of a particular individual, for the realisation of an ulterior motive, which is to destroy, in whole or part, the group of which the individual is just one element.

523. On the issue of determining the offender's specific intent, the Chamber considers that intent is a mental factor which is difficult, even impossible, to determine. This is the reason why, in the absence of a confession from the accused, his intent can be inferred from a certain number of presumptions of fact. The Chamber considers that it is possible to deduce the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership of a particular group, while excluding the members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act.

5468-

524. Trial Chamber I of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia also stated that the specific intent of the crime of genocide

> " may be inferred from a number of facts such as the general political doctrine which gave rise to the acts possibly covered by the definition in Article 4, or the repetition of destructive and discriminatory acts. The intent may also be inferred from the perpetration of acts which violate, or which the perpetrators themselves consider to violate the very foundation of the group- acts which are not in themselves covered by the list in Article 4(2) but which are committed as part of the same pattern of conduct"101.

Thus, in the matter brought before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the Trial Chamber, in its findings, found that

> "this intent derives from the combined effect of speeches or projects laying the groundwork for and justifying the acts, from the massive scale of their destructive effect and from their specific nature, which aims at undermining what is considered to be the foundation of the group".102

6.3.2. Complicity in Genocide

The Crime of Complicity in Genocide, punishable under Article 2(3)e) of the Statute 525. Under Article 2(3)e) of the Statute, the Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons who have committed complicity in genocide. The Prosecutor has charged Akayesu with such a crime under count 2 of the Indictment.

526. Principle VII of the "Nuremberg Principles" 103 reads

> "complicity in the commission of a crime against peace, a war crime, or a crime against humanity as set forth in Principle VI is a crime under international law."

Thus, participation by complicity in the most serious violations of international humanitarian law was considered a crime as early as Nuremberg.

527. The Chamber notes that complicity is viewed as a form of criminal participation by all criminal law systems, notably, under the Anglo-Saxon system (or Common Law) and the Roman-Continental system (or Civil Law). Since the accomplice to an offence may be defined as someone who associates himself in an offence committed by another 104, complicity necessarily implies the existence of a principal offence.105

528. According to one school of thought, complicity is borrowed criminality' (criminalité d'emprunt). In other words, the accomplice borrows the criminality of the principal perpetrator. By borrowed criminality, it should be understood that the physical act which constitutes the act of complicity does not have its own inherent criminality, but rather it borrows the criminality of the act committed by the principal perpetrator of the criminal enterprise. Thus, the conduct of the accomplice emerges as a crime when the crime has been consummated by the principal perpetrator. The accomplice has not committed an autonomous crime, but has merely facilitated the criminal enterprise committed by another.

529. Therefore, the issue before the Chamber is whether genocide must actually be committed in order for any person to be found guilty of complicity in genocide. The Chamber notes that, as stated above, complicity can only exist when there is a punishable, principal act, in the commission of which the accomplice has associated himself. Complicity, therefore, implies a predicate offence committed by someone other than the accomplice.

5469

530. Consequently, the Chamber is of the opinion that in order for an accused to be found guilty of complicity in genocide, it must, first of all, be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime of genocide has, indeed, been committed.

531. The issue thence is whether a person can be tried for complicity even where the perpetrator of the principal offence himself has not being tried. Under Article 89 of the Rwandan Penal Code, accomplices

> "may be prosecuted even where the perpetrator may not face prosecution for personal reasons, such as double jeopardy, death, insanity or non-identification"[unofficial translation].

As far as the Chamber is aware, all criminal systems provide that an accomplice may also be tried, even where the principal perpetrator of the crime has not been identified, or where, for any other reasons, guilt could not be proven.

532. The Chamber notes that the logical inference from the foregoing is that an individual cannot thus be both the principal perpetrator of a particular act and the accomplice thereto. An act with which an accused is being charged cannot, therefore, be characterized both as an act of genocide and an act of complicity in genocide as pertains to this accused. Consequently, since the two are mutually exclusive, the same individual cannot be convicted of both crimes for the same act.

533. As regards the physical elements of complicity in genocide (Actus Reus), three forms of accomplice participation are recognized in most criminal Civil Law systems: complicity by instigation, complicity by aiding and abetting, and complicity by procuring means106. It should be noted that the Rwandan Penal Code includes two other forms of participation, namely, incitement to commit a crime through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at pubic gatherings, or through the public display of placards or posters, and complicity by harbouring or aiding a criminal. Indeed, according to Article 91 of the Rwandan Penal Code:

> "An accomplice shall mean:
> 1. A person or persons who by means of gifts, promises, threats, abuse of authority or power, culpable machinations or artifice, directly incite(s) to commit such action or order(s) that such action be committed.
> 2. A person or persons who procure(s) weapons, instruments or any other means which are used in committing such action with the knowledge that they would be so used.
> 3. A person or persons who knowingly aid(s) or abet(s) the perpetrator or perpetrators of such action in the acts carried out in preparing or planning such action or in effectively committing it.
> 4. A person or persons who, whether through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at pubic gatherings or through the public display of placards or posters, directly incite(s) the perpetrator or perpetrators to commit such an action without prejudice to the penalties applicable to those who incite others to commit offences, even where such incitement fails to produce results.

5447-10

5. A person or persons who harbour(s) or aid(s) perpetrators under the circumstances provided for under Article 257 of this Code."107 [unofficial translation]

534. The Chamber notes, first of all, that the said Article 91 of the Rwandan Penal Code draws a distinction between "instigation" (instigation), on the one hand, as provided for by paragraph 1 of said Article, and "incitation" (incitement), on the other, which is referred to in paragraph 4 of the same Article. The Chamber notes in this respect that, as pertains to the crime of genocide, the latter form of complicity, i.e. by incitement, is the offence which under the Statute is given the specific legal definition of "direct and public incitement to commit genocide," punishable under Article 2(3)c), as distinguished from "complicity in genocide." The findings of the Chamber with respect to the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide will be detailed below. That said, instigation, which according to Article 91 of the Rwandan Penal Code, assumes the form of incitement or instruction to commit a crime, only constitutes complicity if it is accompanied by, "gifts, promises, threats, abuse of authority or power, machinations or culpable artifice"108. In other words, under the Rwandan Penal Code, unless the instigation is accompanied by one of the aforesaid elements, the mere fact of prompting another to commit a crime is not punishable as complicity, even if such a person committed the crime as a result.

535. The ingredients of complicity under Common Law do not appear to be different from those under Civil Law. To a large extent, the forms of accomplice participation, namely "aid and abet, counsel and procure", mirror those conducts characterized under Civil Law as "l'aide et l'assistance, la fourniture des moyens".

536. Complicity by aiding or abetting implies a positive action which excludes, in principle, complicity by failure to act or omission. Procuring means is a very common form of complicity. It covers those persons who procured weapons, instruments or any other means to be used in the commission of an offence, with the full knowledge that they would be used for such purposes.

537. For the purposes of interpreting Article 2(3)e) of the Statute, which does not define the concept of complicity, the Chamber is of the opinion that it is necessary to define complicity as per the Rwandan Penal Code, and to consider the first three forms of criminal participation referred to in Article 91 of the Rwandan Penal Code as being the elements of complicity in genocide, thus:

- complicity by procuring means, such as weapons, instruments or any other means, used to commit genocide, with the accomplice knowing that such means would be used for such a purpose;
- complicity by knowingly aiding or abetting a perpetrator of a genocide in the planning or enabling acts thereof;
- complicity by instigation, for which a person is liable who, though not directly participating in the crime of genocide crime, gave instructions to commit genocide, through gifts, promises, threats, abuse of authority or power, machinations or culpable artifice, or who directly incited to commit genocide.

538. The intent or mental element of complicity implies in general that, at the moment he acted, the accomplice knew of the assistance he was providing in the commission of the principal offence. In other words, the accomplice must have acted knowingly.

539. Moreover, as in all criminal Civil law systems, under Common law, notably English law, generally, the accomplice need not even wish that the principal offence be committed. In the case of National Coal Board v. Gamble109, Justice Devlin stated

"an indifference to the result of the crime does not of itself negate abetting. If one man > deliberately sells to another a gun to be used for murdering a third, he may be indifferent about whether the third lives or dies and interested only the cash profit to be made out of the sale, but he can still be an aider and abettor."

5471

In 1975, the English House of Lords also upheld this definition of complicity, when it held that willingness to participate in the principal offence did not have to be established110. As a result, anyone who knowing of another's criminal purpose, voluntarily aids him or her in it, can be convicted of complicity even though he regretted the outcome of the offence.

540. As far as genocide is concerned, the intent of the accomplice is thus to knowingly aid or abet one or more persons to commit the crime of genocide. Therefore, the Chamber is of the opinion that an accomplice to genocide need not necessarily possess the dolus specialis of genocide, namely the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such.

541. Thus, if for example, an accused knowingly aided or abetted another in the commission of a murder, while being unaware that the principal was committing such a murder, with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the group to which the murdered victim belonged, the accused could be prosecuted for complicity in murder, and certainly not for complicity in genocide. However, if the accused knowingly aided and abetted in the commission of such a murder while he knew or had reason to know that the principal was acting with genocidal intent, the accused would be an accomplice to genocide, even though he did not share the murderer's intent to destroy the group.

542. This finding by the Chamber comports with the decisions rendered by the District Court of Jerusalem on 12 December 1961 and the Supreme Court of Israel on 29 May 1962 in the case of Adolf Eichmann111. Since Eichmann raised the argument in his defence that he was a "small cog" in the Nazi machine, both the District Court and the Supreme Court dealt with accomplice liability and found that,

> "[...] even a small cog, even an insignificant operator, is under our criminal law liable to be regarded as an accomplice in the commission of an offence, in which case he will be dealt with as if he were the actual murderer or destroyer".112

543. The District Court accepted that Eichmann did not personally devise the "Final Solution" himself, but nevertheless, as the head of those engaged in carrying out the "Final Solution" - "acting in accordance with the directives of his superiors, but [with] wide discretionary powers in planning operations on his own initiative," he incurred individual criminal liability for crimes against the Jewish people, as much as his superiors. Likewise, with respect to his subordinates who actually carried out the executions, "[...] the legal and moral responsibility of he who delivers up the victim to his death is, in our opinion, no smaller, and may be greater, than the responsibility of he who kills the victim with his own hands"113. The District Court found that participation in the extermination plan with knowledge of the plan rendered the person liable "as an accomplice to the extermination of all [...] victims from 1941 to 1945, irrespective of the extent of his participation"114.

544. The findings of the Israeli courts in this case support the principle that the mens rea, or special intent, required for complicity in genocide is knowledge of the genocidal plan, coupled with the actus reus of participation in the execution of such plan. Crucially, then, it does not appear that the specific intent to commit the crime of genocide, as reflected in the phrase "with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such," is required for complicity or accomplice liability.

545. In conclusion, the Chamber is of the opinion that an accused is liable as an accomplice to genocide if he knowingly aided or abetted or instigated one or more persons in the commission of genocide, while knowing that such a person or persons were committing genocide, even though the accused himself did not have the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.

5472

546. At this juncture, the Chamber will address another issue, namely that which, with respect to complicity in genocide covered under Article 2(3)(e) of the Statute, may arise from the forms of participation listed in Article 6 of the Statute entitled, "Individual Criminal Responsibility," and more specifically, those covered under paragraph 1 of the same Article. Indeed, under Article 6(1), "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime." Such forms of participation, which are summarized in the expression "[...] or otherwise aided or abetted [...]," are similar to the material elements of complicity, though they in and of themselves, characterize the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, which include namely genocide.

547. Consequently, where a person is accused of aiding and abetting, planning, preparing or executing genocide, it must be proven that such a person acted with specific genocidal intent, i.e. the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group as such, whereas, as stated above, there is no such requirement to establish accomplice liability in genocide.

548. Another difference between complicity in genocide and the principle of abetting in the planning, preparation or execution a genocide as per Article 6(1), is that, in theory, complicity requires a positive act, i.e. an act of commission, whereas aiding and abetting may consist in failing to act or refraining from action. Thus, in the Jefferson and Coney cases, it was held that "The accused [...] only accidentally present [...] must know that his presence is actually encouraging the principal(s)"115. Similarly, the French Court of Cassation found that,

> "A person who, by his mere presence in a group of aggressors provided moral support to the assailants, and fully supported the criminal intent of the group, is liable as an accomplice"116[unofficial translation].

The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia also concluded in the Tadic judgment that :

> "if the presence can be shown or inferred, by circumstantial or other evidence, to be knowing and to have a direct and substantial effect on the commission of the illegal act, then it is sufficient on which to base a finding of participation and assign the criminal culpability that accompanies it."117

6.3.3. Direct and Public Incitement to commit Genocide

THE CRIME OF DIRECT AND PUBLIC INCITEMENT TO COMMIT GENOCIDE, PUNISHABLE UNDER ARTICLE 2(3)(c) OF THE STATUTE

549. Under count 4, the Prosecutor charges Akayesu with direct and public incitement to commit genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute.

550. Perhaps the most famous conviction for incitement to commit crimes of international dimension was that of Julius Streicher by the Nuremberg Tribunal for the virulently anti-Semitic articles which he had published in his weekly newspaper Der Stürmer. The Nuremberg Tribunal found that: "Streicher's incitement to murder and extermination, at the time when Jews in the East were being killed under the most horrible conditions, clearly constitutes persecution on political and racial grounds in connection with War Crimes, as defined by the Charter, and constitutes a Crime against Humanity". 118

5473

551. At the time the Convention on Genocide was adopted, the delegates agreed to expressly spell out direct and public incitement to commit genocide as a specific crime, in particular, because of its critical role in the planning of a genocide, with the delegate from the USSR stating in this regard that, "It was impossible that hundreds of thousands of people should commit so many crimes unless they had been incited to do so and unless the crimes had been premeditated and carefully organized. He asked how in those circumstances, the inciters and organizers of the crime could be allowed to escape punishment, when they were the ones really responsible for the atrocities committed".119

552. Under Common law systems, incitement tends to be viewed as a particular form of criminal participation, punishable as such. Similarly, under the legislation of some Civil law countries, including Argentina, Bolivia, Chili, Peru, Spain, Uruguay and Venezuela, provocation, which is similar to incitement, is a specific form of participation in an offence120; but in most Civil law systems, incitement is most often treated as a form of complicity.

553. The Rwandan Penal Code is one such legislation. Indeed, as stated above, in the discussion on complicity in genocide, it does provide that direct and public incitement or provocation is a form of complicity. In fact, Article 91 subparagraph 4 provides that an accomplice shall mean " A person or persons who, whether through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at public gatherings or through the public display of placards or posters, directly incite(s) the perpetrator or perpetrators to commit such an action without prejudice to the penalties applicable to those who incite others to commit offences, even where such incitement fails to produce results". 121

554. Under the Statute, direct and public incitement is expressly defined as a specific crime, punishable as such, by virtue of Article 2(3)(c). With respect to such a crime, the Chamber deems it appropriate to first define the three terms: incitement, direct and public.

555. Incitement is defined in Common law systems as encouraging or persuading another to commit an offence122. One line of authority in Common law would also view threats or other forms of pressure as a form of incitement123. As stated above, Civil law systems punish direct and public incitement assuming the form of provocation, which is defined as an act intended to directly provoke another to commit a crime or a misdemeanour through speeches, shouting or threats, or any other means of audiovisual communication124. Such a provocation, as defined under Civil law, is made up of the same elements as direct and public incitement to commit genocide covered by Article 2 of the Statute, that is to say it is both direct and public.

556. The public element of incitement to commit genocide may be better appreciated in light of two factors: the place where the incitement occurred and whether or not assistance was selective or limited. A line of authority commonly followed in Civil law systems would regard words as being public where they were spoken aloud in a place that were public by definition125. According to the International Law Commission, public incitement is characterized by a call for criminal action to a number of individuals in a public place or to members of the general public at large by such means as the mass media, for example, radio or television 126. It should be noted in this respect that at the time Convention on Genocide was adopted, the delegates specifically agreed to rule out the possibility of including private incitement to commit genocide as a crime, thereby underscoring their commitment to set aside for punishment only the truly public forms of incitement127.

5474

557. The "direct" element of incitement implies that the incitement assume a direct form and specifically provoke another to engage in a criminal act, and that more than mere vague or indirect suggestion goes to constitute direct incitement128. Under Civil law systems, provocation, the equivalent of incitement, is regarded as being direct where it is aimed at causing a specific offence to be committed. The prosecution must prove a definite causation between the act characterized as incitement, or provocation in this case, and a specific offence129. However, the Chamber is of the opinion that the direct element of incitement should be viewed in the light of its cultural and linguistic content. Indeed, a particular speech may be perceived as "direct" in one country, and not so in another, depending on the audience130. The Chamber further recalls that incitement may be direct, and nonetheless implicit. Thus, at the time the Convention on Genocide was being drafted, the Polish delegate observed that it was sufficient to play skillfully on mob psychology by casting suspicion on certain groups, by insinuating that they were responsible for economic or other difficulties in order to create an atmosphere favourable to the perpetration of the crime. 131

558. The Chamber will therefore consider on a case-by-case basis whether, in light of the culture of Rwanda and the specific circumstances of the instant case, acts of incitement can be viewed as direct or not, by focusing mainly on the issue of whether the persons for whom the message was intended immediately grasped the implication thereof.

559. In light of the foregoing, it can be noted in the final analysis that whatever the legal system, direct and public incitement must be defined for the purposes of interpreting Article 2(3)(c), as directly provoking the perpetrator(s) to commit genocide, whether through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at public gatherings, or through the public display of placards or posters, or through any other means of audiovisual communication.

560. The mens rea required for the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide lies in the intent to directly prompt or provoke another to commit genocide. It implies a desire on the part of the perpetrator to create by his actions a particular state of mind necessary to commit such a crime in the minds of the person(s) he is so engaging. That is to say that the person who is inciting to commit genocide must have himself the specific intent to commit genocide, namely, to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.

561. Therefore, the issue before the Chamber is whether the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide can be punished even where such incitement was unsuccessful. It appears from the travaux préparatoires of the Convention on Genocide that the drafters of the Convention considered stating explicitly that incitement to commit genocide could be punished, whether or not it was successful. In the end, a majority decided against such an approach. Nevertheless, the Chamber is of the opinion that it cannot thereby be inferred that the intent of the drafters was not to punish unsuccessful acts of incitement. In light of the overall travaux, the Chamber holds the view that the drafters of the Convention simply decided not to specifically mention that such a form of incitement could be punished.

562. There are under Common law so-called inchoate offences, which are punishable by virtue of the criminal act alone, irrespective of the result thereof, which may or may not have been achieved. The Civil law counterparts of inchoate offences are known as [infractions formelles] (acts constituting an offence per se irrespective of their results), as opposed to [infractions matérielles] (strict liability offences). Indeed, as is the case with inchoate offenses, in [infractions formelles], the method alone is punishable. Put another way, such offenses are "deemed to have been consummated regardless of the result achieved [unofficial translation]"132 contrary to [infractions matérielles]. Indeed, Rwandan lawmakers appear to characterize the acts defined under Article 91(4) of the Rwandan Penal Code as so-called [infractions formelles], since provision is made for their punishment even where they proved unsuccessful. It should be noted, however, that such offences are the exception, the rule being that in theory, an offence can only be punished in relation to the result envisaged by the lawmakers. In the opinion of the Chamber, the fact that such acts are in themselves particularly dangerous because of the high risk they carry for society, even if they fail to produce results, warrants that they be punished as an exceptional measure. The Chamber holds that genocide clearly falls within the category of crimes so serious that direct and public incitement to commit such a crime must be punished as such, even where such incitement failed to produce the result expected by the perpetrator.

5475

6.4. Crimes against Humanity (Article 3 of the Statute)

Crimes against Humanity - Historical development

563. Crimes against humanity were recognized in the Charter and Judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal, as well as in Law No. 10 of the Control Council for Germany. Article 6(c) of the Charter of Nuremberg Tribunal defines crimes against humanity as

> "..murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connexion with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Chamber, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated."

564. Article II of Law No. 10 of the Control Council Law defined crimes against humanity as:

> "Atrocities and Offenses, including but not limited to murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, or other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population or persecution on political, racial or religious grounds, whether or not in violation of the domestic laws of the country where perpetrated."133

565. Crimes against humanity are aimed at any civilian population and are prohibited regardless of whether they are committed in an armed conflict, international or internal in character134. In fact, the concept of crimes against humanity had been recognised long before Nuremberg. On 28 May 1915, the Governments of France, Great Britain and Russia made a declaration regarding the massacres of the Armenian population in Turkey, denouncing them as "crimes against humanity and civilisation for which all the members of the Turkish government will be held responsible together with its agents implicated in the massacres".135 The 1919 Report of the Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties formulated by representatives from several States and presented to the Paris Peace Conference also referred to "offences against ... the laws of humanity".136

566. These World War I notions derived, in part, from the Martens clause of the Hague Convention (IV) of 1907, which referred to "the usages established among civilised peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience". In 1874, George Curtis called slavery a "crime against humanity". Other such phrases as "crimes against mankind" and "crimes against the human family" appear far earlier in human history (see 12 N.Y.L. Sch. J. Hum. Rts 545 (1995)).

567. The Chamber notes that, following the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials, the concept of crimes against humanity underwent a gradual evolution in the Eichmann, Barbie, Touvier and Papon cases.

568. In the Eichmann case, the accused, Otto Adolf Eichmann, was charged with offences under Nazi and Nazi Collaborators (punishment) Law, 5710/1950, for his participation in the implementation of the plan know as the Final Solution of the Jewish problem'. Pursuant to Section I (b) of the said law:

> "Crime against humanity means any of the following acts: murder, extermination, enslavement, starvation or deportation and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population , and persecution on national, racial, religious or political grounds."137

The district court in the Eichmann stated that crimes against humanity differs from genocide in that for the commission of genocide special intent is required. This special intent is not required for crimes against humanity138. Eichmann was convicted by the District court and sentenced to death. Eichmann appealed against his conviction and his appeal was dismissed by the supreme court.

569. In the Barbie case, the accused, Klaus Barbie, who was the head of the Gestapo in Lyons from November 1942 to August 1944, during the wartime occupation of France, was convicted in 1987 of crimes against humanity for his role in the deportation and extermination of civilians. Barbie appealed in cassation, but the appeal was dismissed. For the purposes of the present Judgment, what is of interest is the definition of crimes against humanity employed by the Court. The French Court of Cassation, in a Judgment rendered on 20 December 1985, stated:

> Crimes against humanity, within the meaning of Article 6(c) of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal annexed to the London Agreement of 8 August 1945, which were not subject to statutory limitation of the right of prosecution, even if they were crimes which could also be classified as war crimes within the meaning of Article 6(b) of the Charter, were inhumane acts and persecution committed in a systematic manner in the name of a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy, not only against persons by reason of their membership of a racial or religious community, but also against the opponents of that policy, whatever the form of their opposition. (Words italicized by the Court)139

570. This was affirmed in a Judgment of the Court of Cassation of 3 June 1988, in which the Court held that:

> The fact that the accused, who had been found guilty of one of the crimes enumerated in Article 6(c) of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal, in perpetrating that crime took part in the execution of a common plan to bring about the deportation or extermination of the civilian population during the war, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds, constituted not a distinct offence or an aggravating circumstance but rather *an essential element of the crime against humanity, consisting of the fact that the acts charged were performed in a systematic manner in the name of a State practising by those means a policy of ideological supremacy.*140(Emphasis added)

571. The definition of crimes against humanity developed in Barbie was further developed in the Touvier case. In that case, the accused, Paul Touvier, had been a high-ranking officer in the Militia (Milice) of Lyons, which operated in "Vichy" France during the German occupation. He was convicted of crimes against humanity for his role in the shooting of seven Jews at Rillieux on 29 June 1994 as a reprisal for the assassination by members of the Resistance, on the previous day, of the Minister for Propaganda of the "Vichy" Government.

572. The Court of Appeal applied the definition of crimes against humanity used in Barbie, stating that:

> The specific intent necessary to establish a crime against humanity was the intention to take part in the execution of a common plan by committing, in a systematic manner, inhuman acts or persecutions in the name of a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy.141

573. Applying this definition, the Court of Appeal held that Touvier could not be guilty of crimes against humanity since he committed the acts in question in the name of the "Vichy" State, which was not a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy, although it collaborated with Nazi Germany, which clearly did practice such a policy.

574. The Court of Cassation allowed appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal, on the grounds that the crimes committed by the accused had been committed at the instigation of a Gestapo officer, and to that extent were linked to Nazi Germany, a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy against persons by virtue of their membership of a racial or religious community. Therefore the crimes could be categorised as crimes against humanity. Touvier was eventually convicted of crimes against humanity by the Cour d'Assises des Yvelines on 20 April 1994.142

575. The definition of crimes against humanity used in Barbie was later affirmed by the ICTY in its Vukovar Rule 61 Decision of 3 April 1996 (IT-95-13-R61), to support its finding that crimes against humanity applied equally where the victims of the acts were members of a resistance movement as to where the victims were civilians:

> "29. ... Although according to the terms of Article 5 of the Statute of this Tribunal combatants in the traditional sense of the term cannot be victims of a crime against humanity, this does not apply to individuals who, at one particular point in time, carried out acts of resistance. As the Commission of Experts, established pursuant to Security Council resolution 780, noted, "it seems obvious that Article 5 applies first and foremost to civilians, meaning people who are not combatants. This, however, should not lead to any quick conclusions concerning people who at one particular point in time did bear arms. ... Information of the overall circumstances is relevant for the interpretation of the provision in a spirit consistent with its purpose." (Doc S/1994/674, para. 78).

576. This conclusion is supported by case law. In the Barbie case, the French Cour de Cassation said that:

> "inhumane acts and persecution which, in the name of a State practising a policy of ideological hegemony, were committed systematically or collectively not only against individuals because of their membership in a racial or religious group but also against the adversaries of that policy whatever the form of the opposition" could be considered a crime against humanity. (Cass. Crim. 20 December 1985).

577. Article 7 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court defines a crime against humanity as any of the enumerated acts committed as part of a widespread of systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack. These enumerated acts are murder; extermination; enslavement; deportation or forcible transfer of population; imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law; torture; rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity; persecution against any identifiable group or collectively on political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender or other grounds that are universally recognised as impermissible under international law, in connection with any act referred to in this article or any other crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; enforced disappearance of persons; the crime of apartheid; other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering , or serious injury to body or mental or physical health.143

Crimes against Humanity in Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal

578. The Chamber considers that Article 3 of the Statute confers on the Chamber the jurisdiction to prosecute persons for various inhumane acts which constitute crimes against humanity. This category of crimes may be broadly broken down into four essential elements, namely :

(i) the act must be inhumane in nature and character, causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health;
(ii) the act must be committed as part of a wide spread or systematic attack;
(iii) the act must be committed against members of the civilian population;
(iv) the act must be committed on one or more discriminatory grounds, namely, national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds.

The act must be committed as part of a wide spread or systematic attack.

579. The Chamber considers that it is a prerequisite that the act must be committed as part of a wide spread or systematic attack and not just a random act of violence. The act can be part of a widespread or systematic attack and need not be a part of both.144

580. The concept of widespread' may be defined as massive, frequent, large scale action, carried out collectively with considerable seriousness and directed against a multiplicity of victims. The concept of systematic' may be defined as thoroughly organised and following a regular pattern on the basis of a common policy involving substantial public or private resources. There is no requirement that this policy must be adopted formally as the policy of a state. There must however be some kind of preconceived plan or policy. 145

581. The concept of attack' maybe defined as a unlawful act of the kind enumerated in Article 3(a) to (I) of the Statute, like murder, extermination, enslavement etc. An attack may also be non violent in nature, like imposing a system of apartheid, which is declared a crime against humanity in Article 1 of the Apartheid Convention of 1973, or exerting pressure on the population to act in a particular manner, may come under the purview of an attack, if orchestrated on a massive scale or in a systematic manner.

The act must be directed against the civilian population

582. The Chamber considers that an act must be directed against the civilian population if it is to constitute a crime against humanity. Members of the civilian population are people who are not taking any active part in the hostilities, including members of the armed forces who laid down their arms and those persons placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention or any other cause.146 Where there are certain individuals within the civilian population who do not come within the definition of civilians , this does not deprive the population of its civilian character.147

The act must be committed on discriminatory grounds

583. The Statute stipulates that inhumane acts committed against the civilian population must be committed on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds.' Discrimination on the basis of a person's political ideology satisfies the requirement of political' grounds as envisaged in Article 3 of the Statute. For definitions on national, ethnic, racial or religious grounds see supra.

584. Inhumane acts committed against persons not falling within any one of the discriminatory categories could constitute crimes against humanity if the perpetrator's intention was to further his attacks on the group discriminated against on one of the grounds mentioned in Article 3 of the Statute. The perpetrator must have the requisite intent for the commission of crimes against humanity. 148

The enumerated acts

585. Article 3 of the Statute sets out various acts that constitute crimes against humanity, namely: murder; extermination; enslavement; deportation; imprisonment; torture; rape; persecution on political, racial and religious grounds; and; other inhumane acts. Although the category of acts that constitute crimes against humanity are set out in Article 3, this category is not exhaustive. Any act which is inhumane in nature and character may constitute a crime against humanity, provided the other elements are met. This is evident in (i) which caters for all other inhumane acts not stipulated in (a) to (h) of Article 3.

586. The Chamber notes that the accused is indicted for murder, extermination, torture, rape and other acts that constitute inhumane acts. The Chamber in interpreting Article 3 of the Statute, shall focus its discussion on these acts only.

Murder

587. The Chamber considers that murder is a crime against humanity, pursuant to Article 3 (a) of the Statute. The International Law Commission discussed the inhumane act of murder in the context of the definition of crimes against humanity and concluded that the crime of murder is clearly understood and defined in the national law of every state and therefore there is no need to further explain this prohibited act.

588. The Chamber notes that article 3(a) of the English version of the Statute refers to "Murder", whilst the French version of the Statute refers to "Assassinat". Customary International Law dictates that it is the act of "Murder" that constitutes a crime against humanity and not "Assassinat". There are therefore sufficient reasons to assume that the French version of the Statute suffers from an error in translation.

589. The Chamber defines murder as the unlawful, intentional killing of a human being. The requisite elements of murder are :

1. the victim is dead;
2. the death resulted from an unlawful act or omission of the accused or a subordinate;
3. at the time of the killing the accused or a subordinate had the intention to kill or inflict grievous bodily harm on the deceased having known that such bodily harm is likely to cause the victim's death, and is reckless whether death ensures or not.

590. Murder must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population. The victim must be a member of this civilian population. The victim must have been murdered because he was discriminated against on national, ethnic, racial, political or religious grounds.

Extermination

591. The Chamber considers that extermination is a crime against humanity, pursuant to Article 3 (c) of the Statute. Extermination is a crime which by its very nature is directed against a group of individuals. Extermination differs from murder in that it requires an element of mass destruction which is not required for murder.

592. The Chamber defines the essential elements of extermination as the following :

1. the accused or his subordinate participated in the killing of certain named or described persons;
2. the act or omission was unlawful and intentional.
3. the unlawful act or omission must be part of a widespread or systematic attack;
4. the attack must be against the civilian population;
5. the attack must be on discriminatory grounds, namely: national, political, ethnic, racial, or religious grounds.

Torture

593. The Chamber considers that torture is a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 3(f) of the Statute. Torture may be defined as :

..any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.'149

594. The Chamber defines the essential elements of torture as :

(i) The perpetrator must intentionally inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering upon the victim for one or more of the following purposes:

(a) to obtain information or a confession from the victim or a third person;
(b) to punish the victim or a third person for an act committed or suspected of having been committed by either of them;
(c) for the purpose of intimidating or coercing the victim or the third person;
(d) for any reason based on discrimination of any kind.

(ii) The perpetrator was himself an official, or acted at the instigation of, or with the consent or acquiescence of, an official or person acting in an official capacity.

595. The Chamber finds that torture is a crime against humanity if the following further elements are satisfied :

(a) Torture must be perpetrated as part of a widespread or systematic attack;
(b) the attack must be against the civilian population;
(c) the attack must be launched on discriminatory grounds, namely: national, ethnic, racial, religious and political grounds.

5481

Rape

596. Considering the extent to which rape constitute crimes against humanity, pursuant to Article 3(g) of the Statute, the Chamber must define rape, as there is no commonly accepted definition of this term in international law. While rape has been defined in certain national jurisdictions as non-consensual intercourse, variations on the act of rape may include acts which involve the insertion of objects and/or the use of bodily orifices not considered to be intrinsically sexual.

597. The Chamber considers that rape is a form of aggression and that the central elements of the crime of rape cannot be captured in a mechanical description of objects and body parts. The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment does not catalogue specific acts in its definition of torture, focusing rather on the conceptual frame work of state sanctioned violence. This approach is more useful in international law. Like torture, rape is used for such purposes as intimidation, degradation, humiliation, discrimination, punishment, control or destruction of a person. Like torture, rape is a violation of personal dignity, and rape in fact constitutes torture when inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.

598. The Chamber defines rape as a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. Sexual violence which includes rape, is considered to be any act of a sexual nature which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. This act must be committed :

(a) as part of a wide spread or systematic attack;
(b) on a civilian population;
(c) on certained catalogued discriminatory grounds, namely: national, ethnic, political, racial, or religious grounds.

6.5. Violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II (Article 4 of the Statute)

Article 4 of the Statute

599. Pursuant to Article 4 of the Statute, the Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:

a) violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

b) collective punishments;

c) taking of hostages;

d) acts of terrorism;

e) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

f) pillage;

5482

g) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples;

h) threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

600. Prior to developing the elements for the above cited offences contained within Article 4 of the Statute, the Chamber deems it necessary to comment upon the applicability of common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II as regards the situation which existed in Rwanda in 1994 at the time of the events contained in the Indictment.

Applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

601. The four 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Additional Protocol I thereto generally apply to international armed conflicts only, whereas Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions extends a minimum threshold of humanitarian protection as well to all persons affected by a non-international conflict, a protection which was further developed and enhanced in the 1977 Additional Protocol II. In the field of international humanitarian law, a clear distinction as to the thresholds of application has been made between situations of international armed conflicts, in which the law of armed conflicts is applicable as a whole, situations of non-international (internal) armed conflicts, where Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II are applicable, and non-international armed conflicts where only Common Article 3 is applicable. Situations of internal disturbances are not covered by international humanitarian law.

602. The distinction pertaining to situations of conflicts of a non-international character emanates from the differing intensity of the conflicts. Such distinction is inherent to the conditions of applicability specified for Common Article 3 or Additional Protocol II respectively. Common Article 3 applies to "armed conflicts not of an international character", whereas for a conflict to fall within the ambit of Additional Protocol II, it must "take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol". Additional Protocol II does not in itself establish a criterion for a non-international conflict, rather it merely develops and supplements the rules contained in Common Article 3 without modifying its conditions of application. 150

603. It should be stressed that the ascertainment of the intensity of a non-international conflict does not depend on the subjective judgment of the parties to the conflict. It should be recalled that the four Geneva Conventions, as well as the two Protocols, were adopted primarily to protect the victims, as well as potential victims, of armed conflicts. If the application of international humanitarian law depended solely on the discretionary judgment of the parties to the conflict, in most cases there would be a tendency for the conflict to be minimized by the parties thereto. Thus, on the basis of objective criteria, both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II will apply once it has been established there exists an internal armed conflict which fulfills their respective pre-determined criteria151.

604. The Security Council, when delimiting the subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICTR152, incorporated violations of international humanitarian law which may be committed in the context of both an international and an internal armed conflict:

" Given the nature of the conflict as non-international in character, the Council has incorporated within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Tribunal violations of international > humanitarian law which may either be committed in both international and internal armed conflicts, such as the crime of genocide and crimes against humanity, or may be committed only in internal armed conflicts, such as violations of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions, as more fully elaborated in article 4 of Additional Protocol II.

5483

> In that latter respect, the Security Council has elected to take a more expansive approach to the choice of the applicable law than the one underlying the Statute of the Yugoslav Tribunal, and included within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Rwanda Tribunal international instruments regardless of whether they were considered part of customary international law or whether they have customarily entailed the individual criminal responsibility of the perpetrator of the crime. Article 4 of the Statute, accordingly, includes violations of Additional Protocol II, which, as a whole, has not yet been universally recognized as part of customary international law, for the first time criminalizes common article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions."153

605. Although the Security Council elected to take a more expansive approach to the choice of the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Tribunal than that of the ICTY, by incorporating international instruments regardless of whether they were considered part of customary international law or whether they customarily entailed the individual criminal responsibilty of the perpetrator of the crime, the Chamber believes, an essential question which should be addressed at this stage is whether Article 4 of the Statute includes norms which did not, at the time the crimes alleged in the Indictment were committed, form part of existing international customary law. Moreover, the Chamber recalls the establishment of the ICTY 154, during which the UN Secretary General asserted that in application of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege the International Tribunal should apply rules of International Humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law.

606. Notwithstanding the above, a possible approach would be for the Chamber not to look at the nature of the building blocks of Article 4 of the Statute nor for it to categorize the conflict as such but, rather, to look only at the relevant parts of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II in the context of this trial. Indeed, the Security Council has itself never explicitly determined how an armed conflict should be characterised. Yet it would appear that, in the case of the ICTY, the Security Council, by making reference to the four Geneva Conventions, considered that the conflict in the former Yugoslavia was an international armed conflict, although it did not suggest the criteria by which it reached this finding. Similarly, when the Security Council added Additional Protocol II to the subject matter jurisdiction of the ICTR, this could suggest that the Security Council deemed the conflict in Rwanda as an Additional Protocol II conflict. Thus, it would not be necessary for the Chamber to determine the precise nature of the conflict, this having already been pre-determined by the Security Council. Article 4 of the Statute would be applicable irrespective of the Additional Protocol II question', so long as the conflict were covered, at the very least, by the customary norms of Common Article 3. Findings would thus be made on the basis of whether or not it were proved beyond a reasonable doubt that there has been a serious violation in the form of one or more of the acts enumerated in Article 4 of the Statute.

607. However, the Chamber recalls the way in which the Prosecutor has brought some of the counts against the accused, namely counts 6, 8, 10, 12 and 15. For the first four of these, there is mention only of Common Article 3 as the subject matter jurisdiction of the particular alleged offences, whereas count 15 makes an additional reference to Additional Protocol II. To so add Additional Protocol II should not, in the opinion of the Chamber, be dealt with as a mere expansive enunciation of a ratione materiae which has been pre-determined by the Security Council. Rather, the Chamber finds it necessary and reasonable to establish the applicability of both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II individually. Thus, if an offence, as per count 15, is charged under both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II, it will not suffice to apply Common Article 3 and take for granted that Article 4 of the Statute, hence Additional Protocol II, is therefore automatically applicable.

608. It is today clear that the norms of Common Article 3 have acquired the status of customary that most States, by their domestic penal codes, have criminalized acts which if committed during internal armed conflict, would constitute violations of Common Article 3. It was also held by the ICTY Trial Chamber in the Tadic judgment 155 that Article 3 of the ICTY Statute (Customs of War), being the body of customary international humanitarian law not covered by Articles 2, 4, and 5 of the ICTY Statute, included the regime of protection established under Common Article 3 applicable to armed conflicts not of an international character. This was in line with the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber stipulating that Common Article 3 beyond doubt formed part of customary international law, and further that there exists a corpus of general principles and norms on internal armed conflict embracing Common Article 3 but having a much greater scope156.

609. However, as aforesaid, Additional Protocol II as a whole was not deemed by the Secretary-General to have been universally recognized as part of customary international law. The Appeals Chamber concurred with this view inasmuch as "[m]any provisions of this Protocol [II] can now be regarded as declaratory of existing rules or as having crystallised in emerging rules of customary law[ ]", but not all.157

610. Whilst the Chamber is very much of the same view as pertains to Additional Protocol II as a whole, it should be recalled that the relevant Article in the context of the ICTR is Article 4(2) (Fundamental Guarantees) of Additional Protocol II 158. All of the guarantees, as enumerated in Article 4 reaffirm and supplement Common Article 3159 and, as discussed above, Common Article 3 being customary in nature, the Chamber is of the opinion that these guarantees did also at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment form part of existing international customary law.

Individual Criminal Responsibility

611. For the purposes of an international criminal Tribunal which is trying individuals, it is not sufficient merely to affirm that Common Article 3 and parts of Article 4 of Additional Protocol II - which comprise the subject-matter jurisdiction of Article 4 of the Statute - form part of international customary law. Even if Article 6 of the Statute provides for individual criminal responsibility as pertains to Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute, it must also be shown that an individual committing serious violations of these customary norms incurs, as a matter of custom, individual criminal responsibility thereby. Otherwise, it might be argued that these instruments only state norms applicable to States and Parties to a conflict, and that they do not create crimes for which individuals may be tried.

612. As regards individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of Common Article 3, the ICTY has already affirmed this principle in the Tadic case. In the ICTY Appeals Chamber, the problem was posed thus:

> " Even if customary international law includes certain basic principles applicable to both internal and international armed conflicts, Appellant argues that such provisions do not entail individual criminal responsibility when breaches are committed in internal armed conflicts; these provisions cannot, therefore, fall within the scope of the International Tribunal's jurisdiction.160"

613. Basing itself on rulings of the Nuremberg Tribunal, on "elements of international practice which show that States intend to criminalise serious breaches of customary rules and principles on internal conflicts", as well as on national legislation designed to implement the Geneva Conventions, the ICTY Appeals Chamber reached the conclusion:

5485

" All of these factors confirm that customary international law imposes criminal liability serious violations of common Article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on protection of victims of internal armed conflict, and for breaching certain fundamental principles and rules regarding means and methods of combat in civil strife.161"

614. This was affirmed by the ICTY Trial Chamber when it rendered in the Tadic judgment162.

615. The Chamber considers this finding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber convincing and dispositive of the issue, both with respect to serious violations of Common Article 3 and of Additional Protocol II.

616. It should be noted, moreover, that Article 4 of the ICTR Statute states that, "The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977" (emphasis added). The Chamber understands the phrase "serious violation" to mean "a breach of a rule protecting important values [which] must involve grave consequences for the victim", in line with the above-mentioned Appeals Chamber Decision in Tadic , paragraph 94. The list of serious violations which is provided in Article 4 of the Statute is taken from Common Article 3 - which contains fundamental prohibitions as a humanitarian minimum of protection for war victims - and Article 4 of Additional Protocol II, which equally outlines "Fundamental Guarantees". The list in Article 4 of the Statute thus comprises serious violations of the fundamental humanitarian guarantees which, as has been stated above, are recognized as part of international customary law. In the opinion of the Chamber, it is clear that the authors of such egregious violations must incur individual criminal responsibility for their deeds.

617. The Chamber, therefore, concludes the violation of these norms entails, as a matter of customary international law, individual responsibility for the perpetrator. In addition to this argument from custom, there is the fact that the Geneva Conventions of 1949 (and thus Common Article 3) were ratified by Rwanda on 5 May 1964 and Additional Protocol II on 19 November 1984, and were therefore in force on the territory of Rwanda at the time of the alleged offences. Moreover, all the offences enumerated under Article 4 of the Statute constituted crimes under Rwandan law in 1994. Rwandan nationals were therefore aware, or should have been aware, in 1994 that they were amenable to the jurisdiction of Rwandan courts in case of commission of those offences falling under Article 4 of the Statute.

The nature of the conflict

618. As aforesaid, it will not suffice to establish that as the criteria of Common Article 3 have been met, the whole of Article 4 of the Statute, hence Additional Protocol II, will be applicable. Where alleged offences are charged under both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II, which has a higher threshold, the Prosecutor will need to prove that the criteria of applicability of, on the one hand, Common Article 3 and, on the other, Additional Protocol II have been met. This is so because Additional Protocol II is a legal instrument the overall sole purpose of which is to afford protection to victims in conflicts not of an international character. Hence, the Chamber deems it reasonable and necessary that, prior to deciding if there have been serious violations of the provisions of Article 4 of the Statute, where a specific reference has been made to Additional Protocol II in counts against an accused, it must be shown that the conflict is such as to satisfy the requirements of Additional Protocol II.

Common Article 3

619. The norms set by Common Article 3 apply to a conflict as soon as it is an armed conflict not of an international character'. An inherent question follows such a description, namely, what constitutes armed conflict? The Appeals Chamber in the Tadic decision on Jurisdiction163 held "that an armed conflict exists whenever there is [...] protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State. International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until [...] in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is reached". Similarly, the Chamber notes that the ICRC commentary on Common Article 3164 suggests useful criteria resulting from the various amendments discussed during the Diplomatic Conference of Geneva, 1949, inter alia:

5486

> That the Party in revolt against the de jure Government possesses an organized military force, an authority responsible for its acts, acting within a determinate territory and having the means of respecting and ensuring the respect for the Convention.
>
> That the legal Government is obliged to have recourse to the regular military forces against insurgents organized as military in possession of a part of the national territory.
>
> (a) That the de jure Government has recognized the insurgents as belligerents; or
>
> (b) that it has claimed for itself the rights of a belligerent; or
>
> (c) that it has accorded the insurgents recognition as belligerents for the purposes only of the present Convention; or
>
> (d) that the dispute has been admitted to the agenda of the Security Council or the General Assembly of the United Nations as being a threat to international peace, a breach of peace, or an act of aggression.

620. The above reference' criteria were enunciated as a means of distinguishing genuine armed conflicts from mere acts of banditry or unorganized and short-lived insurrections165. The term, armed conflict' in itself suggests the existence of hostilities between armed forces organized to a greater or lesser extent166. This consequently rules out situations of internal disturbances and tensions. For a finding to be made on the existence of an internal armed conflict in the territory of Rwanda at the time of the events alleged, it will therefore be necessary to evaluate both the intensity and organization of the parties to the conflict.

621. Evidence presented in relation to paragraphs 5-11 of the Indictment167, namely the testimony of Major-General Dallaire, has shown there to have been a civil war between two groups, being on the one side, the governmental forces, the FAR, and on the other side, the RPF. Both groups were well-organized and considered to be armies in their own right. Further, as pertains to the intensity of conflict, all observers to the events, including UNAMIR and UN Special rapporteurs, were unanimous in characterizing the confrontation between the two forces as a war, an internal armed conflict. Based on the foregoing, the Chamber finds there existed at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment an armed conflict not of an international character as covered by Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

Additional Protocol II

622. As stated above, Additional Protocol II applies to conflicts which "take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol".

623. Thus, the conditions to be met to fulfil the material requirements of applicability of Additional Protocol II at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment would entail showing that:

> (i) an armed conflict took place in the territory of a High Contracting Party, namely Rwanda, between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups;
>
> (ii) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups were under responsible command;
>
> (iii) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups were able to exercise such control over a part of their territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations; and
>
> (iv) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups were able to implement Additional Protocol II.

624. As per Common Article 3, these criteria have to be applied objectively, irrespective of the subjective conclusions of the parties involved in the conflict. A number of precisions need to be made about the said criteria prior to the Chamber making a finding thereon.168

625. The concept of armed conflict has already been discussed in the previous section pertaining to Common Article 3. It suffices to recall that an armed conflict is distinguished from internal disturbances by the level of intensity of the conflict and the degree of organization of the parties to the conflict. Under Additional Protocol II, the parties to the conflict will usually either be the government confronting dissident armed forces, or the government fighting insurgent organized armed groups. The term, armed forces' of the High Contracting Party is to be defined broadly, so as to cover all armed forces as described within national legislations.

626. The armed forces opposing the government must be under responsible command, which entails a degree of organization within the armed group or dissident armed forces. This degree of organization should be such so as to enable the armed group or dissident forces to plan and carry out concerted military operations, and to impose discipline in the name of a de facto authority. Further, these armed forces must be able to dominate a sufficient part of the territory so as to maintain sustained and concerted military operations and to apply Additional Protocol II. In essence, the operations must be continuous and planned. The territory in their control is usually that which has eluded the control of the government forces.

627. In the present case, evidence has been presented to the Chamber which showed there was at the least a conflict not of a international character in Rwanda at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment169. The Chamber, also taking judicial notice of a number of UN official documents dealing with the conflict in Rwanda in 1994, finds, in addition to the requirements of Common Article 3 being met, that the material conditions listed above relevant to Additional Protocol II have been fulfilled. It has been shown that there was a conflict between, on the one hand, the RPF, under the command of General Kagame, and, on the other, the governmental forces, the FAR. The RPF increased its control over the Rwandan territory from that agreed in the Arusha Accords to over half of the country by mid-May 1994, and carried out continuous and sustained military operations until the cease fire on 18 July 1994 which brought the war to an end. The RPF troops were disciplined and possessed a structured leadership which was answerable to authority. The RPF had also stated to the International Committee of the Red that it was bound by the rules of International Humanitarian law170. The Chamber finds the said conflict to have been an internal armed conflict within the meaning of Additional Protocol II. Further, the Chamber finds that conflict took place at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment.

Ratione personae

628. Two distinct issues arise with respect to personal jurisdiction over serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II - the class of victims and the class of perpetrators.

The class of victims

629. Paragraph 10 of the Indictment reads, "The victims referred to in this Indictment were, at all relevant times, persons not taking an active part in the hostilities". This is a material averment for charges involving Article 4 inasmuch as Common Article 3 is for the protection of "persons taking no active part in the hostilities" (Common Article 3(1)), and Article 4 of Additional Protocol II is for the protection of, "all persons who do not take a direct part or who have ceased to take part in hostilities". These phrases are so similar that, for the Chamber's purposes, they may be treated as synonymous. Whether the victims referred to in the Indictment are indeed persons not taking an active part in the hostilities is a factual question, which has been considered in the Factual Findings on the General Allegations (paragraphs 5-11 of the Indictment).

The class of perpetrators

630. The four Geneva Conventions - as well as the two Additional Protocols - as stated above, were adopted primarily to protect the victims as well as potential victims of armed conflicts. This implies thus that the legal instruments are primarily addressed to persons who by virtue of their authority, are responsible for the outbreak of, or are otherwise engaged in the conduct of hostilities. The category of persons to be held accountable in this respect then, would in most cases be limited to commanders, combatants and other members of the armed forces.

631. Due to the overall protective and humanitarian purpose of these international legal instruments, however, the delimitation of this category of persons bound by the provisions in Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II should not be too restricted. The duties and responsibilities of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols, hence, will normally apply only to individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or to individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts. The objective of this approach, thus, would be to apply the provisions of the Statute in a fashion which corresponds best with the underlying protective purpose of the Conventions and the Protocols.

632. However, the Indictment does not specifically aver that the accused falls in the class of persons who may be held responsible for serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. It has not been alleged that the accused was officially a member of the Rwandan armed forces' (in its broadest sense). It could, hence, be objected that, as a civilian, Article 4 of the Statute, which concerns the law of armed conflict, does not apply to him.

633. It is, in fact, well-established, at least since the Tokyo trials, that civilians may be held responsible for violations of international humanitarian law. Hirota, the former Foreign Minister of Japan, was convicted at Tokyo for crimes committed during the rape of Nanking171. Other post-World War II trials unequivocally support the imposition of individual criminal liability for war crimes on civilians where they have a link or connection with a Party to the conflict172.The principle of holding civilians liable for breaches of the laws of war is, moreover, favored by a consideration of the humanitarian object and purpose of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols, which is to protect war victims from atrocities.

5489

634. Thus it is clear from the above that the laws of war must apply equally to civilians as to combatants in the conventional sense. Further, the Chamber notes, in light of the above dicta, that the accused was not, at the time of the events in question, a mere civilian but a bourgmestre. The Chamber therefore concludes that, if so established factually, the accused could fall in the class of individuals who may be held responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, in particular serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II.

Ratione loci

635. There is no clear provision on applicability ratione loci either in Common Article 3 or Additional Protocol II. However, in this respect Additional Protocol II seems slightly clearer, in so far as it provides that the Protocol shall be applied "to all persons affected by an armed conflict as defined in Article 1". The commentary thereon 173 specifies that this applicability is irrespective of the exact location of the affected person in the territory of the State engaged in the conflict. The question of applicability ratione loci in non-international armed conflicts, when only Common Article 3 is of relevance should be approached the same way, i.e. the article must be applied in the whole territory of the State engaged in the conflict. This approach was followed by the Appeals Chamber in its decision on jurisdiction in Tadic , wherein it was held that "the rules contained in [common] Article 3 also apply outside the narrow geographical context of the actual theatre of combat operations"174.

636. Thus the mere fact that Rwanda was engaged in an armed conflict meeting the threshold requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II means that these instruments would apply over the whole territory hence encompassing massacres which occurred away from the war front'. From this follows that it is not possible to apply rules in one part of the country (i.e. Common Article 3) and other rules in other parts of the country (i.e. Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II). The aforesaid, however, is subject to the caveat that the crimes must not be committed by the perpetrator for purely personal motives.

Conclusion

637. The applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II has been dealt with above and findings made thereon in the context of the temporal setting of events alleged in the Indictment. It remains for the Chamber to make its findings with regard the accused's culpability under Article 4 of the Statute. This will be dealt with in section 7 of the judgment.

7. LEGAL FINDINGS

7.1. Counts 6, 8, 10 and 12- Violations of Common Article 3 (murder and cruel treatment) and Count 15 - Violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II (outrages upon personal dignity, in particular rape...)

638. Counts 6, 8, 10, and 12 of

7. LEGAL FINDINGS

7.1. Counts 6, 8, 10 and 12 - Violations of Common Article 3 (murder and cruel treatment) and Count 15 - Violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II (outrages upon personal dignity, in particular rape...)

637. Counts 6, 8, 10, and 12 of the Indictment charge Akayesu with Violations of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, and Count 15 charges Akayesu of Violations of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Additional Protocol II thereto. All these counts are covered by Article 4 of the Statute.

638. It has already been proved beyond reasonable doubt that there was an armed conflict not of an international character between the Government of Rwanda and the RPF in 1994 at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment[175]. The Chamber found the conflict to meet the requirements of Common Article 3 as well as Additional Protocol II.

639. For Akayesu to be held criminally responsible under Article 4 of the Statute, it is incumbent on the Prosecutor to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Akayesu acted for either the Government or the RPF in the execution of their respective conflict objectives. As stipulated earlier in this judgment, this implies that Akayesu would incur individual criminal responsibility for his acts if it were proved that by virtue of his authority, he is either responsible for the outbreak of, or is otherwise directly engaged in the conduct of hostilities. Hence, the Prosecutor will have to demonstrate to the Chamber and prove that Akayesu was either a member of the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or that he was legitimately mandated and expected, as a public official or agent or person otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts. Indeed, the Chamber recalls that Article 4 of the Statute also applies to civilians.

---

[175] Supra 'Legal Findings on Article 4 of the Statute' and 'Genocide in Rwanda in Rwanda in 1994'

640. Evidence presented during trial established that, at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, Akayesu wore a military jacket, carried a rifle, he assisted the military on their arrival in Taba by undertaking a number of tasks, including reconnaissance and mapping of the commune, and the setting up of radio communications, and he allowed the military to use his office premises. The Prosecutor relied in part on these facts to demonstrate that there was a nexus between the actions of Akayesu and the conflict. Further the Prosecutor argued that reference by Akayesu to individuals as RPF accomplices was indicative of Akayesu connecting his actions to the conflict between the Government and the RPF.

641. It has been established in this judgment that Akayesu embodied the communal authority and that he held an executive civilian position in the territorial administrative subdivision of Commune. However, the Prosecutor did not bring sufficient evidence to show how and in what capacity Akayesu was supporting the Government effort against the RPF. The evidence as pertains to the wearing of a military jacket and the carrying of a rifle, in the opinion of the Chamber, are not significant in demonstrating that Akayesu actively supported the war effort. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that the limited assistance given to the military by the accused in his role as the head of the commune does not suffice to establish that he actively supported the war effort. Moreover, the Chamber recalls it has been proved that references to RPF accomplices in the context of the events which occurred in Taba were to be understood as meaning Tutsi.[176]

642. Considering the above, and based on all the evidence presented in this case, the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the acts perpetrated by Akayesu in the commune of Taba at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment were committed in conjunction with the armed conflict. The Chamber further finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu was a member of the armed forces, or that he was legitimately mandated and expected, as a public official or agent or person otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts.

643. The Tribunal therefore finds that Jean-Paul Akayesu did not incur individual criminal responsibility under counts 6, 8, 10, 12 & 15 of the Indictment.

---

[176] Supra 'Factual findings on paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment'

7.2. Count 5 - Crimes against humanity (murder)

644. Count 5 of the indictment charges the Accused with a crime against humanity (murder), pursuant to Article 3(a) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 15 and 18 of the indictment.

645. The definition of crimes against humanity, including the various elements that comprise the enumerated offences under Article 3 of the Statute have already been discussed.

646. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was present and addressed a gathering in Gishyeshye sector on the morning of 19 April 1994. The Chamber however finds that it has not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused during this address, mentioned the names of Juvénal Rukundakuvuga or Emmanuel Sempabwa as Tutsi to be killed and as a result thereof they were subsequently killed.

647. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that during his search for Ephrem Karangwa, the Accused participated in the killing of Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome, by ordering their deaths and being present when they were killed.

648. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome were civilians, taking no active part in the hostilities that prevailed in Rwanda in 1994 and the only reason they were killed is because they were Tutsi.

649. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome, the Accused had the requisite intent to kill them as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population of Rwanda on ethnic grounds.

650. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome, the Accused is individually criminally responsible for the death of these victims, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

651. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population in Rwanda on 19 April 1994 and the conduct of the Accused formed part of this attack.

652. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing of Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome constitutes murder committed, as part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population on ethnic grounds and as such constitutes a crime against humanity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is guilty as charged in count 5 of the indictment.

7.3. Count 7 - Crimes against Humanity (murder)

653. Count 7 of the indictment charges the Accused with a crime against humanity (murder), pursuant to Article 3(a) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraph 19 of the indictment.

654. The definition of crimes against humanity, including the various elements that comprise the enumerated offences under Article 3 of the Statute have already been discussed.

655. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 19 April 1994, the Accused took eight detained refugees who were civilians and who did not take any active part in the hostilities that prevailed in Rwanda in 1994 and handed them over to the local militia, known as the Interahamwe with orders that they be killed.

656. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Interahamwe, acting on the orders from the Accused killed these eight refugees, at the bureau communal in the presence of the Accused.

657. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of the eight refugees, the Accused had the requisite intent to kill them as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population of Rwanda on ethnic grounds and as such he is criminally responsible for the killing of these eight refugees.

658. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of the eight refugees, the Accused is individually criminally responsible for the death of these victims, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

659. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population in Rwanda on 19 April 1994 and the conduct of the Accused formed part of this attack.

660. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing of these eight refugees constitutes murder committed, as part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population on ethnic grounds and as such constitutes a crime against humanity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is guilty as charged in count 7 of the indictment.

1.

7.4. Count 9 - Crimes against Humanity (murder)

661. Count 9 of the indictment charges the Accused with a crime against humanity (murder), pursuant to Article 3(a) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraph 20 of the indictment.

662. The definition of crimes against humanity, including the various elements that comprise the enumerated offences under Article 3 of the Statute have already been discussed.

663. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 19 April 1994, the Accused ordered the local people and militia known as the Interahamwe to kill intellectual people.

664. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Interahamwe and the local population, acting on the orders of the Accused killed five teachers namely; a professor known as Samuel; Tharcisse who was killed in the presence of the Accused; Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé.

665. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that these five teachers were civilians and did not take any active part in the hostilities that prevailed in Rwanda in 1994.

666. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that these five teachers were killed because they were Tutsi.

667. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of these five teachers, the Accused had the requisite intent to kill them as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population of Rwanda on ethnic grounds.

668. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of these five teachers, the Accused is individually criminally responsible for the death of these victims, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

669. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population in Rwanda on 19 April 1994 and the conduct of the Accused formed part of this attack.

670. The Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing of these five people constitute murder committed, as part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population on ethnic grounds and as such constitutes a crime against humanity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is guilty as charged in count 9 of the indictment

7.5. Count 4 - Direct and Public Incitement to commit Genocide

2. Count 4 deals with the allegations described in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment, relating, essentially, to the speeches that Akayesu reportedly made at a meeting held in Gishyeshye on 19 April 1994. The Prosecutor alleges that, through his speeches, Akayesu committed the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute.

671. The Trial Chamber made the following factual findings on the events described in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment. The Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that:

(i) Akayesu, in the early hours of 19 April 1994, joined a crowd of over 100 people which had gathered around the body of a young member of the Interahamwe in Gishyeshye.

(ii) He seized that opportunity to address the people and, owing, particularly, to his functions as bourgmestre and his authority over the population, he led the gathering and the proceedings.

(iii) It has been established that Akayesu then clearly urged the population to unite in order to eliminate what he termed the sole enemy: the accomplices of the Inkotanyi.

(iv) On the basis of consistent testimonies heard throughout the proceedings and the evidence of Dr. Ruzindana, appearing as expert witness on linguistic matters, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the population understood Akayesu's call as one to kill the Tutsi. Akayesu himself was fully aware of the impact of his speech on the crowd and of the fact that his call to fight against the accomplices of the Inkotanyi would be construed as a call to kill the Tutsi in general.

(v) During the said meeting, Akayesu received from the Interahamwe documents which included lists of names, and read from the lists to the crowd by stating, in particular, that the names were those of RPF accomplices.

(vi) Akayesu testified that the lists contained, especially, the name of Ephrem Karangwa, whom he named specifically, while being fully aware of the consequences of doing so. Indeed, he admitted before the Chamber that, at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, to label anyone in public as an accomplice of the RPF would put such a person in danger.

(vii) The Chamber is of the opinion that there is a causal relationship between Akayesu's speeches at the gathering of 19 April 1994 and the ensuing widespread massacres of Tutsi in Taba.

672. From the foregoing, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that, by the above-mentioned speeches made in public and in a public place, Akayesu had the intent to directly create a particular state of mind in his audience necessary to lead to the destruction of the Tutsi group, as such. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that the said acts constitute the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide, as defined above.

673. In addition, the Chamber finds that the direct and public incitement to commit genocide as engaged in by Akayesu, was indeed successful and did lead to the destruction of a great number of Tutsi in the commune of Taba.

7.6. Count 11 - Crimes against Humanity (torture)

674. In the light of its factual findings with regard to the allegations set forth in paragraphs 16,17, 21, 22 and 23 of the Indictment, the Tribunal considers the criminal responsibility of the Accused on Count 11 for his acts in relation to the beatings of Victims U, V, W, X, Y and Z.

675. The Tribunal notes that evidence has been presented at trial regarding the beating of victims not specifically named in paragraphs 16,17,21,22 and 23 of the Indictment. Witness J, for example, testified that she was slapped and her brother was beaten by the Accused. As counts 11 and 12 are restricted to acts in relation to the beatings of Victims U, V, W, X, Y and Z, the Tribunal will restrict its legal findings to these acts.

676. The Tribunal notes that paragraph 16 of the Indictment alleges that the Accused threatened to kill the husband and child of Victim U. The factual finding of the Tribunal is that the Accused threatened to kill Victim U, not her husband and child. The Tribunal considers that the allegations set forth in the Indictment sufficiently informed the Accused, in accordance with the requirements of due process, of the charge against him. The material allegation is that he threatened Victim U. Whether the threat was against her life or the life of her immediate family is not legally significant in the Tribunal's view.

677. The Tribunal notes that Paragraph 21 of the Indictment refers to "communal police" without reference to the Interahamwe, although Paragraph 23 refers to "men under Jean Paul Akayesu's authority". In its factual findings, the Tribunal has determined that only Mugenzi was a communal police officer. The other person actively involved in the interrogation and beating of Victim Z and possibly the interrogation of Victim W was Francois, an Interahamwe. As Francois and Mugenzi were both acting in the presence of and under the immediate authority of the Accused, as bourgemester, the Tribunal finds that in relation to the Accused the acts of Francois may be treated as equivalent to the acts of Mugenzi.
1.

678. The Tribunal notes that the Accused himself participated in the beating of Victim Y by hitting her on the back with a club, and the beating of Victim Z by stepping on his face and holding his foot there while others beat him. It is alleged that he interrogated them but it is not specifically alleged in Paragraphs 21 and 23 of the Indictment that the Accused committed acts of physical violence. The Tribunal finds, however, that the allegations in the Indictment were sufficient notice to the Accused of the incidents in question, and that the exact role of the Accused in these incidents was a matter which was adjudicated at trial in accordance with the requirements of due process. For these reasons, the Tribunal finds that the Accused may be judged criminally responsible for his direct participation in these beatings, despite the absence of a specific allegation of direct participation by the Accused in the relevant paragraphs of the Indictment.

679. The Tribunal interprets the word "torture", as set forth in Article 3(f) of its Statute, in accordance with the definition of torture set forth in the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, that is "any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity."

680. The Tribunal finds that the following acts committed by the Accused or by others in the presence of the Accused, at his instigation or with his consent or acquiescence, constitute torture:

(i) the interrogation of Victim U, under threat to her life, by the Accused at the bureau communal, on 19 April 1994;

(ii) the beating of Victim Y outside of her house by the Accused and Mugenzi on 20 April 1994;

(iii) the interrogation of Victim Y, under threat to her life, by the Accused, and the beating of Victim Y under interrogation by Mugenzi, in the presence of the Accused, at a mine at Buguli on 20 April 1994;

(iv) the interrogation of Victim W, under threat to her life, at a mine at Buguli by the Accused, on 20 April 1994;

(v) the beating of Victim Z under interrogation by the Accused, and by Mugenzi and Francois in the presence of the Accused, in Gishyeshye Sector, on 20 April 1994;

(vi) the forcing of Victim Z to beat Victim Y under interrogation, by Francois in the presence of the Accused, in Gishyeshye Sector, on 20 April 1994;

(vii) the beating of Victim Z and Victim V by Mugenzi and Francois and the interrogation of Victim V, under threat to his life, by the Accused outside the house of Victim V, on 20 April 1994;

681. Accordingly, the Tribunal finds the Accused criminally responsible on Count 11 under Article 6(1) of its Statute for commission of the following acts of torture as crimes against humanity under Article 3(a) of its Statute:

(i) his interrogation of Victim U, under threat to her life, at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994;

(ii) his beating of Victim Y, outside of her house, on 20 April 1994;

(iii) his interrogation of Victim Y, under threat to her life, at a mine at Buguli on 20 April 1994;

(iv) his interrogation of Victim W, under threat to her life, at a mine at Buguli on 20 April 1994;

(v) his beating of Victim Z in Gishyeshye Sector, on 20 April 1994;

(vi) his interrogation of Victim V, under threat to his life, outside of his house, on 20 April 1994.

682. The Tribunal finds the Accused criminally responsible on Count 11 under Article 6(1) of its Statute for implicitly ordering, as well as instigating, aiding and abetting, the following acts of torture, which were committed in his presence by men acting on his behalf, as crimes against humanity under Article 3(a) of its Statute:

(i) the beating of Victim Y outside of her house by Mugenzi on 20 April 1994;

(ii) the beating of Victim Y, under interrogation, by Mugenzi, at a mine at Buguli on 20 April 1994;

(iii) the beating of Victim Z, under interrogation, by Mugenzi and Francois, in Gishyeshye Sector on 20 April 1994;

(iv) the forcing of Victim Z to beat Victim Y, under interrogation, by Francois, in Gishyeshye Sector on 20 April 1994.

7.7. Count 13 (rape) and Count 14 (other inhumane acts) - Crimes against Humanity

683. In the light of its factual findings with regard to the allegations of sexual violence set forth in paragraphs 12A and 12B of the Indictment, the Tribunal considers the criminal responsibility of the Accused on Count 13, crimes against humanity (rape), punishable by Article 3(g) of the Statute of the Tribunal and Count 14, crimes against humanity (other inhumane acts), punishable by Article 3(i) of the Statute.

684. In considering the extent to which acts of sexual violence constitute crimes against humanity under Article 3(g) of its Statute, the Tribunal must define rape, as there is no commonly accepted definition of the term in international law. The Tribunal notes that many of the witnesses have used the term "rape" in their testimony. At times, the Prosecution and the Defence have also tried to elicit an explicit description of what happened in physical terms, to document what the witnesses mean by the term "rape". The Tribunal notes that while rape has been historically defined in national jurisdictions as non-consensual sexual intercourse, variations on the form of rape may include acts which involve the insertion of objects and/or the use of bodily orifices not considered to be intrinsically sexual. An act such as that described by Witness KK in her testimony - the Interahamwes thrusting a piece of wood into the sexual organs of a woman as she lay dying - constitutes rape in the Tribunal's view.

685. The Tribunal considers that rape is a form of aggression and that the central elements of the crime of rape cannot be captured in a mechanical description of objects and body parts. The Tribunal also notes the cultural sensitivities involved in public discussion of intimate matters and recalls the painful reluctance and inability of witnesses to disclose graphic anatomical details of sexual violence they endured. The United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment does not catalogue specific acts in its definition of torture, focusing rather on the conceptual framework of state-sanctioned violence. The Tribunal finds this approach more useful in the context of international law. Like torture, rape is used for such purposes as intimidation, degradation, humiliation, discrimination, punishment, control or destruction of a person. Like torture, rape is a violation of personal dignity, and rape in fact constitutes torture when it is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity.

686. The Tribunal defines rape as a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. The Tribunal considers sexual violence, which includes rape, as any act of a sexual nature which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. Sexual violence is not limited to physical invasion of the human body and may include acts which do not involve penetration or even physical contact. The incident described by Witness KK in which the Accused ordered the Interahamwe to undress a student and force her to do gymnastics naked in the public courtyard of the bureau communal, in front of a crowd, constitutes sexual violence. The Tribunal notes in this context that coercive circumstances need not be evidenced by a show of physical force. Threats, intimidation, extortion and other forms of duress which prey on fear or desperation may constitute coercion, and coercion may be inherent in certain circumstances, such as armed conflict or the military presence of Interahamwe among refugee Tutsi women at the bureau communal. Sexual violence falls within the scope of "other inhumane acts", set forth Article 3(i) of the Tribunal's Statute, "outrages upon personal dignity," set forth in Article 4(e) of the Statute, and "serious bodily or mental harm," set forth in Article 2(2)(b) of the Statute.

687. The Tribunal notes that as set forth by the Prosecution, Counts 13-15 are drawn on the basis of acts as described in paragraphs 12(A) and 12(B) of the Indictment. The allegations in these paragraphs of the Indictment are limited to events which took place "on or near the bureau communal premises." Many of the beatings, rapes and murders established by the evidence presented took place away from the bureau communal premises, and therefore the Tribunal does not make any legal findings with respect to these incidents pursuant to Counts 13, 14 and 15.

688. The Tribunal also notes that on the basis of acts described in paragraphs 12(A) and 12(B), the Accused is charged only pursuant to Article 3(g) (rape) and 3(i) (other inhumane acts) of its Statute, but not Article 3(a)(murder) or Article 3(f)(torture). Similarly, on the basis of acts described in paragraphs 12(A) and 12(B), the Accused is charged only pursuant to Article 4(e)(outrages upon personal dignity) of its Statute, and not Article 4(a)(violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment). As these paragraphs are not referenced elsewhere in the Indictment in connection with these other relevant Articles of the Statute of the Tribunal, the Tribunal concludes that the Accused has not been charged with the beatings and killings which have been established as Crimes Against Humanity or Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions. The Tribunal notes, however, that paragraphs 12(A) and 12(B) are referenced in Counts 1-3, Genocide and it considers the beatings and killings, as well as sexual violence, in connection with those counts.

689. The Tribunal has found that the Accused had reason to know and in fact knew that acts of sexual violence were occurring on or near the premises of the bureau communal and that he took no measures to prevent these acts or punish the perpetrators of them. The Tribunal notes that it is only in consideration of Counts 13, 14 and 15 that the Accused is charged with individual criminal responsibility under Section 6(3) of its Statute. As set forth in the Indictment, under Article 6(3) "an individual is criminally responsible as a superior for the acts of a subordinate if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or punish the perpetrators thereof." Although the evidence supports a finding that a superior/subordinate relationship existed between the Accused and the Interahamwe who were at the bureau communal, the Tribunal notes that there is no allegation in the Indictment that the Interahamwe, who are referred to as "armed local militia," were subordinates of the Accused. This relationship is a fundamental element of the criminal offence set forth in Article 6(3). The amendment of the Indictment with additional charges pursuant to Article 6(3) could arguably be interpreted as implying an allegation of the command responsibility required by Article 6(3). In fairness to the Accused, the Tribunal will not make this inference. Therefore, the Tribunal finds that it cannot consider the criminal responsibility of the Accused under Article 6(3).

1.

690. The Tribunal finds, under Article 6(1) of its Statute, that the Accused, by his own words, specifically ordered, instigated, aided and abetted the following acts of sexual violence:

(i) the multiple acts of rape of ten girls and women, including Witness JJ, by numerous Interahamwe in the cultural center of the bureau communal;

(ii) the rape of Witness OO by an Interahamwe named Antoine in a field near the bureau communal;

(iii) the forced undressing and public marching of Chantal naked at the bureau communal.

691. The Tribunal finds, under Article 6(1) of its Statute, that the Accused aided and abetted the following acts of sexual violence, by allowing them to take place on or near the premises of the bureau communal, while he was present on the premises in respect of (i) and in his presence in respect of (ii) and (iii), and by facilitating the commission of these acts through his words of encouragement in other acts of sexual violence, which, by virtue of his authority, sent a clear signal of official tolerance for sexual violence, without which these acts would not have taken place:

(i) the multiple acts of rape of fifteen girls and women, including Witness JJ, by numerous Interahamwe in the cultural center of the bureau communal;

(ii) the rape of a woman by Interahamwe in between two buildings of the bureau communal, witnessed by Witness NN;

(iii) the forced undressing of the wife of Tharcisse after making her sit in the mud outside the bureau communal, as witnessed by Witness KK;

5505

692. The Tribunal finds, under Article 6(1) of its Statute, that the Accused, having had reason to know that sexual violence was occurring, aided and abetted the following acts of sexual violence, by allowing them to take place on or near the premises of the bureau communal and by facilitating the commission of such sexual violence through his words of encouragement in other acts of sexual violence which, by virtue of his authority, sent a clear signal of official tolerance for sexual violence, without which these acts would not have taken place:

(i) the rape of Witness JJ by an Interahamwe who took her from outside the bureau communal and raped her in a nearby forest;
(ii) the rape of the younger sister of Witness NN by an Interahamwe at the bureau communal;
(iii) the multiple rapes of Alexia, wife of Ntereye, and her two nieces Louise and Nishimwe by Interahamwe near the bureau communal;
(iv) the forced undressing of Alexia, wife of Ntereye, and her two nieces Louise and Nishimwe, and the forcing of the women to perform exercises naked in public near the bureau communal.

693. The Tribunal has established that a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian ethnic population of Tutsis took place in Taba, and more generally in Rwanda, between April 7 and the end of June, 1994. The Tribunal finds that the rape and other inhumane acts which took place on or near the bureau communal premises of Taba were committed as part of this attack.

COUNT 13

694. The Accused is judged criminally responsible under Article 3(g) of the Statute for the following incidents of rape:

(i) the rape of Witness JJ by an Interahamwe who took her from outside the bureau communal and raped her in a nearby forest;
(ii) the multiple acts of rape of fifteen girls and women, including Witness JJ, by numerous Interahamwe in the cultural center of the bureau communal;
(iii) the multiple acts of rape of ten girls and women, including Witness JJ, by numerous Interahamwe in the cultural center of the bureau communal;
(iv) the rape of Witness OO by an Interahamwe named Antoine in a field near the bureau communal;
(v) the rape of a woman by Interahamwe in between two buildings of the bureau communal, witnessed by Witness NN;

(vi) the rape of the younger sister of Witness NN by an Interahamwe at the bureau communal;

(vii) the multiple rapes of Alexia, wife of Ntereye, and her two nieces Louise and Nishimwe by Interahamwe near the bureau communal.

COUNT 14

695. The Accused is judged criminally responsible under Article 3(i) of the Statute for the following other inhumane acts:

(i) the forced undressing of the wife of Tharcisse outside the bureau communal, after making her sit in the mud, as witnessed by Witness KK;

(ii) the forced undressing and public marching of Chantal naked at the bureau communal;

(iii) the forced undressing of Alexia, wife of Ntereye, and her two nieces Louise and Nishimwe, and the forcing of the women to perform exercises naked in public near the bureau communal.

7.8. Count 1 - Genocide, Count 2 - Complicity in Genocide

696. Count 1 relates to all the events described in the Indictment. The Prosecutor submits that by his acts alleged in paragraphs 12 to 23 of the Indictment, Akayesu committed the crime of genocide, punishable under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute.

697. Count 2 also relates to all the acts alleged in paragraphs 12 to 23 of the Indictment. The Prosecutor alleges that, by the said acts, the accused committed the crime of complicity in genocide, punishable under Article 2(3)(e) of the Statute.

698. In its findings on the applicable law, the Chamber indicated supra that, in its opinion, the crime of genocide and that of complicity in genocide were two distinct crimes, and that the same person could certainly not be both the principal perpetrator of, and accomplice to, the same offence. Given that genocide and complicity in genocide are mutually exclusive by definition, the accused cannot obviously be found guilty of both these crimes for the same act. However, since the Prosecutor has charged the accused with both genocide and complicity in genocide for each of the alleged acts, the Chamber deems it necessary, in the instant case, to rule on counts 1 and 2 simultaneously, so as to determine, as far as each proven fact is concerned, whether it constituted genocide or complicity in genocide.

699. Hence the question to be addressed is against which group the genocide was allegedly committed. Although the Prosecutor did not specifically state so in the Indictment, it is obvious, in the light of the context in which the alleged acts were committed, the testimonies presented and the Prosecutor's closing statement, that the genocide was committed against the Tutsi group. Article 2(2) of the Statute, like the Genocide Convention, provides that genocide may be committed against a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. In its findings on the law applicable to the crime of genocide supra, the Chamber considered whether the protected groups should be limited to only the four groups specifically mentioned or whether any group, similar to the four groups in terms of its stability and permanence, should also be included. The Chamber found that it was necessary, above all, to respect the intent of the drafters of the Genocide Convention which, according to the travaux préparatoires, was clearly to protect any stable and permanent group.

700. In the light of the facts brought to its attention during the trial, the Chamber is of the opinion that, in Rwanda in 1994, the Tutsi constituted a group referred to as "ethnic" in official classifications. Thus, the identity cards at the time included a reference to "ubwoko" in Kinyarwanda or "ethnie" (ethnic group) in French which, depending on the case, referred to the designation Hutu or Tutsi, for example. The Chamber further noted that all the Rwandan witnesses who appeared before it invariably answered spontaneously and without hesitation the questions of the Prosecutor regarding their ethnic identity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that, in any case, at the time of the alleged events, the Tutsi did indeed constitute a stable and permanent group and were identified as such by all.

701. In the light of the foregoing, with respect to each of the acts alleged in the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, based on the factual findings it has rendered regarding each of the events described in paragraphs 12 to 23 of the Indictment, of the following:

702. The Chamber finds that, as pertains to the acts alleged in paragraph 12, it has been established that, throughout the period covered in the Indictment, Akayesu, in his capacity as bourgmestre, was responsible for maintaining law and public order in the commune of Taba and that he had effective authority over the communal police. Moreover, as "leader" of Taba commune, of which he was one of the most prominent figures, the inhabitants respected him and followed his orders. Akayesu himself admitted before the Chamber that he had the power to assemble the population and that they obeyed his instructions. It has also been proven that a very large number of Tutsi were killed in Taba between 7 April and the end of June 1994, while Akayesu was bourgmestre of the Commune. Knowing of such killings, he opposed them and attempted to prevent them only until 18 April 1994, date after which he not only stopped trying to maintain law and order in his commune, but was also present during the acts of violence and killings, and sometimes even gave orders himself for bodily or mental harm to be caused to certain Tutsi, and endorsed and even ordered the killing of several Tutsi.

703. In the opinion of the Chamber, the said acts indeed incur the individual criminal responsibility of Akayesu for having ordered, committed, or otherwise aided and abetted in the preparation or execution of the killing of and causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the Tutsi group. Indeed, the Chamber holds that the fact that Akayesu, as a local authority, failed to oppose such killings and serious bodily or mental harm constituted a form of tacit encouragement, which was compounded by being present to such criminal acts.

704. With regard to the acts alleged in paragraphs 12 (A) and 12 (B) of the Indictment, the Prosecutor has shown beyond a reasonable doubt that between 7 April and the end of June 1994, numerous Tutsi who sought refuge at the Taba Bureau communal were frequently beaten by members of the Interahamwe on or near the premises of the Bureau communal. Some of them were killed. Numerous Tutsi women were forced to endure acts of sexual violence, mutilations and rape, often repeatedly, often publicly and often by more than one assailant. Tutsi women were systematically raped, as one female victim testified to by saying that "each time that you met assailants, they raped you". Numerous incidents of such rape and sexual violence against Tutsi women occurred inside or near the Bureau communal. It has been proven that some communal policemen armed with guns and the accused himself were present while some of these rapes and sexual violence were being committed. Furthermore, it is proven that on several occasions, by his presence, his attitude and his utterances, Akayesu encouraged such acts, one particular witness testifying that Akayesu, addressed the Interahamwe who were committing the rapes and said that "never ask me again what a Tutsi woman tastes like"[177]. In the opinion of the Chamber, this constitutes tacit encouragement to the rapes that were being committed.

705. In the opinion of the Chamber, the above-mentioned acts with which Akayesu is charged indeed render him individually criminally responsible for having abetted in the preparation or execution of the killings of members of the Tutsi group and the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of said group.

706. The Chamber found supra, with regard to the facts alleged in paragraph 13 of the Indictment, that the Prosecutor failed to demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that they are established.

707. As regards the facts alleged in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment, it is established that in the early hours of 19 April 1994, Akayesu joined a gathering in Gishyeshye and took this opportunity to address the public; he led the meeting and conducted the proceedings. He then called on the population to unite in order to eliminate what he referred to as the sole enemy: the accomplices of the Inkotanyi; and the population understood that he was thus urging them to kill the Tutsi. Indeed, Akayesu himself knew of the impact of his statements on the crowd and of the fact that his call to fight against the accomplices of the Inkotanyi would be understood as exhortations to kill the Tutsi in general. Akayesu who had received from the Interahamwe documents containing lists of names did, in the course of the said gathering, summarize the contents of same to the crowd by pointing out in particular that the names were those of RPF accomplices. He specifically indicated to the participants that Ephrem Karangwa's name was on of the lists. Akayesu admitted before the Chamber that during the period in question, that to publicly label someone as an accomplice of the RPF would put such a person in danger. The statements thus made by Akayesu at that gathering immediately led to widespread killings of Tutsi in Taba.

---

[177] "Ntihazagire umbaza uko umututsikazi yari ameze, ngo kandi mumenye ko ejo ngo nibabica nta kintu muzambaza."

708. Concerning the acts with which Akayesu is charged in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment, the Chamber recalls that it has found supra that they constitute direct and public incitement to commit genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute as distinct from the crime of genocide[178].

709. With respect to the Prosecutor's allegations in paragraph 16 of the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that on 19 April 1994, Akayesu on two occasions threatened to kill victim U, a Tutsi woman, while she was being interrogated. He detained her for several hours at the Bureau communal, before allowing her to leave. In the evening of 20 April 1994, during a search conducted in the home of victim V, a Hutu man, Akayesu directly threatened to kill the latter. Victim V was thereafter beaten with a stick and the butt of a rifle by a communal policeman called Mugenzi and one Francois, a member of the Interahamwe militia, in the presence of the accused. One of victim V's ribs was broken as a result of the beating.

710. In the opinion of the Chamber, the acts attributed to the accused in connection with victims U and V constitute serious bodily and mental harm inflicted on the two victims. However, while Akayesu does incur individual criminal responsibility by virtue of the acts committed against victim U, a Tutsi , for having committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on a member of the Tutsi group, such acts as committed against victim V were perpetrated against a Hutu and cannot, therefore, constitute a crime of genocide against the Tutsi group.

711. Regarding the acts alleged in paragraph 17, the Prosecutor has failed to satisfy the Chamber that they were proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

712. As for the allegations made in paragraph 18 of the Indictment, it is established that on or about 19 April 1994, Akayesu and a group of men under his control were looking for Ephrem Karangwa and destroyed his house and that of his mother . They then went to search the house of Ephrem Karangwa's brother- in- law, in Musambira commune and found his three brothers there. When the three brothers, namely Simon Mutijima, Thaddee Uwanyiligira and Jean-Chrysostome, tried to escape, Akayesu ordered that they be captured, and ordered that they be killed, and participated in their killing.

---

[178] See findings of the Chamber on Count 4.

713. The Chamber holds that these acts indeed render Akayesu individually criminally responsible for having ordered, committed, aided and abetted in the preparation or execution of the killings of members of the Tutsi group and the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of said group.

714. Regarding the allegations in paragraph 19, the Chamber is satisfied that it has been established that on or about 19 April 1994, Akayesu took from Taba communal prison eight refugees from Runda commune, handed them over to Interahamwe militiamen and ordered that they be killed. They were killed by the Interahamwe using various traditional weapons, including machetes and small axes, in front of the Bureau communal and in the presence of Akayesu who told the killers "do it quickly". The refugees were killed because they were Tutsi.

715. The Chamber holds that by virtue of such acts, Akayesu incurs individual criminal liability for having ordered, aided and abetted in the perpetration of the killings of members of the Tutsi group and in the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of said group.

716. The Prosecutor has proved that, as alleged in paragraph 20 of the Indictment, on that same day, Akayesu ordered the local people to kill intellectuals and to look for one Samuel, a professor who was then brought to the Bureau communal and killed with a machete blow to the neck. Teachers in Taba commune were killed later, on Akayesu's instructions. The victims included the following: Tharcisse Twizeyumuremye, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé whose name is unknown. They were killed on the road in front of the Bureau communal by the local people and the Interahamwe with machetes and agricultural tools. Akayesu personally witnessed the killing of Tharcisse.

717. In the opinion of the Chamber, Akayesu is indeed individually criminally responsible by virtue of such acts for having ordered, aided and abetted in the preparation or execution of the killings of members of the Tutsi group and in the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of said group.

718. The Chamber finds that the acts alleged in paragraph 21 have been proven. It has been established that on the evening of 20 April 1994, Akayesu, and two Interahamwe militiamen and a communal policeman, one Mugenzi, who was armed at the time of the events in question, went to the house of Victim Y, a 69 year old Hutu woman, to interrogate her on the whereabouts of Alexia , the wife of Professor Ntereye. During the questioning which took place in the presence of Akayesu, the victim was hit and beaten several times. In particular, she was hit with the barrel of a rifle on the head by the communal policeman. She was forcibly taken away and ordered by Akayesu to lie on the ground. Akayesu himself beat her on her back with a stick. Later on, he had her lie down in front of a vehicle and threatened to drive over her if she failed to give the information he sought.

719. Although the above acts constitute serious bodily and mental harm inflicted on the victim, the Chamber notes that they were committed against a Hutu woman. Consequently, they cannot constitute acts of genocide against the Tutsi group.

720. As regards the allegations in paragraphs 22 and 23 of the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that on the evening of 20 April 1994, in the course of an interrogation, Akayesu forced victim W to lay down in front of a vehicle and threatened to drive over her . That same evening, Akayesu, accompanied by Mugenzi, a communal policeman, and one Francois, an Interahamwe militiaman, interrogated victims Z and Y. The accused put his foot on the face of victim Z, causing the said victim to bleed, while the police officer and the militiaman beat the victim with the butt of their rifles. The militiaman forced victim Z to beat victim Y with a stick. The two victims were tied together, causing victim Z to suffocate. Victim Z was also beaten on the back with the blade of a machete.

721. The Chamber holds that by virtue of the above-mentioned acts Akayesu is individually criminally responsible for having ordered, committed, aided and abetted in the preparation or infliction of serious bodily or mental harm on members of the Tutsi group.

722. From the foregoing, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that Akayesu is individually criminally responsible, under Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the commission of the acts described above in the findings made by the Chamber on paragraphs 12, 12A, 12B, 16, 18, 19, 20, 22 and 23 of the Indictment, acts which constitute the killing of members of the Tutsi group and the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on members of said group.

723. Since the Prosecutor charged both genocide and complicity in genocide with respect to each of the above-mentioned acts, and since, as indicated supra, the Chamber is of the opinion that these charges are mutually exclusive, it must rule whether each of such acts constitutes genocide or complicity in genocide.

724. In this connection, the Chamber recalls that, in its findings on the applicable law, it held that an accused is an accomplice to genocide if he or she knowingly and wilfully aided or abetted or instigated another to commit a crime of genocide, while being aware of his genocidal plan, even where the accused had no specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. It also found that Article 6(1) of the Statute provides for a form of participation through aiding and abetting which, though akin to the factual elements of complicity, nevertheless entails, in and of itself, the individual responsibility of the accused for the crime of genocide, in particular, where the accused had the specific intent to commit genocide, that is, the intent to destroy a particular group; this latter requirement is not needed where an accomplice to genocide is concerned.

725. Therefore, it is incumbent upon the Chamber to decide, in this instant case, whether or not Akayesu had a specific genocidal intent when he participated in the above-mentioned crimes, that is, the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a group as such.

726. As stated in its findings on the law applicable to the crime of genocide, the Chamber holds the view that the intent underlying an act can be inferred from a number of facts[179]. The Chamber is of the opinion that it is possible to infer the genocidal intention that presided over the commission of a particular act, inter alia, from all acts or utterances of the accused, or from the general context in which other culpable acts were perpetrated systematically against the same group, regardless of whether such other acts were committed by the same perpetrator or even by other perpetrators.

727. First of all, regarding Akayesu's acts and utterances during the period relating to the acts alleged in the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, on the basis of all evidence brought to its attention during the trial, that on several occasions the accused made speeches calling, more or less explicitly, for the commission of genocide. The Chamber, in particular, held in its findings on Count 4, that the accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide. Yet, according to the Chamber, the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide lies in the intent to directly lead or provoke another to commit genocide, which implies that he who incites to commit genocide also has the specific intent to commit genocide: that is, to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.

728. Furthermore, the Chamber has already established that genocide was committed against the Tutsi group in Rwanda in 1994, throughout the period covering the events alleged in the Indictment[180]. Owing to the very high number of atrocities committed against the Tutsi, their widespread nature not only in the commune of Taba, but also throughout Rwanda, and to the fact that the victims were systematically and deliberately selected because they belonged to the Tutsi group, with persons belonging to other groups being excluded, the Chamber is also able to infer, beyond reasonable doubt, the genocidal intent of the accused in the commission of the above-mentioned crimes.

---

[1] See above the findings of the Trial Chamber on the law applicable to the crime of genocide.

[2] See above, the findings of the Trial Chamber on the occurrence of genocide against the Tutsi group in Rwanda in 1994.

729. With regard, particularly, to the acts described in paragraphs 12(A) and 12(B) of the Indictment, that is, rape and sexual violence, the Chamber wishes to underscore the fact that in its opinion, they constitute genocide in the same way as any other act as long as they were committed with the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a particular group, targeted as such. Indeed, rape and sexual violence certainly constitute infliction of serious bodily and mental harm on the victims[181] and are even, according to the Chamber, one of the worst ways of inflict harm on the victim as he or she suffers both bodily and mental harm. In light of all the evidence before it, the Chamber is satisfied that the acts of rape and sexual violence described above, were committed solely against Tutsi women, many of whom were subjected to the worst public humiliation, mutilated, and raped several times, often in public, in the Bureau Communal premises or in other public places, and often by more than one assailant. These rapes resulted in physical and psychological destruction of Tutsi women, their families and their communities. Sexual violence was an integral part of the process of destruction, specifically targeting Tutsi women and specifically contributing to their destruction and to the destruction of the Tutsi group as a whole.

730. The rape of Tutsi women was systematic and was perpetrated against all Tutsi women and solely against them. A Tutsi woman, married to a Hutu, testified before the Chamber that she was not raped because her ethnic background was unknown. As part of the propaganda campaign geared to mobilizing the Hutu against the Tutsi, the Tutsi women were presented as sexual objects. Indeed, the Chamber was told, for an example, that before being raped and killed, Alexia, who was the wife of the Professor, Ntereye, and her two nieces, were forced by the Interahamwe to undress and ordered to run and do exercises "in order to display the thighs of Tutsi women". The Interahamwe who raped Alexia said, as he threw her on the ground and got on top of her, "let us now see what the vagina of a Tutsi woman takes like". As stated above, Akayesu himself, speaking to the Interahamwe who were committing the rapes, said to them: "don't ever ask again what a Tutsi woman tastes like". This sexualized representation of ethnic identity graphically illustrates that tutsi women were subjected to sexual violence because they were Tutsi. Sexual violence was a step in the process of destruction of the tutsi group - destruction of the spirit, of the will to live, and of life itself.

731. On the basis of the substantial testimonies brought before it, the Chamber finds that in most cases, the rapes of Tutsi women in Taba, were accompanied with the intent to kill those women. Many rapes were perpetrated near mass graves where the women were taken to be killed . A victim testified that Tutsi women caught could be taken away by peasants and men with the promise that they would be collected later to be executed. Following an act of gang rape, a witness heard Akayesu say "tomorrow they will be killed" and they were actually killed. In this respect, it appears clearly to the Chamber that the acts of rape and sexual violence, as other acts of serious bodily and mental harm committed against the Tutsi, reflected the determination to make Tutsi women suffer and to mutilate them even before killing them, the intent being to destroy the Tutsi group while inflicting acute suffering on its members in the process.

---

[181] See above, the findings of the Trial Chamber on the Chapter relating to the law applicable to the crime of genocide, in particular, the definition of the constituent elements of genocide.

732. In light of the foregoing, the Chamber finds firstly that the acts described supra are indeed acts as enumerated in Article 2 (2) of the Statute, which constitute the factual elements of the crime of genocide, namely the killings of Tutsi or the serious bodily and mental harm inflicted on the Tutsi. The Chamber is further satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that these various acts were committed by Akayesu with the specific intent to destroy the Tutsi group, as such. Consequently, the Chamber is of the opinion that the acts alleged in paragraphs 12, 12A, 12B, 16, 18, 19, 20, 22 and 23 of the Indictment and proven above, constitute the crime of genocide, but not the crime of complicity; hence, the Chamber finds Akayesu individually criminally responsible for genocide.

7.9. Count 3 - Crimes against Humanity (extermination)

733. Count 3 of the indictment charges the Accused with crimes against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Article 3(b) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 12 to 23 of the indictment.

734. The definition of crimes against humanity, including the various elements that comprise the enumerated offences under Article 3 of the Statute have already been discussed.

735. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that during his search for Ephrem Karangwa on 19 April 1994, the Accused participated in the killing of Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra and Jean Chrysostome, by ordering their deaths and being present when they were killed.

736. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 19 April 1994, the Accused took eight detained refugees and handed them over to the local militia, known as the Interahamwe with orders that they be killed.

737. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Interahamwe and the local population, acting on the orders of the Accused killed five teachers namely; a professor known as Samuel; Tharcisse who was killed in the presence of the Accused; Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé.

738. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the eight refugees as well as Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra, Jean Chrysostome, Samuel, Tharcisse, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé were all civilians, taking no active part in the hostilities that prevailed in Rwanda in 1994 and the only reason they were killed is because they were Tutsi.

739. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of the eight refugees as well as Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra, Jean Chrysostome, Samuel, Tharcisse, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé, the Accused had the requisite intent to cause mass destruction, directed against certain groups of individuals, as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population of Rwanda on ethnic grounds.

740. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in ordering the killing of the eight refugees as well as Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra, Jean Chrysostome, Samuel, Tharcisse, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé, the Accused is individually criminally responsible for the death of these victims, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

741. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population in Rwanda on 19 April 1994 and the conduct of the Accused formed part of this attack.

742. Therefore the Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing of the eight refugees as well as Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligra, Jean Chrysostome, Samuel, Tharcisse, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé, constitute extermination committed, as part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population on ethnic grounds and as such constitutes a crime against humanity. Accordingly, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is guilty as charged in count 3 of the indictment.

8. VERDICT

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, having considered all of the evidence and the arguments, THE CHAMBER unanimously finds as follows:

Count 1:	Guilty of Genocide
Count 2:	Not guilty of Complicity in Genocide
Count 3:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Extermination)
Count 4:	Guilty of Direct and Public Incitement to Commit Genocide
Count 5:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Murder)
Count 6:	Not guilty of Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)
Count 7:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Murder)
Count 8:	Not guilty of Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)
Count 9:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Murder)
Count 10:	Not guilty of Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)
Count 11:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Torture)
Count 12:	Not guilty of Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions (Cruel Treatment)
Count 13:	Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Rape)

Count 14: Guilty of Crime against Humanity (Other Inhumane Acts)

Count 15: Not guilty of Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Article 4(2)(e) of Additional Protocol II (Outrage upon personal dignity, in particular Rape, Degrading and Humiliating Treatment and Indecent Assault)

Done in English and French,
Signed in Arusha, 2 September 1998,

Laïty Kama	Lennart Aspegren	Navanethem Pillay
Presiding Judge	Judge	Judge

(Seal of the Tribunal)

ANNEX 9:

Prosecutor v Kordic and Cerkez, Decision on the Joint Defence Motion to Dismiss the Amended Indictment for Lack of Jurisdiction Based on the Limited Jurisdictional Reach of Articles 2 and 3, Case No. IT-95-14/2-PT, Trial Chamber III, 2 March 1999.

UNITED NATIONS

International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991

Case No.: IT-95-14/2-PT

Date: 2 March 1999

Original: English

IN THE TRIAL CHAMBER

Before: Judge Richard May, Presiding
Judge Mohamed Bennouna
Judge Patrick Robinson

Registrar: Mrs. Dorothee de Sampayo Garrido-Nijgh

Decision of: 2 March 1999

PROSECUTOR

v.

DARIO KORDIJ
MARIO ČERKEZ

DECISION ON THE JOINT DEFENCE MOTION TO DISMISS THE AMENDED INDICTMENT FOR LACK OF JURISDICTION BASED ON THE LIMITED JURISDICTIONAL REACH OF ARTICLES 2 AND 3

The Office of the Prosecutor
Mr. Geoffrey Nice
Mr. Rodney Dixon

Counsel for the Accused
Mr. Mitko Naumovski, Mr. Leo Andreis, Mr. David F. Geneson, Mr. Turner T. Smith, Jr., and Ms. Ksenija Turkovi}, for Dario Kordi}

Mr. Bo`idar Kova~i}, for Mario Čerkez

I. INTRODUCTION

Pending before this Trial Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia Since 1991 ("the International Tribunal"), is the "Jurisdictional Motion #2 – Joint Defense Motion to Dismiss the Amended Indictment Based on the Limited Jurisdictional Reach of Articles 2 and 3" filed by counsel for the two accused, Dario Kordi} and Mario ^erkez, (together "the Defence") on 22 January 1999 ("the Defence Motion"). The Office of the Prosecutor ("Prosecution") responded to the Defence Motion on 5 February 1999 ("the Prosecutor's Response"). On 15 February 1999 the Defence filed an application for leave to file a reply to the Prosecutor's Response, with a "Joint Defence Reply in Support of Jurisdictional Motion #2" ("the Defence Reply") attached. The Defence application was granted orally on 16 February 1999.

THE TRIAL CHAMBER, HAVING CONSIDERED the written submissions and oral arguments of the parties heard on 16 February 1999, HEREBY ISSUES ITS WRITTEN DECISION.

II. SUBMISSIONS

A. Arguments of the Defence

1. The Defence challenges the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal on the grounds that:
   - first, the scope of Article 3 of the Statute of the International Tribunal ("Statute") is limited to matters covered by the "Hague law"[1], which is concerned with the conduct of hostilities, and therefore does not cover common article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions[2] and their Additional Protocols[3],
   - second, Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute are only applicable to international armed conflicts.

2. As to its first argument, the Defence requests that the Trial Chamber dismiss the counts of the indictment based on Article 3[4], or in the alternative, strike all references to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and Additional Protocols I and II. As to its second argument, the Defence requests the Trial Chamber to dismiss the charges brought under Articles 2 and 3 on the ground that there was no international armed conflict, at the time and place relevant to the indictment. In its brief, the Defence recognises that this second issue involves mixed questions of fact and law that may more properly be resolved at trial.

3. The Defence puts emphasis on the principle of nullum crimen sine lege[5], which underlies all of its arguments. Accordingly, it submits that the International Tribunal is only empowered to prosecute serious violations of international humanitarian law which are covered by the language of its Statute, and which beyond any doubt codify customary international law.

---

[1] 1907 Hague Convention IV Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, and annexed Regulations.
[2] 1949 Geneva Convention I for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field; 1949 Geneva Convention II for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea; 1949 Geneva Convention III Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War; 1949 Geneva Convention IV Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War ("Geneva Conventions").
[3] 1977 Geneva Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts; 1977 Geneva Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts ("Protocols").
[4] Counts 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 13, 16, 20, 24, 26, 28, 32, 34, 36.
[5] As referred to in paragraph 34 of the Report of the Secretary-General submitted pursuant to paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), and Annex thereto, U.N. Doc. S/25704 ("Report of the Secretary-General").

4. Starting with its second argument, and only addressing it briefly, the Defence submits that Article 2 of the Statute refers to the "grave breaches" provisions of the Geneva Conventions, and thus is only applicable to international conflicts. Likewise, it contends that Article 3 is based on the Hague Conventions, which are only applicable to international conflicts. In the opinion of the Defence, "at trial, the facts will show that there was no international armed conflict connected with the allegations in the Amended Indictment, that there was no armed conflict at all during a large part of the time period covered by such allegations..."[6].

6. As to its first contention, concerning the scope of Article 3 of the Statute, the Defence contends that Article 3 can be construed as referring to "Hague law" only (arguments relying on interpretation of the Security Council's intent), which is only applicable to international armed conflicts. The Defence further state that violations of common article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions cannot be included within the ambit of Article 3 of the Statute, as common article 3 is not part of customary international law and does not entail individual criminal responsibility. The Defence relies on a wide range of arguments and expands the argument to discuss the scope of Article 2 of the Statute as regards the requirement of the existence of an international conflict. It also discusses serious violations of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols.

7. The Defence inter alia relies on the following arguments, mainly discussing the Appeals Chamber Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction ("Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction") in the Tadi} case[7], which the Defence claims "is in serious fundamental and widely acknowledged error"[8]:

- Article 3 is based on "Hague law" and does not mention the type of conflict it is applicable to: if the intention of the drafters of the Statute was to render it applicable also to internal conflicts, it would have been specifically mentioned, since "Hague law" is traditionally only applicable to international conflicts;
- The conclusion of the Appeals Chamber as to the residual character of Article 3, and its broad interpretation of the scope of Article 3, based on its interpretation of the term "international humanitarian law", is in violation of the principle of legality;

---

[6] Joint Defence Motion to dismiss the amended indictment for lack of jurisdiction based on the limited jurisdictional reach of Articles 2 and 3 ("Defence Motion").
[7] Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Prosecutor v. Du{ko Tadi}, Case IT-94-1-AR72, A. Ch., 2 Oct. 1995 ("Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction").
[8] Unofficial transcript of the hearing on 16 February 1999, pp. 472-73.

5526

- The Security Council did not intend to criminalize through Article 3 of the Statute all violations of international humanitarian law not covered by the other subject-matter Articles of the Statute;
- The Security Council intended a distinction between "Hague law" and "Geneva law": referring to the approach taken by the Statute of the International Criminal Court ("ICC Statute"), the Defence asserts that it is "a completely novel approach, which has no basis in customary law."
- The statements of certain Security Council's members after the Security Council approved the Statute, to which the Appeals Chamber referred to support its conclusion, "do not reflect the Security Council intent" and only constitute "carefully manufactured ex post facto legislative history";
- The Appeals Chamber's conclusion is not supported by commentators;
- The Appeals Chamber's conclusions (as to all infringements of provisions of Geneva Conventions other than grave breaches being part of customary law; serious breaches of the Geneva Conventions and certain Hague rules being applicable to non-international conflicts; common article 3 and Additional Protocol II not being part of customary law; common article 3 being applicable to international as well as to internal conflicts) are not justified under customary law and "represent progressive development of law"; the Defence further contends that the Appeals Chamber instead of relying on State practice "relied principally on perceived changes in opinio juris",
- Provisions of common article 3, Additional Protocol II, serious breaches of the Geneva Conventions, and violations of certain Hague rules, do not entail individual criminal responsibility, and thus cannot fall within the scope of the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal;
- The standard established by the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") in its Decision in the Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua, ("Nicaragua Decision")[9], as relied on by the Trial Chamber in its Judgement in the Tadi} case[10], should be applied by this Chamber to assess the existence of an international armed conflict.

5. In the Defence Reply, the Defence discusses the Prosecution argument that the Trial Chamber is bound by the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, and responds to the submissions as to the proper interpretation of Article 3 of the Statute and the applicability of the Nicaragua Decision to the present case.

[9] (Nicar. v U.S.) (Merits) 1986 I.C.J. Reports, 14.

5527

B. Arguments of the Prosecution

8. The Prosecution submits two arguments in support of its contention that the Defence Motion should be denied.

(a) A decision as to the scope of Article 3 of the Statute, discussing and rejecting the same arguments as those raised by the Defence, has already been rendered by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} case. The Trial Chamber is bound by this decision and should uphold it. The Prosecution refers to paragraphs 87-89, 90-94, 103, 127, 134, and 143 of the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction.

(b) The Defence "offers no compelling arguments for limiting the scope of Article 3 to the offences listed in the Statute." In support of its arguments, the Prosecution inter alia states the following:

- "all of the rules incorporated in Article 3 must either have been part of customary law or conventional law, binding on the parties, at the time the offences were committed". Thus common article 3 and Additional Protocols I and II "fall within the scope of Article 3 on the basis that they are clearly part of customary law, and in any event are binding on the parties as a matter of treaty law."

- The Defence arguments that the Security Council did not intend Article 3 to cover more than the Hague law are erroneous. Statements of members of the Security Council "demonstrate that the Council intended Article 3 to incorporate a broad range of offences", and the fact that no other members disagreed "adds extra weight to the interpretative value of the statements."

- "An expansive interpretation of Article 3 is justified by taking account of the context of the Statute as a whole". "Laws and customs of war" cover in fact "violations of international humanitarian law", which refer to "all violations of the rules of international and internal armed conflict."

- The Security Council intended to put an end to all serious violations of international humanitarian law, not just grave breaches and the Hague law.

---

[10] Opinion and Judgment, Prosecutor v. Du{ko Tadi}, Case No. IT-94-1, T.Ch. II, 7 May 1997.

- Even though common article 3 provides that it applies to non-international armed conflicts, the rules contained "within" common article 3 are applicable to all conflicts as a matter of customary law.
- The fact that a treaty provision or rule itself does not mention criminal liability will not preclude punishment for breaches thereof (referring to the Nürnberg Judgment[11]).
- The issue of the correct standard for assessing whether an international conflict exists, argued by the Defence which relied on the Nicaragua Decision, "is a legal dispute to be litigated at trial in relation to the facts of the case." The Prosecution submits that the "precise elements and proof of this requirement can only be determined at trial." The Prosecution further disputes the Defence contention that the Nicaragua Decision establishes the correct standard for assessing the existence of an international armed conflict.

[11] Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nuremberg, Germany (1947).

III. DISCUSSION

A. Applicable law

9. Both parties rely on Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute, which provide as follows:

Article 2
Grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949

The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, namely the following acts against persons or property protected under the provisions of the relevant Geneva Convention:

(a) wilful killing;
(b) torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments;
(c) wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health;
(d) extensive destruction and appropriation of property, not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly;
(e) compelling a prisoner of war or a civilian to serve in the forces of a hostile power;
(f) wilfully depriving a prisoner of war or a civilian of the rights of fair and regular trial;
(g) unlawful deportation or transfer or unlawful confinement of a civilian;
(h) taking civilians as hostages.

Article 3
Violations of the laws or customs of war

The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons violating the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to:

(a) employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering;
(b) wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity;
(c) attack, or bombardment, by whatever means, of undefended towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings;
(d) seizure of, destruction or wilful damage done to institutions dedicated to religion, charity and education, the arts and sciences, historic monuments and works of art and science;
(e) plunder of public or private property.

5530

10. Common article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, as well as Articles 51(2) and 52(1) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II are also relevant to the issue at hand:

Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions

In the case of an armed conflict not of an international character occuring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, each Party to the conflict shall be bound to apply, as a minimum the following provisions:
(1) Persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria.
To this end the following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever with respect to the above-mentioned persons:
(a) violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture;
(b) taking of hostages;
(c) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment;
(d) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples.
(2) The wounded and the sick shall be collected and cared for.
...

Additional Protocol I
Article 51
Protection of the civilian population

1. ...

2. The civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. Acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.

3. ...

Additional Protocol I
Article 52
General protection of civilian objects

1. Civilian objects shall not be the object of attack or of reprisals. Civilian objects are all objects which are not military objectives as defined in paragraph 2.

2. ...

5531

Additional Protocol II
Article 13
Protection of the civilian population

1. ...
2. The civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. Acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.
3. ...

11. Both parties also rely on paragraphs 89, 91, 94, 103, 127, 134 and 143 of the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction.

B. Analysis

12. This Trial Chamber is of the view that it may not disregard a previous ruling of the Appeals Chamber that has already discussed in depth most of the arguments presently put forward by the Defence, and in this regard it notes the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction. The Trial Chamber has nonetheless carefully reviewed the arguments presented by the Defence in support of its Motion, as well as the arguments submitted by the Prosecution in response.

13. The Trial Chamber will first address the second argument of the Defence as to the applicability of Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute to international armed conflicts, before turning to its first argument concerning the scope of Article 3 of the Statute.

14. As to the argument concerning Article 2 of the Statute raised in the Defence Motion, this is not, as argued by the Defence during the hearing, an issue of scope only, which can be addressed at the pre-trial stage, as the arguments of the Defence also pertain to the applicability of Article 2 insofar as they relate to the existence of an international armed conflict. The Defence contends that "at trial, the facts will show that there was no international armed conflict connected with the allegations in the amended indictment"[12]. The Defence itself acknowledges that the Trial Chamber "may choose to defer factual determinations at trial". The Trial Chamber is of the view that this is an issue that will be more properly addressed at trial as it depends on the assessment of a factual situation which can only be properly made after hearing the evidence submitted by both parties.

[12] Defence Motion, supra n. 6, at p. 3.

15. According to the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal, Article 2 of the Statute is applicable to international armed conflicts. This is not put into question here, although the Appeals Chamber in the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction and Trial Chamber II in Prosecutor v. Delali} et al.[13] did not exclude the possibility that customary law may be evolving to apply the system of grave breaches to internal conflicts as well. However, the question of the applicability of Article 2 of the Statute in the present case is an issue that will be addressed at trial, as this Trial Chamber is not in a position, at this stage of the proceedings, to decide whether to dismiss or not charges brought under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute on the ground that there was no international armed conflict in Central Bosnia at the time and place relevant to the indictment[14].

16. The Trial Chamber is also of the opinion that the applicable standard to assess the existence of an international armed conflict, and in particular whether, as argued by the Defence, the standard set out in the Nicaragua Decision should be applied, should not be discussed at this stage but would be more properly addressed at trial, as suggested by the Prosecution.

17. As to the scope of Article 3 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber is of the view that it is not necessary to respond to all the arguments raised by the Defence, as it finds that the relevant main issue as to the scope of Article 3 of the Statute at this stage, is, as stated in the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, whether the relevant norms are customary in nature, and whether they entail individual criminal responsibility[15].

18. In the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, the Appeals Chamber held that Article 3 "is a general clause covering all violations of humanitarian law not falling under Article 2 or covered by Articles 4 and 5"[16], and that it "functions as a residual clause designed to ensure that no serious violation of international humanitarian law is taken away from the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. Article 3 aims to make such jurisdiction watertight and inescapable."[17] The

---

[13] Judgement, Prosecutor v. Delali} et al., Case No. IT-96-21, T.Ch. II, 16 Nov. 1998 ("^elebi}i Judgement") at para. 202.
[14] Defence Motion, supra n. 6, at p. 3.
[15] It is not appropriate to discuss the other criteria set out by the Appeals Chamber in paragraph 94 of the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction at this pre-trial stage, as they involve questions of facts.
[16] Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, supra n. 7, at para. 89.
[17] Ibid., at para. 91.

Appeals Chamber then went on to spell out four requirements that must be met in order for a violation of international humanitarian law to be subject to Article 3 of the Statute[18].

19. To support its argument that the Appeals Chamber Decision is in error, the Defence relies on the Report of the Secretary-General and, in particular on paragraph 34: "...the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law...".

20. The Trial Chamber agrees that the principle of legality is the underlying principle that should be relied on to assess the subject-matter jurisdiction of the International Tribunal, and that the International Tribunal only has jurisdiction over offences that constituted crimes under customary international law at the time the alleged offences were committed. Thus the arguments of the parties were examined in the light of this principle.

21. As stated by the Appeals Chamber in the Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, Article 3 of the Statute has a "residual character"[19]. It means, practically, that Article 3 covers the list of offences enumerated in the provision as well as other serious violations of international humanitarian law provided they are customary in nature and entail individual criminal responsibility. Thus, Article 3 is not only based on conventional rules, such as the Hague Conventions, which are now part of customary law, but also "refers" to customary international law.

22. Indeed, this interpretation of the scope of Article 3 concerned with the "Violations of the laws or customs of war" is consistent with contemporary customary law as it stood at the time the alleged offences were committed. This is evidenced by the codification process that has taken place in the last decades since the adoption of the Hague Conventions in 1907. Violations of the laws or customs of war encompass what is called "war crimes" in contemporary customary law. It follows that the term "Violations of the laws or customs of war" cannot be limited to "Hague Law". It is encompassed in the larger "generic" term of "war crimes", as is evidenced by the codification of the notion of war crimes. The term "war crimes" is now considered as covering violations of customary norms of humanitarian law entailing individual criminal responsibility. It encompasses both grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and violations of the laws and customs of war.

---

[18] See Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, supra n. 7, at para. 94.

5534

23. That this was the approach taken by the drafters of the Statute of the International Tribunal has subsequently been confirmed by the work of the United Nations International Law Commission ("ILC") on the draft Statute of an International Criminal Court ("draft ICC Statute") adopted in 1994. The draft ICC Statute listed among the offences subject to the jurisdiction of the Court "serious violations of the laws and customs of war applicable in armed conflicts". In its commentary under Article 20 entitled "Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court", the Commission stated that subparagraph (c) concerning "serious violations of the laws and customs of war applicable in armed conflicts" reflects the provisions contained in Article 2 and 3 of the International Tribunal, adding the "Commission shares the widespread view that there exists the category of war crimes in customary international law. That category overlaps with but is not identical to the category of grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol I of 1977."[20] It is also worth mentioning Article 85(5) of Additional Protocol I which states that grave breaches are to be regarded as war crimes. This can be considered as reflecting a consensus among the States participating in the 1977 Diplomatic Conference that adopted the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions, that it is accepted that "war crimes" is a broad category, and that it covers crimes based on Geneva rules as well as crimes based on Hague rules.

24. The Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted by the ILC in 1996 contains Article 20 concerned with "War crimes". The Commission stated in its report that although it retained the expression "war crimes" as the title of the provision, the "expressions 'violations of laws and customs of war' and 'violations of the rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflicts' are ... also used in the body of the report"[21]. According to the ILC, war crimes in the context of Article 20 refer, among others, to violations covered by the 1907 Hague Convention and annexed Regulations, the grave breaches provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol I, violations of common article 3 of the four 1949 Geneva Conventions, and to Additional Protocol II.

25. This is finally illustrated by Article 8 of the ICC Statute adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998. It is entitled "War Crimes", and covers both "grave breaches" of the Geneva Convention and [19] "caractère supplétif" in French.

---

[20] Commentary under Article 20 of the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court at page 74, in Report of the I.L.C. on the work of its Forty-ninth Session, (1994) G.A.O.R., 49th sess., Supp. No. 10, U.N. Doc. A/49/10.
[21] Commentary under Article 20 of the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, in Report of the I.L.C. on the work of its Forty-ninth session (1996), G.A.O.R., A/51/10.

violations of the laws and customs of war. The ICC Statute subjects to individual criminal responsibility violations of common article 3. It can be considered as reaffirming without any doubt a customary norm. Further, it is accepted that fundamental norms of international humanitarian law that are customary in nature are applicable to all types of armed conflicts, excluding situations of internal disturbances and tensions.

26. As also pointed out by the Prosecution, the customary status of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which requires that parties abide by certain minimum fundamental humanitarian standards, was confirmed by the International Court of Justice in the Nicaragua case in 1986. The Court held:

> Article 3 which is common to all four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 defines certain rules to be applied in the armed conflicts of a non-international character. There is no doubt that, in the event of international armed conflicts, these rules also constitute a minimum yardstick, in addition to the more elaborate rules which are also to apply to international conflicts; and they are rules which, in the Court's opinion, reflect what the Court in 1949 called 'elementary considerations of humanity' (Corfu Channel, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22).[22]

27. In its Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons[23], the International Court of Justice also confirmed the customary nature of the Hague and Geneva law. The Court stated:

> It is undoubtedly because a great many rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict are so fundamental to the respect of the human person and "elementary considerations of humanity" (...), that the Hague and Geneva Conventions have enjoyed a broad accession. Further these fundamental rules are to be observed by all States whether or not they have ratified the conventions that contain them, because they constitute intransgressible principles of international customary law.

28. The scope of Article 3 of the Statute, and the customary status of certain provisions of humanitarian law are also addressed in the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal. As noted in the ^elebi}i Judgement, the Report of the Secretary-General made reference to specified particular norms of humanitarian law as being incorporated in custom: "Included in these are the four Geneva Conventions of 1949, with no mention of the exclusion of certain of their provisions, such as common article 3."[24] In a recent judgement, in Prosecutor v. Furund`ija, the Trial Chamber also

---

[22] Nicaragua Decision, supra n. 9. para. 218.
[23] 8 July 1996, at paragraph 79.
[24] ^elebi}i Judgement, supra n. 13, at para. 305.

discussed the scope of Article 3 of the Statute in relation to, among others, Geneva law. It found that "torture", which is, inter alia, mentioned in common article 3, is covered by Article 3 of the Statute, even though it is not specifically prohibited under the Article[25].

29. The Defence refers to statements made by certain members of the Security Council after the vote on the establishment of the International Tribunal, stating that it is not possible to rely on them to assess the scope of Article 3 of the Statute, as they can only be considered as "carefully manufactured ex post facto legislative history". In the Trial Chamber's view, this argument cannot stand, since these statements can be considered as an important part of the legislative history of the Statute and due account may be taken of them in assessing the scope of Article 3.

30. Besides common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, the Defence also disputes that Additional Protocols I and II to the Geneva Conventions are part of customary law, and therefore argues that the International Tribunal is not competent to prosecute persons charged under these provisions. While both Protocols have not yet achieved the near universal participation enjoyed by the Geneva Conventions, it is not controversial that major parts of both Protocols reflect customary law.

31. It is not appropriate at this stage to embark on a general assessment of the customary status of the Additional Protocols as a whole, as suggested by the Defence arguments. It is sufficient here only to address the provisions of Additional Protocols I and II specifically referred to in the indictment. Counts 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the indictment against Dario Kordi} and Mario ^erkez refer specifically to Articles 51(2) and 52(1) of Additional Protocol I, and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II. These provisions concern unlawful attacks on civilians or civilian objects and are based on Hague law relating to the conduct of warfare, which is considered as part of customary law. To the extent that these provisions of the Additional Protocols echo the Hague Regulations, they can be considered as reflecting customary law. It is indisputable that the general prohibition of attacks against the civilian population and the prohibition of indiscriminate attacks or attacks on civilian objects are generally accepted obligations[26]. As a consequence, there is no possible doubt as to the customary status of these specific provisions as they reflect core principles of humanitarian law that can be considered as applying to all armed conflicts, whether intended to apply to international or non-international conflicts.

---

[25] Judgement, Prosecutor v. Anto Furund`ija, Case No. IT-95-17/1, T.Ch. II, 10 Dec. 1998, at para. 158.

32. The Trial Chamber will now address the requirement that a customary rule should entail individual criminal responsibility in order to be included in the scope of Article 3 of the Statute. That serious violations of both the Geneva Conventions, outside of the grave breaches provisions, and Hague law entail individual criminal responsibility has, for instance, been recognised by most States when enacting domestic legislation, including the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The ILC also stated in 1994, as to the Draft ICC Statute, that it is "not its function to define new crimes", thereby acknowledging the prior existence of the offences listed in Article 20 as crimes under customary law. While acknowledging that not every violation of the rules of international humanitarian law is a war crime, it is generally accepted that serious violations of both Geneva and Hague law entail individual criminal responsibility.

33. There can be no doubt that common article 3, and the relevant provisions of Additional Protocols I and II, constitute an appropriate basis to prosecute individuals. As already discussed in the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal, from which this Trial Chamber sees no reason to depart, common article 3 is considered as entailing individual criminal responsibility. Also, as was mentioned before, the relevant provisions of the Protocols are based on Hague law. The Charter of the International Military Tribunal at Nürnberg accepted individual criminal responsibility for violations of Hague rules although the Hague Conventions did not contain specific provisions on individual criminal responsibility. This was subsequently reaffirmed in the Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürenberg Tribunal and in the Judgement of the Tribunal ("Nürenberg Principles") adopted by the ILC in 1950[27].

34. To conclude, this Trial Chamber is in no doubt that common article 3 and the relevant above-mentioned provisions of Additional Protocols I and II, to which counts 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 13, 16, 20, 24, 26, 28, 32, 34 and 36[28] refer, are covered by Article 3 of the Statute. The principle of legality relied on by the Defence and referred to by the Secretary-General in his Report is respected, and the above-mentioned counts are legally founded. The Trial Chamber has jurisdiction to try the accused Dario Kordi} and Mario ^erkez for alleged violations under Article 3 of the Statute.

---

[26] See Appeals Chamber Jurisdiction Decision, supra n. 7, at paras 117-120.
[27] Nürenberg Principles, Ybk I.L.C., 1950, Vols I and II.
[28] Other counts under Article 3 do not refer to provisions not specifically mentioned in the Statute.

IV. DISPOSITION

For the foregoing reasons

PURSUANT TO Rule 72 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal,

THE TRIAL CHAMBER DISMISSES the Joint Defense Motion to Dismiss the Amended Indictment Based on the Limited Jurisdictional Reach of Articles 2 and 3.

Done in English and French, the English text being authoritative.

Richard May
Presiding

Dated this second day of March 1999
At The Hague
The Netherlands

[Seal of the Tribunal]

ANNEX 10:

Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana, Judgement, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, Trial Chamber II, 21 May 1999.

5540

United Nations
Nations Unies

International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
Tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda

Before:
Judge William H. Sekule, Presiding
Judge Yakov A. Ostrovsky
Judge Tafazzal Hossain Khan

Registrar:
Mr. Agwu U. Okali

Decision of: 21 May 1999

THE PROSECUTOR versus CLÉMENT KAYISHEMA
and
OBED RUZINDANA

Case No. ICTR-95-1-T

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:
Mr. Jonah Rahetlah
Ms. Brenda Sue Thornton
Ms. Holo Makwaia

Counsel for Clément Kayishema:
Mr. André Ferran
Mr. Philippe Moriceau

Counsel for Obed Ruzindana:
Mr. Pascal Besnier
Mr. Willem Van der Griend

List of Contents

I. INTRODUCTION

1.1 The Tribunal and its Jurisdiction
1.2 The Indictment

5541

1.3 The Accused
1.4 Procedural Background of the Case

II. Historical Context of the 1994 Events in Rwanda

III. EVIDENTIARY MATTERS

3.1 Equality of Arms
3.2 Reliability of Eyewitnesses
3.3 Witness Statements
3.4 Specificity of the Indictment

IV. THE LAW

4.1 Genocide
4.2 Crimes Against Humanity
4.3 Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II, thereto
4.4 Criminal Responsibility, Articles 6(1) and 6(3)

V. FACTUAL FINDINGS

5.1 Alibi
5.2 Did Genocide Occur in Rwanda and Kibuye in 1994?
5.3 An Introduction: The Massacres at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean Complex, Stadium in Kibuye Town and the Church in Mubuga
5.4 The Massacres in the Area of Bisesero

VI. LEGAL FINDINGS

6.1 Kayishema's Command Responsibility
6.2 Genocide
6.3 Crimes Against Humanity
6.4 Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

VII. Cumulative Charges

VIII. The Verdict

Sentencing Order

Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Khan regarding the Verdicts under Charges of Crimes Against Humanity/Murder and Crimes Against Humanity/Murder

Dissenting Opinion

5542

I. INTRODUCTION

1.1 THE TRIBUNAL AND ITS JURISDICTION
1.2 THE INDICTMENT
1.3 THE ACCUSED
1.4 PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND OF THE CASE

1.1 The Tribunal and its Jurisdiction

1. This Judgement is rendered by Trial Chamber II of the International Tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for the serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January and 31 December 1994 (the Tribunal). The Judgement follows the Indictment and the joint trial of Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana.

2. The Tribunal was established by the United Nations Security Council's Resolution 955 of 8 November 1994.[1] After official investigations, the Security Council found indications of wide spread violations of international humanitarian law and concluded that the situation in that country in 1994 constituted a threat to international peace and security within the meaning of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, thus giving rise to the establishment of the Tribunal.

3. The Tribunal is governed by its Statute (the Statute), annexed to the Security Council Resolution 955, and by its Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the Rules), adopted by the Judges on 5 July 1995 and amended subsequently.[2] The Judges of the Tribunal, currently fourteen in all, are selected by the General Assembly and represent the principal legal systems of the world.

4. The ratione materiae jurisdiction of the Tribunal is set out in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute. Under the Statute, the Tribunal is empowered to prosecute persons who are alleged to have committed Genocide, as defined in Article 2, persons responsible for Crimes Against Humanity, as defined in Article 3 and persons responsible for serious violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the Protection of Victims of War, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977, a crime defined under Article 4 of the Tribunal's Statute.[3] Article 8 of the Statute provides that the Tribunal has concurrent jurisdiction with national courts over which, however, it has primacy. The temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal is limited to acts committed from 1 January 1994 to 31 December 1994.

5. Finally, the Statute stipulates that the Prosecutor, who acts as a separate organ of the Tribunal, is responsible for the investigation and prosecution of the perpetrators of such violations. The Prosecutor is assisted by a Deputy Prosecutor, a team of senior trial attorneys, trial attorneys, and investigators based in Kigali, Rwanda.

5543

5544

1.2 The Indictment

The amended Indictment, against the accused persons, is reproduced, in full, below.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA

CASE NO: ICTR-95-1-1 (sic)

THE PROSECUTOR OF THE TRIBUNAL

AGAINST

CLEMENT KAYISHEMA
OBED RUZINDANA

[Registry date stamped
11 April 1997]

First Amended Indictment

Richard J. Goldstone, Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, pursuant to his authority under Article 17 of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (Tribunal Statute), charges:

1. This indictment charges persons responsible for the following massacres which occurred in the Prefecture of Kibuye, Republic of Rwanda:

   1.1 The massacre at the Catholic Church and the Home St. Jean complex in Kibuye town, where thousands of men, women and children were killed and numerous people injured around 17 April 1994.

   1.2 The massacre at the Stadium in Kibuye town, where thousands of men, women and children were killed and numerous people injured on about 18 and 19 April 1994.

   1.3 The massacre at the Church in Mubuga, where thousands of men, women and children were killed and numerous people injured between about 14 and 17 April 1994.

   1.4 The massacres in the area of Bisesero, where thousands of men, women and children were killed and numerous people injured between about 10 April and 30 June 1994.

5545

THE MASSACRES SITES

2. The Republic of Rwanda is divided into eleven Prefectures. These eleven Prefectures are further divided into communes. The Prefecture of Kibuye consists of nine communes. The massacres which form the basis of the charges in the indictment occurred in the Prefecture of Kibuye, in Gitesi, Gishyita and Gisovu communes.

3. The first massacre site addressed in this indictment, namely, the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean complex, is located in Kibuye town, Gitesi commune, on a piece of land which is surrounded on three sides by Lake Kivu. A road runs past the entrance to the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean complex. The Catholic Church is visible from the road. The Home St. Jean is behind the Church and is not visible from the road.

4. The second massacre site addressed to in this indictment, the Stadium, is located near the main traffic circle in Kibuye town, Gitesi Commune. The town's main road runs past the Stadium. Immediately behind the Stadium is a high hill.

5. The third massacre site addressed in this indictment, the Church of Mubuga, is located in Gishyita Commune. Gishyita Commune is located in the southern part of Kibuye Prefecture. The Church in Mubuga is located approximately 20 kilometres from Kibuye town.

6. The fourth massacre site addressed in this indictment is the area of Bisesero. The area of Bisesero extends through two communes in the Prefecture of Kibuye: Gishyita and Gisovu. Bisesero is an area of high rolling hills, located in the southern portion of Kibuye Prefecture. The hills are very large, and are often separated by deep valleys.

BACKGROUND

7. The structure of the executive branch, and the authority of the members therein, is set forth in the laws of Rwanda. In the Prefecture, the Prefect is the highest local representative of the government, and is the trustee of the State Authority. The Prefect has control over the government and its agencies throughout the Prefecture.

8. In each commune within a Prefecture there exists the council of the commune, which is led by the Bourgmestre of that Commune. The Bourgmestre of each commune is nominated by the Minister of the Interior and appointed by the President. As representative of the executive power, the Bourgmestre is subject to the hierarchical authority of the Prefect, but, subject to this authority, the Bourgmestre is in charge of governmental functions within his commune.

9. The Prefect is responsible for maintaining the peace, public order, and security of persons and goods within the Prefecture. In fulfilling his duty to maintain peace, the Prefect can demand assistance from the army and the Gendarmerie Nationale. The Bourgmestre also has authority over those members of the Gendarmerie Nationale stationed in his commune.

10. The Gendarmerie Nationale is an armed force established to maintain the public order and execute the laws. It is lead by the Minister of Defence, but can exercise its function of safeguarding the public order at the request of the competent national authority, which is the Prefect. The Gendarmerie Nationale has an affirmative duty to report to the Prefect information which has a bearing on the public order, as well as a duty to assist any person who, being in danger, requests its assistance. From January - July 1994, there were approximately 200 gendarmes in the Prefecture of Kibuye.

5546

11. The members of the executive branch also have control over the communal police. Each commune has Police Communale, who are engaged by the Bourgmestre of the commune. Normally the Bourgmestre has exclusive authority over the members of the Police Communale. In case of public calamities, however, the Prefect can claim the policemen of the Police Communale and place them under his direct control.

12. The Interahamwe, an unofficial paramilitary group composed almost exclusively of extremist Hutus, had significant involvement in the events charged in this indictment. The National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND) party created the members of the Interahamwe as a military training organisation for MRND youth and based the members of the Interahamwe's leadership on the MRND's own structure, with leaders at the national, prefectoral, and communal levels. There was no official link between the Interahamwe and the Rwandan military, but members of the Army and Presidential Guard trained, guided and supported the Interahamwe. Occasionally, members of the Army or Presidential Guard participated in Interahamwe activities.

13. On 6 April 1994, the airplane carrying then-president of Rwanda Juvenal Habyarimana crashed during its approach into Kigali airport in Rwanda. Almost immediately, the massacre of civilians began throughout Rwanda. During that time, individuals seeking Tutsis were able to focus their activities on specific locations because Tutsis, who believed themselves to be in danger, often fled in large numbers to perceived safe areas such as churches and communal buildings. This practice, which was widely known, was based on the fact that in the past Tutsis who had sought refuge in such places had not been attacked. Thus, during the period of time relevant to this indictment, groups of people seeking refuge in the same area were most likely predominantly Tutsis.

14. Also, during the times relevant to this indictment, the Rwandan government required all Rwandans to carry, at all times, identity cards that designated the bearer's status as Hutu, Tutsi, Twa or "naturalised". Individuals seeking Tutsis could identify their targets simply by asking individuals to show their identification card.

GENERAL ALLEGATIONS

15. All acts of (sic) omissions by the accused set forth in this indictment occurred during the period of 1 January 1994 to 31 December 1994 and in the territory of the Republic of Rwanda.

16. In each paragraph charging genocide, a crime recognised by Article 2 of the Tribunal Statute, the alleged acts or omissions were committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, an ethnic or racial group.

17. In each paragraph charging crimes against humanity, crimes recognised by Article 3 of the Tribunal Statute, the alleged acts or omissions were part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on political, ethnic or racial grounds.

18. At all times relevant to this indictment, the victims referred to in this indictment were protected under Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and by the Additional Protocol II thereto.

19. At all times relevant to this indictment, there was an internal armed conflict occurring within Rwanda.

20. At all times relevant to this indictment, Clement Kayishema was Prefect of Kibuye and exercised control over the Prefecture of Kibuye, including his subordinates in the executive branch and members of the Gendarmerie Nationale.

21. Each of the accused is individually responsible for the crimes alleged against him in this indictment, pursuant to Article 6 (1) of the Tribunal Statute. Individual responsibility includes planning, instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation and execution of any of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Tribunal Statute.

22. In addition, Clement Kayishema is also or alternatively individually responsible as a superior for the criminal acts of his subordinates in the administration, the Gendarmerie Nationale, and the communal police with respect to each of the crimes charged, pursuant to Article 6 (3) of the Tribunal Statute. Superior individual responsibility is the responsibility of a superior for the acts of his subordinate if he knew or had reasons to know that his subordinate was about to commit such criminal acts or had done so and failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts, or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

THE ACCUSED

23. Clement Kayishema was born in 1954 in Bwishyura Sector, Gitesi Commune, Kibuye Prefecture, Rwanda. Kayishema's father was Jean Baptiste Nabagiziki, and his mother was Anastasie Nyirabakunzi. He was appointed to the position of Prefect of Kibuye on 3 July 1992, and assumed his responsibility as Prefect soon after. Clement Kayishema acted as Prefect of Kibuye until his departure to Zaire in July 1994. He is believed to be currently in Bukavu, Zaire.

24. Obed Ruzindana is believed to have been borne around 1962 in Gisovu Sector, Gisovu Commune, Kibuye Prefecture, Rwanda. Ruzindana's father was Elie Murakaza. Obed Ruzindana was a commercial trader in Kigali during the time period in which the crimes alleged in this indictment occurred. He is believed to be currently somewhere in Zaire.

The Massacre at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean

COUNTS 1-6

25. By about 17 April 1994, thousands of men, women and children from various locations had sought refuge in the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean complex (the Complex) located in Kibuye town. These men, women and children were unarmed and were predominantly Tutsis. They were in the complex seeking protection from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.

26. Some of the people who sought refuge in the Complex did so because Clement Kayishema ordered them to go there. When Clement Kayishema ordered people to the Complex, he knew or had reason to know that an attack on the complex was going to occur.

27. After people gathered in the Complex, the Complex was surrounded by persons under Clement Kayishema's control, including members of the Gendarmerie Nationale. These persons prevented the men, women and children within the Complex from leaving the Complex at a time when

5548

Clement Kayishema knew or had reason to know that an attack on the Complex was going to

28. On about 17 April 1994, Clement Kayishema ordered members of the Gendarmerie Nationale, communal police of Gitesi commune, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to attack the Complex, and personally participated in the attack. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, cudgels and other weapons to kill the people in the Complex.

29. The attack resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to the people within the complex. (Attachment A contains a list of some of the individuals killed in the attack, members of the Gendarmerie Nationale, the Interahamwe and armed civilians searched for and killed or injured survivors of the attack.

30. Before the attack on the Complex, Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent an attack, and after the attack Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators.

31. By these acts and omissions, Clement Kayishema is criminally responsible for:

Count 1: GENOCIDE, a violation of Article 2 (3) (a) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 2: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (a) (murder) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 3: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (b) (extermination) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 4: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (i) (other inhumane acts) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 5: A VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute; and

Count 6: A VIOLATION OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute.

The Massacre at the Stadium in Kibuye Town

COUNTS 7 – 12

32. By about 18 April 1994, thousands of men, women and children from various locations had sought refuge in the Stadium located in Kibuye town. These men, women and children were unarmed and were predominantly Tutsis. They were in the Stadium seeking refuge from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.

33. Some of the people who sought refuge in the Stadium did so because Clement Kayishema ordered them to go there. When Clement Kayishema ordered people to go to the Stadium, he knew or had reason to know that an attack on the Stadium was going to occur.

34. After people gathered in the Stadium, the Stadium was surrounded by persons under Clement Kayishema's control, including members of the Gendarmerie Nationale. These persons prevented the men, women and children within the Stadium from leaving the Stadium at a time when

5549

Clement Kayishema knew or had reason to know that an attack on the Complex (sic) was occur.

35. On or about 18 April 1994, Clement Kayishema, went to Stadium and ordered the Gendarmerie Nationale, the communal police of Gitesi Commune, the members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to attack the Stadium. Clement Kayishema initiated the attack himself by firing a gun into the air. In addition, Clement Kayishema personally participated in the attack. The attackers used guns, grenades, pangas, machetes, spears, cudgels and other weapons to kill the people in the Stadium. There were survivors of the attack on 18 April 1994. During the night of 18 April 1994 and the morning of 19 April 1994 gendarmes surrounding the Stadium prevented the survivors from leaving. The attack on the Stadium continued on 19 April 1994. Throughout the attacks, men, women and children attempting to flee the attacks were killed.

36. The two days of attacks resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to the men, women and children within the Stadium (Attachment B contains a list of some of the individuals killed in the attacks).

37. Before the attacks on the Stadium Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent an attack from occurring, and after the attacks Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators.

38. By these acts and omissions Clement Kayishema is criminally responsible for:

Count 7: GENOCIDE, a violation of Article 2 (3) (a) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 8: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (a) (murder) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 9: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (b) (extermination) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 10: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (i) (other inhumane acts) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 11: A VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute; and

Count 12: A VIOLATION OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute.

The Massacre at the Church in Mubuga

COUNTS 13 - 18

39. By about 14 April 1994, thousands of men, women and children congregated in the Church in Mubuga, Gishyita Commune. These men, women and children were predominantly Tutsis. They were in the church seeking refuge from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.

40. After the men, women and children began to congregate in the Church, Clement Kayishema visited the Church on several occasions. On or about 10 April Clement Kayishema brought gendarmes, under his control, to the Church. These gendarmes prevented the men, women and children within the church from leaving.

55 50

41. On or about 14 April 1994 individuals, including individuals under Clement Kayishema's control, directed members of the Gendarme Nationale, communal police of Gishyita commune, the Interahamwe and armed civilians to attack the Church. In addition, each of them personally participated in the attacks. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the people in the Church. Not all the people could be killed at once, so the attacks continued for several days. Both before and during these attacks persons under Clement Kayishema's control, including members of the Gendarmerie Nationale and communal police, prevented the men, women and children within the church from leaving.

42. The attacks resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to the men, women and children within the Church (Attachment C contains a list of some of the victims killed in the attacks).

43. Before the attacks on the Church in Mubuga, Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent the attacks, and after the attacks Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators.

44. By these acts and omissions Clement Kayishema is criminally responsible for:

Count 13: GENOCIDE, a violation of Article 2 (3) (a) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 14: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (a) (murder) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 15: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (b) (extermination) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 16: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3 (i) (other inhumane acts) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 17: A VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute; and

Count 18: A VIOLATION OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute.

The Massacres in the Area of Bisesero

COUNTS 19-24

45. The area of Bisesero spans over two communes of the Kibuye Prefecture. From about 9 April 1994 through 30 June 1994, thousands of men, women and children sought refuge in the area of Bisesero. These men, women and children were predominantly Tutsis and were seeking refuge from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.

46. The area of Bisesero was regularly attacked, on almost a daily basis, throughout the period of about 9 April 1994 through about 30 June 1994. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the Tutsis in Bisesero. At various times the men, women and children seeking refuge in Bisesero attempted to defend themselves from these attacks with stones, sticks and other crude weapons.

5557

47. At various locations and times throughout April, May and June 1994, and often in concert, Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana brought to the area of Bisesero members of the Gendarmerie Nationale, communal police of Gishyita and Gisovu communes, Interahamwe and armed civilians, and directed them to attack the people seeking refuge there. In addition, at various locations and times, and often in concert, Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana personally attacked and killed persons seeking refuge in Bisesero.

48. The attacks described above resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to the men, women and children within the area of Bisesero (Attachment D contains a list of some of the individuals killed in the attacks).

49. Throughout this time, Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent the attacks, and after the attacks Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators

50. By these acts and omissions Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana are criminally responsible for:

Count 19: GENOCIDE, a violation of Article 2 (3) (a) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 20: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Articles 3(a) (murder) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 21: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3(b) (extermination) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 22: CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, a violation of Article 3(1) (other inhumane acts) of the Tribunal Statute;

Count 23: A VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute; and

Count 24: A VIOLATION OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, a violation of Article 4 (a) of the Tribunal Statute.

1996
Arusha, Tanzania

Signed
Richard J. Goldstone
Prosecutor

This rearranged version conforms to the Order of Trial Chamber II in its decision of 10 April 1997 on the indictment of 28 November 1995 confirmed by the Honourable Judge Pillay and amended on 29 April 1996, to serve as the Indictment for the accused Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana in the case ICTR 95-1-I.

5552

5553

1.3 The Accused

Clement Kayishema

6. According to Clement Kayishema's (Kayishema), own testimony, he was born into a Hutu family in the Bwishyura Sector, Kibuye Prefecture in Rwanda, in 1954. His father was a teacher and later worked as a janitor in a hospital. Subsequently, he was hired as the commune secretary and was finally appointed judge at the Canton Tribunal. His mother and seven siblings were uneducated farmers.

7. In 1974, Kayishema was appointed registrar in Kagnagare Canton Tribunal. The following year he was granted a scholarship to attend the faculty of medicine of the National University of Rwanda, in Butare. Upon graduation, he practiced general medicine and surgery. In 1984, he was sent by the Rwandan Government to work as a doctor in an Ugandan refugee camp. From 1986 to 1991, he held the position of medical director of the hospital of Nyanza. He was then transferred to the Kibuye hospital.

8. Kayishema married a Rwandan woman by the name of Mukandoli, in 1987 with whom he had two children. Mukandoli holds a degree in education science from the National University of Rwanda, with a specialization in psychology.

9. Kayishema joined the Christian Democratic Party (PDC), whose motto was "work, justice and fraternity," in April 1992. On 3 July 1992, Kayishema was appointed the Prefect of Kibuye Prefecture. This occurred at a time when the multiparty system came into effect in Rwanda. He was re-appointed to his post, after the death of the President in 1994, by the Interim Government.

Obed Ruzindana

10. According to the testimony of witnesses, Obed Ruzindana (Ruzindana) was born in 1962 into a wealthy Hutu family in Gisovu Commune, Kibuye Prefecture, Rwanda. His father, Elie Murakaza, had been a Bourgmestre in the Mugonero Commune, where the family resided. Murakaza and, by extension, his family were well known and respected in the community.

11. Ruzindana left his home in Kibuye for Kigali in 1986-1987 and engaged in transporting merchandise out of Rwanda and importing goods into the country. He employed four drivers and by all accounts became a successful businessman in his own right.

12. In 1991 he married a woman whom he had known since childhood. Mrs. Ruzindana testified that although both her parents were Tutsi, her father's identity card indicated that he was a Hutu. According to Mrs. Ruzindana it was possible to "pay" to change one's ethnicity on the identity card.

5554

Two children were born from this union in 1991 and 1993. Ruzindana and his family lived in Remera, Kigali until the tragic events of 1994 when they returned to Ruzindana's parents' home in Mugonero.

1.4 Procedural Background of the Case

Pre-trial

13. Kayishema and Ruzindana were initially charged in the original Indictment submitted by the Prosecutor, Richard Goldstone,[4] on 22 November 1995 together with six other suspects. The charges included conspiracy to commit genocide, Genocide and Crimes Against Humanity and violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. The Indictment was confirmed by Judge Navanethem Pillay on 28 November 1995. Judge Pillay ordered that the Indictment be amended on 6 May 1996 to remove the conspiracy charges. It should be noted that a second Indictment was brought against Ruzindana on 17 June 1996, the trial of which is still pending. That Indictment was confirmed by Judge Tafazzal H. Khan on 21 June 1996.

14. Kayishema was arrested on 2 May 1996 in Zambia and transferred to the United Nations Detention Unit Facility (the UNDF) in Arusha, on 26 May 1996. His initial appearance was held on 31 May 1996 before Trial Chamber I. Kayishema, represented by Mr. André Ferran, of the bar of Montpellier, France, and Philippe Moriceau of the bar of Montpellier, France, pleaded not guilty to all of the charges.

15. Ruzindana was arrested on 20 September 1996 in Nairobi, Kenya and transferred to the UNDF on 22 September 1996. His initial appearance was held on 29 October 1996 before the Trial Chamber II. Ruzindana, represented by Mr. Pascal Besnier, of the bar of Paris, France, and Mr. Willem Van der Griend of the Bar of Rotterdam, the Netherlands, pleaded not guilty to all of the charges. The Chamber set a date for trial for 20 February 1997 while reserving the right to join with Kayishema.

16. At the pretrial stage, the Trial Chamber received and decided many written motions from the Parties. Some of the more pertinent ones are detailed below.

17. Kayishema filed a preliminary Motion on 26 July 1996 in which he requested the annulment of the proceedings, and consequently, his provisional release. The Parties were heard on 5 November 1996 and the Defence request was rejected. Kayishema filed a further Motion on 23 October 1996 for postponement of the trial in order to enable him to prepare his case. The Prosecutor did not oppose the Motion but on 5 November 1996, filed a Motion for joinder of Kayishema and Ruzindana. The Tribunal ordered the joinder of the two accused. The trial date for Kayishema consequently was postponed to the trial date set for Ruzindana, which as mentioned above was 20 February 1997.[5]

18. On 30 December 1996 Ruzindana filed a preliminary Motion objecting to the form of the Indictment and against joinder of his case with that of Kayishema based on various alleged procedural difficulties with the Indictment and the warrant of arrest. The request for annulment of the two Indictments and for his release was rejected as was the objection to the joinder.

19. On 27 March 1997, the Prosecution brought a Motion for leave to sever and to join in a superseding Indictment and to amend the superseding Indictment in the cases against Kayishema, Gérard Ntakirutimana, and Ruzindana on the grounds of involvement in a same transaction. The Chamber rejected the Motion because the Prosecutor did not offer any evidence that demonstrated the nature of the common scheme.

20. Kayishema brought another Motion on 7 March 1997 calling for the application of Article 20(2) and (4)(b) (Rights of the accused) of the Statute of the Tribunal by the Prosecution. The Defence further requested the Prosecution to divulge and limit its number of lawyers, consultants, assistants and investigators working on the case. The Chamber ruled[6] that the rights of the accused and equality between the parties should not be confused with the equality of means and resources. The Chamber concluded that the Defence had not proved any violation of the rights of the accused as provided in Article 20(2) and (4)(b) of the Statute.

Trial

21. On 11 April 1997 the trial of Kayishema and Ruzindana commenced before Trial Chamber II, composed of Judge William H. Sekule, presiding, Judge Yakov A. Ostrovsky and Judge Tafazzal H. Khan, based on the First Amended Indictment filed with the Registry on that day. The Prosecution team consisted of Mr. Jonah Rahetlah, Ms. Brenda Sue Thornton, and Ms. Holo Makwaia. Kayishema was represented by Mr. Andre Ferran and Mr. Philippe Moriceau. Mr. Pascal Besnier and Mr. Van der Griend formed the Defence team for Ruzindana. The Prosecution completed its case on 13 March 1998, having called a total of 51 witnesses and having tendered into evidence over 350 exhibits.

22. The Prosecution filed a Motion on 18 February 1998, pursuant to Rule 73 of the Rules, requesting the Trial Chamber to order the uninterrupted continuation of the trial of the accused and the consultation of both Parties in respect of the scheduling of this continuation. The Chamber was of the view that pursuant to Article 20(4)(b) of the Statute, the accused should be accorded adequate time and facilities for the preparation of their case.[7]

23. The Defence commenced their case on 11 May 1998 and closed on 15 September 1998. It should be noted that at the conclusion of the Prosecution's case, the Defence requested an adjournment in order to prepare its case. In the interest of justice, the Trial Chamber granted the Defence Teams a generous two-month adjournment to prepare. The Defence presented a total of twenty-eight witnesses, sixteen of whom testified on behalf of accused, Ruzindana, seven for Kayishema and five for both accused persons. Kayishema testified on his own behalf. Over 59

5557

Defence exhibits were admitted.

24. The Prosecutor presented closing argument from 21 October to 28 October 1998, Ruzindana's Defence from 28 October to 2 November 1998 and Kayishema's Defence from 3 to 16 November 1998. The Prosecutor presented the argument in rebuttal on 17 November 1998. The case was adjourned the same day for deliberation by the Trial Chamber.

25. During the trial, numerous written and oral motions were heard. On 17 April 1997, the Defence challenged the credibility of a witness, where the oral testimony varied from the previous written statement taken by the prosecutor's investigators. The Chamber opined that variation may occur at times for appreciable reasons without giving cause to disregard the statement in whole or in part. [8] The Chamber ordered that when counsel perceives there to be a contradiction between the written and oral statement of a witness, Counsel should raise such question by putting to the witness the exact portion in issue to enable the witness to explain the discrepancy before the Tribunal. Counsels should then mark the relevant portion and submit it as an exhibit if they find that the contradiction or discrepancy raised was material to the credibility of the witness concerned.

26. On 9 July 1997, Ruzindana filed a Motion pursuant to Rule 75 of the Rules seeking protective measures for potential witnesses noting that this protection should not extend to providing immunity from prosecution by an appropriate authority. The Trial Chamber[9] granted the Motion. A Motion filed by Kayishema seeking general protective measures for witnesses who would testify on his behalf was also granted by the Chamber in its Decision on 23 March 1998.[10]

27. On 12 March 1998 the Prosecutor filed a Motion requesting the Trial Chamber to order the Defence to comply with the provisions of rules 67(A)(ii) and 67(C) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The Prosecutor submitted that if the Defence intended to offer the defence of alibi, it should notify the Prosecution as early as practicable but in any event prior to the commencement of the trial. The Chamber opined that Kayishema should make the necessary disclosure immediately if they intend to rely upon the defence of alibi or special defence. However, the Defence filed a joint Motion on 30 April 1998 requesting the Trial Chamber to interpret the notion of 'defence of alibi' and 'special defence' as stipulated in Rule 67 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The Chamber dismissed the Defence Motion on the ground that it can not define rule 67 of the Rules in an abstract form without a specific problem to address. [11]

28. Due to the Defence's continued non compliance with Rule 67(A)(ii) of the Rule of Procedure and Evidence, the Prosecution filed another Motion on 11 August 1998, seeking, inter alia, an order prohibiting the Defence of Kayishema from invoking the Defence of alibi or any special Defence. The Defence responded that, under Rule 67(B), failure of the Defence to notify the Prosecutor of the Defence of alibi or any special Defence as required by rule 67(A)(ii), does not limit the right of the accused to raise the Defence of alibi or special Defence. The Trial rejected the Defence's reasons for not providing details noting that the accused himself could have provided at least some details. The Chamber therefore reiterated its previous decision on this matter.[12]

5558

29. On 22 June 1998, the Prosecution filed a Motion, seeking for a ruling that evidence of a Defence expert witness, a psychiatrist, be ruled inadmissible. The Chamber noted that it is important to observe the rights of the accused to a fair trial guaranteed under the provisions of Article 20 of the Statute in particular 20(4)(e) which provides that the accused shall have the rights to obtain the attendance of witnesses on his or her behalf. The expert was heard.[13]

30. On 19 August 1998, the Chamber dismissed a Motion filed by the Defence requesting to re-examine witness DE. The Trial Chamber found that the case of Kayishema would not suffer prejudice in the absence of additional evidence from this witness and rejected the Motion. [14]

---

1 UN Doc. S/RES/955 of 8 Nov. 1994.

[2] The Rules were successively amended on 12 Jan. 1996, 15 May 1996, 4 Jul. 1996, 5 Jun. 1997 and 8 Jun. 1998.

[3] The provisions of these offences are detailed in Part IV of the Judgement, entitled The Law.

[4] On 1 October 1996, Louise Arbour succeeded Richard Goldstone as Prosecutor of the Tribunal.

[5] Decision on the joinder of the Accused and Setting the Date for Trial, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 6 November 1996.

[6] Order on the Motion by the Defence Counsel for Application of Article 20 (2) and (4) (b) of the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-96-10-T, 5 May 1997.

[7] Decision on the Prosecution Motion for Directions for the Scheduling of the Continuation of the Trial of ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana on the Charges as Contained in the Indictment No. ICTR-95-1-T, 12 March 1998.

[8] Order on the Probative Value of Alleged Contradiction between the Oral and Written Statement of A Witness During Examination, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 17 April 1997.

[9] Decision on the Motion for the Protection of Defence Witnesses, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 6 October 1997.

[10] Decision on the Motion for the Protection of Defence Witnesses, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 23 February 1998.

[11] Decision on the Prosecution Motion for An Order Requesting Compliance by the Defence with Rules 67 (A)(ii) and 67 (C) of the Rules, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, 15 June 1998.

[12] Decision on the Prosecution Motion for A Ruling on the Defence Continued non Compliance with Rule 67 (A) (ii) and with the Written and Oral Orders of the Trial Chamber, the prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 3 September 1998.

[13] Decision on the Prosecution Motion Request to Rule Inadmissible the Evidence of Defence Expert Witness, Dr. Pouget, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 29 June 1998.

[14] Decision on the Defence Motion for the Re-examination of Defence Witness DE, the Prosecutor v. ClJment Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 19 August 1998.

5559

55160

II. Historical Context of the 1994 Events in Rwanda

31. It is necessary to address the historical context within which the events unfolded in Rwanda in 1994, in order to understand fully the events alleged in the Indictment and the evidence before the Trial Chamber. We will not engage in a lengthy examination of the geo-political or historical difficulties faced by Rwanda as a number of reports and other publications have been written on these issues to which interested persons can refer.

32. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that an attempt to explain the causal links between the history of Rwanda and the suffering endured by this nation in 1994 is not appropriate in this forum and may be futile. It is impossible to simplify all the ingredients that serve as a basis for killings on such a scale. Therefore, the account presented below is a brief explanation of issues related to the division of ethnic groups in Rwanda, a brief history of Rwanda's post-independence era, including a look at the 1991 Constitution, the Arusha Accords, and the creation of militias.

33. The Trial Chamber has chosen to relay the events using neutral language and, where necessary, to discuss the cross-examination of the Prosecution witnesses. The summary is based exclusively on the evidence presented to this Trial Chamber and no reference has been made to sources or materials that do not constitute a part of the record of the present case.

The Question of Ethnicity in Rwanda

34. In 1994, apart from some foreign nationals, there were three officially recognised ethnic groups living in Rwanda, the Hutus, the Tutsis and the Twas. The Hutus constituted the overwhelming majority of the population. The Rwandan use of the term "ethnicity" requires some explanation because according to Prosecution witness, André Guichaoua, Professor of Sociology and Economics at the University of Lille, France, all Rwandans share the same national territory, speak the same language, believe in the same myths and share the same cultural traditions. The Trial Chamber opines that these shared characteristics could be tantamount to a common ethnicity. Thus, it is recognised that prior to the colonisation of Rwanda, by Germany and later Belgium, the line separating the Hutus and Tutsis was permeable as the distinction was class-based. In other words, if a Hutu could acquire sufficient wealth, he would be considered a Tutsi.

35. This begs the question of how it became possible permanently to seal a person into one category after the Belgian colonisation. The Belgians instituted a system of national identification cards bearing the terms Hutu, Tutsi and Twa, under the category of ethnicity, which were used for administrative purposes in 1931. Although prior to the arrival of the European colonisers the Rwandans had referred to themselves as Hutus, Tutsis or Twas, it was after this point that the group identity solidified and this former sociological categorisation became a means of ethnic identification. From its inception, the identification card has been used to facilitate discrimination against one group or another in it in the implementation of an ethnic based quota system in educational and employment opportunities or in implementing a policy of genocide as was done in 1994.

5561

36. For decades some claimed that Hutus and Twas were the original inhabitants of Rwanda and that Tutsis were "people from the Nile."[1] During cross-examination Guichaoua deposed that this idea has never been proven scientifically and that no one "category of occupants has more legitimacy than others."[2] Nonetheless, certain Hutu politicians have periodically used this concept to legitimise their call for "Hutu Power" and to incite hatred and division amongst the Rwandan population, as outlined below.

A Brief Glance at the Post-Independence Era

37. In 1959, shortly prior to gaining independence, Rwanda witnessed the beginnings of intense ethnic tensions. During that year a number of Tutsi chiefs, farmers and other persons were massacred and their houses were set ablaze. Thousands of other Tutsis were forced to flee to neighbouring countries. Guichaoua stated that the deterioration of ethnic relations could be attributed to the legacy of Tutsi favouritism by the colonial powers.

The First Republic

38. The country's first President, Gregoire Kayibanda, was elected in 1962 at which time the Hutu movements began to display their radicalisation more openly. Professor Guichaoua testified that anti-Tutsi movements had become so hostile that by 1963, 200,000 to 300,000 Tutsis sought refuge in neighbouring countries. Between 1962 and 1966 there were repeated attempts by armed Tutsi groups (labelled Inyenzi -- cockroach) to regain power through incursions organised from neighbouring countries, mainly from Burundi. According to Professor Guichaoua, because an incursion in December 1963 reached the gates of Kigali, a hunt for Tutsis ensued throughout the country thereafter. The worsening tensions led to the consolidation of power by "the radical Hutu elements and helped to suppress the deep divisions within the regime in power which was increasingly marked by the personal and authoritarian style of government of President Kayibanda."[3]

39. President Kayibanda's attempt to maintain his hold on power is evident from the institution of a de facto single-party system in Rwanda in 1965. His party, the Republican Democratic Movement (MDR-PARMEHUTU) eliminated the Tutsi parties as well as other Hutu parties such as the Association for the Social Advancement of the Masses (APROSOMA). Factional political divisions, based on regions of origin from within the country, added further strain on the ethnic-base difficulties at that time. A new sense of supremacy, based on the existence of a legitimate majority population was fostered and contributed to the massacres of the Tutsis that occurred in Rwanda and Burundi in 1972-73. Thus, the inability of the First Republic to overcome ethnic tensions lead to its downfall and the assassination of President Kayibanda.

5582

The Second Republic

40. On 5 July 1973, the Chief of Staff, Major Juvenal Habyarimana, a native of Gisenyi Prefecture, seized power in a coup d'etat. His then Chief of Security, Alexis Kanyarengwe "implemented a strategy of political and ethnic tension, aimed at making the coup d'etat" seem necessary for restoring order to the country. Although the 1973 coup was interpreted as "simply settling scores between rival factions"[4] and having nothing to do with ethnic tensions, those in power encouraged the Hutus to chase away their Tutsi friends and colleagues from educational establishments and places of employment. Again, like in 1959, many Tutsis died at the hands of Hutu assailants and thousands of others fled the country. This brought about the advent of Rwanda's Second Republic.

41. Two years later, in 1975, the National Revolutionary Movement for Development (MRND) was created to replace the MDR. At its helm was President Habyarimana. This party controlled the country until the time of the tragic events in 1994. In 1978, President Habyarimana declared that the Hutu-Tutsi problem would be solved by ensuring that all Rwandans, from birth, were members of the MRND. Compulsory and exclusive membership in this party effectively erased any distinction between the party and the State. Habyarimana also promised that all segments of society would be ensured representation in high ranking government posts, taking into account its percentage in the total population. Of course this idea inherently contained a quota system that would further frustrate the efforts in reconciling ethnic difficulties.

42. For the next few years the Habyarimana government focused its efforts on issues of development. According to Professor Guichaoua, throughout the late 1970s and a part of the 1980s this government's efforts met with undeniable success in terms of low national debt, maintaining macroeconomic balances, monetary stability, food self-sufficiency, etc. Also during this time, the government re-introduced the system of umuganda -- the Rwandan concept of communal work -- meant to promote the value of organised or spontaneous solidarity (mutual help among neighbours) among the people living in the hills.[5] Additionally, "the social cohesion of this peasant state and the submission of the peasantry to an extremely authoritarian and constraining order was due largely to a policy which succeeded in establishing a weakly differentiated social system."[6] Thus the misplaced belief and confidence the Rwandans had in their leadership, that existed during the colonial era, was put to use once again in 1994.

43. Despite this economic success and the government's ability to bring its citizens together to engage in community work, the largely agrarian population of Rwanda did not benefit. Rwandans began to protest the inequities, noticing the nepotism and widespread corruption in the government. The quota system mentioned above was another source of difficulties for the population. As gross social inequalities persisted and with other economic problems and food shortages that arose in 1988 , time was ripe for Tutsis outside the country to attempt to regain power once more.

5563

44. On a number of occasions members of the Tutsi diaspora had attempted to return to Rwanda, only to be stopped at the boarder by claims that the small country could not absorb the returnees. For example, in 1982, when Uganda expelled various categories of refugees, Rwanda responded by closing its borders, refusing assistance to the thousands in need and only later allowing a small fraction of the Tutsi refugees to enter and resettle. Following these incidents, the thousands of Rwandans that remained in the neighbouring countries of Burundi, Tanzania, Uganda and Zaire began to pressure the world community and these governments to find a solution to their plight.

45. The Rwandan Patriotic Front (the RPF) was created as a response to the Tutsi Diaspora's frustration with the international community's minimal attention to the emotionally charged refugee problem. In October 1990, the RPF launched an attack into northeastern Rwanda from Uganda. This attack was supported by, inter alia, the majority of Tutsis living abroad and brought an intense period of diplomatic negotiations which produced some noticeable results. For instance, by November 1990, the system of ethnic based scholastic and professional quotas was officially abolished and in December the Rwandan government declared an amnesty for certain prisoners. By March 1991 a cease-fire was called. Certain elements of the then Rwandan government however, were not eager to begin the process and therefore ensured that some of the more significant promises made were not implemented with due haste. Additionally, the extreme violence targeting the Tutsi population, especially in rural areas, continued unabated. Therefore, the RPF continued its strategy of a protracted war. Nevertheless, attempts were made at a democratic transition between 1991 and 1993.

The 1991 Constitution and Multi-Partism

46. Francois Nsanzuwera, a Rwandan scholar, testified that the 1991 Rwandan Constitution replaced the single party system with a multiparty system. It entrusted the National Assembly and the President of the Republic with legislative and executive power, respectively. The Constitution however did not render the President of the Republic accountable to the National Assembly.

47. The officially recognised parties were forbidden to use paramilitary forces (Article 26) and were granted access to the official media. Thereafter, the following parties were created: the Mouvement Democratique Républic (MDR), the Parti Libéral (PL), the Parti Social-democrate (PSD), the Parti Democrate-chrétien (PDC) and the Coalition pour la Défense de la République (CDR).

48. With the advent of multi-party politics, a very distinctive constitutional and administrative status quo would have purportedly manifested itself in Rwanda. This was the view of Professor Guibal, a titular Professor of constitutional and administrative law, Montpellier University, France. He was commissioned by the Defence to produce a report on the constitutional landscape of Rwand upon the laws promulgated and in effect during and prior to the events of 1994.[7]

5564

49. It was Professor Guibal's opinion that as a result of the multi-partyism that emerged after the 1991 Constitution, the traditional delineation of the branches of Government was not discernible. Thus, there was no clear separation of powers between the executive, judiciary and central and regional administration. Rather, the witness testified, the constitutional framework that existed after 1991 was one that was delineated on a party-political basis also. Consequently, a dichotomy of hierarchies and relationships would have emerged throughout, and even transcended the branches of Government – one on an administrative level and one on a party political basis.

50. Professor Guibal then went on to describe the theoretical consequence of the system that existed in Rwanda, when faced with the events and turmoil of 1994. He was of the opinion that such a paradigm of multi-partyism, when confronted with these chaotic and unstable times, would have become a system of crisis multi-partyism. The Chamber was informed that such crisis multi-partyism would arise as pivotal governmental figures were moved to resolve the turmoil and conflicts upon party-political lines, rather than by the delineated constitutional means.

The Arusha Accords

51. Nsanzuwera testified that the Rwandan government and the RPF signed the Arusha Accords on 4 August 1993 in Arusha, Tanzania in order to bring about a peaceful settlement to the political and military crisis in Rwanda. The Accords constituted a compilation of several agreements and protocols previously signed, concerning notably cease-fire and power sharing between the warring factions. 47 articles of the 1991 Constitution were replaced by the provisions of the Arusha Accords, including articles on power sharing and the entrusting of additional power to the Prime Minister and certain organs of the government.

The Creation of Militias

52. While the negotiations for peace and power sharing were underway in Arusha, the MRND and the CDR stepped up their efforts to recruit members, especially from the youth segment of the population. Both the MRND and the CDR, two Hutu based parties, intensified their efforts to fortify membership in their youth organisations known as the Interahamwe and the Impuzamugambi, respectively. Within a short period of time these recruits were converted to paramilitary forces. The parties ensured that the young recruits, made up mostly of former soldiers, gendarmes and prisoners, were militarily trained and indoctrinated. All these activities were carried out in direct violation of Article 26 of the 1991 Constitution and with the knowledge of the then Minister of Internal Affairs who was entrusted with the duty to suspend the activities of any political party for such activities.

5565

53. By the end of 1993 CDR speeches, broadcast from government owned radio stations, re... the Tutsis and Hutus from the opposition parties as collaborators of the RPF. These speeches encouraged the militias to target Tutsis in their daily acts of vandalism. Between 1992 and 1994 there were claims that the militias were supported by certain member of the military and the Presidential Guard. During this period many members of the judiciary were said to have turned a blind eye to the criminal acts of the militias either because they supported their activities or out of fear of reprisals. Assassination attempts, some of which were successful, were made on the lives of certain judges or magistrates who sought to carry out their duties faithfully. According to Nsanzuwera, by that time some claimed that members of the militias had become more powerful than members of the armed forces. As indicated in the parts that follow, the militias did in fact play a substantial role in the 1994 Genocide that occurred in this country.

Conclusion

54. The ethnic tensions were used by those in power in 1994 to carry out their plans to avoid power sharing. The responsible parties ignored the Arusha Accords and used the militias to carry out their genocidal plan and to incite the rest of the Hutu population into believing that all Tutsis and other persons who may not have supported the war against the RPF were in fact RPF supporters. It is against this backdrop that of thousands of people were slaughtered and mutilated in just three short months.

---

[1] Pros. exh. 103A, p. 8.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Pros. exh. 103A, p. 12.

[4] Ibid., p. 15. Professor Guichaoua cited to a proclamation following the coup by commander Theoneste Lizinde, which made no reference to the ethnic confrontations.

[5] Ibid., p. 16.

[6] Ibid., p. 18.

[7] What follows is a synopsis of this report and Professor Guibal's testimony on 27 and 28 May 1998.

5566

III. EVIDENTIARY MATTERS

3.1 EQUALITY OF ARMS

3.2 RELIABILITY OF EYEWITNESSES

3.3 WITNESS STATEMENTS

3.4 SPECIFICITY OF THE INDICTMENT

3.1 Equality of Arms

55. The notion of equality of arms is laid down in Article 20 of the Statute. Specifically, Article 20 (2) states, ". . . the accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing. . . ." Article 20(4) also provides, ". . . the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality. . . ," there then follows a list of rights that must be respected, including the right to a legal counsel and the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his or her defence.

56. Counsel for Kayishema filed a Motion, on 13 March 1997, calling for the application of Rule 20 (2) and 20(4).[1] The Defence submitted that in order to conduct a fair trial, full equality should exist between the Prosecution and the Defence in terms of the means and facilities placed at their disposal. To this end, the Defence requested the Chamber to order the disclosure of the number of lawyers, consultants, assistants and investigators that had been at the disposal of the Prosecution since the beginning of the case. The Motion also requested the Chamber to order the Prosecutor to indicate the amount of time spent on the case and the various expenditures made. Finally, the Motion called upon the Chamber to restrict the number of assistants utilised by the Prosecution during trial to the same number as those authorised for the Defence.

57. On the first two points raised by the Defence (request for information on the Prosecutor's resources), the Prosecution submitted that the information requested by Defence was not public and was intrinsically linked to the exercise of the Prosecutor's mandate, in accordance with Article 15 of the Statute.[2]

58. On the third point (request to limit the number of assistants to the Prosecutor), the Prosecution submitted that Article 20 of the Statute establishes an equality of rights, rather than an equality of means and resources.

59. The Chamber considered that the Defence did not prove any violation of the rights of the accused as laid down in Article 20(2) and 20(4).[3] The Chamber considered that the Defence should have addressed these issues under Article 17(C) of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel (Defence Counsel Directive). This provision clearly states > the costs and expenses of legal representation of the suspect or accused necessarily and reasonably incurred shall be covered by the Tribunal to the extent that such expenses cannot be borne by the suspect or the accused because of his financial situation. [emphasis added]

5567

60. This provision should be read in conjunction with Article 20(4)(d) of the Statute which stipulates that legal assistance shall be provided by the Tribunal, ". . . if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it." [emphasis added]. Therefore, at this juncture, the Trial Chamber would reiterate its earlier ruling on this Motion that the rights of the accused should not be interpreted to mean that the Defence is entitled to same means and resources as the Prosecution. Any other position would be contrary to the status quo that exists within jurisdictions throughout the world and would clearly not reflect the intentions of the drafters of this Tribunal's Statute.

61. The question of equality of arms was verbally raised on other occasions. The Defence Counsel complained, for example, of the impossibility to verify the technical and material data about Kibuye Prefecture submitted by the Prosecution.[4] However, the Trial Chamber is aware that investigators, paid for by the Tribunal, was put at the disposal of the Defence. Furthermore, Article 17(C) establishes that any expenses incurred in the preparation of the Defence case relating, inter alia, to investigative costs are to be met by the Tribunal. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that all of the necessary provisions for the preparation of a comprehensive defence were available, and were afforded to all Defence Counsel in this case. The utilisation of those resources is not a matter for the Trial Chamber.

62. Counsel for Kayishema also raised the issue of lack of time afforded to the Defence for the preparation of its case.[5] In this regard the Trial Chamber notes that Kayishema made his initial appearance before the Tribunal on 31 May1996, Counsel having been assigned two days prior. The trial began on 11 April 1997 and the Defence did not commence its case until 11 May 1998, almost two years after the accused's initial appearance. As such, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that sufficient time was accorded to both Parties for the preparation of their respective cases.

63. Specifically, on the time designated for the preparation of the closing arguments, the Defence expressed further dissatisfaction.[6] Having expressed his opinion that "the trial has been fair," Counsel for Kayishema however went on to submit that the eight days allowed him to prepare for his closing arguments was inequitable in light of the one month time frame afforded to the Prosecution. However, the Chamber pronounced itself on this issue from the bench when it was declared,

> . . . for the record, I think the parties . . . agreed that the presentation of oral argument and filing of the relevant documents will be done within a time frame . . . So the concept of either one party being given one month does not arise . . [I]t was discussed openly with the understanding that each and every respective party had some work to do . . . That is the defence could pr own case . . . right from the word go . . . (President of the Chamber)[7]

5568

64. Moreover, were any particular issues of dispute or dissatisfaction to have arisen, the Trial Chamber should have been seized of these concerns in the appropriate manner and at the appropriate time. A cursory reference in the closing brief, and a desultory allusion in Counsel's closing remarks is not an acceptable mode of raising the issue before the Chamber.

3.2 Reliability of Eyewitnesses

65. Unlike the leaders of Nazi Germany, who meticulously documented their acts during World War II, the organisers and perpetrators of the massacres that occurred in Rwanda in 1994 left little documentation behind. Thus, both Parties relied predominantly upon the testimony of witnesses brought before this Chamber in order to establish their respective cases.

66. A majority of the Prosecution witnesses were Tutsis who had survived attacks in Kibuye Prefecture (survivor witnesses), in which both accused allegedly participated. As such the Defence presented Dr. Régis Pouget to address the Trial Chamber on the credibility of eyewitness testimonies generally and, more specifically, upon the reliability of testimony from persons who had survived attacks having witnessed violent acts committed against their families, friends and neighbours. [8]

67. The Prosecution contested the submission of the report, submitting that it was unnecessary and without probative value.[9] Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber, in exercising its discretion on this issue, received the report and heard the testimony of Dr. Pouget between 29 June and 2 July 1998.

Eyewitness Testimonies Generally

68. The issue of identification is particularly pertinent in light of the defence of alibi advanced by the accused. The report prepared by Dr. Pouget and submitted on behalf of the Defence suggests that eyewitnesses often are not a reliable source of information.

69. In order to support such a conclusion, Dr. Pouget proffered a number of reasons. It was his opinion, for example, that people do not pay attention to what they see yet, when uncertain about the answer to a question, they often give a definite answer nonetheless. He went on to describe various other, common-place factors that may affect the reliability of witness testimony generally. He observed, inter alia, that the passage of time often reduces the accuracy of recollection, and how this recollection may then be influenced either by the individual's own imperfect mental process of reconstructing past events, or by other external factors such as media reports or numerous conversations about the events.

70. The Chamber does not consider that such general observations are in dispute. Equally, the Chamber concurs with Dr. Pouget's assertion that the corroboration of events, even by many v does not necessarily make the event and/or its details correct. However, the Trial Chamber is equally cognisant that, notwithstanding the foregoing analysis, all eyewitness testimony cannot be simply disregarded out-of-hand on the premise that it may not be an exact recollection. Accordingly, it is for the Trial Chamber to decide upon the reliability of the witness' testimony in light of its presentation in court and after its subjection to cross-examination. Thus, whilst corroboration of such testimony is not a guarantee of its accuracy, it is a factor that the Trial Chamber has taken into account when considering the testimonies.

71. Similarly, prior knowledge of those identified is another factor that the Trial Chamber may take into account in considering the reliability of witness testimonies. For example, in the Tanzanian case of Waziri Amani v. Republic[10] the accused called into question his identification by witnesses. The Court of Appeals held that, > if at the end of his (the witness') examination the judge is satisfied that the quality of identification is good, for example, when the identification was made by a witness after a long period of observation or in satisfactory conditions by a relative, a neighbour, a close friend, a workmate and the like, we think, he could in those circumstances safely convict on the evidence of identification.

The case of United States v. Telafaire[11] also offers persuasive guidance on the other factors which may be taken into account. Firstly, the court in Telafaire held that the trier of fact must be convinced that the witness had the capacity and an adequate opportunity to observe the offender. Secondly, the identification of the accused by the witness should be the product of his own recollection and, thirdly, the trier of fact should take into consideration any inconsistency in the witness's identification of the accused at trial. Finally, it was held that the general credibility of the witness – his truthfulness and opportunity to make reliable observations – should also be borne in mind by the trier of fact.

72. The Trial Chamber, in its examination of the evidence, has been alive to these various approaches and, where appropriate, has specifically delineated the salient considerations pertinent to its findings.

Survivors as Witnesses

73. The report of Dr. Pouget, an expert in the field of psychology, address the reliability of testimony from those who have witnessed traumatic events. It was his opinion that strong emotions experienced at the time of the events have a negative effect upon the quality of recollection. During traumatic events, he expounded, the natural defensive system either prevents the retention of those incidents or buries their memories so deep that they are not easily, if at all, accessible.

74. This is the view of the expert Defence witness. However, as the Prosecutor highlighted, other views do exist. She produced, for example, other academic views which stated that stressful co[illegible] lead to an especially vivid and detailed recollection of events.[12] What is apparent to the Trial Chamber is that different witnesses, like different academics, think differently.

5570

75. The Chamber is aware of the impact of trauma on the testimony of witnesses. However, the testimonies cannot be simply disregarded because they describe traumatic and horrific realities. Some inconsistencies and imprecision in the testimonies are expected and were carefully considered in light of the circumstances faced by the witnesses.

5571

3.3 Witness Statements

76. The Parties raised apparent discrepancies or omissions that arose with regard to certain evidence when the witnesses' written statements were juxtaposed with their testimony given orally in Court. These written statements were drafted after the witnesses were interviewed by Prosecution investigators as part of the investigative process. Alleged inconsistencies were raised in relation to both Prosecution and Defence witnesses. The procedure adopted by the Trial Chamber for dealing with apparent inconsistencies was expounded during the hearing of evidence by Prosecution witness A. There, the Trial Chamber ordered that an alleged inconsistency be put to the witness and the witness be offered an opportunity to explain. In light of this explanation, if Counsel asserted that the inconsistency remained, the Counsel would mark the relevant portion of the witness statement and submit it as an exhibit for consideration by the Trial Chamber. Both Prosecution and Defence Counsel submitted such exhibits. [13]

77. The witness statements are not automatically evidence before the Trial Chamber per se. However, the statements may be used to impeach a witness. Where the relevant portion of the statement has been submitted as an exhibit, this portion will be considered by the Trial Chamber in light of the oral evidence and explanation offered by the witness. The Chamber is mindful that there was generally a considerable time lapse between the events to which the witnesses testified, the making of their prior statements, and their testimony before the Trial Chamber. However, notwithstanding the above, inconsistencies may raise doubt in relation to the particular piece of evidence in question or, where such inconsistencies are found to be material, to the witnesses' evidence as a whole.

78. Whether or not the explanation by the witness is enough to remove the doubt is determined on a case-by-case basis considering the circumstances surrounding the inconsistency and the subsequent explanation. However, to be released from doubt the Trial Chamber generally demands an explanation of substance rather than mere procedure. For example, a common explanation provided by witnesses was that the interviewing investigator did not accurately reflect in the written statement what the witness said. Although such an explanation may well be true, particularly considering the translation difficulties, in the absence of evidence that corroborates the explanation, it is generally not enough to remove doubt. Indeed, it is not for the Trial Chamber to search for reasons to excuse inadequacies in the Prosecution's investigative process.

79. Conversely, where the witness provides a convincing explanation of substance, perhaps relating to the substance of the investigator's question, then this may be sufficient to remove the doubt raised.

80. Doubts about a testimony can be removed with the corroboration of other testimonies. However, corroboration of evidence is not a legal requirement to accept a testimony. This Ch nevertheless aware of the importance of corroboration and considered the testimonies in this light. This notion has been emphasised in the Factual Findings of this Judgement.

5572

5573

3.4 Specificity of the Indictment

Introduction

81. The Indictment, in setting out the particulars of the charges against the accused, refers to events "around" and "about" a specific date, or between two specified dates. Kayishema is charged separately for massacres at the sites of the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean, the Stadium in Kibuye and Mubuga Church. Paragraphs 28, 35 and 41 of the Indictment detail these massacres as occurring on or about the 17, 18 and 14 April 1994 respectively. The fourth crime site for which both Kayishema and Ruzindana are charged is the Bisesero area between 9 April and 30 June. The question arises, therefore, as to whether sufficient certainty exists to enable an adequate defence to be advanced, thus to ensure the right of the accused to a fair trial.

The Allegations in Relation to the Massacres in the Bisesero Area

82. The Trial Chamber considers it appropriate to distinguish between the first three sites in the Indictment, and the charges raised in respect of the Bisesero area. The exact dates on which massacres occurred at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean, the Stadium and Mubuga Church were identified in the course of the trial by the Prosecution's case-in-chief. Accordingly, the findings made by this Chamber are set out below in the Factual Findings Part.

83. The Chamber is aware of the difficulties of raising a defence where all of the elements of the offence are not precisely detailed in the Indictment. The difficulties are compounded because the alibi defence advanced by both accused persons does not remove them from the Bisesero vicinity at the time in question. The accused in the Tadic case faced similar difficulties.[14] In that instance the Trial Chamber observed the near impossibility of providing a 24-hour, day-by-day, and week-by-week account of the accused's whereabouts for an alibi defence which covers a duration of several months. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that this is a substantive issue.

84. Nevertheless, it is important to note here that throughout the trial the burden of proving each material element of the offence, beyond a reasonable doubt, has remained firmly on the Prosecution. Whilst, prima facie, the accused should be informed in as greater detail as possible of the elements of the offence against them, such details will necessarily depend on the nature of the alleged crimes. The Trial Chamber finds that during its case-in-chief the Prosecution did focus upon various sites throughout the Bisesero region, but because of the wide-ranging nature of the attacks no further specificity was possible in the Indictment.

85. It is unnecessary, however, for the Prosecution to prove an exact date of an offence where the date or time is not also a material element of the offence. Whilst it would be preferable to allege and prove an exact date of each offence, this can clearly not be demanded as a prerequisite for [illegible] where the time is not an essential element of that offence.[15] Furthermore, even where the date of the offence is an essential element, it is necessary to consider with what precision the timing of the offence must be detailed. It is not always possible to be precise as to exact events; this is especially true in light of the events that occurred in Rwanda in 1994 and in light of the evidence we have heard from witnesses. Consequently, the Chamber recognises that it has balanced the necessary practical considerations to enable the Prosecution to present its case, with the need to ensure sufficient specificity of location and matter of offence in order to allow a comprehensive defence to be raised.

5574

86. However, because of the foregoing observations, the Trial Chamber opines that where timing is of material importance to the charges, then the wording of the count should lift the offence from the general to the particular.[16] In this respect, the Trial Chamber notes that the ratione temporis of this Tribunal extends from 1 January 1994 to 31 December 1994, and the Indictment only refers only to events that occurred in the Bisesero area between the 9 April and 30 June. In fact, during its case-in-chief, and with the more precise definition of massacre sites within the Bisesero area, the Prosecution was able to pinpoint specific periods during which the alleged events occurred. Therefore, the date need only be identified where it is a material element of the offence and, where it is such a necessary element, the precision with which such dates need be identified varies from case to case. In light of this, the Trial Chamber opines that the lack of specificity does not have a bearing upon the otherwise proper and complete counts, and it did not prejudice the right of the accused to a fair trial.

---

[1] Motion by the Defence Counsel for Kayishema Calling for the Application by the Prosecutor of Article 20(2) and 20(4) (b) of the Statute. Filed with the Registry, 13 March 1997. The issue was raised again by Mr. Ferran in his closing arguments, Trans., 3 Nov 1998, from p. 30.

[2] The Prosecution's response to the Motion was filed with the Registry on 29 April 1997 and additional information was filed on 5 May 1997.

[3] Order on the Motion by the Defence Counsel for Application of Article 20(2) and (4)(b) of the Statute, 5 May 1997.

[4] Defence Closing Brief for Kayishema, 16 Oct. 1998, p. 3.

[5] Ibid., p. 2-3.

[6] See Mr. Ferran's closing arguments, Trans., 3 Nov. 1998, pp. 54-55.

[7] Trans., 3 Nov. 1998, pp. 55-56.

[8] Def. exh. 59, Report on the Crowd Psychology. Dr. Pouget has been , inter alia, Professor of Psychiatry and Psychology, Director of Education, Montpellier University, France; and the appointed expert in psychology for Nimes and Montepellier Courts of Appeal, France.

[9] Motion by the Prosecutor that Evidence of a Defence Expert Witness, Dr. Pouget, be Ruled Inadmissible Pursuant to Article 19(1) of the Statute and Rules 54 and 89 of the Rules.

[10] 1980 TLR 250, 252.

[11] 469 F.2d 552 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

5575

[12] An article by Ann Maass and Gautier Kohnken, in the Law and Human Behaviour Journal, vol. 13, no. 4, 198. shown to the witness and discussed in cross-examination. Trans., 2 Jul. 1998, p. 104.

[13] See Pros. exh. 350A, 350B and 350C.

[14] Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic, International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Case No. IT-94-1-T, 7 May 1997, para. 533. (Tadic Judgement.)

[15] See, the Tadic Judgement, para. 534 and the cases cited therein.

[16] See, for example, the Canadian cases of, G.B., A.B. and C.S. v. R (1990) 2 S.C.R. 30, and R v. Colgan (1986) 30 C.C.C. (3d) 193 (Court of Appeal), where Monnin C.J.M. found an offence specified as occurring at some point within a six year period to be sufficiently precise.

5576

IV. THE LAW

4.1 GENOCIDE
4.2 CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY
4.3 VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS AND ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, THERETO
4.4 CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY, ARTICLES 6(1) AND 6(3)

4.1 GENOCIDE

87. Article 2(2) of the ICTR Statute reads:

> Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:
>
> a. Killing members of the group;
> b. Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
> c. Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
> d. Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
> e. Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

The above definition reproduces Articles II and III of the Genocide Convention of 1948 and Article 17 of the International Law Commission Report 1996, Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind (ILC Draft Code of Crimes).

88. The concept of genocide appeared first in the International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg) Judgement of 30 September and 1 October 1946, referring to the destruction of groups. The prohibition of genocide then was recognised by the General Assembly of the United Nations as a principle of international law. Resolution 260(A)(III) of 9 December 1948, adopting the Draft Genocide Convention, crystallised into international law the prohibition of that crime. The Genocide Convention became widely accepted as an international human rights instrument. Furthermore, the crime of genocide is considered part of international customary law and, moreover, a norm of jus cogens.

89. The definition of the crime of genocide was based upon that of crimes against humanity, that is, a combination of "extermination and persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds" and it was intended to cover "the intentional destruction of groups in whole or in substantial part" (emphasis added). The crime of genocide is a type of crime against humanity. Genocide, however, is different from other crimes against humanity. The essential difference is that genocide requires the aforementioned specific intent to exterminate a protected group (in whole or in part) while crimes against humanity require the civilian population to be targeted as part of a widespread or systematic attack. There are instances where the discriminatory grounds coincide and overlap. This scenario is detailed in the present Judgement, in the Part VII on Cumulative Charges.

5577

90. For the crime of genocide to be committed, two elements are required, namely, the mens rea, the requisite specific intent, and the actus reus, the prohibited act or omission.

4.1.1 The Mens Rea

91. A distinguishing aspect of the crime of genocide is the specific intent (dolus specialis) to destroy a group in whole or in part. The dolus specialis applies to all acts of genocide mentioned in Article 2(a) to (e) of the Statute, that is, all the enumerated acts must be committed 'with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.' It is this specific intent that distinguishes the crime of genocide from the ordinary crime of murder.[1] The Trial Chamber opines that for the crime of genocide to occur, the mens rea must be formed prior to the commission of the genocidal acts. The individual acts themselves, however, do not require premeditation; the only consideration is that the act should be done in furtherance of the genocidal intent.

92. Under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the superior is criminally responsible for the acts committed by his subordinates if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

Proof of the Requisite Intent

93. Regarding the assessment of the requisite intent, the Trial Chamber acknowledges that it may be difficult to find explicit manifestations of intent by the perpetrators. The perpetrator's actions, including circumstantial evidence, however may provide sufficient evidence of intent. The Commission of Experts in their Final Report on the situation in Rwanda also noted this difficulty. Their Report suggested that the necessary element of intent can be inferred from sufficient facts, such as the number of group members affected.[2] The Chamber finds that the intent can be inferred either from words or deeds and may be demonstrated by a pattern of purposeful action.[3] In particular, the Chamber considers evidence such as the physical targeting of the group or their property; the use of derogatory language toward members of the targeted group; the weapons employed and the extent of bodily injury; the methodical way of planning, the systematic manner of killing. Furthermore, the number of victims from the group is also important. In the Report of the Sub-Commission on Genocide, the Special Rapporteur stated that "the relative proportionate scale of the actual or attempted destruction of a group, by any act listed in Articles II and III of the Genocide Convention, is strong evidence to prove the necessary intent to destroy a group in whole or in part."[4]

94. It is also the view of the Chamber that although a specific plan to destroy does not constitute an element of genocide, it would appear that it is not easy to carry out a genocide without such a plan, or organisation. Morris and Scharf note that "it is virtually impossible for the crime of genocide to be committed without some or indirect involvement on the part of the State given the magnitud[illegible] crime."[5] They suggested that "it is unnecessary for an individual to have knowledge of all details of the genocidal plan or policy." The Chamber concurs with this view.

5578

Destruction of a Group

95. The perpetrator must intend to destroy a group in whole or in part. This begs the question of what constitutes the "destruction of a group." The Prosecution suggests that the term should be broadly interpreted and encompass acts that are undertaken not only with the intent to cause death but also includes acts which may fall short of causing death.[6] In the Akayesu Judgement, acts of sexual violence, which occurred in Taba Commune were found to form an integral part of the process of destruction, specifically, targeting Tutsi women and contributing to their destruction and the destruction of the Tutsi as a group.[7] The Trial Chamber concurs with this view and that of the International Law Commission (ILC) which stated that "it is not necessary to intend to achieve the complete annihilation of a group from every corner of the globe."[8]

Whole or in Part

96. Another aspect for consideration is that the intent to destroy the group must be "in whole or in part." The ILC stated that "the crime of Genocide by its very nature requires the intention to destroy at least a substantial part of a particular group."[9] In the Report of the Sub-Commission on Genocide, the Special Rapporteur stated that "in part" would seem to imply a reasonably significant number, relative to the total of the group as a whole, or else a significant section of a group such as its leadership. Hence, both proportionate scale and total number are relevant.[10]

97. The Trial Chamber opines, therefore, that "in part" requires the intention to destroy a considerable number of individuals who are part of the group. Individuals must be targeted due to their membership of the group to satisfy this definition.

A National, Ethnical, Racial or Religious Group

98. The intent must exist to "destroy a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such." Thus, the acts must be directed towards a specific group on these discriminatory grounds. An ethnic group is one whose members share a common language and culture; or, a group which distinguishes itself, as such (self identification); or, a group identified as such by others, including perpetrators of the crimes (identification by others). A racial group is based on hereditary physical traits often identified with geography. A religious group includes denomination or mode of worship or a group sharing common beliefs.

Destroying in whole or in part a National, Ethnical, Racial or Religious Group as Such

99. This phrase speaks to specific intent (the requisite mens rea). The "destroying" has to be directed at the group as such, that is, qua group, as stipulated in Article 2(2) of the Statute.

5579

4.1.2 Actus Reus

100. Article 2(2)(a) to (e) of the ICTR Statute and Article II (a) to (e) of the Genocide Convention lists acts which, if committed with the specific intent, amount to genocide.

Killing Members of the Group

101. Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute, in the English language version, states that genocide means the act of "killing" committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. The French language version refers to meurtre, a term that requires the additional mental element of intent.

102. The Parties in their closing remarks addressed the differences between the English and French versions. The Prosecutor submitted that the term meurtre has a legal meaning in French law, that is, a deliberate homicide, whereas the term "killing" is merely the act of causing the death to another.[11] The Prosecutor contended that the language used in the English version is more flexible and would permit, if the need arises, a broadening of the meaning or interpretation.[12] The Defence teams submitted that "meurtre" should be applied, as it was in the Akayesu Judgement. The Defence submitted that where doubt exists then, as a general principle of criminal law, that doubt should be interpreted in favour of the accused.

103. The Trial Chamber agrees that if a doubt exists, for a matter of statutory interpretation, that doubt must be interpreted in favour of the accused. Therefore, the relevant act under Article 2(2)(a) is "meurtre," that is, unlawful and intentional killing. The Trial Chamber notes, however, that all the enumerated acts must be committed with intent to destroy a group in whole or in part. As stated by the ILC the enumerated acts "are by their very nature conscious, intentional or volitional acts which an individual could not usually commit without knowing that certain consequences were likely to result. They are not the type of acts that would normally occur by accident or even as a result of mere negligence . . . the definition of this crime requires a particular state of mind or a specific intent with respect to the overall consequences of the prohibited act."[13] Hence, there is virtually no difference between the two as the term "killing" is linked to the intent to destroy in whole or in part.

104. The Chamber observes that the Akayesu Judgement does not fully define the term "killing."[14] It is the opinion of the Trial Chamber that there is virtually no difference between the term "killing" in the English version and "meurtre" in the French version of Article 2 (2)(a) of the Statute within the context of genocidal intent. Hence "killing" or "meurtre" should be considered along with the specific intent of genocide, that is, the intent to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group as such.

5580

Causing Serious Bodily or Mental Harm to Members of the Group

105. Pursuant to Article 2(2)(b) of the Statute states "causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group."

106. This phrase, which is not defined by the Statute, was the subject of contention during the closing submissions of the Parties. The Prosecution submitted that "causing a bodily or a mental harm" means: to undertake an action that might cause injury to the physical and mental fullness, the total being of a person; that a human being is to be considered as a whole with structures and elements functioning in concert and harmony; that the term "serious" is applicable to both the bodily and the mental part of a person and is dependant upon the extent to which the physical body or mental well being is injured.

107. The Prosecution submitted that serious harm may include impact on one or more elements of the human structure, which disables the organs of the body and prevents them from functioning as normal. To this end, the harm caused need not bring about death but causes handicap such that the individual will be unable to be a socially useful unit or a socially existent unit of the group. The Prosecution submitted that blows and wounds inflicted would constitute serious harm when they are so violent or have such intensity that they immediately cause the malfunctioning of one or many essential mechanisms of the human body. The Prosecution also submits that non-physical aggressions such as the infliction of strong fear or strong terror, intimidation or threat are also serious mental harm.[15]

Serious Bodily Harm

108. The phrase serious bodily harm should be determined on a case-by-case basis, using a common sense approach. In the Akayesu Judgement, it was held that serious bodily harm does not necessarily mean harm that is permanent or irremediable.[16] The Akayesu Judgement further held that acts of sexual violence, rape, mutilations and interrogations combined with beatings, and/or threats of death, were all acts that amount to serious bodily harm.[17] The Trial Chamber concurs with these determinations.

109. It is the view of the Trial Chamber that, to large extent, "causing serious bodily harm" is self-explanatory. This phrase could be construed to mean harm that seriously injures the health, causes disfigurement or causes any serious injury to the external, internal organs or senses.

Serious Mental Harm

110. The phrase "serious mental harm" should also be determined on a case-by-case. The Prosecution submits that there is no prerequisite that mental suffering should be the result of physical harm. The Prosecution relies upon the commentary offered in the Preparatory Committee's Definition of Crimes that suggests that serious mental harm should include "more than minor or temporary impairment on mental faculties."[18] The Prosecution suggested that the inflicting of strong fear or terror, intimidation or threat may amount to serious mental harm.

111. The Defence teams submitted that the serious bodily and mental harm alleged by the Prosecution was merely a consequence of attempts to kill and did not amount to genocidal offences in themselves. It argued that the Prosecution witnesses who had been wounded did not demonstrate that the perpetrators had intention to cause serious bodily or mental harm. The Defence contends therefore, that there was intention to cause murder and not to cause serious bodily or mental harm.

112. The Chamber considers that an accused may be held liable under these circumstances only where, at the time of the act, the accused had the intention to inflict serious mental harm in pursuit of the specific intention to destroy a group in whole or in part.

113. The Chamber opines that "causing serious mental harm" should be interpreted on a case-by-case basis in light of the relevant jurisprudence.

Deliberately Inflicting on the Group Conditions of Life Calculated to Bring About its Physical Destruction in Whole or in Part

114. Article 2(2)(c) of the Statute covers the act of "deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part." The Prosecution submits that Article 2(2)(c) applies to situations likely to cause death regardless of whether death actually occurs and allows for the punishment of the perpetrator for the infliction of substandard conditions of life which, if left to run their coarse, could bring about the physical destruction of the group.[19]

115. The Trial Chamber concurs with the explanation within the Draft Convention, prepared by the U.N. Secretariat which interpreted this concept to include circumstances which will lead to a slow death, for example, lack of proper housing, clothing, hygiene and medical care or excessive work or physical exertion.[20]

116. It is the view of the Trial Chamber that "deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part," includes methods of destruction which do not immediately lead to the death of members of the group. The Chamber adopts the above interpretation.[21] Therefore the conditions of life envisaged include rape, the starving of a group of people, reducing required medical services below a minimum, and withholding sufficient living accommodation for a reasonable period, provided the above would lead to the destruction of the group in whole or in part.

Imposing Measures Intended to Prevent Births Within the Group

117. Article 2(2)(d) of the Statute covers the act of imposing measures intended to prevent within the group. The Trial Chamber concurs with the explanation provided in the Akayesu Judgement.

Forcibly Transferring Children of the Group to Another

118. Article 2(2)(e) of the Statute covers the act of forcibly transferring children of the group to another. The Trial Chamber concurs with the explanation provided in the Akayesu Judgement.

4.2 CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY

119. Article 3 of the ICTR Statute states:

> The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for the following crimes when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds:
>
> a) Murder;
> b) Extermination;
> c) Enslavement;
> d) Deportation;
> e) Imprisonment;
> f) Torture;
> g) Rape;
> h) Prosecutions;
> i) Other inhumane acts.

120. Crimes against humanity were prosecuted at the Nuremberg trials. The Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg[22] in its Article 6(c) (Annex to the Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis (London Agreement)), describes the crimes against humanity as follows:

> ...namely murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian populations, before or during the war; or persecutions on political, racial, or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated.

121. Crimes against humanity were also applied under Article II of Law No. 10 of the Control Council Law[23] and went through a gradual evolution in the domestic cases of Eichmann,[24] Barbie,[25] and Touvier. More recently, crimes against humanity have been applied in the International Criminal Tribunals for both Rwanda and the Former Yugoslavia.

4.2.1 The Attack

122. The enumerated crimes must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. The attack is the event in which the enumerated crimes must form part. Indeed, within a single attack, there may exist a combination of the enumerated crimes, for example murder, rape and deportation. The elements of the attack effectively exclude from crimes against humanity, acts carried out for pu. personal motives and those outside of a broader policy or plan; a position which was adopted by the Defence.

Widespread or Systematic

123. The attack must contain one of the alternative conditions of being widespread or systematic.[26] A widespread attack is one that is directed against a multiplicity of victims.[27] A systematic attack means an attack carried out pursuant to a preconceived policy or plan. Either of these conditions will serve to exclude isolated or random inhumane acts committed for purely personal reasons.[28]

The Policy Element

124. For an act of mass victimisation to be a crime against humanity, it must include a policy element. Either of the requirements of widespread or systematic are enough to exclude acts not committed as part of a broader policy or plan. Additionally, the requirement that the attack must be committed against a "civilian population" inevitably demands some kind of plan and, the discriminatory element of the attack is, by its very nature, only possible as a consequence of a policy.

125. Who or what must instigate the policy? Arguably, customary international law requires a showing that crimes against humanity are committed pursuant to an action or policy of a State. However, it is clear that the ICTR Statute does not demand the involvement of a State. Guidance on this issue may be gained from the ILC who, in the Draft Code of Crimes, stated that crimes against humanity are inhumane acts "instigated or directed by a Government or by any organisation or group."[29] The ILC explains that this requirement was, > intended to exclude the situation in which an individual commits an inhumane act whilst acting on his own initiative pursuant to his own criminal plan in the absence of any encouragement or direction from either a Government or a group or an organisation...The instigation or direction of a Government or any group, which may or may not be affiliated with a Government, gives the act its great dimension and makes it a crime against humanity imputable to private persons or agents of the State.[30]

126. The Trial Chamber concurs with the above view and finds that the Tribunal's jurisdiction covers both State and non-State actors. As Prefect, Kayishema was a State actor. As a businessman Ruzindana was a non-State actor. To have jurisdiction over either of the accused, the Chamber must be satisfied that their actions were instigated or directed by a Government or by any organisation or group.

Civilian Population

127. Traditionally, legal definitions of 'civilian' or 'civilian population' have been discussed within the context of armed conflict. However, under the Statute, crimes against humanity may be committed inside or outside the context of an armed conflict. Therefore, the term civilian must be understood within the context of war as well as relative peace. The Trial Chamber considers that a wide definition of civilian is applicable and, in the context of the situation of Kibuye Prefecture where there was no armed conflict, includes all persons except those who have the duty to maintain public order and have the legitimate means to exercise force. Non-civilians would include, for example, members of the FAR, the RPF, the police and the Gendarmerie Nationale.

128. With regard to the targeting of any civilian population, the Trial Chamber concurs with the finding in the Tadic decision that the targeted population must be predominantly civilian in nature but the presence of certain non-civilians in their midst does not change the character of that population.[31]

129. In any event, the Defence teams did not challenge the assertion that the victims of the alleged attacks were civilians. And, the Prosecution submitted that the victims in the four massacre sites were farmers, teachers and those seeking refuge from the attacks.

Discriminatory Grounds

130. The Statute contains a requirement additional to both the Nuremberg Charter and the ICTY Statute; that the attack be committed on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. The Prosecution submits that the discrimination at issue was based on ethnic or, alternatively, political grounds.[32] The Prosecution asserted that the discrimination was on ethnic grounds because the victims were Tutsis and political grounds because the Tutsis were accomplices or supporters of the RPF. The Defence did not contest that the Tutsis were considered an ethnic group.[33] Political grounds include party political beliefs and political ideology.

131. The Prosecution submit that it is the intent of the perpetrator to discriminate against a group that is important rather than whether the victim was, in fact, a member of that targeted group. In this regard there are two issues for the Chamber to address. Firstly, in a scenario where the perpetrator's intention is to exterminate the Tutsi group and, in furtherance of this intent, he kills a Belgium Priest who is protecting the Tutsi, the Trial Chamber opines that such an act would be based on discrimination against the Tutsi group.

132. The second relevant scenario is where the perpetrator attacks people on the grounds and in the belief that they are members of a group but, in fact, they are not, for example, where perpetrator believes that a group of Tutsi are supporters of the RPF and therefore accomplices. In the scenario, the Trial Chamber opines that the Prosecution must show that the perpetrator's belief was objectively reasonable - based upon real facts - rather than being mere speculation or perverted deduction.

5586

The Mental Element

133. The perpetrator must knowingly commit crimes against humanity in the sense that he must understand the overall context of his act. The Defence for Ruzindana submitted that to be guilty of crimes against humanity the perpetrator must know that there is an attack on a civilian population and that his act is part of the attack.[34] This issue has been addressed by the ICTY where it was stated that the accused must have acted with knowledge of the broader context of the attack;[35] a view which conforms to the wording of the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) Article 7.

134. The Trial Chamber agrees with the Defence. Part of what transforms an individual's act(s) into a crime against humanity is the inclusion of the act within a greater dimension of criminal conduct; therefore an accused should be aware of this greater dimension in order to be culpable thereof. Accordingly, actual or constructive knowledge of the broader context of the attack, meaning that the accused must know that his act(s) is part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and pursuant to some kind of policy or plan, is necessary to satisfy the requisite mens rea element of the accused. This requirement further compliments the exclusion from crimes against humanity of isolated acts carried out for purely personal reasons.

4.2.2 The Crimes

135. Article 3 entitles the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda to prosecute persons responsible for crimes enumerated within the Statute. The crimes must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. The crimes themselves need not contain the three elements of the attack (i.e. widespread or systematic, against any civilian population, on discriminatory grounds), but must form part of such an attack. Indeed, the individual crimes contain their own specific elements. For an accused to be found guilty under crimes against humanity the Prosecution must prove that the accused is responsible for one of the crimes charged pursuant to Article 6(1) and/or 6(3) of the Statute. The following crimes are charged in the Indictment: murder, extermination and other inhumane acts.

Murder

136. The Prosecution charges Kayishema with crimes against humanity for murder in Counts 2, 8,

5587

14 and 20 of the Indictment, and Ruzindana with crimes against humanity for murder in Count [illegible] the Indictment.

137. Article 3(a) of the English version of the Statute uses the term "murder," whilst the French version of the Statute uses the term "assassinat."[36] The use of these terms has been the subject of some debate because the mens rea for murder, as it is defined in most common law jurisdictions, includes but does not require premeditation; whereas, in most civil law systems, premeditation is always required for assassinat.[37] The Akayesu Judgement, which is the only case to have addressed the issue, stated that customary international law dictates that it is the act of murder that constitutes a crime against humanity and not assassinat. In Akayesu, the Chamber held that there were sufficient reasons to assume that the French version of the Statute suffers from an error in translation.[38] The Defence argued, inter alia, that the Akayesu solution of an error in translation was too simple and not convincing as both the French and the English versions of the Statute are originals. According to the Defence, murder was meant to be the equivalent of assassinat. However, the Prosecution argued that premeditation was not a necessary element and suggested that the "unlawful killing of a human being as the result of the perpetrator engaging in conduct which was in reckless disregard for human life" is enough.

138. The Trial Chamber agrees with the Defence. When interpreting a term from one language to another, one may find that there is no equivalent term that corresponds to all the subtleties and nuances. This is particularly true with legal terms that represent jurisprudential concepts. Here, the mens rea for murder in common law overlaps with both meurtre and assassinat (that is, a meurtre aggravé) in civil systems.[39] The drafters chose to use the term assassinat rather than meurtre. As a matter of interpretation, the intention of the drafters should be followed so far as possible and a statute should be given its plain meaning.[40] Since the concepts of murder and assassinat can correspond to one another, in the opinion of this Trial Chamber, there is no need to change the wording of the Statute. Although it may be argued that, under customary international law, it is murder rather than assassinat that constitutes the crime against humanity (a position asserted by the Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement), this court is bound by the wording of the ICTR Statute in particular. It is the ICTR Statute that reflects the intention of the international community for the purposes of trying those charged with violations of international law in Rwanda. Furthermore, the ICTR and ICTY Statutes did not reflect customary international law at the time of drafting. This is evident by the inclusion of the need for an armed conflict in the ICTY Statute and the inclusion of the requirement that the crimes be committed with discriminatory intent in the ICTR Statute. Accordingly, it may be presumed that the drafters intended to use assassinat alongside murder. Indeed, by using assassinat in French, the drafters may have intended that only the higher standards of mens rea for murder will suffice.[41]

5588

139. If in doubt, a matter of interpretation should be decided in favour of the accused; in this c the inclusion of premeditation is favourable to the accused. The Chamber finds, therefore, that murder and assassinat should be considered together in order to ascertain the standard of mens rea intended by the drafters and demanded by the ICTR Statute. When murder is considered along with assassinat the Chamber finds that the standard of mens rea required is intentional and premeditated killing. The result is premeditated when the actor formulated his intent to kill after a cool moment of reflection.[42] The result is intended when it is the actor's purpose, or the actor is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

140. The accused is guilty of murder if the accused, engaging in conduct which is unlawful:

1. causes the death of another;
2. by a premeditated act or omission;
3. intending to kill any person or,
4. intending to cause grievous bodily harm to any person.

Thus, a premeditated murder that forms part of a widespread or systematic attack, against civilians, on discriminatory grounds will be a crime against humanity. Also included will be extrajudicial killings, that is "unlawful and deliberate killings carried out with the order of a Government or with its complicity or acquiescence."[43]

Extermination

141. The Prosecution charges Kayishema with crimes against humanity for extermination in Counts 3, 9, 15 and 21 of the Indictment, and Ruzindana with crimes against humanity for extermination in Count 21 of the Indictment.

142. The crime of extermination was not specifically defined in the Statute or the Nuremberg Charter. Indeed, there is very little jurisprudence relating to the essential elements of extermination. In the Akayesu Judgement, Chamber I considered that extermination is a crime that by its very nature is directed against a group of individuals and differs from murder in that it requires an element of mass destruction that is not required for murder.[44] The Prosecution asserted that there is no need for a defined number of people to die for the killing to rise to an act of extermination; it is determined on a case-by-case basis even though there is the need for a numerical requirement.[45] Notably, Akayesu was found guilty of extermination for ordering the killing of sixteen people.[46] The Chamber agrees that the difference between murder and extermination is the scale; extermination can be said to be murder on a massive scale. The Defence did not address the numerical question but argues that "the essence of extermination lies in the fact that it is an indiscriminate elimination."[47]

5589.

143. Cherif Bassiouni states that extermination is murder on a massive scale and may include unintentional killing:

> Extermination implies intentional and unintentional killing. The reason for the latter is that mass killing of a group of people involves planning and implementation by a number of persons who, though knowing and wanting the intended result, may not necessarily know their victims. Furthermore, such persons may not perform the actus reus that produced the deaths, nor have specific intent toward a particular victim.[48]

The ICC Statute (Article 7(2)(b)), offers an illustrative rather than definitive statement regarding extermination: "Extermination includes the intentional infliction of conditions of life, inter alia the deprivation of access to food and medicine, calculated to bring about the destruction of part of a population."

144. Having considered the above, the Chamber defines the requisite elements of extermination:

> The actor participates in the mass killing of others or in the creation of conditions of life that lead to the mass killing of others, through his act(s) or omission(s); having intended the killing, or being reckless, or grossly negligent as to whether the killing would result and; being aware that his act(s) or omission(s) forms part of a mass killing event; where, his act(s) or omission(s) forms part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds.

145. The term "mass", which may be understood to mean 'large scale,' does not command a numerical imperative but may be determined on a case-by-case basis using a common sense approach. The actor need not act with a specific individual(s) in mind.

146. The act(s) or omission(s) may be done with intention, recklessness, or gross negligence. The 'creation of conditions of life that lead to mass killing' is the institution of circumstances that ultimately causes the mass death of others. For example: Imprisoning a large number of people and withholding the necessities of life which results in mass death; introducing a deadly virus into a population and preventing medical care which results in mass death. Extermination includes not only the implementation of mass killing or the creation of conditions of life that leads to mass killing, but also the planning thereof. In this event, the Prosecutor must prove a nexus between the planning and the actual killing.

147. An actor may be guilty of extermination if he kills, or creates the conditions of life that kills, a single person providing the actor is aware that his act(s) or omission(s) forms part of a mass killing event.[49] For a single killing to form part of extermination, the killing must actually form part of a mass killing event. An 'event' exists when the (mass) killings have close proximity in time and place.

Other Inhumane Acts

148. The Prosecution charges Kayishema with crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts in Counts 4, 10, 16 and 22 of the Indictment, and Ruzindana with crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts in Count 22 of the Indictment.

149. Since the Nuremberg Charter, the category 'other inhumane acts' has been maintained as a useful category for acts not specifically stated but which are of comparable gravity. The importance in maintaining such a category was elucidated by the ICRC when commenting on inhumane treatment contained in Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions,

> It is always dangerous to try to go into too much detail – especially in this domain. However much care were taken in establishing a list of all the various forms of infliction, one would never be able to catch up with the imagination of future torturers who wished to satisfy their bestial instincts; and the more specific and complete a list tries to be, the more restrictive it becomes. The form of wording adopted is flexible and, at the same time, precise.[50]

150. Other inhumane acts include those crimes against humanity that are not otherwise specified in Article 3 of the Statute, but are of comparable seriousness. The ICC Statute (Article 7(k)), provides greater detail than the ICTR Statute to the meaning of other inhumane acts: "other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health." The ILC commenting on Article 18 of its Draft Code of Crimes states

> The Commission recognized that it was impossible to establish an exhaustive list of the inhumane acts which may constitute crimes against humanity. First, this category of acts is intended to include only additional acts that are similar in gravity to those listed in the preceding subparagraphs. Second, the act must in fact cause injury to a human being in terms of physical or mental integrity, health or human dignity.

151. The Chamber notes the International Law Commission's commentary. In relation to the Statute, other inhumane acts include acts that are of similar gravity and seriousness to the enumerated acts of murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, or persecution on political, racial and religious grounds. These will be acts or omissions that deliberately cause serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitute a serious attack on human dignity. The Prosecution must prove a nexus between the inhumane act and the great suffering or serious injury to mental or physical health of the victim. The Chamber agrees with the Prosecution submission that the acts that rise to the level of inhumane acts should be determined on a case-by-case basis.[51]

152. The Defence asserts that for an accused to be found guilty of mental harm, there must be a direct relation between the assailant and the victim.[52] The Prosecution on the other hand suggests that victims have suffered mental harm amounting to other inhumane acts due to them having witnessed atrocities for which the accused is responsible. For example, in relation to Count 4 the Prosecution submits,

5591.

> [w]ith respect to serious mental harm, six survivors testified (and the survivors of all the other massacres testified) that they witnessed family members and friends being killed. As established by the evidence, Tutsi civilians were placed in an environment of fear and desperation and were forced to witness the killing and the severe injuring of friends, family and other Tutsi civilians. The killings were brutal in manner. The people saw carnage and heard the people singing exterminate them, exterminate them....The Prosecutor submits that such an environment inherently causes serious mental harm.[53]

153. The Chamber is in no doubt that a third party could suffer serious mental harm by witnessing acts committed against others, particularly against family or friends. However, to find an accused responsible for such harm under crimes against humanity, it is incumbent on the Prosecution to prove the mens rea on the part of the accused. Indeed, as stated above, inhumane acts are, inter alia, those which deliberately cause serious mental suffering. The Chamber considers that an accused may be held liable under these circumstances only where, at the time of the act, the accused had the intention to inflict serious mental suffering on the third party, or where the accused knew that his act was likely to cause serious mental suffering and was reckless as to whether such suffering would result. Accordingly, if at the time of the act, the accused was unaware of the third party bearing witness to his act, then he cannot be held responsible for the mental suffering of the third party.

154. In summary, for an accused to be found guilty of crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts, he must commit an act of similar gravity and seriousness to the other enumerated crimes, with the intention to cause the other inhumane act, and with knowledge that the act is perpetrated within the overall context of the attack.

5592

4.3 VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS AND ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, THERETO

155. Pursuant to Article 4 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 Common to the Four Geneva Conventions of 1949 (Common Article 3) for the protection of War Victims, and Additional Protocol II thereto of 1977 (Protocol II).

4.3.1 Customary Law

156. The Trial Chamber is cognisant of the ongoing discussions, in other forums, about whether the above-mentioned instruments should be considered customary international law that imposes criminal liability for their serious breaches. In the present case, such an analysis seems superfluous because the situation is rather clear. Rwanda became a party to the Conventions of 1949 on 5 May 1964 and to Protocol II on 19 November 1984. These instruments, therefore, were in force in the territory of Rwanda at the time when the tragic events took place within its borders.

157. Moreover, all the offences enumerated in Article 4 of the Statute, also constituted crimes under the laws of Rwanda. The other Party to the conflict, the RPF, also had stated to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) that it was bound by the rules of international humanitarian law. Therefore, there is no doubt that persons responsible for the breaches of these international instruments during the events in the Rwandan territories in 1994 could be subject to prosecution.

158. Thus, the question before the Trial Chamber is not about the applicability of these instruments in a general sense, but to what extent they are applicable in the instant case. In order to answer this question, a more detailed legal analysis of these instruments as well as the historical background to their adoption is necessary.

4.3.2 Historical Background of Common Article 3

159. The Diplomatic Conference for the Establishment of International Conventions for the Protection of Victims of War, convened by the Swiss Federal Council, was held in Geneva from 21 April to 12 August 1949 (the Conference). The Conference was seized by the working documents that passed through the many preparatory stages. After four months of continuous debate, the Conference established the first, second, third and fourth Geneva Conventions.[54]

5593

160. From the very beginning, it was understood that these four Conventions could be applic in international armed conflicts. However, the ICRC proposed at the Conference to apply these Conventions to non-international armed conflicts as well. The proposal of the ICRC was rejected as a result of almost universal opposition by the states.

161. During the debate on this issue, special attention was focused on the fourth Geneva Convention. For a long period, it was considered evident that civilians would remain outside hostilities. The ICRC recognised that "when the Second World War broke out, civilians were not provided with effective protection under any convention or treaty."[55]

162. It was emphasised by the ICRC that the Fourth Convention represented "an important step forward in written international law in the humanitarian field."[56] Therefore, in the opinion of the ICRC, it was necessary to apply it to internal armed conflicts as well. However, from the point of view of the delegations such an application could entail not only political but also technical difficulties.

163. Thus, the situation at the Conference was rather complicated. On the one hand, the idea of the ICRC to apply the four Geneva Conventions to internal armed conflicts had been treated by many delegations as unfriendly attempts to interfere in the internal affairs of the states and to protect all forms of insurrections, rebellion, anarchy and the break-up of states and even plain brigandage. On the other hand, there was an understanding of the necessity to aid the victims of internal conflicts, the horrors of which sometimes surpass the horrors of international wars by reason of the fratricidal hatred they engender.[57]

164. The Conference rejected a considerable number of the alternative drafts on this issue and, as a result of lengthy and tremendous efforts, succeeded in approving Common Article 3 as it appears now in the four Geneva Conventions. Pursuant to this Article, each Party to a non-international conflict is bound to apply certain provisions as a minimum. The words "as a minimum" must be understood in the sense that the applicable provisions represent a compulsory minimum. At the same time, the Parties were encouraged not to limit themselves to the provided minimum. They were invited, in accordance with Common Article 3, "to endeavour to bring into force, by means of special agreements, all or part of the other provisions of the present Convention."

165. On this occasion, the ICRC pointed out: "To borrow the phrase of one of the delegates, Article 3 is like a 'Convention in miniature.' It applies to non-international conflicts only and will be the only Article applicable to them until such time as a special agreement between the Parties has brought into force between them all or part of the other provisions of the Convention." [58]

4.3.3 Historical Background of Additional Protocol II

166. After the Conference in 1949, the idea to improve the situation with the protection of the victims of internal conflicts remained on the agenda. As a result of compromise, Common Article 3 drafted in a very clear way and there were practical difficulties with its application. Moreover, in light of the number and scale of armed conflicts that occurred in different parts of the world the need to improve the protection of the civilian population during armed conflicts became more urgent. In this respect, the ICRC found it necessary to emphasise that "the development of arms and the increased radius of action given to armed forces by modern inventions have made it apparent that, notwithstanding the ruling theory, civilians were certainly 'in the war', and exposed to the same dangers as the combatants – and sometimes worse."[59]

5594

167. In light of such circumstances, the ICRC began to prepare a new conference, which took place in 1977. One of the main purposes of this conference was to improve the protection of the civilian population during armed conflicts. Two Protocols additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 were adopted as a result of this conference. Protocol I deals with international armed conflict and Protocol II with non-international armed conflict. Commenting recently on the general problems in implementing the fourth Geneva Convention, the ICRC noted that this Convention "contains no detailed provisions for the protection of the civilian population against the dangers caused by military operations such as aerial bombardments and shelling. This gap was later filled by Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions."[60] Similarly, Protocol II had to supplement Common Article 3 in order to improve the protection of civilians in internal armed conflicts.

168. One of the very important supplements of Protocol II to Common Article 3 is Part IV entitled "Civilian Population." In this Part the Protocol provides not only for the protection of "individual civilians," but directly addresses the issue of the protection of the "civilian population." Article 13 of Additional Protocol II states, "the civilian population and individual civilians shall enjoy general protection against dangers arising from military operations." This part contains six detailed Articles providing for the protection of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population, protection of works and installations containing dangerous forces, protection of cultural objects and places of worship, prohibition of forced movement of civilians, activities of relief societies et cetera.

4.3.4 The Test of Applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

Introduction

169. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that in order for an act to breach Common Article 3 and Protocol II, a number of elements must be shown. It must be established that the armed conflict in Rwanda in this period of time was of a non-international character. There must also be a link between the accused and the armed forces. Further, the crimes must be committed ratione loci and ratione personae. Finally, there must be a nexus between the crime and the armed conflict.

The Trial Chamber shall, therefore, consider each of these elements in turn.

5595

The Nature of the Armed Conflict

170. Both international instruments, Common Article 3 and Protocol II, were in force in 1994 in Rwanda. Therefore, it is proper to consider them together taking into account that Protocol II "develops and supplements Common Article 3 without modifying its existing conditions of application."[61] The general criteria in Protocol II for determining whether armed conflict is of a non-international character was one of the important supplements. An armed conflict which takes place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organised armed groups, in accordance with Protocol II, should be considered as a non-international armed conflict. This requirement reflects the essential distinction between an international armed conflict, conducted by two or more States, and non-international armed conflict conducted by a State and another armed force which does not qualify as a State.

171. Certain types of internal conflicts, which fall below a minimum threshold, are not recognised by Article 1(2) of Protocol II as non-international armed conflict, namely, "situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature." The remaining criteria define the necessary characteristics of the dissident armed forces or other organised armed groups, which must:

1. be under responsible command;
2. exercise control over part of the territory of the State;
3. carry out sustained and concerted military operations, and
4. be able to implement the Protocol.

172. Thus, in the present case, all material requirements existed to consider the situation in Rwanda, during April, May, June and July 1994, as an armed conflict, not of an international character. This conflict took place in the territory of Rwanda between governmental armed forces (Forces Armées Rwandaises – the FAR) and the dissident armed forces (Rwandese Patriotic Front – the RPF). These dissidents, under the responsible command of General Kagame, exercised control over part of the territory of Rwanda and were able to carry out sustained and concerted military operations as well as to implement Common Article 3 and Protocol II.

A Link Between the Accused and the Armed Forces

173. In accordance with Article 6 of the ICTR Statute, a person who "planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime." Article 4 of the Statute especially provides for prosecuting persons for serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. Therefore, the question is whether the accused falls within the class of persons who may be held responsible for serious violations of these international instruments.

174. Violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II could be committed during, or as a result of, military operations. This means that the Parties to an armed conflict should be responsible for such breaches. In the instant case, this would constitute the FAR and the RPF. The ability of the RPF as a dissident armed force to implement legally binding international instruments is considered in Protocol II as a fundamental criteria in order to recognise the non-international character of the armed conflict. The ability of the governmental armed forces to comply with the provisions of such instruments is axiomatic. In the instant case, the two armies were well organised and participated in the military operations under responsible military command. Therefore, based on Article 6(1) of the ICTR Statute, it could be concluded that the appropriate members of the FAR and RPF shall be responsible individually for violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II, if factually proven.

175. Thus, individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent Parties fall within the class of perpetrators. If individuals do not belong to the armed forces, they could bear the criminal responsibility only when there is a link between them and the armed forces. It cannot be disregarded that the governmental armed forces are under the permanent supervision of public officials representing the government who had to support the war efforts and fulfil a certain mandate. On this issue, in the Akayesu Judgement, Trial Chamber I was correct to include in the class of perpetrators, "individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government to support or fulfil the war efforts."[62]

176. Thus, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that the laws of war apply not only to the members of the armed forces but, in certain cases, to civilians as well, if so established factually. In this case, the accused persons could fall within the class of individuals who may be held responsible for serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. Violations of these international instruments could be committed outside the theatre of combat. For example, the captured members of the RPF may be brought to any location within the territory of Rwanda and could be under the control or in the hands of persons who are not members of the armed forces. Therefore, every crime should be considered on a case-by-case basis taking into account the material evidence presented by the Prosecution. In other words, the evidence needs to show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that there was a link between the accused and the armed forces.

Ratione Personae

177. Two distinct issues arise with respect to personal jurisdiction over serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. In addition to the class of perpetrators, which has been considered above, the issue of the class of victims should be addressed.

178. It is delineated in paragraph 1 of the Indictment that, "thousands of men, women, and children were killed and numerous people injured" at the four sites in the Prefecture of Kibuye betwe April and 30 June 1994. It was added in paragraphs 25, 32, 39 and 45 of the Indictment that "these men, women and children were unarmed and were predominantly Tutsis."

5597

179. On the basis of the definition of the civilian population contained in Article 50 of Additional Protocol I, the conclusion could be made that the victims of the massacres which occurred at the four sites, referred to in the Indictment, qualify as the civilian population. This definition stipulates, "the civilian population comprises all persons who are civilians." The first paragraph of the same Article indicates that, "a civilian is any person who does not belong to one of the categories of persons referred to in Article 4(A)(1), (2), (3) and (6) of the Third Convention and in Article 43 of this Protocol." Each of these Articles enumerates the various types of combatants. Therefore, in accordance with this definition, for the purpose of protection of victims of armed conflict, all persons who are not combatants might be considered civilians.

180. On this basis, the ICRC comes to the following conclusion: "Thus the Protocol adopted the only satisfactory solution, which is that of a negative definition, namely, that the civilian population is made up of persons who are not members of the armed forces."[63] It should be noted that there is a certain distinction between the terms "civilians" and "civilian population." There are civilians who accompany the armed forces or are attached to them. Civilians could even be among combatants who take a direct part in the hostilities. There is clear confirmation of this fact in Protocol II which stipulates that, "civilians shall enjoy the protection afforded by this part unless and for such time as they take a direct part in the hostilities."[64] However, the civilian population as such does not participate in the armed conflict. Article 50 of Protocol I emphasises, "the presence within the civilian population of individuals who do not come within the definition of civilian does not deprive the population of its civilian character."[65]

181. It is generally known that the civilian population is unarmed and is not in any way drawn into the armed conflict. The Chamber also takes into account the fact that the Defence did not challenge the civilian status of the victims. Whether there is a material averrment for charges involving Article 4 of the Statute is a question of findings which is addressed in Part VI of the Judgement.

Ratione Loci

182. In spite of the fact that there is no clear provision on applicability ratione loci either in Common Article 3 or Protocol II, the juridical situation is rather clear. The Chamber has to recall that two Parties in the armed conflict were legally bound by the provisions of these international instruments. Therefore, in accordance with requirements of international public law, these instruments should be applicable in the whole territory of Rwanda. Moreover, in Article 4 of Protocol II, which in principle reproduces Common Article 3, there is a clear indication that the enumerated criminal acts "shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever." Therefore, it is unnecessary that serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II occur in the actual theatre of operations. Captured per example, could be brought to other locations of the territory, but despite this relocation, they should be treated humanely. The expression "at any time whatsoever" means that the temporal factor does not assume a narrow interpretation. This approach was confirmed by the ICTY Appeal Chamber in its decision on jurisdiction in the Tadic Judgement wherein it was held that,

5598

> . . . the geographical and temporal frame of reference for internal armed conflicts is similarly broad. This conception is reflected in the fact that beneficiaries of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions are those taking no active part (or no longer taking an active part) in the hostilities. This indicates that the rules contained in Article 3 also apply outside the narrow geographical context of the actual theatre of combat operations.[66]

183. The Appeal Chamber also remarked in this paragraph that "like Common Article 3, it explicitly protects all persons who do not take a direct part or who have ceased to take part in the hostilities... Article 2(1) [of Protocol II] provides 'this Protocol shall be applied [...] to all persons affected by an armed conflict as defined in Article 1'." After quoting Article 2(2) of Protocol II about persons who have been deprived of their liberty the Appeals Chamber noted that "under this last provision the temporal scope of the applicable rules clearly reaches beyond the actual hostilities...The nexus required is only a relationship between the conflict and the deprivation of liberty, not that the deprivation occurred in the midst of battle."[Emphasis added]. On the basis of the foregoing, the Appeal Chambers came to the conclusion that in case of internal conflict, until a peaceful settlement is achieved, international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory under the control of a Party, whether or not actual combat takes place there and the crimes committed in these circumstances should be considered as crimes "in the context of an armed conflict."[67] Thus, the Appeals Chamber found that the alleged crimes should not be considered in the narrow geographical and temporal framework and should be understood as crimes committed in the context of an armed conflict if there is a relationship between this conflict and the offence.

Serious Violations

184. The competence of the Chamber is limited to serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. Article 4 of the ICTR Statute states that the persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II should be prosecuted. The Chamber finds that this is a qualitative limitation of its competence and the phrase "serious violations" should be interpreted as breaches involving grave consequences. The list of prohibited acts, which is provided in Article 4 of the ICTR Statute, as well as in Common Article 3 and in Article 4 of Protocol II, undeniably should be recognised as serious violations entailing individual criminal responsibility.

Nexus Requirement Between the Armed Conflict and the Crime

185. It is important to establish whether all the crimes committed during the non-international armed conflict should be considered as crimes connected with serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. The Chamber is of the opinion that only offences, which have a nexus with the armed conflict, fall within this category. If there is not a direct link between the offences and the armed conflict there is no ground for the conclusion that Common Article 3 and Protocol II are violated.

186. The jurisprudence in this area of the law requires such a link between the armed conflict and the offence. The ICTY Trial Chamber in the Judgement of Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo (Celebic¥ Judgement) stated that "there must be an obvious link between the criminal act and the armed conflict."[68] The same point of view is reflected in the Tadic Judgement. In Tadic, the Trial Chamber remarked that "the only question to be determined in the circumstances of each individual case was whether the offences were closely related to the armed conflict as a whole."[69] In the Akayesu Judgement, the Trial Chamber found that ". . .it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the acts perpetrated by Akayesu ...were committed in conjunction with the armed conflict." Such a conclusion means that, in the opinion of that Chamber, such a connection is necessary.

187. This issue was discussed recently at the first session of the Preparatory Commission for the International Criminal Court (16 to 26 February 1999). From the point of view of the participants, war crimes would occur if the criminal conduct took place in the context of and was associated with the armed conflict.[70]

188. Thus the term "nexus" should not be understood as something vague and indefinite. A direct connection between the alleged crimes, referred to in the Indictment, and the armed conflict should be established factually. No test, therefore, can be defined in abstracto. It is for the Trial Chamber, on a case-by-case basis, to adjudge on the facts submitted as to whether a nexus existed. It is incumbent upon the Prosecution to present those facts and to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that such a nexus exists.

189. The nexus requirement between the offence and the armed conflict is of crucial significance, taking into account that Common Article 3 and Protocol II are designed to protect the victims of the armed conflict. War crimes are inevitably connected with violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II. Whether there is a nexus between the alleged crimes and the armed conflict in the instant case is an issue of legal findings which will be addressed in Part VI of the Judgement. At this stage it should be highlighted that the consideration of the applicability of the provisions of Common Article 3 and Protocol II would be proper if such a nexus is established.

Conclusion

5600

190. It remains for the Chamber to make a finding in the context of the events alleg - Indictment with regard to the culpability of the accused under Article 4 of the ICTR Statute. This will be addressed in the Legal Findings Part of the Judgement.

4.4 CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY, ARTICLES 6(1) AND 6(3)

4.4.1 Individual Responsibility – Article 6(1)

191. The Indictment sets out in its General Allegations (paragraph 21) that both Kayishema and Ruzindana, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Tribunal's Statute, are individually responsible for the execution of crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the same Statute. Whilst the Chamber will examine the specific charges raised in the Indictment below, it must first address the inherent requirement that the accused be individually responsible for the commission of these crimes. In this respect the Statute adopts a wide scope of inclusion. Article 6(1) states

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation and execution of the crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

192. The Parties addressed the Chamber with regard to the interpretation and application of this paragraph to the events in question. Accordingly, it is necessary to consider the degree of participation required in the crimes delineated in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute. Only then, and in light of the factual findings set out below, is it possible to identify whether either Ruzindana or Kayishema are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1).

193. Before addressing the requisite elements necessary to find individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1), the Trial Chamber will first examine the issue of statutory construction raised by Counsel for Ruzindana.

194. The Defence focused upon a very specific interpretation of Article 6(1). They contended that the modes of participation, "planning, instigation, ordering, committing", should be read cumulatively, but separately from, "aiding and abetting".[71] Only such a position, it was submitted, would give full weight to the drafters use of "or" within the Article. Furthermore, because "abetting" and "instigating" have the same meaning, to avoid concurrence it was posited that "aiding and abetting" should also be read cumulatively despite the ruling in the Akayesu Judgement.

195. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that the interpretation submitted by the Defence would not only offend common sense, but would also be contrary to the findings of the Chamber in the Celebici Judgement, where it stated categorically,

> . . . that individuals may be held criminally responsible for their participation in the commission of offences in any of the several capacities is in clear conformity with general principles of criminal law. As concluded by the Trial Chamber II in the Tadic Judgement, there can be no doubt that this corresponds to the position under customary international law.[72] [e... added]

5602

196. Similar reasoning is found in the Akayesu Judgement where the Chamber remarked, "Article 6(1) covers various stages of the commission of a crime."[73] [emphasis added]. Trial Chamber I in the Akayesu Judgement also held that, "aiding and abetting" were not synonymous, thus could separately give rise to individual responsibility. After stating these principles the Chamber in Akayesu proceeded to find the accused guilty of nine counts pursuant to one or more of the modes of participation expressed in Article 6(1).

197. The Trial Chamber can see no reason to depart from these logical and well-founded expressions of international law. Therefore, if any of the modes of participation delineated in Article 6(1) can be shown, and the necessary actus reus and mens rea are evidenced, then that would suffice to adduce criminal responsibility under this Article.

198. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that, as was submitted by the Prosecution, there is a further two stage test which must be satisfied in order to establish individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1). This test required the demonstration of (i) participation, that is that the accused's conduct contributed to the commission of an illegal act, and (ii) knowledge or intent, that is awareness by the actor of his participation in a crime.[74]

199. The first point of this test, the actus reus of participation, was considered in great detail by Trial Chamber I in the Akayesu Judgement and by the ICTY in the Tadic Judgement.[75] It is now firmly established that for the accused to be criminally culpable his conduct must have been proved, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have contributed to, or have had an effect on, the commission of the crime.[76] What constitutes the actus reus and the requisite contribution inevitably varies with each mode of participation set out in Article 6(1).[77] What is clear is that the contribution to the undertaking be a substantial one, and this is a question of fact for the Trial Chamber to consider.

200. It is not presupposed that the accused must be present at the scene of the crime, nor that his contribution be a direct one. That is to say, in light of the decision rendered in the Furundzjia Judgement and the jurisprudence set out therein, the role of the individual in the commission of the offence need not always be a tangible one. This is particularly pertinent where the accused is charged with the "aiding" or "abetting" of a crime. In Furundzija it was held, ". . . an approving spectator who is held in such respect by the other perpetrators that his presence encourages them in their conduct, may be guilty of complicity in a crime against humanity."[78]

201. This Chamber concurs. The presence of such a spectator need not be a conditio sine qua non for the principal. Therefore, subject to the caveat that the accused knew the effect that his presen have, he may be found responsible under Article 6(1) for such a contribution to the commission of any of the offences specified in the Tribunal's Statute.

5603

202. This jurisprudence extends naturally to give rise to responsibility when the accused failed to act in breach of a clear duty to act. The question of responsibility arising from a duty to act, and any corresponding failure to execute such a duty is a question that is inextricably linked with the issue of command responsibility. This is because under Article 6(3) a clear duty is imposed upon those in authority, with the requisite means at their disposal, to prevent or punish the commission of a crime. However, individual responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) is based, in this instance, not on the duty to act, but from the encouragement and support that might be afforded to the principals of the crime from such an omission.[79]

203. In view of such a broad scope of participation that may give rise to responsibility under Article 6 (1), there must be a clear awareness that this participation will lead to the commission of a crime.[80] The Trial Chamber has set out, in Chapter 5.1 of this Judgement, that the clear objective of the atrocities occurring throughout Rwanda and the Kibuye Prefecture, in 1994, was to destroy the Tutsi population. The perpetrators of these crimes, therefore, were united in this common intention. On this point, the Chamber in the Celebici Judgement declared that where,

> . . . a plan exists, or where there otherwise is evidence that members of a group are acting with a common criminal purpose, all those who knowingly participate in, and directly and substantially contribute to, the realisation of this purpose may be held criminally responsible . . and . . .[d] epending upon the facts of a given situation, the culpable individual may, under such circumstances, be held criminally responsible either as a direct perpetrator of, or as an aider and abettor to, the crime in question.[81]

204. The Trial Chamber concludes, therefore, that the members of such a group would be responsible for the result of any acts done in furtherance of the common design where such furtherance would be probable from those acts.

205. Thus, the accused need not necessarily have the same mens rea as the principal offender. Whilst knowledge or intention will give rise to individual responsibility under Article 6(1), the distinction is only of importance in distinguishing whether the accused aids or abets a crime or is a co-perpetrator.[82]

206. Such a requirement of mens rea refutes the contention by Counsel for Kayishema that the burden of proof is reversed when the actus reus for responsibility, under this Article, arises through the failure to perform an act. The Prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that his failure to act would contribute to the commission of a crime.

5604

207. In short, therefore, the Chamber finds that each of the modes of participation may, independently, give rise to criminal responsibility. The Prosecution must prove that through his mode of participation, whether it be by act(s) or omission(s), the accused contributed substantially to the commission of a crime and that, depending on the mode of participation in question, he was at least aware that his conduct would so contribute to the crime.

4.4.2 Command Responsibility – Article 6(3)

208. The Indictment further alleges that Kayishema was, "also or alternatively individually responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates". In this respect, Article 6(3) is pertinent. It states,

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew, or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[83]

Ruzindana is not charged under Article 6(3).

209. The principle of command responsibility is firmly established in international law, and its position as a principle of customary international law has recently been delineated by the ICTY in the Celebici Judgement.[84] The clear recognition of this doctrine is now reflected in Article 28 of the Rome Statute of the ICC.

210. The finding of responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute does not prevent the Chamber from finding responsibility additionally, or in the alternative, under Article 6(3). The two forms of responsibility are not mutually exclusive. The Chamber must, therefore, consider both forms of responsibility charged in order to fully reflect the culpability of the accused in light of the facts.

211. There were no submissions made by the Defence with regard to the legal underpinning of Article 6(3). As such, the Trial Chamber will consider the position advanced by the Prosecution concomitantly with its examination of the various elements that must be satisfied in order to establish criminal liability under the doctrine of command responsibility.

212. It is essential to consider first whether Kayishema, in his role as Prefect, is subject to the notion of command responsibility set out in Article 6(3). Secondly, it is incumbent upon the Chamber to consider who constitutes the subordinates over whom Kayishema would exercise command. In this respect it would also be necessary to clarify whether those subordinates must be under his de jure command, or if de facto subordination would suffice. Thirdly, the requisite degree of knowled subordinate's actions required to establish command responsibility must also be considered. Finally, the Chamber must address the question of when an individual becomes responsible under this doctrine for failing to prevent a crime or punish the perpetration thereof.

5605

Responsibility of a Non-Military Commander

213. The Prosecution submitted that the principle of superior responsibility applies not only to military commanders, but also extends to civilians in positions of authority.[85] The Chamber finds that the application of criminal responsibility to those civilians who wield the requisite authority is not a contentious one. There are a number of reasons for this.

214. The construction of the Statute itself is clear. It makes no limited reference to the responsibility to be incurred by military commanders alone.[86] Rather, the more generic term of "superior" is used. The Chamber concurs with the observation in the Celebici Judgement that this generic term, coupled with its juxtaposition to the individual criminal responsibility of "Head[s] of State or Government" or "responsible Government officials" in Article 6(2), clearly reflects the intention of the drafters to extend this provision of superior responsibility beyond military commanders, to also "encompass political leaders and other civilian superiors in positions of authority."[87]

215. The jurisprudence also supports this interpretation. Before Trial Chamber I of this Tribunal, the former Prime Minister, Jean Kambanda, pleaded guilty to crimes against humanity and genocide by virtue, inter alia, of Article 6(3).[88] Similarly, Omar Serushago, a prominent local civilian and leader of the members of the Interahamwe in Gisenyi Prefecture, also pleaded guilty to crimes against humanity and genocide and acknowledged responsibility for these crimes pursuant to Article 6(3).[89] In addition, the Celebici Judgement, which addressed this issue in great detail, highlighted the practice of the Military Tribunal for the Far East (Tokyo Tribunal), and the Superior Military Government Court of the French Occupation Zone in Germany, where senior politicians and even leading industrialists were charged with the commission of war crimes committed by their subordinates.[90]

216. The crucial question in those cases was not the civilian status of the accused, but of the degree of authority he exercised over his subordinates.[91] Accordingly the Chamber accepts the submission made by the Prosecution that a civilian in a position of authority may be liable under the doctrine of command responsibility. The Chamber will turn, therefore, to consider in what instances a civilian can be considered a superior for the purposes of Article 6(3), and the requisite "degree of authority" necessary to establish individual criminal culpability pursuant to this doctrine of superior responsibility.

Concept of Superior: de Jure and de Facto Control

217. This superior-subordinate relationship lies at the heart of the concept of command responsibility. The basis under which he assumes responsibility is that, if he knew or had r know that a crime may or had been committed, then he must take all measures necessary to prevent the crime or punish the perpetrators. If he does not take such actions that are within his power then, accordingly, he is culpable for those crimes committed. The Trial Chamber in Celebici set out the guiding principle in this respect, when it stated that, "[T]he doctrine of command responsibility is ultimately predicated upon the power of the superior to control the acts of his subordinates".[92] The Chamber then elaborated upon this principle by warning that, "[We] must at all times be alive to the realities of any given situation and be prepared to pierce such veils of formalism that may shield those individuals carrying the greatest responsibility for heinous acts."[93]

5606

218. In order to 'pierce the veils of formalism' therefore, the Chamber must be prepared to look beyond the de jure powers enjoyed by the accused and consider the de facto authority he exercised within Kibuye during April to July 1994. The position expounded by the ILC that an individual should only be responsible for those crimes that were within his legitimate legal powers to prevent,[94] does not assist the Trial Chamber in tackling the, 'realities of any given situation'. Therefore, in view of the chaotic situation that which prevailed in Rwanda in these pivotal months of 1994, the Chamber must be free to consider whether Kayishema had the requisite control over those committing the atrocities to establish individual criminal liability under Article 6(3), whether by de jure or de facto command.

219. A concentration upon the de jure powers of the prefect would assist neither Party. For example, focussing upon the de jure power of the prefect under the 1991 Constitution would be to prevent proper consideration of the Defence's case that the climate in Rwanda and the practical realities at that time were such that the prefect not only had no control over certain de jure subordinates, but also that he had no means to effectively prevent the atrocities that were occurring. Equally, a restricted view of the concept of superior to those exercising de jure control would not enable the Chamber to adequately consider the arguments of the Prosecution. She submitted that Kayishema exercised both legal command over those committing the massacres and de facto authority over these and other assailants such as the members of the Interahamwe.

220. This approach is also congruent with the Celebici case and the authorities cited therein.[95] For example, having examined the Hostage and High Command cases the Chamber in Celebici concluded that they authoritatively asserted the principle that, "powers of influence not amounting to formal powers of command provide a sufficient basis for the imposition of command responsibility." This Trial Chamber concurs.

221. Moreover, the Rome Statute for the ICC, having delineated the circumstances in which a military commander would incur responsibility as a superior, stipulates in Article 28(2) that all other superiors shall be criminally responsible for acts, "committed by subordinates under his or her effective control." [emphasis added].

5607

222. Article 6 of this Tribunal's Statute is formulated in a broad manner. By including responsibility of all government officials, all superiors and all those acting pursuant to orders, it is clearly designed to ensure that those who are culpable for the commission of a crime under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute cannot escape responsibility through legalistic formalities. Therefore, the Chamber is under a duty, pursuant to Article 6(3), to consider the responsibility of all individuals who exercised effective control, whether that control be de jure or de facto.

223. Where it can be shown that the accused was the de jure or de facto superior and that pursuant to his orders the atrocities were committed, then the Chamber considers that this must suffice to found command responsibility. The Chamber need only consider whether he knew or had reason to know and failed to prevent or punish the commission of the crimes if he did not in fact order them. If the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused ordered the alleged atrocities then it becomes unnecessary to consider whether he tried to prevent; and irrelevant whether he tried to punish.

224. However, in all other circumstances, the Chamber must give full consideration to the elements of 'knowledge' and 'failure to prevent and punish' that are set out in Article 6(3) of the Statute.

Knowledge of Subordinates' Actions

225. The mens rea in Article 6(3) requires that for a superior to be held criminally responsible for the conduct of his subordinates he must have known, or had reason to know, of their criminal activities. If it can be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the superior knew of the crimes that were being committed by those over whom he exercised control then the requisite mens rea is clearly established.

226. However, when we consider that individual responsibility arises when the superior "had reason to know" that a crime had or was about to be committed, the requisite mens rea is not so clear. The expansive approach to apportioning command responsibility in the cases following the Second World War was observed by the Trial Chamber in the Celebici Judgement. These cases first imposed a duty for the commander to know everything that occurred within his ambit of jurisdiction, and then imposed responsibility upon the commander for failure to fulfil that duty.[96] The Chamber in the Celebici case did not follow this reasoning. Instead it preferred it be proven that some information be available that would put the accused on notice of an offence and require further investigation by him.

227. On this issue, the Chamber finds the distinction between military commanders and other superiors embodied in the Rome Statute an instructive one.[97] In the case of the former it imposes a more active duty upon the superior to inform himself of the activities of his subordinates when he, "knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes." This is juxtaposed with the mens rea element demanded of superiors who must have, "[known], or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes."

5608

228. The Trial Chamber agrees with this view insofar that it does not demand a prima facie duty upon a non-military commander to be seized of every activity of all persons under his or her control. In light of the objective of Article 6(3) which is to ascertain the individual criminal responsibility for crimes as serious as genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of Common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II thereto, the Chamber finds that the Prosecution must prove that the accused in this case either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated or put him on notice that his subordinates had committed, or were about to commit acts in breach of Articles 2 to 4 of this Tribunal's Statute.

Effective Control: Failure to Prevent or Punish a Crime

229. The principle of command responsibility must only apply to those superiors who exercise effective control over their subordinates. This material ability to control the actions of subordinates is the touchstone of individual responsibility under Article 6(3). The International Law Commission in its Draft Code went so far as to suggest that for a superior to incur criminal responsibility, he must have, "the legal competence to take measures to prevent or repress the crime and the material possibility to take such measures."[98] [emphasis added].

230. However, as the Chamber highlighted above, to give such prominence to the de jure power bestowed upon an individual is to provide justice to neither Party. There is a need to shed this legalistic formalism and to focus upon the situation which prevails in the given fact situation. Therefore, the Chamber prefers the position as set out in the Celebici Judgement where it was held that,

> . . . the superior have effective control over the persons committing the underlying violations of humanitarian law, in the sense of having the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of these offences. With the caveat that such authority can have a de facto as well as a de jure character. . .[99]

231. Accordingly, the ability to prevent and punish a crime is a question that is inherently linked with the given factual situation. Thus, only in light of the findings which follow and an examination of the overall conditions in which Kayishema had to operate as Prefect, can the Chamber consider who were the subordinates to Kayishema from April to July 1994 and whether he exercised the requisite degree of control over them in order to conclude whether he is individually criminally responsible for the atrocities committed by them.

5609

[1] Virginia Morris & Michael Scharf, THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR RWANDA, 167 (1998)

[2] Cited in Bassiouni, in THE LAW OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE FOI YUGOSLAVIA, p. 524, and UN AND RWANDA, 1993-6, p. 432, para. 166.

[3] Wisconsin International Law Journal, 243 (1996).

[4] UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1985/6, p. 16, para. 29.

[5] Morris & Scharf, supra, p. 168.

[6] Prosecutor's Brief, 9 Oct. 1998, p. 30.

[7] Akayesu Judgement, para. 731.

[8] ILC Draft Code of Crimes' p. 42, para. 8.[Throughout the text, page citations to the International Law Commission (ILC) Report 1996 may refer to the Internet version at http://www.un.org/law/ilc/reports/196/chap02.htm]

[9] Ibid.

[10] Mr. Whitaker, in UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1985/6, p. 16, para. 29.

[11] Trans., 21 Oct. 1998, p. 91.

[12] Ibid.

[13] ILC Draft Code of Crimes, p. 42, (commenting upon sub-paragraph (a) to (e) of Article 17).

[14] Paras. 500 – 501, p. 206.

[15] Rahetlah, submission, 21 October 1998, pp. 114 to 121.

[16] Akayesu Judgement, para 502.

[17] Akayesu Judgement, paras 706-07 and 711-12.

[18] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, 9 Oct. 1998, p. 26.

[19] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, 9 October 1998, p.28.

[20] Nehemiah Robinson, the Genocide Convention: A Commentary (1960), p. 123.

[21] Robinson, supra, pp. 63-64.

[22] Law No. 10 of the Control Council for Germany.

[23] International Law Reports (ILR)', vol. 36, p. 31.

[24] 36 ILR.

[25] 125 ILR.

[26] Despite the French text containing the conjunctive 'and' instead of the disjunctive 'or' between the terms widespread or systematic, the Trial Chamber is in no doubt that the correct interpretation is the disjunctive. The matter has already been settled in the Akayesu Judgement and needs no further debate here.

[27] The ILC Draft Code of Crimes explained „large scale" (the term used in place of 'widespread') to mean acts that are "directed against a multiplicity of victims." Article 18, para. 4 of commentary.

[28] The ILC Draft Code of Crimes defines systematic as "meaning pursuant to a preconceived plan or policy. The implementation of this plan or policy could result in the repeated or continuous commission of inhumane acts. The thrust of this requirement is to exclude random acts that were not committed as part of a broader plan or policy." Article 18, para. 3 of commentary.

[29] ILC Draft Code of Crimes Article 18.

[30] ILC Draft Code of Crimes Art. 18 para. 5 of commentary.

5640

[31] Tadic Judgement, at para 638.

[32] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, p. 42.

[33] For detailed discussion regarding ethnicity see the Historical Context Part of the Judgement.

[34] Closing Arguments at p. 26.

[35] Tadic Judgement, at para 656, "therefore in addition to the intent to commit the underlying offence the perpetrator must know of the broader context in which his acts occur."

[36] Indeed, the Statute, Article 2(2)(a)(Genocide) refers to "killing" – "meurtre" in French, while Article 4(a) refers to "murder" – "meurtre" in French.

[37] Nouveau Code PJnal, Article 221-3 "Le meurtre commis avec prJmeditation constitute un assassinat. Il est puni de la rJclusion criminelle < perpetuitJ. [...]"

[38] Akayesu Judgement, at para 588.

[39] For example, at the high end of murder the mens rea corresponds to the mens rea of assassinat, i.e., unlawful killing with premeditation. Conversely, at the low end of murder where mere intention or recklessness is sufficient and premeditation is not required, the mens rea of murder corresponds to the mens rea of meurtre.

[40] Notably the text was drafted in English and French, both being original and authentic. The Statute was then translated into the four remaining official UN languages. Therefore, between English and French there was no translation. Accordingly, there can be no 'error in translation' as such; there can only be a mistake in the drafting of an original text. Notably, the term used in the ICTY Statute is also assassinat (ICTY Statute Article 5(a)).

[41] Of course, in common law, there is no crime of unlawful killing that provides for a higher standard of mens rea than that of murder. Therefore, even if the drafters intended that only the standard of mens rea for assassinat would suffice, the drafters would still need to use the term murder in English.

[42] This explanation conforms to the French jurisprudence of the criminal court and to the United States Supreme Court case law.

[43] See Amnesty International's 14 Point Program for the Prevention of Extrajudicial Executions.

[44] Akayesu Judgement, at para 591.

[45] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, at p. 36.

[46] Akayesu Judgement, at para 735-744.

[47] Ruzindana Closing Argument, at p. 8.

[48] Cherif Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity in International Law (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers 1992).

[49] For example, if ten FAR officers fire into a crowd of 200 Tutsis, killing them all. FAR officer X is a poor shot and kills only a single person, whereas officer Y kills 16. Because both X and Y participated in the mass killing and were both aware that their actions formed part of the mass killing event, they will both be guilty of extermination.

[50] ICRC COMMENTARY ON THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS p. 54.

[51] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, p. 37.

[52] See, Ruzindana, Closing Arguments, pp. 38-41.

[53] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, p. 80. See also pp. 93, 101, 105 and 134.

[54] "First Convention," "second Convention," "third Convention" and "fourth Convention" mean, respectively, the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Conditions of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of 12 August 1949; the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Conditions of the Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked members of Armed Forces at Sea of 12 August 1949; the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of 12 August 1949; the Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 12 August 1949.

[55] The Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949, Commentary, IV Geneva Convention, p. 3. (ICRC Pub., 1958). Hereafter,

"Commentary on IV Geneva Convention, ICRC".

[56] Ibid., p. 9.

[57] ICRC comments on Additional Protocol II. See the ICRC website, (visited 6 May. 1999) <http://www.icrc.org>.

[58] Commentary on IV Geneva Convention, p. 34.

[59] Preliminary remarks of the ICRC to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, p. 17.

[60] Report by ICRC Meeting of Experts, Geneva, 27-29 October 1998, p. 2. See the ICRC website (visited 29 Dec. 1998) <http://www.icrc.org>.

[61] See Art. 1 of Additional Protocol II.

[62] Akayesu Judgement, para. 631.

[63] COMMENTARY ON THE ADDITIONAL PROTOCOLS (Jean Pictet, ed.) (ICRC, Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Geneva, 1987), p. 610, section 1913.

[64] Additional Protocol II, Art. 13(3).

[65] Additional Protocol I, Article 50(3).

[66] ICTY Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction of 2 October 1995, para. 69.

[67] Ibid. para. 70.

[68] Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo, Case No. IT-96-21-T, 16 Nov. 1998, para. 193.

[69] Tadic Judgement, para. 573.

[70] The Second Discussion Paper (PCNICC/1999/WGE/RT.2).

[71] Defence closing arguments, read from written brief submitted by Mr. Van der Griend on behalf of Ruzindana, on 28 October 1998 ("Closing Brief for Ruzindana"), p. 45. In the Closing Brief for Ruzindana, counsel at once urged this cumulative reading, and then endorsed its disjunctive formulation adopted by the Akayesu Judgement, p. 45. The Chamber enunciates its view here for the purpose of clarity.

[72] Celebici Judgement, para 321. See also the cases and conventions cited therein.

[73] Akayesu Judgement, para. 473. See also para. 484 where Trial Chamber I reads "aiding and abetting" disjunctively.

[74] Prosecution Closing Brief, p. 17. This test was drawn from the Tadic Judgement applying identical provisions in Article 7(1) of the ICTY Statute.

[75] See, respectively, paras. 480-484, and paras. 673-674 and 688-692.

[76] See Tadic Judgement, para. 673-674; Celebici Judgement, para. 326; Akayesu Judgement, para. 473-475; Furundzija Judgement, para. 235; and the authorities cited therein.

[77] See Akayesu Judgement, paras. 480-485.

[78] Furundzija Judgement, para 207.

[79] See the Akayesu Judgement where the accused's failure to oppose the killings, in light of his authoritative position, was found to constitute a form of tacit encouragement, para. 705.

[80] What constitutes a crime is defined by the Tribunal's Statute. Therefore, only the actual commission of a crime will suffice, except for that of genocide where it is specifically stated that an 'attempt' to commit genocide will give rise to criminal responsibility, Article 2(3)(d) of the Statute.

[81] Celebici Judgement, para. 328.

[82] See Furundzija Judgement, paras. 250-257.

[83] Hereafter, responsibility arising under this Article shall be referred to as "command responsibility", or "superior responsibility". The terms will be used interchangeably.

[84] Celebici Judgement, paras. 333-343, in reference to the respective Article in the ICTY Statute.

[85] Closing Brief, p. 20.

[86] C.f. the specification of the responsibility of "military commanders" in Article 87 of Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions 1949, (Jean Pictet ed.).

[87] Celebici Judgement, para. 356.

[88] Prosecutor v. Jean Kambanda, Judgement and Sentence, Case No.: ICTR 97-23-S (Eng.).

[89] Prosecutor v. Omar Serushago, Judgement and Sentence, Case No.: ICTR 98-39-S (Eng.).

[90] Ibid, paras. 356-362.

[91] See the opinion of Judge Röling in the "Rape of Nanking" case, and the Akayesu Judgement, para. 491.

[92] Celebici Judgement, para. 376.

[93] Ibid., para. 377.

[94] ILC Draft Code of Crimes.

[95] Celebici Judgement, paras. 364-378.

[96] See Celebici Judgement, para. 389, and the cases cited therein, particularly the Hostage case, the Toyoda case, and the Pohl case.

[97] Article 28(1)(a), and 28(2)(a).

[98] ILC Draft Code of Crimes, pp. 38-39.

[99] Celebici Judgement, para. 378.

5613

V. FACTUAL FINDINGS

5.1 ALIBI
5.2 DID GENOCIDE OCCUR IN RWANDA AND KIBUYE IN 1994?
5.3 AN INTRODUCTION: THE MASSACRES AT THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND HOME ST. JEAN COMPLEX, STADIUM IN KIBUYE TOWN AND THE CHURCH IN MUBUGA
5.4 THE MASSACRES IN THE AREA OF BISESERO

5.1 ALIBI

232. Both Kayishema and Ruzindana raised the defence of alibi to the charges levied against them. Both accused assert that they were not at the sites when any of the massacres occurred. The Trial Chamber shall consider the arguments advanced by Kayishema and Ruzindana below. Before examining the specifics of the alibi defences, however, it is first necessary to consider the procedural concerns that have accompanied their invocation.

5.1.1 Alibi Defence and Rule 67 of the Rules

The salient provisions of Rule 67 of the Rules state that,

> (A) As early as reasonably possible and in any event prior to the commencement of the trial:
> (ii) the defence shall notify the Prosecutor of its intent to enter:
> (a) the defence of alibi; in which case the notification shall specify the place or places at which the accused claims to have been present at the time of the alleged crime and the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the alibi
>
> (B) Failure of the defence to provide such notice under this Rule shall not limit the right of the accused to rely on any of the above defences.

233. The requirement upon the Defence to disclose its intention to rely upon the defence of alibi reflects the well-established practice in the common law jurisdictions around the world.[1] It is a requirement necessary in many jurisdictions, and in the jurisdiction of this Tribunal, in order to allow the Prosecution to adequately prepare its case. Once the accused has raised the defence of alibi, the burden to prove this defence may or may not rest upon him depending upon the jurisdiction concerned. In some jurisdictions such as India, the burden of proof rests upon individuals, who plead the defence of alibi.[2] In several other jurisdictions as for example in South Africa, the burden of proof rests upon the Prosecution.[3]

234. In the instant case, the Trial Chamber holds that the burden of proof rests upon the Prosecution to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt in all aspects notwithstanding that the Defence raised alibi. After all, the accused is presumed innocent until the Prosecution has proved his guilt under Article 20(3) of the Statute. The accused is only required to raise the defence of alibi and fulfil the specific requirements of Rule 67(A)(ii) of the Rules, which stipulates the necessary information required about the defence of alibi.

235. Under Rule 67 aforementioned, the Defence is required to notify the Prosecution about their intent to rely upon the defence of alibi. However, Counsel for Kayishema made absolutely no indication prior to the commencement of the trial of his intention to rely upon the defence of alibi, and Counsel for Ruzindana only submitted limited information with regard to the witnesses that he intended to call. The Prosecution filed a formal complaint by Motion in which it requested the Trial Chamber to order compliance with Rule 67(A)(ii) of the Rules.[4]

236. During the hearing, Kayishema was asked why, in light of the evidence he had heard against him, he had not raised his defence of alibi at an earlier stage. He stated that as far as the Office of the Prosecutor was concerned, the question was never asked of him. Furthermore, he raised the issue at the first opportunity with his Defence Counsel on 31 May 1996.

237. The Trial Chamber has considered the failure of both Defence Counsels to act in accordance with Rule 67(A)(ii). In its Decision on the above Prosecution Motion, the Chamber ruled,

> . . . that where good cause is not shown, for the application of Rule 67(B), the Trial Chamber is entitled to take into account this failure when weighing the credibility of the defence of alibi and/or any special defences presented.[5]

238. The Trial Chamber notes that the Defence had ample time to prepare their client's defence and takes this on board in consideration of the timeliness of Counsel's notification of the Prosecution in accordance with Rule 67(A)(ii) of the Rules. This approach is congruent with those jurisdictions[6] facing similar difficulties in balancing the needs of the Prosecution with the Defendant's right to testify and present a defence.[7]

239. Counsel for the Defence constantly advanced the argument that the Prosecution's concern over the continued violations of this rule was unjustified in light of the Prosecution's late disclosure of witness lists.[8] However, all Parties to the proceedings had the opportunity to raise such lack of disclosure in the appropriate manner before this Chamber. Therefore, the Defence's failure to follow the Rules of Procedure and Evidence is unacceptable and serves neither the interests of the accused nor of justice. Furthermore, the Defence's observation that under Rule 85 the Prosecution may bring evidence to rebut the alibi, does not mitigate the aforementioned duty upon the Defence under Rule 67.[9] Moreover, the mere fact that the Prosecutor did not utilise Rule 85 to bring evidence in rebuttal will not have any bearing upon the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence presented. Thus, this Chamber will accord no extra weight to the accused's defence of alibi merely because the Prosecution did not call witnesses in rebuttal. Considering the Decision on the above Motion, in which the Trial Chamber ordered the compliance with Rules 67(A)(ii) and 67(B) and in light of the considerations discussed above, the Trial Chamber will, despite the non-compliance with its order and the defianc Defence Counsel, consider the defence of alibi advanced by both Kayishema and Ruzindana without prejudice to the accused.

5.1.2 Kayishema's Alibi Defence

240. The essence of Kayishema's alibi is that he was in hiding from the morning of Saturday 16 April 1994, to the morning of Wednesday 20 April 1994. These dates purportedly removed him from the scene of the massacres at Catholic Church, Home St. Jean Complex and the Stadium that occurred on 16, 17, 18, 19 April. It would also remove him from Mubuga Church on the 16 April, the date that the Trial Chamber has found the major attack at this site occurred. It would not, however, account for his whereabouts in the days that preceded this attack. Kayishema also denies ever being present at any of the massacre sites in the Bisesero area during the period set out in the Indictment, but provides no specific alibi.

241. Kayishema testified before this Trial Chamber that in the early hours of Saturday 16 April, upon the departure of the commanding officer Major Jabo, the Tutsi gendarmes were mutinying and were looking for him with harmful intention. Upon receipt of this information he, with his wife and children, went into hiding. Kayishema stated in his testimony that between 9 and 10 a.m. he and his family left the prefectorial house and went into hiding. They sought refuge in the houses of white people in Kibuye because they had already been looted and no one was likely to return to them. The first house was that of Mr. Soufflet which lay along from the Prefectorial residence on Lake Kivu, approximately three kilometres from Home St. Jean and the Catholic Church. Kayishema stated that they remained there for the nights of 16 and 17 April. He and his family then moved next door, to the last house in that direction, for the remaining two nights. This was owned by a Swiss technical assistant who was working in the forestry department. Kayishema contended that he was absent from his family only when he would investigate a noise outside or when his informant visited their hiding place. This absence was never in excess of 30 minutes.

242. In an earlier account, Kayishema had volunteered details of this Prosecution period to the investigators, as shown in exhibit 350C, a transcript of the interview with investigators. On 6 November 1996, during the interview with investigators, Kayishema stated that he was in his own home during the period of the massacres at Home St. Jean, the Catholic Church, and the Stadium. Although at this time he could not remember the dates, or the days of the week that he was confined to his house, Kayishema identified individuals with whom he had hidden, namely Emmanuel Dusabimana, Alphonse Kayiranga, the wife of Lieutenant Charles Twagirayezu and the Tutsi wife of a Hutu named Francois. He did not, however, call any of these people to testify on his behalf. In this statement he also asserted that he would spend his nights, in the bush, hiding. During his cross-examination Kayishema explained the difference between his oral testimony and his statement to the investigators. He stated that hi in both was that he had been in hiding during the period of the massacres at the aforementioned sites and, therefore, could not have perpetrated the atrocities alleged.

243. In his testimony, Kayishema went on to describe his activities after he came out of hiding. He talked of travelling around the Prefecture, burying bodies and taking wounded or malnourished children to the hospital, around 22 April. He met with the interim Prime Minister, Jean Kambanda, on 3 May and attended a public meeting with him. Kayishema also talked of going to Gitarama on 9 May in order to meet with the interim government that was based there at that time. His diary,[10] the personal diary of the Prefect, details meetings on 10, 11, and 13 May with his sous prefects. Kayishema referred to these meetings, as well as those on the 14 May with his prefectorial council and on 16 May with the interim president, in his testimony to the Trial Chamber. He also confirmed that he had gone into the Bisesero area throughout May, but only to conduct his prefectorial duties and to investigate the disparities between the information he had received and the actual situation in the area. Kayishema submitted, therefore, that Defence witness DU, who testified that the defendant had not left his prefectorial office in this period, had been mistaken. Kayishema maintained, however, that he never visited any of the massacre sites in the Bisesero area during the months of April, May and June 1994 as charged in the Indictment. Moreover, when questioned in cross-examination about eye-witnesses who had identified him in the Bisesero area at specific sites such as Muyira Hill, and the Cave, Kayishema maintained that he did not know where such sites were even located. He asserted that those witnesses who identified him at various massacre sites either between 16 to 20 April, or in the Bisesero area during the massacres in April, May and June had erred.

Defence Witnesses in Support of Kayishema

244. In support of his alibi defence, the defendant called a number of witnesses, including his wife. In her first statement to investigators Mrs. Kayishema had stated that she, her husband and their children had gone into hiding in mid April. She also stated that on 13 May, the date of one of the major attacks in the Bisesero area, her husband had driven her to work in the morning and after dropping her at her work place, he went directly to his office. She arrived at work that Friday morning at 8 a.m., and returned home with her husband at 11 a.m.

245. In her testimony before the Chamber, however, Mrs. Kayishema, who holds a degree in education science and has served as a school inspector, clarified and elaborated upon her first statement. She contended that they had gone into hiding between 16 and 20 April 1994, following the departure of the commanding officer of the gendarmerie nationale in Kibuye Prefecture on 15 April. The corporal who remained was an RPF sympathiser and, she asserted, they had been informed that he had made various threats against the prefect. Although in her testimony Mrs. Kayishema referred to just female and sick gendarmes who had remained behind after the meeting on 15 April, she maintained that she and her husband had gone into hiding on 16 April for fear of their lives. They hid in the houses people who had been building the roads, staying in several houses and changing frequently. No more details about the houses were given. However, when questioned about her initial statement to investigators where she claimed to have gone into hiding in the bush for three days, she was able to clarify to this Chamber that she and her children had been hiding in the houses, and that her husband had spent the nights in the bush.

5617

246. In her testimony, Kayishema's wife further elaborated upon the events of Friday 13 May 1994. In addition to the activities in the morning, she recalled that she had attended a public meeting chaired by her husband. The meeting, which began at 2 p.m., was to present the new sous prefets. Mrs. Kayishema did not offer any further testimony regarding her husband's whereabouts over the ensuing weeks, but simply stated that he continued with his duties as Prefect until their departure to Zaire on 16 July 1994.

247. Most witnesses for Kayishema had either not seen him at all during the period in question, such as witness DAC, or had seen him for very short periods of time on isolated occasions. Witness DN, for example, had seen him at a meeting in late April, witness DK saw him at a meeting to inaugurate a school in mid May, and witness DM had seen him briefly sometime in May at the roundabout at the centre of Kibuye Town. Consequently, although all Defence witnesses testified to never having heard of the participation of their Prefect in these massacres, very little specific evidence was proffered as to the accused's whereabouts during their execution. Only two other witnesses were able to provide further detailed insight into Kayishema's activities from 6 April 1994. With regard to the massacre at Mubuga Church, the only witness presented by the Defence was DV. The witness knew the accused by sight because he had seen him in Gitesi where he undertook his studies. He had not actually been present at the massacre and was unsure of the date it occurred. However, he lived only six to seven hundred meters from Mubuga Church and stated that he had not seen the defendant in the vicinity during the period of the massacres. In fact, witness DV testified that he did not see the defendant at all throughout April, May, June or July.

248. Witness DU testified as to Kayishema's whereabouts from 4 May to 16 July 1994. His testimony covered almost the entire period. He knew the defendant well and stayed in Kayishema's house upon returning to Kibuye on 4 May. DU also worked in a canteen, just fifteen meters from the entrance of the Prefecture offices. Although he could not see Kayishema's office, he had a clear view of the entrance of these offices. He testified that he saw Kayishema every day over those two months. He ate breakfast, lunch and evening meals with Kayishema and his family, and often travelled to and from work with him. In the opinion of DU, Kayishema could not have visited the Bisesero area at any time from 4 May to 16 July because the defendant was never absent for periods in excess of 30 minutes. The witness felt able to state this with some certainty because of the proximity of the canteen to the defendant's offices and the fact that the noise of Kayishema's vehicle as he arrived at or depa. the offices made his whereabouts very obvious. The one exception that the witness could recall to these minimal absences was when Kayishema led a meeting and was gone for six hours. Mrs. Kayishema informed witness DU that Kayishema was at a meeting. Like the many other witnesses called for the Defence, DU had never heard any reference to the participation in any massacres by his Prefect, Kayishema.

Examination of Kayishema's Alibi Defence

249. Having set out the defence propounded by Kayishema, the Trial Chamber has also given consideration to the various arguments raised by the Prosecution with regard to the issue of Kayishema's alibi. Particularly, the Chamber has taken note of the many contradictions in the defence raised by Kayishema. These are contradictions not only within his own testimony, but also contradictions between his testimony and the testimony of his wife and the other witnesses called on his behalf.

250. The Trial Chamber observes Kayishema's various statements to the investigators and to the Chamber do not correlate. For instance, in his first voluntary statement to investigators in July 1996 Kayishema made no reference to being in hiding or to the events which supposedly led to his being in hiding, namely the 'mutiny' of the gendarmerie nationale. A number of observations may be made in this regard. In the first instance, the Trial Chamber does not make a negative finding due solely to Kayishema's non-disclosure of his alibi during the initial interviews with investigators. However, in addition to this non-disclosure within his interviews, in Kayishema's diary there was no mention of him either being in hiding or of the gendarme mutiny. The diary, Kayishema confirmed, was the personal diary of the Prefect. Whilst this Chamber appreciates that it is not possible to note every event which occurred, it is surprising that no mention was made of such major events, in particular those that precluded him from undertaking his official functions as Prefect.

251. The second statement given by Kayishema to investigators, on 6 November 1996, also differs in many respects from his testimony before this Chamber. In that interview, Kayishema did not remain silent, but gave specific details of his whereabouts during the massacres at the Home St. Jean complex, the Catholic Church and Gatwaro Stadium. He stated that he was in his home, the residence of the Prefect. When questioned specifically if he was in his home, for the whole time, Kayishema affirmed, "Home, in my house." Kayishema further provided the names of those individuals with whom he was hiding, as set out above. He also went on to describe how he would have to spend entire nights in the bush. Kayishema's statement that he was in his own home contradicts his testimony in court where he testified that he was in hiding in houses belonging to others. In his testimony, responding to a judicial question inquiring whether he was in his home or in hiding, Kayishema confirmed that he was hiding in the bush at night. This answer does not clear up the discrepancy. In his oral testimony Kayishema gave specific details of being in two houses for two nights each, moving from one to the other. Further, when questioned specifically as to why he had told investigators that he had been in his home. Ka referred to the need to protect the identity of those in whose houses he had occupied. Responding to another judicial question inquiring why, therefore, he had not told investigators that he had been in hiding could not reveal the identity of Kayishema simply asserted that he had not lied. Kayishema suggested that his response to investigators that he had been in his house had served its purpose, namely to protect the identity of those in the houses of whom he sought refuge.

5619

252. One final point was raised with regard to Kayishema's presence at the sites of Home St. Jean, and the Stadium. In his statement to the investigators he was asked specifically if he had ever visited any of these sites between 7 April and the end of May. He answered emphatically, no. Yet in cross-examination before this Chamber, he stated that he had been at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean sometime between 13 April and the massacres. When questioned on this discrepancy, he answered that he understood that the investigator was asking whether he had been to these sites on a daily basis. This explanation is not entirely convincing.

Contradictions Between Kayishema's Evidence and the Evidence of his Wife and Others

253. The contradictions within this defence extend beyond the statements and testimonies of Kayishema alone. Discrepancies exist, for example, between his account and that of his wife's. In her statement to the investigators on 28 April 1998 Mrs. Kayishema maintained that she and her family were in hiding for three days in the bush, but she could not remember the days or dates. Almost two months later, before this Trial Chamber, she testified that they went into hiding on 15 April, and finally concluded under cross-examination that they had actually gone into hiding on 16 April. She made no mention of others being in their house prior to their departure. Whilst Mrs. Kayishema confirms that they were in hiding until 20 April, she talks of moving from house to house "frequently".[11] Her husband said that they were in just two houses. She testified that he spent the nights in the bush. He testified that for these four nights and days he did not leave her in excess of 30 minutes.

254. With respect to those dates outside of 16 to 20 April, Mrs. Kayishema's testimony offers little further insight. She does not provide any information of her husband's whereabouts on 15 April, during the massacres at Mubuga Church. Similarly, she provides little information on his movements after they came out of hiding. She does confirm that he continued his activities as Prefect and she also testified as to his activities on Friday 13 May 1994. It was on this date that one of the major attacks in the Bisesero area occurred. It was her testimony, however, that during that day Kayishema had driven her to work at around 8 a.m. They then returned home at approximately 11 a.m. that same morning where they stayed until she and her husband attended a public meeting where the defendant presented the new sous préfets at 2 p.m. that afternoon. When asked why Mrs. Kayishema had not mentioned this meeting in the afternoon when speaking to investigators two months prior to her testimony she claimed that she had simply not remembered it. This meeting was entered in Kayishema's diary. However, whereas two previous meetings with regard to the new sous prefects had been written in French, this mee noted in another ink and written in Kinyarwanda. Furthermore, this note states that it was a meeting with all staff members to present the new sous prefects.[12] There is no mention of the meeting being a public one as Mrs. Kayishema had claimed. The Trial Chamber has some doubt whether the entry regarding this meeting was in fact entered at the time of events.

255. Beyond these specific days, and a few other notable days of interest such as when the Cardinal visited the region, the Mrs. Kayishema does not offer any further testimony as to her husband's actions during the remaining period when massacres were occurring in the Bisesero area. However, Witness DU, a friend of Kayishema who claims to have been resident in his house from 4 May, offers this alibi. He testified that apart from one day when the defendant was attending a meeting all morning, Kayishema never left his offices for more than half an hour. It is a testimony that is discredited initially by its improbability, especially in light of Kayishema's position as Prefect that demanded his presence over the whole Prefecture. It is also a testimony that is discredited by its contradictions with Mrs. Kayishema's and the defendant's own testimony before this Chamber. Kayishema gave detailed evidence of his continuing activities as Prefect throughout April, May and June. He specifically confirmed, contrary to the opinion of DU, that he had been to the Bisesero area. The testimony of witness DU, therefore, adds little weight to Kayishema's alibi defence for the massacres that occurred in the Bisesero region.

Kayishema's Elaboration

256. A further phenomenon highlighted by the Prosecution was the Kayishema's ability to recall exact dates, days and even times that he was in hiding during his testimony. It is a matter of concern to this Trial Chamber because it is in sharp contrast to his interview, almost two years prior. In that interview in November 1996 Kayishema could not provide any dates or even days that he was in hiding. Kayishema was asked in cross-examination before this Trial Chamber why he had given the response to the investigators that he did not remember what days he was in hiding. His considered response was that, in the first place, he did not know what were going to be the key issues for his defence. Secondly, he asserted that he had the right to remain silent. However, this Chamber notes that he did not remain silent. Rather, he specifically said that he did not remember.[13] The Chamber also notes that Kayishema could not have an answer what had aided his memory, in light of the absence of any entry in his diary, since that last interview. Although not conclusive in itself, the Trial Chamber has taken such elaboration into consideration.[14]

Finding

257. In light of these contradictions, this Chamber does not find any merit in the defence advanced by Kayishema. Whilst the burden of proof rests upon the Prosecution to prove the case against Kayishema, the defence of alibi that has been raised on his behalf has not been sufficient to levy any doubt against that Prosecution case which is set out and considered below.

5621

5.1.3 Ruzindana's Alibi Defence

258. In total, 21 witnesses appeared on behalf of Ruzindana alone and gave testimony pertinent to his defence of alibi. Most of these witnesses did not give a comprehensive account of Ruzindana's whereabouts during the period when massacres were known to have occurred in the Bisesero region. Nevertheless, a picture was built by the Defence of a man continuing his business in the town of Mugonero.

259. After the death of President Habyarimana, on 6 April 1994, Ruzindana and his family left Remera, a neighbourhood of Kigali, where they had been living. They returned to Mugonero where Ruzindana's father continued to run a shop. Ruzindana was a businessman and a well-known figure in the area. A number of witnesses testified to having seen Ruzindana for varying periods of time between April and July 1994. Witnesses testified to having seen Ruzindana serving customers in his father's shop, others observed Ruzindana at the local market which was held every Wednesday, or noticed him on the roads between Kibuye, Cyangugu and Gisenyi.

260. Specifically, witnesses such as DD testified to frequenting the store of Ruzindana's father "almost everyday" where, on most occasions, Ruzindana had served him.[15] Witness DD, a friend of Ruzindana's was not more specific but witness DAA apparently corroborated his account. Like DD, witness DAA worked in a store opposite the Ruzindana family shop and confirmed that Ruzindana was never away from Mugonero for more than a week. However, like all other witness who testified for the accused, he never accompanied Ruzindana on these business trips. Moreover, the only exact dates to which he could confirm that Ruzindana was present at Mugonero were the 12 to 14 April.

261. Ruzindana was also seen regularly in the Mugonero market, which was held every Wednesday. Witnesses DB, DE, DF, DN, DQ, DS and DY identified Ruzindana in the market on numerous occasions throughout April, May and June. However, no exact dates were ever given by these witnesses. Witness DB, for example, saw the accused one Wednesday in early May; witness DF recollected seeing him four times in these three months; witness DQ saw him once in April and twice in May. Thus, it is possible to see that these sightings, which would last only a few minutes, are utilised by the Defence to reflect the activities of an individual continuing his normal course of business. They are not, and cannot, be offered as a comprehensive alibi for his whereabouts during the massacres in the Bisesero area.

262. Similarly, the Defence offered a number of examples where witnesses had seen Ruzindana on the roads in the conduct of his business. Other witnesses referred to Ruzindana driving one of his four trucks in the course of his trading, transporting beer or coffee to and from Mugonero. Witness [illegible] example, testified that Ruzindana passed by on the road to Kibuye on at least nine occasions in this period; witness DS saw him with empty beer bottles on the way to Kibuye; witness DD, who worked opposite the Ruzindana shop, talked of the accused leaving with empty beer bottles and returning, a few hours later, with full ones; and witness DR, who owned a kiosk near the roadside, testified that Ruzindana would often drive past with his driver in his green Toyota pick-up truck – leaving at approximately 8 a.m. with empty beer bottles and returning around 4 p.m. with full ones. Although none of these witnesses were able to give the Trial Chamber any specific dates as to when they saw Ruzindana undertaking these trips, they were able to further elaborate upon the impression of an individual continuing his daily business activities. To this end, witnesses DB and DA also testified that Ruzindana was in the areas of Cyangugu and Gisenyi for business purposes. Once again, their information is very imprecise and relate his whereabouts for only very limited periods of time. For example, witness DB described how he met Ruzindana in Mugonero approximately one week after the President's death, in Cyangugu Prefecture on a Tuesday one month after that, and then in Mugonero on Wednesday of the next week.

263. The Chamber is cognisant of the difficulties often encountered by witnesses in recalling such details and we have, accordingly, set out our approach elsewhere.[16] However, the Trial Chamber observes that virtually none of the witnesses presented on behalf of the accused were able to give any substantial idea of his whereabouts in their testimony before this Tribunal. Beyond those already stipulated, only witness DH was able to verify a certain date that Ruzindana was in Mugonero. He described how the accused was present when he arrived in Mugonero on the morning of Saturday 16 April. Witness DH, a relative of the accused, remained there until 3 p.m. and described how Ruzindana had also stayed in the town for the duration of his visit. Beyond that, like those witnesses set out above, witness DH simply describes how he had met Ruzindana one day in mid May on the road to Kibuye, about twenty kilometres from Mugonero, and that Ruzindana had just bought supplies of beer.

264. Ruzindana's wife was one of the few who is able to give a more comprehensive picture of his movements during this period. She testified that whilst he went to work, she would remain in the house during the day. However, because they shared a midday meal every day she could be certain that Ruzindana was within the vicinity of Mugonero on most days. Mrs. Ruzindana testified that the Ruzindana had only left for prolonged periods of time on four or five occasions. These periods could be either one or two days if Ruzindana had gone to Cyangugu or Gisenyi on business. Employees working in Ruzindana's house supported this testimony. The houseboy, DC, testified that Ruzindana would leave very early some mornings and would not return for up to two days. Although he had no personal knowledge of why Ruzindana was away, DC testified that on such occasions Ruzindana had instructed him to inform his family that he had gone for supplies. No clear indication of the days or dates that the accused would spend away from the home were offered. This is in common with those other witnesses set out above who corroborated the fact that Ruzindana would go away for either day trips or p[illegible] periods of time, but could also offer no certainty as to when those occasions were. Accordingly, as with sightings at the market and on the road, the Trial Chamber is unable to assess whether the sightings and trips away that have been alluded to were congruent or separate.

5623

265. Each witness further testified that at no time did they see Ruzindana in the company of the militia or the armed forces or in the possession of any form of weapon during the period set out in the Indictment.

Examination of Ruzindana's Alibi Defence

266. The Prosecution questioned the reliability, credibility and relevance of various Defence witnesses. They raised the issue of reliability vis-à-vis the testimony of various witnesses who had close relationships with Ruzindana. Not only was there Ruzindana's wife who testified, but also two other relations, a number of close friends, and two employees of Ruzindana. The Prosecution also raised the issue of credibility of a number of these witnesses. For example, witness DB states that he saw Ruzindana in Cyangugu on 26 June as Ruzindana headed for Zaire. The Prosecution noted, however, that DC also testified before the Chamber that Ruzindana was at home the entire day on 26 June.

267. The final point raised by the Prosecution is the pertinence of the testimony of many Defence witnesses. The majority of the witnesses were close relatives or former employees, who are likely to benefit from shielding Ruzindana from any criminal responsibility. Many individuals testified to having seen him on market day for various lengths of time between five minutes and one hour. Several more testified to having seen him on the road to Kibuye, even those who did not know Ruzindana nevertheless remembered his frequent journeys. However, even those who spent a great deal of time with Ruzindana: his wife, his sister, and his brother-in-law, as well as his servants, all testify that they did not travel with him on the frequent business trips that he supposedly made. They, like all of the other witnesses for the Defence, were not in a position to corroborate Ruzindana's location when he left on his 'business trips.'

268. These witnesses cannot account for the activities of Ruzindana even on a day-to-day basis, let alone 24-hours-a-day. His wife, after all, confirmed that Ruzindana was gone for two-day periods on a number of occasions. Furthermore, in cross-examination his wife conceded that the Defendant made many more daylong journeys to Kibuye although he did not spend the night.[17] The many witnesses who had seen him on the road to Kibuye confirmed these apparent trips. However, in cross-examination these witnesses also stated that this same road from Mugonero to Kibuye divided, branching off into the direction of Gishyita and the area of Bisesero.

269. Bisesero lies approximately twenty kilometres from Mugonero. Given the proximity, therefore, these day trips would have more than sufficed to enable Ruzindana to reach the massacre sites a[illegible] return home. Accordingly, it is not sufficient for the purposes of his alibi defence, for witnesses to state that Ruzindana was the road from Mugonero or for Ruzindana's sister to state that whenever he was not on a business trip, that the accused would enjoy the family meal with them.

5624

270. Furthermore, the Prosecution does not deny that Ruzindana continued trading throughout April, May and June, or that he made several other trips to locations such as Cyangugu. Rather, this supports the contention of Prosecution witnesses, X, FF and II who had not only heard reference to their attackers coming from Gisenyi, Gikongoro and Cyangugu, but had also noticed the accents peculiar to these regions.

Finding

271. The Chamber is cognisant of the difficulties raised in advancing this defence due to the time period covered in the Indictment. The legal issues that this gives rise to have already been considered. [18] At this juncture it is sufficient to note that, on a factual basis, many witnesses for the Defence were unable to provide specific dates as to when they had seen Ruzindana in Mugonero.

272. The burden of proof is, of course, on the Prosecution to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt. In the opinion of the Trial Chamber, however, the alibi defence provided by Ruzindana does not diminish the Prosecution case. Even if the evidence proffered by the Defence in support of alibi is accepted in its entirety, it remains insufficient to raise doubt in relation to Ruzindana's presence in Bisesero at the times of the massacres. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber rejects the defence of alibi advanced by Ruzindana and has set out its factual findings below.

5625

5.2 DID GENOCIDE OCCUR IN RWANDA AND KIBUYE IN 1994?

273. A question of general importance to this case is whether genocide took place in Rwanda in 1994, as the Prosecution has alleged. Considering the plethora of official reports, including United Nations documents,[19] which confirm that genocide occurred in Rwanda and the absence of any Defence argument to the contrary, one could consider this point, settled. Nevertheless, the question is so fundamental to the case against the accused that the Trial Chamber feels obliged to make a finding of fact on this issue. The Trial Chamber underscores that a finding that genocide took place in Rwanda is not dispositive of the question of the accused's innocence or guilt. It is the task of this Chamber to make findings of fact based on the Indictment against the accused and assess the evidence to make a finding of the possible responsibility of each person under the law only.

274. According to Article 2 of the Tribunal's Statute, genocide means various enumerated acts committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such. The enumerated acts include, inter alia, killing members of a group and causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group. The purpose of this Chapter is not to decide whether specific acts by particular individuals amounted to genocidal acts, that is, acts committed with the special intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part. Rather, this Chapter assesses whether the events in Rwanda as a whole, reveal the existence of the elements of the crime of genocide. Such a finding allows for a better understanding of the context within which perpetrators may have committed the crimes alleged in the Indictment. Additionally, because the Indictment concerns events that took place in Kibuye, this Chapter of the Judgment includes a general examination of the events in that prefecture.

275. The Trial Chamber heard testimony from the United Nations Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights, Dr. René Degni-Segui, whose credentials qualified him as an expert and whose testimony was convincing. The Trial Chamber is seized of his reports to the Security Council on the situation of human rights in Rwanda in 1994, which he submitted after conducting investigations throughout Cyangugu, Butare and Kibuye prefectures. Inter alia, Degni-Segui proffered evidence[20] before the Trial Chamber that perpetrators planned the genocide of the Tutsi population prior to 7 April 1994, and produced reports concerning the massacres, which occurred during hostilities. He testified that although to date no one has found any official written document outlining the genocidal plan, there exist sufficient indicators that a plan was in place prior to the crash of the President's plane on 7 April 1994. These indicators include (1) execution lists, which targeted the Tutsi elite, government ministers, leading businessmen, professors and high profile Hutus, who may have favoured the implementation of the Arusha Accords; (2) the spreading of extremist ideology through the Rwandan media which facilitated the campaign of incitement to exterminate the Tutsi population; (3) the use of the civil defence programme and the distribution of weapons to the civilian population; and, (4) the "screening" carried out at many roadblocks which were erected with great speed after the downing of the Pre plane.[21] The outcome of the implementation of these indicators was the massacres carried out throughout the country.

5626

276. It is the opinion of the Trial Chamber that the existence of such a plan would be strong evidence of the specific intent requirement for the crime of genocide. To make a finding on whether this plan existed, the Trial Chamber examines evidence presented regarding the more important indicators of the plan.

Background to the Events of 1994

277. The time was ripe in early 1994 for certain so-called Hutu extremists in power in Rwanda who opposed the Arusha Accords, to avoid having to share decision-making positions with opposition groups. After attending a meeting on the implementation of the Arusha Peace Accords, in Tanzania, President Juvénal Habyarimana was en route to Rwanda when his plane was shot down over Kigali airport and crashed on 6 April 1994. Witness O testified that he on 8 April heard a broadcast on Radio France International (RFI) that the Rwandan People's Army (RPA or FAR) had announced the end of the cease-fire. The state of fear that ensued, caused by the rumours about the intentions of the RPF to exterminate the Hutus and the terror and insecurity that prevailed in Rwanda, served as a pretext for the execution of the genocidal plan and consequently the retention of power by the extremist Hutus. Based on eyewitness and expert testimony and reports, immediately after the plane crash, on 7 April 1994, massacres began throughout Rwanda.

278. A radio announcement on the morning of 7 April, concerning the death of the President, ordered people to remain at home. This announcement was made in order to facilitate the movement of the soldiers and gendarmes from house to house to arrest and execute real and perceived enemies of the Hutu extremists, specifically those named on execution lists. Witnesses, including Degni-Segui and Prosecution witness RR, confirmed this fact.

The Effects of Extremist Ideology Disseminated Through the Mass Media

279. Military and civilian official perpetuated ethnic tensions prior to 1994. Kangura newspaper, established after the 1990 RPF invasion, Radio Television Mille Colline (RTLM) and other print and electronic media took an active part in the incitement of the Hutu population against the Tutsis. Kangura had published the "Ten Commandments" for the Hutus in 1991, which stated that the Tutsis were the enemy. In addition, according to witnesses, in 1991 ten military commanders produced a full report that answered the question how to defeat the enemy in the military, media and political domains. These witnesses also testified that in September 1992 the military issued a memorandum, based on the 1991 report, which also defined the "enemy" as the Tutsi population, thereby transferring the hostile intentions of the RPF to all Tutsis. According to one report, prior to 6 April, the public authorities did not openly engage in inciting the Hutus to perpetrate massacres. On 19 April however, the Pr the Interim Government, told the people of Butare to "get to work" in the Rwandan sense of the term by using their machetes and axes.

5627

280. Several witnesses stated that during the atrocities "the Rwandese carried a radio set in one hand and a machete in the other."[22] This demonstrates that the radio was a powerful tool for the dissemination of ethnic hatred. Radio National and RTLM freely and regularly broadcasted ethnic hatred against the Tutsis. For example, a UNICEF report refers to an RTLM broadcast stating that "for babies who were still suckling . . . they [the assailants] had to cut the legs so that they would not be able to walk."[23] In 1992 Leon Mugesera, a professor turned propagandist for the MRND, declared in a public meeting "nous ne commettrons pas l' erreur de '59 ou nous avons fait échoppé des plus jeunes" (we will not make the 1959 mistake where we let the younger ones [Tutsis] escape.)[24] Mugusera also incited the Hutus by explaining that " . . . we must remove the entrails but there is shorter way, let us throw them into the river so they can go out of the country that way."[25] These speeches and reports became widely diffused through repetition in public meetings and through the mass media.

281. The dissemination and acceptance of such ideas was confirmed by a Hutu policeman to Prosecution witness Patrick de Saint-Exupery, a journalist reporting for the French newspaper Le Figaro. De Saint-Exupery remarked that the policeman had told him how they killed Tutsis "because they were the accomplices of the RPF" and that no Tutsis should be left alive.[26] (emphasis added.) This witness, who went to the Bisesero region late June 1994, described how "the hill was scattered, literally scattered with bodies, in small holes, in small ditches, on the foliage, along the ditches, there were bodies and there were many bodies."[27]

282. As a result of the diffusion of the anti-Tutsi propaganda, the killings "started off like a little spark and then spread."[28] Degni-Segui stated that many communities were involved. Butare was an exception as there was resistance to carrying out the killings because the prefect was a Tutsi. The killings did not start in Butare until 19 April, after the Interim Government sacked the prefect and after a visit and an inciting speech by the Interim President. The speech urged the inhabitants of Butare to engage in a murderous manhunt by appealing to the populace that "the enemies are among you, get rid of them."[29]

The Civil Defence Program and the Militias

283. In 1994, Rwandan officials controlled the militias and civil defence forces. The militias trained in military camps. During times of unrest or emergency states call such groups into duty to supplement its armed forces. The evidence before the Trial Chamber moreover reveals that both the militias and the civil defence forces programme became an integral part of the machinery carrying out the genocidal plan in 1994.

5628

284. One of the means by which an ordinary Rwandan became involved in the genocide was through the civil defence programme. Initially both Hutus and Tutsis were involved in the civil defence programme. Authorities established the civil defence programme in 1990 for the security of the civilian population, whereby they could arm persons at all administrative levels, from the top of the prefecture, down to the cellule. Degni Segui confirmed this scheme during a conversation with Bisimungu, the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces, the chief of the police and the Commander of the Gendarmerie, during one of his visits to Rwanda. Unfortunately, the civil defence programme was used in 1994 to distribute weapons quickly and ultimately transformed into a mechanism to exterminate Tutsis. Numerous eyewitnesses such as Witnesses C and F confirmed this fact. They testified that they witnessed the distribution of machetes to civilians by the Prefectoral and Communal authorities in early April 1994. Other evidence before this Chamber shows that 50,000 machetes were ordered and distributed through this programme shortly before the commencement of the 1994 massacres, to the militias of the MRND (members of the Interahamwe) and CDR (members of the Impuzamugambi), and the Hutu civilian population. Degni-Segui concluded that in the end this "system served to kill innocent people, namely Tutsis."[30]

285. Prosecution evidence, including letters from Rwandan authorities confirmed that "the population must remain watchful in order to unmask the enemy and his accomplices and hand them over to the authorities."[31] Witness R who was familiar with the administrative structure of Rwanda in 1994, affirmed that the people were told to "protect themselves within the Cellules and the Sectors," by organising patrols and erecting roadblocks.[32]

286. Other eyewitnesses recounted their versions of the occurrences at the massacre sites and almost all affirmed the presence of members of the Interahamwe and other armed civilians. In fact, several witnesses averred that the majority of the attackers were members of the militias and other civilians who were singing songs of extermination as they approached their victims. Several witnesses further stated that most of these attackers carried machetes and other traditional agricultural tools, as opposed to the gendarmes or police who were armed with guns and grenades.

Roadblocks and Identification Cards

287. The perpetrators of the genocide often employed roadblocks to identify their victims. Both Prosecution and Defence witnesses testified to this fact. Degni-Segui testified that within hours of the President's death, the military personnel, soldiers, the members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians erected and manned roadblocks. In fact, some roadblocks were erected within thirty to forty-five minutes after the crash of President's plane and remained throughout Rwanda for at least the following three months. According to this witness "what they had to do was to use identity cards to separate the Tutsis from the Hutus. The Tutsis were arrested and thereafter executed, at times, on the spot."[33]

5629

288. De Saint-Exupery confirmed the existence of roadblocks in Rwanda during the time in question. He testified that from Goma to Kibuye on 25 June 1994, "at the approach . . . to each locality, there was a roadblock."[34] Witness Sister Julianne Farrington stated that in May 1994 as she travelled from Butare to Kibuye, she went through 45 roadblocks. She further stated that at some roadblocks military personnel monitored movements, while others were manned by young Hutus in civilian dress. Other witnesses, including witnesses G, T, and Defence witness DA and DM, who travelled through various parts of Rwanda during the genocide, confirmed these facts before this Trial Chamber. The Trial Chamber notes that those who produced identity cards bearing the indication Hutu and those with travel documents were able to pass through these roadblocks without serious difficulties. Conversely, those identified as Tutsis were either arrested or killed. The Trial Chamber recognises that the erection of roadblocks is a natural phenomenon during times of war. However, the roadblocks in Rwanda were unrelated to the military operations. Sadly, they were used to identify the Tutsi victims of the genocide.

Conclusion

289. In summary, the Trial Chamber finds that the massacres of the Tutsi population indeed were "meticulously planned and systematically co-ordinated" by top level Hutu extremists in the former Rwandan government at the time in question.[35] The widespread nature of the attacks and the sheer number of those who perished within just three months is compelling evidence of this fact. This plan could not have been implemented without the participation of the militias and the Hutu population who had been convinced by these extremists that the Tutsi population, in fact, was the enemy and responsible for the downing of President Habyarimana's airplane.

290. The cruelty with which the attackers killed, wounded and disfigured their victims indicates that the propaganda unleashed on Rwanda had the desired effect, namely the destruction of the Tutsi population. The involvement of the peasant population in the massacres was facilitated also by their misplaced belief and confidence in their leadership,[36] and an understanding that the encouragement of the authorities to guaranteed them impunity to kill the Tutsis and loot their property.

291. Final reports produced estimated the number of the victims of the genocide at approximately 800,000 to one million, nearly one-seventh of Rwanda's total population.[37] These facts combined prove the special intent requirement element of genocide. Moreover, there is ample evidence to find that the overwhelming majority of the victims of this tragedy were Tutsi civilians which leaves this Chamber satisfied that the targets of the massacres were "members of a group," in this case an ethnic group. In light of this evidence, the Trial Chamber finds a plan of genocide existed and perpetrators executed this plan in Rwanda between April and June 1994.

5.2.1 Genocide in Kibuye

292. Having determined that perpetrators carried out a genocidal plan in Rwanda in 1994, this Chamber now turns to assess the situation in Kibuye Prefecture. After the death of the President on 6 April 1994, the relatively calm co-existence of the Hutus and Tutsis came to a halt in Kibuye. According to the Prosecutor, Kibuye was among the first of the prefectures "to enter into this dance of death."[38] In Kibuye, the first incidents took place on 8 and 9 April 1994 in various communes. The Chamber heard testimony and received documentary evidence that the perpetrators of the genocide in Kibuye acted with requisite intent to destroy the Tutsi population in whole or in part and that they in fact succeeded in achieving this goal. In this Chapter , this Chamber examines briefly the occurrences in Kibuye Prefecture from April to June 1994.

Background

293. The Chamber finds that events in Kibuye unfolded as follows. After the crash of the President's plane, the atmosphere quickly began to change. The Hutu population began openly to use accusatory or pejorative terms, such as Inkotanyi (Kinyarwanda for RPF accomplice/enemy)[39] and Inyenzi (Kinyarwanda for cockroach) when referring to the Tutsis. The members of the Interahamwe and other armed militant Hutus began a campaign of persecution against the Tutsis based on the victims' education and social prominence. Simultaneously, the Tutsi population, as a whole, suffered indiscriminate attacks in their homes. Perpetrators set on fire their houses and looted and killed their herds of cattle. Witness A testified that on the morning of 7 April 1994 his Hutu neighbours began to engage in looting, attacking Tutsi-owned houses and slaughter Tutsi-owned livestock. Witnesses C, F, OO and E, corroborated these occurrences.

294. On their way to the gathering places many witnesses saw roadblocks where the perpetrators separated Tutsis from the Hutus. Once the Tutsis reached these places they were injured, mutilated and some of the women were raped. In the end the Tutsis were massacred by Hutu assailants who sang songs whose lyrics exhorted extermination during the attacks. These attackers were armed and led by local government officials and other public figures. The fact that these massacres occurred is not in dispute. In fact, Kayishema testified that he and others engaged in a clean-up operation after the massacres.

295. To illustrate implementation of the genocidal plan, the Trial Chamber now turns to examine the occurrences in the commune in Kibuye, immediately following the death of President Habyarimana, and other related issues which serve as further proof, such as meetings and documentary evidence, of the genocidal events in Kibuye.

5631

Initial Attacks at the Residences of the Tutsis

296. There is sufficient evidence to find that in communes such as Gishyita Gitesi, Mabanza and Rutsiro the initial persecution of the Tutsis and individual attacks on their houses began almost immediately after the death of the President. The fact that killings took place throughout Kibuye is corroborated by a diary entry[40] which was tendered by Witness O. Witness O testified that initially after the President's death, in Gitesi Commune, there was relative calm. He also stated, however, that on 7 April "he saw wounded people everywhere, by the roadside, bushes and very close to the administrative headquarters of the Prefecture."[41] Witness O, under cross-examination, told the Trial Chamber that the first people to be killed were in Kigali and they were alleged to be RPF collaborators. Witness O testified there was a cause-and-effect relationship correlation between the 8 April radio announcement of the purported resumption of the war and the first deaths in Rwanda and, in particular, in Kibuye Prefecture.

297. Witness F's testimony is illustrative of many other witnesses and of the situation as a whole. A resident of Gitesi commune, Witness F testified that he heard the news of the crash at 10 a.m. on 7 April and that as a result, the mood of the people changed to one of panic in his neighbourhood. On 7 or 8 April, a meeting took place at Mutekano Bar, situated some 400-500 meters from the Kibuye prison, along the road heading to the Kibuye Prefecture Office. Witness F testified during that period, he interacted with one Mathew, who was participating in the said meeting. Witness F observed the meeting, the topic of which was security – addressing the "Tutsi problem" -- from the roadside for about twenty minutes. Many local officials participated in the meeting.

298. Witness F testified that after the meeting of 8 April, he witnessed machetes being distributed by Ndida, the Commune Secretary. The machetes had been transported into the commune by Prefectoral trucks and the Secretary of Gitesi Commune supervised the unloading. They were taken towards the Petrol Rwanda fuel Station. About twenty persons received a machete each including, Eriel Ndida, Rusigera, Siriaki, Emmanuel, the Headmaster and many others. On 9 April, the local officials departed to other commune after the distribution of machetes. That evening around his neighbourhood in Gitesi, Witness F noticed that the situation had changed and that militant Hutus openly were attacking the Tutsi. The proximity of the distribution of weapons to the massacres of Tutsi civilians is evidence of the genocidal plan. He noticed that militant Hutu had begun throwing rocks at Tutsis and throwing some persons into Lake Kivu. He also observed similar acts of violence in Gishyita commune. He stated that some persons from Gishyita crossed Lake Kivu to take refuge in the commune of Gitesi.[42]

299. On 12 April, the first person in Witness F's neighbourhood was killed. Munazi, who was with other militant Hutu and members of the Interahamwe killed Nyirakagando, an elderly Tutsi. Witness F and others saw her dead body in the morning of 13 April, as they were fleeing their homes. Witness F stated that "the Hutus killed her because she was Tutsi."[43] Militant Hutus started by chasing Tutsi men. Witness F stated that "when the Tutsi realised that they were being pursued by the H started to flee through the bushes."[44] Witness F's wife was gang-raped by the Hutus before her children's eyes on 13 April. Witness F's mother "was killed with the use of a spear to her neck" during the same attack.[45] Witness F left his wife who was no longer able to walk and first hid in the bush, within sight of his house and on 13 April fled to a Pentecostal church at Bukataye.

300. Witness F spent the night at the church parish at Bukataye. During the night, there was an attack on the church parish, led by the Headmaster of the Pentecostal school. People carrying clubs and spears accompanied the Headmaster of the school. He said, "the Tutsi who were in the Church should come out so that they could be killed."[46] Those who were unable to flee the Church were separated. Tutsi women separated from the Hutu women. The latter remained and watched as the attackers killed the former. Witness F stated that the men, including him, then fled to the bushes.

Mass Movement of the Tutsi Population

301. Witness B testified that, when the attacks began in her commune, she and others decided to flee, stating "we did not want to be killed in our homes, and the people were saying that if you go to the Church no one could be killed there."[47] Witness B along with her mother, young sister and brother as well as four other Tutsis, left their village in Kabongo, Bishura sector, Gitesi commune, for the Catholic Church in Kibuye. As they fled, there were armed Hutus around their home.

302. Because the Tutsis were targets in their homes, they began to flee and seek refuge in traditional safety. Witness T, who worked at the Catholic Church and Home Saint Jean, (the Complex) testified that in the days following the President's death, a curfew was announced and people were told to stay at home. Tutsis, however, began to arrive on the peninsula, where the Complex is located, shortly thereafter. These Tutsis were from the hill of Bururga. Others came from Gitesi, Bishunda, Karongi and Kavi. They had converged at the communal office but they were not allowed to stay. Witness T stated that she helped lodge the thousands refugees, comprised of the elderly, women and children, in the dormitories at the Complex. Those seeking refuge were worried because their homes had been burnt. The first incidents of burning homes started between 7 and 10 April in Burunga, the hill to the left of the Home St. Jean, and other hills nearby. Witness T stated that she saw the home of a friend aflame.

303. Explaining a diary entry from 14 April 1994 to the Trial Chamber, Witness O stated that those seeking refuge from Gitesi Commune, who were on their way to the Stadium, told him that they were fleeing massacres which had begun in their area. Witness O observed many massacres during that time and aided Tutsi survivors to reach Kibuye Hospital.

304. Witness C testified that two days after the President's death people in Burunga, Mabanza commune started fleeing. She testified that attackers were attacking the Tutsi for being burning their houses. She explained that there was no apparent reason for these attacks besides these persons' ethnicity. Regarding the militant Hutu, she stated that "they themselves really could not find a reason for this because they would share everything on a day-to-day basis."[48] She saw people fleeing from Mabanza, including a member of her extended family, and the family of Nyaribirangwe. Her relative had been dealt a machete blow to his head.

5633

305. Witness B testified that they fled to the Catholic Church "because people like my father who had lived through other periods of unrest as in 1959, when there was an attack against the Tutsi, at that time people took refuge at the Church."[49] Witness T had a similar reason for going to a place of refuge. She testified that since the 1959 revolutions, whenever people felt insecure, they would go to churches, parishes and would be protected and be "respected in these places."[50] Additionally, witness F testified, that they arrived at the Catholic Church on 15 April at about 4 a.m. and found scores of other Tutsis who had come from other commune such as Mabanza, Rutsiro, Kaivere and Gishyita as well as Gisenyi Prefecture.

306. Witness A testified that on 7 April, militant Hutu began to attack Tutsi-owned houses, slaughtered Tutsi-owned livestock. The Abakiga (Hutus from the northern region of Rwanda) joined their fellow Hutu: On 12 April 1994, militant Abakiga Hutu identified the Tutsi by identification cards and massacres started in Gatunda shopping area. Witness A went to the Catholic Church, arrived 13 April between 6 and 7 a.m., and found numerous refugees gathered there.

307. Almost all Prosecution and Defence witness, including Mrs. Kayishema, who travelled throughout Kibuye Prefecture, testified that they encountered roadblocks. At these roadblocks the attackers used identification cards to distinguish between and to separate Hutus from Tutsis.

Other Evidence of Intent to Commit Genocide

308. The record in the present case is replete with evidence that reveals the existence of a plan to destroy the Rwandan Tutsi population in 1994. The Trial Chamber explores briefly some of the more pertinent evidence relative to the acts demonstrating the intent to commit genocide that took place in Kibuye Prefecture.

309. Evidence presented to the Chamber shows that in Kibuye Prefecture the massacres were pre-arranged. For months before the commencement of the massacres, bourgmestres were communicating lists of suspected RPF members and supporters from their commune to the Prefect.[51] In addition, the Prosecutor produced a series of written communications between the Central Authorities,[52] Kayishema and the Communal Authorities that contain language regarding whether "work has begun" and whether more "workers" were needed in certain commune.[53] Another letter sent by Kayishema to the Minister of Defence requested military hardware and reinforcement to undertake clean in Bisesero.[54]

5634

310. Some of the most brutal massacres occurred after meetings organized by the Prefectoral authorities and attended by the heads of the Rwandan interim government and/or ordinary citizens of the prefecture to discuss matters of "security."[55] During one of these meetings Kayishema was heard requesting reinforcement from the central authorities to deal with the security problem in Bisesero. Witness O testified that on 3 May 1994, Interim Governmental Prime Minister Jean Kambanda visited Kibuye prefecture with a number of other officials, including Ministers of Interior, Information, and Finance, the Prefect of Kibuye, and the General Secretary of MDR party. Witness O attended a meeting with these and other officials in his capacity as an official of Kibuye hospital and voiced his concern regarding seventy-two Tutsi children who survived the massacre at the Complex and were in poor physical condition at Kibuye hospital. Members of the Interahamwe had threatened these children, aged between 8 and 15 years. The Prime Minister did not personally respond to Witness O's concern, but asked the Minister of Information to do so. That minister rebuked Witness O, remarking that he should not protect people who don't want to be protected. He also declared that Witness O obviously did not approve of the politics of the Interim Government, and could not recognize the enemy. The Minister of Information gave the impression that the Interim Government recognized these infirm children as enemies. Later, these children were forcibly taken from the hospital and killed.

311. Sister Farrington testified to having witnessed the discriminatory attitude of various Kibuye authorities towards all Tutsis. During the occurrences Sister Farrington went to Kibuye Prefectoral offices to inquire about obtaining a laissez-passer that would allow some of the nuns from her convent to leave Rwanda. Over a period of three days she spoke with the Sous-prefect, Gashangore as well as Kayishema. Gashangore used hostile language when referring to Tutsis and accused specific people in the Prefecture of being "central to the activities of the Inkontany." During another attempt to obtain help, Sister Farrington spoke with Kayishema in his office where he spoke to her in an agitated and aggressive tone. Kayishema told her that there was a war prepared by the Inkotanyi, and the Tutsi people were collaborators of the enemy. As proof he showed her a list of names of people, maps and other documents allegedly preparing Tutsis to become revolutionaries.

Conclusion

312. Considering this evidence, the Trial Chamber finds that, in Kibuye Prefecture, the plan of genocide was implemented by the public officials. Persons in positions of authority used hate speech and mobilised their subordinates, such as the gendarmes the communal police, and the militias, who in turn assisted in the mobilisation of the Hutu population to the massacre sites where the killings took place. Tutsis were killed, based on their ethnicity, first in their homes and when they attempted to flee to perceived safe havens they were stopped at roadblocks and some were killed on the spot. Those who arrived at churches and stadiums were attacked and as a result tens of thousands perished.

5635

313. Having examined the reasons why Tutsis gathered at the four massacre sites, the Trial Chamber now examines the evidence specific to these sites and the role, if any, of the accused Kayishema, and his subordinates, as well as that of Ruzindana in the alleged crimes.

5636

5.3 AN INTRODUCTION: THE MASSACRES AT THE CATHOLIC CHUR' HOME SAINT-JEAN COMPLEX, STADIUM IN KIBUYE TOWN AND THE CHURCH IN MUBUGA

314. This Chapter addresses the occurences common to the first three massacre sites in the Indictment namely, the Catholic Church and Home Saint-Jean Complex (Complex), located in Kibuye, the Stadium in Kibuye (Stadium), and the Church in Mubuga (Mubuga Church), in Gishyita commune. This introduction does not include the fourth massacre site, Bisesero area, because the masscres in that area followed a slightly different pattern and took place over a much longer period of time than the first three sites. Additionally, under this Indictment, the Bisesro charges include both accused persons where as the first three sites concern Kayishema only. A summary of the witness testimonies for the first three sites paints the following picture.

315. In mid-April 1994, Tutsi seeking refuge from various communes converged on the three sites in order to escape atrocities perpetrated by the Hutus against the Tutsis. Throughout Kibuye Prefecture, Tutsis were being attacked, their houses set ablaze and cattle looted or slaughtered. Historically, community centres such as the Churches and the Stadium were regarded as safe havens where people gathered for protection in times of unrest; this was the case in April 1994. Many witnesses testified that they went to these sites with the belief that the prefectorial authorities would protect them. By the time some Tutsi reached the churches they were overflowing and these people continued on to the Stadium, often under the instruction of the gendarmes and local officials. By all accounts, very large numbers of Tutsis amassed in each of the three sites. Estimates varied from 4,000 to over 5,500 at Mubuga, about 8,000 at the Complex and, 5,000 to 27,000 at the Stadium.

316. At all three sites, gendarmes guarded the entrances or completely surrounded the structure. The gendarmes controlled the congregation, maintaining order or preventing people from leaving. Witnesses testified that Tutsi who attempted to exit were killed by armed Hutu assailants. Conditions inside the massacre sites became desperate, particularly for the weak and wounded. The authorities did not provide food, water or medical aid and, when supplies were offered, the Gendarmes prevented them from reaching the Tutsis.

317. With thousands of internally displaced persons (hereinafter refugees)[56] effectively imprisoned at the three sites in Kibuye, five days of almost continuous massacres commenced. First, at Mubuga Church the major killing started on 15 April and continued on 16 April. On 15 and 16 April the Complex suffered preliminary attacks followed by a major slaughter on 17 April. On 18 April, the massacre at the Stadium began with the attackers returning on 19 April to complete the job. Evidence before the Trial Chamber suggests that thousands of Tutsi seeking refuge were killed during these few days.

5637

318. Testimony reveals striking similarities in the assailants' methods both during the initial [illegible] of Tutsis and later during the execution of the massacres. Some of those seeking refuge assembled at the three sites had done so owing to encouragement by Hutu officials. Initially, the gendarmes appeared merely to be maintaining order and allowed people to leave the Churches or Stadium to find food or water. Soon thereafter, however, authorities cut off supplies and prevented those seeking refuge from leaving. Those who attempted to leave were either chased back inside the structure or were killed by the armed attackers while the gendarmes watched. At this stage gendarmes and/or the members of the Interahamwe surrounded the Churches and at the Stadium gendarmes guarded the entrances. These conditions of siege soon turned into massive attacks by Gendarmes, communal police, prison wardens, the members of the Interahamwe and other armed civilians. Having surrounded the site, they usually waited for the order from an authority figure to begin the assault. The massacres started with the assailants throwing grenades, tear gas, flaming tires into the structure, or simply shooting into the crowds. Those who tried to escape were killed with traditional weapons. Following these hours of slaughter, the attackers would enter the building or Stadium carrying crude traditional weapons and kill those remaining alive.

319. The above background facts for the most part, are not refuted and the Trial Chamber finds ample evidence to support this general picture of events. The real issue for the Trial Chamber is the role, if any, played by Kayishema and/or those under his command or control, at the three crime sites. The Prosecution alleges that Kayishema was present, participated and led others at all three massacre sites. Kayishema admitted that he visited the sites when Tutsi were congregated but prior to the massacres to assess the situation. Kayishema, however, denies his presence during the days of attack. Indeed, Kayishema's alibi states that he was in hiding during the times of the massacres[57] because his life was under threat. He claims to have been hiding from the morning of 16 April through 20 April, coming out on the morning of 20 April.

320. Evidence shows that others saw Kayishema at the three sites during the period of 14 to 18 April. On 14 April Kayishema stated that he visited Mubuga Church, but only to monitor the situation. Testimony, however, places Kayishema at Mubuga in the morning, of 15 April and at the Complex at 3 p.m. in the afternoon. The evidence suggests that the two churches are approximately 40 kilometres apart by road. Again, on 16 April, Kayishema was seen in the morning at Mubuga during the start of the attack and then at the Complex during the preliminary acts of violence. The following day, 17 April, witnesses testified that Kayishema was present at the Complex and played a pivotal role in the massive slaughter of that day. Lastly, Kayishema is said to have initiated the massacre at the Stadium on 18 April. The Trial Chamber now turns to separately assess the evidence for each of the four massacre sites enumerated in the Indictment.

5638

5.3.1 THE MASSACRE AT THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND HOME ST. JEAN

Background

321. According to the Indictment, the massacre site at the Home St. Jean Catholic Church Complex (Complex) is located in Kibuye, Gitesi commune, on the peninsula surrounded by Lake Kivu. A road runs perpendicular to the entrance to the Complex. One can see the Catholic Church but not Home Saint Jean from the road. The Complex, according to Expert witness Sjouke Eekma, is accessible by either the road from the roundabout or from the Prefecture. There were several doors to the Catholic Church.

322. During the unrest occurring in the commune soon after the crash of the President's plane, thousands of people sought refuge in places of worship such as the Complex. For instance, witness F testified, that he arrived at the Catholic Church on 15 April and found many other Tutsis who had arrived from other communes such as Mabanza, Rutsiro, Kaivere and Gishiyita as well as Gisenyi Prefecture. Witness B testified that she fled to the Catholic Church "because people like my father who had lived through other unrest as in 1959, when there was an attack against the Tutsi, at that time people took refuge at the (Catholic) Church."[58] Witness T corroborates other witnesses' reason for seeking refuge at the Church. She testified that since the 1959 revolutions, whenever people felt insecure, they would go to churches, parishes and would be protected; that is, they would be "respected in these places."[59]

323. The conditions inside these places of shelter worsened. In the Catholic Church people were crowded. Witness A testified that when a census was made for purposes of food distribution, the number of those seeking refuge was found to be 8,000 people of Tutsi ethnicity.[60] The census is corroborated by Witnesses T and F. The Tutsis seeking refuge received no assistance whatsoever from the Prefectural Authorities.

324. The major attack on the Complex took place on 17 April but prior to that attack, members of the Interahamwe and local officials launched several smaller attacks. Tutsi seeking refuge threw stones and repulsed the smaller attacks. From about 15 April, the gendarmerie nationale surrounded and prevented the Tutsi from leaving

325. Expert witnesses Dr. Haglund, a Forensic Anthropologist, and Dr. Peerwani a Pathologist, testified regarding the victims of the massacre. Both experts examined cadavers of thousands of people and described how they had been killed. Dr. Haglund testified that he had examined the large mass grave near the Catholic Church along with four additional areas that also contained human remains. Dr. Peerwani examined 122 cadavers during January and February 1996. Now part of the evidence, identification cards found on the victims indicated that they were all Tutsi.

326. Dr. Haglund's written report confirms that many people, men, women and children were killed at the Complex. Of the 493 dead examined by Dr. Haglund, only found one gunshot injury. He estimated that 36% of people in the grave had died from force trauma whereas 33% of the people died from an undetermined cause. Dr. Haglund selected an individual as an example who he identified as a fifty year old man. The man's fibula had been completely severed by some sharp object,[61] which "would have severed the achilles" tendon rendering this individual partially crippled.[62] On the neck region "all the soft tissue from the right side of the neck towards the back would have been cut through"[63] and "a sharp cut mark in the tibia body, and in the inferior border of the scapular shoulder blade, another trauma caused by a blow of a sharp object."[64] Dr. Haglund concluded that the fifty-year old man was trying to protect himself by presenting different body aspects to the armed assailant. Dr. Peerwani found stab wounds indicating the use of sharp force instruments and confirmed that many of the victims were young children and the old.

The Attacks

15, 16 April 1994

327. Several witnesses testified about the minor attacks that occurred on 15 and 16 April. Witnesses T and A testified that an attack on the Complex occurred on 15 April at 3:00 p.m. During that attack, Witnesses A and D saw Kayishema snatching a child from its mother. Witness F testified that local officials participated in an attack on the Complex on 16 April. The gendarmes simply watched, but those seeking refuge repulsed the attack. After this event, witness F saw Kayishema and Mugambira, a prosperous Kibuye businessman, transporting weapons in their vehicles. A military pick-up also assisted in transporting weapons to the nearby Petrol Rwanda fuel station. Witness F saw the accused, Kayishema, hold a meeting with other assailants near the Petrol Rwanda fuel station.

17 April 1994 on Catholic Church

328. On 17 April, between 9 and 10 a.m., a major attack occurred at the Catholic Church, where thousands of Tutsi men, women and children had taken refuge. The attackers arrived from three directions, namely from the roundabout, the Prefecture and Lake Kivu. Witness F, who was standing in front of the Catholic Church, vividly described the various attackers. Witness F and others testified that the attackers were Hutu civilians; Twa civilians; communal police officers; prison guards and local officials such as the Communal Accountant; Rusizera, the Assistant Bourgmestre, Gahima, the Headmaster of the Pentecostal school, Emmanuel Kayihura and Siriaka Bigisimana. Other witnesses identified and corroborated the presence of the local officials. Witness E recognised the conseillers of Gishura Sector and witness C named particular officials such as Conseiller Ndambizimana; Calixte, the Prison Warden; and the Bourgmestre of Gitesi Commune. The attackers carried assorted weapons including machetes, swords, spears, small axes, clubs with nails, the "impuzamugenzi" and other agricultural tools. They were singing "let us exterminate them". Kayishema arrived with the attackers from the Prefecture Office in a white Toyota vehicle. Witnesses F, C, D, E and A clearly o Kayishema's arrival. For example, witness F was sufficiently close to the accused to see that he was wearing a pair of white shorts. Witness A, D and F stated that Kayishema was carrying a sword.

5640

329. Witness F saw Kayishema arrive, get out of his vehicle along with the gendarmes, and receive applause as he walked towards the group of attackers. Witnesses F, D and E testified respectively that Kayishema ordered the assailants to "begin working, get down to work"[65] "go to work," or "start working."

330. They were all positioned so that they could hear Kayishema utter these words. According to witnesses E and F, the phrase "go to work" in the Rwandan context means "to kill Tutsis." At that point, Witnesses E and F testified that after ordering attackers "to go to work," Kayishema climbed up the hill along the path near the Church, addressed the assembled attackers through a megaphone, informed them that he had received orders from Kigali to kill the Tutsis and commanded the gendarmes to shoot. Witness E said that Kayishema then fired three shots.

331. Three witnesses saw Kayishema speak and give orders for the attackers to go to work. Only Witness E, however, claims to have seen Kayishema fire three signal shots. Witness A testified that it was the gendarmes opposite the Church who fired the shots. At that point some attackers began to throw stones at those seeking refuge and the gendarmes opened fire. The gendarmes shot the Tutsis who were in front of the Church. Soon thereafter the gendarmes and other Hutu assailants started to attack Tutsis inside the Church. They fired grenades and tear gas canisters inside the Church through the doors, and proceeded to fire their guns. Witness F who escaped by climbing a tree nearby, stated that "I could see quite clearly the square or the area in front of the Church. I could see him [Kayishema] with my own eyes."[66] Witness F saw Kayishema walk to the threshold of the Church and send an attacker to bring a jerrican of petrol. The petrol was poured on tires and the doors of the Church, and then set ablaze. According to witness A, the main door of the Church was burnt down. Witness C saw the attackers throw a tire which was doused with petrol, inside the Church. Many witnesses, including Witness F, testified that people were burnt.

332. At some point, Kayishema led the attackers who entered the Church and began to kill the survivors. Witness A, who had hidden under dead bodies and had smeared himself with blood, observed that Kayishema entered the Church with a young man and took steps to ensure that there were no survivors. Witness A stated that he could see Kayishema clearly since at that point the only attackers inside the Church were Kayishema and the young man. Witness A saw Kayishema use his sword to cut a person called Rutabana and a baby who was lying on top of witness A. With regard to this scene, witness A stated that he knew that it was a baby on top of him as he could feel the child's legs kicking him about the chest level.[67] Kayishema with his sword cut witness A, injuring him near his right

clavicle, the right hand and the left elbow. The Trial Chamber was shown the scars of these injurie

333. Several witnesses, such as A, B, C, D and E managed to escape. Others, such as B, C, D fled to the Home St. Jean, whilst witness F fled to the Stadium.

17 April 1994 on Home St. Jean

334. The attacks progressed from Catholic Church to the Home St. Jean when assailants descended upon the scene around 1 or 2 p.m., singing the lyrics "let's exterminate them." The assailants threw grenades inside the building and as a result, people suffocated. When the gendarmes broke the lock of the door, the fleeing Tutsis were faced with members of the Interahamwe wielding machetes and spears. Witnesses B and C survived by denouncing their Tutsi ethnicity to the attackers. Attackers allowed them to join a group of 15 to 20 Hutu who were being escorted to safety by the gendarmes and walked away from the Church. On their way, the two and others met Kayishema who asked the accompanying gendarmes "where are you taking these Tutsi?"[68] Notwithstanding that members of the group replied that they were all Hutu, Kayishema struck witness B with his machete.

The Victims

335. The attackers left thousands dead and many injured. Witness D estimated the number of those seeking refuge at the Complex prior to the major attack to be around 8,000. Witness A heard the same figure from Leonard Surasi, a man who had estimated the number in order to supply them with food. Witnesses A, B, C, D and F saw substantial numbers of dead bodies after the attack. Witness O, a local Hutu who had recorded this massacre as an entry in his personal diary, testified that he had participated in burying the dead bodies. Witness E testified that one week after the massacre at the Church, he saw prisoners come to collect bodies for burial. They spent five days burying the dead. Witness G, a Hutu, who had assisted in burying the dead, testified that at the Catholic Church, there were bodies along the road from the Prefecture, in front of the main door to the Church, inside the Church, in front of the Father's residence and also inside the Priests' house. He also stated that people assisting in the burial of the Tutsis were being threatened by Ruberanziza and Biseñyamana among other people.[69]

336. At the Home St. Jean, in particular, Witness T, a person employed at Home St. Jean, testified that she lost nine staff members and their children. Witness G saw around 200 to 300 Tutsi corpses scattered in front, behind, in the cellar, on upper floors and around the Home St. Jean buildings. Further, many of the survivors were injured. Witness F observed about forty injured people, whose ankles had been cut.

Case for the Defence

337. The defence for Kayishema offered a defence of alibi on the dates of the massacre, which appears above in Chapter 5.1 on Alibi. In cross-examination, the Defence challenged witness A's ability to having seen Kayishema when he entered the Church. They further questioned witness A's a' have found space and time to smear himself with blood. This Chamber finds that although witness A's testimony may have lacked certain details, his testimony regarding Kayishema's presence and participation, on the whole, is credible. Moreover, witness A's description of Kayishema's attire and the weapon he carried conforms to the testimony of other witnesses, such as B, C and D. Further, witness A's identification of Kayishema is strengthened because he knew Kayishema prior to the events. Witness A first saw Kayishema in 1993 at the Kibuye Hospital (a friend pointed out Kayishema saying, "there is the Prefect.") This Chamber finds reliable witness A's deposition of Kayishema's presence and participation in the attacks of 17 April.

338. Witness B testified regarding the encounter with Kayishema when she and others were being escorted as 'Hutus' by gendarmes. Witness B affirmed that Kayishema wore white shorts and uttered "where are you taking these Tutsi?"[70] The gendarmes responded "these are not Tutsi but they are Hutus."[71] The Defence in their closing remarks did not deny the scene but claimed that Witness B was involuntarily wounded. The Defence suggested to the witness that the push was intended to put her back in line. The Trial Chamber finds witness B to be a credible witness who identified Kayishema during the attacks and heard him speak. Witness B met Kayishema in 1989 at the Kibuye hospital and thereafter had seen him from time to time. Witness C corroborated witness B's testimony regarding the attack. The Trial Chamber finds no material contradictions in witness B's story.

339. Regarding witness C, the Trial Chamber notes that she knew Kayishema prior to the events. Witness C stated that she and the accused were from Bwishyura Sector and that she knew him and his father. She testified that she saw Kayishema cut the fingers of witness B with a machete. A list tendered into evidence by witness C shows the names of victims and attackers. The names of Kayishema and other local officials appear amongst the alleged attackers.

340. The defence cross-examined witness D on his ability to hear Kayishema utter the words "go to work." Witness D stated that he heard Kayishema ordering the attackers to "go to work" from a distance of approximately ten to fifteen meters away, while standing between the road which leads to the roundabout and to the Prefecture. The Defence also challenged witness D's account of his hiding in the ceiling of Home St. Jean. Witness D explained that he left the Church at 1 p.m. and stayed in the ceiling in Home St. Jean with five others, until 4 a.m. Witness T corroborates his account although she did not specifically single out witness A as being one of those in the ceiling.

341. Witness D, identified Kayishema as one of the attackers. He knew Kayishema prior to the events because Kayishema attended meetings at the Home St. Jean in his capacity as the Prefect of Kibuye. Witness D saw Kayishema on 15 April in a white vehicle near the Home St. Jean. His account of Kayishema's arrival and description of the attack is corroborated by many witnesses including A, B, C and F. The Trial Chamber finds that witness D identified Kayishema and finds his accc Kayishema's participation credible.

342. Witness F testified that he was in front of the Church when Kayishema arrived and that there was little distance between him and the attackers. Witness F confirmed seeing Kayishema and stated that he wore "white shorts" and carried a sword. Witness F's account of how Kayishema spoke through a megaphone was corroborated by witness E. Witness F knew Kayishema prior to the events and gave a detailed account of Kayishema's participation during the events of the attack. The Trial Chamber has considered witness F's testimony and finds his account of the events of 17 April is reliable and conforms to that of other witnesses.

343. Witness E testified also that he heard Kayishema use a large megaphone to order attackers "to go to work."[72] According to this witness, Kayishema spoke using the megaphone to deliver a message from Kigali to exterminate the Tutsis, and fired gunshots. The Trial Chamber notes that witness E described Kayishema's arrival at the massacre site, identified Kayishema and described his participation. The Trial Chamber finds witness E's testimony regarding the events credible. Additionally, he knew Kayishema as the chief of Kibuye hospital prior to these events. His account of the occurrences was corroborated by other witnesses. However, witness E was the sole eyewitness to testify that Kayishema fired the shot signaling the start of the massacre. Hence there exists some doubt as to whether Kayishema actually fired the shots, that sparked off the attack. This uncertainty is not surprising in light of the circumstances. Given the confusion of multiple shooters and the prevailing terror, this Chamber cannot find that Kayishema fired the shots. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber finds that the shooting began following Kayishema's order. The Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema ordered and instigated the attack upon the Catholic Church.

Conclusion

344. The Trial Chamber finds that the witnesses' testimonies proved, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema was present at and participated in the 17 April 1994 massacres at the Complex. Witnesses, such as witness T and witness G, constituted "independent" witnesses, in the sense that they were not survivors as such, because they were not the target of the massacres. Their testimonies corroborated the events as recounted by those who survived the massacre. All the witnesses claimed that they previously knew Kayishema and they identified him at the trial. Moreover, the events occurred in broad daylight. The Hutu attackers killed with impunity as the local officials present not only refrained from preventing the massacre, but encouraged them.

345. The defence failed to controvert the credibility of these witnesses or the reliability of the evidence on fundamental issues, in particular the identification of Kayishema during the attack. Minor discrepancies in testimony between witnesses did not raise a reasonable doubt as to the issue of Kayishema's participation.

5644

Factual Findings

346. With regard to Kayishema's participation in the Complex massacre, the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of witnesses A, B, C, D, E, F, G and T.

347. Paragraph 25 of the Indictment alleges that by 17 April thousands of unarmed and predominantly Tutsi had gathered at the Complex. The Trial Chamber is satisfied from the evidence presented that there were indeed thousands of men, women and children who had sought refuge at the Complex. Further, the Trial Chamber finds that they were unarmed and predominantly Tutsi.

348. Paragraph 26 of the Indictment alleges that some Tutsis went to the Complex because Kayishema ordered them to do so at a time when Kayishema knew that an attack was going to occur. The Prosecution did not prove that the Tutsis were ordered to go to the Complex or that Kayishema ordered them to go there. Most of the witnesses went there on their own volition. Others such as witness B went there because in the past their parents had gone to such places for safety. It was only witness D, who testified that Kayishema ordered him to go to the Church.[73] This testimony while credible, does not satisfy this Chamber of the facts alleged in paragraph 26. Consequently, the Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Tutsi men, women and children went to the Complex on their own volition or because their parents had in the past found refuge in such places.

349. Paragraph 27 of the Indictment alleges that people under Kayishema's control, surrounded the Complex and prevented people from leaving at a time when Kayishema knew the attack was going to occur. This Chamber finds that the evidence of witnesses A, B, C, E and F shows that after those seeking refuge had gathered in the Complex it was surrounded by people under Kayishema's orders or control, including gendarmes and members of the Interahamwe. Witness D described how attackers in boats surrounded the peninsula on which the Complex is located. Witness B, described how the Complex was surrounded by members of the Interahamwe carrying machetes and spears. Witness C, testified that gendarmes prevented persons from leaving the Complex on 17 April 1994.

350. The Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt that Kayishema knew or must have known that an attack was about to occur. This is because Kayishema stated that he had received orders from Kigali to kill Tutsis, he initiated the attack on 17 April, and he gave orders for the attack to begin. It follows, therefore, that Kayishema had the requisite knowledge. Kayishema was seen at the Complex twice before the attacks of 17 April and knew or must have known from the massive number of armed attackers that, in the circumstances of Kibuye Prefecture at the time, there was potential for a massacre to occur. Indeed, because smaller scale attacks had occurred there on the 15 and 16 April, Kayishema must have been aware of the potential for further attacks. Furthermore, as shown above in paragraph 28 of the Indictment, the Complex massacres followed the massacre at Mubuga Church where Kay had played a major role by initiating a systematic pattern of extermination within Kibuye. For these reasons, the Prosecution proved the allegations in paragraph 27.

5645

351. Paragraph 28 of the Indictment alleges that on 17 April Kayishema went to the Complex, ordered the attackers to commence an attack and participated personally. Witnesses A, B, C, D, E and F testified that, notwithstanding the massive number of people seeking refuge at the Complex, they clearly saw Kayishema. The Trial Chamber finds the identification of Kayishema convincing. In making this finding the Trial Chamber is mindful that all the above-mentioned witnesses had known Kayishema prior to the events and successfully identified Kayishema at trial. In addition, the events occurred in broad daylight. The Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that on 15, 16 and 17 April, Kayishema went to the Complex, and that during the attacks it was not possible to leave the premises as those who attempted to flee were killed.

352. The Trial Chamber also finds, beyond a reasonable doubt that Kayishema participated in and played a leading role during the massacres at the Complex. Kayishema led the attackers from the Prefecture office to the massacre site at the Complex, he instigated and encouraged all the attackers by the message from Kigali to kill the Tutsis, which he delivered through the megaphone. Kayishema also orchestrated the burning of the Church. Further, he cut one Rutabana inside the Church after the major offensive subsided.

353. Paragraph 29 of the Indictment alleges that the Complex attacks left thousands dead or injured. The Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the single day of the major scale attack, as well as the smaller-scale sporadic attacks upon the Complex, resulted in the death of thousands of Tutsis whilst numerous others suffered injuries. This Chamber bases this finding primarily on the testimony of Dr. Haglund and Dr. Nizam Peerwani, Prosecution expert witnesses. Thus, the Prosecution has proved the facts alleged in paragraph 29.

354. In relation to paragraph 30 of the Indictment: The accusations in this paragraph are addressed in Chapter 6.1 infra.

5.3.2 The Massacre at the Stadium in Kibuye

Background

355. The witnesses presented a horrific account of the Kibuye Stadium massacre that occurred in mid-April 1994. Hutu military, police and the members of the Interahamwe conducted a massive, systematic, two-day slaughter of thousands of Tutsi civilians. Four witnesses were survivors of this massacre. Dr. Haglund, who visited the Stadium in September 1995, presented photographic slides.

5646

These slides depict a stadium with a field of grass about the size of a football pitch and additio space for viewing; brick walls about eight foot high surround the Stadium on three sides and Gatwaro Hill flanks the fourth side. Spectator grandstands are located at one end. The road runs parallel to the side of the Stadium, facing Gatwaro Hill.

356. On Monday, 18 April 1994, at approximately 1 or 2 p.m., groups of gendarmes, communal police, prison wardens and members of the Interahamwe came from the direction of the roundabout in Kibuye town, surrounded the Stadium and started to massacre the Tutsi with tear gas, guns and grenades. The first attack of the massacre finished at approximately 6 p.m. The next day, after celebrating in the local bar, attackers returned to kill survivors. The fact that the massacre at the Stadium occurred does not appear to be in dispute; Kayishema himself testified that a major attack at the Stadium took place on 18 April 1994[74] and witness DO estimated that about 4,000 of those seeking refuge were killed at the Stadium. Witness G, a local Hutu, who helped to bury bodies found in and near the Stadium, stated that dead bodies covered the entire ground of the Stadium and that bodies were buried using machinery over five days. Therefore, the issues for the Trial Chamber to consider here are whether Kayishema was present at the Stadium on 18 April 1994 and, if so, what was his role if any, and the role of anyone acting under Kayishema's orders or control.

The Role of Kayishema and His Subordinates

357. The Trial Chamber now assesses the evidence in relation to Kayishema's role at the Stadium massacre. In short, witnesses testified that Kayishema arrived in a white vehicle at the head of a column of attackers, ordered them to begin the killing and gave the signal by shooting a gun into a crowd of persons. The identification of Kayishema at the Stadium is strengthened by the witnesses' knowledge of the accused prior to the events in 1994. Witness I had known Kayishema since the accused was a child and had been the neighbour of Kayishema's parents. Indeed, Kayishema himself testified that witness I was a friend of his family. Witness K had known Kayishema before he was a Prefect and had seen him many times when he went for medical treatment. Witness M claimed to have known Kayishema all his life, but admitted that the accused did not know him well. Witness L had not known Kayishema before and testified that he only knew it was Kayishema at the Stadium because others had informed him so. With some variation in detail, witnesses I, K, L and M gave a similar account, both of the events and of Kayishema's role in particular. The testimony of witness I, the most lucid and complete is discussed thoroughly below, followed by the testimony of witnesses K, L, M, F, and NN.

Witnesses

Witness I

358. Witness I is an elderly carpenter. In mid-April, sometime between 15 and 20 April 1994, witness I and seventeen other family members left their home in search of refuge and protection from massacres occurring throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye. Witness I testified that his Conseiller had told him to go to the Stadium where Tutsi would be safe. He explained that they arrived at the St and stayed there for three or four days. When he arrived at the stadium no one was guarding the entrances but soon thereafter gendarmes started to control who could exit and, confiscated weapons from those who entered. Witness I testified that those attempting to leave were killed by members of the Interahamwe and, that he saw this happen. In the Stadium there was no firewood, the water had been cut off, and the Tutsi seeking refuge ate raw meat from cows. Sick and wounded were amongst them and those who attempted to seek help from the local hospital just yards from the Stadium were beaten back or killed. Those seeking refuge barely had room to sit down and there was no protection from sun or rain. The authorities provided no assistance. Soon after arrival the Tutsi heard from others about the massacres at Mubuga Church and Home St. John.

359. Witness I testified, describing his feelings, "For me I thought that no one would be able to kill off 15,000 people, and I thought that any authority who would represent so many people would not dare to kill them off, because these people worked for those persons in authority. They paid taxes and they provide assistance and they repair roads . . . . So I told myself that no one was going to be able to use firearms or machetes to kill us off. I said that no person in authority would be able to do such a thing."[75]

360. Witness I testified that at about 2 p.m. on 18 April armed civilians, soldiers, former soldiers and prison wardens armed with guns, clubs and machetes came from the direction of the roundabout in Kibuye. They divided into groups and surrounded the Stadium, taking position on the hills. From his viewpoint in the spectator grandstands witness I testified that he clearly observed Kayishema standing by the main entrance, near a house owned by the MRND. From this location, Kayishema could see into the Stadium. Witness I saw Kayishema ask for a gun, shoot it toward the masses inside the Stadium as if to signal the attack to commence, and then give the gun back to the gendarme. Kayishema's two shots struck two people. At that point the massacre began. The attackers threw tear gas and grenades and fired guns into the Stadium. Witness I described the scene, "some were dead already, others were wounded in a way that they could no longer lift themselves from the ground. There were children who were crying because of the blows they had received. Others were bleeding or looking for water." The massacre stopped at approximately 6:00 or 6.30 p.m. After the attack ceased, witness I heard the attackers gathered in the bar next to the Stadium, drinking and dancing. On that first day witness I did not see attackers enter the Stadium. Those who tried to flee were killed with sharpened bamboo sticks. Witness I discovered that his two wives and fifteen children who accompanied him to the stadium had been killed on that day. During the night of 18 April he managed to escape and fled towards Karongi.

361. The Defence asserted that witness I did not mention to investigators in an interview prior to his testimony that he had seen two people killed by Kayishema's opening shots. Witness I admitted that, although he had seen two people hit by Kayishema's shots, he did not know whether the victims had died. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence that Kayishema's shots struck two persons seeking in the Stadium, an assertion that is corroborated by witness M.

Witnesses K, L, and M

362. Witnesses K, L and M are also Tutsis who had sought refuge inside the Stadium and survived the massacre of 18 April. Their testimony regarding the appalling conditions within the Stadium and the gendarmes preventing egress conforms to the evidence of witness I. In addition, the witnesses testified to an incident that occurred on the morning of 18 April; a white man started to count the people in the Stadium in order to bring aid but left when Kayishema, who arrived at the Stadium with gendarmes, threatened the same white man if he helped them. All three witnesses testified that they did not understand the conversation between the white man and Kayishema in French, but that others translated the gist of it from French to Kinyarwanda.

363. Like witness I, witnesses K, L and M testified that on 18 April at around 1 or 2 p.m., Kayishema came from the direction of the Kibuye roundabout accompanied by the members of the Interahamwe, gendarmes, communal police and prison wardens. The witnesses saw Kayishema walk to a position just outside the main gate, in front of the MRND building, and order the massacre to commence. Witnesses K and L added further that Kayishema was armed with a sword and that the attackers were singing a song in Kinyarwanda with the lyrics, "exterminate them, exterminate them." These witnesses also testified that the attackers surrounded the Stadium, used tear gas, grenades and guns to kill those inside the Stadium, but did not enter.

364. Witness M gave nearly the same account as witness I with regard to Kayishema firing gunshots into the Stadium. M testified that Kayishema had taken a gun from a gendarme, fired it into the Stadium twice, hitting two people, and then fired once into the air, at which point the massacre started. Witnesses K and L, however, testified that they did not see Kayishema fire into the Stadium but heard him order the gendarmes to "fire on these Tutsi dogs." This difference in testimony is understandable considering that witnesses I and M were observing events from half way up the grandstands whereas witnesses K and L were positioned just inside the Stadium close to the main entrance. When considered together, the witness testimony shows that Kayishema first ordered the gendarmes to fire on the Tutsis and then grabbed a gun and personally fired twice into the Stadium, apparently to lead and set an example to start the massacre. It is reasonable that witnesses K and L did not see Kayishema shoot because, having heard Kayishema's orders to fire, they already were fleeing. Indeed, witness K testified that when he heard Kayishema give the order to shoot he immediately ran further back into the Stadium; witness L testified that when he heard Kayishema's order he ran to find his family and did not see Kayishema again. Witnesses K, L and M testified that the massacre continued until 6 or 6.30 p.m. Witness O, a Hutu doctor, testified that he heard the massacre start with firing and grenades at around 3 p.m. and continue until dark.

365. There is less evidence relating to the massacres on the morning of 19 April. Witness K testified that at 6 a.m. he and others left the Stadium and fled up Gatwaro Hill when he saw the attackers returning to where they appeared to return in order to finish off any survivors with traditional weapons. As he fled, witness K saw the attackers going into the Stadium and heard shouts and screams. Their testimony did not place Kayishema at the Stadium on 19 April.

Witnesses F and NN

366. Witnesses F and NN observed events from hiding places outside the Stadium. The testimony of these witnesses conforms generally to that offered by witnesses I, K, L and M but also differs in some respects. Witness F testified that he survived the massacre at Catholic Church Home St. John and during the night of 17 April fled to Gatwaro Hill, from where he had a good view of the Stadium. He observed the events at the Stadium 18 April and Kayishema's participation, including the opening gunshots. Witness F, however, testified that Kayishema arrived with the attackers between 9.30 and 10 a.m. and estimated that they were there for approximately two hours before the massacre started. Contradicting the other witnesses, witness F testified that killers entered the Stadium on 18 April and began cutting up the Tutsis. The apparent confusion in witness F's account may be explained by the circumstances and the mental state in which he observed the events; responding to a question of what he did when the massacre started, witness F stated "I was astonished. I completely lost my head. I cannot even tell you what I witnessed as regards the massacres and this was because a lot of my family were inside the Stadium and they were being massacred."[76]

367. Witness NN testified that on 18 April he was hiding between two buildings about 40 metres from where Kayishema stopped by the Stadium's main entrance. Witness NN testified that, before shooting into the Stadium, Kayishema murdered a Tutsi child and its mother. He stated that Kayishema then took the child from its mother, held it upside down by one leg, extended the other leg to a soldier and sliced it vertically with a sword. According to NN, Kayishema shot the child's mother as she ran to the Stadium entrance. The Trial Chamber notes that NN observed the events from a different position, which could explain his divergent account. Furthermore, evidence suggests that Kayishema was surrounded by gendarme and members of the Interahamwe when he arrived at the main entrance and, therefore, the view of the other witnesses could have been obstructed at the time when Kayishema allegedly killed the child. However, the Stadium witnesses all testified that they had a clear view of Kayishema when he arrived and, that being so, it seems unlikely that they would omit an incident of such horror from their testimony. Furthermore, if Kayishema had first shot the child's mother before he moved to the main entrance from where he shot twice into the Stadium, the other witnesses likely would have observed this. According to their evidence, they did not. For all the above reasons, the Trial Chamber does not rely on the evidence proffered by witnesses F and NN pertaining to the Stadium massacre on 18 April 1994.

The Defence Case

368. In his defence, Kayishema testified that he was in hiding and did not go to the Stadium at the time of the massacres. However, Kayishema testified that he did visit the people seeking refuge at the Stadium sometime after 13 April but before they were killed; "Yes I went to the place but my CV is clear. I'm quite used to this sort of plague. When there are so many people I know how to gather them together, how to seek solution to the problems, how to subdivide them according to their needs . . . ." In other words, Kayishema testified that he went to the Stadium in order to assess the situation. This, however, squarely contradicts his statement to Prosecution investigators. When asked by investigators if he ever went to the Stadium, Home St. John or Mubuga Church from 7 April 1994 until the end of the war, Kayishema gave a categorical "no". When questioned about this apparent contradiction during cross-examination Kayishema testified that he thought the investigator was asking him whether he had visited the sites everyday and therefore he answered in the negative.[77] With regard to gendarmes guarding the gates of the Stadium and controlling the movement of people in and out, Kayishema testified that this was "true and normal."

369. The Defence raised further issues of detail. The Defence questioned why the huge number of Tutsis did not escape before the 18 April by overpowering the four or so gendarmes who were guarding the entrances. The witnesses were consistent in their responses, stating that the gendarmes were armed but those seeking refuge were powerless, therefore, those who tried to leave would have been killed. This fear seems reasonable particularly in light of the evidence that Tutsis had initially sought refuge in the Stadium as a means of escaping atrocities occurring throughout Kibuye Prefecture and that Tutsis had been killed when they attempted to leave.

370. The Defence further asserts that there is no direct evidence that Kayishema ordered the water supply in the Stadium to be turned off as suggested by some Prosecution witnesses. The Trial Chamber agrees with the Defence; although it is clear that the taps in the Stadium did not supply water, there is no direct evidence that Kayishema was responsible.

Factual Findings

371. With regard to Kayishema's participation in the Stadium massacre, the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of witnesses I, K, L and M. In cross-examination all four witnesses remained fundamentally faithful to the evidence proffered in chief.

372. Paragraph 32 of the Indictment alleges that by April 18 thousands of unarmed and predominantly Tutsis had gathered in the Stadium. The Defence pointed out that Prosecution witnesses did not give a consistent figure with regard to the number of Tutsi whom had gathered in the Stadium. Witness estimates varied from 5,000 to 27,000. The Trial Chamber does not consider this variation fatal to the reliability of the witness evidence. Mindful that the Indictment merely states "thousands o women and children had sought refuge in the Stadium located in Kibuye town," the Trial Chamber is satisfied from the evidence that there were indeed thousands of men, women and children who had sought refuge at the Stadium. Further, the Trial Chamber finds that those seeking refuge were predominately Tutsi and, with the exception of a small number of machetes with which they slaughtered cows for food, they were unarmed.

373. Paragraph 33 of the Indictment alleges some refugees went to the Stadium because Kayishema ordered them to do at a time when Kayishema knew that an attack was going to occur. The Prosecution failed to prove this allegation. In fact, almost all witnesses testified to the contrary.

374. Paragraph 34 of the Indictment alleges that people under Kayishema's control, surrounded the Stadium and prevented people from leaving at a time when Kayishema knew the attack was going to occur. The evidence of Prosecution witnesses I, K, L and M, discussed above, is sufficient to show that after those seeking refuge had gathered in the Stadium, it was surrounded by people under Kayishema's control, including gendarmes. Witnesses I, K, L, M and O, testified that gendarmes prevented persons from leaving the Stadium from about 16 April 1994. Kayishema himself accepted that gendarmes were controlling the movement of people in and out of the Stadium. Furthermore, the Stadium massacre followed the massacres at Mubuga Church and Catholic Church, Home St. John. Indeed, a systematic pattern of extermination existed which is a clear demonstration of the specific intent to destroy Tutsis within Kibuye Prefecture in whole or in part. The evidence shows that Kayishema played a major role within this system. For these reasons, the Trial Chamber finds that at the time when the Tutsi were prevented from leaving, Kayishema knew or had reason to know that an attack on the Stadium was going to occur.

375. Paragraph 35 of the Indictment alleges that on April 18 Kayishema went to the Stadium, initiated, ordered, and participated in the attack. It further alleges that during the night of April 18, attackers killed Tutsis if they tried to leave. Witnesses I, K, L and M notwithstanding the mass people, testified that they clearly saw and (in relation to K and L) heard Kayishema. The Trial Chamber finds the evidence of Kayishema's identification and participation convincing. In a scenario, such as the Stadium, it is not surprising that those inside would strain to see and hear what was happening outside when a group of attackers arrived en masse at the main gate. The photographic exhibits indicate that witnesses I and M, positioned on the spectator stands, would be able to see over the Stadium wall to the main entrance. Witnesses K and L, positioned just inside the Stadium close to the main entrance, explained how, despite many people being between them and Kayishema, they wanted to see who had arrived and succeeded in doing so. All of the identification occurred in broad daylight. In making this finding the Trial Chamber is mindful that witnesses I, K and M had known Kayishema prior to the events and successfully identified Kayishema at the trial. Witness L, however, had not known Kayishema prior to the Stadium massacre, but others informed him that it was Prefect Kayishema time of the events. Therefore, the Trial Chamber must treat the identification of Kayishema by witness L with extra vigilance. The account of witness L is so similar to the other Prosecution witnesses, particularly K, such that the Trial Chamber accepts that his testimony related to the same man. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber considers that the testimony of L further corroborates the evidence of witnesses I, K, and M with regard to Kayishema's participation in the Stadium massacre.

376. The Trial Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 18 April 1994 Kayishema went to the Stadium and ordered members of the Gendarmerie Nationale, communal police and members of the Interahamwe to attack the Stadium. Further, Kayishema initiated the attack by firing a gun into the Tutsi who had assembled in the Stadium and his shots struck two of them. The evidence indicates that the attackers tear gas, guns and grenades were used on 18 April and that the massacre continued on 19 April. However, the evidence relating to the 19 April is not sufficient to show which assailants were attacking the Stadium, or to prove Kayishema's presence. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that during the attacks some of the Tutsis who attempted to flee were killed.

377. There is conflicting evidence pertaining to whether the Tutsis were prevented from leaving the Stadium during the night of April 18 and the morning of April 19. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved their case on this issue.

378. Paragraph 36 of the Indictment alleges that the Stadium attacks left thousands dead or injured. The Trial Chamber is convinced by the evidence that the two days of attacks on the Stadium resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to Tutsi men, women and children. Predominantly Hutu assailants perpetrated these acts.

379. In relation to paragraph 37 of the Indictment: The accusations in this paragraph are dealt with below in Part VI.

5.3.3 THE MASSACRES AT THE CHURCH IN MUBUGA

Background

380. The Church in Mubuga, like other places of worship in Rwanda, was regarded historically as a safe haven in times of unrest. This was also the case in 1994. The Prosecution alleges that by about 14 April 1994 thousands of unarmed men, women and children, most of whom were Tutsi, had gathered at the Church in Mubuga to escape on-going and widespread violent attacks throughout Kibuye Prefecture. The Prosecution alleges that on 14 April the authorities of the Prefecture, including Kayishema and Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, came with gendarmes to the Church located in Gishyita Commune. According to one eyewitness,[78] Sikubwabo stated that he was going to exterminate the Tutsis. Over the next few days, attackers killed thousands of people. Only a handful of those who sought refuge in the Church would survive this massacre, just one of many in Kibuye Prefecture.

381. The allegation that this appalling event occurred at Mubuga Church is not in dispute. In fact, an assortment of witnesses, including various eyewitnesses, Sister Julie Ann Farrington, Defence witness DP, and Kayishema, confirmed that after the massacre, corpses and/or human remains were found inside and/or in the immediate vicinity of Mubuga Church. Witnesses who visited this site shortly after the massacre remarked that the decomposing bodies caused a strong stench in the area. In addition, Dr. Haglund, testified that he went to the Church grounds on 20 September 1995 to investigate two alleged graves sites there. He deposed that one grave had been exhumed previously and the bodies had been reburied nearby. In the second area he found a depression in the ground and there were indications that this area had been disturbed. Upon an attempt to probe the second mass grave he found that the ground was too hard and therefore he did not conduct further investigations there. Due to uncontested evidence showing a massacre near the Church in Mubuga, the questions that remain relate to the presence and the participation of Kayishema and those under his control in this massacre.[79] The Trial Chamber examines the role Kayishema and his subordinates played at this massacre site, in detail, below.

Prosecution Case

382. Five Prosecution eyewitnesses, V, W, OO, PP and UU appeared before the Trial Chamber to recount the events of prior to and during the massacre in mid-April 1994 at Mubuga Church.[80] With slight variations, these five eyewitnesses recounted the events in the following manner. While thousands of Tutsis congregated at this site, between 9 and 14 April 1994, witnesses heard that the Prefect had met with the Hutu priest and that the distribution of food to those seeking refuge was forbidden. The same Hutu priest, who had replaced the Tutsi priest at Mubuga Church, refused water to those seeking refuge, and told them to "die, because your time has come."[81]

383. Paragraph 40 of the Indictment alleges that "[a]fter the men, women and children began to congregate in the Church, Clement Kayishema visited the Church on several occasions" and that on or about 10 April he brought gendarmes to this location who prevented those seeking refuge in the Church from leaving. All prosecution witnesses deposed that gendarmes had gathered on the Church grounds and patrolled the Church complex to ensure that those who had sought shelter there would not leave. Witness V stated that gendarmes accompanied Kayishema before and during the attacks and witness PP stated that he saw gendarmes near the Church on 13 April. Witness UU stated that on the 15 April Kayishema arrived with "soldiers." The other three eyewitnesses stated that gendarmes were present throughout the congregation of those seeking refuge and during the massacres. For example, witness V stated that the gendarmes arrived on either the 9 or 10 April.

384. Witnesses V, OO and PP all confirmed the allegation that, prior to the attacks, the Tutsis could not leave the Church due to a fear of the gendarmes and other armed individuals patrolling the C[illegible] complex. According to one witness, this fear was founded upon the murder of individuals who had attempted to leave the Church building, to find food.

5654

385. Paragraph 41 of the Indictment asserts that individuals under Kayishema's control "directed members of the Gendarme [sic] Nationale, communal police of Gishyita commune, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to attack the Church," and that these individuals directly participated in the events. What follows is how the events unfolded as recounted by Prosecution eyewitnesses before the Trial Chamber.

15 April 1994

386. A number of Prosecution eyewitnesses stated that after the Tutsis began to gather, the Church doors were kept locked from the inside in order to prevent the assailants, who previously had attempted to attack, from entering the Church. Therefore, on the morning of 15 April, the assailants began the attack by throwing tear gas grenades into the Church and shooting through the windows. Witnesses V, W and UU placed Kayishema and the local authorities at the Church on this day. According to witnesses OO and W, Bourgmestre Sikubwabo and Conseillers Mika Muhimana and Vincent Rutaganera led the attack. Witness V stated that he saw Kayishema arrive at the Church in the company of gendarmes on 15 April, while UU stated that he saw Kayishema in the company of "soldiers" on this day. Witness V was the only witness that claimed that Kayishema had a gun and opened fire.

387. According to UU, on this day, Kayishema came to the Church and went to the home of the Hutu priest behind the Church. Witness OO confirmed the cooperation of the priest with Kayishema when he deposed that the priest instructed him to conduct a head count of the Tutsis in the Church for the Prefect. In addition, the Prosecution eyewitnesses confirmed the presence and/or participation of the communal police and civilians, such as local businessman Rundikayo, on this date. Witnesses indicated that although some people died from the effects of the tear gas, the number of Tutsis killed was relatively low on this day. By all accounts, the attackers left the Church in the afternoon of 15 April.

16 April 1994

388. On the morning of 16 April 1994 the Church doors were finally forced opened and the assailants entered the Church. Witness PP recalled that "we were hoping to be killed by bullets and not by machetes."[82] The attackers again used tear gas grenades, along with other traditional weapons and, during the ensuing panic some Tutsis were trampled to death.

389. Witness OO testified that, on the morning of 16 April, Kayishema came with soldiers of the National Army. Witness W was the other eyewitness who placed Kayishema at the Church on this date. It was claimed that in addition to Kayishema, local authorities such as Bourgmestre Sikubwabo and various *conseiller*s were present at the Church on this date. Soldiers threw grenades and other attackers shot at and hacked with machetes the Tutsis inside the Church. After most people in the Church had been killed, witness OO, who hid under the corpses of fallen Tutsis, stated that he heard the Prefect telling the local authorities "to come and collect the Caterpillar [bulldozer] to bury the dead."[83]

The Defence Case

390. The Defence conceded that Kayishema came to Mubuga Church on 14 April, but that he did so only to monitor the situation. In fact, during closing arguments, the Defence reminded the Trial Chamber that his visit to the Church is recorded in Kayishema's diary.[84] This was an obvious mistake as nothing is recorded in the said diary under this date.

391. The Defence also attempted to impeach Prosecution witnesses by stressing that some contradicted themselves, or each other, with regard to the exact hour of the commencement of the attacks or the varying dates of the end of the attacks. For example, the Chamber was asked to recall that witness OO deposed that the attacks did not end until 17 April while others claimed that the massacre, at this site, ended on 16 April. According to Kayishema's Defence Counsel the idea that "a witness can only identify Clement Kayishema if he knew him before" is incorrect.[85] In cross-examination issues of visibility were raised which will be analysed below.

Factual Findings

392. The allegations in paragraph 39 of the Indictment, that by about 14 April 1994 thousands of Tutsis congregated in Mubuga Church and that they were taking refuge from attacks which had occurred throughout Kibuye, are not in dispute. In addition all five Prosecution witnesses and at least one Defence witness confirmed that many Tutsis had come to the Church for protection. The witnesses gave slightly differing numbers about the persons that were gathered at the Church. Witness V estimated that about 4,000 people, mostly women and children had assembled there by 12 April, while witness W remarked that the number of persons taking shelter at this location was between 4,000 to 5,000 by the time of the attacks. Witness OO stated that 5,565 were present at the Church according to a head count he conducted on the instructions of the Hutu priest, who had told OO that this information was needed by the Prefect for humanitarian purposes. The Trial Chamber accepts that between 4,000 to 5,000 persons had taken refuge at Mubuga Church.

393. Paragraph 40 of the Indictment charges Kayishema with having visited the Church on several occasions before the attacks and having brought gendarmes to this location on or about 10 April. The gendarmes allegedly prevented the Tutsis within the Church from leaving. As discussed above, all Prosecution eyewitnesses affirmed having seen gendarmes at the Church while they were assembling there and during the attacks. With regard to Kayishema having brought the gendarmes two witnesses testified that prior to the attack they saw him at the Church either arriving with or in the company of gendarmes. Therefore, we find that whether these gendarmes came to this location with Kayishe arrived without him is irrelevant as Kayishema knew or should have known of their activities, especially given the state of security in his Prefecture. The issue is the presence of the gendarmes and not whether they were physically transported to the crime site by Kayishema.

394. Whether the gendarmes prevented the Tutsis from leaving the Church is the second question raised in paragraph 40 of the Indictment. The Defence contended that the gendarmes were present for the protection of the Tutsis. The Prosecution witnesses painted another picture. They stated that while the gendarmes were present before the attacks, armed assailants, including the members of the Interahamwe, surrounded the Church and attacked Tutsis attempting to exit, with impunity. Witnesses W and OO both affirmed that Tutsis who initially attempted to leave the Church for food or water were either chased back into the building or beaten to death by the armed assailants outside the Church. Witness OO stated that those seeking refuge could not even leave the Church to use the toilet. One Prosecution eyewitness testified that approximately, twelve to fifteen gendarmes were present at the Church. If this number was accurate, coupled with the fact that gendarmes are usually armed, then it would be conceivable that the gendarmes could engage in the prevention of the departure of the Tutsi seeking refuge from this site. Moreover, during the attacks, the gendarmes were seen throwing grenades and shooting into the crowds of the unarmed civilians inside the Church. All these facts leave no doubt that the gendarmes were involved in the virtual imprisonment and later the massacre of the Tutsis in Mubuga Church until the attacks began inside the Church on the morning of 15 April.

395. Paragraph 41 of the Indictment, surprisingly, does not charge Kayishema with having been present during the attacks. It states "on or about 14 April 1994 individuals, including individuals under Clement Kayishema's control, directed members of the Gendarme [sic] Nationale, communal police of Gishyita commune, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to attack the Church." The Indictment goes on to allege that the attacks continued for several days as not all the persons within the Church could be killed at one time. As aforementioned, all five Prosecution eyewitnesses to the events at Mubuga Church were there on the 14 and 15 April. Two witnesses deposed that they had been there on the 16 April and only one on 17 April 1994. These witnesses stated that they closed the doors to the Church to avoid being attacked by assailants. The Trial Chamber finds that, with regard to the date, there were no material contradictions in the oral testimonies of these five witnesses, as claimed by the Defence. The Trial Chamber further finds that the attackers, who surrounded the Church, began their attempts to kill the Tutsis before 15 April, but that the dates on which the massacres were carried out inside the Church were in fact 15 and 16 April in the presence, and at the direction of, local authorities.

396. Because a number of eyewitnesses placed Kayishema at Mubuga Church during the attacks, at this juncture, it is appropriate to consider the identification of the accused at this location before and during the attacks. Preliminarily, we are cognizant of the fact that the events took place during the daytime, which renders visibility less problematic. Secondly, we note that because those seeking were awaiting attacks, they must have been constantly seeking to know about the goings-on around the Church and were therefore, as mentioned by some witnesses, such as W, looking outside through the windows and doors.

397. Having observed the demeanor of the witnesses and listened closely to their oral testimony the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the eyewitnesses were credible and did not attempt to invent facts. This credibility was helpful in determining the reliability of the identification of the accused at the massacre site. Mubuga Church has three doors and several windows[86] and according to the eyewitnesses' accounts, the assailants, including Kayishema and his subordinates came close to the Church building at some point during the time in question. During cross-examination, some concerns of obstructed visibility were raised also in the case of OO, because he had placed Kayishema at the site by stating that while he (witness OO) was lying under the corpses of slaughtered Tutsis, he heard Kayishema speaking with other local authorities. The question then becomes one of voice recognition and not of visibility, as the Defence contend. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the witnesses' prior familiarity with the accused - he had seen the Prefect at the installation of Sikubwabo as Bourgmestre and at local rallies - and having heard his voice at other meetings prior to the massacres would enable OO to recognise Kayishema's voice and render the identification of the accused a trustworthy one.

398. The Defence contested the identification of the accused by witness W by pointing to the unfavorable visibility conditions caused by the tear gas released into the Church. Since there is both oral and pictorial[87] evidence of grenades having been used the Trial Chamber notes that this factor could have made for poor visibility. However, Mubuga Church covers a sizeable amount of space, capable of holding 4,000 to 5,000 persons. Witness W stated that he was not near the part of the Church where the grenade landed and was therefore able to view the persons outside. At any rate, it remains unclear whether the witness saw Kayishema prior to the launching of the tear gas grenade or after. Therefore, the Trial Chamber accepts the testimony of witness W.[88]

399. Questions were also raised by the Defence regarding the reliability of witness UU's identification of the accused. UU testified that he was near the main entrance of Mubuga Church when Kayishema arrived in his vehicle. During cross-examination, however, he stated that he did not recognise Kayishema until he heard other people remark that the Prefect had arrived. The Trial Chamber observes that witness UU had met Kayishema on one occasion prior to April 1994, at Kayishema's grandfather's home, but may not have recognised him immediately upon his arrival at Mubuga Church on 15 April. However, the witness stated that after the declaration by others he did recall knowing Kayishema. The Trial Chamber finds this, in fact, to be the case.

400. Each one of these eyewitnesses, with the exception of PP, placed Kayishema at the site on at least one day either shortly before or during the attacks of 15 and 16 April. Witness PP's h evidence also corroborated the accounts of other eyewitnesses. Additionally all eyewitnesses presented by the Prosecution for this site affirmed having seen at least one or more of the following outside the Church during the time in question: local authorities such as Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, Conseillers Muhimana and Rutagenera, Minister of Information Niyitegeka as well as gendarmes, members of the Interahamwe, communal police and other armed civilians. It is interesting to note that the Defence only contested the presence of local authorities during the cross-examination of Kayishema and not before. [89]

5658

401. Paragraph 42 of the Indictment maintains that as a result of the attacks thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to men, women and children perished and numerous others sustained injuries.

402. The Trial Chamber has made a finding with regard to the number of the Tutsis present at the Church. Therefore, in light of the testimony that most of the persons assembled at the Church were slaughtered, the Trial Chamber deems it unnecessary to focus on exact numbers. Suffices to say we find that thousands of persons were massacred at this site and therefore the Prosecution has met its burden beyond a reasonable doubt with regard to this allegation.

403. Paragraph 43 of the Indictment asserts the Kayishema did not attempt to prevent this massacre and failed to punish those responsible. This allegation is addressed in Chapter 6.1.

Conclusion

404. It is clear from the evidence presented to the Trial Chamber that of the thousands of Tutsis gathered at Mubuga Church, only a few survived this weekend massacre. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema and his subordinates, including local authorities, the gendarmes, the communal police and the members of the Interahamwe were present and participated at the attacks at Mubuga Church between 14 and 16 April. As aforementioned, Kayishema, is not charged with having been present during the attacks under paragraph 41 of the Indictment. In light of the testimony of the five witnesses the Chamber nevertheless finds that Kayishema was present during the actual attacks. We further find that his presence and the presence and the participation of other local authorities, encouraged the killings of the Tutsis who had assembled to seek refuge there.

5.4 THE MASSACRES IN THE AREA OF BISESERO

5.4.1 Introduction

405. The evidence before the Trial Chamber presents a picture of a massive, horrific assault on the Tutsis gathered in the Bisesero area by extremist Hutu military, communal police, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians. These attacks continued throughout April, May and June 1994. The Bisesero area was home and area of refuge to many Tutsis during the genocide. Many Tutsis from other regions, hid in caves, scattered through woods and bushes, or gathered on the high hills in the area. Some Tutsis congregated in Bisesero because they had heard that they would be protected. This was not the case. Relentlessly, they were pursued by Hutus bent on genocide, who shot or hacked all the Tutsis they found.

406. The most severe attacks occurred in the Bisesero area on 13 and 14 May 1994, after an apparent two-week lull in the attacks. Some evidence asserted that this two-week pause in the attacks resulted from a resistance by the Tutsis assembled in Bisesero and attackers used this pause to regroup. Witness G attended a meeting, held on 3 May by Prime Minister Jean Kambanda at Kayishema's offices, in which Kayishema reported there was serious insecurity caused by those gathered in Bisesero and requested reinforcement to resolve the problem.[90] Soon after in mid May, the assailants again pursued those seeking refuge from place to place. At times, Hutu operations were conducted on a huge, organised scale with hundreds of assailants transported in buses to areas where Tutsi civilians had gathered. At other times, minor military or Interahamwe patrols throughout the region attacked Tutsis whenever they were found. The ultimate aim of these assaults appeared to be the complete annihilation of the entire Tutsi population. In pursuit of this objective, attackers killed thousands of Tutsi civilians.

General Allegations

407. Paragraph 45 of the Indictment alleges, that the Bisesero area spans two communes, Gishyita and Gisovu, in Kibuye Prefecture. The Prosecution alleges that from about 9 April until 30 June 1994, thousands of men, women and children sought refuge in the area of Bisesero. Most were Tutsis seeking refuge from attacks that had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.

408. Bisesero's geography is not in dispute. The Trial Chamber is seized of Prosecution exhibits, including maps and photographic slides, which depict the area of Bisesero.

409. Furthermore, the Defence did not contest the allegation that from about 9 April until 30 June 1994, Tutsis sought refuge in Bisesero from Hutu attacks that had occurred in other parts of Rwanda and, in particularly, other areas of Kibuye Prefecture. Many eyewitnesses confirmed having seen Tutsis amongst thousands of Tutsis fleeing other attacks within Kibuye Prefecture[91] and other witnesses confirmed having seen many Tutsis fleeing various areas in Kibuye to Bisesero. Kayishema testified: "I can tell you that the, [sic] aggressors were Hutu and the attacked were the Tutsis, some who came from Bisesero and others who had gathered in the hills of Bisesero. On both sides – on either side there were cases of mortality."[92] Numerous witnesses confirmed the mass murder of Tutsis in the Bisesero area. For instance, Chris McGreal, a journalist for the London-based Guardian newspaper, testified that he spoke to Tutsis seeking refuge on a hill in Bisesero in June 1994. While there, he saw evidence of mass killings in the area including human corpses. The Tutsis whom he interviewed told him that these bodies remained unburied because they (the Tutsis) feared attacks by the armed Hutus near the water. Patrick de Saint Exupery, a journalist for the Paris-based Le Figaro, visited Bisesero in June 1994. He confirmed that a "Bisesero Hill was scattered, literally scattered with bodies, in small holes, in small ditches, on the foliage, along the ditches, there were bodies and there were many bodies."[93]

5660

410. Paragraph 46 of the Indictment, alleges that "the area of Bisesero was regularly attacked on almost a daily basis, throughout the period of about 9 April 1994 through 30 June 1994. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the Tutsis in Bisesero. At various times the men, women and children seeking refuge in Bisesero attempted to defend themselves from these attacks with stones, sticks and other crude weapons."

411. The above allegations were not contested. Most Prosecution witnesses, including survivors of attacks, confirmed that attacks took place on a regular basis, during the time in question. Witness OO testified that "the attacks were every day in Bisesero, but most frequent in Muyira and Gitwa. The attacks began at about 6 a.m. and would continue until about 4 to 5 p.m." Kayishema himself testified that "major attack",[94] and "massacres",[95] took place in Bisesero. There is sufficient evidence to show that attacks occurred at approximately twelve sites in the Bisesero area.[96] Dr. Haglund observed the aftermath of the massacres in September 1995 at various sites at Bisesero. Testifying about his visit to a hill on the border of Gishyita and Gisovu Commune, Dr. Haglund stated "[a]nd if one looks through field glasses or a magnifying instrument across . . . this hillside there were many white spots – it looks almost like strange mushrooms growing here and they represented skeletons, the heads of human bodies that were littered on this landscape . . .",[97] and "in a brief walk around I observed a minimum of 40 to 50 individual skeletons lying about on the hill. These were skeletons on the surface. They represented men, women, children and adults."[98]

412. All types of weapons were used by the attackers, witness JJ confirmed that attackers were carrying "clubs, machetes and grenades." Witness HH also reported that the assailants were armed with guns, machetes, swords and spears. The forensic evidence presented by Dr. Haglund confirmed that the victims were killed with such weapons during the massacres. Tutsis, who had gathered at Bisesero, also attempted to defend themselves with crude weapons. Witness X, along with other witnesses, this fact. Witness EE stated that the Tutsis threw rocks at the assailants to thwart attacks and escape.

5661

5.4.2 Massacres Where Kayishema and Ruzindana Acted in Concert

413. The Prosecution alleges that at various massacre sites in Bisesero, Kayishema and Ruzindana often in concert, brought and directed groups of armed attackers. Moreover, the Prosecution accuses both of personally attacking and killing persons seeking refuge in Bisesero area. Evidence shows that assailants attacked the Tutsis seeking refuge over a vast area. For clarity, the Chamber discusses the evidence chronologically and site by site, with emphasis on the most severe attacks.

Bisesero Hill

414. Witness FF saw Kayishema, Ruzindana and Mika Muhimana, the Conseiller of the Gishyita sector, arriving at Bisesero in a white vehicle on 11 May. Kayishema was wearing a green shirt and carrying a megaphone. Ruzindana wore a white shirt and carried a weapon. Mika said through a megaphone that they were working for the Red Cross and that peace had returned. He urged people to bring the wounded and the handicapped to the Church in Mubuga where they would get blankets and beans. As those seeking refuge emerged from their hiding places Ruzindana stepped out of his vehicle and shot at a woman and two girls. Witness FF observed these events from a distance of approximately ten meters. This Chamber finds this uncontroverted testimony.

Attacks at Muyira Hill in May

415. Muyira Hill is located in the Bisesero area on the border between Gishyita and Gisovu commune on the Gishyita side of the road that separates the two communes at this location. As Saint Exupery deposed, it was a manhunt for Tutsis. Many witnesses identified Kayishema and/or Ruzindana at this massacre site including witnesses PP, OO, II, JJ, NN, HH, UU, FF, KK. Witnesses PP and OO were survivors of the Church in Mubuga massacres who then escaped to Bisesero. Witness PP testified that on 13 May Kayishema and Ruzindana were at the foot of Muyira Hill participating in the attacks. Witness PP clearly observed the attackers throwing grenades, chasing those seeking refuge and, before nightfall, Kayishema and Ruzindana shooting at the fleeing Tutsis. On 14 May, also at Muyira, PP heard Kayishema addressing a group of attackers who had come from other prefectures.

416. Witness OO testified that the Muyira attacks were led by the Bourgmestre, the Prefect, conseillers and Ruzindana. The attackers separated into groups and encircled the Tutsis seeking refuge. According to OO, he stated that before the attacks, Ruzindana had distributed traditional weapons to the attackers. Witness OO stated that on 13 May Kayishema and Ruzindana came to Muyira Hill leading a convoy of vehicles, including buses, which were transporting soldiers. He testified that Kayishema signalled the start of the attack by firing a shot. Witness OO stated that he saw Kayishema clearly and described that Kayishema wore a green suit on that day. Witne saw Ruzindana who was armed, leading one of the group of attackers. Ruzindana shot witness OO, striking him in the foot that day. The Defence noted that the witness had told the Prosecution investigator he had been shot in the leg rather than foot. The witness explained that the Kinyarwanda word he had used on both occasions was "ikirenge," which means foot. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, any discrepancy is not a material contradiction.

5662

417. With regard to the events of 14 May, OO saw Ruzindana and Kayishema arrive with members of the Interahamwe. From his hiding place that morning he heard Kayishema address the attackers who came from the other prefectures and remembered Kayishema saying "the dirt should be cleaned that day and that they should finish the job . . ." and that Kayishema and others would take care of what remained to be done.[99]

418. Witness II, testified that on 13 May he observed the government owned ONATRACOM buses arrive along with many other vehicles from which soldier exited. As the assailants began the attack, the Tutsis fled, after an initial attempt to defend themselves using stones. Witness II testified that he saw Ruzindana arrive with the soldiers and appear to lead them. Although during examination-in-chief II testified that he witnessed Ruzindana firing a gun at the Tutsis, in cross-examination, this statement proved to be based on an assumption rather than his direct observation. In addition, on the evening of 13 May, while he was hiding at Uwingabo Cellule, II observed the attackers regrouping. There he saw and heard Kayishema thanking those attackers from the surrounding commune and prefectures, including Ruzindana, for having shown such devotion to their work.

419. On 14 May II observed the attackers as they again arrived in buses and cars. From a literal stone's throw away, II saw Kayishema and Ruzindana leading the group and observed both shoot at the Tutsis. Witness II fled in the direction of Karongi Hill and escaped. Witness II further claimed that he saw Ruzindana, on several occasions, giving money to several of the attackers.

420. Witness JJ testified to the events at Muyira Hill on 13 May. He affirmed that Kayishema, dressed in a green civilian suit, arrived in a white vehicle with military escort and Ruzindana was seen to be transporting assailants. Kayishema held a short barrelled, black gun and a hand megaphone. He divided the attackers into groups, gave instructions and fired the first shot. Witness JJ recalled that at the end of the attack, Kayishema presided over the regrouped assailants. During the examination-in-chief, JJ initially stated that he was 300 meters away from Kayishema, but later approximated the distance to have been 120 meters.

421. On 14 May, witness JJ again saw Kayishema between Gishyita Hill and Gisovu where the assailants parked their vehicles. At the end of the large-scale attack, Kayishema brought together and congratulated the assailants from other areas. Attackers shot witness JJ in the hand during th attacks.

5663

422. Witness NN testified that on 13 May 1994, he recognised Kayishema, Ruzindana and Bourgmestre Ndimbati, among the attackers. Kayishema was waiting for those seeking refuge on the road and shot in the direction of three Tutsis named Mbunduye, Munyandamutsa and Hakizimana. The record is unclear whether the witness observed the death of any of these persons. Witness NN, who stated that Ruzindana transported members of the Interahamwe to the massacre site on 13 May. There he fired gunshots at two Tutsis named Ragasana and Birara and shot at OO, but missed. Witness NN, who lost an eye from a grenade explosion at this site recalled how the Hill was covered with dead at the end of the attack.

423. Witness HH testified that assailants during the attack of 13 May included Kayishema, Ruzindana, Musema, Ndimbati and Sikubwabo. As OO was hiding in the forest Kayishema and Ruzindana were quite close when OO saw them shoot at a group of Tutsis seeking refuge who were at the top of the hill. Witness HH remembered the attackers singing: "The Tutsis should be exterminated and thrown into the forest . . . don't spare the newly born baby, don't spare the elderly man, don't spare the elderly woman. Kagame left the country when he was a young baby."[100] In cross-examination, HH explained that he had not mentioned Ruzindana in his written statement because the Prosecution investigator had inquired only about the presence of responsible officials. Having reviewed the written statement, the Trial Chamber finds credible the witness's explanation.

424. Witness UU observed Kayishema at Mpura Hill, a 30-minute walk from Muyira Hill, on 14 May. There, he saw Kayishema near the top of Mpura, drinking beer with other assailants before the start of the attacks. He then saw Kayishema directing other leaders to the location of Tutsis nearby. Thereafter, the attackers began to pursue the Tutsis on Mpura Hill. Witness UU testified that he saw Ruzindana giving money to the attackers on 15 May on Gitwa Hill in Mubuga and that he had heard a conversation between him and the attackers regarding additional payments. The witness's testimony clarified that he was able to observe the exchange of money. However, UU stated that he heard only the conversation between the attackers, and not that between Ruzindana and these assailants, who confirmed that they expected Ruzindana to pay them more in the following days. If the latter version of UU's testimony regarding additional payment is how the events unfolded, the evidence proffered amounts to hearsay. However, because other witnesses, such as II corroborate Ruzindana's disbursement of payments to the attackers at various sites, the Trial Chamber finds this discrepancy to be a minor one.

425. The witnesses above provide a thorough account of the role of Kayishema and Ruzindana in the Muyira attacks of 13 and 14 May 1994. The Trial Chamber need not detail the further evidence that supports the Prosecution's case. It suffices to say that the evidence of witnesses Z and AA affirms

5664

Ruzindana was participating in the Muyira Hill attacks.

Witnesses FF and KK

426. Witnesses FF and KK provided evidence that conforms generally to the accounts of the above witnesses. However, doubt exists as to the quality or reliability of their testimony. Witness FF stated that he observed the events from the peak of Gitwa Hill. The Defence proffered evidence that Gitwa Hill is about three kilometres from Muyira Hill and suggested that FF was testifying to events that were at least half that distance away. The Prosecution failed to prove otherwise. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that FF had a clear view of events and deems his evidence unreliable.

427. Witness KK was a public official in Rwanda in 1994. He testified that on 13 May, he heard the attackers singing: "let's exterminate them, let's exterminate them, we must finish off these people who are hiding in bushes. Let's look for men, everywhere so that no one remains."[101] He further testified that on 14 May, Kayishema led the attackers, shot at those seeking refuge as they descended Muyira Hill, and addressed a crowd of assailants using a megaphone. In his written statements, however, KK had made no mention of Kayishema except in reference to a radio broadcast where the former Prime Minister had thanked Kayishema for being valiant. Witness KK explained this omission by stating that the Prosecution investigators had only asked him about those who came from his commune. A close review of his witness statement, however, reveals that this was not the case. The two statements made by witness KK to the investigating team, show that the investigators inquired about leaders of the attacks in general. They did not ask specific questions about the attackers' origins. For the above reasons, the Trial Chamber gives little weight to the evidence proffered by witness KK.

Attacks at Muyira Hill and Vicinity in June

428. The attacks in the Bisesero area continued into June 1994. A letter dated 12 June 1994 shows Kayishema's continued involvement in the massacres. In this letter, Kayishema requested from the Ministry of Defence a plethora of ammunition, such as "gun-propelled and hand grenades, bullets for R4 rifles and magazines for machine guns" to undertake a "clean-up operation" ("ratissage" in French) in Bisesero.[102]

429. Witness PP, who had seen Kayishema and Ruzindana at the attacks on Muyira Hill on 13 and 14 May, saw them again in June at Kucyapa. As PP was running through Kucyapa he saw Kayishema and Ruzindana who fired a gun at him and at the group with which he was fleeing. Later in June, PP saw Kayishema and Ruzindana for the last time near Kabanda's house. Here PP was with a group of unarmed Tutsis and saw both the accused and others fire guns and kill people. Witness PP also testified that Kabanda, a prominent businessman, was a particularly sought after target by both Kayishema and Ruzindana. Witness PP deposed that Kabanda was eventually shot by Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, decapitated and his head was delivered to Kayishema for reward. PP was hiding in a nearby bush when he saw Sikubwabo shoot Kabanda, but only heard about the beheading from others. The acc beheading, given by PP, is not sufficient to prove particular direct acts of participation of the accused. However, with regard to the acts of those under his control, in this instance Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, the Trial Chamber finds the evidence of this witness convincing.

5665

430. In light of the above evidence, the Trial Chamber finds that Kayishema and Ruzindana were present at the massacres in Muyira Hill and its vicinity beginning on about 13 May 1994. Further, the Trial Chamber finds that Kayishema and Ruzindana helped transport other assailants to Muyira Hill and vicinity, instigated them to attack the Tutsis gathered there, orchestrated the method of attack, led the attacks, and personally participated in them. Additionally, with regard to Kayishema, this Chamber finds that the Prosecution has proved the participation in the massacres of his subordinates, including the gendarmes, communal police, members of the Interahamwe, and local officials, such as Bourgmestre Sikubwabo.

The Cave

431. One of the most horrific mass killings in Bisesero took place at a site simply called the "cave," located in Gishyita commune, Bisesero Sector, Kigarama cellule. Hutu assailants launched an attack on the cave where Tutsis sought refuge. The assailants came in the morning and fired guns and threw grenades into the crowd of Tutsis who sought refuge at this location. The attackers then fetched and piled wood at the entrance of the cave and set fire to it. The smoke killed hundreds of people inside. By all accounts, there was apparently only one survivor. The Prosecution asserts that Kayishema and Ruzindana were amongst those leading the attack.

432. Dr. Haglund visited the cave in September 1995 and described it by stating: "I went back perhaps 40 or 50 feet – about 10 metres. It got gradually smaller and smaller and narrower and it would make sharp turns and drops . . . ." Dr. Haglund took photographs from inside and outside the cave which the Prosecution entered into evidence.[103] Dr. Haglund further stated "as I went [further back into the cave] . . . I did observe [the remains] of many individuals, men, women and children protruding from the mud that had covered them up in the intervening rainy season, and at minimum, I observed at least 40 people in this area." Witness QQ, who's sister died at the cave, testified that he saw the smoke coming from the cave on the day of the attack, as he was fleeing from the hill. Later, when he went back to the cave, he discovered that the attackers had set the fire at the entrance.

433. Witness CC is the sole survivor of the massacre at the cave. On the day of the attack, in June 1994, witness CC was inside the cave. According to witness CC, the attack was launched at 9 a.m. when the attackers threw grenades into the cave that did not explode. Members of the Interahamwe then went to look for wood and dry grass and piled it and firewood and earth at the entrance of the cave and ignited. On several occasions, during the attack witness CC heard the members of the Interahamwe talking of Kayishema and Ruzindana in a manner that would suggest they orchestrated the atta inside the cave, however, CC never actually saw Kayishema or Ruzindana. CC claimed that he was able to stay alive by rubbing mud on his body and sipping dripping water. He did lose consciousness later but came to when cool air flowed into the cave after other Tutsis unblocked the entrance from outside.

434. Two witnesses, witness W and HH were hiding outside the cave and confirmed that Kayishema and Ruzindana were present and participated in the cave massacre. Witness W, who was hiding in a thorny bush less than five minutes walk from the cave entrance, testified that in May or June 1994, more than one hundred people, mostly the elderly, women and children took refuge in the cave. As the attackers arrived he heard them singing: "[w]e are going to exterminate them and put them in a hole." Kayishema, Ruzindana, Bourgmestre Sikubwabo and other local authorities were among the attackers. Witness W confirmed that the attack started in the morning when the attackers fired into the cave. Later they piled wood at the entrance of the cave and set the wood ablaze. Witness W further testified that Kayishema appeared to be leading a group of attackers and that Ruzindana was leading those attackers from Ruhengeri. After attackers departed at 5 or 6 p.m., Witness W and others re-opened the entrance to rescue any survivors.

435. Witness HH testified that he fled to the cave after his wife and children were killed in another part of Kigarama. He remained outside watching the assailants in the nearby forest. He recognised Kayishema, Ruzindana, Sikubwabo, Ndimbati, and other civil authorities amongst the attackers. He recounted that the assailants fired into the cave, then closed the mouth of the cave, piled wood at the entrance and set the wood ablaze on the orders of Kayishema and Ruzindana. Witness HH confirmed W's account that Kayishema and Ruzindana were leading the groups of assailants and he saw the two men giving them instructions, "just like an overseer who is demonstrating to workers how the work should be done." After the attack, HH and others removed the earth from partially blocking the cave's entrance. Although his testimony is not completely clear on this point, it appears that when HH went into the cave he found no survivors, but later one person came out alive. Among the victims were HH's mother, sister, sister-in-law and her three children.

436. The Defence claims that there is a discrepancy between the testimony of witnesses CC, W and HH with regard to when CC was rescued from the cave. The Defence asserts that CC claimed to have stayed in the cave for three days and nights after the attack, while HH and W testified that after the departure of the assailants on the same evening, the cave entrance was opened and CC was rescued. The Trial Chamber does not find such a discrepancy. It is true that CC deposed that he remained in the cave for three days and nights after the attack. However, careful review of the transcript shows that HH stated that, although the rescuers opened the cave the same evening, they did not find any survivors on that day. HH testified that later one person came out alive. This conforms with CC's account. Witness W supported HH's account that the rescuers opened the cave on the same day and that they were able to save one survivor but did not mention the day that the survivor emerged from the cave. Witn[illegible] W both named the survivor as CC. It is also possible that CC lost track of time as he was unconscious for an unknown period of time. Whatever the exact day of CC's exit from the cave, the testimony of the three witnesses in relation to the presence and role of Kayishema, his subordinates and Ruzindana at the cave are a consistent and credible.

5667

437. The Chamber notes that no exact date of this event was established. Witness CC stated it was in June. Witness W indicated it happened in late May or June, but added that he was disoriented during this period due to starvation and other factors. According to witness HH, the massacre at the cave took place after French soldiers arrived, which he thought to be 30 June. The problem that witnesses have recollecting precise dates, and the consequential lack of specificity on when the events occurred, has been discussed above. In any event, the essential elements of the crimes depicting the location and nature of the atrocities correlate, thus clearly showing that the witnesses were testifying to the same massacre.

438. The Trial Chamber finds that an attack occurred at the cave and assailants killed scores of Tutsis. Further, both Kayishema and Ruzindana were present at the attack and played a leading role in directing the perpetrators of this massacre; Ruzindana of a particular group of attackers and Kayishema in general. This Chamber finds that gendarmes, members of the Interahamwe and various local officials were present and participated.

5.4.3 Massacres Where Kayishema and Ruzindana Acted Separately

439. There are a number of sites within the area of Bisesero area where the witnesses testified to having seen one of the two accused. The Trial Chamber first turns to evidence in relation to Kayishema, followed by that in relation to Ruzindana. Again, the evidence is presented and analysed chronologically and per site.

Attacks for Which Kayishema is Accused Separately

Karongi Hill

440. Testimony reveals that after the massacre at the Stadium, many Tutsi civilians fled to Karongi. Witness U testified that one morning in mid April Kayishema arrived with the Conseiller of Gitesi Commune, soldiers, gendarmes and Hutu civilians. Witness U was close to the arriving vehicles and observed Kayishema wearing a black, short sleeve shirt and a pair of black trousers. They proceeded to attack Tutsis on Karongi Hill. During the siege, gendarmes and soldiers shot at the Tutsi crowd on the Hill while the Hutu civilians surrounded the Hill preventing escape. Witness U heard Kayishema, who was speaking through a megaphone, demand help for the attack. According to witnesses, the attack started around 10 a.m. and ended about 3 p.m.

441. After this attack at Karongi, witness U fled to Kigarama Hill (in the record transcribed as Muchigarama). Here, in late April, he witnessed another attack led by Kayishema. He stated that although Kayishema was not armed, "[i]t was as though he was a general of the army,"[104] and that thousands of Tutsis lost their lives during these attacks.

442. Witness DD testified that a large-scale attack took place at Karongi Hill towards the end of April. He saw, from a hiding place 30 to 35 meters away, that Kayishema arrived in a white car with other civic authorities, soldiers, gendarmes, communal police, members of the Interahamwe and civilians at about 9 a.m. Witness DD testified that Kayishema was wearing a white shirt, a black jacket and a pair of dark trousers and was carrying a long gun. After having given instructions to the attackers, Kayishema proceeded to the top of the Hill with other attackers. Kayishema shot at Rutazihana, a fleeing Tutsi refugee, and killed him instantaneously. The attack continued until the evening. Witness DD described how the slaughtered bodies on the Hill were like "small insects which had been killed off by insecticide."[105] On that day, DD lost many members of his family, including his mother, wife, nine children, four sisters and their children, five of his brother's children, two brothers and their wives.

443. During the cross-examination, the Defence Counsel stressed the difference between the written statement signed by DD and his oral testimony. In his statement to investigators the witness had described how his friend Rutazimana was killed by the bullet of a soldier, whereas in his testimony, he asserted that Kayishema had shot Rutazimana. The doubt raised by this inconsistency, of which the accused is entitled to the benefit, was not dispelled by the explanation of the witness. With regard to prior inconsistent statements, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that greater emphasis should be placed on direct testimony than on unchallenged prior statements. Although the witness's oral testimony was truthful overall and the accused bears responsibility for the acts of his subordinates at this site as one of the leaders of the attack, we find that with regard to the shooting incident a reasonable doubt has been raised.

Gitwa Cellule and Gitwa Hill

444. Yet another site where Kayishema allegedly led and participated in the attacks is Gitwa Cellule and Gitwa Hill. Witness MM, who lost his wife, four children, two brothers and one sister during the attacks, testified that he (the witness) saw Kayishema when he was hiding at Mukazirandimbwe. Kayishema came in a white double-cabin vehicle with soldiers and members of the Interahamwe who were carrying guns, clubs, machetes and spears. Kayishema ordered and urged the assailants to exterminate the Tutsis seeking refuge there. Witness MM saw Kayishema three times at Gitwa in similar circumstances during May. He testified that although he did not see Kayishema carry a weapon or observe any killing, he stated that, "wherever one went one saw nothing but bodies."[106]

5669

Attacks for Which Ruzindana is Accused Separately

Mine at Nyiramuregro Hill

445. Nyiramurego Hill, where a mine is located, is in Bisesero sector. Witness RR testified that he saw Ruzindana arrive in a vehicle with members of the Interahamwe, park his car at the foot of the hill and distribute machetes and guns about 15 April. According to this witness Ruzindana told the attackers to "hurry up, I'm going to bring other people to help you. But each time bring me an identity card or a head and I will pay you." Although after cross-examination the exact distance at which RR observed Ruzindana remained unclear, RR maintained that he was close enough to hear and see Ruzindana on that occasion.

446. Two witnesses gave specific accounts regarding another incident involving Ruzindana at Nyiramurego Hill. Witnesses II and EE stated that a group of Tutsis, who had taken refuge in the Mine, in this Hill, were killed by Ruzindana, members of the Interahamwe and soldiers. Both witnesses testified that a young Hutu boy who knew of these Tutsis hiding place brought the attackers to this site. Specifically, II testified that one morning after the Muyira attack on 14 May (either in May or June), while he was hiding near the road by this Hill, he saw Ruzindana arrive in a vehicle accompanied by the members of the Interahamwe. Ruzindana stayed by the roadside while the assailants began to uncover the mine entrances and kill those hiding within. Two young Tutsi women were discovered in the Mine by the members of the Interahamwe and Ruzindana ordered that they be brought to him. One of these young women, named Beatrice, a former schoolmate of II's, was approximately sixteen years old. Ruzindana tore open her blouse and then slowly cut off one of her breasts with a machete passed to him by an members of the Interahamwe. After he finished, Ruzindana cut off her other breast while mockingly telling her to look at the first breast as it lay on the ground. He then tore open her stomach. Beatrice died as a result of the assault. A member of the Interahamwe, following Ruzindana's lead, immediately proceeded to kill the second young woman while Ruzindana watched. With some slight variation, witness EE confirmed this account. Both witnesses observed this event from hiding places alongside the road, adjacent to where Ruzindana and the assailants stopped to carryout the attack. Witness EE added that his family members were killed before his eyes as members of the Interahamwe and soldiers uncovered the holes in which the Tutsis were hiding and proceed to kill them and other Tutsis using firearms and machetes.

447. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that both witnesses were able to observe the incident with sufficient visibility because the event occurred during the daytime and both were hiding within viewing distance. Furthermore, they both had known Ruzindana previously. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the witnesses made proper identification of Ruzindana.

Bisesero Hill

448. During the second half of April 1994, witness Z observed regular attacks during which

5670

Ruzindana was present with members of the Presidential Guard and members of the Inter During these attacks Ruzindana would generally wait by his vehicle and give instructions to the attackers. At one of these attacks, on 14 April 1994, witness Z was hiding close to Ruzindana, on Bisesero Hill. Witness Z heard Ruzindana give orders to the assailants to surround the hill and begin the attack. This witness also claimed that Ruzindana was armed and shot at the Tutsis. However, the witness stated that "not many people died during this time period," but that there was pillaging of property that was distributed later amongst the attackers. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Ruzindana was present and played a pivotal role in the massacres at this site by ordering the assailants to surround the Hill and kill the Tutsis hiding there.

Gitwa Cellule

449. Another massacre site where Ruzindana was present was Gitwa Cellule. On 15 April 1994, witness KK saw Ruzindana transport assailants to this site in a vehicle, which he knew belonged to Ruzindana. Furthermore, witness KK was approximately 50 meters away when he saw Ruzindana shoot a Tutsi man named Ruzibiza in the leg. Ruzibiza fell to the ground.

450. Later, in early May, witness MM observed Ruzindana leading members of the Interahamwe during a massacre at this location. The assailants began to chase MM and other Tutsis. MM's wife, who was carrying their child on her back, was running behind MM when she was shot. As he was fleeing the scene, MM turned around to see the attackers, and claims to have seen Ruzindana aiming and firing at his wife. After the attack he returned to the place where his wife had fallen and saw that she had a bullet wound and had been mutilated by traditional weapons. Both his wife and baby were dead. When questioned by the Defence about the circumstances under which MM saw Ruzindana firing the gun, he admitted that he only saw Ruzindana for a short time and that he didn't know how a gun worked.

451. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Ruzindana was amongst a group of attackers at the site who pursued the Tutsis hiding there in an attempt to kill them and that witness MM's wife and baby died as a result of this attack. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that Ruzindana attempted to kill MM's wife because MM deposed that he saw Ruzindana aim in her direction. However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Ruzindana's gunshot actually struck MM's wife or that she in fact died from the bullet wound she received. The Prosecution did not establish that Ruzindana was the only assailant amongst the group who was firing into the fleeing Tutsis and the actual cause of her death remains unclear. The Defence challenged the credibility of MM on the ground that, in cross-examination, MM said that he had not met other Rwandans during his stay in Arusha. The Defence pointed out that it is well known that Prosecution witnesses are lodged together in the same house during their stay in Arusha. On re-examination, when asked why he refused to admit such a fact, MM claimed that he thought the question had referred to people with whom he was sharing his bed. Despite the confusion of this response the Trial Chamber is satisfied that MM's testimony represented a s accurate account of the events in Bisesero.

5671

The Vicinity of Muyira Hill

452. Attacks in the vicinity of Muyira Hill continued into June 1994. Witness II testified to one event at a hole formed by water running under the road in an area called Gahora in Gitwa Cellule. According to II, in early June many Tutsis children, as well as adults, were hiding in this hole; amongst them II's younger brother and sister. While hiding in the bush, just five meters away, witness II saw members of the Interahamwe coming down the valley to drink water from a tap near the hole. On discovering the Tutsis hiding there, the members of the Interahamwe informed Ruzindana that they had found "inyenzi." Ruzindana sent soldiers to monitor the hole and II heard him say that he was going to Gishyita to look for tools. Ruzindana returned with spades and a hose at about 1 p.m., at which time the soldiers and members of the Interahamwe began to unearth the Tutsis. The massacre started when Ruzindana and other soldiers opened fire. Many Tutsis died in the hole while others were shot or hacked to death near the roadside as they tried to escape. After the attack, II found his brother and sister murdered in the nearby bushes. During cross-examination, II remained true to this account. The Trial Chamber finds beyond reasonable doubt that Ruzindana was present, participated and led the attack on the hole where an unknown number of Tutsi civilians were killed, including II's brother and sister.

5.4.4 Bisesero Analysis and Findings

453. Paragraphs 45 and 46 of the Indictment have been discussed above and the allegations therein, were not contested by the Defence.

454. Paragraph 47 of the Indictment directly implicates both the accused persons in the attacks at Bisesero. The most consequential evidence is the identification of the accused at the massacre sites by Prosecution witnesses. Also of grave importance in the case of Kayishema, is evidence of the participation of those under his control. The Trial Chamber is mindful of its obligation to vigorously analyse the evidence. Very pertinent is the witnesses' who knew the accused prior to the massacres; identification is far more reliable when it is based upon recognition of a person already known to the witness. Equally important are the conditions under which the witnesses identified the accused.[107] These issues are discussed below.

455. The Prosecution presented numerous eyewitnesses who testified that they saw Kayishema at various massacre sites in Bisesero. Most Prosecution witnesses claimed that they knew Kayishema before the events. Most commonly the witnesses recognised or knew Kayishema because he was the highest government official in Kibuye. For instance, OO and HH claimed to 'know' Kayishema because he was the Prefect of Kibuye Prefecture and OO had met Kayishema at the installation of the

5672

Bourgmestre Sikubwabo. Witness OO added that all the inhabitants of Gishyita commu Kayishema because he was seen at civic rallies and meetings. In this regard, witness II stated that he saw Kayishema at the swearing ceremony of Sikubwabo. Witness DD had seen Kayishema at meetings and recalled one such meeting at the Stadium. Witness HH testified that he used to see Kayishema at meetings and NN claimed to have participated in meetings organised by Kayishema. Witness KK had worked with Kayishema each time there was a meeting to organise. Witness PP knew Kayishema when the accused was a medical doctor at Kibuye hospital. A number of witnesses also knew Kayishema's family. For example, witness OO, knew Kayishema's grandfather and mother; witness JJ knew Kayishema's father; and witness UU greeted Kayishema in 1992 or 1993 when Kayishema came to visit his (Kayishema's) grandfather. Witness PP met Kayishema at Kibuye church when Kayishema had gone to see a priest there. All Prosecution survivor witnesses successfully identified of Kayishema in court. This prior familiarity with Kayishema enhanced the reliability of the witness's identification of Kayishema heard by the Trial Chamber.[108]

456. Similarly, most of the witnesses testified that they knew Ruzindana in some capacity prior to the massacres. Evidence suggests that Ruzindana was one of the most prominent traders in Kibuye and that his family was well known generally because his father had been the Bourgmestre of Gisovu. Some knew him personally, that is they had had contact with him previously or knew his family. For example, witness FF studied with Ruzindana. Ruzindana attended social functions at which witness OO was also present and had business dealings with him. Witness NN claimed to have been Ruzindana's friend and that he knew some members of his family. Witness RR had known Ruzindana since he was old enough to recognise people, and had been a fellow guest at the marriage of a local man named Antoine. Witness Z had known Ruzindana since at least 1986 and HH had known him long before 1994, having met him at the market and being a customer at his family's shop. Ruzindana was also a neighbour of witness BB's parents and they had played football together.

457. Other witnesses, knew Ruzindana by sight due to his reputation as a prominent businessman in their community and/or because of his father's standing in the community.[109] Examples of such witnesses are II, KK, MM and PP. All Prosecution survivor witnesses successfully identified Ruzindana in court. This prior familiarity with the identity of Ruzindana enhanced the reliability of the identification evidence heard by the Trial Chamber.[110]

458. It is apparent that when the witnesses stated that they 'knew' the accused they were not always referring to a personal acquaintance or friendship. Rather, the witnesses were sometimes referring to 'knowing of' or 'knowing who the accused was,' due to his prominence in the community. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the use of such phraseology was not an attempt by the witnesses to mislead the Trial Chamber. Indeed, it is consistent with common usage in much the same way as one would say that they 'knew' President Nelson Mandela, even though they have never met him through his image in the media. In any event, for the purposes of identification, it is the physical recognition of the accused rather than personal acquaintance which is most pertinent. The above evidence suggests that m witnesses who identified Kayishema and/or Ruzindana, were aware of the physical appearance of the accused prior to seeing them at the massacre sites.

5673

459. The conditions under which the witnesses saw the accused was closely scrutinised by the Defence teams. The Trial Chamber notes that all of the identifications at the massacre sites occurred in daylight. The witnesses were generally questioned about the distance from which they observed the accused. The evidence indicates that almost all of the witnesses were close enough to clearly observe the accused during the attacks and the level of detail provided by the witnesses supports this assertion. For example, at the Muyira Hill attack, where the witnesses were looking down at the accused from higher positions during daylight, the witnesses provided precise details regarding the accused participation. Witness PP saw both accused shooting at Tutsi; OO was close enough to see Kayishema wearing a green outfit and the following day recalled hearing specific words as Kayishema addressed the attackers; JJ also remembered Kayishema's green suit on May 13 and added that Ruzindana was carrying a gun; II observed Kayishema thanking assailants on 13 May and saw both accused shoot at Tutsis on 14 May; NN testified that Ruzindana chased and shot at him; and HH, from his hiding place in the forest, observed both accused as they shot at those seeking refuge on top of the Hill.

460. A further example is the massacre at the cave; witnesses W and HH insisted that they had a clear view of the accused from their hiding places. Witness W stated that he was in bushes 'less than five minutes walk away,' whereas HH was concealed in the nearby forest. The ability of HH to see these events is supported by photographic exhibit 310, which represents HH's view of the cave from his hiding place. Lastly, witnesses EE and II identified Ruzindana as Beatrice's killer, at the Mine, from their respective hiding places alongside the road; both witnesses testified that they were close enough to hear Ruzindana. Prosecution photographic exhibits regarding these hiding places indicates that these witnesses could have clearly seen Ruzindana whist remaining concealed.

461. After reviewing the witness testimonies and Prosecution exhibits, the Trial Chamber is satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema was properly identified by prosecution witnesses FF, PP, OO, II, JJ, NN, HH, UU, W, U, DD and MM, as having participated in one or more of the assaults on the Tutsi population. And, that Ruzindana was properly identified by Prosecution witnesses FF, PP, OO, II, JJ, NN, HH, UU, W, EE, Z, KK, RR and MM, as having participated in one or more assaults.

462. Paragraph 47 of the Indictment alleges specifically that at various locations throughout April, May and June 1994, and often in concert, Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana brought to the area of Bisesero members of the gendarmerie nationale, communal police, Interahamwe and armed civilians and directed them to attack people seeking refuge there. The Trial Chamber opines that bringing attackers to Bisesero could mean either personally transporting them in the same vehicle, or leading a convoy of vehicles. Furthermore, evidence to prove that the accused transported or lead the attackers from one area within Bisesero to another area within Bisesero is enough to satisfy the wording of paragraph 47 of the Indictment. It is not incumbent on the Prosecution to prove from where the attackers came.

5674

463. In relation to the 13 and 14 May assault at Muyira Hill, witnesses OO, II, JJ and NN testified that they had seen Kayishema and Ruzindana arrive at the head of the convoy of vehicles which transported the assailants to the massacre site. Testimony reveals that Ruzindana personally transported attackers. The witnesses confirmed that soldiers, members of the Interahamwe, communal police and armed civilians, were amongst the attackers. Evidence provided by OO, JJ and UU proves how Kayishema directed the assaults, by splitting the assailants into groups, leading a group as it advanced up the Hill and indicating places where the Tutsis could be found. Indeed, PP, OO, II and JJ heard Kayishema address a group of attackers, encouraging them to 'work' harder or thanking them for "work" done. Evidence shows that Kayishema used a megaphone to address the congregated attackers. Witness OO and JJ further testified that Kayishema signalled the start of the attacks by firing a shot into the air. Ruzindana also played a leadership role, heading a group of attackers up the Hill and shooting at those seeking refuge, as evidenced by II and OO. Witness OO also saw Ruzindana distributing traditional weapons prior to the attacks.

464. Evidence proffered in relation to other sites confirms the leadership role of both the accused. At the cave, W testified that Kayishema was directing the siege generally and Ruzindana was commanding the attackers from Ruhengeri; HH added that both the accused appeared to be giving instructions, as if demonstrating how the cave should be blocked, wood collected and fire built. At Karongi Hill, U saw Kayishema arrive with soldiers, gendarmes and Hutu civilians and use a megaphone to address the attackers; DD also observed Kayishema at this site giving instructions to soldiers, gendarmes, communal police and members of the Interahamwe. Ruzindana was also seen transporting members of the Interahamwe to the Mine at Nyiramurego Hill and then directing the attackers. At Bisesero Hill witness Z heard Ruzindana give orders to the assailants to surround the Hill and begin the assault. Witness KK testified that Ruzindana transported attackers to Bisesero Hill and, in the following month, MM observed Ruzindana there leading members of the Interahamwe. Witness II testified that the massacre at the hole near Muyira Hill was orchestrated by Ruzindana and that it commenced on his instruction.

465. The strength and reliability of this evidence was not effectively challenged in Court. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that both Kayishema and Ruzindana brought members of the gendarmerie nationale, communal police, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to the area of Bisesero and directed them to attack those Tutsis seeking refuge.

466. Paragraph 47 of the Indictment further alleges that Kayishema and Ruzindana personally attacked and killed people seeking refuge in Bisesero. There is an abundance of evidence that reveals how Kayishema and Ruzindana participated in the attacks. Along with the evidence discussed in paragraphs above, many witnessed testified that they observed Kayishema and Ruzindana personally shoot at Tutsi those seeking refuge. At Bisesero Hill in April, Z recognised Ruzindana as he shot at those seeking refuge. Later, at a similar spot in May, FF was just metres from Ruzindana when he observed him shooting at women and two girls. At Muyira Hill in May PP, II, NN and HH witnessed both the accused shooting at Tutsis as they fled. In June, PP was shot at by Kayishema and Ruzindana at Kucyapa. Two eyewitnesses testified that Ruzindana killed a young girl named Beatrice. At Gitwa Cellule in April, KK was approximately 50 metres from Ruzindana as he shot Ruzibiza, hitting him in the leg. And, MM testified that Ruzindana shot his wife in May.

467. The major contention of the reliability of witnesses, which was raised by the Defence, has been discussed within the analysis of evidence relating to the particular site. Defence challenges did not negate the quality and strength of the above evidence. The Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Ruzindana and Kayishema personally attacked Tutsis seeking refuge during the assaults described in Bisesero.

468. There is also strong evidence to show that both accused persons personally aided in the killings. The Trial Chamber is left with no doubt that Kayishema and Ruzindana aided and abetted, the killings through orchestration and direction.[111] Kayishema further abetted through his inciting speeches to assailants, and Ruzindana by his provision of transportation and weapons. The evidence proves that Kayishema and Ruzindana personally assisted in attacks that resulted in the killing of Tutsi civilians.

469. Cases of personal killing by Kayishema or Ruzindana relating to specific individuals is less certain. There is ample evidence to show that both the accused personally attempted to kill or injure those seeking refuge, generally by shooting at them. However, as discussed within the above text, in most instances where a witness testified to one or both of the accused shooting at a refugee, the Prosecution failed to establish a resulting death.[112] This is not surprising considering the circumstances under which the witnesses observed the events. One would not expect a fleeing refugee to risk his or her life in order to verify the death of a victim. Nonetheless, it is not for the Trial Chamber to speculate if Tutsis died as a direct consequence of shooting, or other acts, by an accused.

470. One instance where sufficient evidence has been proffered is the killing of Beatrice by Ruzindana. Witnesses II and EE both provided a horrific account of Ruzindana cutting off the breasts of Beatrice before killing her by slashing her stomach with a machete. The witnesses clearly observed Ruzindana mutilate and murder her, both heard him mock his victim in the process. Both witnesses recognised the victim, one of them as a former schoolmate and the other as a prominent person from the area. Both witnesses named the victim as Beatrice. Both witnesses deposed that Beatrice died as a result of Ruzindana's actions. For these reasons, the Trial Chamber is satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Ruzindana mutilated and personally killed Beatrice.

5576

471. In paragraph 48 of the Indictment the Prosecution alleges that the attacks resulted in the deaths of thousands men, women and children. All survivor witnesses attested to the fact that thousands were killed in the Bisesero area during April through June 1994. Witnesses, including Dr. Haglund and several journalists, confirmed this fact. Kayishema himself testified that massive burial efforts had taken place in this area.

472. Finally, in paragraph 49 of the Indictment it is alleged that Kayishema did not take measures to prevent the attacks or to punish the perpetrators is discussed in Chapter 6.1 of the Judgement, infra

---

[1] In this respect see Criminal Justice Act 1967 s.11 of England which specifically legislates to require disclosure of alibi prior to trial. Similar legislation exists in Canada, as well as certain states of the United States and Australia.

[2] Section 103 of the Indian Evidence Act. Refer to Sakar on Evidence, vol. 2 (1993), 14th Ed, p. 1341.

[3] R v. Biya, (1952) 4 SA 514 (Appellate Division); Woolmington v. D.P.P. (1935) A.C. 462 (H.L.) and R v. Wood, Cr. App. R. 74, at 78 (1968) (English Law); Sekitoleko v. Uganda [1967] E.A. 531 (U) (Ugandan Law).

[4] In, Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, in the Decision on the Prosecution motion for a ruling on the Defence continued non compliance with Rule 67(A)(ii) and with the written and oral orders of the Trial Chamber, 3 Sept. 1998, Case No. International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda-95-1-T.

[5] Decision on non-compliance, Ibid.

[6] For example, see Canada, R v. Dunbar and Logan, 68 C.C.C. (2d) 13 at pp. 62-3 (1982); R v. Cleghorn 3 S.C.R. 175 (1995), and Australia, Petty and Maiden v. R, 173 CLR (1991) where, although no inference could be taken from the Defendant's prior silence, where a differing explanation had been given then inferences could be drawn.

[7] Article 20 of the Statute.

[8] This was reiterated once again even in Mr. Ferran's rejoinder, Trans., 17 Nov. 1998, pp. 133-139.

[9] Rule 85(A)(iii) of the Rules.

[10] Def. exh. 58.

[11] Trans., 24 June 1998, p. 121.

[12] Def. exh. 58.

[13] Pros. exh. 350CA.

[14] Similar elaboration by the accused, central to the defence of alibi, were observed by the Trial Chamber in the Tadic Judgement, para. 502.

[15] Trans., 20 May 1998, p.105.

[16] Chapter 3.3

[17] This is a point corroborated by Defence witness DAA, who owned a shop opposite the Ruzindana family shop. See Trans., 18 and 19 Aug. 1998.

[18] See, chapter 3.4

[19] See Pros. exh. 328 - 331.

[20] The witness produced seven reports for the Security Council. He relied most heavily on one Report, Pros. exh. 331, during his testimony before this Chamber (U.N. Doc. E/CN4/1995/71 1995).

567.7

[21] See Pros. exh. 330B and 331B, p. 5.

[22] Trans., 9 Mar. 1998, p. 47.

[23] Trans., 5 Mar. 1998, at 112; Prosecution exh. 331B.

[24] Trans., 5 Mar. 1998, p. 98.

[25] Ibid. p. 85.

[26] Trans., 18 Nov. 1997, p. 136.

[27] Trans., 18 Nov. 1997, p. 153.

[28] Trans., 5 Mar. 1998, p. 110.

[29] Pros. exh. 330B, p. 6.

[30] Trans., 9 Mar. 1998, p. 101-102.

[31] Pros. exh. 52, p. 4.

[32] Trans., 2 Oct. 1997, p. 51.

[33] Trans., 5 Mar. 1998, p. 105.

[34] Trans., 18 Nov. 1997, p. 118.

[35] Trans., 5 Mar. 1998, 84.

[36] See Part II, supra discussing the Historical Context of 1994 Events in Rwanda.

[37] Pros. exh. 331B, p. 5.

[38] Trans., 11 Apr. 1997, at 34.

[39] See the testimonies of Witnesses G, U and Z explaining that Inkotanyi meant "all the Tutsis" or the "enemy".

[40] Prosecution Exhibit 76E, as shown in the Trans., of 13 October 1997.

[41] Trans., of 13 October 1997, p.149

[42] Trans., 22 April 1997, p.36.

[43] Trans., 22 Apr. 1997, p. 46.

[44] Trans., 22 Apr. 1997, p. 47.

[45] Trans., 22 Apr. 1997, p. 49.

[46] Trans., 22 Apr. 1997, p. 51.

[47] Trans., 17 Apr. 1997, p. 8.

[48] Trans., 17 Apr. 1997, p. 116.

[49] Trans., 17 April 1997, p.11

[50] Trans., 6 May 1997, p.24

[51] Pros. exh. 55-58.

[52] Pros. exh. 52, 54 and 296.

[53] Pros. exh. 53. (Letter from Kayishema to all Bourgmestres in Kibuye.)

[54] Pros. exh. 296.

[55] Meetings attended by Prime Minister Kambanda and/or his Ministers included that on 3 May 1994.

[56] Because the parties referred to the internally displaced persons as "those seeking refuge"throughout the tria Chamber will remain consistent with this usage, noting however, that this use of the term in this context is inaccurate.
[57] It should be noted that the massacre at Mubuga Church began on 15 April and that Kayishema's claim of alibi did not begin to until the morning of 16 April.
[58] Trans., 17 April 1997, p. 11

[59] Trans., 6 May 1997, p. 24

[60] Trans., 15 Apr. 1997, p. 31

[61] Trans., 26 Nov 1997, p. 29

[62] Trans., 26 Nov 1997 p. 30

[63] Trans., 26 Nov. 1997, p. 32

[64] Trans., 26 Nov. 1997, p. 33

[65] Trans., 22 Apr. 1997.

[66] Ibid., p. 98.
[67] Trans., 15 April 1997, p. 145

[68] Trans., 17 Apr. 1997, p.29

[69] Trans., 24 Apr. 1997, p.4

[70] Trans., 17 Apr. 1997, p. 93

[71] Trans., 17 Apr. 1997, p .97

208 Trans., 16 Apr., p. 156.

[73] Trans., 14 Apr. 1997, p. 12.

[74] Trans., 10 Sept 1998, p. 24.

[75] Trans., 28 April 1997, p. 49.

[76] Trans., 22 April 1997 p. 133.

[77] See Prosecution exhibit 350c(b).

[78] Trans., 3 Mar. 1998, p. 28.

[79] The Prosecutor presented witnesses who testified that Ruzindana was present and participated in the massacre at Mubuga Church. The Trial Chamber will not consider this evidence because the Indictment in question charges Clement Kayishema alone with crimes at this site.
[80] Witness OO deposed that the massacres continued on 17 April 1994. There will be an examination of this potential discrepancy in the Analysis and Findings Chapter on the massacres at Mubuga Church below.
[81] Trans., 20 Nov. 1997, p. 16.

[82] Trans. 3 Mar. 1998. p. 30.

[83] Trans., p. 39, 20 Nov. 1997. The Trial Chamber notes that the witness claimed this conversation took place after the massacres, on 17 April, a date that was not corroborated by other witnesses.
[84] Def. exh. 58.

[85] Trans., 4 Nov. 1998 p. 148.

[86] Pros. ex's. 37, 39 and 40.

[87] Pros. exh. 47.

5679

[88] It should be noted that witness W deposed that he had known Kayishema well before the attacks.

[89] When asked by Ms. Thornton about whom lead the massacres in Kibuye Prefecture, Kayishema stated that none of the local authorities had taken part and that trials were conducted after he fled the country, in July 1994, to find the culprits.

[90] Witness G also testified that in the ensuing days he saw the members of the Interahamwe from Gisenyi Prefecture, armed with guns, going toward Bisesero.

[91] For example, witnesses OO, PP, W survived the massacres at Mubuga Church and took refuge in the Bisesero area.

[92] Trans., 4 Sept. 1998, p.59.

[93] Trans., 18 Nov. 1997, p.137.

[94] Trans., 9 Sep. 1998, p. 37.

[95] Trans., 8 Sep. 1998, p. 117.

[96] The Trial Chamber notes that some witnesses used specific names of neighbourhoods when testifying about specific attacks. For the purpose of clarity however, we have grouped neighbouring localities together and described the attacks by date.

[97] Trans., 25 Nov. 1997, p. 65.

[98] Trans., 24 Nov. 1997, p. 82.

[99] Trans., 20 Nov. 97, p. 86.

[100] Prosecution exh., 297.

[101] Trans., 26 Feb. 1998, pp. 33-34.

[102] Pros. exh., 296.

[103] Pros. exh., 152-55.

[104] Trans., 6 May 1997, p. 141.

[105] Trans., 25 Feb. 1998, p. 28.

[106] Trans., 24 Feb. 1998, p. 27.

[107] See Part 3 on Evidentiary Matters, supra.

[108] For a detailed explanation of the identification requirement see Chapter 3.2, supra.

[109] Ruzindana's father, Murakaza was also a businessman and a former Bourgmestre.

[110] Ibid.

[111] See for example, the evidence relating to the massacres at Muyira Hill, the cave and the Mine at Nyiramuregra Hill.

[112] See the analysis of the evidence within the specific site Chapter s above.

5680

VI. LEGAL FINDINGS

6.1 KAYISHEMA'S COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY
6.2 GENOCIDE
6.3 CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY
6.4 COMMON ARTICLE 3 AND ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II

6.1 KAYISHEMA'S COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY

473. The Trial Chamber has made its findings as to fact. It is clear that Kayishema and Ruzindana either planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of many of the criminal acts prohibited by Articles 2 to 4 of this Statute, in relation to each crime site. Their individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt and is set out by the Trial Chamber in its legal findings for the relevant counts. The factual findings which go to prove this individual criminal responsibility are also relevant to Kayishema's responsibility as a superior, in particular his knowledge and prevention of the attacks.

474. The extent of the liability to be incurred by Kayishema alone under the doctrine of command responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) warrants further elaboration. In relation to the crime sites of the Complex, the Stadium, and Mubuga Church the Indictment asserts: 'Before the attack on the [site] Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent the attack, and after the attack Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators.' See paragraphs 30, 37, and 43. In relation to the Bisesero Area the Indictment asserts: 'Throughout this time, Clement Kayishema did not take measures to prevent the attack, and after the attack Clement Kayishema did not punish the perpetrators.' See paragraph 49.

475. In relation to the extent of the liability to be incurred by Kayishema under the doctrine of command responsibility, the General Allegations of the Indictment assert, at paragraph 22, that Kayishema is responsible, as a superior, for the criminal acts of his subordinates in the administration, gendarmerie nationale and communal police. In relation to the specific sites it is alleged that Kayishema ordered these assailants and others such as the members of the Interahamwe and armed Hutu civilians to attack the Tutsi. As such, and in light of the proven facts, it is incumbent upon the Trial Chamber to consider the degree of control exercised by Kayishema over the assailants, and his corresponding culpability for their criminal acts. The Chamber, where appropriate, will then proceed to examine[1] whether Kayishema took measures to prevent the attacks or punish the perpetrators, under each crime site.

The Assailants

476. Bourgmestres and other members of the administration, gendarmes, soldiers, communal police, prison wardens, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians were identified at the massacre sites and the Trial Chamber has found that they participated in the atrocities at these sites. The which the Trial Chamber must address, therefore, is whether Kayishema exercised de jure or de facto control over these assailants.

5681

477. Both the Prosecution and Defence laid heavy emphasis upon whether Kayishema enjoyed de jure control over the appropriate administrative bodies and law enforcement agencies. Notably, both Parties also emphasised the turmoil that prevailed between April and July 1994. The Defence, for example, described, "a society that no longer recognised the rule of law"[2] and, in summarising the evidence of Professor Guibal, submitted that, "in common language, after the crash of the President's plane, the situation that occurred was such that a government had to be invented."[3]

478. The Chamber is mindful of the need, therefore, to view the de jure powers of Kayishema with an appreciation that, at the time, a chaotic situation that prevailed. Accordingly, any consideration as to the de jure powers exercised by Kayishema must be subject to an elucidation of the de facto power, or lack thereof, that he held over the assailants.

De Jure Control

479. The Indictment states that the Prefect as trustee of the State Authority in the Prefecture had control over the Prefectoral administration and its agencies. The Chamber has found that, inter alia, Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, a number of communal police, and members of the gendarmerie nationale were responsible for numerous deaths and injuries inflicted upon innocent Tutsis.

480. The Trial Chamber finds that it is beyond question that the Prefect exercised de jure authority over these assailants. The Rwandan law is very clear in this respect.

481. The Prefects' position vis-à-vis the bourgmestre is evidently one of hierarchical authority and supervisory jurisdiction. Two Rwandan statutes support this finding. The first, Loi sur l'organisation de la commune, 1963, clearly implies in Article 59 that the bourgmestre is under the hierarchical authority of the Prefect.[4] The same law provides at Article 85 that where a communal authority fails to execute measures prescribed by law or decree, then the Prefect may, ultimately, supplant this communal authority in order to remedy their inaction.[5] Moreover, at Articles 46 and 48, the Loi sur l'organisation de la commune, 1963, establishes the power of the Prefect to take disciplinary sanctions against a bourgmestre and even to propose his dismissal to the Minister of the Interior. Coupled with this is the law as promulgated in the second statute submitted to this Trial Chamber, the Décret-Loi organisation et fonctionnement de la préfecture, 11 March 1975. Article 15 of this statute makes clear that, in addition to the hierarchical authority that the Prefect exercises over the bourgmestres and their services, he also has a general power of supervision over the acts of the communal aut... Therefore, these provisions, coupled with the Prefect's overarching duty to maintain public order and security, reflect the ultimate hierarchical authority enjoyed by the Prefect over the bourgmestre.[6]

482. The communal police are under the direct control over the bourgmestre. This matter was not disputed, and reflects the findings of the Trial Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement. Even if it is not axiomatic that the Prefect would hold the corresponding hierarchical de jure authority over the communal police, the law provides that in the situation which faced Rwanda and Kibuye Prefecture in 1994, it is the Prefect who retains ultimate control. To this end, the Loi sur l'organisation de la commune, 1963, allows the Prefect to requisition the communal police and place them under his direct authority in cases of grave public disorder or in times when unrest has occurred or is about to occur.[7]

483. Similarly, the Prefect exercises this ultimate authority of requisition over the gendarmerie nationale. The position set out in the Décret-Loi sur la création de la Gendarmerie Nationale, 1974, states that any competent administrative authority may requisition the gendarmerie nationale, that the advisability of the requisition cannot be questioned as long as it does not contravene any law or regulation, and that the requisition persists until the requisitioning authority informs the gendarmerie otherwise.[8] Moreover, the gendarmerie nationale may only execute certain functions, notably, ensuring the maintenance and restoration of public order, when it is legally requisitioned to do so.[9] The Trial Chamber recalls that Kayishema requisitioned the gendarmerie both by telephone, and in writing, in the face of the public disorder that prevailed in Rwanda in the pivotal months of April to July 1994.

484. This de jure power of the Prefect was confirmed by the expert Defence witness, Professor Guibal. In his testimony to the Trial Chamber he opined that, even after the 1991 Constitution, in the advent of multiple party politics, > the Prefect had considerable powers with regard to the prefectorial conference. The Prefect, according to the text of 1975, . . . could even requisition the intervention of the armed forces. The Prefect can define regulations for law and order and he can punish directly. . .[10]

485. Further, when Counsel for Kayishema asked whether, in light of the multi-party politics, it was, "a co-ordination role that the Prefect plays rather than the exercise of hierarchical power", Professor Guibal replied, "normally the relationships fall under the hierarchy rather than under co-ordination".[11]

486. Professor Guibal then proceeded to describe how the situation would have been very different in the tumultuous realities of Rwanda in 1994. The situation in the country and the peculiar nature of the party-orientated constitution would have led to what he described as "crisis multi-partyism". Although he did not examine the specific context of the Rwandan crisis, he explained that such a status q[illegible] have arisen because each respective party would have felt that the situation should be resolved through them, not the constitution. A dichotomy between political and administrative hierarchy would have emerged. This led Professor Guibal to the conclusion that although the power of the Prefect over the forces of law and order existed formally in 1994, these powers were emptied of any real meaning when the ministers, the ultimate hierarchical superiors to the police, gendarmes and army, were of a different political persuasion.

5683

487. The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that such assertions clearly highlight the need to consider the de facto powers of the Prefect between April and July 1994. Such an examination will be conducted below. However, the delineation of power on party political grounds, whilst perhaps theoretically sound, should only be considered in light of the Trial Chambers findings that the administrative bodies, law enforcement agencies, and even armed civilians were engaged together in a common genocidal plan. The focus in these months was upon a unified, common intention to destroy the ethnic Tutsi population. Therefore, the question of political rivalries must have been, if it was at all salient, a secondary consideration.

488. The actions of Kayishema himself also appear to evidence a continued subordination of the *bourgmestre*s to his de jure authority during the events of 1994 or, at least, an expectation of such subordination. Prosecution exhibit 51, for example, is a letter from Kayishema to the *bourgmestre*s requesting that they recruit people to be "trained" for the civil defence programme. Prosecution exhibit 53 is another letter from Kayishema to the *bourgmestre*s, dated 5 May 1994, which requests an urgent report on the security situation in their communes and to inform him of where "the works" had started. In addition, Kayishema testified to this Trial Chamber that in late May 1994, he went to the *Bourgmestre*s in his prefecture and instructed them to disregard a letter that they had received directly from the Minister of Interior relating to the civil defence programme. His clear objective in doing so was to prevent the *Bourgmestre*s from implementing the explicit instructions of the Minister.[12]

489. Even in the climate that prevailed, therefore, Kayishema clearly considered that this hierarchical relationship persisted and expected his 'requests' to be executed. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that it is beyond any doubt that Kayishema exercised de jure power over the *Bourgmestre*s, communal police, gendarmes and other law enforcing agencies identified at the massacre sites.

De Facto Control

490. However, the jurisprudence on this issue clearly reflects the need to look beyond simply the de jure authority enjoyed in a given situation and to consider the de facto power exercised. The Trial Chamber in the Celebici case stated that in the fact situation of the Former Yugoslavia, where the command structure was often ambiguous and ill-defined,

5684

> . . .persons effectively in command of such more informal structures, with power to prevent and punish the crimes of persons who are in fact under their control, may under certain circumstances be held responsible for their failure to do so. Thus the Trial Chamber accepts the . . . proposition that individuals in positions of authority, whether civilian or military structures, may incur criminal responsibility under the doctrine of command responsibility on the basis of their de facto as well as their de jure positions as superiors. The mere absence of formal legal authority to control the actions of subordinates should therefore not be understood to preclude impositions of such responsibility.[13] [emphasis added]

491. Thus, even where a clear hierarchy based upon de jure authority is not present, this does not prevent the finding of command responsibility. Equally, as we shall examine below, the mere existence of de jure power does not always necessitate the imposition of command responsibility. The culpability that this doctrine gives rise to must ultimately be predicated upon the power that the superior exercises over his subordinates in a given situation.

492. The Trial Chamber has found that acts or omissions of a de facto superior can give rise to individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute. Thus, no legal or formal position of authority need exist between the accused and the perpetrators of the crimes. Rather, the influence that an individual exercises over the perpetrators of the crime may provide sufficient grounds for the imposition of command responsibility if it can be shown that such influence was used to order the commission of the crime or that, despite such de facto influence, the accused failed to prevent the crime. The Celebici case provides an exposition of the jurisprudence on this point.[14] One particularly pertinent example is the Roechling case which the Trial Chamber in the Celebici Judgement summarised as,

> . . . an example of the imposition of superior responsibility on the basis of de facto power of control possessed by civilian leaders. While the accused in this case were found guilty, inter alia, of failing to take action against the abuse of forced labourers committed by members of the Gestapo, it is nowhere suggested that the accused had any formal authority to issue orders to personnel under Gestapo command.[15]

493. This passage is instructive not only when considering Kayishema's control over the less explicitly documented command structures which existed in Rwanda in 1994, such as the members of the Interahamwe and those armed civilians involved in the 'civil defence programme'; but also when examining the realities of Kayishema's relationship with bourgmestres, communal police and the gendarmerie nationale.

494. Defence witnesses such as DN and DK testified to the lack of material means available for the Prefect to control the public disorder that ensued after the death of the President. Trial Chamber notes, however, that these witnesses did not actually contest the control that the Prefect exercised over the law enforcing and administrative bodies.

5685

495. It was the Defence's position that the Prefect had insufficient means to prevent those assailants, including a few defecting members of the army and gendarmerie nationale, from committing the massacres of 1994. Kayishema himself testified that he had sent what gendarmes he had at his disposal to the area of Bisesero, but that there was little that could be done.

496. Professor Guibal, for the Defence, described how the status quo that emerged in 1994 after the death of the President would have been one where the traditional influence and power of the Prefect would have been greatly reduced. He was of the opinion that the authority the Prefect, as a member of a political party and in the climate of the "crisis multi-partyism", would have been diminished, both de jure and de facto.

497. In this respect, Professor Guibal referred to a 'paralysis of power' suffered by the Prefect. Accordingly, it was submitted by the Defence, the political and administrative uncertainty that reigned between April and July 1994 was such as to curtail the Prefect's power of requisition and his influence over administrative bodies. This uncertainty, the Defence submitted, also manifested itself amongst the population as a whole. Professor Guibal opined that the citizens in such a climate of uncertainty would receive instructions and orders with difficulty.

498. In short, the Defence submitted that in the pivotal months of 1994, Kayishema was in not in a de facto position to control the actions of the assailants and that he was neither in a position to prevent nor to punish the commission of the massacres in his Prefecture.

499. Once again, however, the theoretical underpinning proffered by Professor Guibal does not reflect the reality that the Trial Chamber has found existed in Rwanda. The Prefect was a well-known, respected, and esteemed figure within his community.[16] The testimony of Kayishema provides an illustrative example of the influence that the Prefect enjoyed. He related to the Trial Chamber an instance in August 1992 when, soon after taking office, he was telephoned by the Bourgmestre of Gishyita Commune. The Bourgmestre reported that houses were being burnt down in his commune, people were fleeing and the situation was chaotic. Kayishema told the Trial Chamber that he was requested to go directly to the scene and intervene, that the Bourgmestre had said "I just want your presence here on the spot."[17]

500. The Trial Chamber draws three basic conclusions from this. Firstly, it is indicative of the effect that Kayishema's presence at a scene could have, thus is appurtenant to the responsibility he must bear in aiding and abetting the crimes pursuant to Article 6(1). Secondly, in times of crisis it was ultimately the Prefect that was called upon, with all the powers of influence that such a bearer of that title wielded.

5686

Finally, it also reflects the de facto influence he had and the commensurate de facto au[illegible] exercised as Prefect in such times. A clear parallel can be drawn with the climate that prevailed in Rwanda in 1994.

501. The facts of the case also reflect the de facto control that Kayishema exercised over all of the assailants participating in the massacres. Kayishema was often identified transporting or leading many of the assailants to the massacre sites. He was regularly identified, for example, in the company of members of the Interahamwe – transporting them, instructing them, rewarding them, as well as directing and leading their attacks. The Trial Chamber, therefore, is satisfied that Kayishema had strong affiliations with these assailants, and his command over them at each massacre site, as with the other assailants, was clearly established by witness testimony.

502. In the Bisesero area, for example, witness W testified that Kayishema was directing the massacre of those Tutsi who had sought refuge at the Cave. Witness U, at Karongi Hill, described to the Trial Chamber how Kayishema arrived at this location leading a number of soldiers, gendarmes, and armed civilians, addressed them by megaphone and then instructed them to attack. Upon these orders, the massacres began. These facts have been proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

503. The massacre that occurred at the Stadium provides a further striking example of the control exercised by Kayishema. The Trial Chamber has found that Kayishema transported gendarmes to the Stadium where, for two days, they simply stood guard and controlled the movement of persons in and out of the Stadium. Kayishema returned on 18 April leading more gendarmes, members of the Interahamwe, other armed civilians and prison wardens. Only then, when Kayishema ordered them to commence the attacks, firing into the crowd twice, did the guarding gendarmes begin their massacre. The onslaught by those who had been guarding the Stadium and those assailants who joined them were impromptu and unforeseen, but formed part of an attack that was clearly orchestrated and commanded by, inter alia, Kayishema.

504. All of the factual findings need not be recounted here. These examples are indicative of the pivotal role that Kayishema played in leading the execution of the massacres. It is clear that for all crime sites denoted in the Indictment, Kayishema had de jure authority over most of the assailants, and de facto control of them all. It has also been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the attacks that occurred were commenced upon his orders (Mubuga Church excepted). They were attacks clearly orchestrated by him, and only executed upon his direction.

505. Further, where the perpetrators of the massacres were found to be under the de jure or de facto control of Kayishema, and where the perpetrators committed the crimes pursuant to Kayishema's orders, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that it is self-evident that the accused knew or had reason to know that the attacks were imminent and that he failed to take reasonable measures to prevent them. In such case, the Trial Chamber need not examine further whether the accused failed to punish the perpetrators. Such an extended analysis would be superfluous.

5687

506. The Trial Chamber finds, therefore, that Kayishema is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, for the crimes committed by his de jure and de facto subordinates at the Home St. Jean and Catholic Church Complex, the Stadium and the Bisesero area.

507. It only remains for the Trial Chamber to consider whether Kayishema knew, or had reason to know, of those attacks at which he was not present. If he was so aware, or ought reasonably to have known of such impending attacks, then the Chamber must consider whether the accused attempted to prevent or punish the commission of those crimes.

Kayishema's Knowledge and Prevention of the Attack and Punishment of the Perpetrators

508. The Trial Chamber has not found that Kayishema, though present at Mubuga Church before and during the attacks there, specifically ordered the massacres. As such, it is necessary to consider the remaining elements necessary to establish command responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute.

509. After examination of the facts presented, the Trial Chamber concludes that Kayishema knew or had reason to know that a large-scale massacre was imminent. The Trial Chamber is convinced of this fact for a number of reasons. First, the Tutsis were the subject of attacks throughout Rwanda by the date of the attack at Mubuga Church, and Kayishema was privy to this information. Second, following Kayishema's conversation with the Hutu priest, witnessed by a number of Tutsis at the Church, the priest refused the Tutsis access to water and informed them that they were about to die. Finally, the attackers included soldiers, gendarmes, and the members of the Interahamwe, all of whom he exercised either de jure or de facto control over.

510. In light of his duty to maintain public order, and seized of the fact that massacres were occurring elsewhere in Rwanda, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that Kayishema was under a duty to ensure that these subordinates were not attacking those Tutsi seeking refuge in Mubuga Church. Moreover, his identification at the site both before and during the attacks leave the Trial Chamber in no doubt that Kayishema knew of the crimes that were being committed by his subordinates.

511. In order to establish responsibility of a superior under Article 6(3), it must also be shown that the accused was in a position to prevent or, alternatively, punish the subordinate perpetrators of those crimes. Clearly, the Trial Chamber cannot demand the impossible. Thus, any imposition of responsibility must be based upon a material ability of the accused to prevent or punish the crimes in question.

512. The accused, for instance, testified to the Trial Chamber that because the gendarmes had mutinied, he did not exercise the requisite control over their actions. However, not only did a number of the incursions upon Mubuga Church occur prior to the supposed mutiny (on the evening of 15 April), but the Trial Chamber has found this line of defence untenable in light of the overwhelming evidence presented by the Prosecution that Kayishema was present at, instrumental in, and a participant of the massacres delineated in the Indictment. Kayishema was in de jure and de facto control of the assailants and others, such as Bourgmestre Sikubwabo, identified as directing the attacks at Mubuga Church.

513. In light of this uncontestable control that Kayishema enjoyed, and his overarching duty as Prefect to maintain public order, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that a positive duty upon Kayishema existed to prevent the commission of the massacres. This point was enunciated succinctly by the United States Military Tribunal at Nuremberg in the Hostage case where it declared, > [u]nder basic principles of command responsibility, an officer who merely stands by while his subordinates execute a criminal order of his superiors which he knows is criminal violates a moral obligation under international law. By doing nothing he cannot wash his hands of international responsibility",[18] [emphasis added]

No evidence was adduced that he attempted to prevent the atrocities that he knew were about to occur and which were within his power to prevent.

514. On the issue of Kayishema's failure to punish the perpetrators, the Defence submitted that the only power held by the Prefect in this respect was the ability to incarcerate for a period not exceeding 30 days. The Trial Chamber concurs with the Defence's submission that this would not be sufficient punishment for the perpetrators of the alleged crimes (though possibly sufficient as a short-term measure to help prevent further atrocities). However, the Trial Chamber is mindful that there is no evidence to suggest that in the 3 months between the start of these attacks and Kayishema's departure from Rwanda, no action was commenced which might ultimately have brought those responsible for these barbarous crimes to justice.

515. It is unnecessary to elaborate upon Kayishema's punishment of these perpetrators, or lack thereof, in any further detail. The task would be a superficial one in light of the Trial Chamber's findings that Kayishema exercised clear, definitive control, both de jure and de facto, over the assailants at every massacre site set out in the Indictment. It has also been proved beyond a reasonable doubt that Kayishema ordered the attacks or, knowing of their imminence, failed to prevent them.

5689

Conclusion

516. The inherent purpose of Article 6(3) is to ensure that a morally culpable individual is held responsible for those heinous acts committed under his command. Kayishema not only knew, and failed to prevent, those under his control from slaughtering thousands of innocent civilians; but he orchestrated and invariably led these bloody massacres. This Trial Chamber finds that in order to adequately reflect his culpability for these deaths, Kayishema he must be held responsible for the actions and atrocities committed.

5690

6.2 GENOCIDE

517. Kayishema and Ruzindana both are charged with the crime of Genocide, under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute. Kayishema is charged with Genocide under Counts 1, 7 and 13 for his responsibility for the crimes committed on 17 April 1994 at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean (Complex), 18 April 1994 at Gatwaro Stadium and 14 and 15 April 1994 at the Mubuga Church, respectively. Kayishema is also charged with Genocide under Count 19 for the crime of Genocide committed in the Bisesero area throughout April, May and June 1994. Kayishema is charged for his criminal responsibility under Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute.

518. Ruzindana is charged with Genocide under Count 19 for his role in the massacres that occurred in the Bisesero area. For his acts or omission Ruzindana is alleged to be criminally responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute.

519. Genocide, in accordance with Article 2(2) of the Statute, means the commission of any of the acts enumerated in Article 2(2)(a) through to (e) of the Statute "with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such." The components of the crime of genocide are discussed in the Chapter that examines the law relating to genocide.

520. In this Chapter, the Chamber first examines the accused persons' mens rea in order to determine whether they carried out acts with the specific intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part. In light of those findings, the Chamber examines the culpable genocidal acts for which the accused are responsible and determine their criminal responsibility under Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute.

6.2.1 The Components of Specific Intent

521. In order to prove the commission of the crime of genocide the Prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, that the criminal acts were committed with the intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such.

The Targeted Group

522. The Prosecution submitted that the targeted group was the Tutsi population in Kibuye that was attacked on the grounds of ethnicity. The Chamber discusses the identity of the victims in detail within the Part on Factual Findings, addressing genocide in Kibuye generally and the massacres at the four crime sites in particular. The evidence proves, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the victims of the acts for which Kayishema and Ruzindana are charged were Tutsis.

5691

523. The Chamber further accepts that the Tutsis were an ethnic group. In support of this contention the Prosecution provided evidence that since 1931, Rwandans were required to carry identification cards which indicated the ethnicity of the bearer as Hutu, Tutsi or Twa.[19] The government-issued identification cards specified the individual bearer's ethnicity. It should be noted that, in accordance with Rwandan custom, the ethnicity of a Rwandan child is derived from that of her or his father.

524. The Prosecution's expert witnesses, Professor Guichaoua and Mr. Nsanzuwera, also offered information on this issue. Through Mr. Nsanzuwera a copy of an identity card was tendered into evidence. He confirmed that all Rwandans were required to identify themselves by ethnicity on official documents. He added that identification based on ethnicity was a highly divisive issue in Rwanda. Therefore, the matter was addressed in the Arusha Peace Accords, which categorically resolved that there would be no mention of ethnicity on the identification cards of Rwandans from that period forth. Identification cards identifying the victims as Tutsis were found on those exhumed from mass graves in Kibuye.

525. Additionally, the scores of survivors who testified before this Chamber stated that they were Tutsis and that those whom they saw massacred during the time in question were also Tutsis.

526. In Akayesu, Trial Chamber I found that the Tutsis are an ethnic group, as such. Based on the evidence presented in the present case, this Trial Chamber concurs. The Trial Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Tutsi victims of the massacres were an ethnical group as stipulated in Article 2(2) of the Statute, and were targeted as such.

Context of the Massacres

527. In the Law Part, the Trial Chamber acknowledges the difficulty in finding explicit manifestations of a perpetrator's intent. The Trial Chamber states that the specific intent can be inferred from words and deeds and may be demonstrated by a pattern of purposeful action. The evidence, in the present case, is considered in light of this reality.

Genocide in Rwanda and Kibuye Generally

528. The Chamber examines the tragic events in Rwanda and in Kibuye in 1994 in Part V. The examination is useful here as it gives context to the crimes at the four crimes sites. The analysis shows that there indeed was a genocidal plan in place prior to the downing of the President's airplane in April 1994. This national plan to commit genocide was implemented at prefecture levels. For instance, Kayishema as the Prefect, disseminated information to the local officials above and below him using the established hierarchical lines of communications.[20]

529. The Prosecution submitted that the killings were planned and organised with a clear strategy, which was implemented by Kayishema and Ruzindana in Kibuye. The plan was executed eff. and successfully in this Prefecture. Those who escaped the April massacres in and around Kibuye Town fled to Bisesero where they were relentlessly pursued and attacked. One witness described Bisesero Hill as strewn with dead bodies "like small insects which had been killed off by insecticide."[21] There is documentary evidence that Kayishema requested reinforcement from the national authorities to attack the unarmed Tutsi population under the guise that there was a "security problem" in Bisesero.[22]

5692

530. A letter dated 26 June 1994 written by the then Bourgmestre of Mabanza, Bagilishema to the Prefect of Kibuye, Kayishema, stated that there was no need for sending additional attackers to Mabanza because there were no Tutsis left in his commune.[23] The letter clearly indicates the knowledge and participation of the civilian authorities in the process of extermination.

Kayishema's Intent to Destroy in Whole or in Part the Tutsi Group, As Such

The Number of Victims

531. The number of Tutsis killed in the massacres, for which Kayishema is responsible, either individually or as a superior, provides evidence of Kayishema's intent. The Trial Chamber finds that enormous number of Tutsis were killed in each of the four crime sites. In the Complex, the number of Tutsis killed was estimated to be about 8,000; there were between 8,000 and 27,000 Tutsis massacred at the Stadium; and, at Mubuga Church between 4,000 and 5,500 Tutsi were massacred. The number killed in Bisesero is more difficult to estimate, however, evidence suggests that the number of those who perished was well into the tens of thousands.

532. Not only were Tutsis killed in tremendous numbers, but they were also killed regardless of gender or age. Men and women, old and young, were killed without mercy. Children were massacred before their parents' eyes, women raped in front of their families. No Tutsi was spared, neither the weak nor the pregnant.

533. The number of the Tutsi victims is clear evidence of intent to destroy this ethnic group in whole or in part. The killers had the common intent to exterminate the ethnic group and Kayishema was instrumental in the realisation of that intent.

Methodology – Persistent Pattern of Conduct

534. The Trial Chamber finds compelling evidence that the attacks were carried out in a methodical manner. The Prosecution submitted that evidence of specific intent (dolus specialis) arises from the repetitive character of the planned and programmed massacres and the constant focus on the Tutsi members of the population. The perpetrators did not commit just one massacre but continually killed the Tutsi from April to June 1994.[24]

5693

535. This consistent and methodical pattern of killing is further evidence of the specific Kayishema was instrumental in executing this pattern of killing. Tutsi refugees gathered in places which had served historically as safe havens including the Complex, the Stadium and Mubuga Church. These places were surrounded by Hutu assailants, those inside the structure were not allowed to leave, and were denied food, medicine or sanitary facilities.[25] Eventually, the refugees were massacred. If there were too many Tutsis to kill in one day the killers would return to finish off their 'work' the next morning. This Chamber finds that Kayishema instigated the attacks at the Complex and the Stadium.

536. In the area of Bisesero the attacks continued for several months; April, May and June of 1994. At Bisesero, evidence proves that Kayishema was leading and directing the attacks. The attackers were transported by government buses and other vehicles. This Chamber finds that Ruzindana brought the Hutu attackers in his personal vehicles and that Kayishema did the same in the trucks belonging to the Prefecture. The assailants included the local officials such as the bourgmestres, counseillers, communal police, the gendarmerie nationale, members of the Interahamwe, other soldiers as well as the accused themselves.

537. The weapons used and the methods by which the Tutsis were killed are also consistent throughout the four crime sites. Generally, the witnesses testified that Kayishema and the gendarmes were armed with guns and grenades while other attackers used traditional farming instruments such as machetes and crude weapons such as bamboo spears. Grenades and guns were used at the crime sites where the Tutsis were taking refuge in enclosed spaces to start the attack, and thereafter victims were hacked to death by machetes. Kayishema and Ruzindana both were seen carrying firearms at the crime sites.

Kayishema's Utterances

538. Kayishema's utterances, as well as utterances by other individuals under his direction before, during and after the massacres, also demonstrate the existence of his specific intent. Tutsis were called Inkotanyi meaning an RPF fighter or an enemy of Rwanda, Inyenzi meaning cockroach. They also were referred to as filth or dirt. Witness WW testified how she heard the Tutsi were being referred to as "dirt" when Kayishema told Bourgmestre Bagilishema that "all the dirt has to be removed,"[26] referring to the Tutsis who had sought shelter in the communal office. During the attacks at the Stadium, Kayishema called the Tutsi: "Tutsi dogs" and "Tutsi sons of bitches," when instigating the attackers to kill the Tutsis gathered there.

539. The Chamber also finds that Kayishema used a megaphone to relay a message from Kigali encouraging the extermination of the Tutsis during the attack at the Complex. Several witnesses who survived the massacres at the Complex heard Kayishema say "go to work" or "get down to work"[27] which, as many witnesses affirmed, meant to begin killing the Tutsis. Other witnesses testi. having heard the attackers, including members of the Interahamwe, who were de facto under Kayishema's control, sing songs about exterminating the Tutsi.[28] The Trial Chamber accepts Prosecution exhibit 297, tendered through Witness HH, which was a transcription of the lyrics of one of these extermination songs. Essentially, the song urges attackers not to spare the elderly and even the babies because Kagame (the then RPF leader) left Rwanda as a child.[29] Again, the Chamber notes the common intention of the attackers with that of Kayishema.

5694

540. In sum for all the reasons stated above the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Kayishema had the intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part and, in pursuit of that intent, carried out the acts detailed below.

Ruzindana's Intent to Destroy in Whole or in Part the Tutsi Population, As Such

541. Ruzindana displayed his intent to rid the area of Tutsis by his words and deeds and through his persistent pattern of conduct throughout the Bisesero area.

Ruzindana's Utterances

542. Witnesses heard Ruzindana giving orders to the Hutu attackers in the Bisesero area. Specifically, some testified about Ruzindana's statements about not sparing babies whose mothers had been killed because those attacking the country initially left as children.[30] The Trial Chamber also heard evidence of Ruzindana's anti-Tutsi utterances to the assailants, saying that the Tutsi refugees were "the enemy."

Methodology - Persistent Pattern of Conduct

543. Ruzindana played a leadership role in the systematic pattern of extermination of the Tutsis who had sought refuge in the area of Bisesero. Evidence proves that many of the Tutsis who had survived the massacres in and around Kibuye Town during April fled to Bisesero. Ruzindana was instrumental in the pursuit of these Tutsi persons, by transporting, encouraging, and leading the attacks.

544. The Trial Chamber finds that at many of the crime sites within Bisesero, Ruzindana did bring Hutu assailants to the sites in his vehicles. Once at the site, Ruzindana directed attackers to kill and offered payment in exchange for the severed heads of well known Tutsis or identification cards of murdered Tutsis. Ruzindana was seen carrying firearms at many of the massacre sites. The Chamber accepted evidence from witnesses who testified about overhearing conversations between the Hutu assailants who referred to Ruzindana as their patron. Yet other witnesses affirmed that gendarmes, speaking among themselves, stated that they were not concerned about using too many bullets, because Ruzindana would purchase more for them. As a result of Ruzindana's consistent pattern of conduct, thousands of Tutsis were killed or seriously injured; men, women and children alike.

5695

545. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, from all the evidence accepted, that the perpetrators of the culpable acts that occurred within Kibuye Prefecture, during the period in questions, were acting with a common intent and purpose. That intent was to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group within Kibuye. Both Kayishema and Ruzindana played pivotal roles in carrying out this common plan.

6.2.2 The Genocidal Acts of Kayishema and Ruzindana

546. The Prosecution alleges that the accused persons committed acts pursuant to Article 2(2). Although Article 2(2) includes a variety of acts, the Prosecution, during closing arguments, only addressed the Trial Chamber on killings (Article 2(2)(a)), causing serious bodily or mental harm (Article 2(2)(b)) to Tutsis, and deliberately inflicting on Tutsis conditions of life calculated to bring about their physical destruction (Article 2(2)(c)) in whole or in part.

547. As a preliminary matter, the Chamber finds that in implementing the policy of genocide, the intent of Kayishema, those under his control and Ruzindana, was to kill members of the Tutsi group at the four crime sites. Inherent in the act of mass killing is the infliction of serious bodily and mental harm. For example, the Trial Chamber was presented with the opportunity to view numerous healing bullet and machete wounds. Furthermore, the Chamber heard the testimony of many witnesses who recounted having watched their loved ones mutilated, raped or killed in a heinous manner. The evidence established that the genocidal act of the accused persons was killing. The Trial Chamber holds Kayishema and Ruzindana responsible for the results of the killings and serious bodily and mental harm to the Tutsi population in Kibuye.

548. No evidence was proffered to show that the accused persons, or Kayishema's de facto and de jure subordinates, deliberately inflicted, on the Tutsi group in Kibuye, conditions of life to bring about their physical destruction in whole or in part. The Chamber acknowledges the Prosecution argument that Tutsis seeking refuge at the four crime sites were deprived of food, water and adequate sanitary and medical facilities. These deprivations, however, were a result of the persecution of the Tutsis, with the intent to exterminate them within a short period of time thereafter. These deprivations were not the deliberate creation of conditions of life - as defined in Chapter 4.1 of this Judgement - intended to bring about their destruction. Additionally, the Chamber finds that the time periods during which these deprivation occurred were not of sufficient length or scale to bring about the destruction of the group. Therefore, the Trial Chamber only examines killings.

549. As stated above, the Chamber has found that Kayishema's and Ruzindana's culpable conduct was committed with the intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part. In relation to Kayishema this intent applies to all four massacre sites. For Ruzindana this intent relates to

5696

Bisesero only.

550. Below, the Chamber addresses the evidence in relation to Kayishema's and Ruzindana's genocidal acts.

COUNT 1:
Charges Kayishema with Genocide in Violation of Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute for the Massacres at the Complex

551. With respect to the Complex, the Trial Chamber finds, inter alia, that by about 17 April 1994 thousands of Tutsis had gathered. Persons under Kayishema's control including gendarmes and members of the Interahamwe surrounded the Complex. There were also boats surrounding the peninsula on which the Complex was located. The attackers who had surrounded the Complex carried machetes, spears and other traditional weapons and prevented people from leaving. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that those attempting to flee were killed.

552. Kayishema led the attackers from the Prefecture office to the Complex. He then ordered them to begin the attack on the Tutsi by relaying a message from Kigali, through a megaphone, to kill the Tutsis. Thus, Kayishema orchestrated and participated in the attack that lasted hours. As a result of the attack, thousands of Tutsis were killed.

553. The Trial Chamber finds that prior to the attack, Kayishema knew that it was imminent. Indeed, along with initiating the attack, he was seen at the Complex twice before the attacks of 17 April.

Kayishema's Criminal Responsibility
554. For the reasons stated above, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, Kayishema is individually responsible for instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation and execution of genocide by the killing and causing of serious bodily harm to the Tutsis at the Complex on 17 April 1994.

555. Additionally, under Article 6(3) of the Statute, Kayishema is responsible, for genocide, as superior, for the mass killing and injuring of the Tutsi at the Complex on 17 April 1994, undertaken by his subordinates. The assailants at the Complex including gendarmes, members of the Interahamwe, local officials, including prison wardens, conseillers and bourgmestres. The Trial Chamber finds that Kayishema had de jure control over most of the assailants and de facto control over all the attackers.

5697

The evidence proves that Kayishema was leading and directing the massacre. As stated in t[illegible] Findings on Criminal Responsibility, because Kayishema himself participated in the massacres, it is self-evident that he knew that his subordinates were about to attack and failed to take reasonable and necessary measures to prevent them, when he had the material ability to do so.

COUNT 7:
Charges Kayishema with Genocide in Violation of Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute for the Massacres at the Stadium in Kibuye Town

556. The Trial Chamber finds that by 18 April 1994, thousands of men, women and children, unarmed Tutsis, sought refuge in the Stadium located in Kibuye Town. Once the refugees had gathered, persons under Kayishema's control, including gendarmes, prevented refugees from leaving the Stadium and surrounded the Stadium. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that during the attacks, some of the Tutsi who attempted to flee were killed. Kayishema instigated the attacks by ordering the attackers to "shoot those Tutsi dogs" and by firing the first shot into the Stadium. As a result of the attack, thousands of people were killed and numerous sustained serious physical injuries.

557. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time when the Tutsi were prevented from leaving the Stadium, Kayishema knew or had reason to know that an attack was about to occur.

Kayishema's Criminal Responsibility
558. For the reasons stated above, Kayishema is individually criminally responsible under Article 6 (1) of the Statute for instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation and execution of genocide by killing and injuring Tutsis in the Stadium

559. Under Article 6(3) of the Statute, Kayishema is responsible for genocide as a superior for the acts committed by his subordinates during the massacres at the Stadium on 18 April 1994. The assailants at the Stadium included gendarmes, soldiers, members of the Interahamwe, prison wardens and armed civilians. The Trial Chamber finds that Kayishema had de jure control over most of the assailants and de facto control over them all. The evidence proves that Kayishema ordered, led and directed the massacre. Accordingly, it is self-evident that he knew that his subordinates were about to commit the massacres and failed to take reasonable and necessary measures to prevent them, when he had the material ability to do so.

COUNT 13:
Charges Kayishema with Genocide in Violation of Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute for the Massacres at the Church at Mubuga

560. The Trial Chamber finds that, inter alia, thousands of Tutsis had gathered at Mubuga Church seeking refuge from attacks which were occurring throughout Kibuye Prefecture. Only a fe those seeking refuge survived the massacres that occurred on 15 and 16 April. Kayishema and his subordinates, including local officials, gendarmes, communal police and members of the Interahamwe were present and participated in the attacks. The Trial Chamber finds that those who initially attempted to leave the Church in search of food or water were forced to retreat or beaten to death by armed assailants outside the Church. Kayishema's presence prior and during the major attack and the participation of those under his control encouraged the killings of the Tutsi refugees assembled there. As a result of the attack, thousands of people were killed and numerous sustained serious physical injuries.

5698

561. The Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time when the Tutsis were prevented from leaving the Mubuga Church, Kayishema knew or had reason to know that an attack was about to occur.

Kayishema's Criminal Responsibility

562. Under Article 6(1) of the Statute, Kayishema is individually responsible for genocide for the killing and serious injuring of Tutsis at the Mubuga Church on 15 and 16 April 1994. Kayishema visited the Church before the attacks and transported gendarmes. The Hutu Priest of this parish, who had been co-operating with Kayishema, specifically told the refugees that they were about to die, and asked that a headcount be done for the Prefect. The gendarmes eventually attacked the refugees. Kayishema also was present during the attacks. These findings prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Kayishema aided and abetted the preparation and execution of the massacre.

563. Additionally, under Article 6(3) of the Statute, Kayishema is responsible for genocide as a superior for the acts of his subordinates that took place at the Mubuga Church on 15 and 16 April 1994. The assailants at Mubuga included the Bourgmestre and the conseillers of the Commune, gendarmes, soldiers, members of the Interahamwe, communal police, other local officials and armed civilians. The Trial Chamber has found that Kayishema had de jure control over most of the assailants and de facto control over them all. It is clear that Kayishema knew that an attack was imminent by virtue of his presence before and during the massacre. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema knew that his subordinates were about to attack the refugees in the Church and failed to take reasonable and necessary measures to prevent them, when he had the material ability to do so.

COUNT 19:

Charges Kayishema and Ruzindana with Genocide in Violation of Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute for the Massacres at the Area of Bisesero

5699

564. The Trial Chamber finds that both Kayishema and Ruzindana brought the gendarmerie nationale, communal police, members of the Interahamwe and armed civilians to the area of Bisesero and directed them to attack the Tutsis. Both accused persons also personally participated in the attacks. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber found that Ruzindana mutilated and personally killed a sixteen-year-old girl named Beatrice at the Mine at Nyiramurego Hill. Accordingly, Kayishema and Ruzindana were responsible for the killings at a number of massacre sites during April, May and June 1994. Hutu assailants during these attacks killed and injured thousands of Tutsis.

565. In relation to the 13 and 14 May assault at Muyira Hill, Kayishema and Ruzindana arrived at the head of the convoy of vehicles which transported soldiers, members of the Interahamwe, communal police and armed civilians. Some of the vehicles, in which the assailants arrived, belonged to the Rwandan Government. Kayishema signalled the start

566. of the attacks by firing a shot into the air, directed the assaults by dividing the assailants into groups, and headed one group of them as it advanced up the Hill and verbally encouraged the attackers through a megaphone. Ruzindana also played a leadership role, distributing traditional weapons, leading a group of attackers up the Hill and shooting at the refugees.

566. The Trial Chamber finds that both accused persons also participated in other massacres. At the cave, Kayishema was directing the siege generally and Ruzindana was commanding the attackers from Ruhengeri; both were giving instructions to the attackers and orchestrating the attack. At Karonge Hill, Kayishema arrived with soldiers, gendarmes and Hutu civilians and used a megaphone to address the attackers, giving them instructions. Ruzindana was seen transporting members of the Interahamwe to the Mine at Nyiramurego Hill and then directing the attackers. At Bisesero Hill, Ruzindana was seen transporting attackers and giving orders to the assailants to surround the Hill and begin the assault. Ruzindana orchestrated the massacre at the Hole near Muyira Hill, and the assault commenced upon his instruction.

Kayishema's Criminal Responsibility

567. In light of the factual findings outlined above, the Trial Chamber finds that the killings that took place in Bisesero during April, May and June 1994 were carried out with the intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part. Further, the Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema caused the death of and serious bodily harm to Tutsis at numerous places in the Bisesero area including, Karonge Hill at the end of April, Bisesero Hill on 11 May, Muyira Hill on 13 and 14 May, the Cave in Gishyita Commune, Gitwa Cellule in May and Kucyapa in June.

568. Under Article 6(1) of the Statute, Kayishema is individually responsible for genocide for killing and injuring the Tutsi at the attacks in the Bisesero area during April, May and June 1994 with the intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group. Kayishema's involvement varied from crime site to crime si .. Bisesero. At the crime sites where he was found to have participated, Kayishema committed one or more of the following acts: headed the convoy of assailants; transported attackers in his vehicle; directed the initial positioning of the attackers; verbally encouraged them; initiated the attacks by orders or gunshots; lead the groups of attackers; shot at fleeing Tutsis; and, finally, thanked the Hutu attackers for their "work." These facts prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Kayishema, instigated, ordered, committed and otherwise aided and abetted in the preparation and execution of the massacre that resulted in thousands of deaths and serious bodily injuries with intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group.

5700

569. Additionally, under Article 6(3) of the Statute, Kayishema is responsible for genocide, as superior, due to the killing and injuring that took place in Bisesero area in during April, May and June 1994 by his subordinates. The assailants in Bisesero were identified as gendarmes, soldiers, members of the Interahamwe, and armed civilians. The Trial Chamber finds that Kayishema had de jure control over most of the assailants and de facto control over them all. The evidence proves that Kayishema was leading and directing the massacres at numerous sites throughout the period.

Ruzindana's Criminal Responsibility

570. In light of the factual findings outlined above, the Trial Chamber finds that the killings that took which took place in Bisesero, during April, May and June 1994, were carried out with intent to destroy the Tutsi group in whole or in part. Further, the Trial Chamber finds beyond reasonable doubt that Ruzindana caused the death of Tutsis at numerous places in the Bisesero area including, the Mine at Nyiramurego Hill on 15 April, Gitwa Cellule in early May, Bisesero Hill on 11 May, Muyira Hill on 13 and 14 May, the Cave, Kucyapa in June, the Hole near Muyira in early June. Ruzindana caused these deaths by premeditated acts or omissions, intending to do so.

571. In particular under Article 6(1) of the Statute, Ruzindana is individually responsible for the killings that took place within the attacks that the Trial Chamber has found he participated, in the Bisesero area during April, May and June 1994. Ruzindana's involvement varied from site to site and day to day. At the sites where he was found to have participated, Ruzindana committed one or more of the following acts: Headed the convoy of assailants; transported attackers in his vehicle; distributed weapons; orchestrated the assaults; lead the groups of attackers; shot at the Tutsi refugees; and, offered to reward the attackers with cash or beer. The Trial Chamber further found that Ruzindana personally mutilated and murdered individuals during the attack at the Mine at Nyiramuregra Hill. These findings prove beyond reasonable doubt that Ruzindana, instigated, ordered, committed and otherwise aided and abetted in the preparation and execution of the massacre that resulted in thousands of murders with the intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group.

5701

5702

6.3 CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY

572. Counts 2, 8, 14, of the Indictment charge Kayishema with crimes against humanity for murder and Counts 3, 9, 15, charge him with crimes against humanity for extermination. Kayishema is charged also in Counts 4, 10, 16 with crimes against humanity other inhumane acts.

573. Count 20 charges both Kayishema and Ruzindana with crimes against humanity for murder, Count 21 charges them with crimes against humanity for extermination and Count 22 charges both accused with crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts.

574. Pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons for a certain number of crimes committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. The offences which constitute crimes against humanity when committed in such a context include, inter alia, murder, extermination, deportation, torture, rape, and other inhumane acts.

575. Under this Article the Prosecution charged the accused only for three crimes: murder, extermination and other inhumane acts committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population on discriminatory grounds.

Murder and Extermination

576. As far as murder and extermination are concerned indeed they took place in Kibuye Prefecture within the context of a widespread and systematic attack. The evidence produced proves that the attacks were aimed at the Tutsi civilian population as an ethnic group. Evidence also shows that the Tutsi victims were generally peasant farmers, refugees or persons of similar status, including the elderly, women and children. In light of the overwhelming testimony the Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the massacres were based on the grounds of ethnicity.

577. Thus, all necessary elements exist for the conclusion that the accused could be convicted for crimes against humanity (murder) and crimes against humanity (extermination). However, in this particular case the crimes against humanity in question are completely absorbed by the crime of genocide. All counts for these crimes are based on the same facts and the same criminal conduct. These crimes were committed at the same massacre sites, against the same people, belonging to the Tutsi ethnic group with the same intent to destroy this group in whole or in part.

578. Considering the above and based on the facts the Trial Chamber finds that it will be improper to convict the accused persons for genocide as well as for crimes against humanity based on murder and extermination because the later two offences are subsumed fully by the counts of genocide as discussed in the Part of the Judgement entitled Cumulative Charges.

5703

579. The responsibility of the accused persons for their criminal conduct is thus fully covered under those counts of genocide.

Other Inhumane Acts

580. As far as counts for other inhumane acts are concerned the accused could be found guilty of crimes against humanity based on other inhumane acts.

581. The crimes must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. The accused must be aware that their crimes were committed in the context of such an attack. Furthermore, the policy element demands a showing that the crimes were instigated by a government or by an organisation or group. A detailed consideration of the elements of crimes against humanity can be found in the Part of the Judgement that addresses the Law.[31]

582. As stated above, the Trial Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, the necessary elements of the attack exist to satisfy the crimes against humanity. The acts for which both accused are charged took place within the context of a widespread and systematic attack. Although only one of the alternative conditions must be proved by the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber finds that both conditions are satisfied. Evidence before this Trial Chamber proves that the attacks in Rwanda generally, and in Kibuye Prefecture in particular, were carried out in a systematic manner, that is, pursuant to a pre-arranged policy or plan.[32] The evidence of a policy or plan discussed in relation to the counts of genocide is applicable here. The evidence proves that the attacks in Rwanda generally, and in Kibuye Prefecture in particular, were aimed at the civilian population. Indeed, evidence shows that the victims in Kibuye were generally peasant farmers, those seeking refuge or persons of similar status, including the elderly, women and children. An abundance of evidence from witnesses, experts and Kayishema himself proves that the attacks in Kibuye Prefecture were carried out against Tutsis based on their ethnicity; again this issue is discussed in more detail in relation to the counts of genocide. Lastly, the Trial Chamber finds that the attack must have been part of a broader policy or plan that had been instigated or directed by any organisation or group and that the accused persons had knowledge that their conduct formed part of that attack.

583. For the accused to be found guilty of crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts they must, inter alia, commit an act of similar gravity and seriousness to the other enumerated crimes, with the intention to cause the other inhumane act. This important category of crimes is reserved for deliberate forms of infliction with (comparably serious) inhumane results that were intended or foreseeable and done with reckless disregard. Thus, the category of other inhumane acts demands a crime distinct from the other crimes against humanity, with its own culpable conduct and mens rea. The crime of other inhumane acts is not a lesser-included offence of the other enumerated crimes. In the opinion of the Trial Chamber, this category should not simply be utilised by the Prosecution as an all-encompassing, 'catch all' category.

5704

584. In relation to all four sites the Indictment did not particularise the nature of the acts that the Prosecution relied upon for the charge of 'other inhumane acts.' Nor did the Indictment specify the nature and extent of the accused's responsibility for the other inhumane acts. This is true for both Kayishema and Ruzindana. In relation to the culpable acts, for each site the Indictment states little more than: The attackers used (specified) weapons to kill people at the site, the accused participated, and the attack resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries. Not one act, allegedly perpetrated either by Ruzindana, Kayishema, or the other assailants, was specified as an 'other inhumane act'. Therefore, it was incumbent upon the Prosecution to rectify the vagueness of the counts during its presentation of evidence. Indeed, "the question of knowing whether the allegations appearing in the Indictment are vague will, in the final analysis, be settled at Trial."[33]

585. At trial, the Prosecution proffered evidence that the Hutu assailants, under Kayishema's and/or Ruzindana's control and direction, deliberately attempted to kill the Tutsi civilians at the sites for which they are respectively charged. As a result of the intent to massacre, most of the Tutsi were killed whilst others sustained injuries. The Prosecution presented its case on this basis. As such it was not difficult to identify the conduct and evidence that supported the charges of crimes against humanity for extermination and murder. However, the conduct to support the crimes of other inhumane acts was not so easily identified.

586. The Chamber heard horrific testimony of mutilation and other conduct by the Hutu assailants that could potentially amount to other inhumane acts. However, throughout trial the Prosecution failed to adequately particularise which pieces of evidence supported the other inhumane act charges. The most specific identification came in response to Defence objections. On a couple of occasions the Defence objected to the evidence of certain injuries proffered by the Prosecution, submitting that it was outside the nature and parameters of the charges. In response, the Prosecution identified the injuries as evidence of other inhumane acts. This method of using the crime as a 'catch-all' – specifying which acts support the count almost as a postscript - does not enable the counts of other inhumane acts to transcend from vagueness to reasonable precision. Further, the fact that some of the survivors displayed their injuries to the Trial Chamber did not mitigate the Prosecution's obligation to distinguish the specific acts, along with the resultant injuries, as those that support the other inhumane act charges. Only in its Closing Brief did the Prosecution submit that the injuries sustained by the survivors amounted to other inhumane acts and, that the environment of fear and desperation where victims were forced to witness the killing and severe injuring of friends, family and other Tutsi inherently caused serious mental harm.[34] Accordingly, the Defence teams were not properly seized of the acts that allegedly constituted the other inhumane acts charges until the end of the trial.

5705

587. In interests of justice and a fair trial the Defence should be seized as promptly as possible, and at any event during the trial, of the conduct which allegedly offends each individual count of crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts. The Indictment did not identify the offending conduct or the nature and extent of the accused's responsibility. During trial, the Prosecution failed to rectify this imprecision. Accordingly, the fundamental rights of both the accused, namely to be informed of the charges against him and to be in a position to prepare his defence in due time with complete knowledge of the matter, has been disregarded in relation to all the counts of crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts. A right that is particularly important considering the gravity of the charges.

588. For all the above reasons, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved its case against Kayishema pursuant to Counts 4, 10, 16, and 22 crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts.

589. For all the above reasons, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved its case against Ruzindana pursuant to Count 22 crimes against humanity for other inhumane acts.

6.4 COMMON ARTICLE 3 AND ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II

Counts 5, 11, 17, 23 - Violations of Common Article 3 (a violation of Article 4(a) of the ICTR Statute) and Counts 6, 12, 18, 24 - Violations of Protocol II (a violation of Article 4(a) of the ICTR Statute).

590. Counts 5, 11 and 17 of the Indictment charge Kayishema with violations of Common Article 3 and Counts 6, 12 and 18 charge Kayishema with violations of Protocol II.

591. Count 23 charges both Kayishema and Ruzindana with violations of Common Article 3 and count 24 charges them with violations of Protocol II. All these counts are covered by Article 4 of the ICTR Statute.

592. During the trial, evidence was produced that between about 10 April and 30 June 1994 thousands of men, women and children were killed and numerous persons injured as a result of massacres at the Catholic Church and Home St. Jean Complex, at the Stadium in Kibuye Town, at the Church in Mubuga and in the area of Bisesero in the Prefecture of Kibuye, Republic of Rwanda.

593. These men, women and children were unarmed and were predominantly Tutsis seeking protection from attacks that had occurred throughout various regions in Rwanda and Kibuye Prefecture. The Prosecution considers the massacred people as victims of the armed conflict and charges Kayishema and Ruzindana with serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II.

5706

594. From the point of view of the Prosecutor, under international law, in order to hold an individual liable for violations of Common Article 3 and/or Protocol II, the following five requirements must be met:

> First, the alleged crime(s) must have been committed in the context of a non-international armed conflict.
>
> Second, temporal requirements for the applicability of the respective regime must be met.
>
> Third, territorial requirements for the applicability of the respective regime must be met.
>
> Fourth, the individual(s) charged must be connected to a Party that was bound by the respective regime; and
>
> Fifth, the victims(s) of the alleged crimes(s) must have been individual(s) that was (were) protected under the respective regime.[35]

595. The first requirement should be considered as a corner stone to clarify the situation in order to establish whether the alleged crimes referred to in the Indictment could be qualified as violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II.

596. In order to hold Kayishema and Ruzindana criminally responsible for the above mentioned counts, from the point of view of the Prosecution, it must be proved that Common Article 3, as well as Protocol II applied to the situation in Rwanda in 1994.[36]

597. The Trial Chamber finds that this is not a question that need be addressed. It has been established, beyond a reasonable doubt, that there was an armed conflict, not of an international character, in Rwanda. This armed conflict took place between the governmental armed forces, the FAR, and the dissident armed forces, the RPF, in the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, that is from April to July 1994. It has also been shown, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Rwanda was bound by Common Article 3 and Protocol II, which were applicable to "the situation in Rwanda in 1994." The Parties in this non-international conflict confirmed their readiness to comply with the rules of these international humanitarian instruments. As far as the second, temporal requirements, and the third, territorial requirements, are concerned, it should be added that these international instruments, as it was shown above, were applicable in the entire territory of Rwanda with the understanding that the alleged crimes should be considered in the context of the armed conflict and interpreted in a broad territorial and temporal framework.

598. Therefore, the question which should be addressed is not whether Common Article 3 and Protocol II were applicable to "the situation in Rwanda in 1994," but whether these instruments were applicable to the alleged crimes at the four sites referred to in the Indictment. It is incumbe Prosecutor to prove the applicability of these international instruments to the above-mentioned crimes.

5707

599. However, the Prosecution limited itself to state, "in order to hold Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana criminally responsible for the above mentioned counts, the Prosecutor must prove that the alleged crimes must have been committed in the context of a non-international armed conflict." [37] [emphasis added]

600. The Prosecutor did not specify the meaning of the words "in the context." If she meant "during" an internal armed conflict, there is nothing to prove as it was recognised, and this matter was not in dispute, that in this period of time Rwanda was in a state of armed conflict not of international character. Therefore, in this case the words "in the context" are too general in character and do not clarify the situation in a proper way. When the country is in a state of armed conflict, crimes committed in this period of time could be considered as having been committed in the context of this conflict. However, it does not mean that all such crimes have a direct link with the armed conflict and all the victims of these crimes are victims of the armed conflict.

601. There is recognition, nevertheless, in the Prosecutor's Closing Brief that "the Prosecutor must also establish a nexus between the armed conflict and the alleged offence."[38] The following paragraph of this document was intended to prove such a nexus,

> In the present case, the Prosecutor submits that the evidence shows, beyond a reasonable doubt, that for each of the alleged violations there was a nexus between the crimes and the armed conflict that was underway in Rwanda. The Tutsis who were massacred in Kibuye went to the four sites seeking refuge from attacks that were occurring on the Tutsis throughout Kibuye and Rwanda. These attacks were occurring because hostilities had broken out between the RPF and the FAR and the Tutsis were being sought out on the pretext that they were accomplices of the RPF, were "the enemy" and/or were responsible for the death of the President.[39]

602. It is true that "the Tutsis went to the four sites seeking refuge from attacks that were occurring on the Tutsis throughout Kibuye and Rwanda." However, the Tutsi were attacked by neither the RPF nor the FAR in the places where they sought refuge in Kibuye. It was proved through witness testimony that these attacks were undertaken by the civilian authorities as a result of a campaign to exterminate the Tutsi population in the country. Therefore, there is no ground to assert that there was a nexus between the committed crimes and the armed conflict, because "the Tutsis went to the four sites seeking refuge from attacks. . ." The Prosecutor's next allegation is that "these attacks were occurring because hostilities had broken out between the RPF and the FAR and the Tutsis were being sought out on the pretext that they were accomplices of the RPF, were "the enemy" and/or were responsible for the death of the President."

5708

603. It is true that "hostilities had broken out between the RPF and the FAR" in this period. However, evidence was not produced that the military operations occurred in Kibuye Prefecture when the alleged crimes were committed. Furthermore, it was not shown that there was a direct link between crimes committed against these victims and the hostilities mentioned by the Prosecutor. It was also not proved that the victims were accomplices of the RPF and/or were responsible for the death of the President. The Prosecutor herself recognised that the Tutsis were being sought out on the pretext that they were accomplices etc. These allegations show only that the armed conflict had been used as pretext to unleash an official policy of genocide. Therefore, such allegations cannot be considered as evidence of a direct link between the alleged crimes and the armed conflict.

604. The term "nexus" should not be understood as something vague and indefinite. A direct connection between the alleged crimes, referred to in the Indictment, and the armed conflict should be established factually. The Prosecutor must show that material provisions of Common Article 3 and Protocol II were violated and she has to produce the necessary evidence of these violations.

In this respect, the Prosecutor stated the following:

> A final requirement for the applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II is that the victim be an individual that was protected by Common Article 3 and/or Additional Protocol II.
>
> Common Article 3 applies to persons taking no active part in the hostilities including members of the armed forces who have laid down their arms and those who are hors de combat.
>
> Additional Protocol II applies to all persons which do not take a direct part or who have ceased to take part in the hostilities (Article 4), persons whose liberty has been restricted (Article 5), the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked (Article 7), medical and religious personnel (Article 9) and the civilian population (Article 13).[40]

605. The Prosecutor did not specify whether she finds that all or only some of the enumerated Articles of Protocol II have been violated. In any case, Article 5 of Protocol II is not applicable to the alleged crimes because there is no evidence that the victims of these crimes were interned or detained persons, deprived of their liberty for reasons related to the armed conflict. It is sufficient to read all four paragraphs of this Article to realise its non-applicability to the crimes in question.

606. Again, no evidence was produced that Article 7 of Protocol II, which aims to protect the wounded, sick and shipwrecked persons, is applicable to the alleged crimes. It was not shown that the victims of the alleged crimes fall into this category.

5709

607. The Prosecutor raised also the question of applicability of Article 9 of Protocol II which with the protection of religious and medical personnel. In the instant case, pursuant to the evidence, the victims were not religious and medical personnel. Therefore, Article 9 cannot be applicable to the alleged crimes.

608. Article 13 of Protocol II is more pertinent to the case before the Trial Chamber, since it is devoted to the protection of the civilian population during armed conflicts. This Article, entitled "Protection of the Civilian Population" stipulates,

> 1. The civilian population and individual civilians shall enjoy general protection against the dangers arising from military operations. To give effect to this protection, the following rules shall be observed in all circumstances.
>
> 2. The civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. Acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.

609. From these two paragraphs of Article 13 it could be understood that military operations in all circumstances should be conducted in such a way not to create dangers for the civilian population, as well as individual civilians, and in any case this category of persons shall not be the object of attacks during military operations.

610. The Prosecutor emphasised that the attacks against the Tutsis at the four sites, referred to in the Indictment, "were occurring because hostilities had broken out between the RPF and the FAR."[41] It is true that such hostilities had broken out in different parts of the country. In accordance with Article 13, as well as Articles 14 to 18 of Protocol II, each Party in the conflict was obliged to conduct the hostilities without affecting the civilian population and individual civilians or creating dangers for them. The Prosecutor claimed,[42] and the witnesses confirmed, that there were no military operations in Kibuye Town nor in the area of Bisesero in this period of time. There is also no evidence that the civilian population, at the four sites in question, was affected by military operations which were under way in other regions of Rwanda.

611. On the basis of the foregoing, it could not be asserted pleno jure that Articles 5, 7, 9 or 13 to 18 of Protocol II were violated in the case of the alleged crimes.

612. In charging Kayishema and Ruzindana with serious violations of Common Article 3 and Protocol II the Prosecutor specifically refers to Article 4(a) of the ICTR Statute. A separate analysis of Article 4(a) of the Statute is not merited, since this Article, Common Article 3 and Article 4 of Protocol II, are interconnected. Article 4(a) of the Statute coincides with Article 4(2)(a) of Protocol II which reproduces, without substantial changes, Common Article 3. These three Articles contain an enumeration of certain prohibited acts. Article 4(2) of Protocol II indicates that these acts are p. against persons referred to in the first paragraph.[43] This category of persons is defined in this paragraph in the following way, "All persons who do not take a direct (active) part or who have ceased to take part in the hostilities."

5710

613. In paragraph 192 of its Closing Brief the Prosecution pointed out that "in this case, the victims of the crimes took no part in the hostilities . . . they were unarmed and not affiliated with an armed force of any kind." [emphasis added]. In paragraph 193 and 194 the Prosecutor expressed her satisfaction that "the Defence did not challenge the civilian status of the victims by making any submissions or leading evidence connecting any victims to the RPF or hostilities that prevailed in 1994." However, in the next paragraph the Prosecution took another position by asserting that "the victims in this Indictment were civilians and were taking no active part in the hostilities" [emphasis added].[44]

614. Thus, the position of the Prosecutor is not expressed claris verbis. If the victims "took no part in the hostilities" this is one situation, but if these persons "were taking no active part in the hostilities" this is another situation and in this case there is a need to prove that these men, women and children participated indirectly in the hostilities or at least committed harmful acts against the Party in the conflict. If there is no such evidence of a nexus this statement sounds like petitio principii, and there is no legal ground for the conclusion that it met the fifth requirement established by the Prosecutor as necessary in order to hold individuals liable for violations of this treaty regime.[45]

615. Since the Prosecutor did not produce evidence of a nexus between the alleged crimes and the armed conflict, the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that there is no ground to consider the applicability to the instant case of Article 4(a) of the Statute which covers Common Article 3 and Article 4(2)(a) of Protocol II.

616. It has already been illustrated that the FAR and the RPF were Parties in the internal armed conflict in Rwanda during the period of time in question. Pursuant to the above mentioned fourth requirement of the Prosecution, Kayishema and Ruzindana must be connected to one of these Parties and bound by the respective regime. In other words, to hold both accused criminally responsible for serious violations of Common Articles 3 and Protocol II it should be proved that there was some sort of a link between the armed forces and the accused.

617. It was shown that both accused were not members of the armed forces. However, it was recognised earlier in this Judgement that civilians could be connected with the armed forces if they are directly engaged in the conduct of hostilities or the alleged civilians were legitimately mandated and expected, as persons holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war effort.

618. However, the Prosecution did not produce any evidence to show how and in what capacity Kayishema and in particular Ruzindana, who was not a public official, were supporting the Government efforts against the RPF.

619. Presenting her case, the Prosecutor pointed out that Kayishema and Ruzindana carried rifles and participated in the massacres alleged in the Indictment. However, the Prosecutor herself recognised that the FAR or the RPF were not involved in these massacres, which were organised and directed by the civilian authorities of the country. She further recognised that the overwhelming majority of the attackers were civilians, armed with traditional weapons. This was proved through witness testimony, and also recognised by the Prosecutor in her Closing Brief, when she stated "the Hutu civilian population was mobilised to attack and kill the Tutsi population under the guise of the Civilian Defence Program."[46] Therefore, these men, women and children were killed not as a result of the military operations between the FAR and the RPF but because of the policy of extermination of the Tutsi, pursued by the official authorities of Rwanda. Therefore, it does not follow from the participation of the accused in these massacres that they were connected with the armed forces of the FAR or the RPF.

620. The struggle for power between the FAR and the RPF, which was underway in 1994, meant that each Party in this armed conflict, in all circumstances, had to treat humanely all persons belonging to the adverse Party. In this period of time, Rwanda had been invaded by the armed forces of the RPF and, in accordance with international law, the Government of this country was undoubtedly entitled to take all necessary measures to resist these attacks. But it does not follow that crimes could be committed against members of the RPF who were under the protection of Common Article 3 and Protocol II.

621. However, the crimes committed at the four sites, referred to in the Indictment, were not crimes against the RPF and its members. They were committed by the civilian authorities of this country against their own civilian population of a certain ethnicity and this fact was proven beyond a reasonable doubt during the trial. It is true that these atrocities were committed during the armed conflict. However, they were committed as part of a distinct policy of genocide; they were committed parallel to, and not as a result of, the armed conflict. Such crimes are undoubtedly the most serious of crimes which could be committed during or in the absence of an armed conflict. In any event, however, these crimes are beyond the scope of Common Article 3 and Protocol II which aim to protect victims of armed conflict.

622. In this respect, it is important to recall a recent statement of the ICRC that, "It should be stressed that in war time international humanitarian law coexists with human rights law, certain provisions of which cannot be derogated from. Protecting the individual vis-à-vis the enemy, (as opposed to protecting the individual vis-à-vis his own authorities) is one of the characteristics of the law of armed conflicts. A state at war cannot use the conflict as a pretext for ignoring the provisions of th. . .".[47] This is just what happened in Rwanda with only one clarification. The armed conflict there was used not only as a pretext for ignoring the provisions of human rights laws but, moreover, as a pretext for committing extremely serious crimes.

5712

623. Considering the above, and based on all the evidence presented in this case, the Trial Chamber finds that it has not been proved, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the crimes alleged in the Indictment were committed in direct conjunction with the armed conflict. The Trial Chamber further finds that the actions of Kayishema and Ruzindana, in the alleged period of time, had no direct connection with the military operations or with the victims of the armed conflict. It has not been shown that there was a direct link between the accused and the armed forces. Moreover, it cannot be concluded pleno jure, that the material provisions of Common Article 3 and Protocol II have been violated in this particular case. Thus both accused persons, ipso facto et ipso jure, cannot be individually responsible for violations of these international instruments.

624. The Trial Chamber finds, therefore, that Kayishema did not incur individual criminal responsibility for breaches of Article 4 of the Statute under counts 5, 6, 11 ,12, 17 and 18, and neither Kayishema nor Ruzindana incurred liability under counts 23 and 24.

---

[1] The law relating to this area has been discussed supra in Chapter 4.4

[2] Closing arguments, Mr. Ferran, Trans., p. 112, 3 Nov. 1998.

[3] Ibid., p. 90, 4 Nov 1998.

[4] Article 59: En tant que représentant du pouvoir exécutif, le Bourgmestre est soumis à l'autorité hiérarchique du préfet.

[5] Article 85: Lorsque les autorités communales font preuve de carence et n'exécutent pas des mesures prescrites par les lois ou règlements, le préfet peut après deux avertissements écrits restés sans effet se substituer à elles. Il peut prendre toutes les mesures appropriées pour parer à leur défaillance.

[6] Article 15: Le préfet, en plus du pouvoir hiérarchique qu'il a sur les Bourgmestres et leurs services administratifs, dispose sur les actes des autorités communales, du pouvoir général de tutelle, determiné par les dispositions de la loi communale.

[7] Article 104 (para. 2): Toutefois, en cas de calamité publique ou lorsque des troubles menacent d'éclater ou ont éclaté, le préfet peut réquisitionner les agents de la Police communale et les placer sous son autorité directe.

[8] Article 29: L'action des autorités administratives compétentes s'exerce à l'égard de la Gendarmerie Nationale par voie de réquisition; Article 33: L'autorité requise de la Gendarmerie Nationale ne peut discuter l'opportunité de la réquisition pour autant qu'elle n'aille pas à l'encontre d'une loi ou d'un règlement; Article 36: Les effets de la réquisition cessent lorsque l'autorité requérante signifie, par écrit ou verbalement, la levée de la réquisition à l'autorité de Gendarmerie qui était chargée de son exécution.

[9] Décret-Loi sur la création de la Gendarmerie Nationale, reading Articles 4 and 24 in conjunction: Article 4 (para. 3): Les fonctions extraordinaires sont celles que la Gendarmerie Nationale ne peut remplir que sur réquisition de l'autorité compétente; Article 24 (Under section 23, Extraordinary functions): La Gendarmerie Nationale assure le maintien et le rétablissement de l'ordre public lorsqu'elle en est légalement requise.

5713

[10] Trans., 27 May 1998, p.125.

[11] Ibid.

[12] Trans., 3 Sept. 1998, p. 113. The Trial Chamber was never seized of the details of these instructions. However, the contents of these instructions are only of secondary importance.

[13] Celebici Judgement, para. 354.

[14] Ibid., paras. 375-376.

[15] Ibid., para. 376.

[16] See Part II, Historical Context.

[17] Trans., 3 Sept. 1998, p. 113.

[18] Cited, Celebici Judgement, para 338.

[19] Prosecutor's Closing Brief, 9 October 1998, p. 28. See supra Part II, Historical Context.

[20] See, for example, Pros exh's. 51 and 53.

[21] See Chapter 5.4 , supra (Bisesero Factual Findings.)

[22] Pros. exh. 296.

[23] Pros. exh. 59.

[24] Trans., 21 Oct. 1998, pp. 125 and 141.

[25] See supra Chapter 5.3 (discussing safe places).

[26] Trans., 19 Feb. 1998, p.34 and Chapter on Genocide in Kibuye

[27] See supra (discussing Factual Findings).

[28] See testimony of witnesses F, W, B, PP,NN.

[29] See Chapter 5.4 , supra (Bisesero Factual Findings.).

[30] Trans., 14 Oct. 1997, p. 17.

[31] See Crimes Against Humanity, Chapter 4.2.

[32] Ibid

[33] The Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaskic, IT-95-14-PT, Decision on the Defence Motion Based Upon Defects in the Form Thereof, 4.4.97, at p. 12.

[34] See, for example, Prosecutor's Closing Brief at p. 80.

[35] Closing Brief of the Prosecutor, p. 45, para. 149-154 (Closing Brief).

[36] Ibid, p. 81, para. 306; p. 82, para. 312-33; p 93, para.370; p.94, para. 377; p. 106, para. 436; p. 107, para.442; p.135, para. 559 and 565; p. 150, para. 75 and 82.

[37] Ibid, p. 81, para. 306; p. 93 para. 370; p. 106, para. 436; p. 135, para. 559; p. 150 para. 75.

[38] Ibid, p. 48, para.163.

[39] Ibid, p. 48, para. 165.

28 Closing Brief, p. 55, Paras. 188-190.

29 Closing Brief, p. 48, para. 165.

[42] See Ibid, p. 56, para. 195.

5714

291 The same indications are provided under Common Article 3.

292 Ibid, p. 56, para 196.

293 During this analysis, the Prosecutor noted that it may appear that an expert witness, Professor Degni-Segui, took the position that the victims were not protected persons under the regimes. But the Trial Chamber, from point of the view of the Prosecutor, is free to reject or accept the testimony of experts. See Closing Brief, p. 56.

294 Ibid, p. 49, para. 165.

295 ICRC, Report of the Meeting of Experts, October 1998.

5715

VII. CUMULATIVE CHARGES

Introduction

625. The Indictment charges both accused persons cumulatively, inter alia, for Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity/Extermination (extermination) and Crimes Against Humanity/Murder (murder). Within each crime site, the three types of crimes in question[1] are based on the same conduct, and the Defence submits that these crimes amounts to the same offense. Therefore the Chamber must consider the facts of the present case as they apply to the charges. The focus of the analysis that follows therefore is whether the charges, as framed in the Indictment, are proper and sustainable. The issue is not one of concurrent sentencing.

Arguments of the Parties

626. The Defence Teams submitted that the Trial Chamber should not convict for both genocide and Crimes Against Humanity because there is a concur d'infraction or concurrence of violations. The Defence for Ruzindana submitted that "Crimes Against Humanity have been largely absorbed by the Genocide Convention."[2] Furthermore, they argue that there is a partial overlap in the protected social interest of the two Articles of the Statute.[3] The Defence for Kayishema submitted that "The criterion which makes it possible to give separate recognition to the two concepts in law (genocide and extermination) is that the special interests served by genocide are different from those served by extermination. In the instant case, the interests were the same, no convincing argument having been advanced to the contrary."[4] The Prosecution does not argue the substantive issues involved in the possibility of a concur d'infractions or the overlapping elements of the crimes.

The Test of Concurrence of Crimes

627. It is only acceptable to convict an accused of two or more offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where offences have differing elements, or (2) where the laws in question protect differing social interests. To address the issue of concurrence, that is whether two or more crimes charged in the Indictment could be considered the same offense, the Trial Chamber examines two factors: Firstly, whether the crimes as charged contain the same elements, and secondly, whether the laws in question protect the same social interests.[5] The Chamber first analyses the issue of concurrence as it applies to the laws of genocide and Crimes Against Humanity generally; that is, examine whether the violation of these laws could overlap? The Chamber will follow this analysis with an application to the case at bench; that is, ask whether the crimes do overlap given the factual circumstances of the present case?

General Analysis of Concurrence in Relation to Genocide and Crimes Against Humanity; Could the Violation of these Laws Overlap?

628. The Trial Chamber first examines concurrence as it relates to the umbrella laws of genocide and

5716

Crimes Against Humanity, addressing the elements that could be invoked when the laws are ap[illegible] different factual scenarios. This allows the Trial Chamber to determine whether concurrence could occur where genocide and one or more of the enumerated crimes within Crimes Against Humanity are charged in relation to the same set of facts.

629. In relation to the elements of the crimes in question, not all the elements of genocide or Crimes Against Humanity will be invoked in every case. Between the two crimes there are three elements that, if applied in a particular case, could be relied upon to prove one crime but not the others. In such a case there would be no overlap of elements. In other circumstances however, the elements relied upon to prove each of the crimes could be the same.

630. Firstly, and most fundamentally, some of the enumerated crimes under Crimes Against Humanity would not be carried out with the objective to destroy a group in whole or in part; the primary requirement for genocide. For example, Crimes Against Humanity of deportation or imprisonment would not generally lead to the destruction of a protected group. Within Crimes Against Humanity, however, the enumerated crimes of murder (when carried out on a large scale) or extermination would, by their very nature, be committed with the objective to eliminate a part of the population based on discriminatory grounds. Indeed, the terms extermination and destroy are interchangeable in the context of these two crimes. Thus, the element could be the same, given the right factual circumstances.

631. Secondly, under Crimes Against Humanity all of the enumerated crimes must be committed specifically against a "civilian population"[6] where as to commit the crime of genocide one must commit acts to destroy "members of a group." The victims' civilian or military status has no bearing on proving an allegation of genocide. However, in some factual scenarios where the victims are members of the civilian population only, the element would be the same.

632. Third, the discriminatory grounds under Crimes Against Humanity include a type of discrimination not included under genocide, that is political conviction. Where the Prosecution case is based on the same discriminatory grounds, the element would be the same.

633. Fourthly, extermination requires a showing that at least one murder was a part of a mass killing event. Mass killing is not required for the crime of murder. Further, under the Statute, premeditation is required for murder but not for a killing that is a part of a policy of extermination. However, as in the case before this Chamber, where all murders are premeditated and form a part of a mass killing event, the elements of the offences are the same.

634. In sum, the Chamber finds that one may have the specific intent required to commit genocide and also to act pursuant to a policy that may fulfil the intent requirement for some Crimes Against

5717

Humanity, while carrying out acts that satisfy the material elements of both Crimes.

635. Similarly, in relation to protecting differing "social interests," the elements of the two crimes may overlap when applied in some factual scenarios, but not in others. Under the crimes of genocide and Crimes Against Humanity the social interest protected is the prohibition of the killing of the protected class of persons. The class of persons is limited to the civilian population under Crimes Against Humanity whereas under genocide it is not limited to attacks against the civilian population. Where the status of the victims and the elements of the crimes are the same however, the laws may be said to protect the same social interests.

636. Having examined the elements, both mental and physical, and the protected social interests, the Trial Chamber finds that genocide and Crimes Against Humanity may overlap in some factual scenarios, but not in others. This is not surprising. Both international crimes are offenses of mass victimization that may be invoked by a wide array of culpable conduct in connection with many, potentially different, factual situations. Accordingly, whether such overlap exists will depend on the specific facts of the case and the particular evidence relied upon by the Prosecution to prove the crimes.

Do the Crimes Overlap in the Present Case ?

637. For his conduct at the Complex, Kayishema is charged cumulatively with Genocide (Count 1), Murder (Count 2) and Extermination (Count 3); for his conduct at the Stadium cumulatively with Genocide (Count 7), Murder (Count 8) and Extermination (Count 9); for his conduct at Mubuga Church cumulatively with Genocide (Count 13), Murder (Count 14) and Extermination (Count 15); and, for his conduct in Bisesero cumulatively with Genocide (Count 19), Murder (Count 20) and Extermination (Count 21). Ruzindana is charged cumulatively for his conduct in Bisesero with Genocide (Count 19), Murder (Count 20) and Extermination (Count 21).

638. In the instant case, both accused persons participated in the three-month long killing event that subsumed Rwanda, committing crimes in Kibuye Prefecture. In short, the Prosecution alleges and the Trial Chamber finds, that Kayishema and Ruzindana intended to kill vast numbers of Tutsis in Kibuye Prefecture and committed numerous acts, including aiding and abetting others, in pursuit of this objective. Evidence proves that the killings for which the accused were responsible were perpetrated against a civilian population. The Trial Chamber finds that the massacres were carried out solely on the basis of ethnicity. Moreover, in the present case the evidence produced indicates that the murders committed were part of the mass killing event. Each one of these issues is examined in detail below.

The Conduct Relied Upon to Prove All Three Crimes Was the Same – the Physical and Mental Elements

5718

639. The Prosecution case was based on the accused's objective to kill Tutsis in Kibuye Prefe their aiding and abetting other Hutus to do so, over a three-month period. The policy of genocide in Kibuye, also served to prove the policy element for Crimes Against Humanity. With regard to the actus reus of both accused persons, the Trial Chamber finds that the attacks in which the accused participated and/or led resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries. The same acts or omissions serve as the basis for the Prosecution case in all three types of crimes in question. For example, the widespread or systematic element of the attack required for Crimes Against Humanity also served to prove that the acts perpetrated by the accused were genocidal acts namely, killings with intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group in whole or in part.

640. With regard to the mens rea, the Trial Chamber finds this case to be one of intentional extermination or destruction of the Tutsi population; all the killings and serious injuries occurred as a result of this objective. It is the same intent that has served as the basis for all three types of crimes in question.

641. Therefore, the elements and the evidence used to prove these elements were the same for genocide and the crimes of extermination and murder, in the instant case.

The Protected Social Interest - The Victims Were the Same

642. The Trial Chamber finds that the victims of the massacres were Tutsi civilians.[7] The discriminatory ground upon which the attacks were based was solely one of ethnicity. Accordingly, the discriminatory element, which is a requirement for both genocide and Crimes Against Humanity, was the same. Furthermore, the Tutsi victims of the attacks were civilians; members of the civilian population in Kibuye Prefecture. The victims held the same status whether they were victims of the genocidal acts or the crimes of extermination or murder. Thus, in this case, the same evidence established that the acts of the accused were intended to destroy the Tutsi group, under genocide, and were equally part of a widespread or systematic attack against civilians on the grounds that they were Tutsis, under extermination and murder.

643. Therefore, in the instant case, the social interest protected, that is, the lives of Tutsi civilians, was the same for genocide and the crimes of extermination and murder under Crimes Against Humanity.

All Murders Were a Part of the Mass Killing Event

644. The Trial Chamber finds that the murders at each one of the crime sites took place as part of the policy of genocide and extermination within Kibuye Prefecture. All the killings were premeditated and were part of the overall plan to exterminate or destroy the Tutsi population. The killings go to prove the charges of Crimes Against Humanity for murder as well as extermination and genocide. None of the killings were presented to the Trial Chamber as a separate or detached incident from the massacres that occurred in the four crime sites in question. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that the elements of crimes are the same for all three types of crimes and that evidence used to prove one crime is used also prove the other two.

5719

Findings

The Same Offence?

645. The Prosecution uses the same elements to show genocide, extermination and murder, and relies upon the same evidence to prove these elements. The evidence produced to prove one charge necessarily involved proof of the other. The culpable conduct that is, premeditated killing, relied upon to prove genocide, also satisfied the actus reus for extermination and murder. Additionally, all the murders were part of the extermination (the mass killing event) and were proved by relying on the same evidence. Indeed, extermination could only be established by proving killing on a massive scale.[8]

646. The widespread or systematic nature of the attacks in Kibuye satisfied the required elements of Crimes Against Humanity, and also served as evidence of the requisite acts and Genocidal intent. The mens rea element in relation to all three crimes was also the same that is, to destroy or exterminate the Tutsi population. Therefore, the special intent required for genocide also satisfied the mens rea for extermination and murder. Finally, the protected social interest in the present case surely is the same. The class of protected persons, i.e., the victims of the attacks, for which Kayishema and Ruzindana were found responsible were Tutsi civilians. They were victims of a genocidal plan and a policy of extermination that involved mass murder. Finally, the Prosecutor failed to show that any of the murders alleged was outside the mass killing event, within each crime site. These collective murders all formed a part of the greater events occurring in Kibuye Prefecture during the time in question.

647. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that, in the peculiar factual scenario in the present case, the crimes of genocide, extermination and murder overlap. Accordingly, there exists a concur d' infractions par excellence with regard to the three crimes within each of the four crime sites, that is to say these offenses were the same in the present case.

The Consequences of Concurrence

648. During the trial, the Prosecution used the same elements to prove all three types of crimes as they applied to the four crime sites. In the context of the present case the three laws in question protected the same social interests. Therefore, the counts of extermination and murder are subsumed fully by the counts of genocide. That is to say they are the same offence in this instance.

649. The Trial Chamber is therefore of the view that the circumstances in this case, as discussed above, do not give rise to the commission of more than one offence. The scenario only allow finding of either genocide or extermination and/or murder. Therefore because the crime of genocide is established against the accused persons, then they cannot simultaneously be convicted for murder and/or extermination, in this case. This would be improper as it would amount to convicting the accused persons twice for the same offence. This, the Trial Chamber deems to be highly prejudicial and untenable in law in the circumstances of this case. If the Prosecution intended to rely on the same elements and evidence to prove all three types of crimes, it should have charged in the alternative. As such, these cumulative charges are improper and untenable.

5720

650. Further, even if the Trial Chamber was to find that the Counts of extermination and murder were tenable, the accused persons could not have been convicted for the collective murders, in this case, under Article 3(a) and extermination under Article 3(b) of the Statute, as charged. This is because, as stated above, the Prosecutor failed to prove that any of the murders alleged was outside the mass killing event, within each crime site. In this situation as well, the Prosecutor should have charged the accused in the alternative.

---

[1] The Trial Chamber does not address the other three crimes charged in the present Indictment because, for various reasons outlined in the Legal Findings Part, the accused have not been found criminally responsible for each of these crimes.

[2] Defence Closing Brief (Ruzindana), 29 Oct. 1998, at 6.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Defence Brief of Clement Kayishema at 7.

[5] Many national jurisdictions have adopted such concepts in conducting criminal proceedings. See Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932).

[6] For a detailed discussion on the definition of the civilian population, under Crimes Against Humanity, see Chapter 4.2, supra.

[7] See Legal Findings on Crimes Against Humanity.

[8] It is important to note that an accused may be guilty of extermination, under Crimes Against Humanity, when sufficient evidence is produced that he or she killed a single person as long as this killing was a part of a mass killing event.

S721

VII. CUMULATIVE CHARGES

Introduction

625. The Indictment charges both accused persons cumulatively, inter alia, for Genocide, Crimes Against Humanity/Extermination (extermination) and Crimes Against Humanity/Murder (murder). Within each crime site, the three types of crimes in question[1] are based on the same conduct, and the Defence submits that these crimes amounts to the same offense. Therefore the Chamber must consider the facts of the present case as they apply to the charges. The focus of the analysis that follows therefore is whether the charges, as framed in the Indictment, are proper and sustainable. The issue is not one of concurrent sentencing.

Arguments of the Parties

626. The Defence Teams submitted that the Trial Chamber should not convict for both genocide and Crimes Against Humanity because there is a concur d'infraction or concurrence of violations. The Defence for Ruzindana submitted that "Crimes Against Humanity have been largely absorbed by the Genocide Convention."[2] Furthermore, they argue that there is a partial overlap in the protected social interest of the two Articles of the Statute.[3] The Defence for Kayishema submitted that "The criterion which makes it possible to give separate recognition to the two concepts in law (genocide and extermination) is that the special interests served by genocide are different from those served by extermination. In the instant case, the interests were the same, no convincing argument having been advanced to the contrary."[4] The Prosecution does not argue the substantive issues involved in the possibility of a concur d'infractions or the overlapping elements of the crimes.

The Test of Concurrence of Crimes

627. It is only acceptable to convict an accused of two or more offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where offences have differing elements, or (2) where the laws in question protect differing social interests. To address the issue of concurrence, that is whether two or more crimes charged in the Indictment could be considered the same offense, the Trial Chamber examines two factors: Firstly, whether the crimes as charged contain the same elements, and secondly, whether the laws in question protect the same social interests.[5] The Chamber first analyses the issue of concurrence as it applies to the laws of genocide and Crimes Against Humanity generally; that is, examine whether the violation of these laws could overlap? The Chamber will follow this analysis with an application to the case at bench; that is, ask whether the crimes do overlap given the factual circumstances of the present case?

General Analysis of Concurrence in Relation to Genocide and Crimes Against Humanity; Could the Violation of these Laws Overlap?

628. The Trial Chamber first examines concurrence as it relates to the umbrella laws of genocide and

Crimes Against Humanity, addressing the elements that could be invoked when the laws are ap[illegible] different factual scenarios. This allows the Trial Chamber to determine whether concurrence could occur where genocide and one or more of the enumerated crimes within Crimes Against Humanity are charged in relation to the same set of facts.

629. In relation to the elements of the crimes in question, not all the elements of genocide or Crimes Against Humanity will be invoked in every case. Between the two crimes there are three elements that, if applied in a particular case, could be relied upon to prove one crime but not the others. In such a case there would be no overlap of elements. In other circumstances however, the elements relied upon to prove each of the crimes could be the same.

630. Firstly, and most fundamentally, some of the enumerated crimes under Crimes Against Humanity would not be carried out with the objective to destroy a group in whole or in part; the primary requirement for genocide. For example, Crimes Against Humanity of deportation or imprisonment would not generally lead to the destruction of a protected group. Within Crimes Against Humanity, however, the enumerated crimes of murder (when carried out on a large scale) or extermination would, by their very nature, be committed with the objective to eliminate a part of the population based on discriminatory grounds. Indeed, the terms extermination and destroy are interchangeable in the context of these two crimes. Thus, the element could be the same, given the right factual circumstances.

631. Secondly, under Crimes Against Humanity all of the enumerated crimes must be committed specifically against a "civilian population"[6] where as to commit the crime of genocide one must commit acts to destroy "members of a group." The victims' civilian or military status has no bearing on proving an allegation of genocide. However, in some factual scenarios where the victims are members of the civilian population only, the element would be the same.

632. Third, the discriminatory grounds under Crimes Against Humanity include a type of discrimination not included under genocide, that is political conviction. Where the Prosecution case is based on the same discriminatory grounds, the element would be the same.

633. Fourthly, extermination requires a showing that at least one murder was a part of a mass killing event. Mass killing is not required for the crime of murder. Further, under the Statute, premeditation is required for murder but not for a killing that is a part of a policy of extermination. However, as in the case before this Chamber, where all murders are premeditated and form a part of a mass killing event, the elements of the offences are the same.

634. In sum, the Chamber finds that one may have the specific intent required to commit genocide and also to act pursuant to a policy that may fulfil the intent requirement for some Crimes Against

5723

Humanity, while carrying out acts that satisfy the material elements of both Crimes.

635. Similarly, in relation to protecting differing "social interests," the elements of the two crimes may overlap when applied in some factual scenarios, but not in others. Under the crimes of genocide and Crimes Against Humanity the social interest protected is the prohibition of the killing of the protected class of persons. The class of persons is limited to the civilian population under Crimes Against Humanity whereas under genocide it is not limited to attacks against the civilian population. Where the status of the victims and the elements of the crimes are the same however, the laws may be said to protect the same social interests.

636. Having examined the elements, both mental and physical, and the protected social interests, the Trial Chamber finds that genocide and Crimes Against Humanity may overlap in some factual scenarios, but not in others. This is not surprising. Both international crimes are offenses of mass victimization that may be invoked by a wide array of culpable conduct in connection with many, potentially different, factual situations. Accordingly, whether such overlap exists will depend on the specific facts of the case and the particular evidence relied upon by the Prosecution to prove the crimes.

Do the Crimes Overlap in the Present Case ?

637. For his conduct at the Complex, Kayishema is charged cumulatively with Genocide (Count 1), Murder (Count 2) and Extermination (Count 3); for his conduct at the Stadium cumulatively with Genocide (Count 7), Murder (Count 8) and Extermination (Count 9); for his conduct at Mubuga Church cumulatively with Genocide (Count 13), Murder (Count 14) and Extermination (Count 15); and, for his conduct in Bisesero cumulatively with Genocide (Count 19), Murder (Count 20) and Extermination (Count 21). Ruzindana is charged cumulatively for his conduct in Bisesero with Genocide (Count 19), Murder (Count 20) and Extermination (Count 21).

638. In the instant case, both accused persons participated in the three-month long killing event that subsumed Rwanda, committing crimes in Kibuye Prefecture. In short, the Prosecution alleges and the Trial Chamber finds, that Kayishema and Ruzindana intended to kill vast numbers of Tutsis in Kibuye Prefecture and committed numerous acts, including aiding and abetting others, in pursuit of this objective. Evidence proves that the killings for which the accused were responsible were perpetrated against a civilian population. The Trial Chamber finds that the massacres were carried out solely on the basis of ethnicity. Moreover, in the present case the evidence produced indicates that the murders committed were part of the mass killing event. Each one of these issues is examined in detail below.

The Conduct Relied Upon to Prove All Three Crimes Was the Same – the Physical and Mental Elements

5724

639. The Prosecution case was based on the accused's objective to kill Tutsis in Kibuye Prefe their aiding and abetting other Hutus to do so, over a three-month period. The policy of genocide in Kibuye, also served to prove the policy element for Crimes Against Humanity. With regard to the actus reus of both accused persons, the Trial Chamber finds that the attacks in which the accused participated and/or led resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries. The same acts or omissions serve as the basis for the Prosecution case in all three types of crimes in question. For example, the widespread or systematic element of the attack required for Crimes Against Humanity also served to prove that the acts perpetrated by the accused were genocidal acts namely, killings with intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group in whole or in part.

640. With regard to the mens rea, the Trial Chamber finds this case to be one of intentional extermination or destruction of the Tutsi population; all the killings and serious injuries occurred as a result of this objective. It is the same intent that has served as the basis for all three types of crimes in question.

641. Therefore, the elements and the evidence used to prove these elements were the same for genocide and the crimes of extermination and murder, in the instant case.

The Protected Social Interest - The Victims Were the Same

642. The Trial Chamber finds that the victims of the massacres were Tutsi civilians.[7] The discriminatory ground upon which the attacks were based was solely one of ethnicity. Accordingly, the discriminatory element, which is a requirement for both genocide and Crimes Against Humanity, was the same. Furthermore, the Tutsi victims of the attacks were civilians; members of the civilian population in Kibuye Prefecture. The victims held the same status whether they were victims of the genocidal acts or the crimes of extermination or murder. Thus, in this case, the same evidence established that the acts of the accused were intended to destroy the Tutsi group, under genocide, and were equally part of a widespread or systematic attack against civilians on the grounds that they were Tutsis, under extermination and murder.

643. Therefore, in the instant case, the social interest protected, that is, the lives of Tutsi civilians, was the same for genocide and the crimes of extermination and murder under Crimes Against Humanity.

All Murders Were a Part of the Mass Killing Event

644. The Trial Chamber finds that the murders at each one of the crime sites took place as part of the policy of genocide and extermination within Kibuye Prefecture. All the killings were premeditated and were part of the overall plan to exterminate or destroy the Tutsi population. The killings go to prove the charges of Crimes Against Humanity for murder as well as extermination and genocide. None of the killings were presented to the Trial Chamber as a separate or detached incident from the massacres that occurred in the four crime sites in question. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that the elem crimes are the same for all three types of crimes and that evidence used to prove one crime is used also prove the other two.

5725

Findings

The Same Offence?

645. The Prosecution uses the same elements to show genocide, extermination and murder, and relies upon the same evidence to prove these elements. The evidence produced to prove one charge necessarily involved proof of the other. The culpable conduct that is, premeditated killing, relied upon to prove genocide, also satisfied the actus reus for extermination and murder. Additionally, all the murders were part of the extermination (the mass killing event) and were proved by relying on the same evidence. Indeed, extermination could only be established by proving killing on a massive scale.[8]

646. The widespread or systematic nature of the attacks in Kibuye satisfied the required elements of Crimes Against Humanity, and also served as evidence of the requisite acts and Genocidal intent. The mens rea element in relation to all three crimes was also the same that is, to destroy or exterminate the Tutsi population. Therefore, the special intent required for genocide also satisfied the mens rea for extermination and murder. Finally, the protected social interest in the present case surely is the same. The class of protected persons, i.e., the victims of the attacks, for which Kayishema and Ruzindana were found responsible were Tutsi civilians. They were victims of a genocidal plan and a policy of extermination that involved mass murder. Finally, the Prosecutor failed to show that any of the murders alleged was outside the mass killing event, within each crime site. These collective murders all formed a part of the greater events occurring in Kibuye Prefecture during the time in question.

647. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that, in the peculiar factual scenario in the present case, the crimes of genocide, extermination and murder overlap. Accordingly, there exists a concur d' infractions par excellence with regard to the three crimes within each of the four crime sites, that is to say these offenses were the same in the present case.

The Consequences of Concurrence

648. During the trial, the Prosecution used the same elements to prove all three types of crimes as they applied to the four crime sites. In the context of the present case the three laws in question protected the same social interests. Therefore, the counts of extermination and murder are subsumed fully by the counts of genocide. That is to say they are the same offence in this instance.

649. The Trial Chamber is therefore of the view that the circumstances in this case, as discussed above, do not give rise to the commission of more than one offence. The scenario only allov finding of either genocide or extermination and/or murder. Therefore because the crime of genocide is established against the accused persons, then they cannot simultaneously be convicted for murder and/or extermination, in this case. This would be improper as it would amount to convicting the accused persons twice for the same offence. This, the Trial Chamber deems to be highly prejudicial and untenable in law in the circumstances of this case. If the Prosecution intended to rely on the same elements and evidence to prove all three types of crimes, it should have charged in the alternative. As such, these cumulative charges are improper and untenable.

5726

650. Further, even if the Trial Chamber was to find that the Counts of extermination and murder were tenable, the accused persons could not have been convicted for the collective murders, in this case, under Article 3(a) and extermination under Article 3(b) of the Statute, as charged. This is because, as stated above, the Prosecutor failed to prove that any of the murders alleged was outside the mass killing event, within each crime site. In this situation as well, the Prosecutor should have charged the accused in the alternative.

---

[1] The Trial Chamber does not address the other three crimes charged in the present Indictment because, for various reasons outlined in the Legal Findings Part, the accused have not been found criminally responsible for each of these crimes.

[2] Defence Closing Brief (Ruzindana), 29 Oct. 1998, at 6.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Defence Brief of Clement Kayishema at 7.

[5] Many national jurisdictions have adopted such concepts in conducting criminal proceedings. See Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299 (1932).

[6] For a detailed discussion on the definition of the civilian population, under Crimes Against Humanity, see Chapter 4.2, supra.

[7] See Legal Findings on Crimes Against Humanity.

[8] It is important to note that an accused may be guilty of extermination, under Crimes Against Humanity, when sufficient evidence is produced that he or she killed a single person as long as this killing was a part of a mass killing event.

5727

VIII. THE VERDICT

FOR THE FORGOING REASONS, having considered all of the evidence and the arguments of the parties, THE TRIAL CHAMBER finds as follows:

(1) By a majority, Judge Khan dissenting,

Decides that the charges brought under Articles 3(a) and (b) of the Statute (Crimes Against Humanity (murder) and Crimes Against Humanity (extermination) respectively) were in the present case, fully subsumed by the counts brought under Article 2 of the Statute (Genocide), therefore finding the accused, Clement Kayishema, NOT GUILTY on counts 2, 3, 8, 9, 14, 15, and both accused persons, Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, NOT GUILTY on counts 20 and 21.

(2) Unanimously finds on the remaining charges as follows:

In the case against Clement Kayishema:

Count 1: Guilty of Genocide
Count 4: Not Guilty of Crimes Against Humanity/Other Inhumane Acts
Count 5: Not Guilty of a violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions
Count 6: Not Guilty of a violation of Additional Protocol II
Count 7: Guilty of Genocide
Count 10: Not Guilty of Crimes Against Humanity/Other Inhumane Acts
Count 11: Not Guilty of a violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions
Count 12: Not Guilty of a violation of Additional Protocol II
Count 13: Guilty of Genocide
Count 16: Not Guilty of Crimes Against Humanity/Other Inhumane Acts
Count 17: Not Guilty of a violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions
Count 18: Not Guilty of a violation of Additional Protocol II
Count 19: Guilty of Genocide
Count 22: Not Guilty of Crimes Against Humanity/Other Inhumane Acts
Count 23: Not Guilty of a violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions
Count 24: Not Guilty of a violation of Additional Protocol II

In the case against Obed Ruzindana:

Count 19: Guilty of Genocide
Count 22: Not Guilty of Crimes Against Humanity/Other Inhumane Acts

5728

Count 23: Not Guilty of a violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions

Count 24: Not Guilty of a violation of Additional Protocol II

Done in English and French, the English text being authoritative.

William H. Sekule
Presiding

Yakov A. Ostrovsky

Tafazzal Hossain Khan

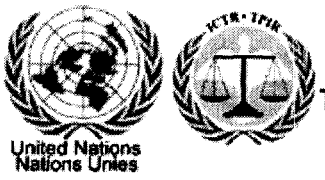
Judge Khan appends a Separate and Dissenting Opinion to this Judgement.

Dated this twenty-first day of May 1999
Arusha
Tanzania

ANNEX 11:

Prosecutor v. Musema, Judgement, Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, Trial Chamber I, 27 January 2000.

5730



International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
Tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda

TABLE OF CONTENTS

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1 The International Criminal Tribunal
1.2 Jurisdiction of the Tribunal
1.3 The Indictment
1.4 The Accused

2. PROCEEDINGS

2.1 Procedural background
2.2 Evidentiary matters
2.3 The Defence of alibi

3. THE APPLICABLE LAW

3.1 Individual criminal responsibility (Article 6 of the Statute)
3.2 The Crime of Genocide (Article 2 of the Statute)
3.2.1 Genocide
3.2.2 Complicity in Genocide
3.2.3 Conspiracy to Commit Genocide
3.3 Crime against Humanity (Article 3 of the Statute)
3.4.Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II
3.5 Cumulative charges

4. THE DEFENCE CASE

4.1 General admissions
4.2 The alibi
4.3 Further arguments

5. FACTUAL FINDINGS

5.1 Context of the events alleged
5.2 Massacres in the Bisesero region
5.3 Sexual crimes
5.4 Musema's authority

6. LEGAL FINDINGS

6.1 Count 1 - Genocide & Count 2 - Complicity in Genocide
6.2 Count 3 - Conspiracy to Commit Genocide
6.3 Count 5 - Crime against Humanity (extermination)

5731

6.4 Count 4 - Crime against Humanity (murder)
6.5 Count 6 - Crime against Humanity (other inhumane acts)
6.6 Count 7 - Crime against Humanity (rape)
6.7 Counts 8 and 9 -Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II 274

7. VERDICT

8. SENTENCING

ANNEXES

Annex A - The Indictment
Annex B - Mission order
Annex C - Musema's calendar
Annex D - Glossary of terms

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE ASPEGREN

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE PILLAY

SUMMARY

5732

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1 The International Criminal Tribunal

1.2 Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

1.3 The Indictment

1.4 The Accused

1.1 The International Criminal Tribunal

1. This Judgement is rendered by Trial Chamber I of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (the "Tribunal"), composed of Judge Lennart Aspegren, presiding, Judge Laïty Kama, and Judge Navanethem Pillay, in the case of The Prosecutor v. Alfred Musema.
2. The Tribunal was established by United Nations Security Council Resolution 955 of 8 November 1994(1) after it had studied official United Nations reports(2) which revealed that genocide and other widespread, systematic, and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in Rwanda. The Security Council determined that this situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, and was convinced that the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in Rwanda. Accordingly, the Security Council established the Tribunal, pursuant to Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.
3. The Tribunal is governed by its Statute (the "Statute") annexed to Security Council Resolution 955, and by its Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the "Rules"), which were adopted by the Judges on 5 July 1995 and subsequently amended.(3)

1.2 Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

1. Pursuant to the provisions of the Statute, the Tribunal has the authority to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda. The Statute has also empowered the Tribunal with the authority to prosecute Rwandan citizens, who are natural persons, responsible for such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States. Under Article 7 of the Statute, the Tribunal's jurisdiction rationae temporae limits prosecution to acts committed between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994. Individual criminal responsibility, pursuant to Article 6, shall be established for acts falling within the Tribunal's jurisdiction rationae materiae, as provided in Articles 2, 3, and 4 as follows:

"Article 2: Genocide

1. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing genocide, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, or of committing any of the other acts enumerated in paragraph 3 of the Article.

2. Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group as such:

   a) Killing members of the group;

5733

b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

3. The following acts shall be punishable:

a) Genocide;

b) Conspiracy to commit genocide;

c) Direct and public incitement to commit genocide;

d) Attempt to commit genocide;

e) Complicity in genocide.

Article 3: Crimes Against Humanity

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for the following crimes, when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial, or religious grounds:

a) Murder;

b) Extermination;

c) Enslavement;

d) Deportation;

e) Imprisonment;

f) Torture;

g) Rape;

h) Persecutions on political, racial, and religious grounds;

i) Other inhumane acts.

Article 4: Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:

5734

a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

b) Collective punishments;

c) Taking of hostages;

d) Acts of Terrorism;

e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

f) Pillage;

g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples;

h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts."

5. In addition, Article 6 states the principle of individual criminal responsibility:

"Article 6: Individual Criminal Responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed, or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.
2. The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.
3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.
4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the International Tribunal for Rwanda determines that justice so requires."

6. Although the Tribunal and national courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction to prosecute persons suspected of serious violations of international humanitarian law and whose identity and acts fall within the said limits of personal and temporal jurisdiction, the Tribunal shall have primacy over national courts pursuant to Article 8 of the Statute and may formally request that national courts defer to its competence.

1.3 The Indictment

5735

7. The initial Indictment against Alfred Musema was submitted by the Prosecutor on 11 Ju[illegible] and was confirmed by Judge Yakov A. Ostrovsky on 15 July 1996.
8. On 14 December 1998, the Chamber confirmed an amended Indictment, submitted on 20 November 1998 by the Prosecutor. In this Indictment, the count of Complicity in Genocide was added alternatively to the existing count of Genocide. The Prosecutor submitted a second significantly amended Indictment on 29 April 1999, which the Chamber confirmed on 6 May 1999. This Indictment contains the final version of the Prosecutor's charges, and is the basis of the present judgement.
9. The amended Indictment, as confirmed on 6 May 1999, is printed in full in Annex A.

1.4 The Accused

10. Alfred Musema-Uwimana, here called Musema, was born on 22 August 1949 in the Byumba Préfecture. He is from Butare Commune. He began his studies in 1968 at the "Université d'État, Faculté des Sciences Agronomiques" in Gembloux, Belgium, and graduated in 1974.
11. Musema and his wife Claire Kayuku were married in 1975. They have three children. Like Musema, his wife is from Butare Commune.
12. Musema began his career in the Rwandan Ministry of Agriculture & Livestock Breeding, working in association with ORSTOM, a French company. In 1984, by presidential decree, Musema, then 35 years of age, was appointed as the director of the public enterprise, the Gisovu Tea Factory (under the parastatal organization OCIR-thé).
13. The Gisovu Tea Factory, constructed during the years 1977 to 1983, was in production for only a short time before Musema assumed responsibility in 1984. Although the tea plantations were young, the factory soon rose to the same standing as other, more established tea factories. By 1993, the Gisovu tea factory was one of the most successful tea factories in Rwanda. Indeed, its excellence was reflected in its volume of trade on the London Tea Market. (See Exhibit D11, a table of figures from Wilson Smith & Co., on the London Tea Exchange.)
14. Though the Head office of the Gisovu tea factory was located in Kibuye, Musema's area of responsibility encompassed the préfectures of Kibuye and Gikongoro.
15. Between 1984 and 1994, Musema participated in two missions abroad. The first mission was to Kenya, where Musema visited the Kenya Tea Development Authority, and the second mission was to Morocco, where he examined alternative types of teas. Musema was chosen to participate in the mission to Morocco on the recommendation of Japanese businessmen, who identified the Gisovu tea factory as the most suitable Rwandan factory to produce several varieties of tea.
16. Musema was a member of the "conseil préfectorial" in Byumba Préfecture and a member of the Technical Committee in the Butare Commune. Both positions of responsibility involved socio-economic and developmental matters and did not focus on préfectorial politics.

---

1. UN Document S/RES/955 of 8 November 1994.

2. Preliminary Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 935(1994), Final Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 935(1994)(Document S/1994/1405) and Reports of the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (Document S/1994/1157, Annexes I and II)

3. The Rules were successively amended on 12 January 1996, 15 May 1996, 4 July 1996, 5 June 1997, 8 June 1998, and 4 June 1999.

S736.

2. PROCEEDINGS

2.1 Procedural background

2.2 Evidentiary matters

2.3 The Defence of alibi

2.1 Procedural background

17. On 11 February 1995, Alfred Musema was arrested in Switzerland by the national authorities, on the basis of a warrant of arrest issued by the examining magistrate. Musema was detained by the Swiss authorities, confirmation of the detention being extended on a monthly basis in conformity with Articles 56 and ff. of the Code of the Martial Criminal Procedure. On 4 March 1996, the then Prosecutor, Richard J. Goldstone, applied to the Tribunal for a formal request for deferral by Switzerland concerning Alfred Musema(1). By decision of 12 March 1996(2), Trial Chamber I, constituted of Judge Laïty Kama, Presiding, Judge Lennart Aspegren and Judge Navanethem Pillay, formally requested the Swiss federal Government to defer to the Tribunal all investigations and criminal proceedings currently being conducted in its national courts against Alfred Musema. The Chamber further requested the Government of Switzerland to continue to detain Alfred Musema until an indictment was established and confirmed and a warrant of arrest was issued against him by the Tribunal.
18. In conformity with Articles 17 and 18 of the Statute, and Rules 28 and 47 of the Rules, the Prosecutor presented an indictment dated 11 July 1996 against Alfred Musema to Judge Yakov Ostrovsky, who confirmed all the counts therein by decision of 15 July 1996(3). A warrant of arrest and order for surrender addressed to the Swiss authorities was issued by Judge Ostrovsky on the same day(4). Musema was transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facility in Arusha on 20 May 1997.
19. Musema's initial appearance had to be rescheduled on two occasions, 16 June 1997 and 3 September 1997 respectively. Defence Counsel, Ms Marie- Paule Honegger of the Geneva Bar, failed to attend on both occasions and declined to accept the appointment of alternate counsel. Musema insisted on his right to have his appointed counsel present before entering a plea. After further delays were caused by the Defence Counsel to the scheduling of the initial appearance, the Chamber found that the Defence Counsel's conduct and lack of co-operation was obstructing the proceedings and was contrary to the interests of justice. The Chamber thus issued a warning to Ms Honegger, pursuant to Rule 46(A) of the Rules, that she may be sanctioned by the refusal of further audience before the Chamber if she defaulted in complying with the Chamber's request to represent in person her client during his initial appearance scheduled anew for 18 November 1997, in which case the Chamber would instruct the Registrar to replace her as counsel for Musema under Rule 46(C)(5).
20. On 18 November 1997, the Defence Counsel, despite the said warning and notice, failed to be present at the initial appearance of Musema. Finding no reasonable or compelling grounds in the response of the assigned counsel for refusing to be present at the Tribunal for the hearing, the Chamber gave effect to the said warning by refusing her further audience before the Tribunal. The Chamber instructed the Registrar to immediately assign a new counsel to Musema(6).
21. Prior to formally charging Musema by having the Indictment read out to him during the initial appearance, the Chamber informed Musema that his pleading guilty or not guilty to the charges without the presence of his lawyer did not deprive him of his right to counsel, and further explained to him that should he fail to enter a plea to the charges, a plea of not guilty would be entered on his behalf. After having satisfied itself that Musema had understood and accepted this, the Chamber proceeded with the initial appearance. The Chamber recalled that, in any event, Musema would be entitled to conduct his own defence if he so chose, pursuant to Rule 45(F) of the Rules. Thereafter, Musema pleaded not guilty to all the counts preferred against him.

22. Furthermore, pursuant to Rule 69 of the Rules, the Chamber granted permission to the Prosecutor to temporarily redact the names and other identifying information of her witnesses in the supporting material until such time as the Chamber had ordered protective measures for the Prosecutor's witnesses(7).
23. On 30 October 1998, the Prosecutor requested leave to file an amended Indictment against Alfred Musema. The proposed 39 page amended Indictment was filed on 3 November 1998(8). On 18 November 1998, after having heard the parties during the audience held to that end, Trial Chamber I rendered its decision thereon(9). The Chamber granted leave to the Prosecutor to add the count of Complicity in Genocide as an alternative Count to the Count of Genocide in the Indictment and on the same facts adduced in respect of the latter Count. Furthermore, leave was granted to the Prosecutor to amend paragraph 5 of the Indictment to include the allegation of Individual Criminal Responsibility under Article 6(3) of Statute in respect to every count. The Chamber directed the Prosecutor to withdraw the draft amended Indictment, and to immediately amend the original Indictment in conformity with the Decision. The new Indictment was filed by the Prosecutor on 20 November 1998. On the same day, Musema pleaded not guilty to the new charges therein before Trial Chamber I, constituted for this hearing of Judge Lennart Aspegren, Presiding, Judge Tafazzal H. Khan and Judge Navanethem Pillay.
24. By decision of 20 November 1998, the Chamber granted the motion of the Prosecutor for protective measures for her witnesses(10).
25. On Monday 25 January 1999, before Trial Chamber I, constituted of Judge Lennart Aspegren, Presiding, Judge Laïty Kama and Judge Navanethem Pillay, the case on the merits of Musema commenced with the opening arguments of the Prosecutor, and the hearing of the first prosecution witness. Defence Counsel, Mr. Steven Kay QC, reserved his right to make an opening statement at the commencement of the case for the defence.
26. On 17 March 1999, the Chamber denied the application of 23 November 1998 and the 22 February 1999 corrigendum thereto filed by African Concern, a charitable non-governmental organization, to file a written brief as Amicus Curiae in the case(11) on the subject of restitution of property to victims.
27. By Decision of the Chamber rendered on 6 May 1999, the Prosecutor was granted leave to amend the Indictment against Musema, inter alia, by adding of one new count against Musema and by expanding on the facts adduced in the then existing Indictment in support of the new count. The Chamber acknowledged that although the filing of the motion for leave to amend the Indictment came at a late stage in the presentation of the Prosecutor's case, this did not cause prejudice to Musema. Furthermore, the Chamber held that no undue delay would be caused to the proceedings by allowing the amendments as all the pertinent witness statements had already been disclosed to the Defence and as all witnesses the Prosecutor intended to rely upon in support of the new count had already testified in the case(12).
28. With regard to witnesses, the Chamber granted leave to both the Prosecutor and the Defence to call additional witnesses(13). The Chamber also ordered, pursuant to a request of the Prosecutor and on the basis of Rule 90*bis* of the Rules, on 19 April 1999, that three of the Prosecutor's protected witnesses be transferred temporarily to the Tribunal's Detention Facilities in Arusha in order to testify in the trial of Musema. The co-operation of the Government of Rwanda was sought in the matter(14).
29. In total, twenty-two protected witnesses, one investigator and one expert witness appeared for the Prosecutor and she closed her case on 7 May 1999. The Defence opened its case on 10 May 1999 with the testimony of Musema. Five other witnesses, including two protected witnesses and one investigator appeared for the Defence. The Defence closed its case on 23 June 1999.

30. Closing arguments were heard on 25 and 28 June 1999 and the case put into deliberation. In all, the Trial covered 39 days between 25 January and 28 June 1999.

2.2 Evidentiary matters

31. The Chamber will here address general evidentiary matters of concern which arose during this trial, including general principles of the evidence evaluation, assessment of documentary evidence, false testimony, impact of trauma on the testimony of witnesses, interpretation and cultural factors affecting the testimony of witnesses.

2.2.1 General Principles of the Assessment of Evidence

32. The Chamber has considered the charges against Musema on the basis of testimony and exhibits offered by the Parties to prove or disprove allegations made in the Indictment.
33. The Chamber also relies on facts not in dispute and on other elements relevant to its decision, such as constitutive documents pertaining to the establishment and the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The Chamber notes that, under Rule 89(A) of the Rules, it is not bound by any national rules of evidence. The Chamber has thus applied, in accordance with Rule 89, the rules of evidence which in its view best favour a fair determination of the matter before it and are consonant with the spirit and general principles of the law.
34.

Admissibility

34. The admission of all evidence, regardless of its form, is governed by Rule 89(c) of the Rules, which states:

"A Chamber may admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value."

Reliability

35. The application of these criteria of admissibility (relevance and probative value) has been clarified by a majority of Trial Chamber II of the ICTY in the Tadi case(15). This decision established that evidence which is both relevant and probative must also enjoy some component of reliability.
36. The role that reliability plays in determining the admissibility and the probative value of evidence is further clarified by the decision of the ICTY in the Delali case(16). The Trial Chamber there stated that:

"for evidence to be relevant, and to have a nexus between it and the subject matter, such evidence must be reliable. The same is true for evidence which is said to have probative value."(17)

37. The Chamber went on to state that reliability is the invisible golden thread which runs through all the components of admissibility.

38. The Chamber concurs with this understanding of the relationship between relevance, probative value, and reliability. The reliability of evidence does not constitute a separate condition of admissibility; rather, it provides the basis for the findings of relevance and probative value required under Rule 89(c) for evidence to be admitted.

Probative Value

39. As a general principle, the Chamber attaches probative value to evidence according to its credibility and relevance to the allegations at issue.
40. As the Chamber has noted above, the probative value of evidence is based upon an assessment of its reliability.
41. The Chamber has assessed the relative weight and probative value to be accorded to each piece of evidence in the context of all other evidence presented to it in the course of the trial.

Corroboration

42. The Chamber notes that during trial, the corroboration of evidence was an important factor in assessing the probative value of much of the evidence presented by the Parties, in particular where only one testimony was presented in support of certain facts alleged in the Indictment, and also in relation to documentary evidence. (Documentary evidence is dealt with below.) The Chamber now turns to the question of the corroboration of testimonies.
43. The Chamber recalls that it is bound only to the application of the provisions of its Statute and Rules, in particular Rule 89 of the Rules. Rule 89 sets out the general principle of the admissibility of any relevant evidence which has probative value, provided that such evidence meets the requirements for the conduct of a fair trial. The Chamber may rule on the basis of a single testimony if, in its opinion, that testimony is relevant and credible.
44. The manner of application of the only Rule which deals specifically with the issue of corroboration of testimony, Rule 96(i) - which states that no corroboration shall be required for the testimonies of victims of sexual assault - was also raised during the trial.
45. The Chamber recalls that, as is stated in the Akayesu Judgement(18) and the Rutaganda Judgement (19), sub-Rule 96(i) accords to the testimony of a victim of sexual assault the same basis of evaluation of reliability as the testimony of victims of other crimes. In the opinion of the Chamber, it cannot be concluded on the basis of this sub-Rule that in cases of crimes other than sexual assault, corroboration is required; nor does it follow from the sub-Rule, as Counsel for the Defence argued in this case, that corroboration is required where a witness is testifying to the occurrence of a sexual assault. On the contrary, it is proper to infer that the ability of the Chamber to rule on the basis of testimonies and other evidence is not bound by any rule of corroboration, but rather on the Chamber's own assessment of the probative value of the evidence before it.
46. The Chamber may freely assess the relevance and credibility of all evidence presented to it. The Chamber notes that this freedom to assess evidence extends even to those testimonies which are corroborated: the corroboration of testimonies, even by many witnesses, does not establish absolutely the credibility of those testimonies.

Corroboration in relation to Count 3 (Conspiracy to Commit Genocide)

47. The Chamber notes that this freedom extends to evidence pertaining to a Count of Conspiracy to Commit Genocide, as is present in the Indictment in the instant case. The Chamber notes that the probative value of the testimony of alleged co-conspirators will be assessed in relation to its credibility and relevance, on the same basis as other evidence.

5740

48. However, the presence of a Count of Conspiracy to Commit Genocide may allow the admission of evidence which does not pertain specifically to the facts alleged in the Indictment, since such evidence may serve to establish the existence of and/or the participation of the Accused in the conspiracy alleged in the Indictment. In particular, evidence relating to the acts and declarations of fellow members of the alleged conspiracy performed or made in pursuance of the objects of the conspiracy may have probative value, and may, as a result, be deemed admissible, though such evidence does not pertain to facts alleged in the Indictment.
49. The admissibility of such evidence shall, as shall all other evidence, be determined through reference to the criteria of relevance and probative value, under Rule 89(C) of the Rules. Relevance is to be assessed through reference to the nexus between the evidence and the existence and/or commission of the conspiracy. As Judge Pal said in the Tokyo Judgement, speaking only of declarations and not acts:

"In order to be competent as evidence the declaration must have been made in furtherance of the prosecution of the common object, or must constitute a part of the res gestae of some act done for the accomplishment of the object of the conspirators, otherwise such a statement should not be competent evidence against the others."(20)

50. The extent to which such evidence will prove merely the existence of a conspiracy, rather than the participation of the Accused in that conspiracy, will be a matter of assessment by the Chamber.

Hearsay evidence

51. The Chamber notes that hearsay evidence is not inadmissible per se, even when it cannot be examined at its source or when it is not corroborated by direct evidence. Rather, the Chamber has considered such hearsay evidence, with caution, in accordance with Rule 89. The Chamber further notes that, where it has relied upon such evidence, that evidence has, as with all other evidence, been subject to the tests of relevance, probative value and reliability discussed above.

Evidence not presented

1. The value of the evidence presented to the Chamber is in no way altered by the non-provision of other evidence(21). The Chamber is free to evaluate all evidence before it on the basis of its relevance and probative value. The absence of forensic or real evidence shall in no way diminish the probative value of the evidence which is provided to the Chamber; in particular, the absence of forensic evidence corroborating eyewitness testimonies shall in no way affect the assessment of those testimonies, the relevance, reliability and probative value of which shall be assessed as discussed above. Similarly, the failure of one Party to present evidence to the Chamber shall not in any way affect the Chamber's assessment of the probative value of such evidence if it is presented by the other Party(22).

2.2.2 The Assessment of Documentary Evidence

53. Documentary evidence consists of documents produced as evidence for evaluation by the Tribunal. For the purposes of this case, the term "document" is interpreted broadly, being understood to mean anything in which information of any description is recorded. This interpretation is wide enough to cover not only documents in writing, but also maps, sketches, plans, calendars, graphs, drawings, computerized records, mechanical records, electro-magnetic records, digital records, databases, sound tracks, audio-tapes, video-tapes, photographs, slides and negatives. Many, though not all, of these types of documents were produced in this case by both Parties in support of their respective cases.

54. Considered as a distinct form of evidence, documentary evidence raises a number of particular issues, both in the assessment of its admissibility and the assessment of its probative value.

The burden of proof in relation to admissibility

55. The Chamber notes that in order for a document to be admissible as evidence, the Party that seeks to rely on the document must first prove that it meets with the standards of relevance and probative value (discussed above) laid out by sub-Rule 89(C). In other words, the burden of proof of the reliability (which, as discussed above, "runs through" the criteria of admissibility, namely relevance and probative value) of the document lies on the Party that seeks to rely on the document. When documents are admitted with the consent of both Parties, as has occurred in the instant case, the issue of proof of reliability does not arise. A similar situation arises when a document is admitted by way of judicial notice, as a "fact of common knowledge" under Rule 94, since no proof of the fact is required. When, however, the reliability of documentary evidence is questioned, the issue arises as to the required standard of proof of reliability for the admission of evidence.
56. With certain exceptions, discussed below, the Chamber is of the opinion that the standard of proof required to establish the reliability of documentary evidence is proof on the balance of probabilities. The admission of evidence requires, under sub-Rule 89(C), the establishment in the evidence of some relevance and some probative value. Accordingly, the standard of proof required for admissibility should be lower than the standard of proof required in the final determination of the matter at hand through the weighing up of the probative value of all the evidence before the Chamber. The admission of evidence does not require the ascertainment of the exact probative value of the evidence by the Chamber; that comes later. Admission requires simply the proof that the evidence has some probative value. Different standards of proof are appropriate for the process of admission and the process of determining the exact probative value of the same evidence.
57. Furthermore, the determination of admissibility does not go to the issue of credibility, but merely reliability. Accordingly, documentary evidence may be assessed, on the balance of probabilities, to be reliable, and as a result admitted. Later, that same evidence may be found, after examination by the Chamber, not to be credible.(23)
58. The circumstances which give rise to exceptions to this general rule include (but are not limited to) those circumstances in which the rights of the Accused are threatened by the admission of the evidence in question, or wherever the allegations about the unreliability of the evidence demand for admissibility the most exacting standard, consistent with the allegations. In such cases, a standard of proof of "beyond reasonable doubt" may, in the opinion of the Chamber, be justified. (24)

Probative Value

59. The Chamber notes that the general principles governing the assessment of the probative value of documentary evidence do not differ in any way from the general principles governing the assessment of the probative value of evidence presented in other forms. Documentary evidence is assessed in accordance with the Rules, in particular Rule 89.

60. Notwithstanding this commonality of general principles, the Chamber notes that the means by which credibility (and to a lesser extent relevance) will be assessed do differ according to the form and nature of the evidence before the Chamber. The Chamber has considered a number of factors specific to documentary evidence in assessing the credibility of this evidence. These are discussed in detail below.
61. Distinct from the question of the authenticity of a document is the issue of the relationship between the document and its source, or authorship. Many national, and indeed some previous international, jurisdictions, have disallowed evidence which is deemed "self-serving": that is, those documents written or produced by one Party (usually by the Accused) in order to support, in a propagandistic way, his or her own claims(25).
62. The Chamber has deemed it inappropriate to exclude such evidence unless, as sub-Rule 89© suggests, it is deemed either irrelevant or devoid of probative value.
63. The Chamber notes, nevertheless, that the source of a document may, taken in context, impact upon the assessment of the reliability or credibility (or both) of the document. For example, evidence produced in support of a defence of alibi from a source other than the Accused may be of greater probative value than evidence provided or produced by the Accused. While noting this, the Chamber emphasizes that such an understanding of the relationship between the source of documentary evidence and its probative value must in no way be interpreted as a presumption of the guilt of the Accused. The Chamber has not, in any way, allowed its assessment of the probative value of documentary evidence to interfere with the right of the accused to a fair trial.
64. Central to the establishment of the credibility and reliability of documentary evidence is the establishment (by the Party that seeks to rely on the document) of the authenticity of the document, and of its contents. The central importance of authenticity in the Tribunal's assessment process is manifest in sub-Rule 89(D) of the Rules, which states that a Chamber may request verification of the authenticity of evidence obtained out of court.
65. In assessing the authenticity of these documents and their contents, the Chamber has, as with all forms of evidence, relied on its power under sub-Rule 89(C) to admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value. In particular, it has acted under sub-Rule 89(B), applying rules of evidence which will best favour a fair determination of the matter before it and are consonant with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law.
66. In assessing the authenticity of documentary evidence, the Chamber has taken into account, amongst other factors, the form, contents and purported use of the document, and the position of the Parties thereon.
67. Form includes such matters as:

- whether the document provided to the Chamber is an original or a copy. Originals will, as a general rule, have a higher probative value than copies;

- whether, a document being a copy, is in any way registered or enrolled with some institutional authority;
- whether the document is signed, sealed, certified, stamped or in any other way officially authorized by some authority or organization;

- whether or not the document has been duly executed. In general terms this involves showing that it was written, produced or authorized by the person or party by whom it purports to be written, produced or authorized.

68. Resolution of such matters may be effected by the Chamber through a variety of means, pursuant to sub-Rule 89(D), which states that a Chamber may request verification of the authenticity of evidence obtained out of court. The means available to the Chamber are limited by sub-Rule 89 (B), which states that a Chamber shall apply rules of evidence which will best favour the fair determination of the matter before it and are consonant with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law. Accordingly, while the Chamber may order the production of a sample of a witness' handwriting for purposes of comparison against documentary evidence, it cannot order such a sample to be produced from the Accused against his or her will, since such an order would compel the Accused to testify against himself or herself(26).

5743

69. The Chamber notes that among the means available to the Chamber to resolve such matters of form is resort to expert testimony.

Other factors affecting probative value:

70. The content of a document may be direct evidence of the existence of a fact or a state of affairs, and of the authenticity of the document itself. The probative value of the content of a document will be assessed by the Chamber in light of all the circumstances of the case, including its relation to oral testimony given before the Chamber pertaining to the content of the document.
71. Similarly, the purported use of the document, whether provided by the content of the document, its form, or oral testimony, may, in certain circumstances, be relevant in the assessment of the authenticity and the probative value of the document.
72. While all of these factors are relevant in assessing the authenticity and probative value of documentary evidence, other factors may also be considered. Further, in assessing authenticity, the Chamber observes that as a general rule, it is insufficient to rely on any one factor alone as proof or disproof of the authenticity of the document. Authenticity must be established through reference to all relevant factors.

The relationship between oral testimony and documentary evidence:

73. In many instances in this case, doubt as to the probative value of a document has arisen not through the form or content of the document, but through inconsistencies between the document and oral testimony rendered before the Chamber. The Chamber wishes, therefore, to address this matter in detail.
74. Concerning the question of oral testimony as "corroboration" of documentary evidence, the Chamber notes the following matters.
75. In assessing the probative value of the documents submitted, the Chamber has distinguished between those documents of which the form, contents and purported use are found to be supported by secondary evidence, primarily oral testimony, and those documents which are found to lack secondary support. Any evidence which is supported by other evidence logically possesses a greater probative value than evidence which stands alone, unless both pieces of evidence are not credible. Accordingly, oral testimony may serve to support, or "corroborate", documentary evidence. The Chamber notes that this approach is wholly in accord with its stated views on the free assessment of evidence and the use of corroborating evidence, and with Rule 89 of the Rules.
76. The Chamber notes that such an approach to the assessment of the probative value of documentary evidence is supported by earlier practice in international criminal proceedings. In the Tokyo Judgement of 1946,(28) Judge Pal stated that "where a written instrument is not a fact in issue but only a piece of evidence in proof of some act, other independent evidence is admissible"(29). In relying on this statement as authority for its approach to the assessment of documentary evidence, the Chamber notes that many of the documents submitted as evidence in this case unambiguously fall into the second category to which Judge Pal made reference - that of "evidence in proof of some other act". The Chamber notes further that the principles outlined by Judge Pal in relation to admissibility are applicable to the assessment of probative value, since what is at stake in both situations is the reliability of the evidence in question.

5744

77. Judge Pal went on to discuss the use of extrinsic evidence in the interpretation of written instruments:

"The words of a written instrument may, to all appearance, appear to be free from ambiguity in themselves. Yet external circumstances may create some doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of the words. In such cases the question of construction may admit of extrinsic evidence.

Whether it be 'the intention of the writer' or 'the meaning of the words', the aim really is to ascertain the true nature of the transaction. Neither 'intention' nor meaning of the words can be the sole object. The primary object is to determine what it was that was really intended and the primary source of determining such intention is the language used"(30).

78. This statement further supports the rule that oral testimony, or other independent evidence, may be used to "corroborate" documentary evidence. Since documentary evidence is not limited to written material, the use of independent or secondary evidence to "corroborate" documentary evidence should not be limited to those situations where the ambiguity or uncertainty arises from the words.
79. The Chamber finds that independent evidence may be used to "corroborate", support, prove or disprove the authenticity and probative value of documentary evidence, once that independent evidence has been admitted. This principle is not limited to the use of oral testimony in supporting documentary evidence: it permits the use of multiple documents in mutual support (for example the combined use of maps, photographs and videos), and it also permits the use of documentary evidence in support of oral testimony.
80. The Chamber notes that the use of documents in support of oral testimony will extend to the use of documents as aides mémoires to refresh the memory of witnesses. However, where documents appear to be used not simply to refresh the memory of the witness, but as a crutch without which the testimony of the witness would fall, the Chamber notes that the credibility of the witness and the probative value of his or her testimony may be undermined.
81. Concerning the question of the assessment of prior statements, the Chamber notes the following.
82. Firstly, it notes that a significant problem arises where the oral testimony of a witness contradicts, or is inconsistent with, prior statements made by the witness which have been admitted as documentary evidence into the proceedings.
83. Secondly, the Chamber also notes that the probative value of the respective pieces of evidence will, in part, depend on the conditions under which the prior statement was provided, as well as on other factors relevant to, or indicia of, the prior statement's reliability or credibility, or both. Accordingly, the Chamber will address separately three classes of prior testimony submitted as documentary evidence in this case:
    1. witness statements and other non-judicial testimonies;
    2. testimonies before this Tribunal; and
    3. statements before other judicial bodies.

84. Firstly, regarding witness statements and other non-judicial testimonies, the Chamber notes that a large number of witnesses who appeared before the Chamber in this case had previously made statements, which included witness declarations and, in one case, a radio interview(31).
85. The Chamber has evaluated the probative value of such testimonies in light of the circumstances in which they were made, and in view of other factors pertaining to the reliability of the testimonies. The circumstances it has taken into consideration include such matters as: the language in which the testimony was made or in which the interview was conducted; the access of the Chamber to transcripts of the testimonies or the interviews, and its corresponding ability to scrutinise the nature of the questions put to a witness; the accuracy of interpretation and transcription; the time lapse between the prior testimonies and the testimony at trial; the difficulties of recollection; the use or non-use of solemn declarations; and the fact of whether or not a witness had read or reviewed the statement at the time at which it was made(32).

5745

86. In light of these factors, it is the Chamber's opinion that the probative value of such prior witness statements is, generally, lower than the probative value of positive oral testimony before a Court of law, where such testimony has been subjected to the test of cross-examination.
87. Secondly, regarding testimonies before this Tribunal, in accordance with this principle of assessing prior statements in the light of the circumstances in which those statements were provided, the Chamber must confront the situation, which arose in this case, where the testimony of a witness appears to conflict with a prior statement made by the same witness before this Tribunal in separate proceedings.
88. The Chamber notes that in such cases, witnesses may have provided conflicting evidence under solemn declaration. The Chamber will, in accordance with the general principles of the assessment of evidence discussed above, assess such evidence on a case-by-case basis. It will address the admissibility of such evidence, and, in evaluating the probative value of the evidence, will address the explanations given by the witness for the discrepancies between his or her testimonies, and the materiality of such apparent discrepancies.
89. The Chamber further notes that inconsistency between two testimonies of the same witness, both given under solemn declaration, affects the credibility and reliability of the later testimony.
90. Where a conflict between testimonies exists, it is not the task of the Chamber to assess the credibility and reliability of the testimony in the earlier proceedings (for example the Kayishema and Ruzindana case), since these issues have been determined previously (and possibly, as in this case, by another Trial Chamber) in light of all the information available to it.
91. Thirdly, the Chamber notes that the issue of the assessment of the probative value of prior statements made before other judicial bodies arose in this case in relation to the "Swiss Files". The "Swiss Files" is the name given in this trial to the transcripts of interviews given by the Accused to a Swiss juge d'instruction following his arrest in Switzerland on 11 February 1995. The "Swiss Files" include eight voluntary statements and a number of accompanying documents, all submitted as evidence by the Prosecution, with the consent of the Defence(33). The truth and probative value of the "Swiss Files" were not in question, to the extent that the files establish an accurate account of the interviews conducted by the Swiss authorities. However, both the Prosecutor and the Defence did, at different points in the Trial, contest the truth of Musema's prior statements and the probative value of some of the documents, contained in those Files.
92. In assessing the probative value of the "Swiss Files", the Chamber has relied on the general principle discussed above, taking into account the circumstances and conditions in which the documents were produced.
93. The Chamber makes two further observations relevant to the assessment of the probative value of such evidence.
94. Firstly, the Chamber notes that judicial testimonies (and other testimonies made under oath or solemn declaration) tend, as a general rule, to demonstrate greater reliability than non-judicial testimonies(34).
95. Secondly, the Chamber notes that the probative value of such evidence must be assessed in the light of the minimum standards expected by the Tribunal for the production of such evidence. These minimum standards provide a general yardstick against which the Chamber is able to measure the reliability of such evidence. However, the standards which comprise this yardstick differ according to the nature of the interview or investigation.
96. Rules 42 and 43 establish the standard expected of an interview of a suspect by the Prosecutor. These Rules do not, however, specifically address interviews of the Accused by someone other than the Prosecutor, or interviews involving witnesses.
97. The issue then arises as to what standards constitute the yardstick against which the probative value of evidence obtained in such interviews may be assessed. The Chamber finds that the relevant standards are embodied in Rules 39(i), 39(ii), 42, 43 and 95, which should be read together. These Rules provide the minimum standards constituting the yardstick against which both the admissibility and probative value of pre-Trial interview testimonies should be measured (35).

5746

2.2.3 False testimony

98. On a number of occasions in this case direct, or indirect, implications were made by one of the Parties that one or more of the witnesses had deliberately or otherwise misled the Chamber. The Chamber notes that such submissions, if seriously intended as allegations of false testimony, should be submitted to the Tribunal in proper motion form, under Rule 91(B).
99. The Chamber reaffirms its position that false testimony is a deliberate offence, which presupposes wilful intent on the part of the perpetrator to mislead the Judges and thus to cause harm(37), and a miscarriage of justice. In such a motion, the onus is on the party pleading the case of false testimony to prove the falsehood of the witness' statements and to prove either that these statements were made with harmful intent or that they were made by a witness who was fully aware both of their falsehood and of their possible bearing upon the Judge's decision. In order to establish a strong basis for believing that the witness may have knowingly and wilfully given false testimony, it is insufficient to raise only doubt as to the credibility of the statements made by the witness. The Chamber affirms its opinion that, inaccurate statements cannot, on their own, constitute false testimony; an element of wilful intent to give false testimony must exist. As the Appeals Chamber has previously confirmed(38), there is an important distinction between testimony that is incredible and testimony which constitutes false testimony. The testimony of a witness may, for one reason or another, lack credibility even if it does not amount to false testimony within the meaning of Rule 91(39).

2.2.4 The impact of trauma on the testimony of witnesses

100. Many of the witnesses who testified before the Chamber in this case have seen or have experienced terrible atrocities. They, their family or their friends have, in many cases, been the victims of such atrocities. The trauma that may have arisen, and may continue to arise, from such experiences is a matter of grave concern to the Chamber. The Chamber notes that recounting and revisiting such painful experiences is likely to be a source of great pain to the witness, and may also affect her or his ability fully or adequately, to recount the relevant events in a judicial context. The Chamber has, accordingly, considered the testimony of those witnesses in this light.
101. The Chamber also notes that some of the witnesses who testified before it may, in its opinion, have suffered, or may continue to suffer stress-related disorders. The Chamber has assessed the testimonies of such witnesses, in light of this possibility, and has taken into account their personal background and the nature of the atrocities to which they may have been subjected(40).

2.2.5 Interpretation

102. The Chamber notes the difficulties presented by the consecutive translation of three languages (Kinyarwanda, French and English) in assessing evidence. In particular, it notes the significant syntactical and grammatical differences between the three languages. These difficulties have been taken into consideration by the Chamber in its assessment of all evidence presented to it, including evidence for which the source was not available for examination by the Chamber.

5747

2.2.6 Cultural factors affecting the evidence of witnesses

103. The testimonies of many of the witnesses in this case were affected by cultural factors. The Chamber has not drawn any adverse conclusions regarding the credibility of witnesses when cultural constraints appeared to induce them to answer indirectly certain questions regarded as delicate. Further, the Chamber recalls that the assessment of all evidence tendered to it is conducted in accordance with the Rules, in particular Rule 89. Accordingly, as the Chamber noted earlier, evidence which appears to be "second-hand" is not, in and of itself, inadmissible; rather it is assessed, like all other evidence, on the basis of its credibility and relevance. While there appears, as the Defence argued, to be in Rwandan culture a "tradition that the perceived knowledge of one becomes the knowledge of all"(41), the Chamber notes that, as in other cultures, Rwandan individuals are clearly able to distinguish between what they have heard and what they have seen(42). The Chamber made a consistent effort to ensure that this distinction was drawn throughout the trial, and has taken such matters into careful consideration in assessing the evidence before it.
104. Finally, the Chamber notes the impact on the testimony of witnesses of cultural factors relating to the use of documents and the witnesses' unfamiliarity with spatio-temporal identification mechanisms and techniques. Certain witnesses had difficulty in being specific as to dates, times, distances and locations, and appeared unfamiliar with the use of maps, films, photographs and other graphic representations. The Chamber has carefully considered witnesses' responses in light of this understanding. It has not drawn any adverse conclusions regarding the credibility of a witness based only on a witness' reticence or circuitousness in responding to questions of such a nature; however, it has taken the accuracy and other relevant elements of such responses into account when assessing such evidence.
105. The Chamber further notes that sensitivity has, and should, be shown by the Parties in addition to the Bench, in relation to these cultural factors. This sensitivity should extend not only to courtroom proceedings but also to the gathering and preparation of evidence. The Chamber notes that it is not in the interests of either Party, let alone the Tribunal, to require witnesses to utilize identification mechanisms which are not familiar to them when other alternatives are readily available to the Parties. In particular, the Chamber draws attention to the use of aerial photography by the Prosecutor(43).

2.3 The Defence of alibi

106. Pursuant to Rule 67 (A) of the Rules, ("Reciprocal Disclosure of Evidence"), the Prosecutor shall, as early as reasonably practicable and in any event prior to the commencement of the trial, notify the Defence of the names of the witnesses that he intends to call to establish the guilt of the accused, and in rebuttal of any defence plea of which the Prosecutor has received notice. The Defence shall notify the Prosecutor of its intent to enter the defence of alibi, in which case the notification shall specify the place or places at which the accused claims to have been present at the time of the alleged crime and the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the alibi.
107. Pursuant to Rule 67 (B), failure of the Defence to provide notice under Rule 67(A) shall not limit the right of the accused to rely on the defence of alibi. Although this Rule prevails, the Chamber notes that failure to provide notice may be relevant to the judicial consideration of the merits of the defence. In the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, Trial Chamber II noted:

"Where good cause is not shown, for the application of Rule 67(B), the Trial Chamber is entitled to take into account this failure when weighing the credibility of the defence of alibi and/or any special defence presented."(44)

108. In raising the defence of alibi, the Accused not only denies that he committed the crimes for which he is charged but also asserts that he was elsewhere than at the scene of these crimes when they were committed. The onus is on the Prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the Accused. In establishing its case, when an alibi defence is introduced, the Prosecution must prove, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the accused was present and committed the crimes for which he is charged and thereby discredit the alibi defence. The alibi defence does not carry a separate burden of proof. If the defence is reasonably possibly true, it must be successful.

1. See "Application by the Prosecutor for a formal request for deferral by Switzerland concerning Musema Alfred", Case No. ICTR-96-5-D, (4 March 1996).

2. See "Decision on the formal request for deferral presented by the Prosecutor", Case No. ICTR-96-5-D, (12 March 1996).

3. See "Decision on the review of the Indictment", Case No. ICTR-96-13-I, (15 July 1996).

4. See "Warrant of Arrest, Order for Surrender", Case No. ICTR-96-13-I.

5. See "Warning and notice to Counsel in terms of Rule 46(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence", Case No. ICTR-96-13-I, (31 October 1997).

6. See "Decision to withdraw counsel and to allow the Prosecutor to redact identifying information of her witnesses",Case No. ICTR-96-13-I, (18 November 1997).

7. See infra.

8. See "Prosecutor's request for leave to file an amended indictment"(Case No. ICTR-96-13-I), dated 30 October 1998; "Brief in support of Prosecutor's request for leave to file an amended indictment", Case No. ICTR-96-13-I, (30 October 1998); "Amended Indictment", Case No. ICTR-96-13-I, (filed 3 November 1998).

9. See "Decision on the Prosecutor's request for leave to amend the Indictment"(Case No. ICTR-96-13-I), dated 18 November 1998.

10. See "Decision on the Prosecutor's Motion for Witness Protection",Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (20 November 1998).

11. See "Decision on an Application by African Concern for Leave to Appear as an Amicus Curiae", Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (17 March 1999).

12. See "Decision on the Prosecutor's Request for Leave to Amend the Indictment", Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (6 May 1999).

13. See "Decision on the Prosecutor's Request for Leave to Call Six New Witnesses", Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (20 April 1999), and "Decision on the Motion of the Defence for Two Additional Witnesses and for Witness Protection", Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (6 May 1999).

14. See "Order for Temporary Transfer of Three Detained Witnesses (Q, L, AB) Pursuant to Rule 90*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence", Case No. ICTR-96-13-T, (19 April 1999).

15. The Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadi. See "Decision on Defense Motion on Hearsay", Case No. IT-94-1-T (5 August 1996).

16. The Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delali, Zdravko Muci a/k/a "Pavo", Hazim Deli and Esad Lando a/k/a "Zenga". See "Decision on the Prosecution's Oral Requests for the Admission of Exhibit 155 into Evidence and for an Order to Compel the Accused, Zdravko Muci, to Provide a Handwriting Sample", Case No. IT-96-21-T (21 January 1998) (RP D5395-D5419).

17. Id. para. 32.

5764

18. Akayesu Judgement, para. 134.

19. Rutaganda Judgement, para. 17.

20. The International Military Tribunal for the Far East (29 April 1946 - 12 November 1948). See Röling, B.V.A and Rüter, C.F. (eds), The Tokyo Judgment, vol. II (Amsterdam, APA-University Press Amsterdam BV, 1977), p. 630.

21. Although the provision of copies of documentary evidence where originals appear to be available may constitute an exception to this general rule. See further below.

22. Notwithstanding this observation, the Chamber recalls the duties on both parties to disclose evidence of which they have knowledge, subject to Rules 66, 67 and 68.

23. As it was stated by the ICTY in Decision on the Motion of the Prosecution for the Admissibility of Evidence (21 January 1998) (RP D5423-D5440, RP D5431):

"the mere admission of a document into evidence does not in and of itself signify that the statements contained therein will necessarily be deemed to be an accurate portrayal of the facts."

24. See "Decision on Zdravko Muci's Motion for the Exclusion of Evidence", IT-96-21-T (2 September 1997) (RP D5082-D5105)), where the ICTY found that the Prosecution bore a burden to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the evidence they sought to admit was obtained voluntarily and not in any way that contradicted the right of the Accused to a fair trial.

25. See e.g. the discussion of Judge Pal in the Decision of The International Military Tribunal for the Far East, fn. 23, supra, pp. 638, 641-5, note 7.

26. See "Decision on the Prosecution's Oral Requests for the Admission of Exhibit 155 into Evidence and for an Order to Compel the Accused, Zdravko Muci, to Provide a Handwriting Sample", IT-96-21-T (21 January 1998) (RP D5395-D5419). It is to be expected that a Chamber would be unable to make any other order which involved a similar self-condemnation by the accused, such as ordering the accused to speak certain words in the presence of a witness for the purposes of aural identification[27]

27. Ibid.

28. The International Military Tribunal for the Far East, fn. 23, supra.

29. Id., p. 640.

30. Id., p. 653.

31. Defence Closing Argument (28 June 1999).

32. See further Akayesu Judgement, para. 134; Rutaganda Judgement, para. 19.

33. Prosecution Closing Argument (25 June 1999).

34. See R. v. B. (K.G.) (1993), 79 C.C.C. (3d) 257.

35. The Chamber is of a similar mind to that of the Trial Chamber of the ICTY in "Decision on Zdravko Muci's Motion for the Exclusion of Evidence", IT-96-21-T (RP D5082-D5105) where it stated:

"43 ....Rule 42 embodies the essential provisions of the right to a fair hearing as enshrined in Article 14(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 6(3)(c) of the European Convention on Human Rights. These are the internationally accepted basic and fundamental rights accorded to the individual to enable the enjoyment of a right to a fair hearing during trial. It seems to us extremely difficult for a statement taken in violation of Rule 42 to fall within Rule 95 which protects the integrity of the proceedings by the non-admissibility of evidence obtained by methods which cast substantial doubts on its reliability.

- The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that the surest way to protect the integrity of the proceedings is to read both Rules 42 and 95 together. We read Rule 95 as a summary of the provisions in the Rules, which enable the exclusion of evidence antithetical to and damaging, and thereby protecting the integrity of the proceedings. We regard it as a residual exclusionary provision."(36)

36. Ibid, paras 43, 44.

37. Rutaganda Judgement, para. 20.

38. See The Prosecutor v. Georges Anderson Nderubumwe Rutaganda, ICTR-96-3-T, "Decision on Appeals Against the Decisions by Trial Chamber I Rejecting the Defence Motions to Direct the Prosecutor to Investigate the Matter of False Testimony by witnesses 'E' and 'CC'" (8 June 1998) para. 28.

39. Rutaganda Judgement, para. 20.

40. Akayesu Judgement, paras 142-156.

41. Defence Closing Argument (28 June 1999).

42. Akayesu Judgement, para. 155.

43. See Prosecution exhibits P 20.1 - P 20.10.

44. See Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement

5757

3. THE APPLICABLE LAW

3.1 Individual criminal responsibility (Article 6 of the Statute)

3.2 The Crime of Genocide (Article 2 of the Statute)

3.2.1 Genocide

3.2.2 Complicity in Genocide

3.2.3 Conspiracy to Commit Genocide

3.3 Crime against Humanity (Article 3 of the Statute)

3.4.Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

3.5 Cumulative charges

3.1 Individual criminal responsibility (Article 6 of the Statute)

109. The Accused is charged under Article 6(1) of the Statute with individual criminal responsibility for all the crimes alleged in the Indictment and under Article 6(3) of the Statute for acts committed by his subordinates.
110. The Chamber will now examine these two forms of criminal responsibility.

3.1.1 Individual criminal responsibility (Article 6(1) of the Statute)

111. Article 6(1) of the Statute provides that: "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime."
112. In the Akayesu Judgement(1), the Chamber issued an opinion on the principle of individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute. The reasoning of this opinion is similar to that in the Tadic(2), Celebici(3), Kayishema and Ruzindana,(4) and Rutaganda(5) Judgements.
113. The Chamber finds that the aforementioned case-law regarding the principle of individual criminal responsibility, as articulated notably in the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, is sufficiently established and is applicable in the instant case.
114. The Chamber notes that, under Article 6(1), an accused person may incur individual criminal responsibility as a result of five forms of participation in the commission of one of the three crimes referred to in the Statute. Article 6(1) covers different stages in the commission of a crime, ranging from its initial planning to its execution.
115. The Chamber observes that the principle of individual criminal responsibility, under Article 6(1), implies that the planning or the preparation of a crime actually must lead to its commission. However, the Chamber notes that Article 2(3) of the Statute, pertaining to the crime of genocide, foresees the possibility for the Tribunal to prosecute attempted genocide, among other acts. Since attempt is by definition an inchoate crime, inherent in the criminal conduct per se, it may be punishable as a separate crime irrespective of whether or not the intended crime is accomplished.
116. Consequently, the Chamber holds that an accused may incur individual criminal responsibility for inchoate offences under Article 2(3) of the Statute but that, conversely, a person engaging in any form of participation in other crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, such as crimes covered under Articles 3 and 4 of the Statute, may incur criminal responsibility only if the intended crime is accomplished.

117. The Chamber finds that in addition to incurring responsibility as a principal offender, the accused may also be liable for criminal acts committed by others if, for example, he planned such acts, instigated another to commit them, ordered that they be committed, or aided and abetted another in the commission of such acts.
118. The Chamber defines five forms of criminal participation under Article 6(1) as follows:
119. The first form of participation, planning of a crime, implies that one or more persons contemplate the commission of a crime at both its preparatory and execution phases.
120. The second form of participation, incitement to commit a crime, involves instigating another, directly and publicly, to commit an offence. Instigation is punishable only where it leads to the actual commission of an offence intended by the instigator, except with genocide, where an accused may be held individually criminally liable for incitement to commit genocide under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute, even where such incitement fails to produce a result.(6)
121. The third form of participation, ordering, implies a superior-subordinate relationship between the person giving the order and the one executing it, with the person in a position of authority using such position to persuade another to commit a crime.
122. The fourth form of participation in which an accused incurs criminal responsibility is where he actually commits one of the crimes within the jurisdiction ratione materiae of the Tribunal.
123. The Chamber holds that an accused may participate in the commission of a crime either through direct commission of an unlawful act or by omission, where he has a duty to act.
124. The fifth and last form of participation where individual criminal responsibility arises under Article 6(1) is "otherwise aid[ing] and abett[ing] in the planning, preparation, or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4".
125. The Chamber is of the view that aiding and abetting alone may be sufficient to render the accused criminally liable. In both instances, it is not necessary that the person aiding and abetting another to commit an offence be present during the commission of the crime. The relevant act of assistance may be geographically and temporally unconnected to the actual commission of the crime.
126. The Chamber holds that aiding and abetting include all acts of assistance in the form of either physical or moral support; nevertheless, it emphasizes that any act of participation must substantially contribute to the commission of the crime. The aider and abettor assists or facilitates another in the accomplishment of a substantive offence.

3.1.2 Responsibility of the Superior for Subordinates

127. Article 6(3) of the Statute provides that :

"The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was commited by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsiblity if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof."

128. The principle enunciating the responsibility of command derives from the principle of individual criminal responsiblity as applied by the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals. It was subsequently codified in Article 86 of the Additional Protocol I of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 1949.
129. It is significant to note that there are varying views regarding the mens rea required for command responsibility. According to one view, mens rea derives from the legal concept of strict liability that is, the superior is criminally responsible for acts committed by his subordinates solely on the basis of his position of responsibility, with no need to prove the criminal intent of the superior.

Another view holds that the superior's negligence, which is so serious as to be tantamount to consent or criminal intent, is a lesser requirement to establish the accused's mens rea.

130. Another position was articulated in one of the "Commentaries on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949", which provides that the mens rea required, as an essential element, to establish superior responsibility "must be so serious that it is tantamount to malicious intent, apart from any link between the conduct in question and the damage that took place."(7)

131. The Chamber reiterates its determination in the Akayesu Judgement, where it found that the requisite mens rea of any crime is the accused's criminal intent. This requirement, which amounts to at least a negligence that is so serious as to be tantamount to acquiescence, also applies in determining the individual criminal responsibility of a person accused of crimes defined in the Statute, for which it is certainly proper to ensure that there existed malicious intent, or, at least, to ensure that the accused's negligence was so serious as to be tantamount to acquiescence or even malicious intent.

132. As to whether the form of individual criminal responsibility referred to under Article 6(3) of the Statute also applies to persons in both military and civilian authority, it is important to note that during the Tokyo Trials, civilian authorities were convicted of war crimes under this principle.

133. Thus Hirota, former Foreign Minister of Japan, was convicted, inter alia of mass rape, known as the "Rape of Nanking", under a count that he had "recklessly disregarded" his legal duty by virtue of his offices to take adequate steps to secure the observance and prevent breaches of law and customs of war. The Tokyo Tribunal held that:

"Hirota was derelict in his duty in not insisting before the Cabinet that immediate action be taken to put an end to the atrocities, failing any other action open to him to bring about the same result. He was content to rely on assurances which he knew were not being implemented while hundreds of murders, violations of women and other atrocities were being committed daily. His inaction amounted to criminal negligence."(8)

134. Judge Roling, dissenting from this finding, held that Hirota should have been acquitted, insofar as:

"[...] a Tribunal should be very careful in holding civil government officials responsible for the behaviour of the army in the field. Moreover, the Tribunal is here to apply the general principles of law as they exist with relation to the responsibility for 'omissions'. Considerations of both law and policies of [...] justice [...] indicate that this responsibility should only be recognized in a very restricted sense."

135. In view of such disparate legal interpretations, it is disputable whether the principle of individual criminal responsibility, articulated in Article 6 (3) of the Statute, should be applied to civilians. Accordingly, the Chamber reiterates its reasoning in the Akayesu Judgement, with which Trial Chamber II concurred in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, that it is appropriate to assess on a case-by-case basis the power of authority actually devolved on an accused to determine whether or not he possessed the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish their perpetration. Therefore the superior's actual or formal power of control over his subordinates remains a determining factor in charging civilians with superior responsibility.

136. As the Judges of the Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia observed in Celebici, (with whom Chamber II concurred in Kayishema and Ruzindana), in explaining their reasoning on the application of the principle of the superior-subordinate relationship to persons in non-military positions of authority:

"[N]o express limitation is made restricting the scope of this type of responsibility to military commanders or situations arising under a military command. [The principle of superior-subordinate relationship] extends beyond the responsibility of military commanders to also encompass political leaders and other civilian superiors in positions of authority."(9)

137. In a previous decision, in reviewing the Indictment against an accused, the ICTY articulated a similar finding:

"[T]he Tribunal has particularly valid grounds for exercising its jurisdiction over persons who, through their position of political or military authority, are able to order the commission of crimes falling within its competence ratione materiae or who knowingly refrain from preventing or punishing the perpetrators of such crimes."(10)

138. From an historical and legal perspective, it is significant to consider different reasoning developed since the Second World War regarding the responsibility of non-military superiors for the actions of their subordinates.
139. It is thus important to note the conviction of General Akiro Muto for acts occurring during his tenure as Chief of Staff to General Yamashita at the time of the "Rape of Nanking", in which The Tokyo Tribunal reasoned that influential power, which is not power of formal command, was sufficient basis for charging one with superior responsibility.(11)
140. The influence at issue in a superior - subordinate command relationship often appears in the form of psychological pressure.(12) This is particularly relevant to the case at bar, insofar as Alfred Musema was a socially and politically prominent person in Gisovu Commune.
141. It is also significant to note that a civilian superior may be charged with superior responsibility only where he has effective control, be it de jure or merely de facto, over the persons committing violations of international humanitarian law.
142. In the Herman Roechling Judgement, civilian industrial leaders were found guilty, inter alia, of failing to take action against abuses committed by members of the Gestapo against forced labourers. It appears that the accused had only de facto power insofar as the accused was granted no official authority to issue orders to personnel under Gestapo command. The Superior Tribunal of the Military Government for the French Zone of Occupation in Germany determined that because one of the accused was Herman Roechling's son-in-law, he had de facto influence, which would have allowed him to arrange with the factory police for better treatment of the workers.(13) The Tribunal rejected his defence of ignorance regarding the actions of his subordinates and held that:

"[n]o superior may prefer this defence indefinitely; for it is his duty to know what occurs in his organization and lack of knowledge, therefore, can only be the result of criminal negligence."(14)

143. Such power of control, even if it is merely de facto, generally implies "indirect subordination", which, according to Article 87 of Additonal Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, extends beyond the commander's duty to his direct subordinates to "other persons under his responsiblity," to prevent violations of the Geneva Conventions.(15)
144. In accord with such reasoning that a superior's authority may be merely de facto, deriving from his influence or his indirect power, the determining question is the extent to which Alfred Musema had power of control over persons who a priori were not under his authority during the period from April to July 1994, namely, the soldiers, the Gisovu Commune police, and the Interahamwe.
145. Regarding the criteria to be met to establish superior responsibility of a civilian, it is important to consider the reasoning behind the adoption of Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, which states:

"The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all necessary measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach."(16)

146. During deliberations for adoption of Article 86(2) (which the provisions of Article 6(3) of the ICTR Statute closely resemble in spirit and in form) delegates held that the mental standard "should have known" was too broad and would subject the commander, a posteriori, to arbitrary judgements with respect to what he should have known.(17)
147. Therefore, in an attempt to avoid ambiguities in applying a mental standard to criminal resonsibility, the drafters of Article 86(2) followed juridical and legal textual authorities that do not distinguish between civilian or military superior authority.
148. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that the definition of individual criminal responsibility, as provided under Article 6(3) of the Statute, applies not only to the military but also to persons exercising civilian authority as superiors. Thus the fundamental issue is to determine the extent to which the superior -- notably Alfred Musema -- exercised power, whether de jure or de facto, over the actions of his indirect subordinates.

3.2 The Crime of Genocide (Article 2 of the Statute)

3.2.1 Genocide

149. Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute provides the Tribunal with the power to try crimes of genocide. Accordingly, Musema is charged under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute.
150. The definition of genocide, as provided in Article 2 of the Statute, cites, verbatim, Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (the "Genocide Convention").(18) Article 2(2) of the Statute reads as follows:

> "Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:
>
> (a) Killing members of the group;
>
> (b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
>
> (c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
>
> (d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
>
> (e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group."

151. The Genocide Convention is undeniably considered part of customary international law, as reflected in the advisory opinion issued in 1951 by the International Court of Justice on reservations to the Genocide Convention, and as noted by the United Nations Secretary-General in his Report on the establishment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. (19)

152. The Chamber notes that Rwanda acceded, by legislative decree, to the Convention on Genocide on 12 February 1975(20), and that the crime of genocide was therefore punishable in Rwanda in 1994.
153. The Chamber notes that the crime of genocide has been defined in several cases considered by the Tribunal, notably in the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements. The Chamber adheres to the definition of the crime of genocide as defined in those judgements.
154. The Chamber is therefore of the opinion that for the crime of genocide to be established, it is necessary, firstly, that one of the acts listed under Article 2(2) of the Statute be committed; secondly, that such an act be committed against a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, specifically targeted as such; and, thirdly, that the "act be committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the targeted group".

The acts enumerated under Article 2(2)(a) to (e) of the Statute

155. Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute, like the corresponding provisions of the Genocide Convention, refers to "meurtre" in the French version and to "killing" in the English version. The Chamber believes that the term "killing" includes both intentional and unintentional homicides, whereas the word "meurtre" covers homicide committed with the intent to cause death. The Chamber holds that, given the presumption of the innocence of the Accused, and pursuant to the general principles of criminal law, the version more favourable to the Accused should be adopted. The Chamber therefore finds that Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute must be interpreted in accordance with the definition of murder in the Criminal Code of Rwanda, which provides, under Article 311, that "Homicide committed with intent to cause death shall be treated as murder".
156. For the purposes of interpreting Article 2(2)(b) of the Statute, the Chamber understands the words "serious bodily or mental harm" to include, but not limited to, acts of bodily or mental torture, inhumane or degrading treatment, rape, sexual violence, and persecution. The Chamber is of the opinion that "serious harm" need not entail permanent or irremediable harm.
157. In the Chamber's opinion, the words "deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part", as indicated in Article 2(2)(c) of the Statute, are to be construed "as methods of destruction by which the perpetrator does not necessarily intend to immediately kill the members of the group", but which are, ultimately, aimed at their physical destruction. The Chamber holds that the means of deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction, in whole or in part, include subjecting a group of people to a subsistence diet, systematic expulsion from their homes and deprivation of essential medical supplies below a minimum vital standard.
158. In its interpretation of Article 2(2)(d) of the Statute, the Chamber holds that the words "measures intended to prevent births within the group" should be construed as including sexual mutilation, enforced sterilization, forced birth control, forced separation of males and females, and prohibition of marriages. The Chamber notes that measures intended to prevent births within the group may be not only physical, but also mental.
159. The Chamber is of the opinion that the provisions of Article 2(2)(e) of the Statute, on the forcible transfer of children from one group to another, are aimed at sanctioning not only any direct act of forcible physical transfer, but also any act of threat or trauma which would lead to the forcible transfer.

Potential groups of victims of the crime of genocide

160. It is the Chamber's view that it is necessary to consider the potential groups of victims of genocide in light of the provisions of the Statute and the Genocide Convention, which stipulate that genocide aims at "destroy[ing], in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such."

161. The Chamber notes that, as stated in the Rutaganda Judgement, the concepts of national, ethnical, racial and religious groups have been researched extensively and, at present, there are no generally and internationally accepted precise definitions thereof. Each of these concepts must be assessed in the light of a particular political, social and cultural context. Moreover, the Chamber notes that for the purposes of applying the Genocide Convention, membership of a group is, in essence, a subjective rather than an objective concept. The victim is perceived by the perpetrator of genocide as belonging to a group slated for destruction. In some instances, the victim may perceive himself/herself as a member of said group.
162. Nevertheless, the Chamber is of the view that a subjective definition alone is not enough sufficient to determine victim groups, as provided for in the Genocide Convention. It appears, from a reading of the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention(21), that certain groups, such as political and economic groups, have been excluded from the protected groups, because they are considered to be "non stable" or "mobile" groups which one joins through individual, voluntary commitment. That would seem to suggest a contrario that the Convention was presumably intended to cover relatively stable and permanent groups.
163. Therefore, the Chamber holds that in assessing whether a particular group may be considered protected from the crime of genocide, it will proceed on a case-by-case basis, taking into account both the relevant evidence proffered and the specific political, social and cultural context in which the acts allegedly took place.

The special intent of the crime of genocide

164. Genocide is distinct from other crimes because it requires a dolus specialis, a special intent. The special intent of a crime is the specific intention which, as an element of the crime, requires that the perpetrator clearly intended the result charged. The dolus specialis of the crime of genocide lies in "the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such". A person may be convicted of genocide only where it is established that he committed one of the acts referred to under Article 2(2) of the Statute with the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a particular protected group.
165. For any of the acts charged to constitute genocide, the said acts must have been committed against one or more persons because such person or persons were members of a specific group, and specifically, because of their membership in this group. Thus, the victim is singled out not by reason of his individual identity, but rather on account of his being a member of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. The victim of the act is, therefore, a member of a given group selected as such, which, ultimately, means the victim of the crime of genocide is the group itself and not the individual alone. The perpetration of the act charged, therefore, extends beyond its actual commission - for example, the murder of a particular person - to encompass the realization of the ulterior purpose to destroy the group in whole or in part.
166. The dolus specialis is a key element of an intentional offence, which offence is characterized by a psychological nexus between the physical result and the mental state of the perpetrator. With regard to the issue of determining the offender's specific intent, the Chamber applies the following reasoning, as held in the Akayesu Judgement:

" [...] intent is a mental factor which is difficult, even impossible, to determine. This is the reason why, in the absence of a confession from the accused, his intent can be inferred from a certain number of presumptions of fact. The Chamber considers that it is possible to deduce the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership of a particular group, while excluding the members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act."(22)

5758

167. Therefore, the Chamber is of the view that, as stated in the Rutaganda Judgement: "[...] in practice, intent can be, on a case-by-case basis, inferred from the material evidence submitted to the Chamber, including the evidence which demonstrates a consistent pattern of conduct by the Accused."(23)

3.2.2 Complicity in Genocide

168. The Prosecutor has charged the Accused with this crime under Count 2 of the Indictment, as an alternative to Count 1 of genocide. The Statute indeed provides, under Article 2(3)(e), the Tribunal with the power to prosecute persons with complicity in genocide.
169. The Chamber notes that complicity is a form of criminal participation both under the Anglo-Saxon legal tradition (or Common Law) and the Roman-Continental legal tradition (or Civil Law).
170. According to the Chamber, the definition of complicity in genocide articulated in the Akayesu Judgement, states that an accomplice to an offence may be defined as someone who associates himself in an offence committed by another, complicity necessarily implying the existence of a principal offence.
171. The issue before the Chamber is whether genocide must be committed for a person to be found guilty of complicity in genocide. The Chamber notes that complicity can only exist when there is a punishable, principal act committed by someone, the commission of which the accomplice has associated himself with.
172. In this regard, the Chamber notes from the Travaux Préparatoires of the Genocide Convention that the crime of complicity in genocide was recognised only where genocide had actually been committed. The Genocide Convention did not provide the possibility for punishment of complicity in an attempt to commit genocide, complicity in incitement to commit genocide nor complicity in conspiracy to commit genocide, all of which were, in the view of some States, too vague to be punishable under the Convention.
173. Consequently, the Chamber is of the opinion that in order for an accused to be found guilty of complicity in genocide, it must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime of genocide has been committed.
174. In regard to the issue of whether a person can be prosecuted for complicity, even where the perpetrator of the principal offence has himself not been tried, the Chamber notes that all criminal systems provide that a person may very well be tried as an accomplice, even where the principal perpetrator of the crime has not been identified, or where, for any other reasons, the latter's guilt can not be proven. The Rwandan Penal code is clear on this subject, and stipulates under Article 89 that accomplices:

"may be prosecuted even where the perpetrator may not face prosecution for personal reasons, such as double jeopardy, death, insanity or non-identification".

175. The Chamber notes that the logical inference from the foregoing is that an individual cannot thus be both the principal perpetrator of a particular act and the accomplice thereto. An act with which an accused is charged cannot, therefore, be characterised as both an act of genocide and an act of complicity in genocide. Consequently, since the two are mutually exclusive, the same individual cannot be convicted of both crimes for the same act(24).

5759

176. In regard to the physical elements of complicity in genocide (actus reus), three forms of accomplice participation are recognised in most criminal Civil Law systems: complicity by instigation, complicity by aiding and abetting, and complicity by procuring means(25).
177. Under Common Law, the forms of accomplice participation, namely "aiding and abetting, counselling and procuring", to a large extent, mirror those conducts characterised under Civil Law which, as indicated above, are "l'aide, l'assistance, et la fourniture des moyens".
178. Complicity by aiding or abetting implies a positive action which excludes, in principle, complicity by failure to act or omission. Procuring means is a common form of complicity. It covers those persons who procured weapons, instruments or any other means to be used in the commission of an offence, with the full knowledge that they would be used for such purposes.
179. For the purposes of interpreting Article 2 (3) (e) of the Statute, which does not define the concept of complicity, the Chamber is of the opinion that it is necessary to define complicity as per the Rwandan Penal Code, and to consider the first three forms of criminal participation referred to in Article 91 of said Code, which defines the elements of complicity in genocide, thus:

> (a) Complicity by procuring means, such as weapons, instruments or any other means, used to commit genocide, with the accomplice knowing that such means would be used for such a purpose;
>
> (b) Complicity by knowingly aiding or abetting a perpetrator of a genocide in the planning or enabling acts thereof;
>
> (c) Complicity by instigation, for which a person is liable who, though not directly participating in the crime of genocide, gave instructions to commit genocide, through gifts, promises, threats, abuse of authority or power, machinations or culpable artifice, or who directly incited the commission of genocide.

180. The intent or mental element of complicity in general implies that, at the moment he acted, the accomplice knew of the assistance he was providing in the commission of the principal offence. In other words, the accomplice must have acted knowingly.
181. As far as genocide is concerned, the intent of the accomplice is thus to knowingly aid or abet one or more persons to commit the crime of genocide. Therefore, the Chamber is of the opinion that an accomplice to genocide need not necessarily possess the dolus specialis of genocide, namely the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such.(26)
182. Thus, if an accused knowingly aided or abetted another in the commission of a murder, while being unaware that the principal was committing such a murder, with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the group to which the murdered victim belonged, said accused could be prosecuted for complicity in murder, and certainly not for complicity in genocide. However, if an accused knowingly aided and abetted in the commission of such a murder while he knew or had reason to know that the principal was acting with genocidal intent, the accused would be an accomplice to genocide, even though he did not share the murderer's intent to destroy the group.
183. In conclusion, the Chamber is of the opinion that an accused is liable for complicity in genocide if he knowingly and voluntarily aided or abetted or instigated one or more persons in the commission of genocide, while knowing that such a person or persons were committing genocide, even though the accused himself did not have the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group as such.

5760

3.2.3 Conspiracy to Commit Genocide

184. Article 2(3)(b) of the Statute provides that the Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons charged with the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide. The Prosecutor has charged the Accused with such a crime under Count 3 of the Indictment.
185. The Chamber notes that the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide covered in the Statute is taken from the Genocide Convention. The "Travaux Préparatoires" of the Genocide Convention suggest that the rationale for including such an offence was to ensure, in view of the serious nature of the crime of genocide, that the mere agreement to commit genocide should be punishable even if no preparatory act has taken place(27). Indeed, during the debate preceding the adoption of the Convention, the Secretariat advised that, in order to comply with General Assembly resolution 96 (I), the Convention would have to take into account the imperatives of the prevention of the crime of genocide:

> "This prevention may involve making certain acts punishable which do not themselves constitute genocide, for example, certain material acts preparatory to genocide, an agreement or a conspiracy with a view to committing genocide, or systematic propaganda inciting to hatred and thus likely to lead to genocide."(28)

186. The Chamber notes that Common Law systems tend to view "entente" or conspiracy as a specific form of criminal participation, punishable in itself. Under Civil Law, conspiracy or "complot" derogates from the principle that a person cannot be punished for mere criminal intent ("résolution criminelle") or for preparatory acts committed. In Civil Law systems, conspiracy (complot) is punishable only where its purpose is to commit certain crimes considered as extremely serious, such as, undermining the security of the State.
187. With respect to the constituent elements of the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide, the Chamber notes that, according to the "Travaux Préparatoires" of the Genocide Convention, the concept of conspiracy relied upon the Anglo-Saxon doctrine of conspiracy. In its Report, the Ad hoc Committee states that conspiracy "is a crime under Anglo-American law": Ad Hoc Committee Report (1948) 8. This reflected the assumptions made during debates on conspiracy. The French representative initially observed that conspiracy was a foreign concept to French law. The US representative, speaking as Chair, explained that "in Anglo-Saxon law 'conspiracy' was an offence consisting in the agreement of two or more persons to effect any unlawful purpose".(29) Venezuela's representative later remarked that in Spanish the word "conspiration" meant a conspiracy against the Government and that the English term "conspiracy" was rendered in Spanish by "asociación" (association) for the purpose of committing a crime.(30) The representative of Poland observed that in Anglo-Saxon law the word "complicity" extended only to "aiding and abetting" and that the offence described as "conspiracy" did not involve complicity. Poland recalled that the Secretariat draft made separate provision for complicity and conspiracy. (31) In the Sixth Committee debates, Mr Maktos of the United States of America stated that "conspiracy" had "a very precise meaning in Anglo-Saxon law; it meant the agreement between two or more persons to commit an unlawful act".(32) Mr. Raafat of Egypt noted that the notion of conspiracy had been introduced into Egyptian law and "meant the connivance of several persons to commit a crime, whether the crime was successful or not".(33)
188. For its part, the United Nations War Crimes Commission defined conspiracy as follows:

> "The doctrine of conspiracy is one under which it is a criminal offence to conspire or to take part in an allegiance to achieve an unlawful object, or to achieve a lawful object by unlawful means."(34)

5761

189. Civil Law distinguishes two types of actus reus, qualifying two "levels" of 'complot' or conspiracy. Following an increasing level of gravity, the first level concerns (le complot simple) simple conspiracy, and the second level (le complot suivi d'actes matériels) conspiracy followed by material acts. Simple conspiracy is usually defined as a concerted agreement to act, decided upon by two or more persons (résolution d'agir concertée et arrêtée entre deux ou plusieurs personnes) while the conspiracy followed by preparatory acts is an aggravated form of conspiracy where the concerted agreement to act is followed by preparatory acts. Both forms of 'complot' require that the following three common elements of the offence be met: (1) an agreement to act [la résolution d'agir];(35) (2) concerted wills [le concert de volontés]; and (3) the common goal to achieve the substantive offence [l'objectif commun de commettre l'infraction principale].
190. Under Common Law, the crime of conspiracy is constituted when two or more persons agree to a common objective, the objective being criminal.
191. The Chamber notes that the constitutive elements of conspiracy, as defined under both systems, are very similar. Based on these elements, the Chamber holds that conspiracy to commit genocide is to be defined as an agreement between two or more persons to commit the crime of genocide.
192. With respect to the mens rea of the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide, the Chamber notes that it rests on the concerted intent to commit genocide, that is to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such. Thus, it is the view of the Chamber that the requisite intent for the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is, ipso facto, the intent required for the crime of genocide, that is the dolus specialis of genocide.(36)
193. It emerges from this definition that, as far as the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is concerned, it is, indeed, the act of conspiracy itself, in other words, the process ("procédé") of conspiracy, which is punishable and not its result. The Chamber notes, in this regard, that under both Civil and Common Law systems, conspiracy is an inchoate offence ("infraction formelle") which is punishable by virtue of the criminal act as such and not as a consequence of the result of that act.(37)
194. The Chamber is of the view that the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is punishable even if it fails to produce a result, that is to say, even if the substantive offence, in this case genocide, has not actually been perpetrated.
195. Moreover, the Chamber raised the question as to whether an accused could be convicted of both genocide and conspiracy to commit genocide.
196. Under Civil Law systems, if the conspiracy is successful and the substantive offence is consummated, the accused will only be convicted of the substantive offence and not of the conspiracy. Further, once the substantive crime has been accomplished and the criminal conduct of the accused is established, there is no reason to punish the accused for his mere résolution criminelle (criminal intent), or even for the preparatory acts committed in furtherance of the substantive offence. Therefore an accused can only be convicted of conspiracy if the substantive offence has not been realized or if the Accused was part of a conspiracy which has been perpetrated by his co-conspirators, without his direct participation.
197. Under Common Law, an accused can, in principle, be convicted of both conspiracy and a substantive offence, in particular, where the objective of the conspiracy extends beyond the offences actually committed. However, this position has incurred much criticism. Thus, for example, according to Don Stuart:

> "The true issue is not whether evidence has been used twice to achieve convictions but rather whether the fundamental nature of the conspiracy offence is best seen [...] as purely preventive, incomplete offence, auxiliary offence to the principal offence and having no true independent rationale to exist on its own alongside the full offence. On this view it inexorably follows that once the completed offence has been committed there is no justification for also punishing the incomplete offence."(38)

5762

198. In the instant case, the Chamber has adopted the definition of conspiracy most favourable to Musema, whereby an accused cannot be convicted of both genocide and conspiracy to commit genocide on the basis of the same acts. Such a definition is in keeping with the intention of the Genocide Convention. Indeed, the "Travaux Préparatoires" show that the crime of conspiracy was included to punish acts which, in and of themselves, did not constitute genocide. The converse implication of this is that no purpose would be served in convicting an accused, who has already been found guilty of genocide, for conspiracy to commit genocide, on the basis of the same acts.

3.3 Crime against Humanity (Article 3 of the Statute)

199. The Chamber notes that the Akayesu Judgement traced the historical development and evolution of crimes against humanity as far back as the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg.(39) The Akayesu Judgement also examined the gradual evolution of crimes against humanity in the cases of Eichmann, Barbie, Touvier and Papon. After consideration, the Chamber concurs with the historical development of crimes against humanity, as articulated in the Akayesu Judgement.

200. The Chamber notes that Article 7 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court defines a crime against humanity as any of the enumerated acts committed, as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with the Perpetrator having knowledge of the said attack. These enumerated acts are murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation or forcible transfer of population, imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law, torture, rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity, persecution against any identifiable group or collectivity on political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender or other grounds that are universally recognised as impermissible under international law, in connection with any act referred to in this article, or any other crime within the jurisdiction of the Court: enforced disappearance of persons; the crime of apartheid; other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering or serious injury to body or mental or physical health.(40)

Crimes against humanity, pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal

201. Article 3 of the Statute confers on the Tribunal the jurisdiction to prosecute persons for acts which constitute crimes against humanity. The Chamber concurs with the reasoning in the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, that offences falling within the ambit of crimes against humanity may be broadly broken down into four essential elements, namely:

(a) the actus reus must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack;

(b) the actus reus must be committed against the civilian population;

(c) the actus reus must be committed on one or more discriminatory grounds, namely, national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds;

(d) the actus reus must be inhumane in nature and character, causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health.(41)

5763

(a) The actus reus must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack

202. The Chamber is of the opinion that the actus reus cannot be a random inhumane act, but rather is an act committed as part of an attack. With regard to the nature of this attack, the Chamber notes that Article 3 of the English version of the Statute reads "as part of a widespread or systematic attack [..].", while the French version of the Statute reads "dans le cadre d'une attaque généralisée et systématique [...]". The French version requires that the attack be both of a widespread and systematic nature, while the English version requires that the attack be of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both.
203. The Chamber notes that customary international law requires that the attack be either of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both. The English version of the Statute conforms more closely with customary international law, and the Chamber therefore accepts the elements as set forth in Article 3 of the English version of the Statute, and follows the interpretation in other ICTR judgements, namely: that the "attack" under Article 3 of the Statute, must be either of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both.(42)
204. The Chamber considers that "widespread", as an element of crimes against humanity, is a massive, frequent, large scale action, carried out collectively with considerable seriousness and directed against multiple victims, while "systematic" constitutes organized action, following a regular pattern, on the basis of a common policy and involves substantial public or private resources. It is not essential for such policy to be adopted formally as a policy of a State. However, there must exist some form of preconceived plan or policy.(43) The Chamber notes that these definitions were endorsed in the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements.(44)
205. The Chamber notes that "attack", as an element of a crime against humanity, was defined in the Akayesu Judgement, as an unlawful act of the kind enumerated in Article 3(a) to (i) of the Statute. An attack may also be non-violent in nature, such as imposing a system of apartheid, which is declared a crime against humanity in Article 1 of the Apartheid Convention of 1973, or exerting pressure on the population to act in a particular manner, which may come under the purview of an attack, if orchestrated on a massive scale or in a systematic manner.(45) The definition of "attack", as defined in the Akayesu Judgement, was later endorsed in the Rutaganda Judgement.(46) The Chamber concurs with this definition.
206. The Chamber concurs with the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, which held that the perpetrator of an act falling within the ambit of crimes against humanity must have "actual or constructive knowledge of the broader context of the attack, meaning that the accused must know that his act[s] is part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and pursuant to some kind of policy or plan."(47)

(b) The actus reus must be committed against the civilian population

207. The Chamber notes that the actus reus for any of the enumerated acts in Article 3 of the Statute must be directed against the civilian population if it is to constitute a crime against humanity. In the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, "civilian population", pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute, was defined as people who were not taking any active part in the hostilities.(48) The fact that there are individuals among the civilian population who themselves are not civilians does not deprive the population of its civilian character.(49) The Chamber concurs with this definition.

5764

(c) The actus reus must be committed on discriminatory grounds

208. The Statute stipulates that inhumane acts committed against the civilian population must be committed on "national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds". Discrimination on the basis of a person's political ideology satisfies the requirement of "political" grounds as envisaged in Article 3 of the Statute.
209. Inhumane acts committed against persons not falling within any one of the discriminatory categories may constitute crimes against humanity if the perpetrator's intention in committing such acts was to further his attack on the group discriminated against on one of the grounds specified in Article 3 of the Statute. The perpetrator must have the requisite intent for the commission of a crime against humanity.(50)
210. In the 15 July 1999 Tadi Judgement, the Appeals Chamber held that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that all crimes against humanity require a discriminatory intent. The Appeals Chamber ruled that discriminatory intent is an indispensable element of the offence only with regard to those crimes for which such intent is expressly required: namely, the offence of persecution, pursuant to Article 5(h) of the ICTY Statute.(51)
211. The Chamber has compared the provisions of Article 5 of the ICTY Statute with the provisions of Article 3 of the ICTR Statute. Accordingly, the Chamber notes that, although the provisions of both aforementioned Articles pertain to crimes against humanity, except for the offence of persecution, there is a material and substantial difference in the respective elements of the offences, that constitute crimes against humanity. This difference stems from the fact that Article 3 of the ICTR Statute expressly requires "national, political, ethnic, racial or religious" discriminatory grounds with respect to the offences of murder, extermination, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, and, other inhumane acts, whereas Article 5 of the ICTY Statute does not stipulate any discriminatory grounds with respect to these offences.

(d) The Enumerated Acts

212. Article 3 of the Statute enumerates various acts that constitute crimes against humanity, namely: murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, persecution on political, racial and religious grounds, and other inhumane acts. This list is not exhaustive. Any act which is inhumane in nature and character may constitute a crime against humanity, provided the other elements are satisfied. This is evident in (i) which caters for all other inhumane acts not stipulated in (a) to (h) of Article 3.(52)
213. The Chamber notes that with respect to crimes against humanity, Musema is indicted for murder, extermination, rape and other inhumane acts. The Chamber, in interpreting Article 3 of the Statute, will focus its discussion on these offences only.

Murder

214. Pursuant to Article 3 (a) of the Statute, murder may constitute a crime against humanity. The Chamber notes that Article 3(a) of the English version of the Statute refers to "Murder", while the French version of the Statute refers to "Assassinat". Customary international law dictates that the offence of "Murder", and not "Assassinat", constitutes a crime against humanity.
215. In both the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, murder was defined as the unlawful, intentional killing of a human being. The requisite elements of murder, as a crime against humanity, were defined as follows:

    (a) The victim is dead;

5765

(b) The death resulted from an unlawful act or omission of the Accused or a subordinate;

(c) At the time of the killing the Accused or a subordinate had the intention to kill or inflict grievous bodily harm on the deceased having known that such bodily harm is likely to cause the victim's death, and is reckless as to whether or not death ensures;

(d) The victim was discriminated against, on any one of the enumerated discriminatory grounds;

(e) The victim was a member of the civilian population;

(f) The act or omission was part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population.(53)

216. The Rutuganda Judgement further held that the act or omission that constitutes murder must be discriminatory in nature and directed against a member of the civilian population.(54)

Extermination

217. Pursuant to Article 3 (c) of the Statute, extermination constitutes a crime against humanity. By its very nature, extermination is a crime which is directed against a group of individuals. Extermination differs from murder in that it requires an element of mass destruction, which is not a prerequisite for murder.
218. In both the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, the elements of extermination were defined as follows:

(a) the Accused or his subordinate participated in the killing of certain named or described persons;

(b) the act or omission was unlawful and intentional;

(c). the unlawful act or omission must be part of a widespread or systematic attack;

(d) the attack must be against the civilian population;

(e) the attack must be on discriminatory grounds, namely: national, political, ethnic, racial, or religious grounds.(55)

219. The Rutaganda Judgement further held that the act or omission that constitutes extermination must be discriminatory in nature and directed against members of the civilian population. Further, this act or omission includes, but is not limited to, the direct act of killing. It can be any act or omission, or cumulative acts or omissions that cause the death of the targeted group of individuals.(56)

Rape

220. Rape may constitute a crime against humanity, pursuant to Article 3(g) of the Statute. In the Akayesu Judgement, rape as a crime against humanity was defined as:

5766

"[...] a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. Sexual violence, which includes rape, is considered to be any act of a sexual nature which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive. This act must be committed:

(a) as part of a widespread or systematic attack;

(b) on a civilian population;

(c) on certain catalogued discriminatory grounds, namely: national, ethnic, political, racial, or religious grounds."(57)

221. The Chamber notes that, while rape has been defined in certain national jurisdictions as non-consensual intercourse, variations on the acts of rape may include acts which involve the insertions of objects and/or the use of bodily orifices not considered to be intrinsically sexual.
222. The Chamber also observes that in defining rape, as a crime against humanity, the Trial Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement acknowledged:

"that rape is a form of aggression and that the central elements of the crime of rape cannot be captured in a mechanical description of objects and body parts. The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment does not catalogue specific acts in its definition of torture, focussing rather on the conceptual frame work of state sanctioned violence. This approach is more useful in international law. Like torture, rape is used for such purposes as intimidation, degradation, humiliation, discrimination, punishment, control or destruction of a person. Like torture, rape is a violation of personal dignity, and rape in fact constitutes torture when inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity."(58)

223. The Chamber notes that the definition of rape and sexual violence articulated in the Akayesu Judgement was adopted by the Trial Chamber II of the ICTY in its Delalic Judgement(59).
224. The Chamber has considered the alternative definition of rape set forth by Trial Chamber I of the ICTY in its Furundzija Judgement, which relies on a detailed description of objects and body parts. In this judgement the Trial Chamber looked to national legislation and noted:

"The Trial Chamber would emphasise at the outset, that a trend can be discerned in the national legislation of a number of States of broadening the definition of rape so that it now embraces acts that were previously classified as comparatively less serious offences, that is sexual or indecent assault. This trend shows that at the national level States tend to take a stricter attitude towards serious forms of sexual assault; the stigma of rape now attaches to a growing category of sexual offences, provided of course they meet certain requirements, chiefly that of forced physical penetration."(60)

225. The Furundzija Judgement further noted that "most legal systems in the common and civil law worlds consider rape to be the forcible sexual penetration of the human body by the penis or the forcible insertion of any other object into either the vagina or the anus".(61) Nevertheless, after due consideration of the practice of forced oral penetration, which is treated as rape in some States and sexual assault in other States, the Trial Chamber in that case determined as follows:

> "183. The Trial Chamber holds that the forced penetration of the mouth by the male sexual organ constitutes a most humiliating and degrading attack upon human dignity. The essence of the whole corpus of international humanitarian law as well as human rights law lies in the protection of the human dignity of every person, whatever his or her gender. The general principle of respect for human dignity is the basic underpinning and indeed the very raison d'être of international humanitarian law and human rights law, indeed in modern times it has become of such paramount importance as to permeate the whole body of international law. This principle is intended to shield human beings from outrages upon their personal dignity, whether such outrages are carried out by unlawfully attacking the body or by humiliating and debasing the honour, the self-respect or the mental well being of a person. It is consonant with this principle that such an extremely serious sexual outrage as forced oral penetration should be classified as rape."(62)

226. The Chamber concurs with the conceptual approach set forth in the Akayesu Judgement for the definition of rape, which recognizes that the essence of rape is not the particular details of the body parts and objects involved, but rather the aggression that is expressed in a sexual manner under conditions of coercion.
227. The Chamber considers that the distinction between rape and other forms of sexual violence drawn by the Akayesu Judgement, that is "a physical invasion of a sexual nature" as contrasted with "any act of a sexual nature" which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive is clear and establishes a framework for judicial consideration of individual incidents of sexual violence and a determination, on a case by case basis, of whether such incidents constitute rape. The definition of rape, as set forth in the Akayesu Judgement, clearly encompasses all the conduct described in the definition of rape set forth in Furundzija.
228. The Chamber notes that in the Furundzija Judgement, the Trial Chamber considered forced penetration of the mouth as a humiliating and degrading attack on human dignity and largely for this reason included such conduct in its definition of rape even though State jurisdictions are divided as to whether such conduct constitutes rape.(63) The Chamber further notes, as the Furundzija Judgement acknowledges, that there is a trend in national legislation to broaden the definition of rape.(64) In light of the dynamic ongoing evolution of the understanding of rape and the incorporation of this understanding into principles of international law, the Chamber considers that a conceptual definition is preferable to a mechanical definition of rape. The conceptual definition will better accommodate evolving norms of criminal justice.
229. For these reasons, the Chamber adopts the definition of rape and sexual violence set forth in the Akayesu Judgement.

Other Inhumane Acts

230. The Chamber notes that Article 3 of the Statute provides a list of eight enumerated acts that may constitute crimes against humanity. The enlisted acts are murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape and persecution on political, racial and religious grounds. This list of acts is not exhaustive and Article 3(i) of the Statute provides for "Other inhumane Acts" that may constitute crimes against humanity.
231. The Chamber notes that the ICC Statute provides that:

> "Other inhumane acts [are acts] of a similar character [to the other specified enumerated acts] intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health"(65).

5768

232. The Chamber finds that an act or omission will fall within the ambit of "Other inhumane Acts", as envisaged in Article 3(i) of the Statute, provided the nature and character of such act or omission is similar in nature, character, gravity and seriousness to the other acts, as enumerated in sub-articles (a) to (h) of Article 3. Further, the inhumane act or omission must:

(a) Be directed against member(s) of the civilian population;

(b) The perpetrator must have discriminated against the victim(s), on one or more of the enumerated discriminatory grounds;

(c) The perpetrator's act or omission must form part of a widespread or systematic attack and the perpetrator must have knowledge of this attack.

233. The Chamber agrees that the perpetrator's act(s) must be assessed "on a case-by-case basis"(66), with a view to establishing whether such act(s) fall within the ambit of "Other inhumane Acts", as envisaged in Article 3 of the Statute.

3.4. Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

Article 4 of the Statute

234. Pursuant to Article 4 of the Statute, the Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977.
235. According to the Statute, these violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:

a) violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

b) collective punishments;

c) taking of hostages;

d) acts of terrorism;

e) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;

f) pillage;

g) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples;

h) threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

Applicability of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II

5769

236. The Chamber esteems that, before discussing the elements for the above cited offences, it is necessary to comment upon the applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II regarding the situation which existed in Rwanda in 1994 at the time of the events referred to in the Indictment.
237. In the light of the principle nullum crimen sine lege, the Chamber must examine whether the above-mentioned instruments, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute, were in force on the territory of Rwanda at the time the tragic events took place within its borders.
238. In the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, Trial Chamber II adjudged, without addressing the question whether or not the instruments incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute are to be considered as customary international law, that these instruments were indisputably in force in Rwanda at the time, as Rwanda became a Party to the Conventions of 1949 on 5 May 1964 and to Protocol II on 19 November 1984. Moreover, the Trial Chamber stated that, as all the offences enumerated in Article 4 of the Statute also constituted offences under the laws of Rwanda, there was no doubt that persons responsible for the breaches of these international instruments during the events in the Rwandan territories in 1994 could be subject to prosecution(67).
239. These findings were affirmed by Trial Chamber I in the Rutaganda Judgement.(68)
240. In the Akayesu Judgement, Trial Chamber I acknowledged the binding nature of the obligation as well, but focused upon customary international law as the source of this obligation rather than treaty law. With regard to Common Article 3, the Trial Chamber held that the "norms of Common Article 3 had acquired the status of customary law in that most States, by their domestic penal codes, have criminalized acts which if committed during internal armed conflict, would constitute violations of Common Article 3"(69). This is in line with the view of both the ICTY Trial Chambers(70) and the ICTY Appeals Chamber(71) stipulating that Common Article 3 beyond doubt formed part of customary international law. In relation to Additional Protocol II, the Trial Chamber in the aforesaid Akayesu Judgement stated that, although not all of Additional Protocol II could be said to be customary law, the guarantees contained in Article 4(2) (Fundamental Guarantees) thereof, which reaffirm and supplement Common Article 3, form part of existing customary international law(72).
241. All of the norms reproduced in Article 4 of the Statute are covered by Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II.
242. The Chamber therefore concludes that, at the time the crimes alleged in the Indictment were perpetrated, persons were bound to respect the provisions of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and their 1977 Additional Protocols, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute. Violations thereof, as a matter of custom and convention, attracted individual criminal responsibility and could result in the prosecution of the authors of the offences.
243. The question remains however to what extent these instruments are applicable in the instant case.

Test of applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

244. The Chamber having deemed Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute, to be in force in Rwanda at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, the issue the Chamber must address at this stage is the material requirements of applicability of Common Article 3 and Addition Protocol II to be met for an act to be deemed a serious violation thereof.

Ratione Materiae

245. The four 1949 Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol I thereto generally apply to international armed conflicts, whereas Common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions extends a minimum threshold of humanitarian protection as well to all persons affected by a non-

5770 international conflict, a protection which was further developed and enhanced in the [illegible] Additional Protocol II. Offences alleged to be covered by Article 4 of the Statute must, as a primary matter, have been committed in the context of a non-international armed conflict, satisfying the requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II.

Common Article 3

246. Common Article 3 applies to "armed conflicts not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties"(73). In absence of a general definition of non-international armed conflict, which may take very different forms, the Chamber finds it necessary to describe situations of this type in relation to the objective facts characterizing them.
247. First, a non-international conflict is distinct from an international armed conflict because of the legal status of the entities opposing each other: the parties to the conflict are not sovereign States, but the government of a single State in conflict with one or more armed factions within its territory.
248. The expression "armed conflicts" introduces a material criterion: the existence of open hostilities between armed forces which are organized to a greater or lesser degree. Internal disturbances and tensions, characterized by isolated or sporadic acts of violence, do not therefore constitute armed conflicts in a legal sense, even if the government is forced to resort to police forces or even armed units for the purpose of restoring law and order. Within these limits, non-international armed conflicts are situations in which hostilities break out between armed forces or organized armed groups within the territory of a single State.(74)
249. Having defined the term in an abstract manner, to the Chamber it is apparent that whether a conflict meets the criteria of Common Article 3 is to be decided on a case by case basis.
250. In dealing with this issue, the Akayesu Judgement suggested an 'evaluation test' whereby the Trial Chamber evaluated the intensity and organization of the parties to the conflict to make a finding on the existence of an armed conflict not of an international character(75).
251. This approach, followed as well in the Rutaganda Judgement, finds favour with the Trial Chamber of this instance.

Additional Protocol II

252. As aforesaid, Common Article 3 does not in itself define "armed conflict not of an international character". Before the elaboration of Additional Protocol II, the absence of clarity on this concept gave rise to a great variety of interpretations and in practice its applicability was often denied.(76) In order to reinforce and improve the protection granted to victims of non-international armed conflict the Additional Protocol II was adopted in 1977, giving a number of objective criteria which would not be dependent on the subjective judgements of the parties. Additional Protocol II, in other words, develops and supplements the brief rules contained in Common Article 3 without modifying its existing conditions of application. As a result, in circumstances where the material requirements of applicability of Protocol II are met, it is self-evident that they also satisfy the threshold requirements of the broader Common Article 3.
253. Additional Protocol II applies to "all armed conflicts which are not covered by Article 1 of the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts which take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol. The Protocol explicitly does not apply to situations of internal disturbances and tensions, such as riots, isolated and sporadic acts of violence and other acts of a similar nature, as not being armed conflicts."(77)

5971

254. Thus the conditions to be met to fulfil the material requirements of applicability of Additional Protocol II at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment would entail showing that:

- an armed conflict took place in Rwanda, between its armed forces and dissenting armed forces or other organized armed groups;
- the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups were:
    - -under responsible command;
    - -able to exercise such control over a part of their territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations; and
    - -able to implement Additional Protocol II.

255. The Protocol applies automatically as soon as the material conditions as defined in the Article are fulfilled. However, prior to the making of a finding thereon, this Chamber deems it necessary to make a number of precisions as regards the said criteria.

256. The concept of armed conflict has already been discussed under the above section pertaining to Common Article 3. It is sufficient to recall that an armed conflict is distinguished from internal disturbances by the level of intensity of the conflict and the degree of organization of the parties to the conflict. Under Additional Protocol II, the parties to the conflict will usually either be the government confronting dissident armed forces, or the government fighting insurgent organized armed groups. The term "armed forces" of the High Contracting Party should be understood in the broadest sense, so as to cover all armed forces as described within national legislation.(78)

257. Furthermore, the armed forces opposing the government must be under responsible command. This requirement implies some degree of organization within the armed groups or dissident armed forces, but this does not necessarily mean that there is a hierarchical system of military organization similar to that of regular armed forces. It means an organization capable of, on the one hand, planning and carrying out sustained and concerted military operations- operations that are kept up continuously and that are done in agreement according to a plan, and on the other, of imposing discipline in the name of the de facto authorities(79).

258. In addition to this, these dissident armed forces must be able to dominate a sufficient part of the territory so as to maintain these sustained and concerted military operations and the insurgents must be in a position to implement this Protocol(80).

The nexus between the crime and the armed conflict

259. The Chamber must also be satisfied that there is a link or nexus between the offence committed and the armed conflict for Article 4 of the Statute to apply.

260. In other words, the alleged crimes, referred to in the Indictment, must be closely related to the hostilities or committed in conjunction with the armed conflict.

261. The Akayesu Judgement addressed this subject stating that the acts perpetrated by the accused had to be "[...] acts, committed in conjunction with the armed conflict".(81)

262. In the Rutaganda Judgement it was held that the term nexus should not be defined in abstracto. Rather, the evidence adduced in support of the charges against the accused must satisfy the Chamber that such a nexus exists. Thus, the burden rests on the Prosecutor to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, that, on the basis of the facts, such a nexus exists between the crime committed and the armed conflict(82). This approach finds favor with the Chamber in this instance.

Ratione personae

5772

263. Two distinct issues arise with respect to personal jurisdiction over serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II; the class of perpetrators and the class of victims.

The class of perpetrators

264. Under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, the perpetrator must belong to a "Party to the conflict", whereas under Additional Protocol II(83) the perpetrator must be a member of the "armed forces" of either the government or of the dissidents.
265. Neither the Geneva Conventions nor the Additional Protocols give an exact definition of "Party to the conflict" or "armed forces". Taken literally, the duties and responsibilities of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols will only apply to individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties.
266. In the Akayesu Judgement, the Chamber, however, expressed the opinion that, due to the overall protective and humanitarian purpose of these international legal instruments, the delimitation of this category of persons bound by the provisions in Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II should not be too restricted.(84) Indeed, according to the Judgement, a too restrictive definition of these terms would dilute the protection afforded by these instruments to the victims and potential victims of armed conflicts. Hence, in the opinion of the Trial Chamber, the categories of persons covered by these terms should not be limited to individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either belligerent parties but should be interpreted in their broadest sense, to include individuals who are legitimately mandated and expected as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority de facto representing the Government to support or fulfil the war efforts. This was affirmed in both the Rutaganda Judgement and the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement.
267. It could be objected that the Accused, as a civilian, cannot be considered as being a member of the "armed forces" (in the broadest sense).
268. Yet, jurisprudence on this issue emanating from both the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals and from the ICTR clearly established that civilians can be held responsible for violations of international humanitarian law committed in an armed conflict. The Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals, however, dealt with the matter in the context of an international armed conflict, while in the instant case, the question arises in the context of an internal conflict.
269. Nevertheless, the Chamber, in cognisance of the importance and relevance of these trials with respect to the instant case, deems it necessary to review such decisions prior to making its findings thereon.
270. In the Zyklon B case, the decision of the British military court was a clear example of the application of the rule that the provisions of the laws and customs of war are addressed not only to combatants and to members of State and other public authorities, but to anybody who is in a position to assist in their violation. The military court, who sentenced two civilians, Tech-the owner of a gas company- and Weinbacher-his second in command-, to death, (85) acted on the principle that any civilian who is as accessory to a violation of the laws and customs of war is himself liable as a war criminal.(86)
271. In the Essen Lynching Case, three civilians -Braschoss, Kaufer and Boddenberg- were found guilty of the killing of unarmed prisoners of war, because they had taken part in the ill-treatment of which eventually led to the death of the victims.(87)
272. In the Hadamar Trial decision, another application was given of the rule that the provisions of laws and customs of war are addressed not only to combatants but also to civilians, and that civilians, by committing illegal acts against nationals of the opponent, may become guilty of war crimes. In Casu, part of the staff of a civilian institution - a sanatorium were found guilty for killing allied nationals by means of injections.(88)
273. These principles were also followed in Tokyo by the International Tribunal for the Far East, that accused Hirota, the former Foreign Minister of Japan, of various violations of war crimes.

5773

274. So it is well-established that the post-World War II Trials unequivocally support the imposition of individual criminal liability for war crimes on civilians where they have a link or connection with a Party to the conflict. The principle of holding civilians liable for breaches of the laws of war is, moreover, favoured by a consideration of the humanitarian object and purpose of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols, which is to protect war victims from atrocities."(89)

275. Therefore, the Chamber concludes that the Accused could fall in the class of individuals who may be held responsible for serious violations on international humanitarian law, in particular serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II.

The class of victims

276. Common Article 3(1) of the Geneva Conventions states that protection must be afforded to "persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of the armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat". Article 4 of Additional Protocol II refers to "all persons who do not take a direct part in the hostilities or who have ceased to take part in the hostilities".

277. Article 50 of Additional Protocol I stipulates in its first paragraph that "a civilian is any person who does not belong to one of the categories of persons referred to in Article 4(A)(1), (2), (3) and (6) of the Third Convention and in Article 43 of this Protocol." Each of these Articles enumerates the various types of combatants.

278. On this basis, the ICRC concluded that: "thus the Protocol adopted the only satisfactory solution, which is that of a negative definition, namely, that the civilian population is made up of persons who are not members of the armed forces or placed hors de combat".(90)

279. Pursuant to Article 13(2) of the Additional Protocol II, the civilian population, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. However, if civilians take a direct part in the hostilities, they then lose their right to protection as civilians per se and could fall within a class of perpetrators. To take a 'direct' part in the hostilities means acts of war which by their nature or purpose are likely to cause actual harm to the personnel and equipment of the enemy armed forces.

280. The Chamber considers, following the findings of the Rutaganda Judgement, that a civilian shall be anyone who falls out with the categories of "perpetrator" developed supra, namely individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or to individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts. The class of civilians thus broadly defined, it will be a matter of evidence on a case by case basis whether a victim has the status of civilian.

281. Concerning this issue, the Chamber recalls that, from a reading of the Indictment, the victims were all allegedly civilians, being usually men, women and children seeking refuge from the massacres.

Ratione loci

282. Having commented upon the criteria ratione materiae and ratione personae, the Chamber will now evaluate if the criteria of ratione loci are met.

283. In spite of the fact that there is no clear provision on the applicability ratione loci either in Common Article 3 or Additional Protocol II, the protection afforded to individuals by these instruments applies throughout the territory of the State where the hostilities are occurring, once the objective material conditions for applicability of the said instruments have been satisfied. Indeed, from that moment, persons affected by the conflict are covered by the Protocol wherever they are in the territory of the State engaged in conflict.(91)

5774

284. This approach was confirmed in the Akayesu Judgement(92), the Rutaganda Judgement(93) and the Tadic Judgement(94) (with regard in particular to Common Article 3), which all conclude that Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II apply in the whole territory where the conflict is occurring and are not limited to the "war front" or to the "narrow geographical context of the actual theater of combat operations".

Specific violation

285. Musema is charged under Count 8 and 9 of the Indictment for violations of Articles 3 Common to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II thereof, in violation of Articles 4(a) and (e) of the Tribunal's Statute . If all the requirements of applicability of Article 4 of the Statute as developed supra are met, the onus is on the Prosecutor to then prove that the alleged acts of the accused constituted the required actus reus and mens rea of 4Articles 4(a) and (e) of the Statute.

Required elements of Article 4 (a) of the Statute of the Tribunal

a) Murder: The specific elements of murder are stated in Section 3.3. on Crime against Humanity in the Applicable Law.

b) Torture: Intentionally inflicting severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, or punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of, or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering only arising form, inherent in or incidental to, lawful sanctions.

c) Mutilation: causing severe physical injury or damage to victims.

Required elements of Article 4 (e) of the Statute of the Tribunal

a) Humiliating and degrading treatment: Subjecting victims to treatment designed to subvert their self-regard. Like outrages upon personal dignity, these offences may be regarded as a lesser forms of torture; moreover ones in which the motives required for torture would not be required, nor would it be required that the acts be committed under state authority.

b) Rape: The specific elements of rape are stated in Section 3.3. on Crime against Humanity in the Applicable Law.

c) Indecent assault: The accused caused the infliction of pain or injury by an act which was of a sexual nature and inflicted by means of coercion, force, threat or intimidation and was non-consensual.

The violation must be serious

286. Article 4 of the Statute states that "The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Common Article 3 and of the Additional Protocol II ". The Trial Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement understood, in line with the Appeals Chamber Decision in Tadic(95) that the phrase "serious violation" means "a breach of a rule protecting important values which must involve grave consequences for the victim"(96).

5775

287. The list of serious violations provided in Article 4 of the Statute is taken from Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, which outline "Fundamental Guarantees"as a humanitarian minimum of protection for war victims. The list in Article 4 of the Statute thus comprises serious violations of the fundamental humanitarian guarantees which, as has been stated above, are recognised as customary international law.
288. In the opinion of the Chamber, violations of these fundamental humanitarian guarantees, by their very nature, are therefore to be considered as serious.

3.5 Cumulative charges

289. The Accused, by his alleged acts in relation to the events described in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment, is cumulatively charged with eight counts. Assuming that the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that a specific act alleged in the Indictment was committed and that several legal characterizations under different counts have been established, it should adopt only a singular legal characterization given to such act, or whether it may the Chamber may find the Accused guilty of all the counts arising from the said act.
290. The Chamber notes that the principle of cumulative charges was applied by the Nuremberg Tribunal, especially regarding war crimes and crimes against humanity.(97)
291. Regarding the concurrence of the various crimes covered under the Statute, the Chamber, in the Akayesu Judgement, held that:

> "[...] it is acceptable to convict the accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did. However, the Chamber finds that it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where (a) one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, [...]or (b) where one offence charges accomplice liability and the other offence charges liability as a principal."(98)

292. Trial Chamber II of the Tribunal, in its Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, endorsed the afore-mentioned test of concurrence of crimes and found that it is only acceptable:

> "(1) where offences have differing elements, or (2) where the laws in question protect differing social interests."(99)

293. Trial Chamber II ruled in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement that the cumulative charges were legally improper and untenable. It found that in that particular case all elements including the mens rea element requisite to show genocide, extermination and murder, and the evidence relied upon to prove the alleged commission of the crimes, were the same. Furthermore, in the opinion of Trial Chamber II, the protected social interests were also the same. Therefore, it held that the Prosecutor should have charged the Accused in the alternative.(100)
294. Judge Tafazzal H. Khan, one of the Judges sitting in Trial Chamber II to consider the said case, expressed a dissenting opinion on the application of the issue of cumulative charges. Relying on consistent jurisprudence he pointed out that the Chamber should have placed less emphasis on the overlapping elements of the cumulative crimes.

5776

> "What must be punished is culpable conduct; this principle applies to situations where the conduct offends two or more crimes, whether or not the factual situation also satisfies the distinct elements of the two or more crimes, as proven."(101)

295. In his dissenting opinion, the Judge goes on to emphasize that the full assessment of charges and the pronouncement of guilty verdicts are important in order to reflect the totality of the accused's culpable conduct.

> "[...] where the culpable conduct was part of a widespread and systematic attack specifically against civilians, to record a conviction for genocide alone does not reflect the totality of the accused's culpable conduct. Similarly, if the Majority had chosen to convict for extermination alone instead of genocide, the verdict would still fail to adequately capture the totality of the accused's conduct."(102)

296. This Chamber fully concurs with the dissenting opinion thus entered. It notes that this position, which endorses the principle of cumulative charges, also finds support in various decisions rendered by the ICTY. In the case of the Zoran Kupreskic and others, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY in its decision on Defence challenges to form of the indictment held that:

> "The Prosecutor may be justified in bringing cumulative charges when the articles of the Statute referred to are designed to protect different values and when each article requires proof of a legal element not required by the others."(103)

297. Furthermore, the Chamber holds that offences covered under the Statute - genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II - have disparate ingredients and, especially, that their punishment is aimed at protecting discrete interests. As a result, multiple offences may be charged on the basis of the same acts, in order to capture the full extent of the crimes committed by an accused.

298. Finally, the Chamber notes that in Civil Law systems, including that of Rwanda, there a rule of concours idéal d'infractions which allows multiple charges for the same act under certain circumstances. Rwandan law allows multiple charges in the following circumstances:

> 'Penal Code of Rwanda: Chapter VI - Concurrent offences:
>
> Article 92: Where a person has committed several offences prior to a conviction on any such charges, such offences shall be concurrent.
>
> Article 93: Notional plurality of offences occurs:
>
> 1. Where a single conduct may be characterized as constituting several offences;
>
> 2. Where a conduct includes acts which, though constituting separate offences, are interrelated as deriving from the same criminal intent or as constituting lesser included offences of one another.
>
> 3. In the former case, only the sentence prescribed for the most serious offence shall be passed while, in the latter case, only the sentence provided for the most severely punished offence shall be passed, the maximum of which may be exceeded by half."

299. Consequently, in light of the foregoing, notably of the Akayesu and Rutaganda Judgements, the Chamber maintains that it is justified to convict an accused of two or more offences for the same act under certain circumstances.

1. The Akayesu Judgement

2. Judgement of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugosalvia, Case No.: IT -94-1-T, 7 May 1997.

3. Judgement of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Case No.: IT 96-21-T, The Prosecutor versus Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic, Esad Landzo, "The Celebici Case",16 November 1998.

4. The Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement.

5. The Rutaganda Judgement

6. Akayesu Judgement, para. 562.

7. Claude Pilloud et al., "Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949", 1987, p. 1012.

8. Complete Transcripts of the Proceedings of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, reprinted in R. John Pritchard and Sonia Magbanua Zaide (ed), the Tokyo War Crimes Trials,Vol. 20, Garland Publishing : New York and London 1981, Edition Garlands (Tokyo Trials Official Transcripts) 49, 791.

9. Celebici Judgement, para. 214.

10. The Prosecutor v. Milan Martic, Case No.: ICTR 95-11-1, 8 March 1996.

11. Tokyo Trial Official Transcript, pp. 49 820-21.

12. See Kai Ambos, Individual Criminal Responsibility in International Criminal Law, in G. K. McDonald/o. Swaak Goldman, Substantive and Procedural Aspects of International Criminal Law (1999, forthcoming).

13. The Government Commissioner of the General Tribunal of the Military Government for the French Zone of Occupation in Germany v. Herman Roechling and Others, Law Reports, Vol. XIV, Appendix B, p. 1075, para. 1092.

14. Ibid, Law Reports, Vol. XIV, Appendix B, p.1097, para. 1106.

15. Commentary to the Additional Protocols, n.9

16. The ICRC commentary to the Protocol makes it clear that "superior" refers to civilian as well as military leaders. "It should not be concluded that this provision [Article 86] only concerns the commander under whose direct orders the subordinate is placed. The role of commanders as such is dealt with in Article 87 (Duty of Commanders). The concept of a superior is broader and should be seen in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control." Yves Sandoz and al. Ed., 1987.

5778

17. Analysis of the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, p. 1-86-1

18. The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 9 December 1948.

19. Secretary-General's Report pursuant to para. 2 of Resolution 808 (1993) of the Security Council, 3 May 1993, S/25704.

20. Legislative Decree of 12 February 1975, Official Gazette of the Republic of Rwanda, 1975, p.230. Rwanda acceded to the Genocide Convention but stated that it shall not be bound by Article 9 of this Convention.

21. Summary Records of the meetings of the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly, 21 September - 10 December 1948, Official Records of the General Assembly.

22. Akayesu Judgement, para. 523.

23. Rutaganda Judgement, para. 63.

24. In this regard, the Chamber notes that, in the Akayesu Judgement, the Trial Chamber, having made this observation on the applicable law and having found Jean-Paul Akayesu guilty of the crime of genocide for certain acts, therefore found him not guilty of the crime of complicity in genocide for the same acts.

25. See, for example, Article 46 of the Senegalese Penal Code, Article 121-7 of the Nouveau code pénal français (New French Penal Code). It should be noted that the Rwandan Penal Code includes two other forms of participation, namely, incitement to commit a crime through speeches, shouting or threats uttered in public places or at public gatherings, or through the sale or dissemination, offer for sale or display of written material or printed matter in public places or at public gatherings, or through the public display of placards or posters, and complicity by harbouring or aiding a criminal.

26. See the conclusions of the Chamber on the dolus specialis of genocide, Section 3.2.2 of the Judgement.

27. See Summary Records of the meetings of the Sixth Committee of the General Assembly, 21 September - 10 December 1948, Official Records of the General Assembly.

28. Note by the Secretariat (1948) 8.

29. See UN Doc E/AC. 25/SR.16, p.4 (USA).

30. See UN Doc E/AC. 25/SR.16, p.5.

31. See UN Doc E/A.25/SR.16, p.5.

32. See Sixth Committee Report art. III(b), at 10.[Lippman (1994) 40].

33. Id.

34. United Nations War Crimes Commission (1948) 196.

35. According to the French Cour de Cassation, the agreement to act shall consist of a well-decided and positive will to act in relation to the common goal to commit the substantive offence.

36. See supra the Chamber's findings with respect to the mens rea of the crime of genocide, or the dolus specialis.

37. The crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is to that extent akin to the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide. In its findings on the crime of incitement to commit genocide in paragraph 52 of the Akayesu Judgement, the Chamber stated with respect to inchoate offences that: "[...] In the opinion of the Chamber, the fact that such acts are in themselves particularly dangerous because of the high risk they carry for society, even if they fail to produce results, warrants that they be punished as an exceptional measure. The Chamber holds that genocide clearly falls within the category of crimes so serious that direct and public incitement to commit such a crime must be punished as such, even where such incitement failed to produce the result expected by the perpetrator.

38. Don Stuart, Canadian Criminal Law: a Treatise, 1995, 3rd edition, p. 647.

39. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 563 to 576.

40. See Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted by the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Court on 17 July 1998.

41. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 578; Rutaganda Judgement, para. 66.

42. See Akayesu Judgement, fn 144, Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, fn 63 and Rutaganda; para. 68.

43. Report on the International Law Commission to the General Assembly, 51 U.N. GAOR Supp. (No 10) at 94 U.N.Doc. A/51/10 (1996)

44. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 580 and Rutaganda Judgement, para. 69.

45. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 581.

46. See Rutaganda and Judgement, para. 70.

47. Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 134.

48. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 582; Rutaganda Judgement, para. 72.

49. See Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflict; Article 50.

50. See Akayesu Judgement, para 584; Rutaganda Judgement, para. 72.

51. See 15 July 1999 Tadi Judgement of the Appeals Chamber, para. 305.

52. See id. para. 585.

53. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 589 and 590.

54. See Rutaganda Judgement, para. 81.

55. Akayesu Judgement, para. 589 and 590;Rutaganda Judgement, para.83.

56. See Rutaganda Judgement, para. 81.

57. Id. para. 598.

58. Akayesu Judgement, para. 597.

59. See Delalic Judgement, para. 478-9.

60. See Furundzija Judgement, para. 179.

61. Id. para. 181.

62. Id. para. 183

63. Id. para. 184-6.

64. Id.. para. 179.

65. Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Article 7(k).

66. See Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 151.

67. See Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement para. 156-158.

68. See Rutaganda Judgement, para. 90.

69. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 608.

70. See ICTY Tadi Judgement (7 May 1997).

71. See "Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction" (2 October 1995).

72. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 610.

73. Common Article 3 states:

In the case of armed conflict not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, each Party to the conflict shall be bound to apply, as a minimum, the following provisions:

(1) Persons taking no active part in hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without any adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria.

To this end, the following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever with respect to the above-mentioned persons:

(a) violence to life and persons, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture;

(b) taking of hostages;

(c) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment;

(d)the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regular constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples.

(2) The wounded and the sick shall be collected and cared for.

An impartial humanitarian body, such as the International Committee of the Red cross, may offer its services to the Parties to the conflict. The Parties to the conflict should further endeavour to bring into force, by means of special agreement, all or part of the other provisions of the present Convention. The application of the preceding provisions shall not affect the legal status of the Parties to the conflict.

74. See ICRC Commentary on Additional Protocol II, para. 4338-4341.

75. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 619-620.

76. See ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols of June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, para. 4448.

77. See Article 1 of the Additional Protocol II.

78. See ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocol, para. 4460-4462.

79. See ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocol, para. 4463.

80. Ibid., para. 4464-4471.

81. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 643.

82. See Rutaganda Judgement, para 102-103. The findings on this matter are in line with the findings of the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 188.

83. See Article 1(1) of the Additional Protocol II.

84. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 630 to 634.

85. See LRTWC, Vol. I. p. 103.

86. See LRTWC, Vol.I, p. 103.

87. See LRTWC,Vol. I. p.88.

88. See LRTWC, Vol. I, o. 46-55.

89. See Akayesu Judgement para. 633

90. See ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols, p.610, section 1913.

91. See ICRC Commentary on Additional Protocol II, para. 4490.

92. See Akayesu Judgement para. 635-636.

93. See Rutaganda Judgement, para. 104.

94. See ICTY "Decision on the Defense Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction" (2 October 1995), para. 69.

95. See " Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction" (2 October 1995), para. 94.

96. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 616.

97. The indictment against the major German War Criminals presented to the International Military Tribunal stated that "the prosecution will rely upon the facts pleaded under Count Three (violations of the laws and customs of war) as also constituting crimes against humanity (Count Four)." Several accused persons were convicted of both war crimes and crimes against humanity. The judgement of the International Military Tribunal delivered at Nuremberg on 30 September and 1 October 1946 ruled that "[...]from the beginning of the war in 1939 war crimes were committed on a vast scale, which were also crimes against humanity." The commentary on the Justice case held the same view: "It is clear that war crimes may also constitute crimes against humanity; the same offences may amount to both types of crimes." The trials on the basis of Control Council Law No. 10 followed the same approach. Pohl, Heinz Karl Franslau, Hans Loerner, and Erwin Tschentscher were all found to have committed war crimes and crimes against humanity. National cases, such as Quinn v. Robinson, the Eichmann case and the Barbie case also support this finding. In the Tadi case, Trial Chamber II of ICTY, based on the above reasoning, ruled that "acts which are enumerated elsewhere in the Statute may also entail additional culpability if they meet the requirements of persecution." Thus, the same acts, which meet the requirements of other crimes--grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, violation of the laws or customs of war and genocide, may also constitute the crimes against humanity for persecution.

98. Akayesu Judgement, para.468.

99. Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 627.

100. Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 645, 646 and 650.

101. Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, "Separate and Dissenting Opinion of Judge Tafazzal Hossain Khan Regarding the Verdicts Under the Charges of Crimes Against Humanity/Murder and Crimes Against Humanity/Extermination", para. 13.

5783

102. Ibid. para.33.

103. The Prosecutor v. Zoran Kupreskic and others, "Decision on Defence Challenges to Form of the Indictment", IT-95-16-PT, (15 May 1998).

5784

4. THE DEFENCE CASE

4.1 General admissions

4.2 The alibi

4.3 Further arguments

300. Musema pleaded not guilty to all counts of the initial Indictment at his initial appearance on 18 November 1997. Following amendments to the Indictment, Musema, on 20 November 1998 and 6 May 1999, pleaded not guilty to the new charges.

301. The Defence case comprised three general arguments:

1. that the Prosecution did not discharge its burden of proving Musema guilty;

2. that the Prosecution did not present sufficient evidence to satisfy the Chamber beyond reasonable doubt of Musema's guilt; and

3. that the Prosecution did not rebut the Defence alibi[(1)].

302. In support of these arguments, the Defence made a number of admissions and presented a defence of alibi as well as a number of further arguments. These are dealt with separately in the sections that follow.

4.1 General admissions

303. Musema made the following admissions pertaining to paragraphs 4.1-4.5, 4.9 and 4.11 of the Indictment.

Paragraph 4.1 of the Indictment

304. During the events referred to in the Indictment, Rwanda was divided into eleven Préfectures: Butare, Byumba, Cyangugu, Gikongoro, Gisenyi, Gitarama, Kibungo, Kibuye, Kigali-Ville, Kigali-Rural and Ruhengeri. Each préfecture was subdivided into communes which were divided into secteurs, and each secteur was divided into cellules.

Paragraph 4.2 of the Indictment

305. During the events that occurred in Rwanda between 1 January and 31 December 1994, the Hutus, the Tutsis and the Twas were respectively identified as racial or ethnic groups.

Paragraph 4.3 of the Indictment

306. On 6 April 1994, the plane carrying, among other passengers, the President of the Republic of Rwanda, Juvénal Habyarimana, was shot down on its approach to Kigali airport. In the hours that followed the crash of President Habyarimana's plane, violence set in and the massacres began in Kigali and in other préfectures in the country, marking the beginning of the genocide.

Paragraph 4.4 of the Indictment

5785

307. From about 9 April 1994 through 30 June 1994, thousands of men, women and children sought refuge in various locations in Bisesero. These men, women and children were predominantly Tutsis and were seeking refuge from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the préfecture of Kibuye. The area of Bisesero spans over two communes in Kibuye Préfecture.

Paragraph 4.5 of the Indictment

308. The individuals seeking refuge in the area of Bisesero were regularly attacked, throughout the period beginning on or about 9 April 1994 and ending on or about 30 June 1994. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the Tutsis in Bisesero. The attacks resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to men, women and children within the area of Bisesero.

Paragraph 4.9 of the Indictment

309. By 13 May 1994, Tutsi civilians had sought refuge at Muyira hill located in Gisovu Commune, Rwamkuba Secteur. Musema further admits that a major attack against these Tutsi civilians occurred on 13 May 1994 at Muyira hill.
310. On 13 May 1994 at Muyira Hill, genocide was committed against the Tutsi population. Musema also admits that on the same day at Muyira Hill, murder, extermination and other inhumane acts occurred as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on ethnic grounds.

Paragraph 4.11 of the Indictment

311. The interim government, sworn in on 9 April 1994 and composed solely of prominent Hutus, espoused the objective of extermination of Tutsis. Members of the interim government incited the population to eliminate "the enemy"and its "accomplices". Musema admits that some members of the interim government participated directly in the massacres. During the genocide, the FAR, particularly units of the Presidential Guard, the Para-Commando Battalion and Reconnaissance Battalion, in complicity with militia men, actively participated in the massacres of the Tutsi population throughout Rwanda.
312. In the years following independence, the political scene was dominated by people identified as Hutus. Those identified as Tutsis were excluded from senior positions in the civil service and the army.
313. Musema admits there were ethnic confrontations between the Hutus and Tutsis and that there was a mass exodus of the Tutsi minority from Rwanda into neighbouring countries. On several occasions individuals perceived and identified as Tutsis were the targets of oppressive treatment. For instance, a few days following the invasion of Rwanda on 1 October 1990 by the FPR (made up mainly of Tutsi refugees), Tutsi and any Hutu political opponents characterized as FPR accomplices were arrested by the MRND Habyarimana regime. Between 1990 and April 1994, according to Musema, the same regime assassinated certain political opponents and massacred many Tutsi civilians in the rural areas. The interim government that was established after Habyarimana's death was characterized by Hutu extremism and overt incitement to extermination of Tutsis and of the enemy and its accomplices. Prominent figures close to Habyarimana carried out propaganda campaigns via the radio and the press with the intention of ensuring widespread dissemination of hate propaganda, calls to ethnic violence, and extermination of Tutsis and their accomplices. The MRND party also organized and trained youth wings of the ethnically founded political parties, notably the Interahamwe (the youth wing of the MRND). The interim government executed the objective of exterminating the Tutsis and their accomplices by inciting the public to exterminate the Tutsis and their accomplices.

5786

314. The military and militiamen set up roadblocks throughout Kigali. At the roadblocks, the identity cards of anyone wishing to pass were checked, and people were killed. Military patrols, often involving militia men, scoured the city to execute Tutsis and certain political opponents. Musema admits that all along the road from Kigali to Gitarama there were road blocks manned by individuals, some of whom were drunk, armed with machetes and other weapons. He admits that he saw many bodies by the road side and witnessed pillaging. Musema admits that the people who were killed at the roadblocks were so killed because they were accused of being Inyenzi, because they were Tutsis, or because they looked Tutsi.
315. The incitement to ethnic hatred took the form of public speeches by people sharing the extremist ideology.
316. During the months of April, May, and June 1994, in Gisovu and Gishyita communes, Kibuye Préfecture, in the Territory of Rwanda, genocide was committed against the Tutsi population. Musema admits that between 1 January and 31 December 1994, throughout Rwanda, there were widespread or systematic attacks, which were directed against a civilian population on the grounds of political persuasion, ethnic affiliation, and racial origin.

4.2 The Alibi

317. The Defence Case included the submission of an alibi defence. The Defence alleged that Musema was in locations other than those alleged to be crime sites, or was involved in activities other than those alleged during the times at which the crimes specified in the Indictment were allegedly committed. To support these claims, the Defence relied on three sources of evidence:

    (a) the testimony of the Accused, supported by documentary evidence;

    (b) the testimony of Defence Witnesses in support of the testimony of Musema;

    (c) the testimony of Witnesses which tended to confirm the authenticity of certain documents.

318. The Chamber has already addressed the legal requirements of a defence of alibi(2).
319. The arguments raised by the Defence in relation to the alibi were of two forms. Firstly, concerning the content of the alibi; secondly, in response to the Prosecutor's rebuttal of the alibi.

4.2.1 The content of the alibi

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema from 6 to 14 April 1994

320. Defence counsel argued that Musema was absent from the Tea Factory on 6 April 1994 and on subsequent days. This is based on a number of documents, including letters sent by Musema during that period to Rwagapfizi and Pletscher(3). Musema testified that he was in Kigali, at the OCIR-Thé, from 1 to12 April, in Gitarama from 12 to13 April, in Rubona from 13 to14 April, and in Gisovu from 14 to 17 April. The Defence argued that even if Musema were present at the Gisovu Tea Factory at the time of the alleged crimes, this itinerary reveals that as Musema was not present in the early stages, he did not inspire the atrocities which had already begun.
321. Mrs Claire Kayuku, wife of Musema, testified that he was with the family in their house in Remera, Kigali, from 6 April to 12 April. She stated that they left Kigali on the afternoon of 12 April for Butare, but, due to difficulties at roadblocks, stayed a night in Gitarama. She stated that they left Gitarama on the afternoon of the next day, 13 April, and went to her mother's home in Rubona, 15 kilometres north of Butare.

5787

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema from 14 to 22 April 1994

322. Musema testified that he went to the Gisovu Tea Factory on 14 April, 1994, with one soldier. Upon arrival he saw a number of bodies of employees and their families, including the body of the Chief Accountant, at the factory.
323. Musema testified that he spent 15 April at the tea factory until early 17 April when, learning that the factory was being attacked, he fled towards Butare and then to Rubona. Musema remained in Rubona until 22 April, except for two day-trips to Gitarama on 18 and 21 April, where he met with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Handicrafts and was told that he would be sent on a mission to contact the director-general of OCIR-Thé.
324. Claire Kayuku testified that Musema was with the family in Rubona on 13 April. On 14 April he went to Butare to look for an escort, returning very early on 16 or 17 April, having, in the meantime, visited the Gisovu Tea Factory. Musema told her that Annunciata was killed while he was at the factory.

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema from 22 April until the end of April 1994

325. The Defence Counsel submitted as evidence the Ordre de Mission of 21 April (Annex B), discovered at the Gisovu Tea factory by the Swiss Juge in 1995(4). The Defence claimed that this document confirms the activities of Musema between 22 April and 7 May. Musema agreed that the documents referred to and the actual mission did not follow regular procedure, but stated that the deplacement of the government, and the unknown whereabouts of the OCIR-Thé Director-General, occurred as a result of the prevailing security situation in April 1994.
326. Further documents support that Musema undertook a mission to different tea factories, such as Pfunda Tea Factory in Gisenyi Préfecture, between 22 to 25 April(5). He testified, supported by documentary evidence, that he remained in Rubona during 26 to 29 April, visiting Kitabi Factory on 28 April(6). Reports from meetings of 29 and 30 April from Gisovu Tea Factory indicate that Musema was at the factory as part of his mission, and that he presented an authorisation to travel, dated 30 April, from the Préfet of Kibuye(7). The Defence Counsel argued that was this document a forged document, Musema would not have mentioned his presence at Gisovu during this time period. Other documents also provide evidence of Musema's presence in Gisovu until 2 May(8).
327. Claire Kayuku testified that her husband was in Rubona between 16 April and 22 April, travelling once or twice in that period to Gitarama, but spending every night at home in Rubona. According to her, Musema left for Gisenyi Préfecture on 22 April. He returned on 26 April.

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema in early to mid May 1994

328. Musema presented further documentary material, and oral testimony in support of his alibi defence for the month of May, 1994. The Defence submitted that between 3 May and 19 May, Musema visited Rubona, Butare, and Gitarama. The Ordre de Mission has stamps dated 3-5 May from Shagasha and Gisakura Tea Factories, and from Mata Tea Factory 7 May(9). Musema testified that he spent from 5 to 19 May in Rubona, making one day trip to Mata 7 May, and that during such period he never set a foot near Kibuye Préfecture.
329. Defence Witness MG testified to having met Musema twice in Gitarama on dates, in late April or in early May, before 16 May, and Defence Witness MH testified to having met Musema in Gitarama on 10 May and in Rubona on 13 May, and Defence Counsel submitted documentary evidence that Musema was present in Rubona on and around 17 May(10).

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema in mid to late May 1994

5788

330. Following the Ordre de Mission, Musema returned to Gisovu on 19 May where he remained until 21 May, making a visit to Kibuye on 20 May.(11) Musema returned to Rubona on 21 May, where he allegedly stayed until 27 May. He allegedly returned to Gisovu on 27 May. The Defence presented letters to show that Musema was only present in Gisovu from 19 May to 21 May, dealing with documents for the months of April and May(12). Together, the Defence claimed, these documents demonstrate Musema's absence from Gisovu during the period from 21 May to 29 May, as he had not dealt with administrative matters in his usual pattern.
331. Upon Musema's return on 27 May to Gisovu, he only remained there until 29 May, making a visit to Kibuye on 28 May, before leaving to Shagasha on 29 May. Musema remained in Shagasha until 30 May when he left for Cyangugu. On 31 May he left Cyangugu to visit Zaïre. Musema's Defence Counsel presented further documentary evidence in support of Musema's whereabouts for the end of May.
332. Claire Kayuku supported Musema's alibi concerning his whereabouts from the end of April until the end of May. She testified that he did not travel a great deal after 26 April, but according to her, he spent most nights in Rubona with her.

The whereabouts of Alfred Musema in June and July 1994

333. According to the testimony of Claire Kayuku, on 10 June, Musema went to the tea factory in Gisovu until17 June when he went to Shagasha. From Shagasha he visited his family in Gikongoro on 19 June, and left on 20 June for Gisovu and drove towards Gisenyi on 21 June. Claire Kayuku did not see him again until 24 July 1994, in Bukavu in Zaïre.
334. The Defence submitted documentary evidence and witness testimonies in support of the claims that Musema was at the Shagasha Tea Factory from 1 June to 10 June, in Gisovu on 20 June, and on mission to Cyangugu, Gikongoro, Butare and Gisenyi between 17 June and 17 July. When he returned to Gisovu, Musema responded to correspondence received throughout June, which allegedly indicates his prior absence.
335. The Defence introduced further documents as evidence that Musema was in Gisovu from 28 June until 25 July. On or about 4 July 1994, French troops arrived at the tea factory where they stayed until Musema's departure. Musema testified that he had no knowledge of what occurred on 16 July, after which many prominent leaders left Rwanda for Zaïre. The Defence submitted a letter, dated 18 July, from the French military, and correspondence from employees, dated 20 July. Musema testified that he replied to the letter from the French Army, thanking the soldiers for their protection, and that he surrendered his personal pistol(13).

4.2.2 Arguments in response to the Prosecutor's rebuttal of the alibi

336. The Prosecutor argued that Musema's alibi is untruthful, and that the documents in the Swiss Files, including a personal calendar written by Musema (Annex C), along with the testimonies of the prosecution witnesses, provide a more accurate representation of Musema's true whereabouts during the relevant period.
337. The Defence presented several arguments to counter the Prosecutions rebuttal. The Defence argued that the Swiss Files are unreliable because of the circumstances and conditions of the Swiss interviews and investigations. Musema testified that during the first two interrogations conducted by Swiss officials he was not represented by counsel, and that at other interrogations he was represented only by a trainee lawyer; that he was not advised of his right to remain silent; that both he and his counsel were denied access to transcripts of the interviews and to his files; that he was pressured to sign every page of the transcript of the interviews without having read it; that the information recorded in the transcripts was at times inaccurate(14); and that he produced the calendars and schedules without the assistance of his files (or dossier).

5789

338. The Defence introduced four exhibits (D85, D86, D87, D88) to prove that Musema did not see his files until more than one year after his arrest. The Defence argued that the files are unreliable because not all interrogations conducted by the Prosecutions are admissible under the Rules.(15)
339. The Defence argued that documents provided by Musema to the Swiss juge d'instruction, are, by their nature, truthful. The Defence suggested that, if Musema had fabricated these documents with a view to providing a defence before any future criminal proceedings, he would have known the dates, nine months after the alleged incidents at Muyira Hill, when he provided dates to the Swiss juge d'instruction; he would not have given the juge a calendar placing him in Gisovu on 13 May if he had known what had happened there at that time; he would have fabricated a document specifically for 13 May 1994, instead of providing documents around that date(16). The Defence further argued that the documents were reliable business records compiled during the normal course of every day proceeding. (17)

4.3 Further arguments

4.3.1 The requirement that the Accused respond to Counts 7, 8 and 9 of the Indictment

340. The Defence argued that, pursuant to Articles 19(2) and 20(4)(a) of the Statute, and in accord with the spirit of the Rules, the Accused had no cause to answer on the amended or added counts 7, 8 and 9 of the Indictment, since the Indictment, as amended by order of the Chamber on 6 May 1999, was never served on the Accused. The last Indictment served on the Accused was the amended Indictment of 18 November 1998.
341. In relation to this argument the Chamber notes briefly:

- that in its Decision on the Prosecutor's Request for Leave to Amend the Indictment of 6 May 1999, the Chamber reminded "the Prosecutor of her obligation to immediately serve on the Accused and his Counsel the amended indictment in English and in French";

- that the fact that the Accused entered pleas of Not Guilty to Counts 7, 8 and 9 of the amended Indictment on 6 May 1999 is evidence that the Accused received and had knowledge of the amended Indictment; and

- that the failure to formally serve the Accused with the amended Indictment did not infringe his rights under Article 19 and sub-Article 20(4)(a) of the Statute.

342. The Chamber accordingly finds that the Accused does have a cause to answer on Counts 7, 8 and 9.

4.3.2 The authority of Alfred Musema

343. The Defence argued that Musema's political activity was minimal, and that the prosecution failed to produce evidence to support Witness W's claim of Musema's involvement in the regime's politics. Musema testified that he was never involved in political activities at school or at University, but that, like other Rwandan citizens, he was a member of the MRND. He admitted that his father-in-law was a member of Parliament. Musema testified that he was the Director of Gisovu Tea Factory, but denied being the eyes and ears of the government in Gisovu or Kibuye because of his position as director. The Defence argued that the Prosecutor produced no evidence to establish that Musema was an influential person in Kibuye Préfecture, or to show that he exercised civic authority.

344. The Defence argued that the nature of Musema's appointment as Director of Gisovu Tea Factory was not conclusive evidence of any association with the government regime. While Musema's appointment by Presidential decree to this position was unusual, it was not unique insofar as one other tea factory director was appointed during the same period by Presidential decree. Since no other tea factory directors were appointed subsequently, it is unclear whether this was a new form of procedure being adopted for such appointments(18).
345. The Defence argued that Musema was a dedicated businessman and nothing more. Musema testified that the Gisovu Tea Factory, one of the top tea factories in Rwanda traded on the London tea market. Defence Exhibit 11, a table of figures from Wilson Smith & Co., was tendered by the Defence as evidence of the quality of tea produced by the factory.
346. Musema testified that although the factory was situated in Kibuye, his zone of responsibility as Director spanned two préfectures, Kibuye and Gikongoro. He stated that the bourgmestre and préfet had no influence on the management of the tea factory. The only influence either the bourgemestre or the préfet might exert was in the recruitment of family members for employment. Musema testified that the tea factory was not the largest employer in the region and that his position as a director was not political. He explained that two trips between 1984 and 1994 to the Kenya Tea Development Authority and to Morocco were not related to politics(19).
347. Claire Kayuku testified that Musema, as Director of the Tea Factory, was an influential person in the area. However, he was not part of the interim government, politically or in any other manner.

4.3.3 Arguments concerning the reliability of evidence

348. The Defence argued that much of the Prosecution evidence was unreliable.
349. The Defence argued that much of the investigation, which is the basis of the Prosecution's evidence, was unreliable. Specifically, the Defence challenged the absence of forensic and real evidence, and the Prosecutions failure to introduce relevant evidence from the Gisovu Tea Factory, which the Defence later presented(20).
350. The Defence also challenged the testimonies of Prosecution witnesses whose memories were affected by the passage of time. The Defence also argued that witnesses mistakenly identified Musema by erroneously associating him with vehicles and employees of the tea factory(21).
351. The Defence contended that documents may be more reliable than oral testing to re-establish events which occurred many years ago, especially when such documents relate to the ordinary affairs of an individual. The Defence argued that the passage of time impeded the Musema's defence, since documents may disappear, and access to evidence may become limited(22).
352. The Defence argued that many of the documents on which Musema relied where intended only as a means of refreshing his memory. The Defence contended that Musema may have made errors concerning dates when he drafted the documents for the Swiss juge d'instruction, but only the specific dates, not the events were in error(23).
353. The Defence argued that the Prosecutor's allegations that Musema lied are untrue and irrelevant. The Defence claimed that inconsistencies may have arisen not because Musema intentionally lied, but because he was merely mistaken in his recollections. The Defence further argued that, even if the Chamber were convinced that Musema did lie, the Chamber should not necessarily conclude that he is guilty. The Defence argued that Musema might, should he be lying, have many "innocent" reasons for doing so.(24)

5791

1. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

2. See Section 2.3 of the Judgement

3. See exhibits D 25 & 36

4. See exhibits D 10 & 29

5. Id

6. Id

7. See exhibits D 30, 31, 32 & 33

8. See exhibits D 28, 34 & 35

9. See exhibits D 10 & 35

10. See exhibits D 92, 101 & 102

11. See exhibit D 10

12. See exhibits D 47, 48 & 49

13. See exhibits D 81, 82, 83 & 22

14. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

15. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

16. See exhibits D 36,45 & 46; Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

17. See supra, Section 2.2 of the Judgement

18. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

19. Id.

20. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

21. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

22. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

23. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

24. See Defence Closing Argument, 28 June 1999

5792

5. FACTUAL FINDINGS

5.1 Context of the events alleged

5.2 Massacres in the Bisesero region

5.3 Sexual crimes

5.4 Musema's authority

5.1 Context of the events alleged

354. Paragraphs 4.1, 4.2 and 4.3 of the Indictment, under the heading "A concise statement of the facts", contain allegations on the general context in Rwanda in 1994, as well as general elements of the crimes which the Accused is charged with committing.
355. Musema admits that during the relevant events, Rwanda was divided into eleven Préfectures, one of which was Kibuye, as alleged in Paragraph 4.1 of the Indictment.
356. Musema admits that during the relevant events, Tutsis were identified as members of an ethnic or racial group, as alleged in Paragraph 4.2 of the Indictment.
357. Musema's admissions also include the fact that for many years prior to 1994, the Tutsis, like the Hutus and Twas, were perceived and identified as an ethnic or racial group and that the Tutsis were the targets of discrimination and killings as such, which prior to 1994 stemmed from the socio-political situation in Rwanda. As noted under "General Admissions" (supra),[1] Musema admitted that in the years following independence, the political scene was dominated by people identified as Hutus. The targeting of the people identified as Tutsi for oppression and discrimination also involved their exclusion from senior positions in politics, the civil service and the army, their arrest and detention and, toward 1993, the overt incitement to violence and extermination of the Tutsi group.
358. In addition to that, Musema admits that in 1994 widespread or systematic attacks were directed against civilians on the grounds of ethnic or racial origin. Musema testified that the massacres in 1994 were targeted and directed against the Tutsi civilians not as individuals but as members of the said group.
359. Musema admits that on 6 April 1994, the plane transporting President Juvénal Habyarimana of Rwanda crashed on its approach to Kigali airport, Rwanda and that attacks and killings of civilians began soon thereafter throughout Rwanda, as alleged in Paragraph 4.3 of the Indictment.
360. Musema testified that while in his house in Kigali, he heard and saw the shots aimed at the plane, heard an explosion, although he did not see the plane crash, nor was he aware of those who were on board. The following day, on RTLM, he learnt of the crash and of those on board. He also admitted the occurrence of this incident and the inception of violence in Rwanda soon thereafter. Musema testified that in the days following the plane crash he witnessed massacres, the destruction of houses and the displacement of people from Kigali. Musema admitted that in the hours following the crash of the President's plane, violence set in and massacres began in Kigali and other préfectures in the country, marking the beginning of massacres described by him as a genocide. As he travelled between Kigali and Gitarama during the time of the massacres, he saw individuals manning roadblocks. These persons separated people they identified as Tutsi or those accused of being Inyenzi by asking for identity cards which indicated the ethnic group of the holders. Musema stated that these persons manning the roadblock threatened him and his family with death. At the roadsides he saw many bodies. He stated that the victims of the massacres were killed, because they were Tutsis (so-called Inyenzi) or because they looked Tutsi or because they were accused of helping the Tutsis. The majority of the victims were Tutsis. Musema stated that the victims included Tutsi children, who naturally could not have been among the FAR or FPR fighters.

361. In light of these admissions, these facts are not in dispute. The Chamber finds, therefore, that the allegations set forth in Paragraphs 4.1, 4.2 and 4.3 of the Indictment have been established beyond reasonable doubt.

5.2 Massacres in the Bisesero region

362. Paragraphs 4.4 to 4.6 and 4.11 of the Indictment charge Musema for his involvement in massacres which occurred in the region of Bisesero from 9 April 1994 until 30 June 1994. They read as follows:

> "4.4 The area of Bisesero spans two communes in Kibuye Prefecture. From about 9 April 1994 through 30 June 1994, thousands of men, women and children sought refuge in various locations in Bisesero. These men, women and children were predominantly Tutsis and were seeking refuge from attacks on Tutsis which had occurred throughout the Prefecture of Kibuye.
>
> 4.5 The individuals seeking refuge in the area of Bisesero were regularly attacked, throughout the period of about 9 April 1994 through about 30 June 1994. The attackers used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the Tutsis in Bisesero.
>
> 4.6 At various locations and times throughout April, May and June 1994, and often in concert with others, Alfred Musema brought to the area of Bisesero armed individuals and directed them to attack people seeking refuge there. In addition, at various locations and times, and often in concert with others Alfred Musema personally attacked and killed persons seeking refuge in Bisesero.
>
> 4.11 The attacks described above resulted in thousands of deaths and numerous injuries to the men, women and children within the area of Bisesero in Gisovu and Gishyita communes, Kibuye Prefecture."

363. As already developed by the Chamber in the section on the General Admissions of the Defence(2), it is not contested that regular attacks occurred in the Bisesero region from 9 April 1994 until about 30 June 1994. The victims were thousands of men, women and children who were predominantly Tutsis and who had sought refuge in the Bisesero region. The attackers were armed with guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons. Thousands of Tutsis were killed, injured and maimed. On 13 May 1994, thousands of Tutsis who had sought refuge on Muyira hill in Gisovu Commune, Rwankuba Secteur, were subjected to a major attack and massacred.
364. The Defence, however, denies the involvement, whether by direct participation or by aiding and abetting in the execution of these massacres, of Musema. Reliance is placed upon the alibi and on the lack of credibility of the Prosecution witnesses testifying on these allegations.
365. The evidence adduced by the Prosecutor in this case concentrates on a number of specific massacres mainly in the Bisesero region, in which Musema is said to have participated. The Chamber shall deal with these matters in a chronological manner along with any other sightings and movements of Musema.

April and May 1994

366. A number of witnesses testify they saw Musema in April and May 1994 participate in massacres against Tutsi civilians.
367. The position of the Defence is that Musema went to Rubona from Gisovu by 17 April and that he was then, from 22 April, on mission visiting a number of tea factories and thus was not present at the locations referred to by these witnesses. Support for this alibi stems in the main from exhibit D10, an "ordre de mission" (mission order), which was said to be issued to Musema in Gitarama, and then stamped, signed and dated at each tea factory he visited. Other documents and a number of witnesses were also presented by the Defence as further evidence of the movement of Musema. The Prosecutor submitted that this mission order had been falsified so as to hide the extent of Musema's involvement in the massacres which occurred in the Bisesero region.
368. For the sake of clarity, in view of the complexity and number of issues which arise from the pertinent evidence during this period, the Chamber will first recall the testimony of prosecution witnesses relevant to massacres as they occurred in a chronological manner. The Chamber will then deal with the alibi presented by Musema, after which the factual findings will be made.

•Gisovu Tea Factory, 15 April 1994

369. The Chamber notes that evidence presented during trial, namely the testimony of two Prosecution witnesses and Musema, relate to the alleged killing of a number of children at the tea factory. The Chamber is of the opinion that this evidence was unclear and inconsistent, and moreover, the events are not specifically averred to in the Indictment. As such, the Chamber shall not make any findings on these allegations.

•Muko and Musebeya Communes, 15 April 1994

370. Prosecution Witness BB testified as to the whereabouts of Musema on 15 April 1994. The witness, who was based at the Gisakura Tea Factory in 1994, was not physically at this tea factory between 12 and 24 April 1994, as he was hiding in the communes of Muko and Musebeya. He heard that, on 15 April, the director of the Gisovu Tea Factory was seen in the communes of Musebeya and Muko at the wheel of a Daihatsu truck transporting individuals armed with spears and machetes. He received this information from workers from Gisakura and Muko.

•Karongi hill FM Station, 18 April 1994

371. Prosecution Witness M testified that, on 15 April 1994, his mother, his three children and himself went to the Karongi hill FM station, which he identified in exhibit 20.18. According to the witness, the hill is about 2000 metres high, with only one access road to the top. They hid there with friends of his who were guards at the FM station. On 18 April, he saw Musema lead a meeting of approximately 150 people. Some of these people came on foot whereas others, about 80 people, including Musema, had arrived aboard two vehicles, both Daihatsus, each bearing the inscription "Usine à thé Gisovu". The witness recognized the driver of the Daihatsu transporting Musema and knew him to be an employee of the tea factory.
372. The witness stated that he was hiding in the guard's hut 10 metres away from where the meeting had convened and was able to see everything through holes in the walls of mud and wood. The hut was three metres by four metres, with one main door, no windows, was split into two rooms and was used by the guards while working at the FM station. He saw people from Gisovu and Mwendo, having first spotted them as the vehicles had commenced the ascent of the hill while he was at the summit. Most of the people at the meeting wore banana leaves and grass on their heads. Musema wore a sports tracksuit. Certain employees of the tea factory were dressed in blue "Usine à thé" overalls. Musema was carrying a medium length gun and a small number of other people were also carrying weapons, namely machetes, clubs and some rifles. The witness was only able to recognize Rekayabo, a communal policeman from Gisovu Commune, and Munyanziza, unemployed and a member of the MRND, because he was too scared and he could not observe very well.

373. According to the witness, Musema addressed those who had convened in Kinyarwanda, telling them to rise together and fight their enemy the Tutsis and deliver their country from the enemy. Questions were put to him by the crowd, asking what would be their rewards considering that they might lose their lives in this war. Musema answered that there would be no problem in finding rewards, that the unemployed would take the jobs of those killed, and that they would appropriate the lands and properties of the Tutsis. He stated that those who wanted to have fun could rape the women and girls of the Tutsis without fearing any consequences. The crowd applauded Musema. Musema then told the crowd to be patient and wait for all those who had hidden to come out and go to the camp where the Tutsis had sought refuge.
374. Witness M went on to state that, at this point, Musema asked the witness' friend, the only guard then on duty at the Station, to hand over rifles and ammunition as the crowd wanted to attack the camp on that very day. It was common knowledge that there were weapons at the Station. The guard hesitated in complying, saying that there was a need to get authorization from the commander of Kibuye. Musema shouted at him, telling him that it was a crime not to hand over weapons to defend the country and that if the commander knew of this refusal, the guard could be severely punished.
375. The witness stated that he observed that the guard, unaccompanied, then went to the hut to collect the rifles and ammunition. According to the witness, the Lee Enfield rifles and ammunition were stored in the room next to the one in which he was hiding. The ammunition was stored in a metallic box against a wall. In the same room were a few pots and pans, foodstuffs and a large folded military tent. The bed was simply grass strewn onto the floor. He described that on walking into the hut, one would first see stones on which the cooking was carried out. Witness M was in the first room and his family were in the adjoining room with the ammunition and rifles. When the guard came to collect the rifles, the witness joined his family in the other room, the walls of which he was unable to see through. When the guard left, closing the front door behind him, the witness went back into the front room so that he could see what was happening outside.
376. According to the witness, the guard then gave Musema the two Lee Enfield rifles and some ammunition, and showed him how to use the weapons, and then loaded bullets into the magazine. Musema and the crowd left immediately thereafter in the direction of the Gitwa "Tutsi" refugee camp. During the whole meeting, none of those who had gathered at the top of Karongi hill had gone to the hut to see what or who was inside.
377. Witness M concluded his testimony in this regard by stating that he saw Musema, in the company of two policemen from the factory, stay with the vehicles which were parked away from the camp so that they would not be damaged if the refugees pushed the attackers back. The rest of the attackers went towards the refugee camp in Gitwa, Rubazo Secteur, Gitesi Commune. According to the witness, who had an electronic watch, the attack commenced between 12:30hrs and 13:00hrs and finished around 15:00hrs. The victims were mainly the refugees. After the attack, Musema left Gitwa with the attackers who had come from different regions. Some were on foot, others aboard vehicles.
378. During cross-examination, witness M affirmed the testimony he had given in direct examination. He provided further details regarding the hut, access to the Karongi hill FM Station and other physical aspects of the locality. Witness M also confirmed that he was able to see and hear the meeting and that he saw Musema, as he had testified in direct examination. 5796

•Near the Gisovu Tea Factory, on or about 20 April 1994

379. Prosecution Witness K, who hid in tea plantations in Twumba, in the Gitabura Secteur from 8 April 1994 for two weeks, stated that he saw Musema during this period transporting assailants to the Bisesero region.
380. Questioned as to his hiding place during this period, the witness specified that he was in the "villageois" tea plantation, which he identified on the left hand side of photo exhibit P27.1. However, when asked to point out in the same photo the Gikongoro road about which he testified, he was unable to do so, indicating rather that it would be easier for him to be on the terrain as it was not very clear from the photo.
381. Witness K went on to say that in April 1994, he saw Musema in his Pajero driving in front of a tea factory Daihatsu going in the direction of Gikongoro. Aboard the Daihatsu, a person using a microphone was calling for others to come to help as the tea factory had been attacked by Inyenzi. The Witness said that "Inyenzi" meant "Tutsis" and that in April 1994 the tea factory had not been attacked by the Tutsis. According to the witness, this was a way of assembling at the tea factory people from Gikongoro and tea factory workers so as to take them to Bisesero.
382. When questioned as to how he knew the vehicles were going to Gikongoro, the witness stated that he first saw Musema as he returned from Gikongoro with a vehicle loaded with persons armed with spears and clubs. On arriving at a bridge where there was an "arc de triomphe", Musema showed them the road to take while he went up to the factory. The witness testified that they were singing "Let's exterminate them, let's finish them from the forest in which they are hiding". The witness added that he was able to see all of this from the tea plantation in which he was hiding. After the vehicle from Gikongoro had been to the tea factory, all three tea factory Daihatsus went to Bisesero. The vehicles were identifiable as belonging to the tea factory as they bore the inscription "Usine à thé Gisovu".
383. Amongst those who were taken to Bisesero, Witness K said he recognized employees of the tea factory. The names of these people form part of exhibit P35. Only a certain Mushoka was armed; the others were dancing in the back of the vehicle. The witness added that there were also Twas with them and that they were armed with spears and clubs.
384. According to the witness, after the attack in Bisesero, certain of the people from Gikongoro were on foot and had cattle and crops in their possession. Musema was travelling in front of the Daihatsu. The witness indicated that fewer people returned from Bisesero than had gone there. The vehicles then parked at the tea factory.
385. The Chamber notes that it became apparent during the proceedings that there exist discrepancies between the witness' testimony and previous statements he had made to the Prosecutor and to the Swiss authorities. In his statement of 13 October 1995, Witness K stated that for three days from 7 April 1994, there were killings in Gitabura, after which he went to Bisesero. Thus, no mention of the tea plantation. The witness denies having stated this and reaffirmed that he went to the tea plantation on 8 April 1994 where he stayed for two weeks, and then he went to Bisesero. He explained that the investigator must have presumed that everyone sought refuge in Bisesero which would explain why in the statement it was indicated that he had gone to Bisesero after three days.
386. In his statement of 17 June 1995 to the Swiss authorities, Witness K said that he had stayed in the tea plantations from 8 April to 20 May 1994. In responding to questions on this statement, the witness testified that the date of 20 May should rather be 20 April.
387. The Chamber notes that the date of 20 May 1994 is mentioned seven times in the statement, while there is no mention of 20 April 1994.
388. The witness then explained that although the statement read that he did not see Musema before "20 May", it should actually read "20 April". In answer to the next question, he confirmed that he had seen Musema before 20 April 1994.

389. Furthermore, in the statement, the witness says that he remembered the date of 20 May as he had written it on a piece of paper, and that he had not seen Musema prior to that date. He added that this note was in actual fact the one he referred to as regards 13 May 1994, being the note he had found amongst cadavers after an attack, and which had been read by many people. Witness K continued by explaining that on 20 May he did see vehicles, and that as he was on a hill in the rain he had not written the date but had memorized it. Thus the verb "to write", he stated, should read "to memorize".
390. In his statement of 17 November 1998, the witness had asked for the date of 20 May 1994 to be changed to 20 April 1994 in his statement of 17 June and 13 October 1995.

•Gitwa Hill, 26 April 1994

391. Witness M is the sole prosecution witness to have specifically testified about an attack which occurred on Gitwa hill on 26 April 1994. The witness who had been hiding in a hut at Karongi hill FM station, as discussed above, left his hiding place on 20 April 1994 having been told by his friend that other guards were coming to the FM station to replace those who had left their posts. He and his family hid in the bush.
392. Witness M told the Tribunal that on 26 April 1994 he witnessed an attack led by Musema. The attack started between 12:00hrs and 12:30hrs on Gitwa hill where the refugees had assembled. A total of eight vehicles, three Toyotas and a Suzuki belonging to the Gasenyi school group, two yellow MINITRAPE vehicles, and two Daihatsus from the Gisovu Tea Factory came to the hill. According to the witness, in addition to those in the vehicles, the people on the road and paths going to the hill numbered the same as people coming out of a stadium after a great event, "a manifestation".
393. Witness M said he saw Musema aboard one of the Daihatsus with tea factory workers wearing blue uniforms. He was carrying a firearm, while the other attackers bore traditional weapons and were dressed in banana leaves and grass belts called "Umuhurura"(3) in Kinyarwanda. The attackers killed with a determination unlike before to such an extent that, apart from a few men, no woman or child was able to survive. Musema and others shot into the crowd as such, individuals fell as they fled. Thousands were killed, including many of the witness' relatives.
394. The witness said he knew that the attack took place on 26 April as he had consulted his electronic watch which worked during that period. He explained that as this was the biggest attack he had seen, he consulted his watch so that he could remember the date while alive. He had also consulted his watch during the meeting of 18 April 1994, as he had done for all other important events. However, when questioned as to the date of his statement (in fact 13 January 1999), the witness recalled that it was in January but was not sure of the precise date.

•End of April - beginning of May

395. Witness F testified that, between 17 and 30 April 1994, assailants coming on the one hand from the commune of Gishyita, and, on the other hand, from Gisovu, converged on Muyira hill. Amongst the Gisovu group he saw Ndimbati, bourgmestre of Gisovu Commune, Eliezer Niyitegeka, Minister of Information, and the Director of the tea factory in Gisovu. The witness testified that the assailants were pushed back after the first attack but returned after 30 minutes to launch a second attack. He specified that it was during this second attack that he saw Musema amongst the assailants. Musema shot at refugees who had surrounded a policeman, and then ran away to his car, which was red. The witness affirmed that Musema was carrying a black rifle of medium length.
396. Witness R testified about an attack which took place around the end of April, or the beginning of May, on Rwirambo hill opposite Muyira hill in Bisesero, during which he was injured.
397. He explained that this attack started in the morning and came from Gisovu. The leaders of the attack were Aloys Ndimbati, the bourgmestre of Gishyita, and Musema, the Director of the tea factory. Musema, who was armed with a rifle of unspecified length, was within rifle range of the witness. Musema had arrived in his red Pajero, followed shortly afterwards by the vehicle of Ndimbati. Other vehicles seen by the witness were 4 tea factory Daihatsu "camionettes" aboard which were Interahamwe. The witness was able to identify the Interahamwe as they wore blue uniforms, on the back of which was printed "Usine à thé de Gisovu". Two of the camionettes were green, one was yellow and one was white. All had "Usine à thé Gisovu" printed on their side panelling.

398. The witness said he saw that the attackers were armed with clubs, rifles and spears. While in a nearby valley looking for water, Witness R was injured from a shot which came from the direction of Ndimbati and Musema. In cross-examination he described how he was injured on Rwirambo hill, which is two hills and a river away from Muyira hill. The hill was next to the road going to Gishyita from Gisovu.
399. Witness R explained that as the attackers arrived, the refugees fled in two groups. He fell behind as he was weak from lack of food, and was shot in the arm near the elbow, the bullet entering the front of his body and exiting behind as he had turned to look at the attackers.
400. In cross-examination, Witness R confirmed that he had already testified in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case. Defence Counsel indicated that he appeared under the pseudonym "JJ" on 13 November 1997. During his testimony in that case, the witness had advanced the date of 29 April as that on which he had been injured.
401. When details of his previous testimony were put to the witness, he stated that he was injured on the arm between 27 April and 3 or 4 May. He was able to remember the date as there had been a week of calm before the attacks of 13 and 14 May. The witness told the Chamber that as he had been unable to get hospital treatment, a benefactor put cow butter on his injury. To this statement, the Defence noted that in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, the witness, in answer to a question from Judge Khan, had stated that "[a]t that time the situation was not yet too serious and one could find one or two Hutus who were kind hearted and one could give them money for the purchase of penicillin". The witness also testified that he had been treated in Rwirambo.
402. Witness R denied having ever said anything about going to Rwirambo as he couldn't have gone to Rwirambo hospital as there were barriers. He was able to recall however that he did speak about penicillin as regards to serious injuries and that some individuals were able to find ways of getting penicillin. The witness stated, after being asked by the Defence and the bench, that he did apply penicillin to his injury much later when his injury had scarred, and that he had never gone to a Hutu to ask for penicillin.

•Muyira hill, 13 May 1994

403. On 13 May 1994, after a period of calm, Tutsis, estimated by witnesses to number between 15000 and 40000, had sought refuge on Muyira hill and in neighbouring areas. These unarmed Tutsi civilians were subjected to the biggest attack to date, during which thousands lost their lives. The Defence admitted that such an attack occurred and that Tutsi civilians were murdered and exterminated. However, as with all other massacres in which Musema is alleged to have participated, the Defence, by way of alibi, denies Musema's presence at this attack. The Chamber shall thus consider the testimonies of prosecution witnesses specifically in light of this argument.
404. Witness F testified that, following two weeks of calm a large scale attack took place on Muyira hill on 13 May 1994. He stated that around 08:00hrs, a large number of vehicles, including lorries and a bus, arrived from Gishyita and Gisovu Communes and stopped on the border of the said two communes. Witness F explained how the attackers approached the hill from all sides, splitting up into groups, those from Gisovu including the bourgmestre of the commune, Eliezer Niyitegeka, Alfred Musema, and the conseillers of the secteurs of Gisovu Commune, and amongst those attacking from the other side of the hill were Kayishema, the Préfet of Kibuye, Charles Sikubwabo, the bourgmestre of Gishyita, Karasankima Charles, Sikubwabo's predecessor, conseillers of the commune of Gishyita, and many armed persons. The witness said the weapons carried by the assailants included firearms, traditional weapons, and bamboo sticks cut into spears. The refugees on Muyira hill were overpowered by the assailants and consequently had to flee.

5799

During the attack many old people, women, and children, including his five children, aged from 1 year and 1 month old to 10 years old, who were trying to flee, were killed. His wife was seriously injured leaving her disabled today. Witness F estimated that only 10000 of the 40 - 50000 refugees on Muyira hill on 13 May 1994 survived the attack. As far as he knew, all the victims were Tutsis, while all the assailants were Hutus. Questioned by the Bench, he confirmed that the assailants used to chant slogans as they approached the hills. The witness quoted two such slogans, "Exterminate them"(4), "them" meaning the Tutsis, and "Even the Tutsi God is dead"(5).

405. The witness added that he saw Musema carrying a firearm, although he did not personally see Musema fire the weapon.

406. In cross-examination, the Defence put to the witness prior statements he had given to the Office of the Prosecutor. As pertains to the first statement (20 March 1996), the Defence asked why the witness had made no specific mention of Musema during the May attacks, whereas the witness had specified Musema's presence during the April attacks. Witness F explained that he had mentioned Musema in connection with the May attacks, and referred to the phrase "[...] [l]eading these attackers who were divided into groups were the same persons I listed before. [...]". The Defence then put the second statement (14 and 16 February 1998) to the witness and asked the same question, namely why there was no specific mention of Musema in the 13 May 1994 attack. Again, the witness explained that he did re-cite the names of the leaders of the April attacks and reaffirmed that the leaders of the 13 May attack were the same as those of April.

407. In re-direct examination of Witness F, the Prosecutor entered into evidence page 52 of the transcripts of 11 February 1998 in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, where Witness F appeared as Witness QQ. Witness F confirmed having testified on that day that he had seen Musema, the director of the Gisovu Tea Factory, amongst others, during the Muyira attacks of 13 May 1994.

408. Witness P had sought refuge on Muyira hill with many others up until 13 May 1994. On that day he and other refugees, numbering 40000, on Muyira hill, were the victims of a massive attack during which his wife and two children were killed. Such was the attack, that the refugees were unable to resist the assailants and as a result had to flee. He identified attackers from Rwamatamu, Gisovu, Gitesi, Gishyita and Cyangugu. He said that amongst the attackers from Gitesi were the Préfet Clément Kayishema, a communal policeman by the name of Claude, and Mucungurampfizi, who worked at Electrogaz. Amongst the leaders of the Gisovu group were the bourgmestre Aloys Ndimbati, Alfred Musema, communal policemen called Rukazamyambi and Sebahire, and the conseiller Segatarama. He said that he was also able to recognize workers from the tea factory, who wore a blue uniform on which was written "Usine à thé de Gisovu".

409. However, Witness P testified that, because he was fleeing, he did not personally see Musema during the attack of 13 May 1994, although he did see the Daihatsus of the tea factory, and Musema's red Pajero.

410. In cross-examination, Witness P testified that he did not see Musema on that particular day, but that he saw the tea factory vehicles which could only be taken from the factory with the permission of Musema, and that he also saw the vehicle of Musema which only Musema ever drove. Witness P presumed that Musema must have been present as his vehicle was there.

411. Witness R testified that on 13 May 1994, because he was unable to climb Muyira hill as he was injured, he was hiding in bushes near the Gisovu-Gishyita road, from where he saw the refugees on Muyira hill being attacked.

412. He explained that the leaders of the attackers regrouped on the Gishyita and Gisovu boundary before attacking the Tutsi refugees on Muyira hill. The first vehicle belonged to Kayishema, Préfet of Kibuye, which was followed by the businessman Ruzindana's car and a number of buses. From the direction of Gisovu came the vehicles of the tea factory led by Musema and Ndimbati. Witness R stated that each of the leaders bore long rifles.

413. Witness R further testified that when the two groups met on the boundary of the two communes, Kayishema gave instructions on the attack. He heard Kayishema give instructions to the attackers and assign one or more leaders to each group. Musema, Ndimbati and Eliezer Niyitegeka were assigned to the Gisovu and Gikongoro groups, while Elizaphan Ntakirutimana and Ruzindana were assigned to another group. The witness explained that Kayishema then fired the first shot in the direction of Muyira hill after which the leaders, including Musema, and their respective groups, went towards Muyira hill. The witness was unable to see what happened on the hill, but he heard gunfire, grenade explosions and people screaming.

5800

414. Witness R stated that he stayed hidden until the departure of the attackers, including Musema, at which point he went to Muyira hill to find the bodies of his family. He found the cadavers of his wife, child, mother and older brothers, amongst the many bodies which covered Muyira hill. All the dead were Tutsis and all were civilians.

415. In cross-examination, Witness R gave more details as to where he hid, namely, in bushes below Muyira hill, approximately 30 metres from the roadside. These bushes were not very far from where the attackers had gathered.

416. The Defence noted that in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, Witness R had stated that he was three hundred metres from where Kayishema had stood. The witness confirmed this during this trial and explained that he was able to hear Kayishema give instructions as everyone was quiet and listening to him, and that Kayishema had a megaphone. Witness R stated that all the attackers had their backs to him. The witness testified that the leaders used the megaphone while they were forming the groups. However, the leaders did not use the megaphone when speaking amongst themselves and as such, said the witness, he could not hear everything that they were saying. However, Witness R then stated that as Niyitegeka was speaking in a loud voice, he heard Niyitegeka tell others that they must not go towards their secteurs of origin but that they should go towards Muyira and push the Tutsis to the other side.

417. Witness R testified further in cross-examination that all the Hutus and the Twas wore white clothing so as to be distinguishable from the Tutsis. The Defence noted that on page 130 of the English transcripts of 13 November 1997 in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, the witness had said that the Interahamwe of Kayishema wore black, and those from Cyangugu wore white, and that Kayishema had said that to recognise one another, those wearing black should be on one side, and those wearing white should be on another side. The witness remembered having said that and added that although most of the attackers wore white, some of the leaders chose a different colour to set their groups apart.

418. Witness Z, who had sought refuge on Muyira hill, testified that attackers came on 13 May 1994 to the hill from Gisenyi, Ruhengeri, Gitarama, Kibuye, Gikongoro, Cyangugu, from Yusufu's, and from the Gisovu Tea Factory. He listed the leaders of the attack as the Préfet Kayishema, Obed Ruzindana, Musema, and the bourgmestres Ndimbati and Sikubabwo. The witness identified Musema as he saw him arrive alone in his car.

419. Witness Z explained that Musema, who was armed with a rifle, led the group of attackers coming from Gisovu, while Ruzindana and Kayishema led a group coming from another direction. All the attackers grouped on the border of Gishyita and Gisovu Communes. The witness stated that amongst the attackers were civilians belonging to the MDR, CDR and MRND, while amongst Musema's group were Interahamwe trained by Musema, Interahamwe from Cyangugu, soldiers, gendarmes, and employees of the tea factory, including guards. Witness Z explained that from his position on the side of the hill he was able to see Musema addressing the attackers aloud as though he was using a microphone, and that, although Musema was at a distance which would take 5 minutes to cover by running, he was still able to hear Musema give instructions to the attackers. He heard Musema say "Go that way, the attackers from Kibuye and Gishyita will come from the other direction", and indicate the directions with his arms.

420. Witness Z then stated that the leaders of the various groups, including Musema, distributed weapons to attackers trained in the use of such weapons. The weapons, he said, were returned at the end of each day, and redistributed at the start of each day.

421. In cross-examination, Witness Z added that from his position at the top of Muyira hill, he was able to hear Musema at the bottom of the hill give instructions to various groups of attackers. The witness was able to hear all that was being said as everyone else on Muyira hill was quiet, and the attackers were listening attentively to the authorities as they gave instructions. The Defence also referred to the statement of the witness dated 13 May 1995, wherein the witness lists the attackers he saw yet makes no mention of Musema. The witness explained that, unlike in statements to the Prosecutor, before the court he would speak of everything he knew.

422. Witness Z described how the attackers made their way up the hill, while the refugees threw stones at them. As the refugees were overpowered by the attackers, a group of about two or three hundred refugees charged the attackers to force a way through them. He told the Chamber that many of the refugees were killed, including his family members.

423. During cross-examination, Witness Z explained that at the end of the attack, the military kept their weapons, whereas those who had been trained returned their weapons to Musema and were given rewards such as cattle. In the morning the weapons were distributed to the attackers, and if an attacker did not receive a weapon then that attacker would complain that another had received his. Witness Z testified to having seen all of this.

424. The witness said that he sustained his eye injuries from a grenade thrown by attackers coming from Gishyita while near the road on the Gishyita-Gisovu borders. In cross-examination, Witness Z testified that he could not remember the exact date on which he sustained his injuries. As such the Defence referred the witness to transcripts from the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, of 2 March 1998, wherein the witness, then under the pseudonym NN, testified as to how he was injured on 13 May 1994. The Defence Counsel referred to other pages of the said transcripts, in which the witness states that he can clearly remember the day of 13 May 1994 as it was on this day that he lost many members of his family.

425. In response to these questions from the Defence, Witness Z stated that he was now testifying in the Musema case and not in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case. The witness then stated that he was indeed injured on 13 May 1994, but that he could not remember clearly the dates during that period.

426. Witness N testified that there were many attacks on Muyira hill on 13 May 1994, and that very few people survived. He explained that the attackers arrived around 10:00hrs from Gisovu, Kibuye, Rwamatamu, Mubuga and Cyangugu. With regard to the group that came from Gisovu, Witness N specified that, because of the distance between him and the group, he was only able to recognize those in the cars at the front. He stated that he saw the car of Musema, nicknamed a "Benz" by the witness as it was an expensive car, at the head of the others, three Daihatsus from the Gisovu tea factory, three buses belonging to the ONATRACOM and a lorry from Gisovu prison. Witness N was unable to see any other vehicles as they were hidden by the forest. These vehicles came to a stop near a road sign on meeting vehicles coming from "the road below".(6)

427. Witness N stated that he was unable to say precisely how many people formed the Gisovu group, but he estimated that in total there must have been 50000 people, which included people from Gikongoro and Burundi. When asked how many people came on foot, the witness explained that those on foot had come from neighbouring secteurs, namely Rugaragara and Gitabura, whereas those in vehicles had come from further afield, namely the commune of Gisovu. Questioned from the bench as to the number of people, the witness explained that when speaking of 50000 people, he was talking about the Gisovu group. The witness clarified that he saw Musema aboard his vehicle, and that this was first time that he had seen Musema during the attacks.

428. Witness N testified that all the attackers had regrouped and that he could see them move their arms and speak, although he was unable to hear what they were saying. He said he was able to hear Musema once the group moved to within a few metres of him. The witness testified that Musema spoke to a policeman named Ruhindura, and asked him whether a young woman called Nyiramusugi was already dead, to which the policeman answered "no". He stated that Musema then asked that before anything, this young woman be brought to him . In cross-examination, the witness specified that he was able to hear Musema as the refugees were speaking amongst themselves softly and the attackers were getting organized. He added that the attackers spoke loudly so that everyone could hear them.

5802

429. The witness stated that he knew this young woman, who was a teacher, as he used to see her when she walked to school, and that he used to take his cows to graze in front of her parents' house.

430. Immediately after these instructions, stated Witness N, those from Gishyita started shooting so that everyone else would start shooting. The attacks lasted until 15:00hrs, at which point the witness fled to the commune of Ruhindura. He added that some of the "refugees" fled towards the top of the hill and others towards the bottom of the hill. The witness explained that Musema searched for the young woman throughout this period and also shot at people.

431. In cross-examination, the witness confirmed his above testimony. The Defence questioned the witness as to why it had taken him five years to come forward with this statement, to which Witness N explained that he had been approached by two investigators to do so and that he had already brought charges in 1997 against Musema at the prosecutor's office of Kibuye. He indicated that when one knows somebody has committed a crime, it is one's duty to report it.

432. Witness G, who is not originally from the Bisesero region, testified that he saw Musema participate in an attack on 13 May 1994, shooting at refugees, with all the other leaders of the region, whom he said he knew as he visited Kibuye regularly during his holidays. Musema was seen by the witness at Kucyapa on the Gishyita and Gisovu border with Kayishema, Ruzindana and Sikubabwo and many other persons. The witness saw Musema when he was fleeing an attack on Muyira hill.

433. Witness G testified that the attackers had arrived aboard a number of vehicles, including buses belonging to ONATRACOM and at least two vehicles bearing the inscription "Usine à thé Gisovu". According to the witness, he was able to see from where he had sought refuge on Muyira hill, attackers come from Mugonero, Ngoma, Gisovu, Gishyita, Mubuga, Gitesi and Rubazo.

434. Witness G explained that as he fled from Muyira hill, attackers caught a woman by the name of Goretti Mukangoga, whom the witness knew as a teacher from his time in primary school. Musema, who was still with Kayishema, Sikubwabo, Ruzindana and Mika, asked for her to be brought to him. According to the witness, he then proceeded to cut open her stomach with a long sword "to see what the insides of a Tutsi woman looked like". The victim crumbled to the ground and was then encircled by the attackers. When asked by the Prosecutor to give more details as to the attackers surrounding the victim, the witness stated that there were men and women, and after a long explanation stated that he could not say how many they numbered.

435. Witness G described that, as he was tired and thought he would not be found, he hid in a bush near the vehicles of the attackers at which point he saw Musema's red car.

436. In cross-examination, when photo exhibits of the Bisesero region were put to Witness G, except for one where he thought he recognized the summit of Muyira hill, for all the others he explained that he was not from Bisesero and that it would be easier for him to be able to identify the various hills on site. When pressed as to details on distances and the numbers of vehicles and people that he saw while hidden in a bush in Kucyapa, the witness stated that he was unable to give such details, even though he was an educated man. Further, the witness was unable to explain where and how Musema came into possession of a sword or why in his testimony he had failed to make mention of blood, which, according to the Defence would have inevitably spurted out as Goretti was cut open.

437. Witness T, who had sought refuge on Muyira hill, stated that on 13 May 1994 a large attack occurred on the hill. Numerous attackers including policemen, civilians, Interahamwe, tea factory workers, soldiers and some officials arrived in an array of vehicles, namely eight ONATRACOM buses, one white and one green Daihatsu belonging to the tea factory and pick-up trucks, all seen by the witness. Witness T explained that the attackers had come from Mwendo, Gisenyi, Gitesi, Rwamatamu, Ruhengeri and Cyangugu.

438. From Gisovu, said Witness T, came armed civilians, tea factory workers in blue and khaki uniforms, prison guards in yellow uniforms carrying firearms, soldiers with rocket launchers, and policemen wearing green uniforms and bearing firearms. Amongst the leaders of the attack the witness saw Ndimbati, Musema, Sikubabwo, Segatarama and Mika.

5803

439. The witness explained how the attackers gathered for an hour before launching the attack with gunfire around 10:00hrs. According to the witness, those who had firearms, including Musema, would protect the attackers armed with traditional weapons who were in close proximity against the refugees during the attack. The witness stated that although he did not personally see Musema shoot at the refugees, he presumed that he had done so as he was carrying a rifle. The attackers chased the refugees and threw grenades at them when in range, the refugees retaliating with stones. Witness T testified that the refugees were forced to flee and many were killed during that attack.

440. In cross-examination, the Defence put to Witness T his previous statement taken during the Swiss investigations in which the witness makes no specific mention of Musema as being present at the massacres or being a leader thereof, although he did mention a number of the leaders he named in his testimony. Moreover, the Defence referred to passages in the statement where explicit mention is made by the witness of the tea factory vehicles transporting killers from Gikongoro to Bisesero without there being any mention of Musema. The only mentions therein of Musema by the witness are "I know Musema, we saw each other sometimes" and after having identified him from a photograph, he states "After the arrival of the French, I saw Musema about 2-3 days later [...]".

441. In response, Witness T explained that, during that interview, he had not been asked specific questions about Musema, save whether he knew him and could identify him, and whether he had seen him after the arrival of the French.

442. The Chamber notes at this juncture that, during the cross-examination of Witness T on this issue, as a consequence of a suggestion by the Defence relating to the apparent discomfort of the witness, Witness T requested the permission of the Chamber to continue his testimony standing up as he felt tired.

•14 May 1994, Muyira hill

443. Witnesses for the Prosecutor also testified that a second large scale attack took place on Muyira hill on 14 May 1994.

444. Witness AC described a big attack which took place on 14 May 1994 on Muyira hill and which resulted in the deaths of many children and old persons. The attack, he said, was led by Musema, who arrived at the site in a red Pajero followed by four other vehicles, one being from Gisovu. He said that other "dirigeants" were Ndimbati, bourgmestre of Gisovu, Niyitegeka, the Minister of Information, as well as Kayishema, Ruzindana, Sikubwabo, bourgmestre of Gishyita, Samson, the Minister of Agriculture, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana, the Mugonero pastor, Gérard Ntakirutimana, and Kajerijeri from Mukingo.

445. Witness AC explained there were about 5000 predominantly Hutu attackers, many armed with rifles, clubs called "ntampongano", and small axes. Amongst the attackers were members of the Presidential Guard, military personnel and gendarmes from Kigali and Gitarama who had been informed that Inkotanyi had hoisted their flag in Bisesero, and workers from the Gisovu Tea Factory. The witness testified that he was able to recognize these workers as their clothes bore the words "Thé Gisovu". Other identifiable emblems worn by the attackers as seen by the witness were "MRND", "MDR" and "CDR", while other attackers wore banana leaves.

446. Witness AC described the first attack which was led by Ndimbati and Musema. He testified that the attackers disembarked from their vehicles on the Gisovu road at approximately 50 metres from the position of the Tutsi refugees. He further specified that Musema was on the Mirambi side of the river, the refugees being on the Muyira side of the river. The attack started when Ndimbati shot in the air, followed by Musema who fired his rifle. The witness added that Musema's rifle had a belt of ammunition around it. According to AC, Musema's shots hit an old man by the name of Ntambiye and another person by the name of Iamuremye.

447. Witness AC stated that, on being attacked, the refugees threw stones to defend themselves but the military fired tear gas at them, after which the Interahamwe entered the fray using bladed weapons. The refugees were attacked on the one side by the Musema group and on the other by the Ndimbati group. The refugees were forced towards the attackers from Gisenyi and Ruhengeri, but managed to flee into the Muyira forest. Around 18:00hrs the attackers left.

5804

448. Although there was no cross-examination specific to Witness AC's testimony regarding Muyira, other issues raised and cross-examined during his testimony are relevant inasmuch as they go to the credibility of Witness AC.

449. Witness AC testified that, on the night of 6 April 1994, he had taken a lift with gendarmes going to Kibuye. Asked as to the names of the gendarmes, he explained that he was unable to remember them as it had been over five years since the events and being an old man his memory was failing him. However, after having been reminded by the Defence of his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, the witness recalled having cited the names of the gendarmes.

450. The witness then testified that a certain Innocent came on the trip and that they had met a certain Major Jabo in Kibuye. Yet, when transcripts of the hearing of 6 October 1997 in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case were put to the witness, he testified that Major Jabo, a friend of his in charge of the Kibuye military camp, a person by the name of Cyprien, a Lieutenant, were on the trip. Witness AC confirmed having said this but continued that, because it all happened so long ago that, he could not remember; had he known these questions would have been asked, Witness AC said, he would have consulted his documents. He added he could not even remember the names of his wife and children. Witness AC then reaffirmed that Major Jabo was in Kibuye and that others, namely Cyprien and Munyankindi, were on the trip. When re-questioned about the presence of Major Jabo on the trip, the witness explained that there were two persons by the name of Jabo, both Majors, one who worked in Gisenyi and the other in Kibuye. Witness AC said it was only at this point that he remembered Major Jabo who went from Karago to Kibuye.

451. Furthermore, Witness AC testified that during the above trip, he and his travelling companions stopped over in Kibuye before going to Bisesero. Witness AC explained that as he did not have access to the gendarmes' camp in Kibuye, he remained by the side of the road, until his companions rejoined him to continue the trip.

452. Defence Counsel referred to a statement given by Witness AC on 12 June 1996 to the investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor. In the statement Witness AC describes a meeting he attended in Kibuye during his trip to Bisesero. He explained therein how, by staying close to a certain Lieutenant Kaburuga Cyprien, he was able to attend the meeting which was being held by the authorities, and saw Niyitegeka and Bagasora. He said that he stayed at the meeting for two to three hours while waiting for the soldiers with whom he was travelling.

453. When questioned by the Defence as to the contents of this statement, Witness AC refused to answer the questions on the basis that he was not called to testify in the Bagasora case. Furthermore, Witness AC refused to answer questions emanating from the Chamber on his attendance at the meeting in Kibuye, saying he did not attend the meeting and that he would prefer to be questioned on matters in relation to the Musema case. After further cross-examination, Witness AC testified that on arrival at Kibuye, he found out that there was a meeting but that he was unable to attend it as he was a simple civilian, and not a gendarme nor a civil or political authority.

454. In re-examination on these divergences, Witness AC confirmed that the divergence in his answers emanated from the specific questions relating to certain events and people as put to him by the investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor.

455. Witness R stated that on 13 May 1994 he had heard Niyitegeka tell the other attackers to be aware of Tutsis hiding in Hutu areas. As a result, testified the witness, on 14 May he went back to the place where he had hidden the day before. The witness testified that the attackers who came on Friday 13 May to Muyira Hill also came on Saturday 14 May to kill the survivors. Witness R said that Musema came back on 14 May in his own vehicle with attackers and with all the tea factory vehicles. Witness R stated he had heard that Musema had brought with him people from Gikongoro. The witness specified that as he was not standing very far from the attackers, he was able to hear Kayishema, who was speaking aloud, thank Musema for bringing the attackers from Gikongoro. Witness R said that Kayishema also thanked Ruzindana for having brought people from afar.

456. Witness F testified that on 14 May 1994 the attacks continued on Muyira hill and surrounding hills during which he was shot in his right arm and was hit by shrapnel in his shoulder. Though he saw Musema's red car amongst the vehicles of other attackers he was able to identify, the witness testified that he did not personally see Musema on that day. The witness added that the hills were strewn with bodies of those who had died the day before.
457. Issues raised during the cross-examination of this witness have been dealt with above as regards his testimony of 13 May 1994.
458. Witness Z testified that the refugees on Muyira hill were also attacked on 14 May 1994. At around 09:00hrs, the witness saw Musema arrive with vehicles of the tea factory. He explained that, on seeing the vehicles, he fled. The witness stated that three members of his family were shot by Musema as the refugees came down the hill to break through the attackers. He saw this from where he was standing approximately 15 metres away.
459. Issues raised during the cross-examination of Witness Z have been dealt with above by the Chamber as regards his testimony of 13 May 1994.
460. Witness T testified that he saw Musema participate in a large scale attack against Muyira hill on 14 May. The witness indicated that Musema was on an opposite hill and carried a rifle which the witness presumed was used by Musema during the attack.
461. The Chamber dealt with the cross-examination of Witness T in the context of his testimony on the events of 13 May 1994.
462. Witness D spoke of a large scale attack which took place on a day of Sabbath, thus a Saturday, between 08:00hrs and 16:00hrs. The Chamber notes that 14 May 1994 was indeed a Saturday. During this attack at Muyira Witness D saw Musema, Sikubabwo, Kayishema and Ndimbati. She saw attackers, numbering approximately 15000, armed with rifles, grenades and traditional weapons arrive in numerous vehicles, including lorries and nine buses, and heard them sing "Let's exterminate them". According to the witness, those with traditional weapons were to finish off refugees who had been injured by bullets. The refugees numbering approximately 15000 fought back with stones.
463. In cross-examination, Witness D specified that as the vehicles approached, she was unable to identify the vehicles or those aboard. Moreover, she indicated, when the vehicles parked, they were out of her sight. She only saw the attackers once they had disembarked and were making their way towards the refugees, after which she fled. The Defence noted that in her previous statements she had described how as refugees, including her, fled, they mixed with the attackers so as not to be shot.

•A mid-May attack 1994 on Muyira hill

464. The Chamber notes that "mid-May" means at some time between 10 May and 20 May.
465. Prosecution, Witness H, spoke of an attack which took place on Muyira hill directed against the Tutsi refugees. He testified that attackers came from Gisovu led by Musema, while those who came from Mugonero were led by Ruzindana and those from Gishyita by the bourgmestre Sikubwabo.
466. Witness H explained that he saw four vehicles from the tea factory and Musema's red Pajero in front of them which stopped at Kurwirambo. The Chamber notes that at a later stage in his testimony, the witness indicated that Musema's Pajero was behind the convoy of vehicles coming from the tea factory and stopped first at Kurwirambo. Aboard the vehicles were Interahamwe who were, according to the witness, living with Musema in Gisovu. When asked whether he could see anyone else aboard Musema's vehicle, Witness H stated that he was not close to the area and observed everything from a distance. When asked by the Prosecutor whether he was correct in identifying Musema, the witness simply replied that he knew his vehicle. The witness explained that he had seen Musema's vehicle on numerous occasions before 1994, specifically in 1992 while he worked on a Swiss road project.

467. Witness H described the attackers he saw on that day as being made up, firstly, of workers from the tea factory, dressed in blue factory uniforms with inscriptions on the back and armed with machetes and clubs, secondly, of Interahamwe dressed in white who came on a bus from Kigali to assist the local population, armed with rifles and clubs, thirdly, of soldiers in "smoke" uniform with black berets and gendarmes wearing red berets, all of whom were armed with rifles, and, fourthly, civilian Hutus (men, young people) who had come on foot from Gisovu.

468. The witness testified that, upon reaching the foot of the hill, Musema came forward and gathered the assailants who were scattered. He then fired a shot which marked the beginning of the attacks around 09:00hrs. Although the villagers only had stones to defend themselves, they were able to drive the assailants back down to the foot of the hill, with the intention of grabbing Musema. However, other assailants, led by Ruzindana and Sikubwabo, surrounded them, and they had to flee. Many refugees, including his wife and children, were killed during this attack. According to the witness, Musema was leading the Interahamwe and personally shot at the refugees, although the witness could not say whether Musema actually hit anyone. Witness H stated that the attack finished around 18:00hrs.

>

469. In cross-examination, Witness H specified that during the attack on Muyira hill, he was at the top of the hill from where he could see the vehicles parked on the road about twenty to thirty minutes from where he stood, there being a valley and a river between the road and the top of the hill. He was able to recognize the factory vehicles, because he had seen them several times before. The witness added that he was able to read the inscriptions on the factory uniforms as during the attack he had been close to the workers of the tea factory.

•An attack in mid-May 1994, Mumataba hill

470. Witness S stated that sometime near the middle of May while he was in refuge on Mpura hill, he saw Musema participate in an attack in Birembo. The witness testified that, around 10:00hrs he saw Musema and many other people (between 120 and 150) on the Gishyita and Gisovu road. He also saw three Daihatsu vehicles, one yellow, one green and one blue, belonging to the tea factory and bearing the inscription "OCIR-thé Gisovu" and Musema's red Pajero. The group of attackers included communal policemen recognizable from their uniforms, people dressed in white, and employees of the factory in blue uniforms and casquettes all bearing the inscription "Usine à Thé". The factory employees carried traditional weapons, machetes, spears and clubs.

471. The vehicles dropped off the attackers and then all, save Musema's, went to pick up other individuals in Gisovu, returning 45 minutes to an hour later. Other attackers led by Ruzindana and Sikubwabo were also seen by the witness coming from Gishyita with two vehicles, a lorry and a Toyota Stout. Witness S said the attackers first grouped and had a "meeting" before blowing their whistles and launching the attack against Sakufe's house on Mumataba hill. The attack was aimed at between 2000 and 3000 Tutsis who had sought refuge in and around the house. The majority of the refugees, including relatives of the witness, were killed during the attack. The witness stated that Musema stayed by his car during the attack in the company of persons dressed in white.

472. At the end of the attack the assailants headed towards Gisovu. Musema left the site at the end of the day around 17:00hrs heading in the same direction, while Ruzindana and Sikubwabo went towards Gishyita.

473. In cross-examination, Witness S described the locations of Mpura hill and Birembo in exhibits P20.1 and P20.2, and their situation in relation to Sakufe's house. He stated that Sakufe's house was ten minutes walk from the Gisovu road, while Birembo is one kilometre from Mpura hill.

Even though the vehicles had parked less than one kilometre from where the witness and another person were hiding, the Defence called into question the witness' assertion that he was able to read the inscriptions on the tea factory vehicles.

•End of May at the Nyakavumu cave

474. Witness AC recalled an incident which took place at a cave in Kigarama Commune, Nyakavumu cellule. He testified that he was 40-50 metres away from the cave and saw Kayishema, Musema, Ruzindana and the bourgmestres of Gishyita and Gisovu come to the cave and order it to be sealed by having it covered in firewood. The witness told the Chamber that a man from Gisovu was ordered by Ndimbati, Ruzindana, Musema, Niyitegeka and Kayishema to light the wood. The man then set the wood on fire using grass and kerosene.
475. Witness AC recalled that of the 300 people inside the cave, only one survived, all others being suffocated to death by the smoke. Following questions from the bench, the witness affirmed that he had heard Musema give orders at the cave, however, he gave two answers, namely that he had heard Musema say on the one hand, "Bring some wood, make some fire", and, on the other hand, "Bring some wood, bring some sods of earth". The witness also reaffirmed that Musema ordered that a fire be lit.
476. In cross-examination of Witness AC, the Defence put questions to Witness AC pertaining to his previous testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case during which he made no mention of Musema in the attack perpetrated at the cave. The witness explained that on all the previous occasions he had been interviewed by the Office of the Prosecutor, the questions had been relevant to specific individuals, and so he did not mention Musema. However, in a previous statement of Witness AC of 12 June 1996 which contained the witness' description of events at the cave with a list of people he had seen there, there was no mention of Musema. The Defence further questioned the witness as to his sighting of Prime Minister Kambanda at the cave, Kambanda not being mentioned when Witness AC testified in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, whereas in the said statement the witness cited Kambanda as one of the attackers taking a prime role in the events. The witness said he did not find it surprising that a person as important as the Prime Minister should be present at the cave.
477. Witness H testified that around the end of May or early June, an attack led by Musema and Ndimbati was directed against a cave in Nyakavumu. Although he was not present at the attack, he had seen Musema shortly before it in a convoy with others going in the direction of the cave and thus presumed that Musema must have been at the attack. This convoy was made up of vehicles of the tea factory, buses from Kibuye, vehicles belonging to the commune, and Musema's Pajero.
478. During the attack on the cave, said Witness H, he had hid on the hill at about thirty minutes walk from the cave. This hill was separated from the cave by a small valley and hillock. He explained that the assailants proceeded to destroy the fence of the surrounding houses for firewood to the set the entrance of the cave alight, and gathered branches to produce more smoke. After the attack, the witness said he went to the cave and saw that everything was burnt. He testified that only one person survived.
479. In cross-examination, the witness confirmed that he was able to see the events as he testified above and explained to the Chamber that it was only recently that he had developed eye problems.
480. Witness S testified seeing Musema lead attackers towards Nyakavumu cave. He explained that near the end of May, while on Nyirandagano hill with 2000 other refugees, in Gitwa cellule, he saw Musema arrive with tea factory vehicles aboard which were attackers, comprised of tea factory workers and inhabitants of Gisovu. These vehicles, explained the witness, stopped at Birambo around 09:00hrs and 10:00hrs, and Musema's vehicle stopped behind them.
481. The witness testified that the refugees sent "spies" to see what the attackers were up to. Having received information from these spies that the attackers were too numerous to fight, the refugees fled to Kigarama hill. Witness S described how the attackers chased the refugees who were forced to separate into three groups, the first going to Nyakavumu cave, the second group went towards Nyarukagarata, and the third group, including the witness, fled to Gitwa hill. Witness S said that his group was not chased by the attackers as they had gone to Nyarukagarata and to Nyakavumu cave. The witness testified that, through trees, he saw Musema with a long rifle following the assailants.

482. Witness S said that those with Musema then blew whistles and shouted out three times for the attackers ahead of them to backtrack as they had passed by the Nyakavumu cave. Those who returned gathered around Musema for approximately two minutes. The witness explained that the attackers exchanged a few words after which they destroyed the house of a certain Munyanbamutsa for firewood which they took to the cave. Witness S was unable to see what then happened at the cave, but saw smoke rise a short while later. The witness indicated to the Chamber that he had hidden his wife in the cave that very same day. The attackers, said the witness, stayed at the cave for four hours after which they left for Gisovu.

483. Witness S said that he went down to the cave with eight other men after the attackers had left and noted that wood and leaves had been burnt at its entrance. Only three survivors, one man, one woman and one child were pulled out; the last two died during an attack the next day.

484. The witness indicated that Musema's group had been joined at some point by attackers from Gishyita led by Sikubabwo, Rutagananira and Ruzindana. The Chamber notes that it is unclear exactly where the witness saw these individuals.

485. In cross-examination, Witness S specified that the vehicles from the Gisovu tea factory had parked at Birembo, while those of the other groups of attackers parked at Gisoro and Mubuga. The Defence referred to the witness' written statement in which he describes in more detail the attack on the cave after having seen Musema with three soldiers and a gun slung over his shoulder. Witness S confirmed that he could not see the attack on the cave from his position on Gitwa hill.

486. Witness D described an attack which occurred at a cave, although no indication was forthcoming from her testimony as to exactly where and when this attack occurred. She testified that approximately 400 people, including children and women, had sought refuge in the cave. From where she was hiding she was able to see attackers start a fire with grass at the entrance of the cave, the smoke thus suffocating those inside. Amongst those who started the fire, Witness D recognized Musema and Ndimbati. Once the attackers had left, said the witness, she went with others to the entrance of the cave where she saw many bodies. She then fled.

487. In cross-examination, Witness D specified that she was unable to see any vehicles from where she was hiding on the side of the hill.

488. Witness AB testified that he saw Musema sometime in the month of June at the military camp in Kibuye in the company of Second Lieutenant 'Buffalo' Ndagijimana, Ndimbati and Doctor Gérard Ntakirutimana. Ndimbati was carrying a pistol and wearing military trousers and a black jacket. He said that Musema was armed with a pistol and was wearing a military jacket. The witness said that he overheard them discussing one last operation that had to be carried out in Bisesero. Witness AB added that he was able to hear them as they were speaking with raised voices, and as he was responsible for the camp security he had the right to know who was there and why they were there.

489. According to the witness, Musema said that information that he had received indicated that Tutsi were hiding in the tin mines. Musema explained that he therefore needed a lorry load of firewood to start a fire at the entrance of the hole where they were hiding, and consequently to block the hole to prevent anyone getting out. The witness said that Musema asked the second Lieutenant for the firewood. The witness explained that although it was with 'Buffalo' that they carried out the operations, permission for the wood could only be given from Masengesho, the camp commander. Witness AB testified that he was unable to say whether they succeeded in getting the wood as he did not spend all day at the camp.

490. In cross-examination, Witness AB confirmed that Musema had come to the camp in his red Pajero and had requested a pick up full of firewood. When questioned as to why Musema had not used a tea factory pick-up, the witness stated that Musema would be in a better place to answer. The witness testified that he knew that there was a plantation of wood for burning at the tea factory, but that he did not know whether during the war the wood had become Musema's personal property, whether Musema had come for assistance by asking for this pick-up or whether there remained any wood at the tea factory. He stated that he had never been to the cave where many people had died.

5809

•Attack of 31 May 1994, Biyiniro

491. Witness E testified that during an attack on Muyira hill directed against 20000 refugees, he and others fled to Biyiniro hill at which point he saw Musema on the road with soldiers, guards, Interahamwe, tea factory workers who were wearing "Usine à thé Gisovu" caps, uniforms and tea leaves, and gendarmes who had come from Gisovu, Gishyita and Kibuye in array of vehicles including a green and a blue Daihatsu from the tea factory. The attackers, who were armed with firearms and traditional weapons, continued shooting at these refugees. The witness explained that the refugees decided to catch Musema as they saw him as a leader and because he had provided vehicles for the attackers. Musema then fled in his Pajero while soldiers continued firing at the refugees, many of whom, including the witness' older brother, were killed during the attack.
492. In cross-examination, Witness E specified that he fled from Muyira hill before midday in the direction of Biyiniro. According to him, it would take five minutes to walk from the summit of Muyira hill to the Bisesero road. He gave further details as to the vehicles he saw on that day but was unable to enlighten the Chamber as to the exact number of attackers.

•Attack of 5 June 1994, near Muyira hill

493. In addition, Witness E also saw Musema on 5 June 1994 near Muyira hill. He explained that he saw Musema's car and tea factory Daihatsus, among others, parked on the road at the Gishyita-Gisovu border, near Muyira hill. Aboard these vehicles were gendarmes, tea factory workers, communal policemen, Interahamwe and guards. The witness said he saw Musema carrying a rifle, and other leaders, including Kayishema, Sikubabwo and Ruzindana, give instruction to the attackers. Witness E said the attackers killed many refugees, including his younger sister, and that Musema also fired shots with a rifle during the attack.

•22 June 1994, Nyarutovu cellule

494. Prosecution Witness P said that in June 1994 while in Nyarutovu cellule he witnessed a number of attacks, and particularly remembered that of 22 June 1994, which he testified was led by Musema, and which occurred six days before the arrival of the French.
495. The witness described how this particular attack took place near a precious stone mine belonging to a company called Redemi, between 11:00hrs and midday. Musema and a number of tea factory workers, whom he recognized by virtue of their uniforms, were in a blue Daihatsu. The witness said that the vehicle stopped on the Gishyita road next to him and the young woman with whom he was.
496. He explained that he was with a young woman and a certain François who was crossing the road looking for somewhere to hide. The witness was 30 metres from the road but was unable to specify how many people there were aboard the Daihatsu as he fled while they disembarked. He testified that Musema was standing on the road next to the vehicle when he shot him, Musema holding the firearm with two hands. The witness stated that when the shot was fired he had his back to Musema. In his mind, there was no doubt that it was Musema who fired because he saw him aim at him and because Musema was the only person in the group who had a rifle. Witness P testified that after being shot in the ankle, he fell to the ground face down and feigned death. He then heard another gunshot and he again presumed that it was Musema who fired the shot. When the attackers left, the witness saw the body of François, so he concluded that it was Musema who had killed him. Most of these details pertinent to the gunshots came out during cross-examination.

497. Witness P stated that after the gunshots, the young woman ran away. He then heard Musema tell his workers to catch this young woman and to bring her back alive, so that they could see how Tutsi women were made. The attackers ran after the young woman, caught her, and put her in the vehicle. The witness said the attackers, including Musema, then drove off in the direction of Gisovu. He said that he never saw the young woman again.

The Alibi

•15/17 April to 22 April 1994

498. According to the alibi, around 03:00hrs on 17 April 1994 Musema and a soldier who was with him in Gisovu were woken by the supervisor of the Gisovu Tea Factory and by two guards who had come to the residence to warn him that the factory was being attacked. Musema testified that the supervisor told him that he had heard that Musema was going to be killed. The soldier suggested the only course of action was to flee. Musema thus fled towards Butare and then to Rubona aboard the red Pajero, registration A7171. He arrived in Butare around 09:00hrs. During the journey, he came across more roadblocks than he had seen before.

499. Musema testified that once at Butare, he dropped off the soldier and sought out a certain gendarme to inform him of his brother's death in Gisovu. Musema then went to his mother-in-law's in Rubona where he rested for the remainder of the day. Musema explained that, at this time, what was happening in Rwanda was "du jamais vu"; people were desperate not knowing what was going to happen, hoping that the massacres would stop in the region and that the war would cease in Kigali and in the north of the country.

500. Claire Kayuku, Musema's wife, testified that he returned to Rubona on either 16 April or 17 April in a state of shock, as a result of the killing of the tea factory employees. She specified that Musema had gone to Gisovu and returned two days later.

501. The Prosecutor referred in her cross-examination of Musema to exhibit P63, a Swiss asylum interview, wherein Musema states that he left the factory on the night of 15 April 1994. The Chamber notes that Musema then explained that this particular document was not the interview but rather his notes in preparation for an asylum request. The questions/headers were inserted by himself, he said.

502. In exhibit P56, a Swiss interview of 8 March 1995, Musema states he arrived at Gisovu on 14 April 1994 and left on 15 April around 03:00hrs, and in exhibit P54, a Swiss interview of 11 February 1995, he states he left Gisovu on the night of 15-16 April after being warned by factory guards of an imminent attack. Similarly the calendar of Musema, exhibit P68, indicates that he went to Butare (Rubona) on 15 April 1994. In exhibit P68, it is also indicated that Musema was on mission from 18 April 1994 to 21 April 1994 in tea factories.

503. During trial, the Chamber sought clarification as to the discrepancies concerning the dates of departure from the factory and the start of the mission. Musema then explained that at the time of preparing the calendar he was not certain of the exact dates of his mission(s). He added that it was only after the Swiss juge d'instruction returned with documentation from a visit of the Gisovu Tea Factory that he was able to recall that between 18 and 22 April he was in Rubona, and that the mission started on 22 April 1994.

504. Exhibit D27, tendered by the Defence, is a document entitled "Préparation réunion du 15 Avril 1994". Musema confirmed in Court that his annotations appeared on the document which, he stated, had been given to him by the Chief of the Secretariat at either some time in the afternoon of 15 April or in the morning of 16 April, although no meeting was held on 15 April 1994. He also confirmed that, as could be seen from the document, he was concerned about the security situation at the factory, and the human and material damage which had occurred at the factory.

5811

•18 April 1994

505. On the morning of 18 April 1994, testified Musema, he went to Gitarama, the "transit" area for those fleeing Kigali, in the hope of meeting authorities, including the Director-General of OCIR-thé, who he thought had fled the seat of OCIR-thé in Kigali and, considering the war situation, would have had to go to or through Gitarama. By then the government had already left Kigali, although the transfer to Gitarama had been very disorganized. Once in Gitarama, Musema went to look for the heads of service of OCIR-thé and searched for relatives who could be among the refugees.
506. According to Musema, he did not meet anyone from OCIR-thé, but spoke with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Handicraft, Justin Mugenzi, to whom he reported the events and situation at the Gisovu Tea Factory, and asked for protection for the factory. According to Musema, the Minister appeared shocked at the news and assured him that he would take the appropriate measures to ensure the security of the factory. Musema testified that it was on this day that the Minister had indicated to him that he would be sent on mission to contact the Director-General of OCIR-thé to start up the factories. Musema returned the same day to Rubona where he stayed until 22 April 1994, although he did visit Gitarama on 21 April 1994, again to look for relatives among the refugees.
507. In support of the movements of Musema on these dates, the Defence tendered exhibit D45, a document in the name of Musema, requesting payment of expenses incurred for the Pajero, registration A7171. The form was filled out by the secretary of the factory and signed by the accountant and Musema. Attached are receipts from a garage in Butare, for cash payment for a broken windscreen, dated 19 April 1994, and from a garage in Gitarama for petrol on 14 May 1994.
508. Claire Kayuku told the Chamber she remembered that between 16 and 22 April Musema went to Gitarama twice to see his family. During that period Musema would spend every night at his mother-in-law's. She testified that on 22 April, he went on mission to Gisenyi and returned to Rubona on 26 April.
509. Exhibit D89, tendered by the Defence, is an undated letter from Claire Kayuku to Nicole Pletscher in which it is written "[i]magine how we all came together on 18 April whereas each one thought the other person was dead"(7).
510. With reference to exhibit P56, where he states that he left Gitarama around 19 April(8), Musema affirmed that at the time of this interview, the dates were just estimations and not necessarily correct, and that it was only after receiving documentation collected by the juge d'instruction and his lawyers that he was able to say with certainty on which dates his mission was effected.

The mission order and the subsequent mission

511. The Defence tendered exhibit D10, an "ordre de mission" (mission order), dated 21 April 1994. Musema testified that this order was given to him in Gitarama on 21 April 1994, even though it is written "fait à Kigali" on the document. By accident he met Minister Justin Mugenzi near a FINA petrol station at the entrance of Gitarama, who told him that he had tried to contact the Gendarmerie for protection at the factory, and that he had not been able to reach the Director-General of OCIR-thé, Michel Baragaza. The minister then ordered him to go to the north of the country, in particular Gisenyi, to find Michel Baragaza so that the status of each factory could be established.
512. Musema went on to testify that the minister said he would arrange the security modalities and prepare a mission order necessary for circulation around Rwanda. Musema was to collect the mission order at the residence of Faustin Nyagahima, a director within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Handicraft. The Minister of Public Works, Water and Energy, Hyacinthe Nsengiyumva, who was also at the station, gave him petrol coupons. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Handicraft authorized the Minister of Public Works, Water and Energy to sign the mission order on his behalf as he had to take care of other business. The meeting lasted 30 minutes.

513. On 22 April 1994, said Musema, Faustin Nyagahima told him that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was the only ministry at that time which possessed a stamp/seal and that consequently it is this stamp which appears on the bottom of the mission order.

514. Musema declared that the mission was in the context of the OCIR-thé, but not in the name of OCIR-thé or for the government. He explained that, in normal times, such missions were ordered by the Director-General of OCIR-thé. Musema believed that he had been given the mission as the minister had found no one else from OCIR-thé to whom to assign it. The expenses were to be met by OCIR-thé/Gisovu Tea Factory. The length of the mission, indicated Musema, must have been decided by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Handicraft. The mission order was not drafted on the basis of particular factories but rather on the basis of Préfectures where tea factories or tea projects were located. In normal times, Musema stated that a memorandum would be drafted outlining the objectives of the mission whereas during this period he had received the objectives of his mission orally.

515. According to Musema's testimony, the mission extension on the document was typed on at a later stage, around 7-10 May 1994 in Gitarama. Musema explained that more ministries had stamps by then, thus the stamp of the Minister of Defence, Augustin Bizimana, and his signature appear on the document. Musema conceded that to have the stamp of the Minister of Defence as authority for the extension of his mission was not usual practice, though he recalled that, during that whole period, the situation in Rwanda was not normal, which would explain why the Minister of Defence had signed the extension.

516. Musema further specified that he happened to meet the Minister of Defence in Gitarama. The Minister was an agronomist, originally from Byumba, and he and Musema had begun discussing the situation of finding relatives and about the past four years' conflict. The situation was still very unstable and although Musema's mission had come to an end he still had to visit a number of factories to establish inter-factory contacts. The stamp was to serve as a travel document. It did not extend his original mission with OCIR-thé but came into the context of the visits he wanted to make to other factories, to facilitate his movements and so as to provide him with more personal security. He added that there was no need for him to have the stamp of his ministry as the extension did not have any administrative value but only practical value. Musema was unable to explain why the Minister of Defence had not just given him a travel document for safe passage.

517. Musema conceded that it was a mistake that there was no indication as to the date on which the extension was issued. He testified that he would not have gone on the mission had the minister not guaranteed his security, and that he had to respect the mission order from a superior.

518. The Prosecutor contested the veracity of the mission order, submitting that the circumstances in which the mission order was provided, namely through a chance encounter at a petrol station, were unconvincing. Had the mission been simply to contact the Director-General of OCIR-thé, as Musema had indicated in his testimony, then, argued the Prosecutor, the mission should have been terminated on the day Musema established contact with the said Director-General. The Prosecutor did not accept the explanations given by Musema in relation to the stamps on the mission order of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and of the Ministry of Defence and contended that the documents and stamps are complete fabrications. The mission order, in the mind of the Prosecutor, was designed simply to mislead the Chamber and to conceal the extent of the involvement of Musema in the massacres. Other supposed inconsistencies in the mission order were raised by the Prosecutor during the testimony of Musema as to his whereabouts.

519. Prosecutor's Witness BB testified that the mission order was unusual and not one normally used in OCIR-thé. Details missing included the length of time to be spent away from one's factory and space for expenses incurred. He also stated that it was odd that a minister should sign the order and also that it was odd to send a director of a factory to visit other factories.

S813

•22 April 1994

520. Musema testified that on 22 April 1994, he went to Gitarama to pick up the mission order from Faustin Nyagahima who was in a house in the commercial district(9).
521. Musema also said that he then went to the military camp in Gitarama where he was given two gendarmes to escort him, and then drove off in the direction of Kabaya around 10:00hrs. In Kabaya, Musema stopped at the house of the Director-General of OCIR-thé, where he met the Director-General's wife. She informed him that the Director-General was somewhere in Gisenyi. Musema asked the Director-General's wife to tell her husband that he would like to meet with him.
522. Musema stated that he reached the tea factory of Pfunda at the end of the day, around 16:00hrs - 17:00hrs. The director of the tea factory of Pfunda signed the back of the mission order and stamped it with the factory seal. Musema wrote next to the stamp "arrivée à Pfunda le 21/04/1994". Although the date of 21 April 1994 appears next to the signature, Musema was adamant that he arrived at the tea factory of Pfunda the following day, on 22 April 1994.
523. Musema explained that at the time they did notice the error. He said that the mistake was rectified for accounting purposes but not so reflected on the mission order as it was not expected to be used as an itinerary.
524. In support of this explanation, the Defence tendered exhibit D28, a "Déclaration de Créances" for expenses incurred by OCIR-thé (Gisovu Tea Factory) for the use of two gendarmes from 22 April 1994 up to 2 May 1994. This document is signed by the chief accountant and Musema and dated 2 May 1994.
525. Musema stated in his testimony that he stayed at the factory until 25 April 1994. The factory was operational and most of the troubles and massacres were outside the vicinity of the factory. Although he did not see him while at Pfunda, Musema had hoped that the Director-General of OCIR-thé would pass by the factory on his way back from Gisenyi.
526. The Defence tendered exhibit D29, a "Rapport de Mission" and a covering letter, dated 24 April 1994 and written and signed by Musema in Gisenyi. According to the Defence, these documents were found by the Defence in the archives of the Gisovu Tea Factory.
527. Musema testified that the interim report was typed at Pfunda factory and was to be sent to the Director-General of OCIR-thé, although Musema acknowledged that the lack of the recipient's full address was an oversight on the part of the typist. Musema explained that he had planned to drop off the report and annexes on his way back to Rubona at the house of the Director-General in Kabaya, but that by accident he bumped into him at Mukamura. He was thus able to hand over the documents in person. Other copies were also given by Musema to the directors of the Pfunda and Nyabihu tea factories whom he also met.
528. During cross-examination, Musema gave further details as to his mission. He only visited in person the factory of Pfunda, having gone to the factory of Nyabihu which was closed although he met its director. Besides the directors of these two factories Musema also met the director of Rubaya.
529. The Prosecutor referred to exhibit P56, the Swiss interview of 8 March 1995, where Musema says "[...] I left Gitarama to visit the factories in Gisenyi (Nyabihu, Rubaya and Pfunda)" and to exhibit P58, Swiss interview of 6 April 1995, where he states "Pfunda factory was the first I visited. I met there the factory director, we discussed, and I was accommodated at his house. [...] At Nyabihu, I met the director Mr. Gasongero at his residence. I did not reach Rubaya, but I met the factory director Mr. Jaribu".
530. Musema explained during the trial that he was able to make a report on these factories based on the discussions he had had with the respective directors. The mission report D29, dated 24 April 1994, contains recommendations for the above three factories.
531. The Prosecutor argued that this report was "strikingly thin" considering the importance of the alleged mission and the calibre of the requesting official, a minister. The recommendations and issues contained in the report were vague and could have been written at any time without having been on mission, stated the Prosecutor.

5814

• 25 April 1994

532. Musema testified that he and the gendarmes left Pfunda factory on 25 April 1994 around 08:00hrs and met the Director-General of OCIR-thé, who was with his wife, and the director of the Nyabihu tea factory, at Mukamura. The Director-General of OCIR-thé read the mission report, approved it, added a couple of aspects, and confirmed that Musema could continue his mission. Musema stated that the meeting lasted approximately one hour, after which he drove to Gitarama. He arrived there late at night because of the number of dangerous road barriers, and stayed overnight because of the curfew.

• 26 April 1994

533. According to Musema, on 26 April 1994, Musema went to Rubona where by now the security situation had completely deteriorated. Pillagers and killers had taken over the ISAR. He stayed overnight with the rest of his family at the house of his brother-in-law, who worked at ISAR.
534. Claire Kayuku testified that Musema returned to Rubona on 26 April from Gisenyi.

• 27 April 1994

535. Musema stated in Court that he remained in Rubona on 27 April 1994. Although he did not see any killings he witnessed much pillaging of cattle and plantations.

•28 April 1994

536. During his testimony, Musema stated that on 28 April 1994, he went to Kitabi where he stayed for the day before returning to Rubona in the evening. The director of the Kitabi tea factory signed and stamped Exhibit D10. Musema heard that some of the factory staff had been massacred but on his visit there, it was calm at the factory.

• 29 April 1994

537. Musema declared that he left Rubona with the gendarmes between 09:00hrs and 10:00hrs, still in the red Pajero, and travelled back to Gisovu via Butare, Gikongoro and Gasaranda. They arrived in late afternoon. On the mission order appears the Gisovu tea factory stamp with "Arrivée Gisovu 29/04/94" written next to it.
538. Musema described the situation then as being calmer, with fewer people on the barriers and no movement of groups of killers. The factory was calm, the guards were present while the other employees were in their homes. The bodies he had seen previously on the roads were no longer there.
539. Musema confirmed that he held a meeting with the higher factory officials between 16:00hrs and 17:00hrs at the factory. There were four participants, excluding Musema, according to the report on the meeting. The report was made by the secretary Nyarugwiza and filed. The minutes were tendered as exhibit D30. The second paragraph of the minutes reads that "[t]he director informed the participants that he had not neglected the workers but rather that the Government had entrusted him with the assignment of going round factories to see how to ensure resumption of operations in such factories".
540. Musema testified that he stayed at the factory that night.

• 30 April 1994

541. Exhibit D31, the minutes of a meeting held on 30 April 1994 at the tea factory, was tendered by the Defence.
542. Musema confirmed that he signed the minutes that were taken by the secretary Nyarugwiza.

5815

Musema explained that the meeting took place in two phases, the first with the department heads of service and the second with the technicians so as to hear their opinions on restarting the factory. During the meeting, it was decided that Musema, as director of the factory should be the one to ask for fuel from the Préfet of Kibuye, because in time of war, the Préfets would requisition petrol stations and control the distribution of fuel.

543. Point 2.7 of the minutes reflects that the disappearance of employees of the tea factory was discussed. Musema stated that the atmosphere at the meeting was cold as everyone knew that there still existed dangers and that there was a general situation of insecurity in the region. Issues discussed included security at the factory, the date for the start of the picking of tea and the amount to be picked and the route to be used for the transport of tea.
544. Exhibit D32, a letter dated 30 April 1994 from Musema to a Ms Annociathe Nyiratabaruka assigning her as storekeeper, was tendered by the Defence to show the implementation of a decision taken at the meeting of 30 April 1994.
545. Exhibit D33, dated 30 April 1994 and signed and stamped by the Préfet Clément Kayishema, is an "Autorisation de Circulation". In this particular document, travel permission is granted with reference to the mission order of 21 April 1994.
546. Musema testified that he met the Préfet on 30 April 1994 for the issuance of this authorization needed to further his mission and travel outside of the Préfecture. The Préfet had previously decreed that all travel outside the Préfecture had to be authorized by him and that all travel between communes had to be authorized by a bourgmestre.
547. Musema went on to tell the Chamber that during his trip to Kibuye along Lake Kivu he saw burnt and destroyed houses. In Kibuye, the Stadium doors had been destroyed. There were red stains on the walls, and a putrid smell of decomposing bodies hung in the air. The Home Saint Jean and the catholic church had been damaged, and the church's front entrance damaged by fire.

• 1 May 1994

548. Exhibit D34 was tendered by the Defence to show that, during this period, Musema was still taking care of the running of the tea factory. The exhibit is a letter sent by Musema from Gisovu to Gaspard Bitihuse, in which he reprimands the addressee for not attending the meeting of 30 April 1994 and delegating instead to his subordinates. Musema indicated therein that work at the factory was to restart on 2 May 1994.

•2 May 1994

549. According to Musema, exhibit D28, the "Déclaration de Créances" dated 2 May 1994, was drafted prior to him leaving Gisovu on that same day. He left for Shagasha tea factory between 10:00hrs and 11:00hrs and arrived between 18:00hrs and 18:30hrs. Musema stated that the reference of 3 May 1994 as the date of arrival at Shagasha on Exhibit D10 was an error and that he arrived in Shagasha on 2 May 1994. The visit to the factory took place the next day, which may explain the date of 3 May 1994.
550. During cross-examination the Prosecutor referred to exhibit P56, a Swiss interview of 8 March 1995, where Musema states that he travelled on 2 May 1994 to the factory of Kitabi where he met with the director.

• 3 May 1994

551. Musema said he carried out his visit to Shagasha tea factory on the morning of 3 May 1994 and then visited the Gisakura factory afterwards. At Shagasha the teamaker signed the ordre de mission but did not have a stamp. Musema could not explain to the Chamber why the Shagasha signature appears further down the page after the Gisakura stamp, but assured the court that he did visit the former first. He stated that he came back to Shagasha after visiting Gisakura and that it may have been then that the teamaker signed.

552. Musema stated that the chief accountant of the Gisakura factory put his factory's stamp on the mission order on 3 May 1994. Musema visited Gisakura on at least two more occasions before leaving Shagasha on 5 May 1994.
553. However, prosecution Witness BB stated that on 3 May 1994, he was at the Gisakura tea factory. He also stated that Musema did not meet with the director of the Gisakura factory, although the stamp of the factory appears on Musema's mission order (exhibit D10, discussed below). In the opinion of the witness, had they met, the Gisakura director would have signed mission order, and not the chief accountant, whose signature the witness recognized.
554. According to Witness BB, the factory had two stamps: one was kept by the director and the other by the chief of personnel. In his opinion, the chief accountant, who was superior in rank to the chief of personnel, must have requested the latter for the stamp of the factory at the time of stamping the mission order for Musema. The usual procedure was to have the chief of personnel stamp the document if the director was unavailable. The witness added that as the chief accountant was a member of MDR Power, he would have had good relations with Musema.
555. The witness added that he believed that it was peculiar that the director had not been informed by his staff or wife of the visit of Musema.
556. During cross-examination of Claire Kayuku, the Prosecutor suggested in a question to her that on 3 May 1994, Musema attended a meeting in Kibuye town with the Prime Minister. The witness had no knowledge of this.

•5 May 1994

557. Musema testified he left for Rubona on 5 May 1994, and hoped to visit the tea factory of Mata. He departed from Shagasha around 08:00hrs and arrived in Rubona around 18:00hrs, staying there overnight. Although there were no massacres at Rubona, tension had risen as a result of all the refugee movements and because of all the news of the intensifying war.

• 6 May 1994

558. Musema said he believed he stayed in Rubona on 6 May 1994.
559. The Prosecutor put exhibit P56 to Musema wherein he states that "[o]n 3 May, I once again visited the factories in the south west, that is, Gisakura and Shagasha. I then returned to Butare. On 7 or 8 May, I returned to Gisovu and on 9 May, I supervised the resumption of operations of the factory. I remained there until 19/20 May and travelled to Butare to join my family."
560. During his testimony, Musema affirmed that between 7 and 19 May 1994 he was at Rubona and visited Gitarama on occasions.

•7 May 1994

561. Musema testified that on 7 May 1994, he went to Mata tea factory. The visit lasted no more than six hours after which he returned to Rubona. The chief accountant of Mata tea factory affixed his stamp to the mission order which is dated 7 May 1994.
562. According to Claire Kayuku, Musema visited a number of tea factories at the end of the month of April and the beginning of May.

• 7 to 19 May 1994

563. Musema stated that he stayed in Rubona from 7 May 1994 until 19 May 1994, never going beyond the towns of Butare and Gitarama and thus did not set foot in Kibuye Préfecture, and that he did not visit any other factory.
564. Exhibit D35, a letter dated 8 May 1994, to which is annexed the mission report, was typed up by the secretarial services of ISAR at Rubona. Reference is made therein to the date of the start of the mission, its objectives and to the interim report of 24 April 1994. There is mention of the dates on which the various tea factory started up production and existing stocks at the Gisakura and Shagasha factories. These last figures, according to Musema, could be made available by the teamaker, the accountant or even by the director. Conclusions rendered by Musema deal with fuel provisions, payment of salaries, security of the tea factories, recruitment of new staff and the setting up of transport routes for black tea via Gisenyi.

565. Musema indicated that he made approximately ten copies of the report for transmission to the directors of the visited tea factories. Musema handed a copy for the Director-General of OCIR-thé on 10 May 1994 to the commercial bank in Gitarama which had a convoy going to Gisenyi. The manager of the bank had promised to deliver this report to the Director-General.
566. Defence Witness MH said he saw Musema on 10 May and 13 May 1994. On 10 May, the witness saw Musema in Gitarama. He talked with him but did not remember asking him where he had come from or what he was doing. Musema had arrived in a vehicle, but Witness MH could not remember the type of vehicle it was, nor the colour of the vehicle. He recalled that these events dated back five years which may account for his inability to remember such details.
567. MH added that, on 13 May 1994, he was fleeing on his own to Burundi and had left Gitarama in the afternoon between 12:00hrs to 13:00hrs, travelling in his vehicle from Gitarama to Butare, towards the Kanyaru-Haut border post. After 45 minutes to an hour, he stopped at Rubona where he spent no more than 20 minutes. In Rubona, the witness went to the residence of the Kayuku family, being the family of Musema's mother-in-law, to say goodbye to them and to inform them that he was leaving Rwanda for Burundi, in transit to Kenya. He saw and spoke with Musema. Although he was unable to specify exactly when he met with Musema, he estimated it to have been around 14:00hrs, roughly one hour after leaving Gitarama.
568. A copy of Witness MH's passport with the entry stamp for Burundi on 13 May 1994 was introduced by the Defence as exhibit D102. On the same page as this stamp is a stamp issued at the Bujumbura airport showing the exit of Witness MH from Burundi territory on 15 May 1994.
569. Exhibit D45 contains a copy of a receipt dated 14 May 1994 from a FINA petrol station in Gitarama for a cash payment made by Musema for fuel for the Pajero, registration number A7171. This document, contends the Defence, strikes at the Prosecutor's case by placing Musema elsewhere than at the scene of the massacres in Bisesero.
570. Defence Witness MG, the wife of MH, said she saw Musema on two occasions between mid-April and 16 May when he came to visit her family in Gitarama. Although she was not sure of the exact dates, she believes that one of these visits was in May. MG left Gitarama on 15 May and Rwanda on 17 May. On 7 June 1994, she wrote a letter (exhibit D92) from Nairobi to Nicole Pletscher in which she indicates that on 17 May 1994 Musema and his family were in Butare at the house of Claire Kayuku's mother. She specified in her testimony that she did not personally see Musema in the days preceding her departure from Rwanda, but that she had heard of his whereabouts from one of her brothers and indirectly from her husband. MG indicated that she had written the date of 17 May in her letter as it was then that she had finally left Rwanda, and that she would be unable to confirm whether or not Musema had left the house of his mother in law on 16 May.
571. Defence witness Claire Kayuku, Musema's wife, declared she remembered that he returned to Gisovu at some time around the middle of May to pay the tea factory employees. She recalled that at the beginning of the month of May, Musema's red Pajero spent one or two weeks in a garage in Butare for repairs.
572. Exhibit D36, a letter, was tendered to demonstrate that Musema was a man not taking part in the events but just watching the events unfold and that by being in Butare on 14 May 1994, he could not have been in Muyira as alleged[10].
573. According to Musema, this letter was written by him on 14 May 1994 in Butare and addressed to a Swiss friend called Nicole Pletscher. He gave it to a person going to Burundi on 14 May 1994, and hoped that it would be posted in Bujumbura. Musema had known Nicole Pletscher since 1986 and his family and hers had become friends. The last time he saw her was on 3 April 1994 in Kigali. The next time he saw this letter was during his testimony in this case.

5818

574. In further support of Musema's absence from Gisovu, the Defence tendered exhibit D46, a letter from Musema sent to the prefect of Kibuye, dated 18 May 1994 requesting gendarmes for the factory. On the letter is written ACL, meaning "à classer". Annexed to this letter is a note, headed "A qui de droit", which Musema said was given to him by the Minister of Defence then based in Gitarama on 10 May 1994. By this note drafted by the minister, the commander of Kibuye groupement is requested, taking into account its importance, to ensure the close security of the tea factory. Musema stated that on 18 May 1994, as he still had car trouble, the letter and annex were given by Musema to someone in Gitarama who was going to Kibuye.
575. Were Musema in Gisovu, contends the Defence, he would not have waited eight days to transmit this note.
576. A number of other documents were tendered by the Defence to prove that Musema was absent from the Gisovu tea factory in mid-May 1994. Exhibit D41, a request for employment, received 5 May 1994 at the tea factory, was only dealt with by Musema on 14 June 1994. Exhibit D42, a request for accommodation for security reasons, was received on 11 May 1994, yet there appears no date as to when the request was dealt with. Exhibit D44, a request for accommodation, received at the tea factory on 16 May 1994 was dealt with by Musema on 14 June 1994.
577. Exhibit D43, is a letter sent from Joseph Nyarugwiza, head of personnel to the bourgmestre of Gisovu, dated 16 May 1994. Before the Chamber, Musema stated that the author of the letter forwarded the list of security personnel who requested to be trained in weapons, in furtherance of their discussions of 13 May and 16 May 1994. Musema was not aware of this letter, the first time he had seen it being upon its discovery by his Counsel during investigations at the Gisovu Tea Factory.
578. The Defence contends that, were Musema acting in concert with the bourgmestre Ndimbati during the massacres, Musema would have acted on the letter D43 or commented upon it, yet he did neither.
579. Exhibit D49, entitled "demande de trésorerie" and dated 21 May 1994, according to the Defence, was written by Musema for the attention of the Director-General of OCIR-thé. Annexed thereto is the trésorerie for April and May 1994. The annex is dated 7 May 1994 and signed by Musema.
580. Musema testified that this date referred to the date document D49 was prepared and not when it was signed by him, being 21 May.
581. Musema continued his testimony to say that as the situation was deteriorating in Rwanda, he and his family tried to formulate a plan in case they had to leave the country. Exhibit D37 is a certificate of complete identity issued for his eldest son Patrick Olivier Rukezamiheto, certified by the bourgmestre of Ruhashya Commune on 16 May 1994. By having this identity certificate, Musema hoped, the task of getting a passport for his son would be facilitated. Copies of the passports of his sons were tendered as exhibit D38, D39 and D40. According to Musema, all the passports were issued in Gitarama on 18 May 1994 in his presence. The passport tendered as exhibit D40 was signed by Musema as his son was not old enough to hold an identity card, and was then personally given to Musema.
582. Musema said he also went to the Commercial Bank in Gitarama on 18 May 1994 to find out about operations since the bank had moved from Kigali. He left his mission report for the Director-General of OCIR-thé with the manager of the bank who would deliver it on the occasion when funds were to be taken to Gisenyi.
583. Musema added he spent the night of 18 May in Rubona.
584. During cross-examination, reference was made to Musema's handwritten calendar, exhibit P68, which indicates that he was in Gisovu from 4 May to 14 May. Musema testified that this was an error and that he was not in Gisovu at that time.
585. In exhibit P57, a Swiss interview of 16 March 1995, Musema said that he was in Gisovu in the week of 4 to 13 May. The Prosecutor also recalled exhibit D49, the "demande de trésorerie". Musema reiterated that the date of 7 May referred to the date the document was prepared and not the date when signed by him, which was on 21 May.

5819

586. Musema confirmed that, although he did not know the specific names of hills in the Bisesero region, he knew that there had been attacks in the Bisesero region on 13 and 14 May and before. When asked how he knew that there had been attacks when he had not been there, he stated that the agronomists had informed him during the meeting of 19 May 1994 and that he had so heard on radio RTLM and the FPR radio, Muhabura. He also testified that he did not participate in attacks on Muyira hill or elsewhere on 13 and 14 May. Musema did not have any proof or reason to suspect that employees of the tea factory participated in the attacks or that tea factory vehicles were used. He did add, however, that there were times when he was absent from the tea factory, and as such could not be sure that a certain individual or a certain vehicle was not part of the attacks.

• 19 May 1994

587. Musema testified that on 19 May 1994, he returned to the Gisovu Tea Factory. He travelled in the company of two soldiers, Félicien and Alphonse, who had been with him since the start of the mission, and a locksmith who came to help with the safes and doors. They travelled aboard the Pajero. Having left around 09:00hrs they arrived between 15:00hrs and 16:00hrs. The stamp of the Gisovu Tea Factory and "Arrivée à Gisovu le 19.05.94" appear on Exhibit D10. The writing is that of Musema and the signature imposed on the seal that of the chief of personnel.

588. Musema went on to say that a meeting was held at the factory. Those present were Musema, Gaspard Bitihuse, teamaker, James Barawigirira, chief mechanic ad interim, Joseph Nyarugwiza, chief of personnel, and François Uwamugura, accountant of the factory. The minutes of the meeting, drafted by Joseph Nyarugwiza and signed by him and Musema, were tendered by the Defence as exhibit D47. Most issues dealt with stocks and operations of the tea factory. Paragraph 2 of the minutes indicates that the Director of the tea factory had been on "tournée" and that when he was to return his car had broken down and that although he had sought assistance from the factory, none had been forthcoming.

589. During his testimony, Musema explained that his Pajero had developed problems on 7 May 1994 during his visit to Mata tea factory. As the problems were not solved, he had to stay in the Butare region. He had asked for a replacement car from the factory which was only sent on 19 May 1994 by which time the Pajero had been repaired. Exhibit D45, the "Déclaration de Créance", requesting payment of expenses incurred by Musema for the Pajero reg. A7171, is dated 19 May 1994. The form was filled out by the secretary of the factory and signed by the accountant and Musema. Attached, inter alia, is a bill from a garage in Butare, for spare parts, dated 19 April 1994.

590. Also tendered by the Defence was exhibit D48, a letter dated 19 May 1994, from Musema to the manager of the Banque Commerciale du Rwanda requesting withdrawal of funds. The letter also explained that the chief accountant, Canisius Twagura-Kayego, the usual co-signatory, had not been seen since 13 April 1994. In cross-examination, Musema stated that he could not indicate explicitly in the letter that people had died, but that it was implied by saying that they had disappeared. The bench confirmed that in French the term "disparu" could be used to indicate that someone had died.

591. Musema told the Chamber that he stayed at the Gisovu Tea Factory on the night of 19 May 1994.

•20 May 1994

592. Musema testified that on 20 May 1994, he went to the Commercial Bank in Kibuye to deliver the letter and collect funds for the salaries. He was accompanied by the two soldiers and the cashier.They stayed at the Gisovu Tea Factory on the night of 20 May 1994.

•21 to 27 May 1994

593. Musema testified that he returned to Rubona to see his family on 21 May 1994. He left Gisovu

Tea Factory with the locksmith around 11:00hrs after having distributed the salaries.

594. Musema added that he stayed in Rubona until 27 May 1994. While in Rubona, Musema and his family again discussed leaving the country. At some point during this period, he said he travelled to Gitarama to drop off documents for the factory at the commercial bank and to search for family members. He also went to Nyanza one day to visit a friend of his who was a priest.

• 27 May 1994

595. Musema stated that he returned to the tea factory on 27 May 1994. His family had moved to Kitabi as result of the advancing soldiers. He stayed the night of 26 May in Rubona and then passed via Kitabi to collect his family on his return to the factory in Gisovu. His wife, two of his children and the soldiers, Alphonse and Félicien, accompanied him to the tea factory.
596. According to Musema, a meeting with eight participants and chaired by himself was held at the factory 27 May. The report of such a meeting was tendered as exhibit D51. The report refers to the meetings of 29 April, 30 April and 19 May. The atmosphere at the tea factory was tense due to news of the war and the ongoing massacres in the Bisesero region. The meeting addressed a number of issues pertaining to the security and production of the tea factory, including losses incurred due to a breakdown which had not been repaired. This breakdown had occurred ten days before 19 May. This, concludes the Defence, demonstrates that Musema was not in the vicinity of the tea factory during these ten days, i.e. 10 - 19 May 1994.
597. One recommendation of the meeting referred to an agreement reached between Musema and the bourgmestre of Gisovu for weapons training. It was also decided that gendarmes would come and help the factory guards due to the general insecurity.
598. Musema added that he and his family stayed at the Gisovu Tea Factory on 27 May 1994.
599. The Prosecutor referred to exhibit D51, and to the recommendation regarding civil defence as proof of Musema's involvement in the training of tea factory employees. Musema stated that this point constituted an issue raised by an employee. He did not send people for training as it was not of direct concern for the tea factory, but was rather the concern of the bourgmestre and the commune. This, Musema explained, was the agreement between him and Ndimbati.

•28 May 1994

600. Musema testified that, by 28 May 1994, he had two plans in mind, one to evacuate his family to the border, and the other to participate in a technical mission headed by a certain Claudien Kanyarwanda, to prospect a corridor for import and export.
601. According to Musema, a meeting was held on 28 May 1994 at the factory in which he participated. Exhibit D52 is a report thereof, signed by Musema. In the report it is stated that Musema handed over three Kalashnikov rifles. During his testimony, Musema stated that he had obtained them in Gitarama, from the military camp on the order of the Minister of Defence, Augustin Bizimana after having explained to the minister his security concerns for the tea factory, and that no help had been forthcoming from the Préfet. The minister agreed to give Musema three rifles to complement the two at the factory and to equip all five military reservists.
602. Support for the movements of Musema was put forward by the Defence in exhibit D53, "Autorisation de sortie de fonds" dated 28 May 1994, which authorized the payment of funds for expenses to Harelimana for mission expenses with Musema from 21 May to 29 May 1994. Exhibit D55, "Déclaration de créance" confirmed the payment of funds to corporal Félicien Harélimana for the mission with Musema from 21 to 29 May 1994. This is signed by Musema and the accountant of the tea factory.
603. Exhibit D54, "Autorisation de sortie de fonds" dated 29 May 1994, authorized advance payments of funds to Musema for his mission to Zaïre.
604. In the penultimate paragraph of a letter from the witness Claire Kayuku to the witness Nicole Pletscher, tendered by the Defence as exhibit D90, there is mention of the fact that Musema and she stopped over in Gisovu on 27 and 28 May on their way from Butare to Shagasha.

5821

•29 May 1994

605. Defence exhibit D10, shows a stamp of Gisovu Tea Factory, with "Fin de mission: 29/05/94" written by Musema. The signatures of the chief of personnel and of Musema also appear.
606. Musema testified that he left Gisovu with his family on 29 May 1994. They first went to Shagasha tea factory where they stayed at the "maison de passage".
607. Musema explained in cross-examination that the date of 29 May 1994 pertained to the end of the mission with the OCIR-thé and that between 19 May and 29 May he finalized his reports. Although he dealt with personal issues, the expenses he incurred during this eleven day period were billed only for the official work he carried out. Normal procedure required more precise dates, usually on a daily basis, than those on the exhibit D10 for payment of expenses. For this particular period, stated Musema, he was paid for six to eight days, on the basis of his oral representations.
608. Musema affirmed that the date of 29 May was clearly indicated on the exhibit and that the "2" had not been written over a "1". The bench accepted this statement.
609. The Defence filed exhibit D63, a "Prime" for Corporal Ndindabahizi for the period 29 May to 17 June 1994 signed by Musema on 17 June 1994. The corporal was one of two gendarmes who had been sent to the tea factory by the Kibuye gendarmerie for security purposes.

•30 May 1994

610. Musema testified that on 30 May 1994 he left Shagasha between 08:00hrs and 09:00hrs and went to Cyangugu to join the technical mission. After a number of meetings, he returned to Shagasha where he stayed overnight.

•31 May 1994

611. On 31 May 1994, stated Musema, he rejoined the mission in Cyangugu and stayed overnight at the Chutes Hotel.
612. The Defence tendered photocopies of the passport of Musema as exhibit D56. On page 12 of the passport are stamps dated 31 May 1994. Musema explained that he travelled with the technical mission to Zaïre leaving Rwanda through Bugarama and entering Zaïre at Kamanyoma. He testified that they came back from Zaïre on the same day. Exhibit D54 is an "Autorisation de sortie de fonds" dated 29 May 1994, which authorized advance payments of funds to Musema for his mission to Zaïre.
613. Also tendered was exhibit D59, letter of 2 June 1994, sent to Musema and received at the tea factory on 4 June 1994. In annex are the minutes of a meeting held by the agronomists on 31 May 1994, Musema not being marked as present at the meeting.

•1 to 10 June 1994

614. Musema testified that after meeting a delegation from Bukavu in Cyangugu, he travelled back to Shagasha where he stayed at the maison de passage. His family and he remained at Shagasha until 10 June 1994. He testified that for the first few days he stayed at the maison de passage, and that he also spent one night in Kitabi where he searched for his mother-in-law. He stated that he had to wait longer than he expected for the return of the directors of the Shagasha and Gisakura tea factories with news from the Director-General of the OCIR-thé.
615. The Defence produced exhibit D57, an "Autorisation spéciale de circulation CEPGL", issued on 3 June 1994 in Cyangugu. Musema explained that this document was valid for travel in Burundi, Rwanda and Zaïre.
616. Exhibit D58 is a letter signed by Musema, dated 6 June 1994, sent to a merchant in Cyangugu requesting fuel for the Gisovu Tea Factory and the calculation of costs. Although the letter is addressed from Gisovu, Musema testified that he was in Shagasha when he drafted it. He explained that the directors of Shagasha and Gisakura Tea Factories had recommended the merchants based in Cyangugu who were buying fuel from Zaïre.

617. Defence Witness Claire Kayuku testified that from 29 May 1994, until 7 or 10 June, Musema stayed with her and the family at the Shagasha tea factory, except for one or two nights which he spent in Bukavu as the border had closed. She explained that during this period he was with a delegation working between Cyangugu and Zaïre looking for ways to export tea to Zaïre.

•10 - 17 June 1994

618. Musema testified that he returned to Gisovu Tea Factory on 10 June 1994, without the two soldiers who had received the order to return to Gitarama. Musema testified that this order had been sent by Colonel Bagarameshe head of the Cyangugu Gendarmerie. As such, the colonel had given him a gendarme from Cyangugu to accompany him to Gisovu.
619. On 10 June, said Musema, the factory was functioning normally save for the uncertainty that hung in the air as regards the war. He said that he stayed at the factory until 17 June 1994 and carried out his normal duties.
620. He denied ever transporting people in factory cars to massacres, and stated that he could not have control over all the factory workers, especially not those outside the premises of the factory. He stated that he had noted an unusual increase in fuel consumption since 6 April 1994.
621. A number of exhibits were filed by the Defence to demonstrate that Musema worked as per normal during this period. Exhibit D60 is a "note de service" requesting drivers to maintain certain standards, to service their vehicles and to account for all fuel consumption, dated 14 June 1994, and signed by Musema. Exhibit D63 is the "prime" authorizing payment to Corporal Ndinbabahizi signed on 17 June 1994 by Musema. Exhibit D61 is a fiche de déplacement, dated 16 June 1994, signed and stamped by the Préfet of Kibuye, Clément Kayishema, giving Musema the two gendarmes, and a driver permission to travel for 30 days (17 June to 17 July) between Cyangugu, Gikongoro, Butare and Gisenyi on mission in vehicle reg. A9095. Musema stated that this last document was collected by an agronomist who went to Kibuye on 16 July.
622. The Defence produced exhibit D64, a letter dated 31 May 1994, sent to Musema by the two gendarmes ensuring security at the factory, wherein they request means of transport to make a trip to their camp in Kibuye. Musema testified that he never received the letter, and that it must have been signed by one gendarme only as the other had accompanied Musema on his trip during the first ten days of June.
623. In cross-examination, the Prosecutor referred to this exhibit and suggested that Musema exerted control over the gendarmes. Musema denied this saying that they were at all times under the command of the Gendarmerie of Kibuye.

• 17 June 1994

624. Musema testified that on 17 June 1994 he went to Shagasha tea factory to see his family and to buy some goods. He was accompanied by a gendarme and travelled aboard a Daihatsu to bring the goods back to Gisovu.
625. He arrived in Shagasha around 15:00hrs or 16:00hrs. He first went to see his family at the Shagasha Tea Factory maison de passage, and then went to the tea factory and to Cyangugu to inquire and purchase the necessary goods. He spent the night with his family at Shagasha.
626. Exhibit D65, a mission order given to the gendarme accompanying Musema, and delivered to the commanding officer of the Gendarmerie of Kibuye, was filed by the Defence as support for the alibi during this period. Dates thereon are those of departure from Gisovu to Cyangugu, 17 June 1994, return to Gisovu from Cyangugu, 20 June 1994, departure from Gisovu to Gisenyi, 21 June 1994, and return to Gisovu from Gisenyi, 28 June 1994.

627. The Defence produced exhibit D66, "Pièce de Caisse Sortie", dated 17 June 1994, which indicates the amount advanced to Musema for the purchase of goods for the factory. Also produced was exhibit D67, a handwritten note dated 17 June 1994 and left by Kanyarwanda Claudien - the director of Magerwa who headed the earlier mission to Zaïre, with Musema's family at Shagasha. The Defence submitted that this note clearly indicates that the author expected to meet Musema in the near future.
628. Defence Witness Claire Kayuku testified that she remained in Shagasha until 18 July 1994.

• 18 June 1994

629. On 18 June 1994, stated Musema, he went to Gihundwae, Cyangugu to visit family members who had come from Rubona. At Cyangugu he also bought the goods he needed and met with a merchant called Elias Bakundukiza. Musema added that he stayed in Shagasha overnight.

•19 June 1994

630. Musema testified that on 19 June 1994 he travelled to Kitabi and Gikongoro to see other relatives including his mother-in-law. He went to Rubona to look for other relatives and spent the night in Gikongoro.
631. In support of this travel, the Defence filed exhibit D90, a letter from its Witness Claire Kayuku dated 21 June 1994 from Shagasha. She writes therein "Alfred is still on the move, he is going back and forth and serving as a link between everybody, Butare, where my elder sister is, my mother who has fled to Gikongoro with two brothers and three children, with us in Cyangugu guest house [...]".

• 20 June 1994

632. Musema stated that he returned to Shagasha in the morning of 20 June and later on the same day he travelled to Gisovu. He explained that he returned to Gisovu as his family had heard a communiqué on the radio from a Mr Kanyarwanda asking him to join him in Gisenyi. Musema testified that as he arrived late in Gisovu he stayed overnight.
633. The Defence presented a number of exhibits to show that Musema had returned to Gisovu on this date. Exhibit D70 is a letter from the tea factory to the bourgmestre of Gisovu, Ndimbati, dated 21 June 1994, on which appear handwritten notes of Musema, also dated 21 June. The subject concerned a night guard, a "Zamu", who had been working at the tea factory and who, according to Musema, was suspected of participating in massacres and had thus been sent to the bourgmestre. Exhibit D52 is the report of a meeting held on 28 May 1994 on which Musema wrote on 21 June that this report should be circulated to a number of individuals.
634. During cross-examination concerning exhibit D70, Musema explained that this night guard "Zamu" was paid and worked on a day-to-day basis. Contrary to the feeling of the Prosecutor, Musema did not find anything peculiar in this system. The Prosecutor tendered exhibit P70, a response to exhibit D70, indicating that the guards' training would be terminated. Musema explained that this training was that given by the gendarmes to guards at the factory, in the context of the factory security. The rest of the cross examination on this exhibit and on exhibits P71 and P72 pertained to the type of training received by the guards and others, and whether this involved weapons and was carried out with the full knowledge of Musema. Such matters are not alleged in the Indictment and have thus been left out here.

•21 to 28 June 1994

635. Musema stated that he drove to Gisenyi on 21 June 1994, leaving around 09:00hrs in the A7171 Pajero with a gendarme, and arriving around 18:00hrs. He stayed in Gisenyi to finalize the tea export mission and to access funds from the Banque Commerciale which had moved from Kigali to Gisenyi. He indicated that he was very concerned for his family and tried to contact individuals outside Rwanda.

636. During this period, and in the context of the tea exportations, Musema said that he went to Goma in Zaïre, only returning to Gisovu on 28 June with the gendarmes who had accompanied him. Musema explained that he returned on this day to Gisovu so as to deposit cash at Kibuye bank for the salaries of the tea factory personnel, to supervize the factory and also to be able to join his family for whom he was concerned. On their return trip, they followed a French military convoy and arrived in Gisovu late afternoon.

637. As regards these dates, the Defence referred to exhibit D65 again, the mission order given to the gendarme accompanying Musema, and delivered to the commanding officer of the Gendarmerie of Kibuye. The departure from Gisovu to Gisenyi is 21 June 1994, and the return to Gisovu from Gisenyi is on 28 June 1994. The Defence also referred to exhibit D69, a letter written by Musema on 23 June 1994 from Gisenyi and addressed to Swiss friends. The letter was sent through the intermediary of the Belgian director of SOTRAG who was returning to Europe.

638. The Defence presented two exhibits to show that Musema travelled to Gisenyi during this period. In exhibit D90, a letter dated 21 June 1994 from Defence Witness Claire Kayuku in Shagasha, it is written of Musema that "for the time being he is in Gisenyi after satisfying everybody's needs especially to make them secure. [...] He will certainly try to contact you through Goma [near Gisenyi], he has been called urgently by his Minister we do not know for what reason." In exhibit D91, another letter from Claire Kayuku, this one dated 6 July 1994, she writes "Alfred has not returned since 20/6. On his return from Gisenyi last week he passed through Gisovu. On arrival there he fell ill and was confined to bed without medication for 3 days. He wrote a short letter to inform me yesterday [...]".

639. During the cross-examination of Claire Kayuku, the Prosecutor suggested that during this period Musema was part and parcel of the interim government, and that he was in Kapgayi and Gisenyi at the same time as the interim government were in these locations. The witness refuted these allegations and stated that she described Musema in the letter as "impertubable" because he would go to any length to ensure that the factory was safe and that it stayed in operation as directed by the Minister.

• 29 June to 24 July 1994

640. Musema testified that he stayed at the Gisovu Tea Factory until 24 July 1994. On or about 4 July 1994, French troops came to the tea factory where they stayed until the departure of Musema. Some moved into a church being built by Musema, while others stayed in the houses of the tea factory.

641. Musema explained that on 16 July, "there was an event" after which the Préfet, gendarmes, shopkeepers, bourgmestres - everybody - left the Préfecture of Kibuye and went to Zaïre. The bourgmestre of Gisovu and his colleagues fled in the night of 17 July. Musema said he did not know what was happening and that he was not associated to it. Employees of the tea factory also wanted to flee, but Musema believed that they should wait to see how the situation developed in the south of the country at the Shagasha and Gisakura factories.

642. He testified that tea production ended on 19 July 1994 at the factory.

643. On 20 July 1994, said Musema, he sent a messenger to the Shagasha tea factory to contact his wife. However the messenger found the factory destroyed and abandoned. When he received this information, being worried, he decided to leave for Cyangugu and Shagasha.

644. Musema stated that on 24 July, he drove to Cyangugu and crossed the border by foot into Zaïre where he went to Bukavu blindly looking for his family amongst the thousands of refugees. By luck, he saw one of his sons near a petrol station and managed to meet his family and other relatives. Musema said that he explained to his wife that he couldn't just abandon the factory and thus returned to Gisovu the same day.

645. A number of exhibits were presented by the Defence to show that Musema was present at the factory during this period and that he dealt with matters left unattended during his travels between 21 and 28 June. Exhibit D71, are two letters from the prefect of Kibuye, dated 21 June 1994, the first addressed to Musema requesting information on the personnel status at the Gisovu tea factory, and the second, addressed to the bourgmestre and to the head of service of the tea factory informing them of the need for funds and the bank account for the civil defence. Musema's handwritten notes dated 29 June 1994 appear on both letters. Musema stated that he did not deem it necessary to respond to the second letter, an inaction which, according to the Defence, goes against the Prosecutor's allegation as regards Musema's participation in the massacres.

646. Exhibit D72, is a letter received by the tea factory on 29 June 1994. Musema confirmed that the date of 28 June 1994 as written by him on this letter was an error on his part. The letter was sent by the bourgmestre Ndimbati informing the addressees of the bank account for the civil defence and of the need to contribute funds to fight and vanquish the Inkotanyi. Musema testified that he did not provide any funds in this regard. His handwritten remarks are that the letter should be circulated to the heads of service for dissemination.

647. Other evidence tendered by the Defence include exhibit D73, a letter received 27 June 1994 by the tea factory, with handwritten notes of Musema dated 29 June; exhibit D74, a letter received 8 July 1994 by the tea factory, sent by the bourgmestre of Gisovu to Musema in response to the letter filed as exhibit D70. Musema wrote comments on the letter on 9 July 1994. The individual, the "Zamu" was not to be allowed to be trained in the use of weapons. Also tendered were exhibit D75, an inventory of materials given to the French troops, dated 5 July 1994 and signed by the Adjudant Jean-Pierre Peigne; exhibit D76, a letter dated 8 July 1994 and sent by Musema to Swiss friends through the French troops; exhibit D77, dated 13 July 1994 and signed by Musema, a payment of Corporal Ndindabahizi for his expenses while he stayed at the tea factory from 18 June to 13 July 1994; exhibit D78, a letter dated 13 July 1994 from Musema forwarding to the Director-General of OCIR-thé the figures of the Gisovu Tea Factory for the first quarter of 1994; exhibit D80, a letter sent on 18 July 1994 from Musema to the directors of the Gisakura and Shagasha Tea Factories enquiring as to the possibility of housing the families of his personnel at their factories in view of the security situation; exhibit D81, a letter from Captain Lecointre of the French military, addressed to Musema and dated 18 July 1994, in which the author of the letter explains that he is leaving to go to another zone and that Lieutenant Beauraisain is henceforth in charge of the troops staying in Gisovu; exhibit D82, a letter dated 20 July 1994, sent from employees to Musema requesting overtime payment; exhibit D83, a letter sent from Musema to Colonel Sartre on 22 July 1994 thanking him for the security provided at the factory; and exhibit D22, a handwritten note indicating the return of a gun by Musema to the French army on 24 July 1994.

• 25 July 1994

648. Musema testified that he finally left Gisovu tea factory on 25 July 1994, passing into Zaïre without a vehicle, leaving Rwanda for the last time.

Factual Findings

649. The Chamber has considered the testimonies of the witnesses, the evidence in support of the contested facts and the alibi of Musema. It shall now present in chronological order, its factual findings thereon. The burden of proof being on the Prosecutor, the Chamber will first consider the Prosecutor's evidence, and then, if the Chamber deems there to be a case to answer, it will consider the alibi before finally making its findings.

•15 April 1994

As pertains to the facts alleged:

650. Although Witness BB testified, concerning the alleged events of 15 April 1994, that he received information from workers from Gisakura and from Muko that Musema had been seen in the communes of Musebeya and Muko at the wheel of a Daihatsu truck transporting individuals armed with spears and machetes, the Chamber notes that this testimony is hearsay corroborated by no other witness brought to testify. Furthermore, the Prosecutor did not advance any other arguments or evidence in support of this testimony.
651. Consequently, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was in the communes of Musebeya and Muko at the wheel of a Daihatsu truck transporting individuals armed with spears and machetes.

• Karongi hill FM Station, 18 April 1994

As pertains to the facts alleged:

652. The Chamber has considered the testimony of Witness M with regard to the meeting at Karongi hill on 18 April 1994. As already indicated in the section on evidentiary matters, the Chamber may in principle rely on the testimony of a single witness as to certain events, without necessitating corroboration thereof.
653. The Chamber finds Witness M to be credible, his evidence proving to be consistent throughout his testimony. Under cross-examination, no inconsistencies with prior testimony emerged and the Chamber was satisfied that the witness was able to see and hear Musema make statements to the people at the meeting on Karongi hill. Among these statements, he said that they had to rise together and fight their enemy the Tutsis and deliver their country from the enemy. Musema also said that as compensation the unemployed would take the jobs of those killed, and that they would appropriate the lands and properties of the Tutsis. Witness M also heard Musema say that those who wanted to have fun could rape the women and girls of the Tutsis without fearing any consequences.
654. The Defence, in its closing brief, submitted that Witness M was not credible on the grounds that it was improbable that the witness would not have been discovered in the hut; that it was improbable that the meeting would have been held at the top of the hill rather than at the bottom of the hill; and that it was peculiar that the witness should wait nearly five years (the witness statement being dated 13 January 1999) before making a statement on the events he witnessed.
655. The Chamber has considered all of these arguments and finds that they do not impair the credibility of the witness. The Chamber does not find it inherently improbable that his presence at the hut would not have been discovered. The witness clearly described his movements from one room to another within the hut to avoid detection. He gave two reasons as to why the meeting should be held at the top of Karongi hill - firstly that the assailants could get the guns there and secondly because from this vantage point they could see the refugee camp which was subsequently attacked. In the opinion of the Chamber, for the witness to have waited five years before making a statement is not significant because he only made the statement in response to an approach from the Office of the Prosecutor at that time.

As pertains to the alibi:

656. According to the alibi, Musema was in Rubona and Gitarama on 18 April 1994 having left Gisovu on 17 April.
657. The Prosecutor contested this last date by referring to numerous previous interviews and a calendar prepared by Musema in 1996, all of which tend to suggest that Musema left Gisovu two days before that date, namely on 15 April. Furthermore, the Defence Witness Claire Kayuku, Musema's wife, testified that she saw him on his return to Rubona on 16 or 17 April 1994.
658. Although there appears to be some doubt as to the exact date of departure of Musema, in the opinion of the Chamber, the submissions of the Prosecutor on this issue, the testimony of Musema and of Claire Kayuku and the other evidence, all tend towards demonstrating not that Musema was at or in the vicinity of Karongi hill FM Station on 18 April, but rather that he had actually left Gisovu on a date earlier than that which he indicated in his testimony during the trial. No evidence, save the testimony of Witness M, places Musema at Karongi FM station on that day. The Prosecutor has not demonstrated how and when Musema may have traveled from Rubona to Kibuye Préfecture to lead the meeting. This, in the opinion of the Chamber, creates doubt in the facts as alleged by the Prosecutor as pertains to the participation of Musema in a meeting convened at Karongi hill FM Station on 18 April 1994.

5827

Findings:

659. Therefore, in the opinion of the Chamber, there still remains doubt on Musema's presence at the 18 April 1994 meeting on Karongi hill, taking into account his and Claire Kayuku's testimonies on the alibi, and the arguments of the Prosecutor which indicate only that Musema had left Gisovu earlier than he stated, without questioning whether he was in Gitarama on 18 April or not.
660. Under these circumstances, the Chamber finds the sole testimony of Witness M in the matter to be insufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in a meeting at the Karongi hill FM Station on 18 April 1994.

•On or about 20 April and on 26 April 1994

661. Prosecution witnesses testified in relation to events which occurred on or about 20 April and on 26 April 1994 respectively. As the alibi of Musema is not specific to these dates but covers the period as a whole, the Chamber shall first consider each of the events alleged and the credibility of the witnesses, and it shall then consider the alibi for that period before making its findings.

•On or about 20 April 1994, near the Gisovu Tea Factory

As to the facts alleged:

662. Witness K testified that on or about 20 April 1994, while in hiding, he saw Musema transport armed attackers in the vicinity of the Gisovu Tea Factory. The witness stated that the assailants, including tea factory employees and persons from Gikongoro, were taken to the Bisesero region to kill Inyenzi.
663. Regarding the alleged events on or about 20 April 1994, the Chamber has considered the testimony of Witness K, including his previous statements. A number of discrepancies arose during the course of his cross-examination between his oral testimony and previous statements. Questions were addressed to the witness by the Chamber and by the Defence regarding these discrepancies, in particular with regard to the dates during which he was hiding in the tea plantation, the note allegedly discovered by the witness on Muyira hill after a massacre, and the basis of his remembering important dates.
664. The Chamber finds that, in answering these questions, the witness was evasive and often contradictory as to a number of important details. The witness sought during his testimony to have the verb "to write" substituted by the verb "to memorize" in one of his statements, essential to his testimony inasmuch as it supports the means by which he could remember the dates of the events about which he was testifying.
665. The Chamber accepts that, considering the prevailing circumstances in which pre-trial statements are taken, errors and inaccuracies may occur therein. However, in the present instance, the alleged errors which the witness is seeking to amend are key to his testimony of the participation of Musema in events and in the way he remembers such events. Furthermore, in the opinion of the Chamber, such discrepancies cannot be solely attributed to the investigators and the methods used in the taking of pre-trial statements. Rather, the Chamber deems such discrepancies to cast doubt as to the veracity and consistency of the witness' testimony and to be contradictions serious enough to put into doubt the credibility of the witness. Consequently, the Chamber deems the testimony of Witness K insufficiently reliable to be admitted as evidence.

666. Therefore, the Chamber is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that on or about 20 April, Musema transported tea factory workers and attackers from Gikongoro in tea factory vehicles to massacres in the Bisesero region as alleged by Witness K.

•Gitwa hill, 26 April 1994

As pertains to the facts alleged:

667. The Chamber has considered the sole testimony of Witness M as regards to an attack he described seeing on 26 April 1994 led by Musema on Gitwa hill, six days after having left his hiding place at the Karongi hill FM station. The witness said that during this attack he saw Musema aboard a tea factory Daihatsu, and a number of other vehicles which he described during his testimony. Musema and many others, some of whom wore banana leaves and Imihurura belts, are then said to have taken part in a large scale attack on Gitwa hill. Musema fired shots into the crowd of refugees.

668. The witness stated that this had been the most sweeping attack he had seen and one he had memorized very well by consulting his electronic wrist-watch at the time. Although in cross-examination the witness was unable to remember the precise date of the statement he had given three months earlier, the Chamber does not find such a lapse of memory sufficient to cast doubt on the credibility of the witness. Rather, the Chamber finds Witness M overall to be credible and consistent, without at any time being evasive during his testimony.

As pertains to the Alibi:

669. The Chamber notes that the alibi of Musema is not specific to 26 April 1994, but is linked with the mission order and travel consequent thereto. The Defence purports that on 18 April 1994, Musema, while searching for the heads of service of OCIR-thé in Gitarama, ran into the Minister of Industry, Trade and Handicraft, Justin Mugenzi. Having conveyed to Musema his concerns for the Gisovu Tea Factory, the minister indicated to him that he would be sent on mission to contact the Director-General of OCIR-thé to start up the tea factories.

670. According to the alibi, Musema, who during this period was staying in Rubona, returned to Gitarama on 21 April 1994 where again he ran into Justin Mugenzi and also the Minister of Public Works, Water and Energy, this time at a FINA petrol station. Mugenzi told Musema of the security measures he had taken for the factory, and informed him that he had been unable to contact Mr Baragaza the Director-General of OCIR-thé. As such, Musema was to go to the north of the country to find him. The minister said he would prepare the necessary paperwork which Musema should pick up from the residence of Faustin Nyagahima, a director within the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Handicraft. During the meeting at the FINA station, Mugenzi authorized the Minister of Public Works, Water and Energy to sign the eventual mission order.

671. On 22 April, Musema picked up the mission order (exhibit D10) from Faustin Nyagahima. The order was stamped by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, according to Musema, was the only minister at that time in Gitarama to possess a stamp. Musema was given two gendarmes from the military camp in Gitarama and then traveled up to the factory of Pfunda where he stayed until 25 April. With reference to exhibit D10, where Musema wrote "arrivée à Pfunda le 21/04/1994", Musema attributed this date to an error, and affirmed that he arrived at the factory in Pfunda on 22

5829

April. Exhibits in support of this contention include exhibit D28, a "Déclaration de Créances" for expenses incurred by OCIR-thé (Gisovu Tea Factory) for the use of two gendarmes from 22 April 1994 up to 2 May 1994, which is signed by the Chief accountant of the Gisovu tea factory.

672. Although he only visited the Pfunda Tea Factory during this part of his mission, Musema admitted that he was able to include the factories of Nyabihu and Rubaya in his interim report (exhibit D29), having met the respective directors during the trip.
673. According to the alibi, on 25 April Musema returned to Gitarama after meeting the Director-General of OCIR-thé at Mukamara, who read the interim report and confirmed that Musema could continue his mission. Having stayed overnight in Gitarama, Musema traveled on to Rubona.
674. Defence Witness Claire Kayuku testified that Musema left Rubona on 22 April for Gisenyi and returned on 26 April where he stayed overnight.
675. The Chamber has considered the contentions of the Prosecutor that the mission order was false and that the stamps of the ministries were fabrications. The Prosecutor also contends that chance encounters with ministers, as described by Musema, were hardly convincing as the basis of the mission. In the opinion of the Prosecutor, the mission order was designed simply to mislead the Chamber and to conceal the extent of Musema's involvement in the massacres. The Prosecutor further contends that the interim report was strikingly thin considering the apparent nature of the mission. Moreover, Prosecution Witness BB stated that the mission order was unusual, and not one normally used by OCIR-thé.
676. The Chamber has considered the alibi and the Defence witness. The Chamber finds that the documentary evidence, read in conjunction with the testimony of Musema, raised a number of contradictions, many of which were addressed by the Prosecutor. These contradictions related, inter alia, to the plausibility of the chance meetings, the date the mission actually started, the array of ministry stamps on the mission order and the content of the interim report prepared by Musema.
677. The Chamber moreover considered the answers given by Musema to explain these discrepancies. However, the Chamber was not convinced by the relevant explanations, and, as such, must reject the alibi for this period.

Findings:

678. As stated above, the Chamber finds that Witness M appeared credible during his testimony as regards the attack on Gitwa hill of 26 April 1994. Moreover, the Chamber finds that the alibi of Musema for this date is doubtful and contains a number of material inconsistencies. The explanations given by Musema for these inconsistencies were unconvincing, in the opinion of the Chamber.
679. As such, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema led and participated in the attack of 26 April 1994 on Gitwa hill. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema arrived aboard one of the Gisovu Tea Factory Daihatsus. It has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema and others, some of whom wore Imuhura belts and banana leaves, participated in a large scale attack against refugees. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema shot into the crowd of refugees.

•End of April - beginning of May 1994, Muyira and Rwirambo hills

As pertains to the facts alleged:

680. The Chamber has considered the testimonies of Witnesses F and R as regards the alleged participation of Musema in attacks near the end of April and the beginning of May 1994.
681. Witness F spoke of an attack he witnessed at some point between 17 and 30 April 1994 on Muyira hill. He described how assailants from Gisovu and Gishyita converged on the hill and launched a first attack on Muyira hill during which they were forced back by the refugees. Half an hour later, they regrouped, and launched a second attack. Witness F told the Chamber that he saw Musema during these attacks, carrying a medium length black rifle and firing shots at refugees who had surrounded a policeman, before running away to his own red car.

5830

682. As for Witness R, he described to the Chamber an attack which he said took place on Rwirambo hill around the end of April or the beginning of May 1994. The witness identified Musema, armed with a rifle, amongst others, and saw a number of vehicles, including four tea factory pick-ups aboard of which were Interahamwe. The witness explained that as he fled the attackers, he was wounded in the arm by a gunshot coming from the direction of Musema and another.

683. The Chamber notes that Witness R previously testified in the Kayishema and Ruzindana trial under the pseudonym "JJ". The Defence raised a number of apparent contradictions between the witness' testimony in that trial and in this trial as regards the treatment he received for his gun shot wound.

684. Having considered the arguments of the Defence as to these discrepancies and the answers of the witness thereon, the Chamber finds Witness R to be credible. The questions raised by the Defence relating to the date of his injury and the manner in which it was treated did not elicit inconsistencies between the witness' testimony in this trial and his earlier testimony in the trial of Kayishema and Ruzindana. He clarified that he had obtained penicillin not soon after the injury, which is when it was treated with cow butter, but much later. With regard to dates, the Chamber notes that the 29 April falls within the time period 27 April to 3-4 May. While the specific date testimony is clearly more precise, the two testimonies are not inconsistent.

As pertains to the alibi:

685. The Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has alleged that the attack of 13 May followed a week and a half to two weeks of calm. The Chamber is therefore to assume that the attacks witnessed by R and F occurred before 3 May 1994.

686. It remains, as a result, for the Chamber to consider the alibi from 26 April to 2 May.

687. Musema stated that on 27 April he was in Rubona. On 28 April, he said he visited Kitabi factory, the stamp and date of arrival appearing on exhibit D10, and then returned to Rubona. These dates and movements were not contested by the Prosecutor. On 29 April he travelled to Gisovu with two gendarmes via Butare, Gikongoro and Gasaranda, arriving in Gisovu late in the afternoon. Exhibit D10 carries the stamp of Gisovu Tea Factory and the date of arrival, namely, 29 April 1994. Musema remained at the factory until 2 May taking care of business. A number of exhibits, including reports of minutes of meetings held on 29 and 30 April, and correspondence, were tendered by the Defence to support this. On 30 April he visited the Préfet of Kibuye who issued Musema with an "Autorisation de Circulation", in which reference is made to the mission order. On 2 May, Musema said he left for Shagasha, departing between 10:00hrs and 11:00hrs and arriving there before 19:00hrs. Musema explained that he visited the Shagasha Tea Factory the next day which would explain why the date of 3 May 1994 appears on D10 as the date of arrival at this factory.

Findings:

688. The Chamber has considered the testimonies of Witnesses F and R and finds them to be credible. Musema admits to being in Gisovu from 29 April to 2 May attending to factory business. Thus, in the opinion of the Chamber, it is not excluded, considering the distance between Gisovu and the locations of the attacks, that Musema was both at the tea factory working and taking part in attacks, although at different times. Also, to have visited Kibuye on 30 April does not rule out that an attack involving Musema may have occurred on the same day.

689. However, of concern to the Chamber is the lack of specificity on the part of the Witness F as regards the date of the attacks. Witness F speaks of an attack which occurred between 17 and 30 April. Witness F's approximation, which takes 17 April as the earliest date, would suggest the attack he witnessed occurred closer to the middle of the month rather than later in the month.

S831

690. For further guidance on this issue, the Chamber also considered the closing arguments of the Prosecutor, which includes a detailed chronology of the events and massacres as they evolved during April and May. However, no mention is made therein of the testimonies of Witness F and the attack involving Musema. This thus creates further ambiguity and doubt in the matter.

691. Consequently, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt during the trial that Musema participated in the alleged attacks which occurred between 17 and 30 April.

692. As regards Witness R, who testified to Musema's participation in an attack which occurred around the end of April and the beginning of May, the Chamber notes that there also existed ambiguity during this testimony as to the exact date of the attack. Notwithstanding this, while testifying in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, the witness was clear that he was injured on 29 April, the date of the attack. Thus, the Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that an attack occurred between 27 April and 3 May 1994 on Rwirambo hill.

693. Furthermore, the Chamber is of the opinion that the alibi does not cast doubt on the testimony of Witness R, and that his testimony is consistent and reliable. The Chamber consequently finds that Musema, who was armed with a rifle, others unknown and Interahamwe aboard a number of vehicles, including four tea factory pick-ups, participated in an attack between 27 April and 3 May 1994 on Rwirambo hill. The Chamber also finds that as Witness R fled the attackers, he was wounded in the arm by a gunshot coming from the direction of Musema.

•The mid-May 1994 attacks, Muyira hill

694. The Chamber will now consider events which are alleged to have taken place in the middle of May 1994, namely the 13 and 14 May attacks and two other mid-May attacks. As the alibi pertains to this period as a whole, the Chamber will first deal with all the relevant witnesses for these attacks, and, if there is a case to answer, will consider the alibi for the period, before finally making its findings.

As pertains to the facts alleged:

•13 May 1994, Muyira hill

695. As already stated, the attack which occurred on 13 May 1994 on Muyira hill took place after two and a half weeks of relative calm. This day was to see the biggest attacks so far launched against unarmed Tutsi refugees, who numbered between 15000 and 40000. According to witnesses, thousands of attackers came from all over the region in vehicles and on foot intent on killing the refugees.

696. The Prosecutor presented a number of witnesses to this attack. However, having considered the testimonies, the Chamber disregards the testimonies of Witnesses Z and G for a lack of reliability.

697. As regards Witness Z, it is questionable whether the witness could have heard what he claims to have heard Musema say, at the distance he says he was, namely the length of a five minute run, and from his position at the top of Muyira hill. The Chamber notes that in his prior statement dated 13 May 1995, Witness Z made no mention of the presence of Musema at the 13 May 1994 attack. His explanation for this omission in the main was that unlike in statements, before the court he could speak of everything he knew. The Chamber is not convinced by this explanation. Similarly, when questions were put to him relating to his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case and the discrepancies with his testimony in this case, he was resistant and evasive. Consequently, the Chamber does not find the testimony of Witness Z to be reliable.

698. Considering Witness G, who said he saw attackers catch a woman on the instructions of Musema and subsequently that she was killed by Musema, the Chamber is also not convinced of the reliability of this witness. The Chamber notes that, whenever pushed for further details as to the number of attackers around the victim, the number of vehicles and distances, the witness consistently evaded the questions and presented long winded explanations as to why he could not remember such details, although he is an educated man. Whenever pressed for more information the witness seemed uncomfortable and very evasive. The Chamber notes, in contrast, that the witness had no difficulty in remembering the exact words of Musema during the unfolding of the events. Consequently the Chamber does not find the testimony of Witness G reliable.

699. Notwithstanding this, many witnesses presented a consistent account of events as they unfolded in the attack of 13 May 1994.

700. Witnesses F, P, T, and N all described how attackers from Gisovu, Gishyita, Gitesi, Cyangugu, Rwamatamu and Kibuye arrived in an array of vehicles, including Daihatsus belonging to the tea factory and ONATRACOM buses. Amongst the attackers, who were armed with traditional weapons, firearms, grenades and rocket launchers, the witnesses saw communal policemen, workers from the Gisovu Tea Factory wearing their uniforms, Interahamwe, prison guards, armed civilians, and soldiers. Leading the attackers from Gisovu were the bourgmestre of the commune Aloys Ndimbati, Eliezer Niyitegeka, Alfred Musema, and the conseillers of the secteurs of Gisovu Commune. Leading attackers from other regions were Kayishema, the Préfet of Kibuye, Charles Sikubwabo, the bourgmestre of Gishyita, Charles Karasankima, Sikubwabo's predecessor, conseillers of the commune of Gishyita, Obed Ruzindana and others. As the attackers approached the hill, they sang slogans such as "Exterminate them" and "Even the Tutsi God is dead".

701. Witness F said the attack against the Tutsi refugees started around 08:00hrs. He saw Musema, amongst the Gisovu group and bearing a firearm, although he did not personally see him fire the weapon. Witness F estimated that only 10000 or so of the 40-50000 Tutsi refugees survived the attack, those killed being old people, women and children, including five of his own children.

702. The testimony of Witness F, in the opinion of the Chamber, went virtually unchallenged by the Defence. On cross-examination the witness was questioned as to why he had not specifically mentioned Musema in his description of the May attack in his 1996 statement to the Prosecutor but had mentioned him in his description of an April attack. The witness in response cited the passage in his statement where he said of the May attack, "Leading these attackers who were divided into groups were the same persons I listed before [...]". The Chamber notes that the cross-examination of Witness F, which was brief, in no way impaired his credibility, and the Chamber considers his evidence to be reliable. Moreover, the Chamber recalls that during his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, as confirmed during his examination in this case, Witness F stated that he had seen Musema during the 13 May 1994 attacks.

703. Witness P lost his wife and two children during the attack. He explained how the assailants overpowered the refugees who, including himself, were forced to flee. Although the witness did not personally see Musema during the attack, he saw Musema's red Pajero and tea factory Daihatsus which led him to conclude that Musema must have been present. Amongst the attackers he recognised tea factory workers by virtue of their uniforms.

704. The Chamber notes that in cross-examination, asked as to how he could conclude that Musema was present during the attack, Witness P stated that, in his view, the tea factory vehicles could not have been used without the permission of Musema, and that only Musema ever drove the red Pajero. While the Chamber finds the witness to be credible, his evidence is not probative of Musema's presence at or participation in the attack at Muyira on 13 May. Nevertheless, it corroborates the testimony of other witnesses in important respects.

705. Witness T saw a green and a white Daihatsu belonging to the tea factory and tea factory workers wearing blue and khaki uniforms. Musema was seen by the witness amongst the leaders of the attack, bearing a firearm. The witness described how the attackers who had firearms protected those who were fighting in close against the refugees. Many refugees were killed and the survivors fled, their stones useless against the grenades of their assailants. The witness specified that he did not see Musema fire his weapon but presumed that he had.

5833

706. The Chamber notes that in cross-examination, the witness was questioned by the Defence as to his previous statements and the lack of mention therein of Musema in relation to the above attack. Witness T explained that at the time he had not been asked specific questions about Musema save whether he knew him and could identify him, and whether he had seen him after the arrival of the French. The Chamber is satisfied with this explanation. The Chamber also notes that the cross-examination as a whole did not impair the credibility of the witness and the Chamber thus finds his evidence to be reliable.
707. Witness N, whose specific testimony on the fate of a certain Nyiramusugi will be dealt with in section 5.3 below, witnessed many attacks on Muyira hill on 13 May 1994. Amongst the attackers who arrived around 10:00hrs from Gisovu, the witness saw Musema aboard his vehicle which he described as a "Benz" because it was expensive, leading other vehicles, including three Daihatsus from the Gisovu Tea Factory. He elaborated, saying that save for these and four or five other vehicles, he was unable to identify others as they were hidden by trees.
708. He could not hear the attackers when they regrouped, though he could see them gesticulating and speaking. Witness N was able to hear Musema once the group had moved to within a few metres of him. Musema asked a policeman named Ruhindira to fetch a young woman called Nyiramusugi after having found out from him that she was still alive. Immediately after this, said the witness, the attackers from Gishyita launched the attack with gunfire. The attack lasted until 15:00hrs, and, according to the witness, Musema searched for the young woman throughout this period and shot people.
709. The Chamber notes that in cross-examination, the witness confirmed his testimony. To the issue of when and how he made his statement, the Chamber is satisfied with his explanation and does not find his credibility to have been impaired. Consequently, the Chamber finds the testimony to be reliable.

•14 May 1994, Muyira hill

710. A number of witnesses testified that the attacks continued on 14 May 1994 against the surviving refugees on Muyira hill.
711. Witness AC described a big attack he saw on 14 May. He saw Musema arrive in his red Pajero and recognized a number of other "dirigeants", which he cited in his testimony. The 5000 or so attackers, armed with rifles and traditional weapons, were predominantly Hutu and comprised gendarmes, soldiers, Interahamwe, tea factory workers recognizable by their uniforms and other assailants some of whom wore political party emblems.
712. The witness described the attack which was led by Musema and Ndimbati. It was started by Ndimbati who fired a gunshot into the air. Musema, carrying a firearm and a belt of ammunition then fired gunshots, which, according to Witness AC hit an old man by the name of Ntambiye and another person by the name of Iamuremye. On being attacked by the assailants led by Musema and Ndimbati, the refugees defended themselves with stones but the military fired tear gas at them. Overpowered, the refugees fled. Around 18:00hrs the attackers left.
713. The Chamber notes that there was no cross-examination of this witness specific to this attack. Other issues raised on cross-examination, however, raise questions as to the reliability of the witness' testimony. There are many confusing elements in the testimony. It is unclear, for example, whether or not he attended the meeting in Kibuye. It is also unclear why he had such difficulty remembering names of gendarmes, whose names he was able to recall during his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case. When asked to explain these divergences in his testimony he was willing to provide them in this case. The Chamber considers that the Defence did not establish that the testimony of Witness AC was untruthful in any material respect. However, in light of the confusion which emerges from the cross-examination, the Chamber is willing to accept the evidence of this witness only to the extent that it is corroborated by other testimony.
714. Witness F was injured by shrapnel and a gunshot during an attack of 14 May on Muyira hill and surrounding hills. Although he did not see Musema during the attacks, he did see Musema's red car among the vehicles of other attackers. As previously stated with regard to the 13 May 1994 attack, the Chamber finds the testimony of Witness F to be reliable.

715. Witness T also saw Musema participate in a large scale attack on Muyira hill. He explained that he saw Musema on an opposite hill, armed with a rifle which he presumed Musema utilized during the attack. The Chamber recalls its findings as pertains to this witness on his testimony on the 13 May attack, and thus considers him to be reliable.
716. Witness D spoke of a large scale attack which took place on the day of Sabbath, 14 May 1994, during which she saw Musema and other leaders including Kayishema and Ndimbati. The assailants, numbering 15000, armed with firearms, grenades and traditional weapons, and singing "Let's exterminate them", arrived in an array of vehicles and attacked the refugees, the attackers being armed with traditional weapons, and finishing off the refugees who had been injured with bullets.
717. In cross-examination, Witness D confirmed her above testimony. The Chamber notes that she was careful to explain that she could only see certain vehicles but could not identify those aboard and that when the vehicles parked she lost sight of them. Witness D gave the further precision that she only saw the attackers once they had disembarked and were making their way to the refugees, after which she fled. The Chamber notes that the cross-examination did not impair the credibility of the witness' testimony and therefore finds it to be reliable.

•The two attacks in mid-May 1994

718. The Chamber notes that, in its opinion, the expression mid-May would seem to indicate a day between 10 and 20 May, and shall thus consider the testimonies of Witnesses H and S with this in mind.
719. Witness H testified about a first attack which occurred in mid-may 1994 against Tutsi refugees on Muyira hill, Musema leading attackers from Gisovu, including Interahamwe, and tea factory workers in blue uniforms. The witness saw Musema's red Pajero and four tea factory vehicles stop at Kurwirambo. The witness gave a detailed description of the attackers he saw, in terms of dress and weapons. Amongst the attackers were soldiers, gendarmes and civilians. According to the witness, Musema launched the attack with a gunshot and personally shot at refugees although he could not say whether he actually hit anyone.
720. At some point during the attack, the refugees were able to drive back the assailants and attempted to grab Musema but were prevented from doing so by other attackers.
721. The Chamber is satisfied with the explanations given in cross-examination by Witness H as to how he could identify the tea factory vehicles and Musema's Pajero. Other issues raised in cross-examination did not impair the credibility of Witness H. The Chamber therefore considers the testimony of Witness H to be reliable.
722. Witness S saw Musema take part in an attack involving between 120 and 150 assailants sometime near the middle of May on Mpura hill and in Birembo. The witness saw three Daihatsus belonging to the tea factory and Musema's red Pajero. Amongst the attackers were communal policemen and tea factory employees wearing tea factory uniforms and caps, and armed with traditional weapons.
723. The vehicles, except Musema's, collected more assailants from Gisovu, while more persons arrived from Gishyita. Once all the assailants were in place, they held a small "meeting" and, with a blow of whistles, launched their attack against Sakufe's house on Mumataba hill, the place of refuge for 2000-3000 Tutsis. Most of the refugees, including relatives of the witness, were killed. Throughout the attack, Musema stayed by his car with persons dressed in white, and left for Gisovu with other attackers around 17:00hrs.
724. In cross-examination, Witness S described in more detail the area of the attack by reference to Prosecutor photo exhibits 20.1 and 20.2. Other issues raised during the cross-examination of the witness, in the opinion of the Chamber, in no way lessened his credibility and his testimony is, as such, reliable.

5835

As pertains to the alibi for all the Muyira hill mid-May attacks:

725. The Chamber has considered the alibi of Musema for the period of 7 to 19 May, during which Musema testified that he was in Rubona and visited Gitarama on occasions. The Defence presented a number of documents to support the alibi and also the testimony of Witnesses MG, MH and Claire Kayuku.
726. The Chamber notes that Musema stated that he visited Mata tea factory on 7 May 1994, the signature of the chief accountant of the Mata tea factory and the stamp appearing on the mission order not being specifically contested by the Prosecutor. After this visit, asserts Musema, he returned to Rubona where he stayed until 19 May 1994, not visiting any other factories, nor going beyond the town of Butare and Gitarama and thus not setting foot in Kibuye Préfecture.
727. Witness MH remembers meeting Musema in Gitarama on 10 May and in Rubona on 13 May 1994. In direct examination, Witness MH stated that he met Musema only once in Gitarama, most probably on 10 May 1994, although he was unable to provide the Chamber with details as to the length or subject of the conversation he had with Musema on this day, save that he believed they may have discussed the situation in Rwanda. The Chamber notes that in cross-examination, he indicated that they did not speak about why Musema had come to Gitarama and that he could not remember five years later the type and colour of the vehicle driven by Musema. In support of the alibi for this date, the Defence presented exhibit D46, a letter 18 May 1994, and a note entitled "A qui de droit" dated 10 May 1994 in Gitarama. Musema testified to receiving this note from the Minister of Defence on 10 May 1994, and contended that, had he been in Gisovu, he would not have waited eight days to transmit it.
728. As regards 13 May 1994, Witness MH, who on this day was fleeing to Burundi, stated that he saw Musema on 13 May 1994 for approximately 20 minutes in Rubona at the residence of the Kayuku family. He confirmed this in cross-examination.
729. The Chamber notes that the witness testified that he had last used his passport in 1994, when in fact it was evident from the document that it had been used in 1995.
730. According to Claire Kayuku, Musema returned to Gisovu around the middle of May to pay the tea factory employees. She added that, in the beginning of May, Musema's Pajero spent one or two weeks in a Butare garage undergoing repairs. Musema had explained that he had developed car problems on 7 May while in Mata, and that he remained in the Butare region until the car was repaired. A replacement car from the factory only reached him on 19 May by which time his Pajero was roadworthy. Exhibit D47, the minutes of a 19 May 1994 meeting at the factory, refers to Musema's broken down car and the resultant delay in returning to the factory.
731. According to Exhibit P68, the handwritten calendar personally made by Musema, he was in Gisovu from 4-14 May 1994. The Chamber recalls also that according to the record of an interview with Swiss authorities which took place on 16 March 1995, Musema again said he was in Gisovu during the week of 4-13 May 1994. When presented with these dates during the cross-examination, Musema indicated that these were errors. The Chamber notes at this juncture that, according on the handwritten calendar (P68) Musema indicated that the Gisovu Tea Factory started production again on 9 May 1994.
732. A number of documents were tendered by the Defence to demonstrate that Musema was absent from Gisovu Tea Factory between 7 and 19 May 1994. Exhibit D35 is a letter dated 8 May 1994 from Musema to the Director-General of OCIR-thé in Kigali, annexed to which is the mission report, which Musema says was typed by the secretarial services of ISAR at Rubona. Musema explained that he made ten copies of the report for transmission to the directors of the visited tea factories and handed over a copy for the Director-General of OCIR-thé on 10 May 1994 to the Commercial Bank in Gitarama which had a convoy going to Gisenyi. The Chamber notes that this letter, signed by Musema, is on Gisovu Tea Factory headed paper and moreover would appear to have been written in Gisovu.
733. Exhibit D45 contains a copy of a receipt dated 14 May 1994 from a FINA petrol station in

5836

Gitarama for a cash payment made by Musema for fuel for the Pajero, registration number A7171. Exhibit D36 is a letter written by Musema on 14 May 1994 in Butare, by which the Defence alleges Musema appears to be a man just observing the events. Exhibit D92 is a letter written by MG in Nairobi on 7 June 1994, in which she writes that, before 17 May, the Musema family was still in Butare. During her testimony Witness MG specified that she could not confirm whether or not the family was in Butare at that date. Exhibit D37, dated 16 may 1994, is a certificate of complete identity issued for one of Musema's sons and required for the issuance of a passport. Exhibits D38, D39 and D40 are copies of passports issued on 18 May 1994 in Gitarama, for Musema's sons, D40 being signed by Musema for his thirteen year old son. Numerous other documents were produced, including letters which were received at the tea factory during this period but which were either not acted upon until much later by Musema or not even seen by Musema, for instance exhibit D43, a letter dated 16 May 1994 from the Chief of Personnel to the bourgmestre of Gisovu, in furtherance of discussions held on 13 and 16 May respectively and regarding weapons training of security personnel. Exhibit D41, a request for employment, received 5 May 1994 at the tea factory, was only dealt with by Musema on 14 June 1994. Exhibit D42, a request for accommodation for security reasons, was received on 11 May 1994, yet there appears no date as to when the request was dealt with. Exhibit D44, a request for accommodation, received at the tea factory on 16 May 1994 was dealt with by Musema only on 14 June 1994.

734. The Chamber has considered all the above evidence. As regards the testimony of MH, the Chamber notes that, as regards the meeting of 10 May with Musema, the witness was unable to provide any specific details, this contrasting with his testimony on the meeting of 13 May 1994, which is detailed and specific in a number of ways. The Chamber notes however that the latter testimony is uncorroborated by other Defence evidence, including Musema's testimony. Claire Kayuku testified that Musema returned to Gisovu during the middle of May to pay the employees, whereas the handwritten calendar drafted by Musema, exhibit P68 and his statement to the Swiss juge d'instruction of 16 March 1995, similarly place Musema in Gisovu between 4 and 14 May. The testimony of MH is thus of little probative value as it is unsupported by any other direct evidence.

735. Other evidence would suggest that Musema was indeed in Gisovu during this period. Exhibit D35, the cover letter for the mission report, is dated 8 May 1994 in Gisovu. According to Musema, this letter was typed up in Rubona.

736. In the handwritten calendar, Musema clearly indicates that on 9 May 1994, the tea factory re-started production. This date is confirmed in his mission report. Moreover in exhibit P56 Musema states that "[o]n 3 May, I once again visited the factories in the South West, that is, Gisakura and Shagasha. I then returned to Butare. On 7 or 8 May, I returned to Gisovu and on 9 May, I supervised the resumption of operations of the factory. I remained there until 19/20 May and travelled to Butare to join my family."

737. The Chamber finds Musema's supposed absence from the factory on this occasion irreconcilable with his evidence during this case, evidence which tends to portray Musema as a dedicated director of the tea factory who at all times shared equivalent concerns for the safety of his family and for the factory, often, according to him, leaving the former to rejoin the latter, for example in April, May, June and July 1994, despite threats to his safety. Moreover, in exhibit D51, the report of the meeting of 27 May 1994, recalls the minutes of the meeting of 19 May 1994, and states "[t] he meeting of 19 May 1994 also discussed the breakdown that the manager had asked the Agronomist Benjamin KABERA to repair and which was not done in good time (after 10 days) giving rise to heavy loses (sic);[...]". This would presuppose that the Agronomist had received instructions on 9 May 1994. The Chamber also presupposes that as it was now Musema himself dealing with this breakdown, as the Director of the tea factory, he must have either directly or indirectly given the original instructions.

738. Musema, throughout his testimony, affirmed that his handwritten calendar and the Swiss statements were inaccurate, and that any errors therein were subsequently corrected as documents were uncovered during investigations from, amongst other places, Gisovu Tea Factory. In some instances, such an explanation is valid. However, as regards the present period, the Chamber cannot accept such an explanation. In the said calendar and the 16 March 1995 Swiss statement, Musema clearly remembers being in Gisovu between 4 and 14 May 1994, and recalls that he was present the day the tea factory started up production. To remember such an occasion and one's presence thereat, is not, in the opinion of the Chamber, something one forgets and recalls only after seeing newly uncovered documents. Rather, it is an event which, as Director of the tea factory, Musema would beyond any doubt not have forgotten.

5837

739. The Chamber notes other discrepancies in the alibi as regards his vehicle, registration A7171, which he says developed problems on 7 May 1994 and was not repaired until 19 May 1994 in Butare, being the date on which he finally returned to Gisovu. Exhibit D45, dated 19 May 1994, includes a bill for repairs to the vehicle in April 1994 and a petrol receipt from a FINA petrol station in Gitarama dated 14 May 1994. The Chamber must raise a number of issues as regards this exhibit. If the Chamber were to follow Musema's version of the events, the Pajero, registration A7171, could not have been fit enough to drive from Butare, where he says it was being repaired, to Gitarama before 19 May 1994. Thus, notes the Chamber, the above mentioned petrol receipt puts into doubt Musema's testimony.

740. Whereas, if the Chamber accepts the handwritten calendar and the said Swiss statement, the FINA receipt would support the dates therein by confirming that Musema travelled on 14 May 1994. In the opinion of the Chamber, the receipt, and the letter of 14 May 1994 which Musema says he wrote in Butare, are by themselves, insufficient to refute the possibility that on the same day, yet at a different time, Musema was in the Bisesero region.

741. Moreover, the Chamber notes that Musema advanced no details, namely with which vehicle or other mode of transport, as to how he travelled to Gitarama on 18 May 1994 to collect the passports of his sons. The Chamber finds this at odds with his alibi, as, to have indicated such details would have given support to his testimony.

742. The Chamber notes that Musema kept his receipt for car repairs dated 19 April 1994, and the petrol bill of 14 May 1994, yet kept no such receipts kept for the repairs, which according to Musema, occurred between 7 and 19 May 1994.

743. As regards the specific attacks of 13 and 14 May 1994 and the name of the hills, the Chamber considers, as put to Musema, at trial, that one would remember where one was when such momentous massacres in the Bisesero region occurred, without having to consult a calendar. The Chamber cannot accept the explanations given by Musema that he only knew of these massacres from hearing of them on the radio and because they were discussed at a meeting at the Gisovu tea factory on 19 May 1994. Nor can the Chamber accept that Musema did not know the names of specific hills in the Bisesero region, considering that he had been director of the Gisovu tea factory since 1984 and that, as testified by numerous witnesses, there were many "thé villageois" plantations on hills around the Bisesero region. Such plantations, in the opinion of the Chamber, would undoubtedly have been visited by Musema in his capacity as director of the tea factory.

744. The Defence has argued that certain documents, such as receipts and correspondence, and even Musema's delays in replying to correspondence, should be interpreted as supporting his defence of alibi. In the Chamber's view, this evidence, while it may in some cases be consistent with the alibi, is not probative thereof. For example, the failure of Musema to reply to correspondence received in May 1994 until June 1994 could be explained by his absence from the tea factory in Gisovu, or it could be explained in may other ways, for instance that he was attending to other issues. Such delays, in the opinion of the Chamber, do not, in themselves, support the alibi that Musema was absent from the Gisovu tea factory in mid-May 1994.

745. In light of the above, the Chamber must reject the alibi of Musema as regards 13 May, 14 May and mid-May 1994, as it is not supported by evidence sufficient to cast any doubt on the overwhelming reliable evidence for this period presented by the Prosecutor.

Findings on all the mid-May Muyira hill attacks:

746. The Chamber therefore finds that, on the basis of consistent and reliable evidence presented by the Prosecution witnesses discussed above, it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in attacks against Tutsi refugees in the Bisesero region in mid-May 1994, including on 13 and 14 May.
747. Consequently, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that on 13 May 1994, a large scale attack occurred on Muyira hill against up to 40000 Tutsi refugees. The attack started in the morning. The attackers, who had arrived at Muyira hill on foot and in an array of vehicles including Daihatsus belonging to the Gisovu Tea Factory, were comprised of Gisovu Tea Factory workers in uniform, gendarmes, soldiers, civilians, and Interahamwe. The attackers were armed with firearms, grenades, rocket launchers and traditional weapons, and sang anti-Tutsi slogans.
748. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was one of the leaders of the attackers coming from Gisovu and drove his red Pajero to the attack. Musema was armed with a rifle. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that he used the weapon during the attack. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that thousands of unarmed Tutsi men, women and children were killed during the attack at the hands of the assailants and that many were forced to flee for their survival.
749. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that during the attack, Musema asked one of the attackers, a certain policeman by the name of Ruhindara to fetch a young woman called Nyiramusugi after having found out from him that she was still alive. The Chamber finds that Musema searched for the young woman throughout this period.
750. As regards 14 May 1994, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that a large scale attack occurred on Muyira hill 14 May 1994 against Tutsi civilians, and that the attackers, numbering as many as 15000, were armed with traditional weapons, firearms and grenades, and sang slogans.
751. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was amongst the leaders of the attack of 14 May 1994 and that his red Pajero was at the site of the attack. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was armed with a rifle during the attack.
752. The Chamber does not find that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema shot a certain Ntambiye and a certain Iamuremye during the attack.
753. The Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in an attack in mid-May 1994 on Muyira hill against Tutsi refugees. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema led attackers, including Interahamwe and tea factory workers from Gisovu. It has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema's red Pajero and tea factory vehicles were seen at the attack.
754. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema launched the attack with a gunshot and personally shot at refugees. It has not been established, however, that Musema actually hit anyone with his gunshots.
755. The Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in an attack on Mumataba hill in mid-May 1994. It has been established that the assailants, numbering between 120 and 150, included tea factory employees, armed with traditional weapons, and communal policemen.
756. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that in the presence and with the knowledge of Musema, tea factory vehicles transported attackers to the location. It has been established beyond reasonable doubt that the attack was launched on the blowing of whistles, and that the target of the attack were 2000 to 3000 Tutsis who had sought refuge in and around a certain Sakufe's house.
757. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema remained next to his vehicle, with others, throughout the attack, and left with attackers for Gisovu around 17:00hrs.

5839

•End of May attack at Nyakavumu cave

As pertains to the facts alleged:

758. Witnesses AC, H, S and D, all testified about an attack which occurred at Nyakavumu cave.
759. Witness AC saw Musema amongst others arrive at the cave in which 300 people had sought refuge. Following orders from Ndimbati, Ruzindana, Musema, Niyitegeka and Kayishema, the cave was sealed with wood, then a man from Gisovu set the wood on fire with kerosene and grass. Only one of the refugees survived, while the others were asphyxiated to death by the smoke.
760. The Chamber has considered the issues raised during cross-examination and is satisfied by the explanations given by the witness. Notwithstanding this, and as the Chamber stated in its factual findings on 14 May 1994, the testimony of Witness AC shall only be accepted as evidence to the extent that it is corroborated by other testimony.
761. Sometime around the end of May early June, said Witness H, he saw Musema shortly before the attack, in a convoy going in the direction of the cave, and thus presumed that he must have been present at the cave. Within the convoy was Musema's Pajero and tea factory vehicles. The witness observed from a nearby hill assailants destroy the fence of houses in the vicinity for firewood and set light to the entrance of the cave. Only one person survived the fire.
762. The Chamber considered the issues raised in cross-examination and deems them not to have impaired the reliability and testimony of Witness H.
763. Witness D observed the attack from a cave and said she saw Musema amongst the assailants. From where she was hiding, she said that she was able to see the attackers start a fire at the entrance of the cave and that the smoke suffocated the 400 refugees inside. After the attack she went down to the cave and saw many bodies, and then fled. The Chamber notes that during her testimony, she was unable to say exactly when the attack occurred.
764. In cross-examination, Witness D specified that she was unable to see any vehicles from where she was hiding on the side of the hill. The Chamber found this witness to be consistent and reliable throughout her testimony.
765. Witness S described how sometime near the end of May, attackers chased refugees who were fleeing towards Kigarama hill. Amongst the attackers he saw Musema, who was armed with a long rifle, and tea factory workers aboard factory vehicles. The refugees were forced to split into three groups, one of which went towards Nyakavumu cave.
766. According to the witness, the assailants with Musema blew their whistles and shouted three times to call back those attackers who had gone beyond Nyakavumu cave. The attackers then gathered around Musema for a couple of minutes and exchanged a few words, after which they destroyed a nearby house for firewood which they took to the cave.
767. A short while later, although he did not see the attack on the cave, Witness S saw smoke rise. The witness indicated that he had hidden his wife in the cave the very same day.
768. After the attackers had left, he and eight others went to the entrance of the cave, and pulled out three survivors, two of whom died the next day.
769. In cross-examination, the Defence referred to a previous statement of the witness in which he provided more details on the involvement of Musema in the attack. In this regard, the witness stated, as he had in direct-examination, that he did not actually see the attack on the cave. This and other issues raised in cross-examination did not impair the credibility of Witness S, and thus the Chamber finds him to be credible.
770. The Chamber has also considered the testimony of Witness AB who testified that sometime in the month of June he saw Musema, who was armed and wearing a military jacket, at the Kibuye military camp in the company of second Lieutenant 'Buffalo' Ndagijimana, Ndimbati and Doctor

5840

Gérard Ntakirutimana. The witness overheard them discussing one last operation that had to be carried out in Bisesero. According to the witness, Musema said that information that he had received indicated that Tutsis were hiding in the tin mines and that, according to the witness, Musema said that he therefore needed a lorry load of firewood to start a fire at the entrance of the hole where they were hiding, and consequently to block the hole to prevent anyone getting out. Although Musema asked an officer of the camp for the wood, the witness could not say whether any was given to him.

771. In cross-examination, Witness AB confirmed that Musema had come to the camp in his red Pajero. The witness added that he had never been to the cave where many people had died. Other issues raised in cross-examination did not impair on the consistency of the witness' testimony.
772. The Defence admitted that such an attack took place near the end of May or in June 1994 and that those who had sought refuge in the cave were Tutsi civilians.
773. Having considered all the above evidence, it would appear, in the opinion of the Chamber, that the attack on the cave occurred at some point between the end of May and early June.

As pertains to the alibi:

774. The Chamber has considered the alibi for this period.
775. The alibi places Musema in Gisovu on 27 and 28 May 1994, at the Gisovu Tea Factory, and is supported by documentary evidence and the testimonies of Claire Kayuku and of Musema. Musema travelled to Shagasha with his family on 29 April 1994. Then, according to the alibi, on 30 May 1994 until 10 June 1994, Musema was away from the Gisovu Tea Factory, having traveled on 30 May to Shagasha. He rejoined a technical mission in Cyangugu and spent the day in Zaïre on 31 May. Copies of his passport and the pertinent border stamps were filed in support of this alibi.
776. On 1 June 1994, according to the alibi, Musema went to Shagasha where he stayed with his family until returning to Gisovu on 10 June. Exhibit D57, issued in Cyangugu, was produced to support the alibi of Musema for 3 June, and exhibit D58 for 6 June 1994.
777. Claire Kayuku confirmed that Musema stayed with her and the family until 7 or 10 June 1994. The Chamber notes that all of the above evidence is corroborated by Musema's handwritten calendar (P68), which indicates that he left Gisovu on 29 May with his family and returned to Gisovu only on 10 June.

Findings:

778. The Chamber notes that the alibi does not specifically refute the presence of Musema at the cave. Although the exact date of the attack is unclear from the testimonies, the Chamber notes that the witnesses all provided an overall consistent account of the events at Nyakavumu cave throughout their testimonies. The fact that the date of the attack is unclear does not, in the opinion of the Chamber, impair on the reliability of the witnesses.
779. The Chamber therefore finds that on the basis of the overwhelming evidence of four Prosecution witnesses, all of whom presented consistent testimonies as to the attack on the cave, the Chamber rejects the alibi and finds that it is established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the attack on Nyakavumu cave.
780. The Chamber consequently finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the attack on Nyakavumu cave at the end of May 1994. It has been established that Musema was aboard his Pajero in a convoy, which included tea factory Daihatsus aboard of which were tea factory workers, travelling towards the cave. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was armed with a rifle. It has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was present at the attack during which assailants closed off the entrance to the cave with wood and leaves, and set fire thereto. The Chamber finds that it has been proven beyond reasonable doubt that over 300 Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge in the cave died as a result of the fire.

5841

•Attack of 31 May 1994, Biyiniro hill

As pertains to the facts alleged:

781. Witness E saw Musema during an attack on Biyiniro hill after fleeing from the adjacent Muyira hill where 20000 refugees were being attacked by assailants from Gishyita and Gisovu. Amongst the attackers were tea factory employees in uniform and gendarmes who had arrived aboard an array of vehicles including tea factory Daihatsus. The refugees, who identified Musema as one of the leaders and as a provider of vehicles for the attackers, tried to catch him. Musema fled in his Pajero under the cover of gunshots of soldiers. The attack continued after the departure of Musema.
782. In cross-examination, the witness provided more details as to the geographical location of the attack and as regards the types of vehicles he saw.

As pertains to the alibi:

783. According to the alibi, Musema, after having spent the night in Shagasha, returned to Cyangugu on 31 May 1994 to continue his participation in a technical mission. Musema travelled with the rest of the mission to and from Zaïre on that day. In support of the alibi, the Defence tendered exhibit D56, containing a photocopy of page 12 of Musema's passport, showing two signed stamps by the Rwandese immigration authority in Bugarama, one of exit and one of entry, and also two signed stamps by the "Poste frontalier" of Kamanyoma in Zaïre, all four stamps dated 31 May 1994. The Defence also tendered exhibit D54, being an "Autorisation de sortie de fonds" dated 29 May 1994, authorising advance payment of funds to Musema for a mission to Zaïre.

Findings:

784. Although the Chamber finds that the evidence presented by Witness E was consistent throughout his testimony, the alibi and the documents tendered in support thereof are such as to cast doubt on the allegations of the Prosecutor. Therefore, the Chamber does not find Musema's alleged participation to the attack on Biyiniro Hill on 31 May 1999 to have been established beyond reasonable doubt.

•Attack of 5 June 1994, near Muyira hill>

As pertains to the facts alleged:

785. Witness E saw Musema in his car on 5 June 1994 near Muyira hill and a number of tea factory Daihatsus parked on the road at the Gishyita-Gisovu border, near Muyira hill. The attackers seen by the witness included gendarmes, tea factory workers, communal policemen, Interahamwe and guards. Musema, who carried a rifle, and other leaders, including Kayishema, Sikubabwo and Ruzindana, gave instructions to the attackers who subsequently killed many refugees, including the witness' younger sister. Musema is said also to have fired shots with a rifle during the attack.
786. The Chamber recalls its recent findings as regards the cross-examination of this witness on the attack on 31 May 1994 near Biyiniro Hill, and notes that the evidence presented by the witness was consistent throughout his testimony. The Chamber confirms this also with respect to his above testimony.

5842

As pertains to the alibi:

787. Musema's alibi alleged that after meeting in Cyangugu, Musema travelled back to Shagasha where he and his family remained until 10 June 1994. This alibi was supported by exhibits D57, 58 and 59, the testimony of Musema and that of Defence Witness Claire Kayuku. The Chamber notes that cross-examination during Musema's testimony did not specifically challenge the alibi for this period.

Findings:

788. In light of the above, although the evidence presented by Witness E was found to be consistent throughout his testimony, the alibi of Musema for these dates, supported by documentary evidence and oral testimony, and scrutinized by the Chamber is, in the opinion of the Chamber, such as to cast a reasonable doubt on the allegation of the Prosecutor as to the involvement of Musema in the attack of 5 June 1994 as alleged.
789. As such, the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the attack of 5 June 1994.

• 22 June 1994, Nyarutovu cellule

As pertains to the facts alleged:

790. It was alleged by Witness P that Musema led an attack on 22 June 1994 in Nyarutovu cellule. Witness P described how Musema stopped in a blue Daihatsu on the Gishyita road, about 30 metres from where he was. Musema was standing on the road next to the vehicle when he shot him, holding a firearm with two hands. He described how two shots were fired, one of which hit him in the ankle, and one of which hit and killed a certain François, who was with him.
791. Witness P also stated that Musema instructed Tea Factory workers who were with him to catch a young woman that was with the witness, who had run away, and to bring her back alive, so that "they could see how Tutsi women were made". After the attackers caught the young woman and put her in the vehicle, Musema drove off with them in the direction of Gisovu.
792. In cross-examination the witness advanced more details relating to the allegations, including the fact that he had not seen Musema fire the shots, but that he assumed it was he who had fired, since he saw Musema aim, before he was shot in the ankle, and Musema was the only one in the group with a firearm.
793. The Chamber notes that this cross-examination did not undermine his testimony, and, accordingly, finds the evidence presented during his testimony to be consistent.

As to pertains to the alibi:

794. According to the alibi, Musema was in Gisenyi on 22 June until 27 June, conducting business. During this period he also visited Goma, in Zaïre. He returned to Gisovu on 28 June 1994. This alibi was supported by exhibits D65, 90 and 91, and by the testimony of Claire Kayuku.

Findings:

795. Despite the consistent evidence of Witness P, the Chamber finds that Musema's alibi for this date, heavily scrutinized by the Chamber, supported by documentary evidence and oral testimony, is such as to cast doubt on the allegation of the Prosecutor as to the involvement of Musema in the events alleged of 22 June 1994.

796. As a result, the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema led or participated in an attack in Nyarutovu cellule on 22 June 1994. 5843

5.3 Sexual crimes

797. The Chamber will now assess, one by one, four paragraphs (4.7 to 4.10) of the Indictment according to which Musema allegedly committed crimes connected with sexual offences (cf. Annex A to the Judgement).

General allegations of rape and of encouraging others to capture, rape and kill Tutsi women throughout April, May and June 1994 (paragraph 4.7)

798. Paragraph 4.7 of the Indictment states the following:

> "At various locations within the area of Bisesero and Gisovu, in the prefecture of Kibuye, throughout April, May and June 1994, Alfred Musema, committed acts of rape and encouraged others to capture, rape and kill Tutsi women, seeking refuge from attacks within the area of Bisesero in Gisovu and Gishyita communes, Kibuye Prefecture."

799. Musema admitted that there had been mass killings at the Gisovu Tea Factory and around.
800. Witness M testified that during the meeting held on Karongi hill on 18 April 1994, Musema said that "those who wanted to have fun could rape their women and their children, without fearing any consequences"(11), referring to Tutsi women and children.
801. Witness M also testified that subsequently, the day after, on 19 April, two of the men who had attended this meeting, together with three other men, took part in the rape of his cousin and niece, on the hill of Rushekera, opposite to Mount Karongi. Witness M was hiding in the undergrowth on a hillside opposite the hillside where the rapes took place. He said that he was at no more than 300 metres from where the attackers were. In the course of the cross-examination, witness M confirmed that he saw the five rapists at a distance of between 250 and 300 meters. The witness explained that the women were dragged out of the bushes to a more visible area on the "terraces"on the hillside used for cultivation.

Factual Findings:

802. According to the Chamber, the Prosecutor has not proven beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was present at the meeting on 18 April 1994 on Karongi hill. The Chamber here refers to its factual findings in Section 5.2 above, under the heading "Karongi hill FM Station, 18 April 1994".
803. Under these circumstances, the Chamber considers that there is no evidence that Musema ordered the rapes.
804. Concerning the general allegations in paragraph 4.7 that Musema himself committed acts of rape throughout April, May and June 1994, the Chamber refers to its conclusions below regarding paragraphs 4.8 to 4.10 of the Indictment.

Alleged acts of rape and murder of Annunciata Mujawayezu on 14 April 1994 (paragraph 4.8)

805. Paragraph 4.8 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "On 14 April 1994, within the area of the Gisovu Tea Factory, Twumba Cellule, Gisovu Commune, Alfred Musema, in concert with others, ordered and encouraged the raping of Annunciata, a Tutsi woman, and thereafter, ordered, that she be killed together with her son Blaise".

5844

806. Witness I, a 32 year-old Tutsi woman, testified that in 1994 she was working as a teacher in a primary school. Her husband worked in the Gisovu Tea Factory from 1992 to 1994, and they lived within the factory premises. The witness testified that when the killing began at the tea factory, she and her youngest child took refuge in the Guest House where they were discovered by Interahamwe. The Interahamwe showed her a list of people to be killed. The first name on the list was her husband's, and her own name was second. Next on the list were the names of Canisius, the Chief Accountant of the factory, and his wife Annunciata Mujawayezu and their children. Two of Annunciata Mujawayezu's children were killed at that time by the Interahamwe. Annunciata Mujawayezu escaped and went to hide in the tea plantations. The witness testified that on that day, 13 April, Canisius was killed.
807. Witness I was held by the Interahamwe to wait for the arrival of Musema, together with the children of a certain Ndoli. On the next day, 14 April, the witness saw Musema arrive in his vehicle at the tea factory. He was accompanied by two soldiers, whom she named, in a second vehicle. She said they told her that they had come for her children and for the children of Ndoli. Ndoli's children were killed on the spot by an old man who did not want them to suffer. The witness testified that Musema asked where her children were and ordered them to be taken away to be drowned or put in bags and beaten like rats. Her two children, one and three years old, were then taken from the house. The witness followed the vehicle, throwing stones at it. Though she was later reunited with her own children, Witness I testified that she subsequently discovered sacks which had been thrown away in the forest containing bodies of dead children, some of which had been decapitated, as well as some children still alive, in the throes of death. The witness recognized many of these children whom she named at trial.
808. When asked whether they should kill Witness I, the witness heard Musema say no, that they should take her with him to the guest house. The witness testified that with the help of someone called Mushoka, she was able to escape and hid in a nearby bush. She then met Annunciata Mujawayezu who said she was hiding in Ndoli's house. They decided to go and hide close to the guest house in the tea plantation so that they could hear what was being said and know where attacks would be made and where they could hide. Annunciata Mujawayezu was with her child Blaise.
809. Witness I testified that Musema and other people came to the bungalow, close enough for her to hear what they were saying. Annunciata Mujawayezu's child Blaise, a five year old, then began to cry from hunger, and she told Witness I that she did not want everyone to be killed so she was leaving with the child. She then stood up, and Musema called her from the bungalow and told her, "come we are going to kill you like the Inyenzi killed our own people." According to Witness I, Musema then called the Twas and told them to rape her and to cut one of her breasts off and give it to the child to eat if the child was hungry. There were then many cries. Witness I testified that she was sure the breast was cut because she heard them say to Annunciata Mujawayezu that since she only had one breast nobody could "treat" her for that. Witness I further testified that she was sure that Annunciata Mujawayezu was raped because she heard them say "you slept with the Tutsi now you have slept with the Twa."(12) Witness I said she continued to hear the cries of Annunciata Mujawayezu and later on sounds which she described as snoring. She thought the child was killed before because she heard something like a blow and the child died immediately. Witness I stated that Musema then told Ndimbati and another man, called Bayingana, that they had done a good job, that the list no longer had many names and that he was going to pay them.
810. Witness I testified, on cross-examination, that, she recognized Musema's voice and distinctly heard the cries and comments. Although many people were speaking at the same time, and there was a lot of noise when Musema was speaking, she added that she only heard when Musema ordered Annunciata Mujawayezu's breast to be cut off. Further, the witness said that someone else told her, after she had taken refuge at her house, that Annunciata Mujawayezu's killers had driven stakes into her corpse.

5845

811. Still on cross-examination, Witness I was presented with a handwritten statement of hers dated 15 April 1995. In this statement she wrote that Musema had undressed Annunciata Mujawayezu. The Witness explained that in her handwritten statement she included information she had been told but that in her testimony she had only related what she herself had seen and heard. She said she did not herself hear anything about Musema undressing Annunciata Mujawayezu. Similarly, she was presented with having written that the hands and ears of Annunciata Mujawayezu, as well as her breast, were cut off and given to her son Blaise to eat. She again explained that this handwritten statement, which she had done for a priest, was an account of everything she had heard others say, and not limited to what she herself heard, which was only related to the cutting off of the breast. Witness I was presented with another portion of the pre-trial statement in which she was recorded as saying that some men in the crowd ordered the Twas to rape Annunciata Mujawayezu without specifically mentioning Musema.
812. The Defence extensively cross-examined Witness I on her physical location and the extent to which she could have been able to see from where she was hiding. In her testimony, which she reaffirmed on cross-examination, she stated that she was approximately 1.5 metres from the bungalow. She clarified that she could not see Musema because she was lying on the ground of the plantation but that she knew and recognized his voice. She also clarified that pieces of wood were missing from the fence, differentiating it from the picture of the fence introduced by the Defence and dated 1995. When questioned about the statement made to a Swiss judge on 16 June 1995 in which she said she saw Musema on 15 April 1994 but that she was not sure of the day, Witness I acknowledged that she had thought it was the following day but had not been able to be specific with regard to the dates.
813. Defence counsel extensively questioned Witness I regarding discrepancies between her pre-trial statements and her testimony as to how she was reunited with her children the night following the death of Annunciata Mujawayezu. The witness maintained repeatedly that she had not spent the night in the forest with her children, as recorded in a statement, but that the watchman had taken the children to his home after he had come to the forest looking for her unsuccessfully. The witness noted on cross-examination that with regard to the long period of several weeks in which she was hiding it would be difficult to recount every single detail of where she stayed and when. She stated that she had in fact hidden in all of the places mentioned in her pre-trial statements at various times.
814. Witness L, a thirty nine year-old Hutu employed at the tea factory, testified that Musema returned to the factory around the 18th of April. Witness L said he knew Annunciata Mujawayezu. He recounted that on the day Musema returned, the bourgemestre Ndimbati arrived with some young people, and they said that they had come from Bisesero to have a drink at the guest house. He said he saw them there with Annunciata Mujawayezu and they were drinking, that Musema came and joined them there together with Annunciata Mujawayezu, all standing close to the fence which surrounded the guest house. He said Musema stood by Ndimbati but that the witness was up the road and did not hear what they were saying to each other. The witness testified that after a short while Musema went into his car but in the meantime Annunciata Mujawayezu was made to enter the guest house by those who were with her, through the back door. Witness L, who was observing from the road, continued on his way. The next morning he asked a child whether he had seen a woman in the guest house and the child replied that the woman had been killed.
815. On cross-examination, Witness L stated that he did not see Musema go into the guest house and that he did not see Musema at the guest house with Annunciata Mujawayezu.
816. On re-examination, the witness clarified that he saw Musema standing near the pergola (bungalow) and that Annunciata Mujawayezu was standing with the others behind the pergola. He added that Annunciata Mujawayezu was holding a child in her arms which he was told was hers.

5846

817. In the course of the cross-examination, the witness also said that the killings at the tea factory started before the return of Musema and that the killing at the Guest House occurred a few days after the other killings at the tea factory.
818. In re-examination, the witness added that he was not at the Tea Factory when the killings took place there, as he was off duty. Witness L confirmed that when he saw Musema at the Guest House in the company of the bourgmestre, Musema had only just returned from Kigali and not even gone to his residence. The witness further said that he saw Nzamwita but not Musema with Annunciata Mujawayezu enter the Guest House.
819. Witness PP, a 46 year-old Hutu was employed at the Gisovu tea factory in 1994, testified that on 13 April 1994 he saw a number of bodies, including the body of Annunciata Mujawayezu, whom he knew, which was below the road near the canteen. He said her body had clothes on its lower part, and the face was turned towards the canteen. The witness testified that he did not observe any injuries on the body from that position. Witness PP identified a number of the bodies as those of Tutsi employees of the factory. Witness PP further testified that he knew Musema was around on the evening of 14 April 1994 because he saw his vehicle near the canteen, which was below the factory. He clarified that this was the same canteen near which he saw the body of Annunciata Mujawayezu.
820. The only witness for the Defence on the allegations relating to the rape and killing of Annunciata Mujawayezu is Musema. According to his testimony, Musema was at the Guest House on 14 April 1994, talking with the bourgmestre Ndimbati, when they suddenly heard a woman's cough and the cry of a child. He realized later that it was Annunicata. He then saw a few people, among them a soldier and Emmanuel, a school teacher, going into the Guest House. Emmanuel came out and was wiping blood off his sword. Musema testified that he suspected some complicity between the bourgmestre and the others. When the others had gone, he asked his Chief of Personnel what had happened. He did not ask Emmanuel. The Chief of Personnel told him that Annunciata Mujawayezu had been killed and that they had arrived too late. No mention was made of the child.
821. On cross-examination, Musema was confronted with his other accounts of this incident, which differ substantially from his testimony. Prosecution brought forward notably three interviews of Musema given to the Swiss Judge, namely on 12 May and 13 July 1995, and on 4 March 1996, respectively.
822. In a statement he made on 12 May 1995 to Swiss authorities (Exhibit P59), Musema was reported to have said that Annunciata Mujawayezu was murdered while he was touring the factory and en route to the Guest House where the bourgmestre joined them. A pick-up truck arrived carrying many people including a teacher and a police inspector. People shouted that Annunciata Mujawayezu had been found and Musema said he shouted back that she was not to be killed. The people with the bourgmestre then ran towards her and killed her and the people at her residence. In a statement made on 13 July 1995 to Swiss authorities (Exhibit P60), Musema was reported to have said that Annunciata Mujawayezu was killed at the residence of the Chief Accountant[(13)]. People took her from the tea plantation near the guest house to the staff quarters above the guest house more that 300 metres away. He was inside the guest house together with Ndimbati and several others. He noted that the guest house referred to both the main building and the pergola (bungalow). He said that he and Ndimbati heard cries from the tea plantation, that they both stayed inside while others went out. In a statement made on 4 March 1996 to Swiss authorities (Exhibit P61), Musema was reported to have said that Annunciata Mujawayezu had been killed in her house from where the cries were heard.

Factual Findings:

823. The Chamber notes that the testimony of Witness I was confusing in certain respects, particularly with regard to the details of her movement and the chronology of events. However, her testimony was consistent on cross-examination, and she did provide reasonable and clear answers to the questions raised on cross-examination with regard to her various pre-trial statements. The Chamber noted the determination of the witness to clarify the distinction between what she had heard others say and what she herself witnessed. She also carefully indicated on numerous occasions what she did not see or hear, as well as what she did see or hear. With regard to her account concerning the rape and murder of Annunciata Mujawayezu, the Chamber finds Witness I to be clear and consistent and accepts her testimony.

5847

824. The testimony of Witness L is limited with respect to its probative value because the witness was not able to hear Musema from where he was standing. What he saw, that is Musema standing near the pergola (bungalow), Annunciata Mujawayezu standing by the fence with the others and subsequently being taken by them into the guest house, is consistent with Witness I's much more detailed account of the event. On cross-examination, the witness clearly stated that Musema did not enter the guest house. This is not inconsistent with the other accounts, all of which indicate that he remained outside and left shortly thereafter in his vehicle.

825. It, it is clear, from Witness L's testimony, Witness I's testimony and Musema's own testimony, that Musema and Annunciata Mujawayezu were at the Guest House on 14 April 1994. It appears that Annunciata Mujawayezu was near the Guest House at the beginning but afterwards she was taken in by the back door. According to Musema's testimony to the Swiss Judge, he was inside the Guest House. The Chamber notes that Witness L places the date of this incident as around 18 April. In light of the evidence of Witness I and Musema himself that this incident took place on the 14 April, the Chamber considers that the witness is mistaken about the date, which he indicated in any event as an estimation.

826. The testimony of Witness PP is limited with respect to its probative value because Witness PP was not present when the killing of Annunciata Mujawayezu occurred. The witness saw her body and testified that there was no clothing on the upper half of the body. This evidence would be consistent with the account of Witness I that sexual violence might have been directed to her upper body. However, Witness PP noted that he did not see injuries to the body from its position. The testimony does not make it clear whether the body was face down or on its back. For this reason, the Chamber finds that the evidence of Witness PP, while credible, is not helpful in establishing what happened other than to corroborate that Annunciata Mujawayezu was killed and that Musema was present at the factory on 14 April. The Chamber further notes that the witness testified that he saw the body of Annunciata Mujawayezu on 13 April, whereas both Witness I and Musema date the death of Annunciata Mujawayezu to 14 April. The Chamber considers that the witness is mistaken about the date.

827. The Chamber has considered the testimony of Musema in light of the pre-trial statements he made to Swiss authorities which differ not only from his testimony but from each other in material respects. In one version of the incident, Musema tried to stop the killing of Annunciata Mujawayezu. In another version, he came too late. In each version, she was killed in a different place. In light of these gross inconsistencies, for which Musema does not have any reasonable explanation, the Chamber concludes that the only reasonable explanation for the inconsistencies is that he is not being truthful.

828. Having considered the evidence, as set forth above, the Chamber finds that the Prosecution has established beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema ordered the rape of Annunciata Mujawayezu, a Tutsi woman, and the cutting off of her breast to be fed to her son. No evidence was introduced to indicate that he ordered her to be killed, although there is conclusive evidence that she was in fact killed. Considering Musema's high position in the commune, he must have known that his words would necessarily have had an important and even binding impact on his interlocutors.

829. There is no conclusive evidence that Annunciata Mujawayezu was raped, or that her breast was cut off, although there is some evidence to support an inference that these acts were perpetrated.

Alleged acts of rape and murder of Immaculée Mukankuzi and others on 13 May 1994 (paragraph 4.9)

5848

1. Paragraph 4.9 of the Indictment states the following:

> "On 13 May 1994, within the area of Bisesero, in Gisovu and Gishyita communes, Kibuye Prefecture, Alfred Musema, in concert with others, raped and killed Immaculée Mukankuzi Mukankusi, a pregnant Tutsi, and thereafter ordered others accompanying him to rape and kill Tutsi women seeking refuge from attacks."

831. Witness J, a 49 year-old Tutsi woman, testified that she had five children, four girls and one boy. In 1994 the girls were 25, 23, 19 and 12 respectively, and the boy was 9 years old. The witness testified that she arrived in Bisesero in April 1994 seeking refuge on Muyira hill with two of her children. The other three children had been shot by Charles Sikubwabo, the bourgmestre of the Gishyita Commune on 7 April as she was fleeing.
832. Witness J testified that she first saw Musema on 13 May, leading the attackers, although she stated that she knew him previously as the managing Director of the Gisovu Tea Factory, where her husband worked. He was with about thirty young men, many Interahamwe wearing red shirts and white shorts and armed with clubs, sticks and machetes. Witness J testified that she was with five other Tutsi women and that when they saw Musema they ran and hid in a bush. He fired in the air, and they came out of the bush and tried to run away. Musema told his men to run after them, and they were caught. She said Musema told the men that he was going to take one of the women and rape her and that they should follow his example and do the same thing. The assailants followed the instructions. Witness J heard Musema tell them in Kinyarwanda "What I do, you will imitate after me." Musema also told the youths to take the Tutsi women and to check and note their constitution, which the witness understood to mean they were to be raped. The witness stated that Musema regrouped and instructed the assailants by using a megaphone and a whistle, and by speaking to them.
833. According to Witness J, Musema then raped one of the women, a Tutsi woman named Immaculée Mukankusi who was 25 years old and eight months pregnant. He hit her with the butt of his gun, she fell down, he dropped his trousers and underwear to the knees and jumped on her. The witness said Immaculee was struggling and she was crying because he was saying that he was going to kill her. Musema was on top of her for about four minutes. After raping her, he put on his clothes, got up and killed her, stabbing her with the knife attached to his gun between the neck and the shoulder.
834. Witness J testified that the killing of Immaculée Mukankuzi gave the men with Musema the courage to kill the other women. The other five women, including Witness J and her 18 year-old daughter, were then raped. After raping them, the men stuck sharpened sticks into their private parts. The witness said that she was raped last because the others were much younger than she was and she was considered as an old woman. She said the other women were still alive when the sticks were inserted into them and that they were screaming, and she clarified that they were killed with the sticks. Those who did not die were finished off with clubs or machetes. Witness J testified that she saw her daughter dying. The rapes, killings and other acts took place at less than two metres from her.
835. The witness said that while all this was happening Musema was further off but still in the area, shooting at the men who were fleeing. He told his men that when they had finished killing the women they should all leave. The witness testified that Musema was watching while she was raped and that her clothing was removed by her attackers. She said that the man who raped her was on top of her for four hours. On further questioning she said that because of the pain she was feeling she thought it went on for four hours and then she lost consciousness. On further questioning of the four hours, the witness said that maybe it was one year because the suffering was so much. Witness J said that nothing was inserted into her private parts because she was almost unconscious but that they cut her head with a machete and on her right shoulder and hand with a panga. She was also kicked in the stomach. When she recovered consciousness she noticed that she was bleeding and she saw the cadavers of the other victims, including that of her daughter. As a result of the attack, the witness said she has lost feeling in her arm and still has bleeding for which she cannot be treated. She said that while other widows were able to remarry she was not as she has become disabled.

5849

836. On cross-examination, Witness J testified that her three older children - the 25 year-old, the 23 year-old and the 19 year-old were the ones shot by the bourgmestre when she was fleeing to Bisesero. She said the other two were killed in Bisesero. Defence counsel also questioned Witness J on the discrepancies between her testimony in court and a radio interview that she did in January 1998 for Radio Rwanda. In the interview, the witness gave an account of the killings that took place in Bisesero. Defence counsel noted that the witness did not mention certain killings, including the killing of her three children by Sikubwabo and also that she mentioned details in the interview that she had not mentioned in her testimony, such as that she went to the Mubunga church on the day she fled to Bisesero. The witness explained that she was asked questions and was not testifying against anybody, that she did not think it necessary to mention the church as she did not think there was anyone there against whom she was testifying. Defence counsel accused the witness of lying in her testimony because she felt that somebody should be responsible for her loss and injury. The witness emphatically insisted that her testimony was what she herself had witnessed and experienced. Defence counsel noted that the witness had not mentioned Musema, or the fact that she was raped or that others were raped, in the radio interview. She replied that she had not wanted to raise this matter and on re-direct examination she stated that before testifying she had not told anyone about the rape.
837. On cross-examination, Defence counsel noted that Witness J had said that her three oldest children had been shot by Sikubwabo, leaving her two children ages 12 and 9. He asked how then her 18 year-old daughter could have been raped by Musema's men subsequently. The witness responded that the child was her own baby that she had brought into this world and said that Defence counsel was trying to make her lose her mind with questions about the ages. She then said insistently that it was Musema who ordered the killing of her children, together with all those who were with her. At the request of the Chamber, the Prosecution introduced documentary evidence establishing that the witness had five children and giving their names.
838. Defence counsel questioned the witness extensively with regard to the physical location of the rape and killing showing her a number of photographs and asking her to identify Muyira hill. She was unable to do this from the photographs, which she attributed to the fact that the hills were all similar in nature and did not have distinguishing characteristics that could be identified, such as crop plantations.
839. According to the Defence, the allegations based on Witness J' testimony falls, since the witness lacks integrity and is unfaithfull.

Factual Findings:

840. The Chamber notes that witness J is the sole witness of the rape and killing of Immaculée Mukankuzi by Musema and the rape and killing of other women by the men with him at Muyira Hill on his instruction. The Chamber found her, generally speaking, to be a balanced witness. Her evidence on direct and cross-examination was notably consistent and additional details which emerged through extensive questioning provide a clear picture of the events she was describing.
841. Yet, the Chamber notes that the witness made several time estimates which appeared to be inaccurate. For example, she testified that the man who raped her was on top of her for four hours, saying subsequently that it felt like four hours or even a day. She testified that a distance which would take a young man five minutes to cover would take her two hours. The Chamber considers that these estimates reflect a general difficulty of the witness in measuring time which do not detract from the credibility or her testimony.
842. On cross-examination, Defence counsel challenged the witness on several grounds. The Chamber considers that with regard to the interview she did on Radio Rwanda, that it is inaccurate to characterize the interview as "different"from her testimony, as if it were therefore inconsistent with her testimony. Defence pointed out that she did not say everything in the interview that she said in her testimony and that she did not say everything in her testimony that she said in the interview. The witness had a reasonable explanation for these differences - the radio interview was of short duration with a specific purpose and controlled by the interviewer. The fact that she did not mention Musema is not, in the view of the Chamber, significant, particularly in light of the fact that she did not mention the killing of her children and other very significant events to which she testified. The chamber recognizes that it is especially difficult to testify about rape and sexual violence, moreover in a public forum. No inconsistencies between the radio interview and the testimony were identified.

5850

843. The Chamber considers that the principal inconsistency in the testimony of Witness J relates to her account of the circumstances surrounding the killing of her 19 year-old daughter by Sikubwabo and the rape and killing of her 18 year-old daughter by the young men with Musema at Muyira hill. The witness clearly testified several times that she had five children, who were aged 25, 23, 19, 12, and 9. This has further been established by documentary evidence at the request of the Chamber. She clearly testified several times that her three eldest children were killed by Sikubwabo, leaving her with two children aged 12 and 9. Yet she also testified that one of the five young women raped with her at Muyira hill was her 18 year-old daughter. On cross-examination when the question was put to her to explain how this was possible, she did not provide any answer. On re-direct examination, in reply to a specific question on this point by the Prosecutor, she provided a very general answer to the effect that Musema had ordered her children to be killed. She did not explain the apparent inconsistency.

844. While the Chamber found the testimony of Witness J to be generally credible, it is deeply troubled by this unexplained inconsistency regarding the rape of her daughter. Without any reasonable explanation, the Chamber must question the accuracy of the account. The Chamber believes that there is likely to be a reasonable explanation, based on its evaluation of the witness.

845. However, recalling the high burden of proof on the Prosecutor and the lack of any other evidence produced to corroborate the account of Witness J, the Chamber cannot find beyond a reasonable doubt that the allegations have been established relating to the rape and killing of Immaculée Mukankuzi by Musema and the rape and killing of others with her by his men and on his order on 13 May 1994.

Alleged acts of rape and murder of a woman called Nyiramusugi on 13 May 1994 (paragraph 4.10).

846. Paragraph 4.10 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "On 13 May 1994, within the area of Bisesero, in Gisovu and Gishyita communes, Kibuye prefecture, Alfred Musema, acting in concert with others, raped Nyiramusugi, a Tutsi woman, and encouraged others accompanying him to rape and kill her".

847. Witness N , a 39 year old Tutsi, testified that he sought refuge in the Bisesero area from 26 April to 13 May 1994. He stated that there were many attacks on Muyira hill on 13 May 1994 and that he stayed on Muyira hill until that date, after which he had to flee again. He testified that he knew Musema. He saw Musema arrive at Muyira hill aboard his red vehicle on 13 May 1994. He said that this was the first time that he had seen Musema during the attacks. He explained that he was able to hear Musema once the group moved to within a few metres of him.

848. The witness testified that Musema spoke to a policeman named Ruhindura, and asked him whether a young woman called Nyiramusugi was already dead, to which the policeman answered

5851

'no'. He stated that Musema then asked that before anything, this girl had to be brought to him.(14) He and the bourgmestre fired the first shots so the others would start shooting. Ruhindura while fighting and looking for the young woman caught her. The Witness stated that he knew Nyiramusugi. He used to see her when she walked to school and he used to take his cows to graze in front of her parents' house. He said that she was a young unmarried teacher.

849. Witness N testified that Nyiramusugi was caught around 15.30hrs. He said that he saw Ruhindura with four youths drag the young woman on the ground and take her to Musema. He said that Musema was carrying a rifle which he then handed to Ruhindura. The four people holding Nyiramusugi brought her to the ground. They pinned her down, two holding her arms and two holding her legs. The two holding her legs then spread them, and Musema placed himself between them. The witness saw Musema rip off Nyiramusugi's clothes and underclothes and then took off his own clothes. The witness stated that Musema said aloud "Today, the pride of the Tutsi shall end"(15) and then raped the young woman. Witness N said that Nyiramusugi was a very well known Tutsi girl who was very beautiful.
850. The witness explained that because of the echo at Muyira hill, it was possible to hear everything that was said and to recognize the voice of certain of the attackers. The Witness also explained that he was able to see the rape as he had fallen in a bush when fleeing to the top of the hill. Musema was at 40 metres, bird flight, on a little hill at Muyira, walking distance being further because to get to Musema from the Witness' position on the hill, one had to walk down and back up the other side.
851. The witness affirmed that the victim was Tutsi and explained that Musema took her by force. He stated that during the rape, Nyiramusugi struggled until Musema grabbed one of her arms and held it against her neck. The four assailants who initially held down the victim watched from nearby while the policeman, Ruhindura, stood further away. Witness N stated that after the rape, which he estimated lasted forty minutes, Musema walked over to Ruhindura, took his rifle back and left with him.
852. Witness N also testified that the four other men, who initially pinned down the victim, went back to the girl and took turns raping her. She was struggling and started rolling down toward the valley. He was able to see them rape Nyiramusugi until they were out of sight. During the rape, he heard the victim scream and say "the only thing that I can do for you is only to pray for you."(16)
853. Witness N added that he later saw the four attackers on the rise of the other side of the valley and saw that Nyiramusugi had been left for dead in the valley. That night, the witness and three other people went to the victim and found her badly injured. She was cut all over her body, covered with blood and nail scratches around her neck. He stated that they took her to her mother. The witness testified that the mother died the next day and that he learnt from Nyiramusugi's brother that she had been shot.
854. On cross-examination, Defence counsel extensively questioned the witness as to how he came to testify and the circumstances of his statement which was made on 13 January 1999 to the Prosecutor. The witness explained that he had previously made a statement about Musema to the local court in 1997. The witness further testified that he was able to hear Musema as the refugees were speaking amongst themselves softly and the attackers were getting organized. Moreover, the attackers spoke loudly so that everyone could hear them.
855. The witness was asked why Nyarimusugi was not killed after she was raped. He replied that he did not know. When asked again, he replied that what they did to her was worse than killing her. When pressed further as to whether it was not strange that she was not killed he replied that in a way they did kill her, and that sometimes they would leave people to die if they thought they had been sufficiently weakened. He added that if she had been left there without any help through the night, she would have died. The witness was asked whether he had been paid any money to come and testify, and he replied that he had not. Finally, it was put to him that he was lying, and he replied that he had not come to lie but rather to talk about what he himself had seen and that Musema would know that he was telling the truth.

856. According to the Defence, Musema was not in Kibuye during the period covering 13 May 1994. Several letters were presented in support of the alibi.

Factual Findings:

857. The Chamber accepts the testimony of Witness N as credible.

858. It is clear and consistent, and nothing emerged from the cross-examination of the witness which cast any doubt on the evidence presented. In the view of the Chamber, the reasons given by witness N as to why he waited five years to come forward with this statement, namely that he reported Musema to his local court in 1997, is satisfactory.

859. The reasons given by the witness as to how he had been able to hear Musema's exclamations are also convincing. The witness indeed explained that, firstly, the attacks had not yet started when Musema asked for the girl to be brought to him, secondly, he was able to hear Musema since the refugees were speaking amongst themselves softly and the attackers were getting organized, and thirdly, the attackers spoke loudly. Moreover, the witness explained that because of the echo at Muyira hill, it was possible for him to hear everything that was said and to recognize the voice of certain attackers, taking into account that the bush in which he was hiding was approximately at 40 metres bird flight from Musema. In the light of exhibits D7-A, D7-B and P21, Witness N's observation and description of the area of Muyira hill is convincing.

860. Concerning the alibi, the Chamber recalls its finding in Section 5.2 above as regards mid-May attacks. The Chamber here confirms that this alibi does not stand.

861. Based on this evidence, the Chamber finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Musema, acting in concert with others raped Nyiramusugi, and by his example encouraged the others to rape her on 13 May 1994.

862. According to the Chamber, there is no evidence, however, that he encouraged them to kill her, as alleged in the Indictment.

5.4 Musema's Authority

863. Paragraph 5 of the Indictment states that Musema is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes with which he is charged in the Indictment.

864. In Section 3.1 of the Judgement, the Chamber discussed the legal principles pertaining to individual criminal responsibility under Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute. As it determined there, the authority, whether de facto or de jure, or the effective control, exercised by Alfred Musema in the context of the events alleged, may provide the basis for such individual criminal responsibility.

865. In relation to Article 6(1), the nature of the authority wielded by an individual affects the assessment of that individual's role in planning, instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute. In particular, the presence of an authority figure at an event could amount to acquiescence in the event or support thereof, and, in the perception of the perpetrators, legitimize the said event.

866. In relation to Article 6(3) of the Statute, the nature of the authority exercised by an individual is crucial to an assessment of whether that individual exercised a superior responsibility over perpetrators of acts detailed in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, and whether, as a result, that individual attracts individual criminal responsibility for those acts.

867. It is, therefore, necessary for the Chamber to assess the nature and extent of the authority, whether de facto or de jure, and the effective control exercised by Musema in the context of the events alleged in the Indictment. The Chamber will make that assessment of Musema's authority, firstly by examining the testimonies of witnesses before the Chamber and the documents tendered to it, and secondly by presenting its factual findings on the matter.

5853

The Evidence

868. Many of the witnesses testified that Musema was perceived as a figure of authority and considerable influence in the Gisovu region. Witness H stated that Musema was "very well respected" in the locality. Witness W testified that Musema "occupied an important position in Rwanda", and that he occupied a place higher in the regime than others of equivalent or higher age or qualifications. Witness E stated that Musema was considered to have the same powers as a Préfet. Witnesses R and D both testified to seeing Musema sitting with officials or authorities at political meetings.
869. Witnesses offered two different, and overlapping, explanations for Musema's influence. According to some witnesses, his power stemmed from his control of socio-economic resources. According to other witnesses, his power was politically based.
870. Witness BB stated that Directors of Tea Factories became well respected in their respective Préfectures as a result of their provision to the local communities of social services (such as clinics and schools) ancillary to the factories. This respect extended their influence beyond their direct control over factory employees. Witness G stated that Musema was a "very important personality" because he employed many people at the factory.
871. Witnesses W, E and AB all testified in relation to Musema's political activities, and that he played an important political role within the Gisovu region.
872. The Expert Witness of the Prosecutor, André Guichaoua, provided testimony linking these two explanations of the source of Musema's authority. Guichaoua emphasized the political importance in the Second Republic of controlling key posts and positions which controlled the distribution of resources, including export earnings. These positions included management positions in parastatal organizations, such as OCIR-thé. OCIR-thé was a key parastatal because it controlled the "coming in of external resources" in the form of export earnings from tea. Guichaoua stated that according to the National Commission of Agriculture reports of 1991, it was one of the central export earners in Rwanda.
873. According to Guichaoua, the importance of the Tea Factory in Gisovu was magnified by the relative poverty of the region. Musema's influence as Tea Factory Director extended not only to the people, whom he could employ, but to the communal authorities, since by employing the people, and providing them with financial resources with which to pay communal taxes, he made it possible for the commune to pay its employees. As a result there was, according to Guichaoua, generally an extensive solidarity between the communal authorities and the parastatal enterprises. He stated that a Director of such an enterprise could "buy social peace".
874. Guichaoua also testified that Musema's appointment to the directorship of the Tea Factory was politically motivated, and to his links with the central government. He stated that Musema's influence and "prerogatives" would have expanded after the instalment of the new government on 8 or 9 April, 1994, because of the unprecedented presence of citizens of Kibuye in that government. Guichaoua outlined many personal affiliations between Musema and a range of governmental ministers. According to Guichaoua, during times of conflict, it was the role of a Tea Factory Director to maintain infrastructure and exports, but also to "ensure peace". The economic importance of Tea Factories meant Directors were closely surveyed by the central government. In Guichaoua's opinion it would not have been possible, being in a position such as that Musema occupied, not to have participated in the decision-making process at the time.
875. The Defence contested these allegations concerning Musema's authority. Their representations are contained in Section 4.3 of the Judgement. Generally, it was argued that no evidence had been presented of Musema's alleged civic authority; that the nature of Musema's appointment to the Directorship of the Gisovu Tea Factory was not conclusive evidence of any link between him and the regime; and that he was not in any way part of the interim government.

5854

876. Musema's legal status as a Tea Factory Director was clarified by Witness BB. He stated that Tea Factory Directors, as heads of the factories in the independent legal entity, the parastatal OCIR-thé, were appointed by the President. They reported to the Managing Director of OCIR-thé, who in turn reported to the Ministry of Agriculture. Witness BB stated that the Préfet represented the Head of State in the Préfecture, and that the Factory Director was bound to respect him. However, the day-to-day administration of the factory, including the appointment of staff, was the prerogative of the Director, with no need of consultations with the Préfet nor the bourgmestre. In the Witness' opinion, the Director "exercised control" over his staff.
877. The Chamber notes that Musema testified that he could visit certain military camps, and that he was authorized to carry a firearm. Moreover, notes the Chamber, the fact that Musema was accompanied by military personnel also shows the importance of his general position.
878. In conclusion, the Chamber notes that the Defence also tendered numerous documents, including meeting reports and minutes and official correspondence, which all tend to demonstrate that at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, Musema exercised de jure and de facto authority over tea factory employees in his official capacity as Director of the Tea Factory.

Factual findings

879. Having reviewed the evidence presented to it, and in light of its assessments of the credibility and reliability of witnesses in the Sections 5.2 and 5.3 of the Judgement, the Chamber will now make its factual findings regarding the nature and extent of authority and control, if any, exercised by Musema in the context of the events alleged in the Indictment.
880. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema exercised de jure authority over employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory while they were on Tea Factory premises and while they were engaged in their professional duties as employees of the Tea Factory, even if those duties were performed outside factory premises. The Chamber notes that Musema exercised legal and financial control over these employees, particularly through his power to appoint and remove these employees from their positions at the Tea Factory. The Chamber notes that Musema was in a position, by virtue of these powers, to take reasonable measures, such as removing, or threatening to remove, an individual from his or her position at the Tea Factory if he or she was identified as a perpetrator of crimes punishable under the Statute. The Chamber also finds that, by virtue of these powers, Musema was in a position to take reasonable measures to attempt to prevent or to punish the use of Tea Factory vehicles, uniforms or other Tea Factory property in the commission of such crimes. The Chamber finds that Musema exercised de jure power and de facto control over Tea Factory employees and the resources of the Tea Factory.
881. In relation to other members of the population of Kibuye Préfecture, including thé villageois plantation workers, while the Chamber is satisfied that such individuals perceived Musema as a figure of authority and as someone who wielded considerable power in the region, it is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence presented to it that Musema did, in fact, exercise de jure power and de facto control over these individuals.
882. The Chamber finds, therefore, that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that there existed at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment a de jure superior-subordinate relationship between Musema and the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory.
883. In Section 6 of the Judgement in its legal findings, the Chamber will evaluate whether Musema's individual criminal responsibility is engaged under Article 6 of the Statute with respect to paragraphs 4.6 to 4.11 of the Indictment.

1. Section 4.1 of the Judgement.

58555

2. See Section 4.1 of the Judgement - "General Admissions"

3. In plural "Imihurura"

4. Kinyarwanda "badutsembatsembe".

5. Kinyarwanda "Imana y'Abatutsi barayishe. Nta Mana bakigira".

6. French Transcript 28 April 1999, "Ces véhicules qui venaient de la route d'en bas et les gens qui étaient à bord des véhicules sont descendus et tout le monde s'est regroupé près du panneau de signalement, près du panneau routier".

7. French original "Imaginez que tout le monde s'est retrouvé le 18/04 alors que chacun croyait tout les autres morts".

8. Exhibit P56A, English translation of P56, refers, incorrectly, to 17 April.

9. It should be noted that later in his testimony, Musema named the person as Faustin Nyavihima and spelt the name for the Court.

10. See Defence Closing Brief para. 263.

11. The French transcript reads "Pour ceux qui voulaient s'amuser, ils pouvaient violer leurs femmes et leurs filles, sans craindre aucune conséquence"(transcript of 30 April 1999, p.30).

12. French transcript reads " Tu as couché avec des Tutsi et maintenant tu viens de coucher avec des Twa".

13. The French states "Elle a été assasinée dans l'habitation du chef comptable. Les gens l'ont prise dans le thé, à proximité du guest house, puis ils sont montés vers les habitations, au-dessus du guest house, soit à plus de 300m. Moi-même, je me trouvais au guest house, à l'intèrieur. J'étais à ce moment avec Ndimbati, un enseignant, l'IPJ de la commune, deux militaires venus avec moi de Butare et Baragiwira". Musema made no mention of the bloodied sword carried by the teacher nor the coughs coming from the plantation behind him and said he was in the Guest. In Court he said he was outside.

14. [14] French transcript, 28 April 1999, page 75, lines 1 and 2, 'Musema a dit, qu'avant toute chose, on devait lui amener cette jeune fille.'

15. [15] French transcript, 28 April 1999, "il a dit 'Aujourd'hui, l'orgueil des Tutsis va finir.'"

16. [16] French transcript, 28 April 1999, "la seule chose que je peux faire pour vous, c'est de prier pour vous seulement."

5856

6. LEGAL FINDINGS

6.1 Count 1 - Genocide & Count 2 - Complicity in Genocide

6.2 Count 3 - Conspiracy to Commit Genocide

6.3 Count 5 - Crime against Humanity (extermination)

6.4 Count 4 - Crime against Humanity (murder)

6.5 Count 6 - Crime against Humanity (other inhumane acts)

6.6 Count 7 - Crime against Humanity (rape)

6.7 Counts 8 and 9 -Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II 274

6.1 Count 1 - Genocide & Count 2 - Complicity in Genocide

884. In Count 1, relating to all the facts alleged in the Indictment, the Prosecutor charges Musema with criminal responsibility, under Article 6 (1) and (3) of the Statute, for the crime of genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2 (3) (a) of the Statute.
885. As an alternative, the Prosecutor also charges Musema with Count 2, in which Musema is held criminally responsible, under Article 6 (1) and (3) of the Statute, for having committed the crime of complicity in genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2 (3) (e) of the Statute. Count 2 also relates to all the acts alleged in the Indictment.
886. The Chamber recalls, as it indicated supra in its findings on the applicable law, that it holds that an accused is guilty of the crime of genocide if he committed one of the acts enumerated under Article 2 (2) of the Statute against a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, specifically targeted as such, with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, said group.
887. Furthermore, the Chamber holds that an accused is liable for complicity in genocide if he knowingly and voluntarily aided or abetted or instigated a person or persons to commit genocide, while knowing that such a person or persons were committing genocide, even though the accused himself did not have the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, specifically targeted as such.
888. As Count 2 stands in the alternative to Count 1, the Chamber will now present its findings with respect to both counts by examining, firstly, on the basis of the factual findings set forth above in Chapter 5, which of the acts alleged in the Indictment to have been committed by Musema it considers to have been established beyond a reasonable doubt and for which he incurs responsibility. The Chamber will then determine whether those acts are constituent elements of the crime of genocide and, if not, whether they constitute elements of the crime of complicity in genocide.

With respect, firstly, to the facts alleged in the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt, on the basis of the factual findings, of the following:

889. Firstly, regarding the allegations presented under paragraph 4.8 of the Indictment, according to which Musema, in concert with others, ordered and abetted in the rape of Annunciata, a Tutsi, and thereafter ordered that she and her son be killed, the Chamber holds that even if it is proven that Musema ordered that Annunciata be raped, such order, by and of itself, does not suffice for him to incur individual criminal responsibility, given that no evidence has been adduced to show that the order was executed to produce such result, namely the rape of Annunciata. Nor has it been proved that Musema ordered that she and her son be killed.

5857

890. Secondly, the Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that on 26 April 1994, Musema led and participated in an attack on Gitwa Hill. Musema arrived at the site of the attack in a Daihatsu vehicle belonging to the Gisovu Tea Factory. He carried a firearm and was accompanied by employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory wearing blue uniforms. Musema and other persons, some of whom wore banana leaves and Imihurura belts, attacked Tutsi refugees. It has also been established beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema shot into the crowd of refugees. The attackers killed resolutely, and few refugees survived the large-scale attack.

891. The Chamber finds that Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility for the above-mentioned acts, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6 (1) of the Statute, for having ordered and, by his presence and participation, having aided and abetted in the murder of members of the Tutsi ethnic group, and for the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the said group.

892. With respect to the Prosecutor's contention that Musema could additionally be held criminally responsible, under Article 6 (3) of the Statute, the Chamber finds that for an accused to be held criminally responsible under these statutory provisions, the Prosecutor must establish: (1) that one of the acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute was, indeed, committed by a subordinate of the Accused; (2) that the accused knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such act or had done so; and (3) that the accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said act by the subordinate or to punish him for the criminal conduct.

893. The Chamber notes that, in the instant case, it has been established that employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory were among the attackers. The Chamber is of the view that their participation resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, causing serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.

894. The Chamber finds that it has also been established that Musema was the superior of said employees and that he held not only de jure power over them, but also de facto power.(1) Considering that Musema was personally present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the opinion that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that the Accused nevertheless failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in the commission of those acts, by his presence and personal participation.

895. Consequently, the Chamber finds that, for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory during the attack of 26 April 1994 on Gitwa Hill, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, as their superior, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6 (3) of the Statute.

896. Thirdly, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that between 27 April and 3 May 1994, Musema participated in the attack on Rwirambo Hill. Musema arrived in a red Pajero, followed by four Daihatsu pick-ups from the Gisovu Tea Factory which were carrying persons that Witness R described as Interahamwe. The witness recognized those persons from their blue uniforms which had the name "Usine à thé Gisovu" printed on the back. Musema was armed with a rifle. While trying to flee, Witness R's arm was injured from a bullet which came from Musema's direction.

897. The Chamber finds that, for the above-mentioned acts, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6 (1) of the Statute, for having committed and, by his presence and participation, having aided and abetted in the causing of, serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.

898. With respect to the Prosecutor's argument that Musema could also be held responsible under Article 6 (3) of the Statute, the Chamber finds, firstly, that among the attackers at Rwirambo were persons identified as employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory. The Chamber is of the view that their participation resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, causing serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.

5858

899. The Chamber finds that it has also been established, as held supra, that Musema was the superior of said employees and that he held not only de jure power over them, but also de facto power. Noting that Musema was personally present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the opinion that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that Musema, nevertheless, failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in their commission, by his presence and by his personal participation.

900. Consequently, the Chamber finds that, for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory during the attack on Rwirambo Hill, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, as their superior, on the basis of the basis of Article 6 (3) of the Statute.

901. Fourthly, on the basis of numerous corroborating testimonies, the Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond any reasonable doubt that on 13 May 1994 a large-scale attack was launched at Muyira Hill against 40,000 Tutsi refugees. The attack began in the morning. Some of the attackers arrived on Muyira Hill on foot while others came in vehicles, including Daihatsus belonging to the Gisovu Tea Factory. Employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory dressed in their uniforms, gendarmes, soldiers, civilians and members of the Interahamwe were among the attackers. The attackers were armed with firearms, grenades, rocket launchers and traditional weapons. They chanted anti-Tutsi slogans.

902. The Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema was among the leaders of the attack. He arrived at the location in his red Pajero. He was armed with a rifle which he used during the attack. Thousands of unarmed Tutsi men, women and children were killed during the attack, while others were forced to flee for their lives.

903. The Chamber finds that, for the acts mentioned supra, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6 (1) of the Statute, for having ordered and, by his presence and participation, aided and abetted in the murder of members of the Tutsi group and the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of said group.

904. The Chamber notes, on the basis of the factual findings set forth supra, that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt, that employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory were among the attackers. The Chamber is of the view that their participation resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, the killing of members of the Tutsi group and causing serious bodily and mental harm to members of the said group.

905. The Chamber also finds that it has been established that Musema was the superior of the said employees and that he had not only de jure power over them, but also de facto power. Noting that Musema was himself present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the opinion that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that the Accused, nevertheless, failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in the commission of those acts, by his presence and personal participation.

906. Consequently, the Chamber finds that, for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory during the attack of 13 May 1994, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, as their superior, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6 (3) of the Statute.

907. Fifthly, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that on 13 May 1994, during the above-mentioned attack on Muyira Hill, Musema, having been told by a policeman called Ruhindara that a young Tutsi woman, a teacher by the name Nyiramusugi, was still alive, asked Ruhindara to catch her and to bring her to him. With the help of four young men, Ruhindara dragged the woman on the ground and brought her to Musema who had his rifle in his hand. The four young men, who were restraining Nyiramusugi, dropped her on the ground and pinned her down. Two of them held her arms, while the other two clamped her legs. The latter two opened the legs of the young woman and Musema tore her garments and undergarments, before undressing himself. In a loud voice, Musema said: "The pride of the Tutsi is going to end today". Musema raped Nyiramusugi. During the rape, as Nyiramusugi struggled, Musema immobilized her by taking her arm which he forcibly held to her neck. Standing nearby, the four men who initially held Nyiramusugi to the ground watched the scene. After Musema's departure, they came back to the woman and also raped her in turns. Thereafter, they left Nyiramusugi for dead.

5859

908. The Chamber finds that Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility under Article 6 (1) of the Statute, for having raped, in concert with others, a young Tutsi woman and for thus having caused serious bodily and mental harm to a member of the Tutsi group. The Chamber also finds that Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having abetted others to rape the girl, by the said act of rape and the example he thus set.
909. With respect to the Prosecutor's argument that Musema could also be liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has not established, nor even alleged, that among the assailants who attacked Nyiramusugi there were employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory or other persons who were Musema's subordinates. Therefore, the Chamber holds that Musema does not incur individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute for Nyiramusugi's rape.
910. Sixthly, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that another large-scale attack took place on Muyira Hill on 14 May 1994 against Tutsi civilians. The attackers, who numbered about 15 000, were armed with traditional weapons, firearms and grenades. They chanted slogans. Musema, who was armed with a rifle, was one of the leaders of that attack.
911. Furthermore, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema participated in an attack which took place in mid-May 1994 on Muyira Hill against Tutsi civilians and that Musema led the attackers, who included the Interahamwe and employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory. Musema's red Pajero and vehicles belonging to the Gisovu Tea Factory were seen at the site of the attack. Musema launched the attack by shooting his rifle, and he personally shot at the refugees, although it has not been established beyond a reasonable doubt that he killed anyone.
912. The Chamber finds that, for the above-mentioned acts, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, under Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having ordered, committed and, by his presence and participation, aided and abetted in the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.
913. The Chamber notes that, on the basis of the factual findings set forth supra, it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory were among the attackers. The Chamber holds that the participation of said employees resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.
914. The Chamber finds that it has also been established that Musema was the superior of said employees and that he not only held de jure power over them, but also de facto power. Considering that Musema was personally present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the view that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that the Accused, nevertheless, failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in the commission of those acts, by his presence and personal participation.
915. Consequently, the Chamber finds that for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory on Muyira Hill, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility as their superior, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6(3) of the Statute.
916. Seventhly, the Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema participated in an attack on Mumataba Hill in mid-May 1994. Among the attackers, who numbered between 120 and 150, were employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory armed with traditional weapons, and communal policemen. In the presence of Musema, vehicles of the tea factory transported the attackers to the sites. The attack, which was carried out against some 2000 to 3000 Tutsis who had sought refuge in the house of one Sakufe and in the vicinity of the said house, was sparked off by blowing whistles. The Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that Musema was present, that he stayed with the others near his vehicle during the attack, and that he left the site with the attackers.

5860

917. The Chamber finds that, for these acts, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having, by his presence and the fact that he witnessed the attack, aided and abetted in the murder of members of the Tutsi group and in the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the said group.
918. The Chamber notes that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory were among the attackers and that they were transported to the attack sites by vehicles of the factory, in the presence of Musema. The Chamber is of the view that their participation resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, the killing of members of the Tutsi group and causing serious bodily and mental harm to members of the said group.
919. The Chamber finds that it has been established that Musema was the superior of the said employees and that he had not only de jure power over them, but also de facto power. Considering that Musema was himself present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the opinion that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that Musema, nevertheless, failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said act by his subordinates, but rather abetted his subordinates in the commission of those acts, by his presence and by his personal participation.
920. Consequently, the Chamber finds that, for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory during the Mumataba attack, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, as their superior, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6(3) of the Statute.
921. Eighthly, the Chamber is convinced beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the attack on Nyakavumu cave. Musema was aboard his Pajero in a convoy, travelling towards the cave, which included tea factory Daihatsus aboard of which were tea factory workers. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was armed with a rifle, and that he was present at the attack during which assailants closed off the entrance to the cave with wood and leaves, and set fire thereto. The Chamber finds that it has been proven beyond reasonable doubt that over 300 Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge in the cave died as a result of the fire.
922. The Chamber finds that, for the above-mentioned acts, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility, under Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having committed and, by his presence, aided and abetted in the commission of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.
923. The Chamber notes that, on the basis of the factual findings set forth supra, it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Gisovu Tea Factory workers were among the attackers. The Chamber holds that the participation of these employees resulted, inevitably, in the commission of acts referred to under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, including, in particular, the causing of serious bodily and mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.
924. The Chamber finds that it has also been established that Musema was the superior of said employees and that he not only held de jure power over them, but also de facto control. Considering that Musema was personally present at the attack sites, the Chamber is of the view that he knew or, at least, had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit such acts or had done so. The Chamber notes that the Accused, nevertheless, failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of said acts by his subordinates, but rather abetted in the commission of those acts, by his presence and personal participation.
925. Consequently, the Chamber finds that for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory on Muyira Hill, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility as their superior, on the basis of the provisions of Article 6(3) of the Statute.
926. It emerges from the foregoing findings that the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that Musema is criminally responsible, under Article 6 (1) of the Statute, for having ordered, committed and, by his presence and his participation aided and abetted in the killing of members of the Tutsi group, to whom he caused serious bodily and mental harm. Moreover, the Chan... is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that Musema incurs further criminal responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the acts committed by the employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory.

5861

Regarding ,secondly, whether the above-mentioned acts were committed against the Tutsi group as such, and whether Musema possessed genocidal intent at the time those acts were committed:

927. As held in the findings regarding the applicable law on the determination of genocidal intent, the Chamber is of the view that it is necessary to infer such intent by deduction from the material evidence submitted to the Chamber, including the evidence which demonstrates a consistent pattern of conduct by Musema.
928. The Chamber notes, firstly, that based on numerous submissions of evidence proffered at the trial, and, in particular, on acts referred to in paragraphs 4.4, 4.5, and 4.11 of the Indictment (2), it has been proven that, at the time of the facts alleged in the Indictment, numerous atrocities were committed against the Tutsis in Rwanda. Musema acknowledged that roadblocks manned by individuals, some of whom were armed with machetes and an assortment of weapons, were erected at the time all along the road from Kigali to Gitarama. Musema testified that he personally saw several bodies along the road and also witnessed incidents of looting. Musema conceded that those people had been killed at the roadblocks because they were accused of being Inyenzi, a term which at the time was equivalent to Tutsi.
929. In particular, Musema acknowledged that from April to June 1994, thousands of men, women and children, predominantly Tutsis, sought refuge in the Bisesero area. Musema admitted that those people were targets of regular attacks from approximately 9 April to 30 June 1994. The assailants used guns, grenades, machetes, spears, pangas, cudgels and other weapons to kill the Tutsis. In the Bisesero area, the attacks resulted in thousands of deaths and injuries among these men, women and children.
930. Musema also conceded that around 13 May 1994 a large-scale attack was launched against Tutsi civilians who had taken refuge on Muyira Hill in Gisovu Commune and that those Tutsis then became victims of acts of genocide. Musema admitted, in general, that during the months of April, May and June 1994, in the communes of Gisovu and Gishyita, in Kibuye Préfecture, acts of genocide were committed against the Tutsi ethnic group.
931. Consequently, the Chamber notes that the above acts, with which Musema and his subordinates are charged, were committed as part of a widespread and systematic perpetration of other criminal acts against members of the Tutsi group. Furthermore, the Chamber notes that Musema acknowledged that genocide directed against the Tutsis took place at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment and at the very sites where the acts with which he is charged were committed.
932. Next, and foremost, the Chamber notes that, on the basis of corroborating testimonies presented, the participation by Musema in the attacks against members of the Tutsi group has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The anti-Tutsi slogans chanted during the attacks, including the slogan "Let's exterminate them", directed at the Tutsis, clearly demonstrated that the objective of the attackers, including Musema, was to destroy the Tutsis. The Chamber is satisfied that Musema, who held de facto authority, by virtue inter alia of his position as Director of the Gisovu Tea Factory and as an educated man with political influence, ordered the commission of crimes against members of the Tutsi group and abetted in said crimes by participating personally in them. These attacks were pointedly aimed at causing harm to and destroying the Tutsis. The victims, namely men, women and children, were deliberately and systematically targeted on the basis of their membership in the Tutsi ethnic group. Certain degrading acts were purposely intended to humiliate them for being Tutsis.
933. Accordingly, the Chamber notes that on the basis of the evidence presented, it emerges that acts of serious bodily and mental harm, including rape and other forms of sexual violence were often accompanied by humiliating utterances, which clearly indicated that the intention underlying each specific act was to destroy the Tutsi group as a whole. The Chamber notes, for example, that during the rape of Nyiramusugi Musema declared: "The pride of the Tutsis will end today". In this context, the acts of rape and sexual violence were an integral part of the plan conceived to destroy the Tutsi group. Such acts targeted Tutsi women, in particular, and specifically contributed to their destruction and therefore that of the Tutsi group as such. Witness N testified before the Chamber that Nyiramusugi, who was left for dead by those who raped her, had indeed been killed in a way. Indeed, the Witness specified that "what they did to her is worse than death".

5362

934. Therefore, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time of commission of the above-mentioned acts, which the Chamber considers to have been established, Musema had the intent to destroy the Tutsi ethnic group as such.
935. On that basis, the Chamber recalls that, with regard to the issue of whether the Tutsis were, indeed, a protected group within the meaning of the Genocide Convention, at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, the Defence did admit that acts of genocide were committed against the Tutsi ethnic group. Consequently, after having considered all the evidence submitted, and the political, social and cultural context prevailing in Rwanda, the Chamber holds that, at the time of the alleged events, the Tutsi group did constitute and still constitutes a protected group within the meaning of the Genocide Convention and , thereby, under Article 2 of the Statute.
936. In conclusion, from all the foregoing, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that: firstly, Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility for the above-mentioned acts, which are constituent elements of the crime of genocide; secondly, that said acts were committed by Musema with the specific intent to destroy the Tutsi group, as such; and thirdly, that the Tutsi group is one of the groups legally protected from the crime of genocide. Musema incurs individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) and (3) of the Statute for the crime of genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute.

6.2 Count 3 - Conspiracy to commit genocide

937. Under Count 3, which relates to all acts alleged in the Indictment, the Prosecutor charges Musema with the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide, a crime punishable under Article 2 (3) (b) of the Statute.
938. The Chamber notes that the acts thus alleged by the Prosecutor under Count 3 are the same as the acts alleged under Count 1(genocide) and Count 2 (complicity in genocide).
939. Regarding the law applicable to the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide, the Chamber held supra that:

> "... conspiracy to commit genocide is to be defined as an agreement between two or more persons to commit the crime of genocide".(3)

940. The Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has neither clearly alleged, nor, above all, adduced evidence that Musema, indeed, conspired with other persons to commit genocide and that he and such persons reached an agreement to act to that end.
941. Therefore, the Chamber holds that Musema does not incur criminal responsibility for the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide, under Count 3, all the more so as, on the basis of the same acts, the Prosecutor presented evidence of Musema's participation in the commission of genocide, the substantive offence in relation to conspiracy.

6.3 Legal Findings - Count 5: Crime against Humanity (extermination)

5863

942. Count 5 of the Indictment charges Musema with crime against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Articles 3(b), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment.
943. The Chamber notes that the Defence has made certain admissions inter alia: that the Tutsi were either a racial or ethnic group; that there were widespread or systematic attacks throughout Rwanda, between the period 1 January and 31 December 1994 and these attacks were directed against civilians on the grounds, ethnic affiliation and racial origin. The Chamber finds that the Prosecutor is discharged of the burden of proving these elements in respect of crime against humanity (extermination).
944. The Chamber notes that Article 6(1) of the Statute, provides that a person who "planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime." It is also noted that Article 6(3) of the Statute provides that "acts [...] committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof".
945. The Chamber has found, beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema:

- was armed with a rifle and that he ordered, aided and abetted and participated in the commission of attacks on Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge on Muyira hill on 13 and 14 May 1994, and in mid-May 1994. The Accused was one of the leaders of the attacks and some of the attackers were employees of the Gisovu Tea Factory who had traveled to Muyira hill in motor vehicles belonging to the Gisovu Tea Factory;(4)
- participated in an attack on Tutsi civilians, who had sought refuge on Mumataba hill in mid-May 1994. Some of the attackers were tea factory employees who were transported to Mumataba hill in motor vehicles belonging to Gisovu Tea Factory. The Accused was present through out the attack and left with the attackers;(5)
- participated in an attack on Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge in the Nyakavumu cave;(6)
- participated in an attack on Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge on Gitwa hill on 26 April 1994 (7); and;
- participated in an attack on Tutsi civilians between 27 April and 3 May 1994 in Rwirambo.

946. The Chamber finds that in 1994, the Accused had knowledge of a widespread or systematic attack that was directed against the civilian population in Rwanda. This finding is supported by the presence of Musema at attacks in different locations in Kibuye Préfecture, as found above, by the testimony of the Accused, and by Defence exhibits. The Chamber recalls, in particular, the following testimony of the Accused:

"[...] compte tenu d'abord d'une part les massacres qui se faisaient à l'intérieur [...] il y avait ce génocide qui venait de se commettre, qui était encore en train de se commettre [...]"(8);

"[...] des gens ont été massacrés à Kibuye, dans d'autres préfectures [...]"(9);

"[...] Ce bébé qui est mort, cette vieille femme, ce petit enfant qui est mort, qui a été massacré, par des bourreaux impitoyables, pour moi ce sont des martyrs."(10)

947. The Chamber further recalls statements made by Musema in letters written to Nicole Pletscher, which were tendered as Defence exhibits, specifically:

"Depuis le 06/04 le pays a vécu un bain de sang incroyable: troubles ethniques - massacres - vols - tout ce qu'on puisse ou plutôt qu'on ne peut pas s'imaginer sur le plan de l'horreur humaine ... Ruhengeri est plus ou moins touché. Mais Byumba est occupé à 100% ... Mais on indique que les morts dépassent des centaine de milliers de gens [...] Des milliers et des milliers de déplacés de guerre, quelle horreur qui s'ajoute à des milliers de cadavres!"(11)

"Au niveaux des droits humanitaires des massacres se sont arrêtés dans la Zône gouvernmentale mais se perpetrent toujours dans la Zône FPR. L'aide humanitaire est attendue mais n'arrive pas."(12)

948. The Chamber finds that, Musema's criminal conduct was consistent with the pattern of the then ongoing widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population and his conduct formed a part of this attack.
949. The Chamber finds, that Musema's conduct: in ordering and participating in the attacks on Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge on Muyira hill and on Mumataba hill; in aiding and abetting in the aforementioned attacks by providing motor vehicles belonging to Gisovu Tea Factory, for the transport of attackers to Muyira hill and Mumataba hill; and in his participation in attacks on Tutsi civilians who had sought refuge in Nyakavumu cave, Gitwa hill and Rwirambo, renders the Accused individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.
950. The Chamber has already found that there existed at the time of the events alleged in the indictment a de jure superior-subordinate relationship between Musema and the employees at the Gisovu Tea Factory.(13) The Chamber also found that the Accused had the authority to take reasonable measures to prevent the use of Tea Factory vehicles, uniforms or other Tea Factory property in the commission of the attacks(14). The Chamber finds that the Accused, despite his knowledge of the participation of Gisovu Tea Factory employees in these attacks and their use of Tea Factory property in the commission of these attacks, failed to take any reasonable measures to prevent or punish such participation or such use of Tea Factory property.
951. The Chamber therefore finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema is individually criminally responsible for crime against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Articles 3(b), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, as charged in Count 5 of the Indictment.

6.4 Count 4: Crime against Humanity (murder)

952. Count 4 of the Indictment charges Musema with crime against humanity (murder), pursuant to Articles 3(a), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment.
953. The Chamber notes that the Accused is also charged, under count 5 of the Indictment, for crime against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Articles 3(b), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment, which acts include the attacks on civilians at various locations in Bisesero. The allegations in the aforementioned paragraphs of the Indictment also form the basis for Count 4, crimes against humanity (murder).
954. The Chamber concurs with the reasoning in Akayesu that:

"[...] it is acceptable to convict the accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did. However, the Chamber finds that it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where (a) one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, for example, murder and grievous bodily harm, robbery and theft, or rape and indecent assault; or (b) where one offence charges accomplice liability and the other offence charges liability as a principal, e.g. genocide and complicity in genocide."(15)

5865

955. The Chamber also concurs with the reasoning in the Rutaganda Judgement which states that:

"murder and extermination, as crimes against humanity, share the same constituent elements of the offence, that it is committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. Both murder and extermination are constituted by unlawful, intentional killing. However, murder is the killing of one or more individuals, whereas extermination is a crime which is directed against a group of individuals....."(16) (Emphasis added)

956. The Chamber notes that in the Akayesu Judgement, a series of acts of murder, as alleged in individual paragraphs of the Indictment were held collectively to constitute an act of extermination. In the Rutaganda Judgement a single act of an attack on the "ETO", although charged inter alia both as murder and as extermination, was held to constitute extermination, and not murder, because it was found to be a killing of a collective group of individuals.
957. In this case, the killings at Gitwa hill, Muyira hill, Rwirambo hill, Mumataba hill and at the Nyakavumu cave are killings of collective groups of individuals, hence constituting extermination and not murder. Therefore, the Accused cannot be held culpable for crime against humanity (murder), in respect of these killings. The Chamber recalls its findings in Section 6.3 above.
958. The Chamber therefore finds that Musema is not individually criminally responsible, for crime against humanity (murder), pursuant to Article 3(a), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, and as charged in Count 4 of the Indictment.

6.5 Count 6: Crime against Humanity (other inhumane acts)

959. Count 6 of the Indictment charges Musema with crime against humanity (other inhumane acts), pursuant to Articles 3(i), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment.
960. The Chamber has already defined "Other inhumane Acts", as envisaged in Article 3 of the Statute. (17)
961. The Chamber finds that the Prosecutor has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema is individually criminally responsible for any act, falling within the ambit of crime against humanity (other inhumane acts), pursuant to Articles 3(i), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, as charged in Count 6 of the Indictment.

6.6 Count 7: Crime Against Humanity (rape)

962. Count 7 of the Indictment charges Musema with crime against humanity (rape), pursuant to Articles 3(g), 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 4.1 to 4.11 of the Indictment.
963. In light of its factual findings with regard to the allegations in paragraph 4.10 of the Indictment (18), the Chamber considers the criminal responsibility of the Accused, pursuant to Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute.
964. The Chamber notes that the Defence has made certain admissions inter alia: that the Tutsi were a racial or ethnic group; that there were widespread or systematic attacks through out Rwanda, between the period 1 January and 31 December 1994 and these attacks were directed against civilians on the grounds of ethnic affiliation and racial origin. The Chamber finds that the Prosecutor is discharged of the burden of proving these elements in respect of crime against humanity (rape).

5866

965. The Chamber has adopted the definition of rape set forth in the Akayesu Judgement, as "a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive"(19) and the definition of sexual violence set forth in the Akayesu Judgement as "any act of a sexual nature which is committed on a person under circumstances which are coercive."(20)
966. The Chamber has made the factual finding that on 13 May 1994 the Accused raped a Tutsi woman called Nyiramusugi. The Chamber recalls its finding in Section 6.3 supra, that the Accused had knowledge of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population. The Chamber finds that the rape of Nyiramusugi by the Accused was consistent with the pattern of this attack and formed a part of this attack.
967. The Chamber therefore finds, that Musema is individually criminally responsible for crime against humanity (rape), pursuant to Articles 3(g) and (6)(1) of the Statute.
968. However, the Chamber finds, that the Prosecutor has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt any act of rape that had been committed by Musema's subordinates and that Musema knew or had reason to know of this act and he failed to take reasonable measures to prevent the said act or to punish the perpetrators thereof, following the commission of such act. The Prosecutor has therefore not proved beyond a reasonable the individual criminal responsibility of Musema, pursuant to Articles 3(g) and 6(3) of the Statute, as charged in Count 7 of the Indictment.

6.7 Counts 8 and 9 -Violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

969. Counts 8 and 9 of the Indictment charge Musema with serious violations of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the 1977 Additional Protocol II thereto, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal.
970. The Chamber notes that the Defence admitted that, at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, there existed an internal armed conflict meeting the temporal and territorial requirements of both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. Further, evidence presented during the trial, in particular the testimony of Musema, demonstrated the full extent of the conflict between the dissident armed forces, the FPR, and the Government forces, the FAR, in Rwanda throughout the period the offences were said to have been perpetrated.
971. On the basis of the above, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment there existed a non-international armed conflict meeting the requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II.
972. The Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims of the offences alleged, comprised of unarmed civilians, men, women and children, are protected persons under Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. Moreover, the Chamber notes that the Defence admitted that the victims of the alleged crimes were individuals protected under Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II.
973. The Chamber recalls, as developed in Section 3.4 of the Judgement on the Applicable Law, that offences must be closely related to the hostilities or committed in conjunction with the armed conflict to constitute serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. In other words, there must be a nexus between the offences and the armed conflict.
974. The burden rests on the Prosecutor to establish, on the basis of the evidence adduced during trial, that there exists a nexus, on the one hand, between the acts for which Musema is individually criminally responsible, including those for which he is individually criminally responsible as a superior, and, on the other, the armed conflict. In the opinion of the Chamber, the Prosecutor has failed to establish that there was such a nexus.

975. Consequently, the Chamber finds Musema not guilty of serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II as charged in Counts 8 and 9 of the Indictment.

---

1. See section 5.2 of the Judgement.

2. See Section 4.1.of the Judgement..

3. See Section 3.2.3 of this Judgement.

4. See Supra Section 5.2.

5. See Supra Section 5.2.

6. See Supra Section 5.2.

7. See Supra Section 5.2.

8. See Testimony of the Accused, transcript of 24 May 1999. English translation: "considering the killings that were taking place inside the country there was this genocide which had been committed, and which was being committed".

9. See Testimony of the Accused, transcript of 24 May 1999. English translation: "people were massacred in Kibuye and other Prefectures ...".

10. See Testimony of the Accused, transcript of 24 May 1999. English translation: "Babies, elderly women, children who died, who were massacred by butchers. They were butchered."

11. See Defence exhibit D36. English translation: " Since 06/04, the country has been living through an incredible blood bath: ethnic unrests - massacres - thefts - all that can or rather all that cannot be imagined at the level of human horror ... Runegeri is more or less affected. But Byumba is 100% affected ... It is estimated that about hundred of thousands of people [sic] have been killed ... Thousands and thousands of displaced people, how dreadful in addition to the thousands of corpses!"

12. See Defence exhibit D76. "At the level of human rights, the massacres have been halted in the Government zone but still to continue in the FPR zone. Humanitarian assistance is expected but has not arrived". [Unofficial translation]

13. See Supra Section 5.4.

14. See Supra Section 5.4.

15. See Akayesu Judgement, para. 468.

16. See Rutaganda Judgement, para.422.

17. See Supra Section 3.3.

18. See Supra Section 5.3.

19. See Supra, Section 3.3.

20. See Supra, Section 3.3.

5868

7. VERDICT

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, having considered all of the evidence and the arguments, THE CHAMBER finds Alfred Musema-Uwimana:

Count 1: Guilty of Genocide

Count 2: Not Guilty of Complicity in Genocide

Count 3: Not Guilty of Conspiracy to commit Genocide

Count 4: Not Guilty of Crime against Humanity (murder)

Count 5: Guilty of Crime against Humanity (extermination)

Count 6: Not Guilty of Crime against Humanity (other inhumane acts)

Count 7: Guilty of Crime against Humanity (rape)

Count 8: Not Guilty of Violation of Common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II thereto (Article 4 (a) of the Statute)

Count 9: Not Guilty of Violation of Common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II thereto (4 (e) of the Statute)

5869

8. SENTENCING

976. The Chamber will now summarize the legal provisions relating to sentences and penalties and their enforcement, before discussing the scale of sentences and the general principles applicable in the determination of penalties.

8.1 Applicable texts

977. The Chamber will apply the following statutory and regulatory provisions: Article 22 of the Statute on judgement, Articles 23 and 26 of the Statute dealing respectively with penalties and enforcement of sentences, and Rules 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Rules covering, respectively, sentencing procedure upon a conviction, status of the convicted person, and place and supervision of imprisonment.

8.2 Scale of sentences applicable to an accused convicted of one of the crimes listed in Articles 2, 3, or 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal

978. The Tribunal may sentence an accused who pleads guilty or is convicted to imprisonment for a fixed term or the remainder of his life. The Statute of the Tribunal does not allow for other forms of punishment, such as the death penalty, penal servitude or a fine.
979. In most national systems the scale of penalties is determined in accordance with the gravity of the offence. The Chamber notes that the Statute of the Tribunal does not rank the various crimes within the Tribunal's jurisdiction. The same scale of sentences applies to each of the crimes, with the maximum penalty being life imprisonment.
980. It should be noted, however, that in imposing a sentence, the Chamber should take into account, as one of the factors specified in Article 23(2) of the Statute, the gravity of the offence. In the opinion of the Chamber, it is difficult to rank the gravity of genocide and crime against humanity relative to each other. Both genocide and crime against humanity are crimes which are particularly shocking to the collective conscience.
981. Regarding the crime of genocide, the preamble of the Genocide Convention recognizes that at all periods of history, genocide has inflicted great losses on humanity and reiterates the need for international co-operation to liberate humanity from such an odious scourge. The crime of genocide is unique because of its element of dolus specialis (special intent) which requires that the crime be committed with the intent "to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such", as stipulated in Article 2 of the Statute. The Chamber is thus of the opinion that genocide constitutes the "crime of crimes", and that this must be taken into account in deciding the sentence.
982. Crime against humanity must also be punished appropriately, duly recognizing their gravity. Article 27 of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal empowered that Tribunal to sentence any accused found guilty of crimes against humanity, as defined in Article 6(c) of the said Charter, to death or other punishment deemed to be just.
983. Rwanda, like all the States that have incorporated crime against humanity or genocide in their domestic legislation, provides the most severe penalties for these crimes in its criminal legislation. The Rwandan Organic Law on the Organization of Prosecutions for Offences constituting Genocide or Crimes against Humanity, committed since 1 October 1990,(1) groups accused persons into four categories, according to their acts of criminal participation. Included in the first category are the masterminds of the crimes (planners, organizers), persons in positions of authority, persons who have exhibited excessive cruelty and perpetrators of sexual violence. All such persons may be punished by the death penalty. The second category covers perpetrators, conspirators or accomplices in criminal acts, for whom the prescribed penalty is life imprisonment. Included in the third category are persons who, in addition to committing a substantive offence, are guilty of other serious assaults against the person. Such persons face a short-term imprisonment. The fourth category is that of persons who have committed offences against property.

5870.

984. Reference to the practice of sentencing in Rwanda and to the Organic Law is for purposes of guidance. While referring as much as practicable to such practice, the Chamber maintains its discretion to pass on persons found guilty of crimes within the Tribunal's jurisdiction any sentence authorized by the Statute, taking into account the circumstances of the case and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

8.3 General principles regarding the determination of sentences

985. In determining the sentence, the Chamber shall be mindful of the fact that the Security Council, acting under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, established the Tribunal to prosecute and punish perpetrators of genocide and serious violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda in 1994 with a view of ending impunity, promoting national reconciliation, and restoring peace.

986. The penalties imposed by this Tribunal must be directed at retribution, so that the convicted perpetrators see their crimes punished, and, over and above that, at deterrence, to dissuade for ever others who may be tempted to commit atrocities by showing them that the international community does not tolerate serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.

987. The Chamber also recalls that in the determination of sentences it is required, under Article 23(2) of the Statute and Rule 101(B) of the Rules, to take into account a number of factors including the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the convicted person, and the existence of aggravating and mitigating circumstances. It is a matter, as it were, of individualizing the penalty.

988. In individualizing the penalty, the Chamber is not limited to consideration of the factors enumerated above. The Judges may consider any factor or fact that will enable the penalty to reflect the totality of the circumstances present in the given case and thus to ensure justice in sentencing.

989. Finally, the Chamber recalls that nothing in the Statute or the Rules requires a separate penalty for each proven count. In other words, the Chamber may impose one penalty for all the counts on which the accused has been found guilty.

8.4 Submissions of the Parties

Prosecutor's submissions

990. In her closing brief and in her closing argument made in open court on 24 June 1999, the Prosecutor submitted that the crimes committed by Musema, in particular genocide and crime against humanity, are crimes of extreme gravity. She submitted that the Chamber should take into account the status of Musema in society at the time of the commission of the crimes, including his resulting duty vis-à-vis the population; his individual role in the execution of the crimes; his motivation and his goals, as well as the extent of planning and premeditation; his disposition and will in regard to the criminal acts and the extent of behaving in a manner contrary to his duty; the way the crimes were executed; and his behaviour after the criminal acts.

991. The Prosecutor submitted that the following aggravating circumstances should be taken into account in this case:

1. Musema was known in society;

5871

2. His criminal participation extended to all levels;

3. He was committed to the genocidal program of the interim government. At the same time, he seized the occasion to promote his personal ambitions;

4. He abused his position as Director of a parastatal company by diverting workers and property to further unlawful acts;

5. The way the crimes were committed;

6. After the criminal acts, Musema did nothing to punish the perpetrators. Indeed, he was one of the main perpetrators;

7. He lied before the Chamber when dealing with the defence of alibi; and

8. He showed no remorse whatsoever with respect to the role he played in the commission of the unlawful acts.

992. Furthermore, the Prosecutor submitted that there are no mitigating circumstances. Musema did not co-operate with the Prosecutor. Nor has he shown that in committing the unlawful acts he was following orders.
993. With regard to the issue of multiple sentences which could be imposed on Musema as envisaged by Rule 101(c) of the Rules, the Prosecutor asked for a separate sentence for each of the counts on which Musema was found guilty while requesting that he serve the more severe sentence. The Prosecutor submitted that the Chamber should impose a sentence for each offence committed in order to fully recognise the severity of each crime and the particular role of the convicted person in its commission.
994. In conclusion, the Prosecutor recommended life imprisonment for each count on which Musema is convicted.

Defence's submissions

995. In its closing argument, the Defence submitted that the Prosecutor failed to prove Musema's guilt and that Musema should be set free.
996. The Defence further submitted that Musema deeply regrets that factory facilities may have been used by the perpetrators of atrocities and that he was unable to prevent this.
997. Moreover, it was submitted that Musema admitted publicly the genocide against the Tutsi people in Rwanda in 1994 and that he publicly expressed his distress about the deaths of so many innocent people and that he paid tribute to all victims of the tragic events which took place in Rwanda.
998. Finally, the Defence underlined that Musema co-operated with the Prosecutor by admitting facts to facilitate an expedient prosecution and trial.

8.5 Personal circumstances of Alfred Musema

999. Musema was born in 1949. At the age of 35, Musema was appointed Director of the Gisovu Tea Factory by a presidential decree and he continued to serve in that capacity during April, May, and June 1994. The Gisovu Tea Factory was one of the most successful tea factories in Rwanda and it was a major economic enterprise in Kibuye. As Director of the factory, Musema exercised legal and financial control over its employees.

5872

8.6 The Chamber

000. The Chamber has examined all the submissions presented by the parties in determination of the sentence, and finds as follows.

Aggravating circumstances

001. Amongst the aggravating circumstances, the Chamber finds, first of all, that the offences of which Musema is found guilty are extremely serious, as the Chamber already pointed out when it described genocide as the 'crime of crimes'.
002. As to Musema's role in the execution of the crimes, the Chamber notes that he led attackers who killed a large number of Tutsi refugees in the Bisesero region on 26 and between 27 April and 3 May 1994, in mid-May 1994, including on 13 and 14 May, and at the end of May 1994. Musema was armed with a rifle and used the weapon during the attacks. He took no steps to prevent tea factory employees or vehicles from taking part in the attacks.
003. The Chamber recalls that it found that individuals perceived Musema as a figure of authority and as someone who wielded considerable power in the region. The Chamber is of the opinion that, by virtue of this capacity, Musema was in a position to take reasonable measures to help in the prevention of crimes.
004. The Chamber however finds that Musema did nothing to prevent the commission of the crimes and that he took no steps to punish the perpetrators over whom he had control. As the Chamber found in Section 5, Musema had powers enabling him to remove, or threaten to remove, an individual from his or her position at the Gisovu Tea Factory if he or she were identified as a perpetrator of crimes punishable under the Statute.

Mitigating circumstances

005. The Chamber, amongst the mitigating circumstances, takes into consideration that Musema admitted the genocide against the Tutsi people in Rwanda in 1994, expressed his distress about the deaths of so many innocent people, and paid tribute to all victims of the tragic events in Rwanda.
006. Additionally, the Chamber notes that Musema expressed deep regret that the Gisovu Tea Factory facilities may have been used by the perpetrators of atrocities.
007. Furthermore, the Chamber notes that Musema's co-operation through his admission of facts pertaining to the case, not the least the fact that a genocide occurred in the Bisesero region in April, May, and June 1994, facilitated an expeditious trial. Finally, the Chamber notes that Musema's co-operation continued throughout the trial and similarly contributed to proceedings without undue delay.

Conclusion

008. Having reviewed all the circumstances of the case, the Chamber is of the opinion that the aggravating factors outweigh the mitigating factors, especially as on several occasions Musema personally led attackers to attack large numbers of Tutsi refugees and raped a young Tutsi woman. He knowingly and consciously participated in the commission of crimes and never showed remorse for his personal role in the atrocities.

TRIAL CHAMBER I

5873

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS,

DELIVERING its decision in public, inter partes and in the first instance;

PURSUANT to Articles 22, 23, and 26 of the Statute and Rules 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Rules;

NOTING the general practice regarding sentencing in Rwanda;

NOTING that Musema has been found guilty of:

Genocide - Count 1,

Crime against humanity (extermination) - Count 5, and Crime against humanity (rape) - Count 7;

NOTING the closing briefs submitted by the Prosecutor and the Defence; and

HAVING HEARD the Prosecutor and the Defence;

IN PUNISHMENT OF THE ABOVE MENTIONED CRIMES,

SENTENCES Alfred Musema to:

A SINGLE SENTENCE OF LIFE IMPRISONMENT

FOR ALL THE COUNTS ON WHICH HE HAS BEEN FOUND GUILTY

RULES that the imprisonment shall be served in a State designated by the President of the Tribunal in consultation with the Trial Chamber; the Government of Rwanda and the designated State shall be notified of such designation by the Registrar;

RULES that this Judgement shall be enforced immediately, and that, however:

1. until his transfer to the designated place of imprisonment, Alfred Musema shall be kept in detention under the present conditions;

2. upon notice of appeal, if any, the enforcement of the sentence shall be stayed until a decision has been rendered on the appeal, with Musema nevertheless remaining in detention.

Judge Aspegren and Judge Pillay append their Separate Opinions to this Judgement.

Arusha, 27 January 2000.

Lennart Aspegren Laïty Kama Navanethem Pillay

Presiding Judge Judge Judge

(Seal of the Tribunal)

5874

1. Organic Law No. 8/96 of 30 August 1996, published in the Gazette of the Republic of Rwanda, 35th year. No. 17, 1 September 1996.

5875

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE LENNART ASPEGREN

As to the factual findings:

1. I agree and share the factual findings by the Trial Chamber in its Judgement with the exception of certain findings which I am not able to support, namely:

   •those in Section 5.2 of the Judgement relating to events which are said to have occurred on 26 April 1994 at Gitwa hill, between 27 April and 3 May 1994 on Rwirambo hill, and at the end of May 1994 at Nyakavumu cave; and

   •those in Section 5.3 of the Judgement relating to events which are said to have occurred on 14 April 1994 (paragraph 4.8 of the Indictment).

2. For these dates and events, I remain unconvinced that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the events as alleged.
3. Below is the reasoning behind this partially dissenting position of mine.
4. Reference should of course be made to the relevant facts and presentation of the alibi as developed in said Sections 5.2 and 5.3 of the Judgement.

26 April 1994, Gitwa hill

5. As noted in the Judgement, the alibi of Musema is not specific to 26 April 1994, but is linked with the mission order (exhibit D10, Annex B to the Judgement) and the travel consequent thereto. I agree with the facts set forth below, as presented in the Judgement, but dissent on the rejection of the alibi for 26 April. Rather, it is my opinion that the alibi here stands.
6. I recall, as stated in the Judgement, that the Defence purports that on 18 April 1994, Musema, while searching for the heads of service of OCIR-thé in Gitarama, had run into the Minister of Industry, Trade & Handicraft, Justin Mugenzi. Having conveyed to Musema his concerns for the Gisovu Tea Factory, the Minister indicated that Musema would be sent on mission to contact the Director-General of OCIR-thé to start up the factories.
7. According to the alibi, Musema, who during this period was staying in Rubona, returned to Gitarama on 21 April 1994 where again he ran into Justin Mugenzi and also the Minister of Public Works, Water & Energy, this time at a FINA petrol station. Mugenzi told Musema of the security measures he had taken for the factory, and informed him that he had been unable to contact the Director-General of OCIR-thé, Baragaza. As such, Musema was to go to the North of the country to find him. Mugenzi said he himself would prepare the necessary paperwork which Musema should pick up from the residence of Faustin Nyagahima, a director within the Ministry of Industry, Trade & Handicraft. During the meeting at the FINA station, Mugenzi authorized the Public Works, Water & Energy Minister to sign the eventual mission order.
8. On 22 April, Musema said, he picked up the mission order (exhibit D10) from Faustin Nyagahima. This order was stamped by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, according to Musema, was the only minister at that time in Gitarama to possess an official stamp. For security reasons, Musema was given two gendarmes from the military camp in Gitarama to accompany him and then travelled up to the tea factory of Pfunda where he stayed until 25 April. With reference to the said exhibit D10, where Musema wrote "arrivée à Pfunda le 21/04/1994", he attributed this date to an error, and affirmed that he arrived at the factory in Pfunda on 22 April. Evidence in support of this include exhibit D28, a "Déclaration de Créances" for expenses incurred by OCIR-thé (Gisovu Tea Factory) for the use of two gendarmes from 22 April 1994 up to 2 May 1994, which is signed by the factory's Chief Accountant of the Gisovu Tea Factory.

5876

9. Although he only visited the Pfunda Tea Factory during this part of his mission, Musema stated that he was able to include the tea factories of Nyabihu and Rubaya in his interim report (exhibit D29), having met the respective directors during the trip. I note, at this juncture, that the Defence uncovered this report in the Gisovu Tea Factory archives.
10. According to the alibi, on 25 April Musema returned to Gitarama after meeting at Mukamara the Director-General of OCIR-thé, who read the interim report and confirmed that Musema could continue his mission. Having stayed overnight in Gitarama, Musema travelled on to Rubona.
11. Defence Witness Claire Kayuku, Musema's spouse, confirmed that he left Rubona on 22 April for Gisenyi and on 26 April returned to Rubona where he stayed overnight.
12. I have also considered the contentions of the Prosecutor that the mission order was false and that the stamps of the ministries were fabrications. She contends that chance encounters with ministers, as described by Musema, were hardly convincing as the basis of the mission. In the Prosecutor's opinion, the mission order was designed simply to mislead the Tribunal and to conceal the extent of Musema's involvement in the massacres. The Prosecutor further contends that the interim report was strikingly thin considering the apparent nature of the mission. Moreover, Prosecution Witness BB stated that the mission order was unusual, and not one normally used by OCIR-thé.
13. I have specifically considered the issue of the alleged falsification by Musema of the mission order so as to camouflage his participation in the massacres.
14. In my view, it should be recalled, first and foremost, that this document, exhibit D10, was uncovered by the Swiss investigating magistrate while in Rwanda, and was thus afterwards brought to the attention of Musema while he was under arrest in Switzerland. As such, until it was appropriately disclosed, whether it be by the Swiss authorities or the Prosecutor, Musema did not have possession of it.
15. With this in mind, as regards the issue of alleged falsification, as addressed by the Prosecutor, I thus find it hard to see why, had Musema taken the time and care meticulously to create a false mission order in 1994 in Rwanda before fleeing abroad, he would have abandoned the document, a document which he must have deemed essential to his alibi in case of a possible investigation or trial concerning the events. Surely, were the mission order falsified to create such an alibi, Musema would most probably have seen to it that it was not left behind at the end of the conflict in Gisovu, especially in view of the advancing war front, and the uncertain fate of the Gisovu Tea Factory.
16. As pertains to the allegedly unconvincing nature of Musema's chance encounters with the ministers in Gitarama, I note that the prevailing circumstances during this period were far from normal. Indeed, evidence has shown that, around 18 April 1994 in Rwanda, an armed conflict was raging between the FAR and the FPR, widespread massacres of civilians were occurring, thousands of civilians were displaced, and the interim government was fleeing Kigali to seek temporary refuge in Gitarama. Consequently, it is my opinion that, in these circumstances, such chance encounters with ministers in Gitarama cannot be ruled out or deemed unconvincing per se.
17. As such, I find that the arguments advanced by the Prosecutor in support of the allegation that the mission order was a fake are insufficient to demonstrate that Musema purposefully falsified this order to conceal for the future his involvement in the 1994 massacres.
18. During Musema's testimony, he also dealt with the other issues pertaining in the main to the plausibility of such a mission. He explained that the prevailing circumstances, namely the insecurity caused by the armed conflict and the displacement of the interim government to Gitarama, would account for stamps of ministries other than that governing OCIR-thé appearing on the mission order.
19. I note that, although Musema included the Nyahibu and Rubaya tea factories in his interim report, yet did not visit them in person, he did meet and discuss these factories with the respective

5877

Director. It was on the basis of these discussions that Musema compiled this report. The contentions of the Prosecutor that the report is not derived from information gathered by Musema during his mission and is "strikingly thin" compared to the importance of the mission are, as I see it, unsubstantiated by evidence within the trial. It should be recalled that Musema had explained that this was just an interim report covering the initial stages of his mission, and that it did not even represent the "half-way" stage of his mission. Moreover, the argument of the Prosecutor that the report could have been written anywhere is similarly unsubstantiated during trial.

20. The Defence Witness Claire Kayuku, although married to Musema, appeared credible during her testimony, and testified that Musema returned to Rubona on 26 April.
21. This supports his alibi.
22. I agree with the majority as regards the testimony of Witness M. However, I do not share the majority position that the alibi should be rejected on this point. Rather, I am of the opinion that the alibi of Musema for these dates, which was heavily scrutinized during the trial and supported by documentary evidence and oral testimony, is such as to at least cast a reasonable doubt on the allegation of the Prosecutor as to the involvement of Musema in the attack of 26 April 1994 on Gitwa hill.

•27 April - 3 May, Rwirambo hill

23. Like the majority, I have considered the testimony of Witness R and the arguments of the Defence as to the discrepancies and the answers of the witness thereon between the witness' testimony in this case and his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case. However, unlike the majority, I find the evidence of Witness R must be considered to be unreliable and to cast doubt in the present matter.
24. There, of particular concern to me are the discrepancies which relate to Witness R's injuries and the treatment he received for them. I recall that R had indicated to the Chamber that as he had been unable to get hospital treatment, a benefactor put cow butter on his injury. However, this contrasts with his testimony as a witness in the Kayishema and Ruzindana case, where, in answer to a question from Judge Khan, he stated: "At that time the situation was not yet too serious and one could find one or two Hutus who were kind hearted and one could give them money for the purchase of penicillin". R had also testified that he had been treated in Rwirambo.
25. Yet, during the course of his testimony in this trial, Witness R denied having ever said anything about going to Rwirambo, it being impossible to reach Rwirambo hospital as there were barriers. He was able to recall before the Chamber that he did speak about penicillin as regards to serious injuries and that some individuals were able to find ways of getting this medicine. Following more questions from the Defence and the Chamber, he added that he did apply penicillin to his injury much later when his injury had scarred, but that he had never gone to a Hutu to ask for penicillin.
26. Although the divergent answers given by Witness R during his testimonies are not specific to the involvement of Musema in the attack, they touch upon serious matters and represent discrepant answers given under solemn declaration before this Tribunal. By their very nature therefore, their reliability should be equivalent, and discrepancies between such testimonies in my view must affect the credibility of the witness. Consequently, I am of the opinion that the contradictions raised by the Defence are serious and important enough to cast doubt on R's credibility in the present matter and that he is not, therefore, reliable enough.
27. I therefore find that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in an attack on Rwirambo hill around 27 April - 3 May 1994.

•End of May attack at Nyakavumu cave

28. Like the majority, I have considered the testimonies of Prosecution Witnesses H, S, D, AC and AB, and Musema's and Claire Kayuku's testimonies, as well as documentary evidence in support of the alibi. However, unlike the majority, I cannot find that it has been proven beyond reasonable doubt that Musema participated in the attack on Nyakavumu cave.

29. My reasons follow.
30. Witness H speaks of the attack occurring around the end of May or early June, Witness S testifies to it taking place near the end of May, while Witnesses D and AC make no specific mention of dates in their testimony. Witness AB stated that Musema came to the Kibuye military camp asking for firewood sometime in June.
31. The alibi places Musema in Gisovu on 27 and 28 May 1994, leaving for Shagasha on 29 May. According to the alibi, on 31 May he visited Zaïre as part of a technical mission. Copies of his passport were tendered in support thereof. His absence from the Gisovu tea factory lasted until 10 June 1994. It should be noted that all these dates are corroborated by exhibit P68, being Musema's handwritten calendar (Annex C to the Judgement).
32. The majority finding in the Judgement is based on the overwhelming consistent evidence of the Prosecution witnesses. The fact that the exact date of the attack is not clear from the said evidence, does not, in the opinion of the majority, deter from the reliability of the evidence. The alibi, in its opinion, does not refute this evidence.
33. I have to disagree. The witnesses, as I have indicated above, speak in turn of the 'end of May', 'early June' and 'sometime in June' as the possible time of the attack. One could, therefore, logically imply therefrom that the attack would have occurred on any date between the end of May and the end of June. Of course, I agree, in view of the prevailing situation in the Bisesero region during the events alleged, the likely trauma suffered by witnesses to the events, and the time lapse between the events and testimony thereon before this Tribunal, that it may be harder than usual for the witnesses to remember dates from five years ago with exactitude. Even though the evidence presented by these witnesses, is, I concede, consistent, there remains the fact that doubt prevails in the matter, inasmuch as it cannot be adduced with more precision when the attack occurred.
34. To state that the attack has taken place, and merely place it in a loose temporal setting, cannot be considered as removing doubt from the matter, and consequently, it my opinion, shall not be the basis of a finding of guilt, proved beyond reasonable doubt. Moreover, as in all cases, the burden being on the Prosecutor to prove the facts alleged, a lack of specificity in such a serious matter should not be of prejudice to the Defence. As the alibi stands from the end of May to early June, to find the events proved beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of consistent witness testimonies as to the events and yet, not as to time, is to place the burden of proof on the Defence. Moreover, an inability to be more precise as to the date of the attack in this instance does not allow Musema to adequately answer the relevant charges against him.
35. Therefore, I find that Musema's participation in the attack on Nyakavunu cave is not established beyond reasonable doubt.

•Annunciata Mujawayezu, 14 April 1994

36. I agree with the Chamber's majority that it has not been proven that on 14 April 1994, Annunciata Mujawayesu was raped or that Musema ordered that she be killed together with her son, Blaise.
37. However, the majority is convinced that the rape was ordered by Musema. In my view, this was not proven.
38. The main evidence on the raping comes from witness I, whose testimony was partially inconsistent, and to some extent contradicted by witnesses L and PP.
39. In my mind, these inconsistencies and contradictions cast doubt on witness I's testimony.
40. Therefore, I am not convinced, beyond reasonable doubt, by the evidence presented that on 14 April 1994, Musema, as alleged in paragraph 4.8 of the Indictment, ordered or encouraged the raping of Annunciata Mujawayezu.

As to the legal findings, verdict and sentencing:

5979

41. I concur with the legal findings in the Judgement (Section 6) to the extent they pertain to the acts other than those above.
42. Concerning the alleged rape of Annunciata Mujaweyezu on 14 April 1994, as just pointed out, the majority in its factual findings found it proved that Musema ordered the rape. On this point, as I have stated, I disagree, since I am not convinced that he did.
43. Being overruled in this matter, I join the majority in its legal findings on this point in Section 6.1 of the Judgement, to say, in short, that the order as such is not punishable.
44. I also agree with the majority's findings of guilt in the Judgement to the extent they pertain to the acts other than those above. Being partially overruled as to the factual and legal findings, I concur with the verdict (Section 7) and the sentence (Section 8).

Arusha, 27 January 2000,

Lennart Aspegren

Presiding Judge

(Seal of the Tribunal)

5880

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE NAVANETHEM PILLAY

The judgement is unanimous with the exception of the partial dissents on factual findings that have been recorded.

1. I dissent with the factual finding of the majority in respect of the evidence presented in support of the allegations in paragraph 4.7 of the Indictment, in particular that the Accused encouraged the killing of Tutsis and the rape of Tutsi women at a meeting on 18 April 1994 and that following the meeting he participated in an attack of Tutsis, by securing weapons and ammunition for the attack.
2. My approach to the examination of the defence alibi presented by the Accused is at variance with the majority, even though the conclusions reached with regard to the other allegations in the Indictment are the same. For this reason, I am recording a separate opinion.
3. Evidence of an albi was tendered by the Accused and other Defence witnesses. I have assessed the evidence of alibi presented at trial as a whole, rather than on a piece meal, or a day by day basis. My assessment depends on the credibility findings I have made with regard to each witness, and the extent to which any documentary or other additional evidence presented supports or undermines their testimony.

4. In my view, once the credibility of a witness has been impaired, the testimony of that witness is inherently unreliable in all of its parts, unless it is independently corroborated. Similarly, once the Chamber has made a finding of credibility with respect to a witness, the testimony of that witness should be accepted, unless there is a compelling reason to find otherwise.
5. As set forth in the Judgement, the evidence given by the Prosecution witnesses has been evaluated and findings of credibility have been made with regard to each witness. The witnesses who testified specifically in relation to the allegations regarding events at Karongi Hill on 18 April are Witness M (for the Prosecution), and the Accused, and Claire Kayuku, the wife of the Accused (for the Defence).

   6. The Chamber has reviewed the evidence presented by Witness M and found Witness M to be a credible witness. Witness M testified that he heard the Accused make a statement at the meeting held on Karongi Hill on 18 April 1994 in which he encouraged those present to kill Tutsis and stated that "those who wanted to have fun could rape their women and their children." Subsequently, according to the testimony, the Accused ordered a guard to hand over rifles and ammunition for an attack on Tutsi refugees. Witness M also saw his cousin and niece being raped by five men, two of whom he recognized as having attended the meeting.

   7. The majority has in effect rejected this evidence on the grounds that they accept the alibi of the Accused with respect to 18 April 1994. The Accused testified that on 18 April he was in Gitarama, and the Defence argued that therefore he could not have been at the meeting on Karongi hill or the subsequent attack. Claire Kayuku, the Accused's wife, recalled in her testimony that the Accused went to Gitarama during this period but could not recall the exact date. Without specificity regarding dates, the testimony of Claire Kayuku, in my view, does not corroborate the alibi of the Accused.

   8. Having found that the Accused is not a credible witness for the reasons set forth below, I cannot accept his uncorroborated testimony, as the Majority does, when it directly conflicts with the testimony of Witness M, whom the Chamber has found to be credible. The Majority finds that with regard to the meeting at Karongi Hill, the sole testimony of Witness M is insufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused was present. The majority further states that with regard to the rapes about which Witness M testified, "there is no evidence that Musema ordered the rapes."

5881

9. Witness M, who the Chamber unanimously declared to be credible, did provide compelling testimony consituting evidence that the Accused participated in the Karongi meeting and subsequent attack, that he instigated rape through the suggestion he made at the meeting that those who wanted to "have fun" could rape Tutsi women, and that two women were subsequently raped by two men who had attended the meeting.

10. I accept Witness M's testimony as a true account of events which took place on 18 April, and I reject the testimony of the Accused in presenting an alibi for this date on account of the following findings with regard to the alibi defence. The evidence of the Accused is so riddled with inconsistencies, as set forth below, that I do not consider his testimony, that he was in Gitarama on 18 April, which is not confirmed by any other witness or any other evidence, to raise reasonable doubt as to the credibility of the testimony of Witness M.

11. Witness M is the sole prosecution witness for both the 18 April and 26 April attacks. He was found to be credible by the Chamber. The Majority accepted Witness M's evidence and rejected the Accused's alibi and found that the Accused was present and participated in the 26 April attack. In respect of 18 April attack, the Majority accepted Witness M's evidence and also accepted the Accused's defence of alibi. In my view, without additional evidence with regard to either event, the testimony of Witness M cannot be rejected in one instance on the basis of testimony from the Accused and accepted in another instance despite testimony from the Accused.

12. For these reasons I disagree with the factual findings of the majority. I find that the Accused addressed a meeting on 18 April 1994, at which he encouraged the killing of Tutsi civilians and the raping of Tutsi women. I hold that these factual findings should be considered as cumulative evidence, when assessing the culpability of the Accused, in respect of the Counts which charge Genocide and Crimes against Humanity (extermination and rape).

The Alibi Defence

13. The Accused acknowledges his presence in Gisovu on 14 April but denies that he was present at Gisovu on 18 April, the date on which he is alleged to have addressed a meeting on Karonge hill FM Station and participated in the attack which ensued. He denies his presence in Gisovu on 13 and 14 May, the dates of the Muyira hill massacres, and he denies his presence at the entombment and asphyxiation of people in a cave at Nyakavumu at the end of May. He denies his presence in the region when there were attacks on 31 May and 5 June at Gishyita and on 22 June, the date of the attack on the Nyarutovu cellule.

14. There are a number of documents which are relevant to the alibi defence. Exhibit P54 is a record of an interview of the Accused by Swiss authorities on 11 Feb 1995. In this document, the Accused is recorded as having stated that he left Gisovu on the night of 15 to 16 April. Exhibit P56 is a record of an interview with Swiss authorities on 18 March 1995. In this document, the Accused is recorded as having said that he arrived at Gisovu on 14 April and left on 15 April at 0300. Exhibit P63 is a document written by the Accused, consisting of his notes for his asylum request to Swiss authorities. In these notes he says he left Gisovu on the night of 15 April 1994. Exhibit P68 is a hand written calendar drawn by the Accused, in which he indicates that he went to Butare from Gisovu on 15 April. The Accused testified, contrary to the documents cited above, that he left Gisovu on 17 April at 0300 and arrived in Butare at 0900 on the same day. His wife testified that he returned to their home in Butare on either 16 or 17 April.

5882

15. The handwritten calendar (Exhibit P68), further indicates that the Accused was on mission from 18 to 26 April. Exhibit D10, an ordre de mission, records that the date on which the mission commenced was 22 April. A handwritten notation by the Accused next to the first stamp, on page 2 of this document, records that he started the mission on 21 April 1994. The Accused testified that his date of departure on mission was 22 April. He explained his handwritten entry of 21 April on the ordre de mission as an error.

16. The Accused does not maintain that he remained in Butare throughout the period 17 to 22 April. He testified that he went to Gitarama on 18 April in the hope of meeting authorities and searching for relatives. He testified that he went again to Gitarama to look for relatives on 21 April. The Accused's wife, Claire Kayuku, testified that between 16 and 22 April the Accused went twice to Gitarama to see his family but she did not specify exact dates. There is no testimony to corroborate the Accused's testimony that he was in Gitarama on 18 April. According to Exhibit P68, the hand written calendar written by the Accused, he should have been on mission to the tea factories on 18 April. There is no tea factory in Gitarama. The Accused testified, under cross-examination, that when he prepared the calendar he was not in possession of documents collected by the Swiss magistrates and by his defence lawyers and that it was only upon sight of these documents that he could say with certainty on which dates his mission was effected.

17. With regard to the whereabouts of the Accused on 13 and 14 May, the Accused testified that he remained in Rubona from 7 to 19 May 1994 and was not in Gisovu during this period. According to Exhibit P68, the handwritten calendar made by the Accused, he was in Gisovu from 4 to 14 May 1994. According to the record of an interview with Swiss authorities which took place on 16 March 1995, the Accused again said he was in Gisovu during the week of 4 to 13 May 1994. His wife, Claire Kayuku, testified that she remembered that the Accused returned to Gisovu sometime around the middle of May to pay the tea factory employees. She recalled that at the beginning of May the motor vehicle used by the Accused (the red Pajero), was under repair at a garage in Butare for one or two weeks. The Accused testified that the Pajero, registration number A7171, developed mechanical problems on 7 May 1994 and he submitted exhibit D45, a request for payment of expenses for the vehicle's repair. The date of the request was 19 May 1994. There is also a petrol receipt in exhibit D45, for fuel purchased on 14 May in Gitarama for a Pajero, registration number A7171. This document, the Defence contends, places the Accused away from the scene of the massacres in Bisesero on 14 May, but it is inconsistent with his testimony that the vehicle was out of order from 7 May to 19 May and that he was only able to travel to Gisovu on 19 May following its repair. The Chamber also notes that the other receipt submitted with exhibit D45, an invoice for a vehicle part, is dated 19 April 1994.

18. Other than his wife, who was not sure of the exact dates, the only witness to corroborate the statement of the Accused that he was in Rubona, Butare on 13 and 14 May was Defence Witness MH, who testified that he saw the Accused in Rubona on 13 May. Witness MH testified that when he was fleeing from Gitarama to Burundi he stopped in Rubona for twenty minutes in the early afternoon of 13 May 1994. He said he saw and spoke with the Accused there at the house of his mother-in-law and then proceeded to Burundi where he arrived on the same day. His passport was produced with an entry stamp for Burundi on 13 May 1994. Witness MH also testified that the Accused came to see him in Gitarama on 10 May 1994.

5883

19. When asked on cross-examination how he knew the Accused, Witness MH was very vague and evasive, repeating several times that it is very difficult to explain how one comes to know people. He said that he knew the Accused through his family-in-law but insisted that he had no relationship with the family-in-law of the Accused. Then subsequently Witness MH testified that one of his brothers-in-law was married to someone from the Accused's wife's family and that the two families knew one another through marriage. Witness MG, the wife of Witness MH, testified that the Accused came to their house one time in May but that she did not remember the exact date. She described him as a friend and did not mention any family relationship. Neither the Accused nor his wife Claire Kayuku testified to having met Witness MH.

20. On direct examination, Witness MH stated, in response to a question as to whether he had seen the Accused in Gitarama, that he only saw him once, on 10 May. I note that it was only at the prompting of Defence counsel that Witness MH recalled that he saw the Accused again on 13 May, the day he left the country. Initially he testified simply that he left Gitarama for Burundi, saying subsequently that he had forgotten to mention his stop in Rubona where he saw the Accused. The Chamber notes that the cross-examination of Witness MH elicited further memory lapses. The witness testified on cross-examination that he did not remember the make or the color of the vehicle driven by the Accused on May 10th, when he came to Gitarama. The witness testified that he had last used his passport in 1994, when in fact it was evident from the document that it had been used in 1995.

21. On cross-examination, Witness MH testified that before moving to Gitarama he had lived with his wife in Remera. When confronted with her testimony that they lived in Kicukiro, the witness claimed that the area was called Remera Kicukiro. He was unable or unwilling to describe a major landmark near his house in Remera. He was resistant to the questions put to him and did not provide any information on this matter.

22. The manner in which Witness MH testified casts doubt on the credibility of his testimony. He appeared to be very uncomfortable and hesitant to answer questions relating to his relationship with the Accused and to provide details relating to his testimony. In some instances, he virtually refused to answer questions put to him, even relatively straightforward questions. Some of these questions, while undermining his credibility as a witness, did not go directly to the relevant substance of his testimony. Some of these questions, however, are material to the alibi defence, such as his relationship with the Accused and the reason he went to Rubona in the midst of his flight from the country. He is the only witness presented at trial who testified that he saw the Accused somewhere other than in Bisesero on 13 May. There is no defence testimony that the Accused was in Rubona specifically on the date of 14 May, other than that of the Accused.

23. The evidence of Witness MH that he saw the Accused in Rubona on 13 May cannot be accepted, based on his demeanor, his reluctance to answer questions forthrightly, and the many inconsistencies in his testimony. There is no corroboration of his account, even from testimony of the Accused.

24. I put to the Accused at trial, that momentous events like the massacre at Muyira on 13 and 14 May are such that one would remember where one was when they occurred, without having to consult a calendar. The Accused prepared his own handwritten calendar, meticulously shading in the dates of his movement, less than a year after these massacres took place. The Accused testified that he knew these massacres had occurred because he had heard about them on the radio and because they were discussed at a meeting at the Gisovu Tea Factory on 19 May. The Accused further testified that when he prepared the handwritten calendar, he believed it to be accurate.

5884

25. Having carefully considered the evidence of alibi presented by the Defence, I note the numerous inconsistencies between the testimony of the Accused, the Defence exhibits and p statements made by the Accused, which was tendered as evidence at the trial. These inconsistencies are material and go to the heart of the alibi defence, particularly in respect to the dates of his travel to and from Gisovu. Witness MH was the only witness, other than the Accused's wife, who testified in support of his alibi, and the Chamber does not accept the testimony of this witness.

26. The Accused relies heavily on the document referred to as Exhibit D10, the mission de ordre. The authenticity of this document is in question for numerous reasons. The circumstances, as described by the Accused, of both its issuance and the extension affixed to it, seem highly unlikely and give rise to many questions which have not been satisfactorily explained. The document purports to have been issued by the Minister of Industry and Commerce but it is signed by the Minister of Justice and was extended by the Minister of Defence. The extension is not dated, and all the dates of arrival and departure noted next to the stamps on the second page of the document, are, by the Accused's own admission, in his own handwriting. Moreover, the Accused stated in his testimony that the first entry dated 21 April is not accurate. For these reasons, I do not accept the document as corroborating evidence of the alibi. Moreover, even if Exhibit D10 were to be accepted, it would not support the alibi defence in that it does not contain evidence of his whereabouts on the 18 April, 13 or 14 May, and other dates on which the crimes are alleged to have been committed.

27. The Defence has argued that certain documents, such as receipts and correspondence, and even the Accused's delay in replying to correspondence, should be interpreted as supporting his defence of alibi. In my view, this evidence while it may in some cases be consistent with the alibi, is not probative. For example, the failure of the Accused to reply to correspondence received in May 1994 until June 1994 could be explained by his absence from the tea factory in Gisovu, or it could be explained in many other ways. Moreover, some of the documents presented by the Defence raise more questions than they answer. For example, the receipt for petrol purchased on 14 May 1994 for a Pajero motor vehicle, registration A7171, suggests that the vehicle was in use at that time, although the Accused testified that it had developed mechanical problems on 7 May and was under repair until 19 May 1994. His submission of a request for reimbursement that is dated 19 May is not evidence that he returned to the factory on 19 May, rather than before 19 May, nor is it evidence that he was not there on other dates.

28. Having already found, the testimony of Witness MH to be unreliable, for the reasons set forth above, I note that the only other witness who testified on behalf of the Defence, in support of the alibi, is the testimony of the Accused's wife, Claire Kayuku. The Accused also testified on his behalf. Claire Kayuku's testimony, in large measure does not specifically corroborate the account by the Accused of his whereabouts. For example, she testified that the vehicle was under repair in the first week of May and that the Accused went to Gisovu sometime in the middle of May to pay the tea factory workers. This evidence could as easily be interpreted to support the allegation that the Accused was in Gisovu on 13 and 14 May, when the massacres took place, as to support his claim that he only went to Gisovu on 19 May. Moreover, I note that Claire Kayuku's testimony is consistent with the handwritten calendar of the Accused, in which he places himself at Gisovu through 14 May.

29. In light of the above, I reject the alibi defence, as it is not supported by sufficient evidence to make it even possible to cast reasonable doubt on the other evidence the Chamber finds to be credible. In coming to this conclusion, I note the evidence presented by the Prosecution placing the Accused at the scenes of the crimes he is alleged to have committed. For example, ten witnesses testified that they saw the Accused at Muyira hill in mid-May. Witnesses S and H testified that they saw him in mid-May. Witnesses R and F saw him on the 13 and 14 May. Witnesses N and T saw him on 13 May, Witness D saw him on 14 May and Witness P saw his vehicle on the 13 May. The Chamber found these witnesses to be credible and to have corroborated each other's evidence.

5885

30. For these reasons, I reject the testimony of the Accused as inherently unreliable in its entirety.

31. With regard to the 31 May attack on Biyiniro hill, the Majority finds that the defence of alibi raised by the Accused casts a reasonable doubt on the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, although they find Witness E to be a "reliable witness", who was "consistent through out his testimony". Hence, the majority finds that the allegations in respect of the aforementioned attack have not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. I concur with this finding of the Majority. I have reached this conclusion for reasons different to those of the Majority. I am of the view that the alibi defence does not diminish the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, in respect of this allegation. However, I find that the testimony of Witness E does not provide sufficient evidence, with regard to the participation of the Accused in the 31 May attack on Biyiniro hill, to satisfy the required standard of proof. It is solely for this reason that I find that the Prosecutor has failed to prove her case beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Accused participated in the 31 May attack on Biyiniro hill attack.

32. With regard to the 5 June attack, near Muyira hill, the Majority finds that the defence of alibi raised by the Accused casts a reasonable doubt on the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, although they find Witness E to have been "consistent through out his testimony". I concur with this finding of the Majority. I have reached this conclusion however, for reasons different to those of the Majority. I am of the view that the alibi defence does not diminish the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, in respect of this allegation. However, I find that the testimony of Witness E does not provide sufficient evidence, with regard to the participation of the Accused in the 5 June attack, near Muyira hill, to satisfy the required standard of proof. It is solely for this reason that I find that the Prosecutor has failed to prove her case beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused participated in the 5 June attack near Muyira hill.

33. With regard to the 22 June attack in Nyarutovu cellule, the Majority finds that the defence of alibi, "documentary evidence and oral testimony" presented by the Defence, cast a reasonable doubt on the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, although they find Witness P to have given "consistent evidence". I concur with the finding of the Majority that allegations in respect of the aforementioned attack have not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. I have reached this conclusion for reasons different to those of Majority. I am of the view that the alibi defence does not diminish the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, in respect of this allegation. However, I find that the testimony of Witness P does not provide sufficient evidence, with regard to the participation of the Accused in the 22 June attack, to satisfy the required standard of proof. I therefore find that the Prosecutor has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused participated in the 28 June attack in Nyarutovu cellule.

Done in English and French, the English being authoritative.

Arusha, 27 January 2000

5886

Navanethem Pillay

Judge

(Seal of the Tribunal)

5887

ANNEX 12:

Polyukhovich v. Commonwealth (1991) 172 CLR 501.

5889

High Court of Australia

POLYUKHOVICH v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA AND ANOTHER (1991) 172 CLR 501 F.C. 91/026

Constitutional Law (Cth)

COURT
High Court of Australia
Mason C.J.(1), Brennan(2), Deane(3), Dawson(4), Toohey(5), Gaudron(6) and McHugh(7) JJ.
HRNG
Canberra, 1990, September 3-5; November 9;
1991, August 14. #DATE 14:8:1991
JUDGE1
MASON C.J. The plaintiff is an Australian citizen and a resident of South Australia. He brought an action in this Court seeking a declaration that the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (Cth) is invalid and, or in the alternative, a declaration that ss.6(1), 6(3), 7, 9 and 11 of the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) as amended ("the Act") are invalid. The plaintiff's interest in seeking declaratory relief of this kind arises from the circumstance that the second defendant laid an information against the plaintiff alleging that, between 1 September 1942 and 31 May 1943, the plaintiff committed war crimes in the Ukraine. Each of the crimes is alleged to have been a "war crime" within the meaning of s.9 of the Act, being a "serious crime" within the meaning of s.6 of the Act. In each instance the crime was alleged to have been committed at a time when the Ukraine was under German occupation during the Second World War. It is common ground that at the time of the commission of the alleged offences there was no Australian legislation in force which purported to make it a criminal offence on the part of an Australian citizen or resident to do such acts in the Ukraine as the plaintiff is alleged to have done.

2. In the course of the proceedings, at the request of the parties, I reserved for the consideration of the Full Court the question:

> "Is Section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 as amended, invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff?"

The plaintiff submits that the question should be answered in the affirmative on two grounds. The first ground is that the section is beyond the legislative powers conferred upon the Parliament by s.51(vi) and (xxix) of the Constitution with respect to defence and external affairs, these being the only two powers which, according to the defendants' case, could sustain the validity of the law. The second is that the section, because it attempts to enact that past conduct shall constitute a criminal offence, is an invalid attempt to usurp the judicial power of the Commonwealth, that power being vested by the Constitution in Ch III courts.
The War Crimes Act 1945

3. According to its long title, the Act is "(a)n Act to provide for the Trial and Punishment of War Criminals". The original preamble to the Act recited:

> "WHEREAS it is expedient to make provision for the trial and punishment of violations of the laws and usages of war committed during any war in which His Majesty has been engaged since the second day of September, One thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine, against any persons who were at any time resident in Australia or against certain other persons".

S890

4. By s.5(1) of the Act, as originally enacted, the Governor-General was authorized to "convene military courts for the trial of persons charged with the commission of war crimes". Section 7 conferred power on a military court so convened to "try persons charged with war crimes committed, at any place whatsoever, whether within or beyond Australia" and for that purpose "to sit at any place whatsoever, whether within or beyond Australia". "War crime" was defined by s.3 to mean: "(a) a violation of the laws and usages of war; or (b) any war crime within the meaning of the instrument of appointment" of a certain Board of Inquiry appointed under the National Security (Inquiries) Regulations (Cth) committed in any place whatsoever, whether within or beyond Australia, during any war.

5. By the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (No.3 of 1989) the original Act was almost entirely repealed and replaced. The amended preamble recites:

"WHEREAS:

(a) concern has arisen that a significant number of persons who committed serious war crimes in Europe during World War II may since have entered Australia and became Australian citizens or residents;

(b) it is appropriate that persons accused of such war crimes be brought to trial in the ordinary criminal courts in Australia; and

(c) it is also essential in the interests of justice that persons so accused be given a fair trial with all the safeguards for accused persons in trials in those courts, having particular regard to matters such as the gravity of the allegations and the lapse of time since the alleged crimes".

6. Section 9 of the Act provides:

"(1) A person who:

(a) on or after 1 September 1939 and on or before 8 May 1945; and

(b) whether as an individual or as a member of an organisation;

committed a war crime is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act.

(2) Sections 5 and 7, and paragraph 86(1)(a), of the Crimes Act 1914 do not apply in relation to an offence against this Act."

In order to ascertain whether an offence is a "war crime" within the meaning of the Act it is necessary to look to ss.6, 7 and 8. Section 7 defines a "war crime" by reference to a "serious crime". What constitutes a "serious crime" is to be ascertained from s.6.

7. Section 6(1) provides:

"An act is a serious crime if it was done in a part of Australia and was, under the law then in force in that part" one of a number of offences mentioned in the sub-section. One such offence is: "(a) murder"; another is:

"(k) an offence of:

(i) attempting or conspiring to commit;

(ii) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of; or

(iii) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the commission of;

5891

an offence referred to in (paragraph (a))".

Section 6(2), (3) and (6) provide:

"(2) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) whether or not an act was, under the law in force at a particular time in a part of Australia, an offence of a particular kind, regard shall be had to any defence under that law that could have been established in a proceeding for the offence.

(3) An act is a serious crime if:

(a) it was done at a particular time outside Australia; and

(b) the law in force at that time in some part of Australia was such that the act would, had it been done at that time in that part, be a serious crime by virtue of subsection (1)."

"(6) For the purposes of (subsection (3)), the fact that the doing of an act was required or permitted by the law in force when and where the act was done shall be disregarded."

8. Section 7 provides:

"(1) A serious crime is a war crime if it was committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war;

(b) in the course of an occupation;

(c) in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of a war or with an occupation; or

(d) on behalf of, or in the interests of, a power conducting a war or engaged in an occupation.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a serious crime was not committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war; or

(b) in the course of an occupation;

merely because the serious crime had with the hostilities or occupation a connection (whether in time, in time and place, or otherwise) that was only incidental or remote.

(3) A serious crime is a war crime if it was:

(a) committed:

(i) in the course of political, racial or religious persecution; or

(ii) with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such; and

(b) committed in the territory of a country when the country was involved in a war or when territory of the country was subject to an occupation.

(4) Two or more serious crimes together constitute a war crime if:

(a) they are of the same or a similar character;

(b) they form, or are part of, a single transaction or event; and

(c) each of them is also a war crime by virtue of either or both of subsections (1) and (3)."

Section 7 must be read in conjunction with the definition of "war" in s.5. That section defines "war" to mean a war "in so far as it occurred in Europe in the period beginning on 1 September 1939 and ending on 8 May 1945". The section defines "occupation", inter alia, as meaning "(a) an occupation of territory arising out of a war".

9. The effect of these definitions is to confine war crimes to conduct which took place outside Australia (see s.7(1)(a) and (b)) except in so far as "serious crimes" under s.7(1)(c) and (d) and s.7(3) might conceivably be committed in Australia. However, the terms of the preamble and the provisions of s.7(1)(a) and (b) make it clear that the primary and substantial concern of the Act is with war crimes committed outside Australia, in other words, with conduct on the part of persons outside Australia. Further, the primary and substantial concern of the Act is with war crimes committed in Europe during the Second World War. So much appears from the preamble and the definitions of "war" and "occupation".

5892

10. Only an Australian citizen or resident shall be charged with an offence under the Act (s.11), but that means that the person charged must be an Australian citizen or resident only at the time that he or she is charged. It follows that the Act makes criminal acts done by a person who, at the time of the commission of those acts, had no relevant connection with Australia.

11. The information laid against the plaintiff rests on an application of the provisions of ss.6(1), 6(3), 7, 9 and 11 of the Act. That is why he seeks a declaration that s.9 is invalid, for the application of that section depends not only on its own validity but also on the validity of related provisions.

12. Superior orders are not a defence in a proceeding for an offence under the Act: s.16. However, s.17(2) provides that, subject to s.16,

> "it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:
>
> (a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
>
> (b) was not under international law a crime against humanity."

Section 17(3) to (5) go on to provide:

> "(3) To avoid doubt, the doing of the act by the defendant was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war if it was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war.
>
> (4) The defendant is not entitled to rely on a defence under subsection (2) unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence.
>
> (5) However, if there is such evidence, the onus of establishing, beyond a reasonable doubt, that those facts either do not exist or do not constitute the defence lies on the prosecution."

13. The provisions of s.68 of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) apply in relation to an offence against the Act as if a reference in that section to a Territory did not include a reference to an external Territory: s.13(1). By virtue of s.68(2) and (5C) of the Judiciary Act, in relation to offences committed elsewhere than in a State or Territory, jurisdiction is conferred on the courts of a State or Territory notwithstanding any limits as to locality of the jurisdiction of that court under the law of that State or Territory. However, by s.14(4) of the Act, on an application by a defendant, the magistrate or judge is bound to order that all proceedings for the offence charged be held in a State or Territory other than that in which it is being held, unless he or she is satisfied on the balance of probabilities that the defendant, when charged with the offence:

> "(a) was a resident of the State or Territory referred to in subsection (1); or
>
> (b) was not a resident of that other State or Territory".

14. The powers of a court to take action to prevent an abuse of process are expressly preserved: s.13(4)(b). Moreover, s.13(5) provides:

> "Where, on the trial of a person for an offence against this Act, the person satisfies the judge, on the balance of probabilities, that:

5893

(a) the person is unable to obtain evidence that he or she would, but for the lapse of time or some other reason beyond his or her control, have been able to obtain;
(b) the person's inability to obtain that evidence has substantially prejudiced, or will substantially prejudice, the preparation or conduct of his or her defence; and
(c) the interests of justice require the making of an order under this subsection;

the judge may make such order as he or she thinks appropriate for a stay of proceedings for the offence."

The External Affairs Power (s.51(xxix))

15. Discussion of the scope of the external affairs power has naturally concentrated upon its operation in the context of Australia's relationships with other countries and the implementation of Australia's treaty obligations. However, it is clear that the scope of the power is not confined to these matters and that it extends to matters external to Australia. I have previously expressed the view that the grant of legislative power with respect to external affairs should be construed with all the generality that the words admit and that, so construed, the power extends to matters and things, as well as relationships, outside Australia: New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, at pp 470-471; Robinson v. Western Australian Museum (1977) 138 CLR 283, at p 335; Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168, at p 223. That view has prevailed in this Court since 1975: see the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, per Barwick C.J. at p 360; Jacobs J. at p 497; Murphy J. at pp 503-504; Robinson, per Barwick C.J. at p 294; Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, per Murphy J. at p 162; Koowarta, per Stephen J. at p 211; The Commonwealth v. Tasmania (The Tasmanian Dam Case) (1983) 158 CLR 1, per Gibbs C.J. at p 97; Murphy J. at p 170. In Koowarta, I said (at p 223) that the power extended to persons, as well as matters and things, outside Australia; in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, Jacobs J. had expressed the same view: at p 497. Although not all of the judicial observations in the cases to which I have just referred mention explicitly the application of the power to persons, as distinct from matters, things or circumstances, external to Australia, there is no reason for drawing any distinction between the reach of the power in its application to persons on the one hand and matters, things and circumstances on the other hand. As Murphy J. stated in The Tasmanian Dam Case (at p 170), the power extends to conduct outside Australia.

16. The existence of a connection between the enacting State and the extraterritorial persons, things and events on which a State law operates has been held to be essential to the valid extraterritorial operation of that State law: Pearce v. Florenca (1976) 135 CLR 507, per Gibbs J. at pp 518-519; Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King (1988) 166 CLR 1, at p 14; Port MacDonnell Professional Fishermen's Assn Inc. v. South Australia (1989) 168 CLR 340, at pp 372-373; cf. Australia Act 1986 (Cth), s.2(1); Australia Act 1986 (UK), s.2(1). The requirement for a relevant connection between the circumstances on which the legislation operates and the State has been liberally applied and even a remote and general connection suffices: Union Steamship, at p 14. According to traditional doctrine, the requirement for such a connection or nexus stems from the circumstance that the legislative power of a State legislature is expressed to be for the peace, order and good government of the State. The opening words of the grant of legislative powers to the Parliament in s.51 of the Constitution might have provided a foundation for a similar interpretation of the external affairs power, making the existence of a relevant connection or nexus an essential prerequisite of the valid exercise of the power. However, I share the view expressed by Windeyer

5894

J. in Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, where he said (at p 308):

> "So far as the Commonwealth is concerned, it is now for Parliament alone to judge whether a measure in respect of any topic on which it has power to legislate is in fact for the peace order and good government of the Commonwealth".

This comment applies with particular force to an exercise of the external affairs power.

17. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, Jacobs J. was of the same opinion, observing (at p 498):

> "There is no gap in the constitutional framework. Every power right and authority of the British Crown is vested in and exercisable by the Crown in Australia subject only to the Constitution. The State legislatures do not have that sovereignty which the British legislature and now the Australian legislature possess. A State can only legislate in respect of persons acts matters and things which have a relevant territorial connexion with the State, a connexion not too remote to entitle the law to the description of a law for the peace welfare and good government of the State. ... The words of s.51 of the Constitution do not import any similar territorial limitation and there now is none in the case of the Australian legislature. The words 'external affairs' can now be given an operation unaffected by any concept of territorial limitation. The result is that the Commonwealth, outside the boundaries of the States and subject to any particular constitutional injunctions, may make laws on all subject matters in exercise of its sovereignty."

It follows that the legislative power of the Parliament with respect to matters external to Australia, using "matters" in a comprehensive sense, is not less in scope than the power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom with respect to such matters.

18. The very recent cases on the external affairs power - Koowarta, The Tasmanian Dam Case, Richardson v. Forestry Commission (1988) 164 CLR 261 and Queensland v. The Commonwealth (1989) 167 CLR 232 - concerned the impact on the States of Commonwealth legislation implementing Australia's obligations under international conventions designed to protect human rights and the domestic environment. These cases vindicated the regulation by the Parliament of conduct within Australia pursuant to the external affairs power when that regulation is undertaken by way of implementation of an international convention. The cases serve to illustrate the proposition that legislation enacted pursuant to the power, though necessarily concerned with some aspect of externality, will have a domestic or internal operation.

19. That, of course, is the situation here. The legislation makes conduct outside Australia unlawful, thereby visiting that conduct with legal consequences under Australian law. The conduct made unlawful constitutes a criminal offence triable and punishable in the ordinary criminal courts in this country. But, to the extent that s.9 operates upon conduct which took place outside Australia and makes that conduct a criminal offence, the section is properly characterized as a law with respect to external affairs and is a valid exercise of power, subject to a consideration of the argument based on usurpation of judicial power. In conformity with what I have already said, I arrive at this conclusion on the footing that it is not necessary that the Court should be satisfied that Australia has an interest or concern in the subject-matter of the legislation in order that its validity be sustained. It is enough that Parliament's judgment is that Australia has an interest or concern. It is inconceivable that the Court could overrule Parliament's decision on that question. That Australia has such an interest or concern in the subject-matter of the legislation here, stemming from Australia's participation in the Second World War, goes virtually without saying.

20. If, to the extent that the law operates upon conduct which took place within Australia, s.9 cannot be supported as a valid exercise of legislative power, it is plainly severable so that, on any view, the section operates validly on conduct which took place outside Australia. In saying this, I do not mean to imply that s.9 is invalid to the extent to which it may operate on conduct within Australia. That question does not arise for decision and there is no point in discussing it further.

21. I should, however, indicate that I do not regard the circumstance that the law operates on the past conduct of persons who, at the time of the commission of that conduct, had no connection with Australia as detracting in any way from the character of s.9 as a law with respect to external affairs. The externality of the conduct which the law prescribes as the foundation of the criminal offence is enough without more to constitute it as a law with respect to external affairs. In this respect it makes no difference whether the law creates a criminal liability by reference to past or future conduct, so long as the conduct is external to Australia.

22. My conclusion that the external affairs power supports the validity of s.9 on the basis discussed above makes it unnecessary for me to examine the argument that the section may be supported on the ground that it is a law with respect to external affairs because it gives effect to an obligation arising under international law or because it implements a resolution of an international body. It is also unnecessary to deal with the alternative submission that the law is a valid exercise of the power because it facilitates the exercise of the universal jurisdiction under international law. Likewise, there is no need to consider the defence power.

Usurpation of Judicial Power

23. The plaintiff's argument on this aspect of the case is that the Act usurps the exercise of the judicial power of the Commonwealth in so far as it declares retrospectively certain past conduct to be a criminal offence and falls into the category of ex post facto laws. The submission is that one of the essential elements in the exercise of judicial power is the determination by a court of the issue whether the accused person infringed a rule of conduct prescribed in advance. According to the plaintiff's argument, the Act has determined that all persons who engaged in conduct of the kind declared unlawful are guilty of an offence, the only issue left for determination being whether the plaintiff is one of those persons.

24. The judicial power of the Commonwealth is vested by s.71 of the Constitution in Ch III courts comprising this Court, federal courts created by Parliament and State courts exercising federal jurisdiction. Judicial power is an elusive concept; "it has never been found possible to frame a definition that is at once exclusive and exhaustive", to repeat the comment of Dixon C.J. and McTiernan J. in Reg. v. Davison (1954) 90 CLR 353, at p 366. According to the widely-accepted statement of Griffith C.J. in Huddart, Parker and Co. Proprietary Ltd. v. Moorehead (1909) 8 CLR 330, at p 357, judicial power in s.71 means "the power which every sovereign authority must of necessity have to decide controversies between its subjects, or between itself and its subjects, whether the rights relate to life, liberty or property".

25. A more comprehensive statement of the content of judicial power is contained in the judgment of Kitto J. in Reg. v. Trade Practices Tribunal; Ex parte Tasmanian Breweries Pty. Ltd. (1970) 123 CLR 361. His Honour observed

5896

(at pp 374-375):

> "Thus a judicial power involves, as a general rule, a decision settling for the future, as between defined persons or classes of persons, a question as to the existence of a right or obligation, so that an exercise of the power creates a new charter by reference to which that question is in future to be decided as between those persons or classes of persons. In other words, the process to be followed must generally be an inquiry concerning the law as it is and the facts as they are, followed by an application of the law as determined to the facts as determined; and the end to be reached must be an act which, so long as it stands, entitles and obliges the persons between whom it intervenes, to observance of the rights and obligations that the application of law to facts has shown to exist. It is right, I think, to conclude from the cases on the subject that a power which does not involve such a process and lead to such an end needs to possess some special compelling feature if its inclusion in the category of judicial power is to be justified."

This statement contemplates as one element in the exercise of judicial power the application to the facts of a pre-existing or antecedent legal principle or standard, though it does not require that the rule or standard should have been ascertained or precisely defined before the determination is made in the exercise of judicial power. The need for an inquiry into what the law is presupposes that there may be uncertainty as to the nature, scope or content of the principle or standard to be applied. Indeed, it is widely recognized that courts, in exercising their judicial power, make and alter law in the sense of formulating new or altered legal principles.

26. There is nothing in the statements which I have quoted to suggest that an exercise of judicial power necessarily involves the application to the facts of a legal principle or standard formulated in advance of the events to which it is sought to be applied. Indeed, there is powerful authority in this Court which supports the proposition that the application to the facts of a retrospective law which operates on past conduct so as to create rights and liabilities is an instance of the exercise of judicial power. In Nelungaloo Pty. Ltd. v. The Commonwealth (1948) 75 CLR 495, the validity of the Wheat Industry Stabilization Act (No.2) 1946 (Cth) was upheld, even though it validated an order for the acquisition of wheat, the validity of which was in issue in proceedings pending when the statute was enacted. The statute affected rights in issue in the litigation. At first instance, Williams J., in holding that the statute was a valid exercise of the defence power, remarked (at p 503):

> "It was contended that this section infringes the judicial power because it does not amend the law prospectively but attempts to prescribe the construction to be placed upon an existing law by the court and the determination of the meaning of a statute is of the essence of the judicial power. The result of this contention, if sound, would be that the Commonwealth Parliament has no power to pass a declaratory statute which only has a retrospective operation. I cannot agree with this contention."

On appeal, his Honour's decision upon the point was upheld: see at pp 579-580, 584. Dixon J., with reference to the validating provision, said (at p 579):

> "It is simply a retrospective validation of an administrative act and should be treated in the same way as if it said that the rights and duties of the growers and of the Commonwealth should be the same as they would > be, if the order was valid. If such an enactment is a law with respect to the subject of defence, I can see no objection to its validity".

Subsequently, in Reg. v. Humby; Ex parte Rooney (1973) 129 CLR 231, I applied Nelungaloo and, in so doing, observed (at p 250):

> "Chapter III contains no prohibition, express or implied, that rights in issue in legal proceedings shall not be the subject of legislative declaration or action."

27. More recently, in Australian Building Construction Employees' and Builders Labourers' Federation v. The Commonwealth (1986) 161 CLR 88, this Court rejected the contention that the Builders Labourers' Federation (Cancellation of Registration) Act 1986 (Cth) was invalid because it was an exercise of judicial power or because it involved an interference with judicial power. The contention was that the impugned statute, which cancelled the registration of the plaintiff union as a registered organization, abrogated the function of this Court in pending proceedings concerning the cancellation of that registration. The Court drew a distinction between legislation affecting substantive rights in issue in litigation and legislative interference with the judicial process itself: at p 96. Liyanage v. The Queen (1967) 1 AC 259, where the statutes were directed to the trial of particular persons charged with particular offences on a particular occasion, was a case which fell into the second of the two categories.

28. It is contended that the power of the Parliament to enact a retrospective or retroactive law dealing with substantive rights or liabilities does not extend to a law which makes past conduct a criminal offence. Such a law, it is said, stands in a very different position. It is suggested that support is to be found in Blackstone's Commentaries and in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on Art.I, s.9, cl.3 and Art.I, s.10, cl.1 of the United States Constitution for the proposition that such a retrospective criminal law is beyond the power of the legislature on the ground that it is an interference with judicial power. The answer to this submission, as will appear, is that Blackstone does not assert that such a law is beyond the power of Parliament and that, to the extent to which the proposition is sustained by judicial decision, it rests upon the existence of a specific prohibition in the United States Constitution which has no counterpart in our Constitution.

29. Blackstone in his Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol.I, pp 45-46, equated law to a "rule prescribed" and stated that, in the case of criminal conduct, such a rule must be prescribed as to future conduct. With reference to a law making past conduct a crime and inflicting punishment on the person who committed it, Blackstone said (at p 46):

> "Here it is impossible that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law: he had therefore no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust. All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro, and be notified before their commencement; which is implied in the term 'prescribed'."

But nowhere does Blackstone assert that it is beyond the power of Parliament to enact such a law, and still less that such a law would constitute an interference with the exercise of judicial power. He held strongly to the view that Parliament had power to enact that which was unreasonable and was vehemently opposed to the pretension that the courts had power to reject a statute on the ground that it was unreasonable "for that were to set the judicial power above that of the legislature, which would be subversive of all government": Commentaries, (1830), vol.I, p 91.

30. Art.I, s.9, cl.3 and Art.I, s.10, cl.1 of the United States Constitution prohibit any State as well as Congress from passing a bill of attainder or an ex post facto law. A bill of attainder is a legislative enactment which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial; initially a bill of attainder provided for punishment by death but in the context of the constitutional prohibition such a bill is now regarded as including what was formerly a bill of pains and penalties: Cummings v. The State of Missouri (1866) 71 US 277. An ex post facto law, of which a bill of attainder was, or might be, an instance, is a retrospective law which makes past conduct a criminal offence. An ex post facto law includes:

> "1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action.
> 2d. Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was, when committed": Calder v. Bull (1798) 3 US 385, per Chase J. at p 390.

The distinctive characteristic of a bill of attainder, marking it out from other ex post facto laws, is that it is a legislative enactment adjudging a specific person or specific persons guilty of an offence constituted by past conduct and imposing punishment in respect of that offence. Other ex post facto laws speak generally, leaving it to the courts to try and punish specific individuals.

31. The constitutional prohibition against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws was not an expression of the antecedent common law of England. So much was acknowledged by Chase J. in Calder v. Bull when he said (at p 388):

> "The prohibition against (State legislatures) making any ex post facto laws was introduced for greater caution, and very probably arose from the knowledge, that the parliament of Great Britain claimed and exercised a power to pass such laws, under the denomination of bills of attainder, or bills of pains and penalties; the first inflicting capital, and the other less punishment. These acts were legislative judgments; and an exercise of judicial power."

32. The absence of any similar prohibition in our Constitution against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws is fatal to the plaintiff's argument except in so far as the separation of powers effected by our Constitution, in particular the vesting of judicial power in Ch III courts, imports a restraint on Parliament's power to enact such laws. In this respect the prohibition against bills of attainder has been seen "as an implementation of the separation of powers, a general safeguard against legislative exercise of the judicial function, or more simply - trial by legislature": United States v. Brown (1965) 381 US 437, at p 442. This doctrine applies to bills of attainder but not to the generality of other ex post facto laws. That is because it is of the essence of the prohibition of a bill of attainder "that it proscribes legislative punishment of specified persons - not of whichever persons might be judicially determined to fit within properly general proscriptions duly enacted in advance": Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. (1988), p 643. The application of the doctrine depends upon the legislature adjudging the guilt of a specific individual or specific individuals or imposing punishment upon them. If, for some reason, an ex post facto law did not amount to a bill of attainder, yet adjudged persons guilty of a crime or imposed punishment upon them, it could amount to trial by legislature and a usurpation of judicial power. But if the law, though retrospective in operation, leaves it to the courts to determine whether the person charged has engaged in the conduct complained of and whether that conduct is an infringement of the rule prescribed, there is no interference with the exercise of judicial power.

5899

33. That the application of the doctrine of separation of powers depends upon the notion of "trial by legislature" is demonstrated by United States v. Brown. The statute made it an offence for anyone who was, or had been within five years, a member of the Communist Party to serve as an officer or manager of a labour union. The Court held that the statute was invalid as a bill of attainder, observing (at p 450):

> "The statute does not set forth a generally applicable rule decreeing that any person who commits certain acts or possesses certain characteristics (acts and characteristics which, in Congress' view, make them likely to initiate political strikes) shall not hold union office, and leave to courts and juries the job of deciding what persons have committed the specified acts or possess the specified characteristics. Instead, it designates ... the persons who possess the feared characteristics and therefore cannot hold union office without incurring criminal liability - members of the Communist Party."

Later, the Court stated (at p 454) that the command of the bill of attainder prohibition is "that a legislature can provide that persons possessing certain characteristics must abstain from certain activities, but must leave to other tribunals the task of deciding who possesses those characteristics ...".

34. The view that a statute which contains no declaration of guilt and does not impose punishment for guilt is not a usurpation of judicial power is supported by the reasoning of the Privy Council in its decision in Kariapper v. Wijesinha (1968) AC 717. The Privy Council upheld the validity of a statute enacted by the Parliament of Ceylon which imposed civil disabilities on persons to whom the statute applied, namely, persons, including the appellant, named in a schedule to the statute who were found guilty of bribery in a report by a commission of inquiry. The statute also provided for the vacation of the appellant's seat as a Member of Parliament. It was common ground that the Constitution of Ceylon insisted upon a separation of powers, at least to the extent that judicial power was vested exclusively in the courts to the exclusion of the legislature: see at p 732. The Privy Council had so held in its earlier decision in Liyanage v. The Queen, at pp 287-289. In Kariapper v. Wijesinha, the appellant argued (at p 721) that the statute was an exercise of judicial power because it imposed punishment for guilt without trial by a competent court and was a bill of attainder, ex post facto legislation having an element of punishment being on the same footing as a bill of attainder. The Privy Council rejected the argument on the grounds that the statute contained no declaration of guilt and the disabilities which it imposed did not have the character of punishment for guilt but were to keep public life clean for the public good.

35. Sir Douglas Menzies, speaking for the Judicial Committee, referred with evident approval to the concurring opinion of Frankfurter J. in United States v. Lovett (1946) 328 US 303. In that case, his Honour said (at pp 322-323):

> "All bills of attainder specify the offense for which the attainted person was deemed guilty and for which the punishment was imposed."

Frankfurter J. went on to say (at p 323):

> "No offense is specified and no declaration of guilt is made ... Not only does s304 lack the essential declaration of guilt. It likewise lacks the imposition of punishment in the sense appropriate for bills of attainder."

Sir Douglas Menzies concluded (at p 736) that, in conformity with the opinion of Frankfurter J., the Ceylon statute contained no declaration of guilt of bribery or of any other act. His Honour continued (at p 736):

> "It is the commission's finding that attracts the operation of the Act not any conduct of a person against whom the > finding was made. Parliament did not make any finding of its own against the appellant or any other of the seven persons named in the schedule. The question of the guilt or innocence of the persons named in the schedule does not arise for the purpose of the Act and the Act has no bearing upon the determination of such a question should it ever arise in any circumstances."

5900

Accordingly, the statute did not interfere with the exercise of judicial power.

36. All that I have said so far in refutation of this aspect of the plaintiff's case is confirmed by the decision of this Court in R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425. That case concerned the validity of the Crimes Act 1915 (Cth) so far as its provisions were retrospective. Section 2 of that Act added conspiracies to defraud the Commonwealth to the conspiracies which, by s.86 of the Crimes Act 1914 (Cth), were declared to be indictable offences. Section 3 of the 1915 Act provided that the Act was deemed to have been in force from the date of commencement of the 1914 Act. The accused were indicted for conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth under the retrospective provisions of the 1915 Act. By a unanimous decision the validity of that Act was upheld. It was specifically contended that the Parliament had no power to enact retrospective criminal laws, reliance being placed on Calder v. Bull, the argument naturally being that the 1915 Act was an ex post facto law rather than a bill of attainder.

37. Griffith C.J. acknowledged (at p 432) that an ex post facto law was forbidden by the United States Constitution but pointed out that no question of the validity of such a law could arise in the case of a legislature of plenary power. However, being of the opinion, mistakenly, that Parliament's power to enact a criminal law stemmed only from s.51(xxxix), he concluded that this power did not extend to an ex post facto criminal law. He upheld the 1915 Act because in his opinion it did no more than re-enact the common law.

38. Isaacs J. observed (at pp 442-443):

> "There is no prohibition in the Australian Constitution against passing ex post facto laws, as there is in the American Constitution ... The prohibition to the United States apparently assumes that Congress would otherwise have had the power. Therefore, in my opinion, no distinction can be validly drawn between ex post facto laws - regarding them as criminal only - and any other kind of retroactive laws."

His Honour concluded by saying (at p 443):

> "But the Parliament's powers are not confined to creating fear of punishment by threatening as to future acts, but extend to dealing with the conduct, which in its opinion deserves it, and so conveying the same warning and fear as a plenary Legislature within the ambit assigned to it."

Higgins J. was of the same opinion: at pp 451-454. His Honour specifically referred (at p 451) to the fact that the Parliament of Great Britain had, by Acts of attainder and otherwise, made crimes of acts after they had been committed and held that, in the absence of a prohibition in the Constitution, the Commonwealth had like power to enact a retrospective criminal law. Likewise, Powers J. (at p 462) considered that the Parliament had the same power to pass retrospective criminal laws with respect to the subject-matters committed to it by s.51 of the Constitution as had the Imperial Parliament.

39. In the light of what I have said earlier about the plaintiff's argument, the decision in Kidman was plainly correct. It has frequently been cited in subsequent decisions of the Court without any hint of disapproval: see R. v. Snow (1917) 23 CLR 256, at p 265; Ex parte Walsh and Johnson; In re Yates

5901

(1925) 37 CLR 36, at pp 86, 124-125; Millner v. Raith (1942) 66 CLR 1, at p 9; Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth (1951) 83 CLR 1, at p 172; University of Wollongong v. Metwally (1984) 158 CLR 447, at pp 461, 484. The only qualification relevant to the plaintiff's argument that needs to be made is that the separation of powers effected by our Constitution would invalidate a bill of attainder on the ground that it involves a usurpation of judicial power. To the extent that Higgins J. seems to suggest that such a bill, if enacted by the Parliament, would be valid, I am unable to agree.

40. True it is that the judgments in Kidman to which I have referred do not make any mention of the separation of powers. That is readily understandable. The challenge to the validity of the 1915 Act was, and could only be, that it was an ex post facto law, for it was not a bill of attainder. Before the present case it had never occurred to anyone to suggest that an ex post facto law of the kind under consideration here, not being a bill of attainder, could amount to a usurpation of judicial power because such an ex post facto law simply does not amount to a trial by legislature. It leaves for determination by the court the issues which would arise for determination under a prospective law.

41. In the result, I would answer the question in the negative.
JUDGE2
BRENNAN J. The second defendant, with the claimed authority of the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions, laid an information charging the plaintiff with the commission of a number of war crimes "within the meaning of section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945". The War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) was extensively amended by the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (Cth) which inserted a new preamble and new ss.3 to 22 in the place of the preamble and ss.3 to 14 of the original Act. The Act to which reference is made hereafter is the amended Act, except where the original Act (No.48 of 1945) is expressly mentioned. The plaintiff, by his further amended statement of claim in an action brought against the Commonwealth and the second defendant, seeks declarations that the sections of the Act relevant to his prosecution are invalid and an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any step in furtherance of the prosecution of the plaintiff for offences under the Act. The defendants assert that the Act is valid, relying on the external affairs power and the defence power conferred on the Parliament respectively by s.51(xxix) and (vi) of the Constitution. The question reserved for consideration of the Full Court is as follows:

> "Is Section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 as amended, invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff?"

That question is concisely drawn, but there is a more general question the answer to which may determine the answer to the question reserved and which is logically anterior to it. The more general question is this: is s.9 as amended invalid? Or, even more generally, is the Act as amended invalid? The last of these questions should be addressed first. To appreciate the respective arguments for and against the validity of the Act, it is necessary to construe its terms and to ascertain its operation.
1. The meaning and operation of the Act.

2. Section 9 of the Act purports to create a new offence. It reads as follows:

> " (1) A person who:
> (a) on or after 1 September 1939 and on or before 8 May 1945; and
> (b) whether as an individual or as a member of an organisation;
> committed a war crime is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act.
> (2) Sections 5 and 7, and paragraph 86 (1)(a), of the Crimes Act 1914 do not apply in relation to an offence against this Act."

S902

The offence purportedly created by s.9 is a statutory offence, the elements of which are to be found in other sections of the Act that give a statutory meaning to the term "a war crime". But it is clear from the terms of s.9 itself that the acts which attract liability to conviction for the statutory offence are past acts. It is an offence that cannot now be committed, but it is an offence for which a person may be convicted by reason of past conduct. To be liable to conviction as for "an indictable offence against this Act" a person must have engaged in conduct of the prescribed kind - that is, conduct which answers the statutory definition of the term "a war crime" - during the period prescribed by par.(a) - that is, between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 inclusive - and, when charged, be either:

"(a) an Australian citizen; or
(b) a resident of Australia or of an external Territory": s.11.

3. The term "a war crime" is defined by reference to another term: "a serious crime". Section 6 contains the definition of "a serious crime" and conduct which answers that definition is "a war crime" if it was committed in circumstances which are prescribed by s.7(1) or s.7(3). Section 6 reads as follows:

" (1) An act is a serious crime if it was done in a part of Australia and was, under the law then in force in that part, an offence, being:
(a) murder;
(b) manslaughter;
(c) causing grievous bodily harm;
(d) wounding;
(e) rape;
(f) indecent assault;
(g) abduction, or procuring, for immoral purposes;
(h) an offence (in this paragraph called the 'variant offence') that would be referred to in a preceding paragraph if that paragraph contained a reference to:
(i) a particular intention or state of mind on the offender's part; or
(ii) particular circumstances of aggravation;
necessary to constitute the variant offence;
(j) an offence whose elements are substantially the same as the elements of an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (h), inclusive; or
(k) an offence of:
(i) attempting or conspiring to commit;
(ii) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of; or
(iii) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the commission of;
an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (j), inclusive.
(2) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) whether or not an act was, under the law in force at a particular time in a part of Australia, an offence of a particular kind, regard shall be had to any defence under that law that could have been established in a proceeding for the offence.
(3) An act is a serious crime if:
(a) it was done at a particular time outside Australia; and
(b) the law in force at that time in some part of Australia was such that the act would, had it been done at that time in that part, be a serious crime by virtue of subsection (1).

5903

(4) The deportation of a person to, or the internment of a person in, a death camp, a slave labour camp, or a place where persons are subjected to treatment similar to that undergone in a death camp or slave labour camp, is a serious crime.

(5) Each of the following is a serious crime:

(a) attempting or conspiring to deport or intern a person as mentioned in subsection (4);

(b) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the deportation or internment of a person as so mentioned;

(c) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the deportation or internment of a person as so mentioned.

(6) For the purposes of subsections (3), (4) and (5), the fact that the doing of an act was required or permitted by the law in force when and where the act was done shall be disregarded."

The acts which, by force of s.6, are elements of the statutory offence may have been done during the prescribed period either in Australia (sub-s.(1)) or outside Australia (sub-s.(3)). If the relevant act was done inside Australia and if, under the law in force in that part of Australia at the time when the act was done, it amounted to any of the offences mentioned in sub-s.(1), the act answers the description of "a serious crime". If the act was done outside Australia but would have amounted to an offence of one of the kinds mentioned in sub-s.(1) had it been done at that time in some part of Australia by force of the law in that part, it is "a serious crime" for the purposes of sub-s.(3). The draftsman has not prescribed a particular Australian system of law to be the system to which reference must be made in determining, for the purposes of sub-s.(3), whether an act amounted to one of the offences mentioned. The consequence seems to be that, if an act, done within any part of Australia within the prescribed period, would have amounted to any of the offences mentioned under the law in force in that part of Australia at that time, the act is "a serious crime" for the purposes of s.6(3). Presumably, sub-s.(2) is material in determining whether an act done outside Australia would have amounted to one of the offences mentioned in sub-s.(1) had it been done in some part of Australia, though it is artificial to apply a municipal system of law designed for the preservation of the King's peace to acts done by or on behalf of belligerents in war.

4. An act which answers the description of "a serious crime" also answers the description of "a war crime" if it was done in circumstances defined by s.7. That section reads as follows:

" (1) A serious crime is a war crime if it was committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war;

(b) in the course of an occupation;

(c) in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of a war or with an occupation; or

(d) on behalf of, or in the interests of, a power conducting a war or engaged in an occupation.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a serious crime was not committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war; or

(b) in the course of an occupation;

merely because the serious crime had with the hostilities or occupation a connection (whether in time, in time and place, or otherwise) that was only incidental or remote.

(3) A serious crime is a war crime if it was:

(a) committed:

(i) in the course of political, racial or 5904 religious persecution; or

(ii) with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such; and
(b) committed in the territory of a country when the country was involved in a war or when territory of the country was subject to an occupation.
(4) Two or more serious crimes together constitute a war crime if:
(a) they are of the same or a similar character;
(b) they form, or are part of, a single transaction or event; and
(c) each of them is also a war crime by virtue of either or both of subsections (1) and (3)."

The term "war" in this section is not left at large; it is defined by s.5 to mean -

" (a) a war, whether declared or not;
(b) any other armed conflict between countries; or
(c) a civil war or similar armed conflict;
(whether or not involving Australia or a country allied or associated with Australia) in so far as it occurred in Europe in the period beginning on 1 September 1939 and ending on 8 May 1945."

Section 7 thus has effect, so far as it relates to "war", to any armed conflict occurring in Europe during the same period as that prescribed by s.9(1)(a), whether the armed conflict involved Australia or not. The Commonwealth submitted that this section is to be read as importing by implication the requirement that the relevant conduct be a war crime or a crime against humanity by international law. This submission cannot be accepted. There is nothing in the framework of the Act which provides any foundation for implying an element which is not expressed. Although the suggested implied element would limit the exposure of persons to conviction, the Act expressly purports to deal with the requirements which, when added to the definition of "a serious crime", satisfy the element of "a war crime". As the preamble demonstrates, the Act was intended to provide for the bringing "to trial in the ordinary criminal courts in Australia" of "persons who committed serious war crimes in Europe during World War II", and ss.6 and 7 were the legislative expression of what were perceived to be war crimes of serious degree. There is no legislative indication that the words of s.7 should be read as importing into the definition of the term "a war crime" in s.9 the definition of a war crime at international law. A war crime in international law is a violation of the laws and customs of war. Those laws and customs limit the belligerents' choice of means of injuring enemy forces, controlling enemy prisoners of war and treating enemy civilians, but are silent as to acts which do not contravene those limitations. Sections 6 and 7 do not import those limitations. Indeed, the sections assume that any killing, not justified or excused under the general law applicable (ordinarily to civilians) in Australia during the prescribed period, would amount to culpable homicide.

5. To avoid so bizarre an operation of ss.6, 7 and 9, the draftsman introduced s.17(2) of the Act to confer immunity from conviction on persons whose acts, though falling within the category of "a war crime" as prescribed by ss.6 and 7, were, at the time when they were done, "permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war" and were then "not under international law a crime against humanity". Section 17 provides:

" (1) This section has effect for the purposes of a proceeding for an offence against this Act.
(2) Subject to section 16, it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:

5905

(a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
(b) was not under international law a crime against humanity.
(3) To avoid doubt, the doing of the act by the defendant was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war if it was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war.
(4) The defendant is not entitled to rely on a defence under subsection (2) unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence.
(5) However, if there is such evidence, the onus of establishing, beyond a reasonable doubt, that those facts either do not exist or do not constitute the defence lies on the prosecution."

The practical operation of sub-ss.(4) and (5) of this section may be open to debate, but its substantive effect is clearly to introduce a modification to the relevant system of Australian municipal law. Section 17 has been inserted in an attempt to provide, under municipal law, some justification or excuse for some acts of belligerents in war - a justification or excuse not usually provided by municipal criminal law: see Brierly, The Basis of Obligation in International Law, (1958), pp 297-298. In due course it will be necessary to consider whether the provisions of the Act correspond with the provisions of international law but, in considering whether the Act incorporates international law into its definition of "a war crime", we must refer briefly at this stage to some of the rules of international law. Thus, in construing s.17, it is clear that the draftsman misunderstood the effect of the laws, customs and usages of war, for they give no permission for acts which would otherwise be forbidden; they simply forbid particular means of injuring enemy forces, controlling enemy prisoners of war or treating enemy civilians. Therefore, to give some effect to s.17(2)(a), "permitted by" must be read as meaning "not in contravention of". However, by reading s.17(2) in that way, any justification or excuse for "a serious crime" which was committed by a belligerent as a belligerent in time of war but which was not a violation of the law and customs of war must be found, if at all, in the relevant municipal law of a State or Territory. Yet the municipal law of the States and Territories contains no justification or excuse which might protect belligerents against liability to conviction for the deliberate killing of one who is not outside the protection of the municipal law. Alternatively, sub-s.2(a) might be read as having the precise meaning which sub-s.(3) attributes to it, so that a "defence" is available when the act charged was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war and was not under international law a crime against humanity. In due course, it will be necessary to consider more precisely the meaning and effect of s.17(2) in order to ascertain whether it imports the elements of a war crime under international law. For the moment, it is sufficient to note that, once the reader is directed to the provisions of s.17, it is impossible to read ss.6 and 7 as though they impliedly imported international law to provide a definition of, or an element in the definition of, "a war crime" for the purposes of s.9.

6. The Act is drafted in language which not only bespeaks its turbulent legislative history but which rejects international law as the legal system by reference to which the elements of a war crime may be ascertained for the purposes of s.9. (In this respect, as we shall see, the Act reverses the operation of the original Act which provided for the application of international law to the trial of war criminals.) The Act invokes in the first place the several systems of municipal law in force in Australia at the time when the relevant act was done: s.6. Then, when a person is charged with the statutory offence, the reference in s.6 to the law in force "in a part of Australia" is supplemented by s.13(2) which reads as follows:

" Where a person is charged with an offence against this Act, then, for the purposes of:

(a) determining whether a court of a State or internal Territory has jurisdiction in relation to the offence;
(b) an exercise of jurisdiction by such a court in relation to the offence;
(c) a proceeding connected with such an exercise of jurisdiction; and
(d) an appeal arising out of, or out of a proceeding connected with, such an exercise of jurisdiction;
this Act has effect, in relation to an act that is, or is alleged to be, the offence, as if:
(e) a reference in subsection 6(3) or section 18 to a part of Australia were a reference to that State or Territory; and
(f) without limiting subsection 6(2), all defences under the law in force in that State or Territory when the person is charged with the offence had been defences under the law in force in that State or Territory at the time of the act."

The supplementation of the legal system applicable by force of s.6 by the contemporary legal system of the place of trial is further modified by other provisions of the Act. Section 6(6) denies a defence of justification or excuse under the law of the place outside Australia where the relevant act was done. Not even the execution of judicial orders would, it seems, provide any justification or excuse for acts falling within s.6(3), (4) or (5). Then s.16 excludes the defence of superior orders. Section 16 reads:

" Subject to subsections 6(2) and 13(2), the fact that, in doing an act alleged to be an offence against this Act, a person acted under orders of his or her government or of a superior is not a defence in a proceeding for the offence, but may, if the person is convicted of the offence, be taken into account in determining the proper sentence."

Section 20 instructs the reader that ss.6(6) and 16 "are enacted to avoid doubt." Though s.20 indicates that ss.6(6) and 16 are not perceived by the Legislature to be statutory modifications of the applicable system of Australian municipal law, it is clear that s.17 is intended to have that effect.

7. From this review of the Act, it is clear that the elements of the statutory offence purportedly created by s.9 are to be found solely in the provisions of the Act itself and, except for the limited purposes of s.17, by reference to the municipal systems of law to which the Act refers. Indeed, s.8(2) and (3) are consistent only with that view. Section 8 reads:

" (1) Subject to subsection 7(2), nothing in section 6 or 7 limits the generality of anything else in that section.
(2) An act may be a serious crime by virtue of one or more of subsections 6(1), (3), (4) and (5), but not otherwise.
(3) A serious crime may be a war crime by virtue of either or both of subsections 7(1) and (3), but not otherwise.
(4) Two or more serious crimes may together constitute a war crime by virtue of subsection 7(4), but not otherwise."

8. The Act thus exposes to punishment by a court of a State or Territory exercising jurisdiction under municipal law any person who -

(a) being an Australian citizen or resident when charged with the offence;
(b) committed an act of the kind referred to in s.6;
(c) in Australia or outside Australia;
(d) between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 (inclusive);
(e) in circumstances (defined in s.7) connected with any armed conflict in Europe between the dates mentioned, whether Australia was involved in that conflict or not;

5907

(f) being an act that is not "permitted by" the laws, customs and usages of war or being under international law a crime against humanity.

It is immaterial that, when the relevant act was done, the person who did it was not then an Australian citizen or resident, that no Australian citizen or resident nor any person under or entitled to the protection of Australian law was the victim or likely victim, that the armed conflict in the course of which the act was committed did not involve Australia or that the act was lawful according to the laws of the place where the act was done at the time when it was done. Whether or not any relevant Australian interest was involved when the relevant act was done, it is sufficient for the purposes of the Act that the person who did the act has become an Australian citizen or an Australian resident. The Act is truly retrospective in its operation: that is to say, it attaches penalties under Australian municipal law to the doing of an act to which that penalty was not attached when the act was done. Under this Act, the plaintiff is charged with offences allegedly committed in 1942 and 1943 in the Ukraine during Germany's occupation of that territory. It is alleged that he wilfully killed a number of people in pursuit of German policies - either a policy of persecuting the Jewish people or those opposed to German policies or a policy of annihilating suspected partisans or communists. The plaintiff was not then an Australian citizen or resident.

9. If the allegations made in the charges be true, the plaintiff was guilty of heinous offences against the laws of the Ukraine and against the laws and customs of war but he is not charged with offences against the laws of the Ukraine nor, as we shall see, with offences against the laws and customs of war. He is charged with offences against the municipal law of Australia, created by s.9 of the Act. The validity of the Act depends upon the legislative power of the Parliament to create the offence defined by the Act and to vest jurisdiction in Australian courts to try persons charged with that offence. As the Act is retrospective in its operation, I assume the defendants would seek constitutional support for the Act not only in sub-ss.(vi) and (xxix) of s.51 but also in sub-s.(xxxix) of s.51 (the sub-section on which reliance was placed in R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425 to support the retrospective criminal law that was there upheld). It will be convenient to consider first the various ways in which the external affairs power is said to support the Act.

2. The external affairs power.

10. The Constitution, by s.51(xxix), confers on the Parliament plenary legislative power with respect to external affairs, but the support given by the external affairs power to a particular law depends upon the identification of some relationship, set of circumstances or field of activity which falls within the description of "external affairs" and with which the law has a connection sufficient to satisfy the requirement imported by the words "with respect to" in s.51: Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168, at p 256.

11. The Commonwealth submits that the Act is supported by s.51(xxix) in a number of ways. First, the Act is said to be a law "with respect to things done outside Australia" and that a law "upon anything whatsoever done outside Australia" is supportable, "at least where there is a sufficient connection with Australia". Next, the Act is said to be a law enacted for purposes which attract the support of the power, the relevant purposes being identified as - " (A) the discharge of an international obligation ...;

(B) the exercise of an international right ...;
(C) the meeting of an international concern; or
(D) the implementation of resolutions or recommendations > of the United Nations General Assembly ('UNGA') or any other international body."

The first way in which the argument is put propounds the conduct in which individuals engage outside Australia as the relevant category of "external affairs" with which the Act is sufficiently connected. The next way in which the argument is put depends upon the international personality of Australia and propounds Australia's relationship with the community of nations as the relevant category of "external affairs". The two ways in which the argument is put call for separate consideration.

(i) External acts.

12. Put at its broadest, the Commonwealth's argument attributes to the external affairs power a scope which would empower the Commonwealth to pass a law affecting the doing of anything by anybody outside Australia: acts which are external to Australia are said to be external affairs and a law relating to any external acts is said to be a law with respect to external affairs. In New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, Barwick C.J. said, at p 360:

> "The (external affairs) power extends, in my opinion, to any affair which in its nature is external to the continent of Australia and the island of Tasmania subject always to the Constitution as a whole."

A wide view of the power was also taken by Mason, Jacobs and Murphy JJ. (at pp 470-471, 497, 503). In Koowarta, Mason J. said (at p 223) that "'external affairs' covers any matters or concerns external to Australia." In the contexts in which these observations were made, no question arose as to the connection between Australia and the extraterritorial person, thing or event to which the particular Commonwealth law applied. Australia's connection with its maritime boundaries in the one case and with its treaty obligations in the other was manifest. But it is argued that, although there must be some connection between the extraterritorial operation of a State law and the extraterritorial persons, things or events on which a State law operates (Port MacDonnell Professional Fishermen's Assn Inc. v. South Australia (1989) 168 CLR 340, at p 372), no such connection is required in the case of a Commonwealth law. If such a connection were required, so the argument runs, there would be a lacuna in the plenitude of legislative powers which the Australian legislatures, Commonwealth and State, together possess: see per Jacobs J. in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, at p 497. But the powers conferred by the Constitution are not to be expanded beyond their true scope merely to supply what is thought, from the public viewpoint, to be a desirable or convenient power. Limits on power are the measure of private immunity from legislative action by the State. The legislative powers of the Parliament are limited by the terms of the Constitution, and the connotation of the phrase "external affairs" must be ascertained from its context and purpose. Accepting fully that s.51(xxix) is not to be narrowly construed (The Commonwealth v. Tasmania. The Tasmanian Dam Case (1983) 158 CLR 1, at pp 220-221), nevertheless the power thereby conferred is limited. Although the phrase "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" itself contains no territorial limitation (Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co.Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, at pp 300-301, 307-308), it does not expand the connotation of the phrase "External affairs" in s.51(xxix). Just as the power conferred by s.51(xxvii) "remains a power to make laws with respect to immigration into and emigration from Australian territory", as Menzies J. pointed out in Reg. v. Foster (at p 301), so the power conferred by s.51(xxix) remains a power to make laws with respect to Australia's external affairs. I do not understand the phrase "external affairs" to sweep into Commonwealth power every person who exists or every relationship, set of circumstances or field of activity which exists or occurs outside Australian territory. The "affairs" which are the subject matter of the power are, in my view, the external affairs of Australia; not affairs which have nothing to do with Australia. Although affairs which exist or occur outside Australia may be described as "external" in a geographical sense, I would not hold that the Constitution confers power to enact laws affecting affairs which, though geographically external, have nothing to do with Australia. There must be some nexus, not necessarily substantial, between Australia and the "external affairs" which a law purports to affect before the law is supported by s.51(xxix).

13. It may be that this view of the scope of the external affairs power corresponds with the legislative competence of Australia as recognized by international law. The internationally recognized competence of a domestic legislature is illustrated by "Le Louis" (1817) 2 Dods.210 (165 E.R.1464), a case in which a question arose as to the limits of domestic legislative power under international law. In proceedings for the condemnation of a French ship for being employed in the slave trade, the seizors sought to rely upon a British statute which made the slave trade illegal. At that time, slavery was not illegal by the law of nations and it was held that "(t)he Legislature must be understood to have contemplated all that was within its power, and no more" (at p 254 (p 1479)). Although the power of the Legislature to enact extraterritorial legislation was not denied, it was acknowledged that, by the law of nations, the plenitude of legislative power claimed by the United Kingdom Parliament would not be recognized internationally where there was no occasion for its exercise. The general terms of the statute were construed in accordance with the limits recognized by international law. However, the correspondence between the scope of the power conferred by s.51(xxix) and that recognized by the law of nations is not a question which we have to decide in this case. The scope of the constitutional power is not determined by the law of nations, much less by international opinion as to Australia's connection with a particular subject matter. We are here concerned solely with the limits of a power conferred by the Constitution. The recent cases relating to s.51(xxix) show that the power thereby conferred enables the Commonwealth to legislate for the purpose of discharging the responsibilities and asserting to the full the interests of Australia as an independent member of the community of nations: the Seas and Submerged Lands Case; Koowarta; The Tasmanian Dam Case; Gerhardy v. Brown (1985) 159 CLR 70; Richardson v. Forestry Commission (1988) 164 CLR 261; Mabo v. Queensland (1988) 166 CLR 186. It is a plenary power exercisable as well in protection of Australia's international interests as in performance of its international obligations. But s.51(xxix) does not arm the Commonwealth with power to enact laws governing affairs outside Australia with which Australia has no connection. It is, of course, for the Parliament to determine in the first instance whether there is any connection between Australia and a relationship, set of circumstances or field of activity which exists or occurs outside Australia and which a proposed law would purportedly affect, but, if the legislative judgment cannot reasonably be supported, the law will be held to be outside the power conferred by s.51(xxix): see Richardson, at p 296; Gerhardy v. Brown, at p 139. It leaves no great lacuna in the plenitude of Australian legislative power to deny the character of a law with respect to external affairs to a law which does no more than affect something or somebody unconnected with Australia occurring or existing outside Australia. To take an extreme example: would a law be properly characterized as a law with respect to external affairs if it imposed a criminal penalty on a person who, being a citizen and resident of France, had dropped litter in a Parisian street forty years ago? The limits of the power conferred by s.51(xxix) are, in a real sense, a guarantee of the immunity from harassment by Australian law of persons who, having no connection with Australia, engage in conduct elsewhere which does not affect Australian interests or concerns.

14. The requirement of some connection between Australia and the relationship, set of circumstances or field of activity affected by a law is satisfied when the law purports to control extraterritorial conduct engaged in by Australian citizens or residents (whether natural or corporate) or by persons who are under or are entitled to the protection of Australian law. The extraterritorial conduct of such persons is an aspect of Australia's external affairs. Equally, the requirement of connection is satisfied when the law, in protection of the interests of any such persons, purports to prohibit conduct engaged in by others outside Australia. The external protection of the interests of those under the protection of Australian law, wherever those interests might be located, is another aspect of Australia's external affairs. A law governing conduct of the kinds referred to in this paragraph answers the description of a law with respect to Australia's external affairs.

5910

15. However, the Act does not purport to affect the conduct of Australian citizens or residents outside Australia. It does not attach any penalty to conduct in which any such person might engage outside Australia. The conduct which is made a condition of present liability to conviction is past conduct of the kinds prescribed by the Act which occurred during the prescribed period, being conduct that was engaged in by any person. It is immaterial to liability whether the victims of any such conduct were under the protection of Australian law. If it be said that the Act bears the character of a law with respect to the "serious crimes" which fall within s.7(1) or s.7(3), the question is whether those crimes, at the time when they were committed, were then an aspect of Australia's external affairs. Nothing in the Act suggests that a serious crime falling within s.7(1) or 7(3) must be an aspect of Australia's external affairs. The Act does not prescribe as an element of conduct answering the description of "a war crime" anything which connects Australia with that conduct at the time it was engaged in. The element which at first sight may seem to provide some contemporaneous nexus between "a war crime" in s.9 and Australia is the definition of "war" in s.5, for Australia was involved in the European war between 3 September 1939 and 8 May 1945. But, apart from the difference in the commencing date of the prescribed period, the definition of "war" in s.5 rejects Australia's involvement in the Second World War as a necessary element in the definition, for the definition is satisfied by any armed conflict "(whether or not involving Australia or a country allied or associated with Australia)". If conduct of the prescribed kind which occurred during the prescribed period was not then an aspect of Australia's external affairs, a fortiori it could not have been an aspect of Australia's external affairs when the Act came into operation on 25 January 1989. Nearly forty-four years had passed between 8 May 1945 and the date when the Act came into operation. Unless Australia's external relations were affected by unpunished "serious crimes" committed more than forty-four years earlier (a question presently to be examined) I am unable to see how an act by an individual in the course of any European armed conflict occurring between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 could be regarded, without more, as an aspect of Australia's external affairs in 1989.

16. If "a serious crime" committed by an individual forty-four or more years earlier answering the statutory description of "a war crime" was not itself an aspect of Australia's contemporary external affairs before 8 May 1945, does it make any difference to the character of the Act that the only persons who are liable to conviction must now be Australian residents or citizens? The Act, as we have seen, is a retrospective law which attaches penal consequences to conduct engaged in before the law was made. If the Parliament has power to enact a law which prohibits Australian residents and citizens from engaging in particular conduct outside Australia in future, does it have power to enact a law which exposes to conviction Australian residents and citizens who have engaged in particular conduct in the past? Were the Act restricted in its application to persons who were Australian residents or citizens at the time when "a war crime" was committed, it would be strongly arguable, on the authority of Kidman, that the Act is supportable under s.51(xxxix) as a retrospective law with respect to the conduct of Australian residents and citizens overseas. In Kidman, a majority of this Court upheld the validity of a law deeming past conduct in defrauding the Commonwealth to be criminal and imposing penal consequences. By analogy, it could be argued that the extraterritorial commission of "a war crime" by Australian residents and citizens was, at that time, an aspect of Australia's external affairs and the retrospective imposition of a criminal penalty on them for engaging in that conduct is simply an exercise of the incidental power which empowers the Parliament to make retrospective laws to punish conduct that was at all material times a subject of legislative power. It is unnecessary in the present case to determine whether, if the Act had retrospectively created an offence which only persons who were Australian citizens or residents at the time could have committed, the Act might have been supported on the authority of Kidman. It is common ground that, at the times of the alleged occurrences of the acts charged against the plaintiff, the plaintiff had no connection with Australia and was not then either a citizen or a resident of Australia. He subsequently became and is now an Australian citizen and a resident of the State of South Australia. Does his becoming a citizen and resident of Australia transform his earlier conduct into an aspect of Australia's external affairs?

17. In answering this question, I again put to one side the argument that Australia's international relations constitute the aspect of Australia's external affairs that enlivens the legislative power in s.51(xxix) and supports the enactment of the Act. The argument which I now address is the argument that extraterritorial conduct, without more, has a sufficient connection with Australia to enliven the external affairs power if the person who engaged in that conduct subsequently becomes an Australian citizen or resident.

18. If it be right to say that the external affairs which may enliven legislative power under s.51(xxix) are affairs with which Australia has some connection, the scope of the power may alter from time to time as an Australian connection with particular relationships, sets of circumstances or fields of activity comes into existence or disappears. Like the defence power (see, for example, Hume v. Higgins (1949) 78 CLR 116, at pp 133-136), the scope of the external affairs power must be affected by the international conditions prevailing at the material time. It follows that, if there was no power to prohibit conduct outside Australia by a person who was not a citizen or resident at the time when the conduct was engaged in because that conduct was not an aspect of Australia's external affairs, the subsequent acquisition of Australian citizenship or residence cannot make that conduct an aspect of Australia's external affairs unless there be some international relationship which requires Australia to impose on a person who becomes a citizen or resident a penalty or liability for that conduct. There is no logical or legal reason why a power to forbid extraterritorial conduct engaged in by an Australian citizen or resident - which is an aspect of Australia's external affairs - should be expanded to a power to attach a penalty to persons for engaging in conduct which was not an aspect of Australia's external affairs unless, perhaps, the attaching of such a penalty (as distinct from the conduct) is itself required to satisfy Australia's international relations.

19. If the law would have been beyond power had it been in force when the relevant conduct was engaged in, the power cannot now be enlarged by retrospective legislation. Legislative power cannot be exercised retrospectively to transform a relationship, set of circumstances or field of activity which was not an aspect of Australia's external affairs when it existed or occurred into an aspect of Australia's present external affairs. A law cannot create the facts which condition the power needed for its own support. A purported exercise of a legislative power cannot itself enliven the power to be exercised.

20. Australian citizenship or residence in Australia is not a solvent of responsibility for crimes committed elsewhere; Australia's extradition obligations are discharged and its deportation powers are exercised in order to ensure that this country does not become an Alsatia for criminals from overseas. But the mere acquisition of Australian citizenship or residence in Australia does not transform earlier extraterritorial conduct that was not a matter of Australia's external affairs when it was engaged in into a matter of Australia's external affairs. Something more is needed to make transgressions of other laws in other places in other times an aspect of Australia's external affairs. It follows that, in my opinion, the Act cannot be supported as a law with respect to external affairs if no more than conduct answering the description of "a war crime" as that term is used in s.9 is relied on as the relevant aspect of external affairs; nor can the Act be so supported if, in addition to that conduct, the subsequent acquisition of Australian citizenship and residence is relied on to constitute the relevant aspect of external affairs. The Commonwealth did not submit that the Act is supportable as a law with respect to immigration, citizenship or the influx of criminals.

21. I pass now to a consideration of a more substantial argument, namely, that the external affairs power supports the Act because Australia's international relationships require or permit it to attach liability to criminal conviction to any person who has committed an act which amounts to "a war crime" as that term is used in s.9.

(ii) International relations.

(a) International obligation or concern and the right to try.

22. The Commonwealth submits that the Act discharges an international obligation or meets an international concern that persons alleged to be guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity be sought out, brought to trial and, upon conviction, punished, irrespective of the place where the crime was committed or where the alleged offender is found and irrespective of the citizenship or residence of the alleged offender or the victim. The propounded matter of international obligation or international concern is not stated merely in terms of seeking out and punishing persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity. A process of trial is concededly an integral part of the postulated obligation or concern. Therefore, the postulated international obligation or matter of international concern is that the guilt of an alleged criminal be ascertained by a court of competent jurisdiction administering a system of law which creates or recognizes the crime with which the alleged criminal is charged. The international instruments relating to the punishment of war criminals have uniformly contemplated trials according to law. In 1942, the Declaration of St. James placed among the main goals of war the punishment, "through the channels of organized justice", of war criminals. In 1943, the Moscow Declaration declared that those responsible for or taking part in atrocities, massacres and mass executions would be "sent back to the countries in which their abominable deeds were done in order that they may be judged and punished according to the laws of these liberated countries and of the free governments which will be created therein." That Declaration was echoed by a unanimous recommendation of the United Nations General Assembly in Resolution 3(I) of 13 February 1946 which was reaffirmed by Resolution 170(II) of 31 October 1947. The latter resolution "(r)easserts that trials of war criminals and traitors, like all other trials, should be governed by the principles of justice, law and evidence." Then, following a series of further resolutions, the General Assembly declared on 3 December 1973 (Resolution 3074(XXVIII)) that, inter alia -

" 5. Persons against whom there is evidence that they have committed war crimes and crimes against humanity shall be subject to trial and, if found guilty, to punishment, as a general rule in the countries in which they committed those crimes. In that connexion, States shall co-operate on questions of extraditing such persons."

The problem of statutory limitations on the prosecution of war crimes had been the subject of a United Nations Convention in 1968 but most members of the Council of Europe found that Convention unacceptable because of its broad definition of "crimes against humanity". A European Convention, drawn more narrowly, was signed in 1974 calling on each Contracting State to lift time limitations on the prosecution of certain war crimes and genocide punishable "under its domestic law" committed after the particular State ratified or acceded to the Convention or prior to that time if the limitation period had not then expired.

23. There can be no doubt but that, at least until 1974, there was a widespread desire expressed by the community of nations that the Axis perpetrators of war crimes during the Second World War should be apprehended, tried and, if found guilty, punished. Later evidence of this desire is meagre, though an agreement between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1989 relating to co-operation in investigating such war crimes suggests that some countries have continued the pursuit of war criminals. Although the instruments abovementioned gave jurisdictional priority to the courts of the States in whose territories the crimes were committed, there was also a general recognition that some crimes are international and are amenable to the jurisdiction either of international tribunals or of the courts of any State into whose hands the alleged criminal might fall.

24. The Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals (the Nuremberg Tribunal) which was attached to an Agreement dated 8 August 1945 between the major Allied Powers for the Prosecution and Punishment of the Major War Criminals of the European Axis contained a list of recognized war crimes in Art.6(b). By its Resolution 95(I) of 11 December 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations reaffirmed "the principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the Nurnberg Tribunal and the judgment of the Tribunal". Subsequent resolutions of the General Assembly or of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations requested member States to ensure that "in accordance with international law and national laws, the criminals responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity are traced, apprehended and equitably punished by the competent courts" (ECOSOC Resolution 1074D(XXXIX) of 28 July 1965). Moreover, each of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 prescribed a number of "grave breaches" which might be committed against persons or property protected by that Convention and contained a common provision in these terms:

" The High Contracting Parties undertake to enact any legislation necessary to provide effective penal sanctions for persons committing, or ordering to be committed, any of the grave breaches of the present Convention defined in the following Article.

Each High Contracting Party shall be under the obligation to search for persons alleged to have committed, or to have ordered to be committed, such grave breaches, and shall bring such persons, regardless of their nationality, before its own courts. It may also, if it prefers, and in accordance with the provisions of its own legislation, hand such persons over for trial to another High Contracting Party concerned, provided such High Contracting Party has made out a prima facie case."

(See Art.49, Geneva Convention I; Art.50, Geneva Convention II; Art.129, Geneva Convention III; Art.146, Geneva Convention IV.)

5914

25. These instruments establish that the trial and punishment of war crimes was, at least for many years after the Second World War, a matter of serious international concern and has become, under the Geneva Conventions, a matter of treaty obligation. In its Resolution 2712(XXV) of 15 December 1970, the General Assembly of the United Nations recognized that war crimes and crimes against humanity were still being committed, and requested States to take appropriate action to bring war criminals and persons guilty of crimes against humanity to justice. Yet Australia, in common with most other nations, failed for many years to respond to that request.

26. The primary question on this branch of the case is whether the material relied on establishes that in 1989 there was either an obligation under customary international law or a matter of international concern that war criminals from the pre-1945 years be sought out and tried for their offences. As the sources of the postulated obligation and of the postulated concern are the same, there is no difference in content between the obligation and the concern. There are no relevant treaty obligations. The treaty obligations imposed by the Geneva Conventions of 1949 were not retrospective. The legislative obligations accepted by Australia under those Conventions were fulfilled by the Geneva Conventions Act 1957 (Cth) which substantially translated the Convention provisions into Australian municipal law. Although the material demonstrates that there was a widespread aspiration that the war criminals of the Axis powers should be brought to justice after the Second World War and although that aspiration was repeated in a series of resolutions in the UNGA and in the Economic and Social Council, the practice of States in the community of nations does not reveal a widespread exercise of jurisdiction to try alleged war criminals for extraterritorial war crimes. European States have exercised jurisdiction in respect of war crimes committed in their respective territories, but Israel and Canada are the only States which have asserted jurisdiction to try alleged war criminals in respect of extraterritorial war crimes.

27. To determine whether, in these circumstances, there exists a customary law obligation to try alleged war criminals in respect of extraterritorial war crimes, it is necessary to refer to the sources of international law. Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice is generally regarded as a complete statement of the sources of international law: Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 4th ed. (1990), p 3. It provides:

> " The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:
>
> (a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States;
>
> (b) international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
>
> (c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
>
> (d) subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law."

28. In the absence of international conventions, the custom required to evidence "a general practice accepted as law" must be "extensive and virtually uniform" (North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (1969) I.C.J.R.1, at p 43) and "followed on the basis of a claim of right and, in turn, submitted to as a matter of obligation" (MacGibbon, "Customary International Law and Acquiescence", (1957) XXXIII The British Year Book of International Law 115, at p 117). In Nicaragua v. United States of America (1986) I.C.J.R.14, the International Court of Justice accepted (at p 98) that it is "sufficient that the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with" a postulated rule of international law, but that was a view expressed in conjunction with an inquiry whether there was an opinio juris as to the binding character of the postulated rule (see pp 99-101). An opinio juris supportive of a postulated rule of customary international law must explain and inform the practice of States in order to show that that practice is "accepted as law". The principle is conveniently stated by Dr Akehurst's summary of his article "Custom as a Source of International Law", (1974-1975) XLVII The British Year Book of International Law 1, at p 53:

5915

> " Opinio juris is necessary for the creation of customary rules; State practice, in order to create a customary rule, must be accompanied by (or consist of) statements that certain conduct is permitted, required or forbidden by international law (a claim that conduct is permitted can be inferred from the mere existence of such conduct, but claims that conduct is required or forbidden need to be stated expressly). It is not necessary that the State making such statements believes them to be true; what is necessary is that the statements are not challenged by other States."

In the present case, there is no evidence of widespread State practice which suggests that States are under a legal obligation to seek out Axis war criminals and to bring them to trial. There is no opinio juris supportive of such a rule.

29. Although there be no obligation in international law to which reference might be made in support of the validity of the Act, the external affairs power is not restricted to the support of laws passed to fulfil international treaty obligations (Richardson, at p 289) or to fulfil other obligations under customary international law. It has been recognized that the power may be enlivened by circumstances which do not give rise to an obligation under international law: The Tasmanian Dam Case, at pp 129-132, 171-172, 222, 258-259. Those circumstances have been said to be sufficient if they reveal that the subject matter of the law is a matter of "international concern". The reason why matters of international concern enliven the power was explained by Stephen J. in Koowarta, at p 217:

> "A subject-matter of international concern necessarily possesses the capacity to affect a country's relations with other nations and this quality is itself enough to make a subject-matter a part of a nation's 'external affairs'."

30. It is clear that the term "international concern" possesses no very precise meaning, for it may cover a diverse multitude of topics. However, its meaning cannot carry the external affairs power beyond the fulfilment of the purpose for which it was conferred. The Constitution summoned into existence a new Commonwealth that was to take its place among the nations of the world and, in the fulness of time, to act and to be seen to be acting independently of the Imperial Government. The Commonwealth was equipped not only with executive power, so that its voice might be heard and its actions might be seen by the international community, but with legislative power, so that the Commonwealth might ensure that our municipal laws were conducive to the discharge of our international duties and the effective assertion of our international rights. As treaty obligations and other obligations in international law possess the capacity to affect Australia's relations with other countries, those obligations are a matter of international concern, but not every subject of international dialogue or even of widespread international aspiration has the capacity to affect Australia's relations.

One purpose of the external affairs power is to furnish the Commonwealth with legislative authority to ensure that Australia acts in accordance with standards expected of and by the community of nations, even though those standards are not, or have not yet achieved the status of, obligations in international law. The observation of those standards may rightly be regarded as a matter of international concern. However, unless standards are broadly adhered to or are likely to be broadly adhered to in international practice and unless those standards are expressed in terms which clearly state the expectation of the community of nations, the subject of those standards cannot be described as a true matter of international concern. It may be that there are few occasions when the external affairs power is enlivened by the existence of a matter of international concern without a corresponding obligation in international law, but whether the enlivening factor be an obligation or a concern it is necessary to define it with some precision in order to ascertain the scope of the power. Understanding the notion of international concern in this way, the relationship between obligation and concern can be perceived - a relationship which requires elucidation in order to answer the question asked by Dawson J. in Richardson, at pp 322-323:

> "... if international concern is the touchstone, why is a treaty necessary at all? Why is international concern over a matter not sufficient of itself to bring it within the external affairs power?"

It would be erroneous to attribute a scope to the external affairs power which depended on the broadest meaning which could be given to the imprecise phrase "international concern": that phrase is not a constitutional text and it is used to indicate that the power relates to matters affecting Australia's external relations even if those matters are not obligations under international law.

31. In the present case, the postulated matter of international obligation or concern is not simply the punishment of war criminals but the seeking out, bringing to trial and punishment of war criminals. In my view, the material relied on to establish that Australia is or was obliged to take steps now to bring to trial in Australia suspected war criminals from the Second World War fails to do so, but the material does establish that the apprehension and prosecution of war criminals from the Second World War before international tribunals or before courts of the country in which the crimes were committed were matters of international concern for many years after 1945. Whether those matters were still of international concern in 1989 may be doubted. There is insufficient material to show that the apprehension and trial of such war criminals before courts of countries other than those in which the crimes were committed were ever matters of international concern.

32. However, I need not and I do not rest my judgment on this view for there is a further argument which depends simply on the existence of a universal jurisdiction to try international crimes. In the way in which this argument was first put by the Commonwealth, the Act was said to be a law adapted and appropriate to the exercise of a right which international law specially confers on each nation to try those charged with the commission of international crimes, especially war crimes. At first, the submission made by the Commonwealth identified the right to try as a right to try allegations of guilt of crimes defined by international law, albeit that definition was adopted by municipal law and applied as such.

33. Although the terminology which equates universal jurisdiction with a right might be open to question, I would hold that a law which vested in an Australian court a jurisdiction recognized by international law as a universal jurisdiction is a law with respect to Australia's external affairs. Australia's international personality would be incomplete if it were unable to exercise a jurisdiction to try and to punish offenders against the law of nations whose crimes are such that their subjection to universal jurisdiction is conducive to international peace and order. As the material drawn from international agreements and UNGA resolutions acknowledges, international law recognizes a State to have universal jurisdiction to try suspected war criminals whether or not that State is under an obligation to do so and whether or not there is any international concern that the State should do so.

34. Even if there were an international obligation or concern as postulated by the Commonwealth, its content must be this: that States should try war criminals in exercise of their universal jurisdiction to do so, for there is nothing to suggest that the postulated obligation or concern was to be satisfied or met by a trial in exercise of a jurisdiction which is not conferred by international law.

35. A municipal law which provides for the exercise of a universal jurisdiction recognized by international law must prescribe an appropriate system of law by which to try an alleged criminal and an appropriate court to exercise jurisdiction in the case. The present argument thus raises for consideration two questions: 1. what system of law does the community of nations recognize as applicable to the creation and definition of war crimes and crimes against humanity? and 2. what courts are recognized to possess universal jurisdiction to apply the relevant system of law?

36. International law recognizes certain international crimes in respect of which any country may exercise criminal jurisdiction regardless of the citizenship or residence of the alleged offender or of the place where the offence was committed: Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed., vol.18, par.1529; Professor Green, "International Crimes and the Legal Process", (1980) 29 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 567, at p 568. Brownlie, op cit, p 305, states the principle in this way:

> "It is now generally accepted that breaches of the laws of war, and especially of the Hague Convention of 1907 and the Geneva Convention of 1949, may be punished by any state which obtains custody of persons suspected of responsibility. This is often expressed as an acceptance of the principle of universality, but this is not strictly correct, since what is punished is the breach of international law; and the case is thus different from the punishment, under national law, of acts in respect of which international law gives a liberty to all states to punish, but does not itself declare criminal."

Piracy is an older example of a crime under international law as war crimes now are. Indeed, one author has described war crimes as "international crimes par excellence" (Van den Wijngaert, "War Crimes, Crimes Against Humanity, and Statutory Limitations" in Bassiouni (ed.), International Criminal Law, vol.3, (1987), p 91). In In re List (Hostages Trial) (1948) 15 Annual Digest 632, at p 636, the United States Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg said:

> " An international crime is such an act universally recognized as criminal, which is considered a grave matter of international concern and for some valid reason cannot be left within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state that would have control over it under ordinary circumstances. The inherent nature of a war crime is ordinarily itself sufficient justification for jurisdiction to attach in the courts of the belligerent into whose hands the alleged criminal has fallen."

37. A war crime in international law consists in a violation of those laws and customs of war - "breaches of the laws of war" as Brownlie calls them - which oblige belligerents to abstain from prescribed anti-humanitarian acts in the waging of armed conflicts. The laws and customs of war are prohibitory in nature; they do not authorize the use of force. M.W. Mouton, the Netherlands Representative on the United Nations War Crimes Commission, writing on "War Crimes and International Law" in Grotius International Yearbook (1940-1946), said (at p 59):

5918

> " The laws and customs of war never justify any killing, on the contrary they limit the right as to the choice of means of injuring the enemy (Hague regulations art. 22); forbid unnecessary cruelty and acts of barbarity against the enemy, limit the evils of war and unnecessary suffering and protect the civil population of an occupied country (see the preamble of the Hague regulations) and try to make lasting peaceful relations after the hostilities possible.
> Killing is not punishable in the course of combat. But killing is the form of execution between parties who have taken the 'law' into their own hands for want of a court or a judge. The laws and customs of war are the procedural rules about this execution, laying down e.g. that torture is not allowed, that killing should be limited to armed combatants in action."

The prohibitory nature of the laws and customs of war is illustrated by Art.22 of the Hague Regulations of 1907 which provides:

> " The right of belligerents to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited."

War crimes, being violations of the laws and customs of war, thus consist in acts which transgress the limitations imposed by those laws and customs. Such transgressions are universally condemned and are internationally recognized as crimes which can be tried according to international law by the courts of any nation into whose hands the offender falls. The same national competence was recognized in relation to the offence of piracy, as the Privy Council observed in In re Piracy Jure Gentium (1934) AC 586, at p 589:

> " With regard to crimes as defined by international law, that law has no means of trying or punishing them. The recognition of them as constituting crimes, and the trial and punishment of the criminals, are left to the municipal law of each country. But whereas according to international law the criminal jurisdiction of municipal law is ordinarily restricted to crimes committed on its terra firma or territorial waters or its own ships, and to crimes by its own nationals wherever committed, it is also recognized as extending to piracy committed on the high seas by any national on any ship, because a person guilty of such piracy has placed himself beyond the protection of any State. He is no longer a national, but 'hostis humani generis' and as such he is justiciable by any State anywhere".

Their Lordships' statement that recognition of crimes as defined by international law is "left to the municipal law of each country" should not be understood to mean that international law accepts whatever definition of an international crime the municipal law may contain. Rather, what is left to municipal law is the adoption of international law as the governing law of what is an international crime. So much appears from the judgment of Judge Moore (dissenting, but not on this point) in The S.S. Lotus (1927) 2 W.C.R.20, at p 69:

> "in the case of what is known as piracy by law of nations, there has been conceded a universal jurisdiction, under which the person charged with the offence may be tried and punished by any nation into whose jurisdiction he may come. I say 'piracy by law of nations', because the municipal laws of many States denominate and punish as 'piracy' numerous acts which do not constitute piracy by law of nations, and > which therefore are not of universal cognizance, so as to be punishable by all nations.

5919

>
> Piracy by law of nations, in its jurisdictional aspects, is sui generis. Though statutes may provide for its punishment, it is an offence against the law of nations; and as the scene of the pirate's operations is the high seas, which it is not the right or duty of any nation to police, he is denied the protection of the flag which he may carry, and is treated as an outlaw, as the enemy of all mankind - hostis humani generis - whom any nation may in the interest of all capture and punish."

The universal jurisdiction to try war criminals is a jurisdiction to try those alleged to have committed war crimes as defined by international law: see Simons, "The Jurisdictional Bases of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg" in Ginsburgs and Kudriavtsev (eds), The Nuremberg Trial and International Law, (1990), pp 48-49. But jurisdiction under municipal law to try a municipal law offence which is similar to but not identical with an international crime is not recognized as a jurisdiction conferred or recognized by the law of nations. Professor Green, op cit, p 571, comments:

> "If a country introduces legislation describing some offence under its own criminal law as constituting, for example, piracy, and includes within that term offences which do not strictly fall within the international law definition, then that law can only be invoked to establish jurisdiction against nationals or residents of the country in question, a principle that was made crystal clear by Lord Stowell in his decision in the Le Louis in 1817, and the situation is the same, even if the offence so described were to constitute an international crime under some other name or concept. Equally, if a country uses in its national criminal law a definition that only partly meets the conditions of international law, especially if the offence in question has been defined in a treaty, the courts of that country would only be entitled to try those whose actions fall within its own definition, although it might well be that the country concerned might have breached its international obligations by adopting so narrow a definition."

38. However, when municipal law adopts the international law definition of a crime as the municipal law definition of the crime, the jurisdiction exercised in applying the municipal law is recognized as an appropriate means of exercising universal jurisdiction under international law. Brownlie, op cit, p 561, states the position thus:

> " Since the latter half of the nineteenth century it has been generally recognized that there are acts or omissions for which international law imposes criminal responsibility on individuals and for which punishment may be imposed, either by properly empowered international tribunals or by national courts and military tribunals. These tribunals exercise an international jurisdiction by reason of the law applied and the constitution of the tribunal, or, in the case of national courts, by reason of the law applied and the nature of jurisdiction (the exercise of which is justified by international law)."

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States to try cases of international crime was founded on the application by municipal courts of international law. Thus, in an early American case (United States v. Smith (1820) 5 Wheat.153, noted in the report of The Magellan Pirates (1853) 1 Sp Ecc and Ad 81, at pp 90-91 (164 ER 47, at pp 52-53)), the Supreme Court of the United States held that American common law "recognises and punishes piracy as an offence, not against its own municipal code, but as an offence against the Law of Nations (which is part of the Common Law), as an offence against the universal law of society; a pirate being deemed an enemy of the human race." In that case and in Ex parte Quirin (1942) 317 US 1, the Court spoke in terms which suggested that the courts of the United States applied international law directly as part of the municipal law of the United States. Thus in Ex parte Quirin, at pp 27-28, the Court said:

> " From the very beginning of its history this Court has recognized and applied the law of war as including that part of the law of nations which prescribes, for the conduct of war, the status, rights and duties of enemy nations as well as of enemy individuals."

In In re Yamashita (1946) 327 US 1, the Court, speaking in more guarded language, observed (at p 16) that -

> " We do not make the laws of war but we respect them so far as they do not conflict with the commands of Congress or the Constitution."

(Cf. Art.I, s.8, cl.10 of the United States Constitution which confers on the Congress power "To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations".)

39. International law distinguishes between crimes as defined by it and crimes as defined by municipal law and it makes a corresponding distinction between jurisdiction to try crimes as defined by international law and jurisdiction to try crimes as defined by municipal law. Professor Lauterpacht ("The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes", (1944) XXI The British Year Book of International Law 58, at pp 65-67) held the opinion that the law which must be applied in connection with the prosecution and punishment of war criminals is primarily the law of nations and that, by applying the law of nations, municipal legislation providing for the trial of war criminals avoids the reproach of retroactivity and breach of the principle nullum crimen sine lege. He wrote:

> "Once it is realized that the offenders are being prosecuted, in substance, for breaches of international law, then any doubts due to inadequacy of the municipal law of any given State determined to punish war crimes recede into the background. There is in this matter no question of any vindictive retroactivity arising out of the creation of crimes of which the accused could not possibly be cognizant. There is even no question of procedural retroactivity by subjecting him to a foreign jurisdiction in defiance of established law and principles. The law of Great Britain, of the United States, and of many other States, does not, as a rule, recognize the competence of national courts in respect of criminal acts committed by aliens abroad. But there would be no question of any retroactivity, contrary to justice and to established principles of law, if Great Britain were to alter her law so as to enable her tribunals, civil or military, whether functioning in Great Britain or abroad, to assume jurisdiction over German nationals who committed in Germany criminal offences against British prisoners of war or British civilians in circumstances not authorized by international law.
>
> It would thus appear that there is no novelty about the principle that a belligerent is entitled to punish such perpetrators of war crimes as fall into his hands; that that principle, far from being a mere assertion of power, grudgingly assented to by international law, on the part of the fortunate belligerent is, in turn, grounded in the fact of recognition by international law of the jurisdiction of

5921

States based on the territorial and cognate principles as well as in the fact that in punishing war criminals the belligerent applies and enforces, in essence, the rules of the law of nations which are binding upon the individual members of the armed forces of all belligerents; and that there is no question of any retroactive application of the law from any material point of view."

40. In the Netherlands, war crimes committed by the occupying forces of Germany during the Second World War were, for a time after the War, prosecuted under municipal laws. This procedure, like the procedure contemplated by the Act, required some consideration of the relationship between international law and municipal law. A Special Court of Cassation refused to apply the municipal law of manslaughter to the trial of Ahlbrecht (1946-1947) - see Mouton, op cit, p 54 - an alleged war criminal who had been convicted and sentenced to death by the Special Court at Arnhem. The Special Court of Cassation was of the view that an army in occupation of foreign territory brings its own penal code, courts martial and penal procedure with it, but the members of the occupying forces may be brought to trial at the cessation of hostilities for violations of the laws and customs of war. The Court's judgment continued:

"however this conclusion in no way implies that as the Netherlands law now stands the Netherlands judge already possesses legal competence over enemy war criminals; ... for this, more is necessary, namely that the Netherlands judge can either directly apply an international agreement brought about to this effect with the co-operation of the Netherlands, or can base himself on a Netherlands law in which the legislator has set out in a concrete legal form his (the judge's) internationally recognised competence over enemy war criminals in the national sphere etc.".

The Court found no statement of international law in the municipal statutory provisions, as they then stood, observing that the view that the municipal statutory provisions applied to the case -

"proceeds from the mistaken train of thought that international law would give the Netherlands jurisdiction over all members of the enemy forces and officials who committed ... acts in this country which could be construed as coming under any act described and made punishable in the Netherlands Penal Code, unless they could put forward in their defence that a positive rule of international law nevertheless allowed them full liberty to commit those acts; ... however this version inverts the correct relationship of things and gives far too wide a scope to that jurisdiction which international law has granted to States over members of a hostile occupying force; ... on the contrary this jurisdiction is limited in principle to those among them who while in this country violated the laws or customs of war and who on those grounds alone can be tried by Netherlands courts; ... in other words, international law does not here function as a general ground of excuse for a foreign power whose actions in this country should in principle come fully under the provisions of the penal law, in force here, but on the contrary it does by way of exception give jurisdiction to that State where the hostile army operated with respect to the members of that army and its followers who violated there the laws or customs of war, and does so only for that purpose; ... it would be unreasonable to try foreign soldiers and officials according to Netherlands rules which were not written for them instead of trying them by those rules, written for them, which govern warfare and also taking into account the provision regarding superior orders which was accepted in article 8 of the Charter belonging to the London Agreement; ... indeed all those international documents quoted above take the line that alone the violation of the rules of war forms a basis for foreign jurisdiction": Mouton, op cit, pp 54-56 (emphasis added).

5922

Subsequently, the municipal law was amended by making punishable war crimes and crimes against humanity as defined by the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal (Baxter, "The Municipal and International Law Basis of Jurisdiction over War Crimes", (1951) XXVIII The British Year Book of International Law 382, at p 384). Whether or not it be right to say that contraventions of the laws and customs of war are the only crimes for which the members of the military forces of an enemy power in occupation of the territory of a State may be prosecuted in the courts of that State after the occupation ceases, it seems that municipal law can govern the acts done in the course and for the purposes of the occupation only if those acts fail to comply with the law of nations governing armed conflict and hostile occupation. This is the principle on which France and Norway acted in the trial of war criminals after the Second World War (Baxter, op cit, at pp 384-385) and there is authority to support that view in United States cases after the Civil War: Coleman v. Tennessee (1878) 97 US 509; Dow v. Johnson (1879) 100 US 158. Whether contraventions of the laws and customs of war constitute the only crimes justiciable by the courts of the State whose territory has been occupied or whether such contraventions remove the immunity from municipal law to which occupying forces are entitled in respect of acts done in the course and for the purposes of hostile occupation, the prosecution must establish such a contravention in order to obtain a conviction.

41. Historically, war crimes allegedly committed by the forces of a belligerent power were tried according to international law by military courts or commissions created for the purpose by the other belligerent: Mouton, op cit, p 39. In pursuance of the policy adopted by the Allied Powers in the Second World War to bring war criminals to justice, international military tribunals were constituted by the Allied Powers and military courts or commissions were appointed by particular nations for the purpose. The respective jurisdictions of these tribunals to try persons accused of war crimes were prescribed by the instruments which constituted them. Article 6 of the Nuremberg Charter prescribed the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Nuremberg Tribunal; similar provisions were inserted in the proclamation by the Supreme Commander for the Allied Forces in the Pacific War setting up the International Military Tribunal for the Far East: Mouton, op cit, p 53. Article 6(b) defined "war crimes" as follows:

"War crimes: namely, violations of the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to, murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war or persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity".

The Nuremberg Tribunal observed, (1947) 41 The American Journal of International Law 172, at p 248:

" The Tribunal is of course bound by the Charter, in the definition which it gives both of War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity. With respect to War Crimes, however, as has already been pointed out, the crimes defined by Article 6, Section (b), of the Charter were already recognized as War Crimes under international law. They were covered by > Articles 46, 50, 52, and 56 of the Hague Convention of 1907, and Articles 2, 3, 4, 46, and 51 of the Geneva Convention of 1929. That violation of these provisions constituted crimes for which the guilty individuals were punishable is too well settled to admit of argument."

42. Apart from the coercive jurisdiction of international tribunals, enforcement of international law governing war crimes is a matter for the particular State into whose hands the alleged criminal falls. In In re Altstotter (The Justice Trial) (1947) 14 Annual Digest 278, at pp 282-283, the United States Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, dealing with the universality of punishment of war crimes, said:

> "This universality and superiority of international law does not necessarily imply universality of its enforcement. As to the punishment of persons guilty of violating the laws and customs of war (war crimes in the narrow sense), it has always been recognised that tribunals may be established and punishment imposed by the State into whose hands the perpetrators fall. Those rules of international law were recognised as paramount, and jurisdiction to enforce them by the injured belligerent government, whether within the territorial boundaries of the State or in occupied territory, has been unquestioned. (Ex parte Quirin, supra; In re Yamashita, 90 L Ed 343.)"

43. In Australia, the original War Crimes Act (No.48 of 1945) provided for the convening of military courts with "power to try persons charged with war crimes committed, at any place whatsoever, ... against any person who was at any time resident in Australia ..." (see s.7), "war crimes" being so defined as to import the law of nations: see s.3 and the instrument of appointment therein mentioned. Act No.48 of 1945 did not exhaust the jurisdiction over war crimes which international law recognized Australia to possess, for the jurisdiction created by s.7 was limited to war crimes against Australian residents. Although the jurisdiction vested in military courts by that Act was jurisdiction to administer international law, upon amendment of the War Crimes Act the jurisdiction vested in the competent courts of the several States and Territories (s.13(1)) was jurisdiction to administer not international law but, as we have seen, a purely municipal law having a retrospective operation.

44. There is no reason why jurisdiction to try persons alleged to be guilty of war crimes should be conferred only on military courts or commissions. I would respectfully agree with what Lord Simon L.C. said in the House of Lords on 7 October 1942 (quoted in War Crimes: Report of the War Crimes Inquiry (UK) - the Hetherington Report - Cm.744, (1989), pars 6.41, 6.42):

> "I take it to be perfectly well-established International Law that the laws of war permit a belligerent commander to punish by means of his Military Courts any hostile offender against the laws and customs of war who may fall into his hands wherever be the place where the crime was committed. ... National courts, in my view, are equally entitled to exercise whatever criminal jurisdiction would be conceded to them by International law ... The real question ... is not so much whether the domestic law of a particular nation has already conferred upon the particular national Courts concerned a particular jurisdiction. It may not have gone to the full length which International Law would recognise and permit. The important question is this: what is the ambit of the jurisdiction which might by International Law be conferred upon them, as for example, in the present case, > by Parliament here actually legislating to enlarge, within permissible limits, the jurisdiction of our Courts to deal with crimes committed abroad?" (Official Report (Hansard): cols 578-579.)

The Hetherington Report observes (par.6.42):

> "Legal opinion at the time seems to have been that jurisdiction over violations of the laws and customs of war existed, and that there was a need to legislate only to empower the domestic courts to utilise the jurisdiction which was already available under international law."

It follows that it is no objection to the validity of the Act that it selects the ordinary courts of the States and Territories as the tribunals for the trial of persons charged with "a war crime".

45. It is one thing to vest in a municipal court jurisdiction to administer the law of nations, albeit that that law is adopted by the municipal law. It is another thing to vest jurisdiction to administer municipal law that does not correspond with international law. The real objection to the validity of the Act is that the Act rejects international law as the governing law for the trial of persons allegedly guilty of war crimes and adopts a municipal law definition which operates retrospectively. That retrospectivity denies to the Act the capacity to satisfy an international obligation or to meet an international concern or to confer a universal jurisdiction recognized by international law.

46. International law does not create an international crime retrospectively. The judgment of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg was concerned to repel the suggestion that its jurisdiction extended to the imposition of criminal penalties for acts that were not forbidden by international law when they were done. Subsequently, the question of retrospectivity arose in respect of Control Council Law No.10 by which the Allied Control Council conferred jurisdiction upon Military Tribunals sitting in the respective occupation zones of Germany after the Second World War to try persons accused of crimes "recognized" by Law No.10. An objection that the crimes so recognized (stated more broadly in the case of crimes against humanity than in the Nuremberg Charter) were retrospective was rejected by the United States Military Tribunal at Nuremberg (In re List (Hostages Trial)). The correspondence between the offences defined by Law No.10 and crimes under international law may be doubted but the Military Tribunal asserted that there was correspondence in order to answer the argument that Law No.10 was retrospective. The judgment contained the following passage (at pp 634-636):

> " (2) Control Council Law No.10 and the Principle of 'Nullum Crimen Sine Lege'. - It is urged that Control Council Law No.10 is an ex post facto act and retroactive in nature as to the crime charged in the indictment. The act was adopted on 20th December, 1945, a date subsequent to the dates of the acts charged to be crimes. It is a fundamental principle of criminal jurisprudence that one may not be charged with crime for the doing of an act which was not a crime at the time of its commission. We think it could be said with justification that Article 23 (h) of the Hague Regulations of 1907 operates as a bar to retroactive action in criminal matters. In any event, we are of the opinion that a victorious nation may not lawfully enact legislation defining a new crime and make it effective as to acts previously occurring which were not at the time unlawful. It therefore becomes the duty of a Tribunal trying a case charging a crime under the provisions of Control Council Law No.10, to determine if the acts charged were crimes at the time of their commission and that Control Council Law No.10 > is in fact declaratory of then existing International Law. This very question was passed upon by the International Military Tribunal in the case of the United States v. Hermann Wilhelm Goering in its judgment entered on 1st October, 1946 (13 Annual Digest 203). Similar provisions appearing in the Charter creating the International Military Tribunal and defining the crimes over which it had jurisdiction were held to be devoid of retroactive features in the following language: 'The Charter is not an arbitrary exercise of power on the part of the victorious nations, but in (the) view of the Tribunal, as will be shown, it is the expression of International Law existing at the time of its creation; and to that extent is itself a contribution to International Law'. ... The crimes defined in Control Council Law No.10 which we have quoted herein, were crimes under pre-existing rules of International Law - some by conventional law and some by customary law. ... If the acts charged were in fact crimes under International Law when committed, they cannot be said to be ex post facto acts or retroactive pronouncements. ...

5925

>
> It is true, of course, that customary International Law is not static. It must be elastic enough to meet the new conditions that natural progress brings to the world. It might be argued that this requires a certain amount of retroactive application of new rules and that, by conceding the existence of a customary International Law, one thereby concedes the legality of retroactive pronouncements. To a limited extent the argument is sound, but when it comes in conflict with a rule of fundamental right and justice, the latter must prevail. The rule that one may not be charged with crime for committing an act which was not a crime at the time of its commission is such a right. The fact that it might be found in a constitution or bill of rights does not detract from its status as a fundamental principle of justice. It cannot properly be changed by retroactive action to the prejudice of one charged with a violation of the laws of war."

47. Whether or not all the offences recognized by Law No.10 were at all material times offences against the law of nations, the principle against retrospectivity is rightly stated. Some texts have suggested that, in international law, there is no rule forbidding the enactment or adoption of criminal laws with retrospective force: see the discussion by the Supreme Court of Israel in Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann (1962) 36 ILR 277, at pp 281-283, the Report of the Canadian Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals (Deschenes Commission), (1986), pp 137-138, and the writings therein mentioned. The better view now, if not in earlier times, is that the rule of customary international law is as expressed in Art.15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, (1966):

> "1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. ...
>
> 2. Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations."

Article 99 of the 1949 Geneva Convention (III) Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War contains a similar provision:

5926

" No prisoner of war may be tried or sentenced for an act which is not forbidden by the law of the Detaining Power or by International Law, in force at the time the said act was committed."

Oppenheim, International Law, 7th ed. (1952), vol.II, p 390, comments:

"The reference to International Law, which did not appear in the Convention of 1929, is intended to remove any doubts as to the right of the detaining belligerent to try prisoners of war for war crimes."

48. Thus international law not only refuses to countenance retrospective provisions in international criminal law; it condemns as offensive to human rights retrospective municipal criminal law imposing a punishment for crime unless the crime was a crime under international law at the time when the relevant act was done. It follows that there can be no international obligation to enact a municipal law to attach a penalty to past conduct unless that conduct, at the time when it was engaged in, was a crime under international law. International concerns must be qualified in like manner. For present purposes, the relevant time is between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945: s.9(1)(a) of the Act. The jurisdiction of a national court to try a person for a war crime will be recognized as a universal jurisdiction in international law if the crime as defined by a post-war municipal law was an international crime at the time of its commission, but not otherwise.

49. In ascertaining whether the jurisdiction of a national court to try alleged war criminals from the Second World War is a universal jurisdiction recognized by international law, the correct approach is that taken by the Hetherington Report in pars 6.36 and 6.37:

"6.36. The principles nullem crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege are basic tenets of law, and are themselves included in the laws and constitutions of many countries. No state may enact legislation to deem an act a crime or render it punishable when it was not considered to be a criminal offence under the law at the time of its commission, and thus give its courts jurisdiction in respect of those acts. These principles are also enshrined in international conventions and declarations including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1966 (Article 15); the European Convention on Human Rights 1950 (Article 7); and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 (Article 11).

6.37. To apply these principles to war crimes as defined by this Inquiry's terms of reference it is necessary to consider whether the acts or omissions were crimes at the time of their commission, and, if so, whether there was jurisdiction over them at the time of their commission and whether the British criminal courts could now have jurisdiction over them."

Therefore, the question is whether the statutory offence created by s.9 of the Act corresponds with the international law definition of international crimes existing at the relevant time. If it does, the Act vests jurisdiction to try alleged war criminals for crimes which were crimes under the applicable (international) law when they were committed; its apparent retrospectivity in municipal law is no bar to the exercise of a universal jurisdiction recognized by international law and that is sufficient to enliven the external affairs power to support the Act which vests that jurisdiction. Even if there be no international obligation or concern calling for the exercise of the universal jurisdiction, a statutory vesting of the jurisdiction would be essential to its exercise by an Australian court and that would suffice to give the support of s.51(xxix) to the law. But if the statutory offence created by s.9 does not correspond with the international law definition of international crimes existing before 8 May 1945, the retrospective creation by Australian municipal law of the crime defined by the Act is offensive to international law. In that event, the Act cannot be seen to satisfy an international obligation, to meet an international concern or (subject to a further submission yet to be considered) to be appropriate and adapted to the vesting of a universal jurisdiction.

5927

50. This view is consistent with the view of Professor Baxter who, after the Supreme Court of Israel had affirmed Israel's jurisdiction to try and to condemn Eichmann for war crimes and other violations of international law committed before Israel came into existence, added a postscript to his article on "The Municipal and International Law Basis of Jurisdiction over War Crimes", op cit. The postscript appears in Bassiouni and Nanda (eds), A Treatise on International Criminal Law, (1973), vol.2, p 65. The author wrote (at p 83):

> " There could be no objection under international law to Israeli law's reaching out to 'a person' of whatsoever nationality to the extent that the municipal law of that country merely incorporated in its law crimes under international law subject to universal jurisdiction. It is thus necessary to examine the consistency of the crimes defined by the law of Israel with those crimes recognized by international law."

Baxter's conclusion was that Israeli municipal law defined war crimes restrictively and not more broadly than the international law definition, but he stopped short of affirming that Israel's definition of crimes other than war crimes conformed to international law.

51. At this stage, the differing operation of s.7(1) and s.7(3) should be noted. Section 7(1) relates to "serious crimes" which, having been committed in connection with a war or armed conflict, might have amounted to a war crime in international law; s.7(3), on the other hand, relates to "serious crimes" committed in a country while it was at war or under hostile occupation, but it is immaterial whether the victims were of the same nationality as the offender or not. Serious crimes falling within s.7(3) might have amounted to what has become known as crimes against humanity. Before considering crimes against humanity, we should enquire whether s.9 of the Act, by the operation of ss.6, 7(1) and 17, creates an offence which corresponds with a war crime as defined by the law of nations.
"A war crime" in s.9 and a war crime in the law of nations.

52. Section 6(3) of the Act requires a court, in determining whether an act committed outside Australia is "a serious crime" to "imagine another act committed (in a part of Australia) which is similar in all relevant respects" (per Lord Reid in Cox v. Army Council (1963) AC 48, at p 70). Although Lord Reid went on to say that murder and theft "are the same all the world over", there are conceptual difficulties in translating a killing in the course and for the purposes of military activity in Europe (including hostile military occupation of a European State) into a part of Australia. Presumably, in the notional translation directed by s.6(3)(b), the victim must be treated as having been within "the King's peace" (cf. Reg. v. Page (1954) 1 QB 170) so that that element of culpable homicide can be established. But what is the position of an accused who, as a member of military forces, killed "in the course of hostilities in a war" or in any of the other circumstances referred to in s.7(1)? If it be right to say that the members of an enemy force in occupation of a State are immune from the municipal law of the State provided they do not act in violation of the law and customs of war, an accused looking at ss.6, 7(1) and 9 of the Act might have argued that his act would not have amounted to one of the offences under municipal law mentioned in s.6(1) unless it were proved to be an act done in violation of the laws and customs of war.

Had that been the effect of the Act, the law of nations would have governed his liability to conviction as for an offence under s.9. Sections 6 and 7 would have operated as restrictions on liability to conviction for war crimes as defined in international law. But s.17 precludes that construction. It is enacted as a critical part of a code which determines the liability to conviction of a person who is proved to have committed an act falling within ss.6 and 7. One cannot postulate, for the purposes of s.6, that the members of an enemy force are immune from punishment for the municipal law offences mentioned in s.6(1) except where the act charged violated the laws and customs of war, for that would make s.17(2) otiose. Section 6 must bring deliberate and wilful killing by a member of an enemy force into the category of "serious crime" unless the usual defences - self-defence, mistake, etc. - are open on the facts of the particular case, leaving s.17(2) to take out of "a war crime" any killing which falls within its terms. The Act thus displaces the essential character of a war crime under the law of nations as a violation of the laws and customs of war and seeks to make the laws, customs and usages of war a source of excuse. Section 17(2) is misconceived, as Baxter (op cit, p 388) explains:

> " If, in those states in which war crimes are tried under municipal law, the function of international law is to furnish a justification for acts of warfare which are thereby recognized to be lawful, the law of war loses its reasonableness. The international law of war is 'prohibitive law' and its purpose is to place curbs upon the otherwise unrestrained violence of war. Belligerent acts in war are facts, not legal rights, and to set the law to justifying them, instead of keeping them within limits which comport with the dictates of humanity, leads to a law which places its emphasis on the rightness of war to the detriment of what is wrong in war. Any theory which relies on the law of nations as a defence for belligerent acts thus fails to accord with the true raison d'etre of the law of war and with the many expressions of the intentions of those who have contributed to its development in recent years."

Sub-section (2) does not stand alone as a defence. Sub-section (3) provides a dictionary for sub-s.(2) and calls for a factual evaluation of what was "reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war." It may be that the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war could be construed to embrace any military objective which is not unlawful by the laws and customs of war (see Bindschedler-Robert, "Problems of the Law of Armed Conflicts" in Bassiouni and Nanda (eds), op cit, vol.1, p 295, at pp 304-306), a construction that would be repetitive of the concepts in sub-s.(2)(a). However that may be, the requirement that the act charged be "reasonably justified" leaves the way open for a jury to make an evaluation of the facts adverse to an accused although the legal restrictions on military action prescribed by the laws and customs of war have not been violated. By the combined operation of sub-ss.(2) and (3) of s.17, the laws and customs of war are excluded as the legal criterion of criminal liability capable of application by direction of the trial judge and are replaced by the factual criterion of reasonable justification which a jury, probably inexperienced in the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war, must apply as best it can.

53. The disconformity between the statutory offence purportedly created by s.9 of the Act and a war crime in international law can be illustrated by taking, as an example, the facts of the case in Osman Bin Haji Mohamed Ali v. Public Prosecutor (1969) 1 AC 430 where Indonesian military personnel penetrated into enemy territory (Singapore) and, in doing sabotage, caused death. Had they been acting under legitimate orders and had they been wearing uniform, they may have been able to plead that their act was immune from municipal law as an act of State of a belligerent Power (Wright, "War Criminals", (1945) 39 The American Journal of International Law 257, at pp 272-273) but, as they wore no uniform and concealed their identity in order to sabotage their objective, they were held to have forfeited the protection of a prisoner of war under the Geneva Convention (whether of 1929 or 1949) and were liable to conviction for murder under municipal law. As the laws and customs of war do not "permit" such an act, such an act would amount to "a war crime" under s.9. Yet such an act is no contravention of the laws and customs of war, at least where the objective of the sabotage is legitimate. Oppenheim, International Law, 7th ed., vol.II, par.255, deals with cases of this kind which are sometimes designated as "war treason". That designation includes cases of "(w)recking of military trains, destruction of the lines of communication or of telegraphs or telephones in the interest of the enemy, and destruction of any war material for the same purpose". The author writes, at pp 574-576:

5929.

> " Espionage and so-called war treason ... bear a twofold character. International Law gives a right to belligerents to use them. On the other hand, it gives a right to belligerents to consider them, when committed by enemy soldiers or enemy private individuals within their lines, as acts of illegitimate warfare, and consequently liable to punishment - though it seems improper to characterise such acts as war crimes. ...
>
> So-called 'war treason' consists of all such acts ... committed within the lines of a belligerent as are harmful to him and are intended to favour the enemy. It may be committed, not only in occupied enemy country, or in the zone of military operations, but anywhere within the lines of a belligerent.
>
> Enemy soldiers - in contradistinction to private enemy individuals - may only be punished for such acts when they have committed them during their stay within a belligerent's lines under disguise. If, for instance, two soldiers in uniform are sent to the rear of the enemy to destroy a bridge, they may not, when caught, be punished for 'war treason,' because their act was one of legitimate warfare. But if they exchange their uniforms for plain clothes, and thereby appear to be members of the peaceful private population, they are liable to punishment." (Emphasis added.)

By applying Australian municipal law, s.9 would hold the out-of-uniform saboteur of a legitimate objective behind enemy lines in Europe guilty of a war crime consisting in the "serious crime" of murder if the sabotage was likely to cause death and did cause death - unless the accused can point to or adduce evidence to show that his act "was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war."

54. Even if "permitted by" in s.17(2)(a) were construed as meaning "not in violation of" the laws, customs and usages of war, s.17 would not bring the offence created by s.9 into correspondence with international law. Section 17 provides a defence to what has been proved under ss.6 and 7. The issue of violation of the laws and customs of war would not arise unless the accused could point to or adduce "evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence" - and to do so in a trial more than forty years after the event. Instead of adopting the international law definition of a war crime, the Act has created an offence which holds members of an enemy force to be subject to municipal law in respect of acts done "in the course of hostilities in a war" and, instead of restricting criminal liability to acts done in violation of the laws and customs of war, holds an accused liable to conviction unless he can point to or adduce evidence which might lead a jury to acquit on the ground that the act "was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war." Thus the offence which ss.6, 7(1), 9 and 17 create is in disconformity with the offence of a war crime as defined by the law of nations.

5930

55. It is arguable that s.16 (to which s.17(2) is subject) creates a further disconformity between the municipal law and the international law of war crimes or, at least, the international law of war crimes as it existed during the period 1 September 1939 to 8 May 1945. Subject to s.6(2), s.16 excludes a defence of superior orders. It prescribes a rule which is the converse of Art.443 of the Australian Manual of Military Law, as it stood at 1 September 1939. After setting out the more important violations of the laws of war, Art.443 read:

> "It is important, however, to note that members of the armed forces who commit such violations of the recognized rules of warfare as are ordered by their Government, or by their commander, are not war criminals and cannot therefore be punished by the enemy. He may punish the officials or commanders responsible for such orders if they fall into his hands, but otherwise he may only resort to the other means of obtaining redress which are dealt with in this chapter."

This proposition, which had been copied from the British Manual of Military Law, 7th ed. (1929), was in substantial accord with the Rules of Land Warfare (1940) approved by the General Staff of the United States Army and then in force. Art.347 of those Rules read as follows:

> "... Individuals of the armed forces will not be punished for these offences in case they are committed under the orders or sanction of their government or commanders. The commanders ordering the commission of such acts, or under whose authority they are committed by their troops, may be punished by the belligerent into whose hands they may fall."

The concurrent views of the Australian, British and United States military forces as at 1 September 1939 embraced the doctrine of respondeat superior advanced by Professor Oppenheim in his work International Law (5th ed., vol.II, pp 453-454):

> " Violations of rules regarding warfare are war crimes only when committed without an order of the belligerent Government concerned. If members of the armed forces commit violations by order of their Government, they are not war criminals, and may not be punished by the enemy; the latter may, however, resort to reprisals. In case members of forces commit violations ordered by their commanders, the members may not be punished, for the commanders are alone responsible, and the latter may, therefore, be punished as war criminals on their capture by the enemy."

56. The doctrine of respondeat superior had been applied in the case of Commander Karl Neumann (The "Dover Castle") (1921) 16 The American Journal of International Law 704 by the Second Criminal Senate of the Imperial Court of Justice of Germany (the Reichsgericht), but that Court's view of the doctrine appears more clearly from its decision in the case of Lieutenants Dithmar and Boldt (The "Llandovery Castle") (1921) 16 The American Journal of International Law 708. There it was held (at p 722) that a defence of superior orders was not available "if (the) order is universally known to everybody, including also the accused, to be without any doubt whatever against the law". The correctness of an unqualified doctrine of respondeat superior was questioned by Lord Cave in an address to the Grotius Society in 1922: (1922) 8 Grotius Transactions, p xix. Lord Cave thought that the true scope of the doctrine "limits the impunity of the soldier to cases where the orders are not so manifestly illegal that he must or ought to have known they were unlawful": at p xxiii. In 1942, Professor Lauterpacht rejected the unqualified defence of superior orders in a memorandum to a committee of the International Commission for Penal Reconstruction and Development, which was approved by the Commission and by the participating governments: see Dinstein, The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law, (1965), p 104. Professor Lauterpacht said:

> " There ought to be no doubt that should courts entrusted with the trial of war crimes disregard altogether the plea of superior orders, they would be adopting a course which could not be regarded as defensible. On the other hand, while the fact of superior orders sets a limit to the punishment of acts which might otherwise constitute war crimes, it need not warp the effectiveness of the law in a manner which may rightly be regarded as a perversion of justice. It will not cover crimes committed by superior authorities and officers acting under their own responsibility and initiative; it will not protect criminal acts committed by subordinates for purposes of private gain and lust; it will not shield acts committed in pursuance of orders so glaringly offending against fundamental conceptions of law and humanity as to remove them from the orbit of any possible justification, including that of immediate danger to the person charged with the execution of the orders; it will not excuse crimes committed in obedience to unlawful orders in circumstances in which the person executing the crime was not acting under the immediate impact of fear of drastic consequences of summary martial justice following upon a refusal to act (the latter being crimes perpetrated by the vast army of officials in the occupied territories). If these limits of the doctrine of superior orders are taken into consideration, then its judicious application, far from defeating the ends of justice, may testify in a significant manner to the determination of the victorious belligerent to abide by the limitations of international law": (1944) XXI The British Year Book of International Law, pp 73-74.

57. Professor Lauterpacht edited the 6th edition of Oppenheim's International Law and rejected the earlier views of Professor Oppenheim: see vol.II, s253. Following that edition, Art.443 of the Australian Manual of Military Law was amended on 30 September 1944 to read:

> " The fact that a rule of warfare has been violated in pursuance of an order of the belligerent Government or of an individual belligerent commander does not deprive the act in question of its character as a war crime; neither does it, in principle, confer upon the perpetrator immunity from punishment by the injured belligerent. Undoubtedly, a court confronted with the plea of superior orders adduced in justification of a war crime is bound to take into consideration the fact that obedience to military orders, not obviously unlawful, is the duty of every member of the armed forces and that the latter cannot, in conditions of war discipline, be expected to weight scrupulously the legal merits of the order received. The question, however, is governed by the major principle that members of the armed forces are bound to obey lawful orders only and that they cannot therefore escape liability if, in obedience to a command, they commit acts which both violate unchallenged rules of warfare and outrage the general sentiment of humanity."

58. By 8 August 1945, when the Nuremberg Charter was agreed, the Oppenheim position had been abandoned. In its place, a doctrine of absolute liability was erected (see Dinstein, p 117). Article 8 of the Charter provided that:

5932

> " The fact that the Defendant acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior shall not free him from responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Tribunal determines that justice so requires."

Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (the Tokyo Tribunal), however, provided that a superior order should not "of itself" be a defence: see Whiteman, Digest of International Law, vol.11, p 972. Dinstein (op cit, p 157) comments that -

> "the fact of obedience to orders was not prevented from contributing, in conjunction with other facts, to discharge from responsibility and was rejected only as a defence per se."

59. If that was the state of international law during the prescribed period, there may be little disconformity between the provisions of the Act (ss.16, 6(2) and 6(6)) and the relevant international law, despite the contrary provisions in Art.443 of the Australian Manual of Military Law. The United States Military Tribunal at Nuremberg in the Hostages Trial adopted the formulation of the Nuremberg Charter, observing with reference to the Oppenheim doctrine (at p 650):

> "The fact that the British and American armies may have adopted it for the regulation of their own armies as a matter of policy, does not have the effect of enthroning it as a rule of International Law."

However that may be, the significance in international law of obedience to superior orders remains a matter of "some incertitude" (Dinstein, p 253) if not of "universal uncertainty" (Vogler, "The Defense of 'Superior Orders' in International Criminal Law" in Bassiouni and Nanda (eds), op cit, vol.1, p 619, at p 634). Both of these jurists would reject the doctrine of absolute liability. Dinstein prefers a defence of lack of mens rea to which the fact of obedience to orders would be relevant. Vogler perceives international law to be moving to the position that the subordinate is criminally responsible "only if he had in reality recognized the criminal nature of the order, or if the fact of its criminality was obvious." In my respectful opinion, there is much to commend these views. Having regard to the uncertain state of international law during the prescribed period, one cannot be confident of the coincidence of the law prescribed by s.16 and international law. However, there remains a disconformity between international law and the municipal law contained in ss.6, 7(1), 9 and 17 of the Act.

"A war crime" in s.9 and a crime against humanity.

60. Section 7(3) brings within the statutory definition of "a war crime" conduct which, though heinous, is not necessarily in violation of the laws and customs of war. It is said that the crimes falling within s.7(3) are crimes against humanity and that such crimes are, like war crimes, international. In the plaintiff's case, it is said that he was guilty of a particular species of crimes against humanity, namely, crimes of genocide. In the Nuremberg Charter, Art.6(c) prescribed the crimes which were to be treated as crimes against humanity:

> "Crimes against humanity: namely, murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated."
> (Emphasis added.)

The words italicized limited the scope of the crimes falling within Art.6(c) and, in effect, restricted them to crimes against humanity which were also war crimes or, pursuant to Art.6(a), crimes against peace: see Schwelb, "Crimes Against Humanity", (1946) XXIII The British Year Book of International Law 178, at pp 188, 194-195, 206. If war crimes and crimes against peace were, at all material times, crimes against the law of nations, it was unnecessary to consider whether crimes against humanity which were not connected with war crimes or with crimes against peace were crimes against the law of nations. Construing its Charter, the Nuremberg Tribunal said, at p 249:

5933

> " With regard to Crimes against Humanity there is no doubt whatever that political opponents were murdered in Germany before the war, and that many of them were kept in concentration camps in circumstances of great horror and cruelty. The policy of terror was certainly carried out on a vast scale, and in many cases was organized and systematic. The policy of persecution, repression, and murder of civilians in Germany before the war of 1939, who were likely to be hostile to the Government, was most ruthlessly carried out. The persecution of Jews during the same period is established beyond all doubt. To constitute Crimes against Humanity, the acts relied on before the outbreak of war must have been in execution of, or in connection with, any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The Tribunal is of the opinion that revolting and horrible as many of these crimes were, it has not been satisfactorily proved that they were done in execution of, or in connection with, any such crime. The Tribunal therefore cannot make a general declaration that the acts before 1939 were Crimes against Humanity within the meaning of the Charter, but from the beginning of the war in 1939 War Crimes were committed on a vast scale, which were also Crimes against Humanity; and insofar as the inhumane acts charged in the Indictment, and committed after the beginning of the war, did not constitute War Crimes, they were all committed in execution of, or in connection with, the aggressive war, and therefore constituted Crimes against Humanity."

61. In Reg. v. Finta (1989) 61 DLR (4th) 85, the Ontario High Court rejected an argument that crimes against humanity were not recognized as international crimes before 1945. In doing so, Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. said (at p 101):

> "I accept the reasoning of the Nuremberg Tribunal who indicated, when faced with the same sorts of arguments as above, that 'by 1939 these rules laid down in the Convention were recognized by all civilized nations, and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war'. In other words, in light of the historical documents I have referred to and the words of the Nuremberg Tribunal, I am of the opinion that war crimes and crimes against humanity were, by 1939, offences at international law or criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations."

With great respect, the Nuremberg Tribunal used the words cited by his Lordship in reference only to "the laws and customs of war which are referred to in Article 6(b) of the Charter" (see vol.41 The American Journal of International Law, at pp 248-249), not in reference to crimes against humanity. The words cited by his Lordship did not relate to crimes against humanity referred to in Art.6(c) of the Charter; those crimes were dealt with by a subsequent passage in the judgment (at p 249) which is the passage cited above. Schwelb points out (op cit, p 205) that, in the case of Streicher, the Tribunal found him guilty of crimes against humanity committed before 1 September 1939 in Germany against German nationals but the Tribunal pointed to a nexus between these activities and crimes committed on occupied Allied territory and against non-German nationals. Schwelb notes that this is "the most that can be said" and that -

5934

> "It cannot be said in the case of any of the defendants that he was convicted only of crimes committed in Germany against Germans before 1 September 1939."

62. Control Council Law No.10, enacted by the military powers in occupation of Germany after the Second World War, provided for trial within the respective Zones of Occupation of persons charged with crimes "recognized" in Art.II. Among those crimes were "Crimes against Humanity" expressed more expansively than in the Nuremberg Charter. The breadth of that definition and the uncertainty of its content are manifest from the consideration given to it by the United States Military Tribunal in In re Altstotter (The Justice Trial), at pp 284-285:

> " We hold that crimes against humanity as defined in C.C. Law 10 must be strictly construed to exclude isolated cases of atrocities or persecutions whether committed by private individuals or by a governmental authority. As we construe it, that section provides for the punishment of crimes committed against German nationals only where there is proof of conscious participation in systematic governmentally organised or approved procedures, amounting to atrocities and offences of that kind specified in the act and committed against populations or amounting to persecutions on political, racial, or religious grounds.
>
> Thus the statute is limited by the construction of the type of criminal activity which prior to 1939 was, and still is, a matter of international concern. Whether or not such atrocities constituted technical violations of laws and customs of war, they were acts of such scope and malevolence, and they so clearly imperilled the peace of the world, that they must be deemed to have become violations of international law. ... As the prime illustration of a crime against humanity under C.C. Law 10, which by reason of its magnitude and its international repercussions has been recognised as a violation of common international law, we cite 'genocide'." (Emphasis added.)

The opinion of this Tribunal has not been accepted as an authoritative statement of customary international law. Law No.10 and the tribunals which administered it were not international in the sense that the Nuremberg Charter and the International Military Tribunal were international. As Dr Schwelb observes (op cit, p 218):

> "the difference between the Charter and Law No.10 probably reflects the difference both in the constitutional nature of the two documents and in the standing of the tribunals called upon to administer the law. As we have attempted to show, the International Military Tribunal is, in addition to being an occupation court for Germany, also - to a certain extent - an international judicial organ administering international law, and therefore its jurisdiction in domestic matters of Germany is cautiously circumscribed. The Allied and German courts, applying Law No.10, are local courts, administering primarily local (municipal) law, which, of course, includes provisions emanating from the occupation authorities." (Emphasis added.)

63. The crime of genocide, which the Tribunal described as the "prime illustration" of a crime against humanity attracting punishment, did not acquire the status of an international crime until after the Second World War: see Kunz, Editorial Comment: "The United Nations Convention on Genocide",

(1949) 43 The American Journal of International Law 738, at p 742; Green, "Canadian Law, War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity", (1988) LIX The British Year Book of International Law 217, at pp 225-226; Shaw, "Genocide and International Law" in Dinstein (ed.), International Law at a Time of Perplexity, (1989), p 797. Genocide was not listed as a crime in Art.6(b) of the Nuremberg Charter but, on 11 December 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations by Resolution 96(I) affirmed that genocide is a crime under international law and initiated studies leading to the adoption of the Genocide Convention of 1948. There is some disagreement as to whether, by the time when the Genocide Convention was approved by the General Assembly, genocide had become a crime under customary international law. Shaw (op cit, at p 799) expresses the view that, after the General Assembly adopted Resolution 96(I) -

> "Hand in hand with the speedy enshrinement of genocide as a crime under conventional law, has gone a process of parallel acceptance under customary international law."

Kunz (at p 742) and Green (at p 225), on the other hand, take the view that the Convention created and defined the crime of genocide for the law of nations. The weight of opinion and international practice as evidenced by the drafting of Art.6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter show that genocide was not a crime under international law until after the Second World War, and the history of the drafting of Art.6(c) shows that crimes against humanity were not clearly established as crimes in international law independent of war crimes when the Nuremberg Charter was drafted: see Clark, "Crimes Against Humanity" in The Nuremberg Trial and International Law, pp 177-199; but cf. Simons, at p 49. Thus I come to the same conclusion as that expressed in the Hetherington Report whose summary I would adopt (par.6.44) mutatis mutandis as applicable to Australia:

> " To summarise, by 1939, before the offences which this Inquiry is required to investigate were allegedly committed, violations of the customs and uses of war, or war crimes as they were later called, were internationally recognised as crimes, both Britain and Germany being among the signatories of the Hague Conventions which confirmed them as such. The Nuremberg judgement also held that such acts were also recognised as crimes under customary international law, which bound even those nations which had not become party to the Conventions. Genocide was not so recognised until 1948 and we find the position of what were subsequently called crimes against humanity to be unclear. Under customary law belligerents had the right to try before military courts war criminals who fell into their hands, and also to provide for the surrender of others in the terms of the armistice or the peace treaty. Legal opinion then held that jurisdiction existed over such crimes and that a state had the right to legislate to incorporate that jurisdiction into its national domestic law. Therefore it can be argued that enactment of legislation in this country to allow the prosecution of 'war crimes' in British courts would not be retrospective: it would merely empower British courts to utilise a jurisdiction already available to them under international law since before 1939, over crimes which had been internationally recognised as such since before 1939 by nations including both the United Kingdom and Germany. We are less certain that a similar stance can be adopted with regard to crimes against humanity. To legislate now for offences of genocide committed during the Second World War would, in our view, constitute retrospective legislation." (Emphasis added.)

64. The crime created by s.9 of the Act would thus expose to conviction persons whose act, if it fell only within sub-s.(3) of s.7, would not (genocide) or might not (some other crime against humanity) have amounted to a crime under international law at the time when the act was done and did not then amount to a crime under municipal law. In the light of the objection of international law to retrospective criminal legislation unless the crime was, at the time of its commission, a crime under international law, there could be no international obligation which would have been satisfied nor any international concern which would have been met by creating retrospectively a crime one of the elements of which is furnished by s.7(3). So far as s.7(3) furnishes an element of the statutory offence created by s.9, it is not consonant with pre-1945 international law. A jurisdiction to try a person for such an offence is not a universal jurisdiction to try a person for an international crime.

65. The disconformity between the provisions of the Act defining a war crime falling within sub-s.(1) of s.7 and international law equally denies that that provision, so far as it furnishes an element of the s.9 offence, satisfies an international obligation or meets an international concern. The international obligation or concern, if any, can relate only to the seeking out and prosecution of persons alleged to be guilty of war crimes as recognized by international law. The prosecution of crimes which are the creation of a retrospective municipal law and which differ from international crimes cannot be the subject of a universal jurisdiction to try. As s.8(3) provides that a "serious crime may be a war crime by virtue of either or both of subsections 7(1) and (3), but not otherwise", s.9 cannot be supported as a provision which satisfies an international obligation or meets an international concern. Nor can it be supported as a law investing a universal jurisdiction to try a person for an international crime. If s.9 be invalid, the Act must fall.

66. To meet an argument that the statutory offence does not conform to the international law definition of international crimes (as international law stood during the prescribed period), the proposition that the Act invested a jurisdiction to try offences defined in international law was broadened in the course of the Commonwealth's submissions. It was submitted that there is a universal jurisdiction under international law to try allegations of guilt of crimes defined by municipal law if those definitions approximated the definitions of crimes in international law. The authority cited in support of the broadened submission was Brierly, op cit, which must be set out in extenso. Asserting that jurisdiction over war crimes "in the strict sense" is "a special jurisdiction created by the international law of war" (at p 297), the author says (at pp 300-301):

> " It is of course to be regretted that the laws of war do not define more precisely either the acts that it is permissible to treat as war crimes, or the procedure by which they ought to be dealt with. But lack of precision, and consequently scope for differing interpretations of the rule of law, are inevitable in any system of customary law, and it is notorious that they occur throughout the whole body of international law. Municipal courts are frequently called on to apply international law, yet they rarely have any absolutely authoritative guide to the right rule; they have to do their best, with the result that different national courts do not always arrive at uniform decisions on the same point of international law. ... Yet to allow this lack of uniform interpretation to persuade us that the law that a national court applies in such cases is simply its own municipal law is to come near to denying the existence of international law altogether; what the court does is to apply its own national view of what the rule of > international law is, but that is a different matter, and in the present stage of international legal development is is unfortunately inevitable.

>
> It will be the same with national courts when they come to the trial of war crimes. They will not all arrive at exactly the same view as to the constituent elements of each particular offence; they will not all follow the same procedure of trial. But so long as the trial accords with natural justice, with 'the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations' as principles proper to be applied on the trial of a criminal charge, they will not exceed the discretion that the laws of war have left to them. Nor is it at all likely that the absence of exact uniformity will be serious in practice. Even in the most favourable circumstances it will never be possible to bring to justice more than a small fraction of the crimes that Germans have committed in this war, and the possibility that in the cases that do come to trial any real difficulty, still less any real injustice, will be caused by the uncertainty of the laws of war is almost negligible. Murder, rape, robbery, no doubt it is desirable that crimes like these should be meticulously defined for the purposes of penal law, and in a developed municipal system that is done. But it is idle to expect such refinements in the laws of war. In practice courts will probably follow more or less closely the definitions and the procedures of their own municipal law, and in so doing they will be well within the latitude that the laws of war allow. But again that will not mean that they follow their own municipal law because that is the law which they are bound to apply; it will mean that in the absence of exact definition contained in the laws of war the municipal definition is likely to be the best available guide to the rule that natural justice requires them to apply."

67. An analysis of the Act demonstrates that the last proposition is, if not inaccurate, at least subject to exceptions. The latitude which national courts must have in applying the law of nations cannot relieve them, when the question is in issue, from determining whether a municipal law does create or define an offence in respect of which international law recognizes a universal jurisdiction to try. The latitude available to national courts might allow them to accept that an absolute statutory exclusion of the defence of superior orders (ss.6(6) and 16) is consistent with international law when the status of that defence is uncertain in international law, but the latitude cannot warrant the disregarding of divergences between the substantive offences defined in municipal law and the offences defined in international law. Nor are the two systems of substantive law brought into unison merely by according "natural justice" which has to do with the procedure of the court, not with the issues to be tried. Some violations of the laws and customs of war may be imprecisely defined, according to the particular law or custom that has been violated, but the Act is no more precise. The Act seems to stretch out to embrace international law in s.17(2)(a) only to reject the laws, customs and usages of war as a legal touchstone of criminal responsibility in favour of a factual element in s.17(3). To accept the Act as an approximate reflection of international law would not be to interpret international law but to abdicate the Court's duty of interpretation in favour of the provisions which commended themselves to the Legislature.

68. Whatever right Australia may now possess under international law to bring alleged war criminals from the Second World War to trial before Australian courts, the Act does not exercise it.

(b) Resolutions and recommendations of international bodies.

69. The resolutions and recommendations of the United Nations General Assembly and of the Economic and Social Council do not suggest that States should bring suspects to trial under a municipal law that is in disconformity with international law. Nor do they suggest that a municipal law which acts retrospectively is an appropriate means of bringing to justice a person whose act did not amount to a crime under international law at the time when the act was done. Indeed, in each of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, the obligation stated is to enact legislation to punish "persons committing, or ordering to be committed" any of the "grave breaches" defined therein: see, for example, Arts 146 and 147 of Geneva Convention IV. The obligation is to translate into municipal law the international law definition of those crimes to be effective in the case of future breaches.

70. In the Genocide Convention of 1948, a similar obligation was imposed (Art.V) followed by a jurisdictional provision (Art.VI) which, as I read it, requires a person charged with a Convention offence to be tried ("shall be tried") either by "a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction." The Supreme Court of Israel read this provision as not excluding the jurisdiction of national courts but, with respect, I am unable to read it in that way (cf. Baxter's questioning of this jurisdictional decision in Bassiouni and Nanda (eds), op cit, at p 85).

71. The material relied on gives no support for the notion that the jurisdiction of a national court to try a person suspected of committing a war crime or a crime against humanity should be exercised pursuant to a law which is in disconformity with international law.

72. It follows that on none of the bases advanced is the Act to be characterized as a law with respect to Australia's external affairs. It thus derives no support from s.51(xxix). The second power on which reliance is placed to support the Act is the defence power (s.51(vi)).
3. The defence power.

73. The purpose of a law for which support is claimed under s.51(vi) is "collected from the instrument in question, the facts to which it applies and the circumstances which called it forth": per Dixon J. in Stenhouse v. Coleman (1944) 69 CLR 457, at p 471. In determining whether a purpose of the Act is to advance the defence of the Commonwealth, it is legitimate to take into account the fact that, by punishing violations of the laws and customs of war, the conduct of future armed conflicts will be less likely to be attended by the barbarities those laws and customs proscribe. The deterrent effect of punishing such violations was noted by resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly passed between 1965 and 1973, but the deterrent effect of trials and punishments under the Act must now be doubtful. The passage of time since 8 May 1945, the occurrence of other armed conflicts in which Australia has been engaged during and after the Second World War (conflicts frequently attended by notorious violations of the laws and customs of war) and the selective operation of the Act upon acts done during armed conflicts in Europe between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 not only diminish, if not destroy, the deterrent effect of the Act but throw doubt on the proposition that defence considerations are "the circumstances which called it forth".

74. Although the Act is capable of having a relevant deterrent effect and may, on that account, be said to be "appropriate and adapted" to serve defence purposes (as the original War Crimes Act was thought to do), the validity under s.51(vi) of a law enacted in a time of peace depends upon whether the Parliament might have reasonably considered the means which the law embodies for achieving or procuring the relevant defence purpose to be appropriate and adapted to that end, a question of reasonable proportionality: see per Deane J. in The Tasmanian Dam Case, at p 260; Richardson, at pp 291, 311-312, 336, 345-346. In times of war, laws abridging the freedoms which the law assures to the Australian people are supported in order to ensure the survival of those freedoms in times of peace. In times of peace, an abridging of those freedoms - in this case, freedom from a retrospective criminal law - cannot be supported unless the Court can perceive that the abridging of the freedom in question is proportionate to the defence interest to be served. What is necessary and appropriate for the defence of the Commonwealth in times of war is different from what is necessary or appropriate in times of peace: Richardson, per Dawson J. at p 326. "That is because the question of appropriateness and adaptation falls for determination by reference to the circumstances which engage the power": per Gaudron J. in Re Tracey; Ex parte Ryan (1989) 166 CLR 518, at p 597. The formation of the critical judgment as to whether the means adopted by a law are appropriate and adapted to serve defence purposes is entrusted to the Court: Stenhouse v. Coleman, at p 470.

75. The means which the Act adopts to secure future adherence to the laws and customs of war not only trample upon a principle which is of the highest importance in a free society, namely, that criminal laws should not operate retrospectively, but also select a specific group of persons from a time long past out of all those who have committed, or are suspected of having committed, war crimes in other armed conflicts. Respect for the laws and customs of war cannot be secured by a law having such an oppressive and discriminatory operation.

76. I would hold the Act invalid. It follows that I would answer the question reserved for consideration thus: Section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 as amended is invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff.

JUDGE3

DEANE J. The question reserved for the consideration of the Court in this case is whether s.9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) ("the Act") is invalid in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff. That question raises problems of fundamental importance about the extent of the Commonwealth's legislative power with respect to "External affairs" and the implications, in so far as the trial and punishment of criminal offences are concerned, of the Constitution's exclusive vesting of the judicial power of the Commonwealth in the courts contemplated by Ch III. It is convenient to turn at once to a consideration of the meaning and operation of the central provisions of the Act. Except to the extent necessary for discussion, I shall avoid repetition of either the background facts or the detailed text of the relevant statutory provisions. It suffices to note that the acts which are said to constitute offences under the Act were all allegedly done by the plaintiff in the Ukraine between 1942 and 1943. It is common ground that, at the time those acts were allegedly committed in the Ukraine, the plaintiff had no relevant connection with this country and that, at that time, none of the alleged offences was a crime under any domestic law in force in this country. If any of the alleged offences is a crime under the domestic law of this country, it is only because it was made such a crime by the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (Cth) ("the 1988 Amendment Act") which, while retaining the old title, substituted a completely new piece of legislation for the then provisions of the Act.

Offences against the Act

2. Section 7 of the Act identifies what constitutes a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act. It does this by building upon a "serious crime" as defined by s.6. The effect of s.7, when read in the context of the definitions of "war" and "occupation" in s.5, is that any of the multitude of acts which might constitute a "serious crime" under s.6(1), (4) and (5) (if done in a part of Australia) or s.6(3),(4) and (5) (if done outside Australia) is a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act if it bears one or more of a number of specified relationships with the war or armed conflict which "occurred in Europe in the period" between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 or with an occupation of territory arising out of that war or armed conflict (including the occupation of territory in Latvia, Lithuania or Estonia pursuant to the 1939 agreement between Germany and the U.S.S.R.).

3. Section 9(1) of the Act provides that a person who committed a "war crime" during the period from 1 September 1939 to 8 May 1945 is guilty of an indictable offence against the Act. Section 10 prescribes the maximum penalties for an offence against the Act: imprisonment for life for an offence involving wilful killing; imprisonment for twenty-five years for any other offence. Section 11 restricts the persons who may be charged with an offence against this Act to "an Australian citizen" or "a resident of Australia or of an external Territory". Section 13 applies s.68 of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) to vest jurisdiction in relation to alleged offences against the Act in courts of the Australian States and internal Territories.

The defence under s.17

4. Section 17(2) constitutes a key to an understanding of the scope and operation of the Act. It provides that, subject to s.16 (which excludes a defence of superior orders), "it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:

(a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and

(b) was not under international law a crime against humanity".

The past tense "was" in each limb of s.17(2) makes plain that the temporal reference point for the operation of the sub-section is the time when the offence was allegedly committed.

5. The law permits what it does not proscribe or penalize and the ordinary meaning of "permitted" when used with reference to a law or system of law is "not prohibited" or "not in contravention of". The word "permitted" is used in that sense in par.(a). It follows that, as a matter of ordinary language, the effect of the sub-section is that "it is a defence" if, at the time of its commission, "the act alleged to be the offence" was neither a contravention of the laws, customs and usages of war nor a crime against humanity under international law.

6. The phrase "the laws, customs and usages of war" in par.(a) of s.17(2) would seem to be the equivalent of the phrase "the laws and customs of war" which has long been used in international treaties and literature. The inclusion of the word "usages" presumably reflects a tendency in some places, including this country, to use that word instead of the more traditional "customs" (see, e.g., United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3(I), "Extradition and Punishment of War Criminals", 13 February 1946; Manual of Military Law 1941, Australian ed., Ch XIV). The phrase "the laws, customs and usages of war" in par.(a) should be understood as referring to laws and customs which have reached the status of binding rules in the sense explained by Finch in "The Nuremberg Trial and International Law", The American Journal of International Law, vol.41 (1947), at pp 20-21:

> "The laws and customs of war, including those of military occupation, are well established in international law. They are enacted in national legislation, codified in military manuals, incorporated in binding international conventions, and affirmed by the immemorial practice of states thus becoming a part of the common law of war."

5941

In their particular context as a "defence" to conduct which would otherwise be punishable as a "war crime" under the statutory definition contained in the main operative provisions of the Act, it appears to me to be clear enough that the words "was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war" should be understood as meaning conduct which did not constitute a violation of the then rules of international law prohibiting certain types of conduct towards combatants, prisoners and civilians in or in relation to the waging of war. Such conduct is commonly described as a war crime under international law. That description should not, however, be allowed to conceal the fact that the rules of international law, as distinct from particular treaties, did not, at the time of the alleged offences in the present case (i.e. between September 1942 and May 1943), directly establish or make punishable the criminality of individuals for breaches of the law of war (see, generally, Stone, Legal Controls of International Conflict, (1954), at p 357; United Nations War Crimes Commission, History of the United Nations War Crimes Commission and the Development of the Laws of War, (1948), at pp 262ff.). International law had long recognized the right of a belligerent State to punish for war crimes not only members of its own forces and those who contravened the laws and customs of war upon its territory but also members of the armed forces of an opposing State who fell into its hands. The development of international law to the stage where it made individuals directly and universally punishable by the International Community or by a State or States acting on its behalf for conduct constituting a war crime was, however, something which occurred after the establishment of the United Nations War Crimes Commission in October 1943. It was closely associated with the development of the principle of international law that conduct of an individual could be a crime under international law notwithstanding that it was done in obedience to government or superior orders (see below).

7. The phrase "crime against humanity" has, in the last half-century, also become a commonly used one in international treaties and the writing of publicists. There is little real difficulty about its meaning. It is a convenient general phrase for referring to heinous conduct in the course of a persecution of civilian groups of a kind which is now outlawed by international law but which may not involve a war crime in the strict sense by reason of lack of connection with actual hostilities. Inevitably, there may be difficulties in determining whether a particular course of conduct (e.g. genocide) was made criminal and punishable as a "crime against humanity" under international law at any particular point of time. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue those difficulties for the purposes of the present judgment. As will be seen, the Act is not concerned with offences against international law in their character as such and does not confine the past acts which it makes punishable for the first time as offences against Commonwealth law to acts which were in contravention of international law.

8. Sub-sections (3),(4) and (5) of s.17 all bear upon the operation and effect of s.17(2). They were introduced in the Bill for the 1988 Amendment Act by amendment made in the Senate. Sub-section (3) reads:

> "To avoid doubt, the doing of the act by the defendant was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war if it was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war."

That provision is ambiguous. It is open to be construed as an exhaustive definition of the scope of par.(a) of s.17(2), that is to say, as confining what is "permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war" for the purposes of par.(a) to what can be reasonably justified by considerations of military necessity. The more obvious construction of sub-s.(3) is, however, not as an exhaustive definition of what falls within par.(a) but as no more than an express identification (to "avoid doubt") of but one of the possible sets of circumstances in which a defence under that paragraph is available. This more obvious construction is, in my view, the preferable one. So construed, the sub-section does not affect the scope of s.17(2) otherwise than in relation to the special case of military necessity with which it deals. In so far as that special case is concerned, sub-s.(3) arguably extends the scope of sub-s.(2) in that it is arguable that it gives a more general application to a more lenient test than does international law. It would, however, presumably be a less generous test than the extended notion of necessity asserted under the German doctrine of Kriegsraison in the two World Wars (see Stone, op cit, at pp 351-352).

5947

9. Section 17(4) provides that a defendant "is not entitled to rely on a defence" under s.17(2) "unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence". Section 17(5) provides that, "if there is such evidence, the onus of establishing, beyond a reasonable doubt, that those facts either do not exist or do not constitute the defence lies on the prosecution". On first impression, sub-ss.(4) and (5) appear to have been framed on the assumption that the question whether the doing of any act falling within the very wide range of s.7 was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war and was not under international law a crime against humanity will always involve a defence allegation of additional fact by way of confession and avoidance. Such an assumption would be ill-founded in any case where, regardless of excuse or justification, "the act alleged to be the offence" was not, as a matter of international law, a contravention of the laws, customs and usages of war or a crime against humanity at the time when it was allegedly committed (e.g. some possible examples of the "serious crime" of "manslaughter" (see s.6(1)(b)) "committed ... in the course of an occupation" (see s.7(1)(b)). Be that as it may, s.17(4) confirms what s.17(2) itself clearly indicates, namely, that s.17 does not add an element to what constitutes a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act. The elements of a "war crime" are to be found in the earlier sections to which reference has been made: in particular, s.6 which defines a "serious crime"; s.7 which builds upon a "serious crime" to define a "war crime"; and s.9 which identifies a past period within which the commission of a "war crime" constitutes an indictable offence. Conduct which constitutes a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act is not punishable as such if a s.17(2) defence is applicable. Where such a defence involves allegations of additional fact, there must be some evidence of the existence of those facts before the defence can be relied upon. Subject to that qualification, the onus of negativing the defence to the ordinary criminal standard of proof rests on the prosecution.

10. It should be mentioned that it was submitted on behalf of the defendants that there should be implied in s.7 of the Act a provision to the effect that it is an element of a "war crime" for the purposes of that section that the conduct in question constituted a war crime or crime against humanity under international law. There is, however, nothing in the Act which supports the importation of such a clause. To the contrary, the express provisions of s.17 preclude the implication of any such general overriding provision in s.7. The primary legislative purpose to be discerned in the Act

11. The preamble to the Act, like all of the Act's operative provisions, was introduced by the 1988 Amendment Act. It expresses a legislative decision that it is "appropriate" that there should be "brought to trial in the ordinary criminal courts in Australia" any "persons who committed serious war crimes in Europe during World War II" and who have "since ... entered Australia and became Australian citizens or residents" (emphasis added). While the Act in terms applies to "war crimes" committed in Australia, its requirement of one or other of the various specified relationships with the 1939-1945 war or armed conflict which "occurred in Europe" supports the conclusion that, as the preamble indicates, the ordinary operation of the Act was intended by the Parliament to be in relation to the trial and, in case of a conviction, the punishment of Australian citizens or residents accused of past conduct in Europe of the kind described by the Act. The present case falls within the area of that intended ordinary operation in that the plaintiff, an Australian citizen and resident, is charged with acts allegedly committed almost half a century ago in the Ukraine at a time when he had no disclosed connection with Australia. The defendants' primary contention is that that ordinary operation of the Act (i.e. in relation to a case such as the present where the alleged offence is an act committed outside Australia by a person who was not at the time an Australian citizen or resident) can be justified by reference to the grant of legislative power contained in s.51(xxix) of the Constitution. For reasons which will appear, it is unnecessary for me to consider a subsidiary submission of the defendants that the Act can also be justified as a law with respect to the naval and military defence of the Commonwealth and the States (Constitution, s.51(vi)).

5943

Section 51(xxix): "External affairs"

12. The first thing to be stressed about s.51(xxix) of the Constitution for the purposes of the present case is that its reference to "External affairs" is unqualified. The paragraph does not refer to "Australia's external affairs". Nor does it limit the subject matter of the grant of power to external affairs which have some special connection with Australia. The word "external" means "outside". As a matter of language, it carries no implication beyond that of location. The word "affairs" has a wide and indefinite meaning. It is appropriate to refer to relations, matters or things. Used without qualification or limitation, the phrase "external affairs" is appropriate, in a constitutional grant of legislative power, to encompass both relationships and things: relationships with or between foreign States and foreign or international organizations or other entities; matters and things which are territorially external to Australia regardless of whether they have some identified connection with Australia or whether they be the subject matter of international treaties, dealings, rights or obligations. Such a construction of the phrase "External affairs" in s.51(xxix) is supported by the settled principle of constitutional construction which requires that, subject to any express or implied general constitutional limitations and any overriding restrictions flowing from express or implied constitutional guarantees, the grants of legislative power contained in s.51 be construed with all the generality which the words used admit and be given their full force and effect.

13. The view that a law with respect to matters or things which are territorially outside Australia is a law with respect to "External affairs" for the purposes of s.51(xxix) is supported by numerous statements in recent cases in this Court. Thus, Barwick C.J., in New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, at p 360, expressed the view that the legislative power with respect to external affairs "extends ... to any affair which in its nature is external to the continent of Australia and the island of Tasmania subject always to the Constitution as a whole". To the same effect were the comments of Mason J. (at p 470):

> "The plaintiffs' argument proceeds on the footing that the power is no more than a power to make laws with respect to Australia's relationships with foreign countries. Why the power should be so confined is not readily apparent. The power is expressed in the widest terms; it relates to 'affairs' which are external to Australia. 'Affairs' include 'matters' and 'things' as well as 'relationships' and a constitutional grant of plenary legislative power 'should be construed with all the generality which the words used admit'".

Jacobs J. (at p 497) was no less emphatic:

> "In my opinion the Commonwealth has the power to make > laws in respect of any person or place outside and any matter or thing done or to be done or prohibited to be done outside the boundaries of the Commonwealth."

5944

14. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case (at p 503), Murphy J. said that "external affairs" in s.51(xxix) are not confined to subjects "of international concern" and are "not limited to the subject matters of treaties and conventions to which Australia is a party, and to the affairs of international bodies ... of which Australia is a member". His Honour concluded (at pp 503-504) that it mattered not whether the Seas and Submerged Lands Act 1973 (Cth) departed from the international conventions upon which the Commonwealth relied. It sufficed that the Act dealt directly with "aspects of external affairs". In the context of a challenge to the validity of legislation which dealt with (amongst other things) the continental shelf outside the limits of the territorial sea, it is arguable that Murphy J.'s comments should be read as reflecting an underlying view corresponding to that expressed by Barwick C.J., Mason J. and Jacobs J. in the above-quoted extracts from their judgments. If that be so, the view that the external affairs power extends to authorize the making of laws in respect of any place situate, and any matter or thing done or to be done, outside the boundaries of the Commonwealth was a basis of the decision in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case upholding the validity of the provisions relating to the continental shelf outside territorial Australia. That that view was subsequently held by Murphy J. is made clear by his judgment in Robinson v. Western Australian Museum (1977) 138 CLR 283, at p 343, where his Honour wrote that the Parliament "has plenary power under the external affairs power to legislate for shipping (whether intra-state, interstate or overseas) in and beyond the territorial sea and may make any provision it thinks fit for wrecks in or under the sea or on the coast", and added that "the practical limitation" upon the exercise of the power was international acceptance. In The Commonwealth v. Tasmania (The Tasmanian Dam Case) (1983) 158 CLR 1, at pp 171-172, his Honour said:

> "To be a law with respect to external affairs it is sufficient that it ... deals with circumstances or things outside Australia".

(See also Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, at p 162.)

15. One searches in vain in recent judgments in this Court in cases involving s.51(xxix) for any denial of the view that the legislative power with respect to external affairs extends to any matter or thing done or situate outside Australia. The closest one comes to finding any express questioning of that view is in the judgment of Gibbs C.J. in Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168, where his Honour (who had dissented in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case in relation to the territorial sea but not in relation to the continental shelf beyond territorial waters) saw the question as remaining an open one. Referring to the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, he said (at p 190):

> "... three members of the Court, Barwick C.J., Mason and Jacobs JJ., relied on the further ground that the power given by s.51(xxix) was not limited to authorizing laws with respect to Australia's relationships with foreign countries, but extended to any matter or thing situated or done outside Australia. It is unnecessary to consider whether the words of par.(xxix) can have this dual operation, i.e. whether the phrase 'external affairs' can be used to mean matters outside the Commonwealth as well as matters involving a relationship between Australia and other countries."

In contrast, Mason J. in Koowarta (at p 223) expressed the view that the question had been determined by the decision in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case which "decided that the power extends to matters and things, and I would say, persons, outside Australia". His Honour added:

> "That decision established, quite apart from the provisions > of the Statute of Westminster, that the so-called principle denying an extra-territorial operation to the legislation of a colony had no application to laws enacted by the Commonwealth Parliament. There was, accordingly, no reason why the power should not apply to any matter or concern external to Australia."

5945

In Koowarta, Stephen J. (who, like Gibbs C.J., had dissented in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case in relation to the territorial sea) appears to me to have accepted that s.51(xxix) conferred a general legislative power with respect to matters outside Australia. The word "External", his Honour wrote (at p 211), qualified "affairs" so as to restrict the meaning of the composite phrase "External affairs" in s.51(xxix) "to such of the public business of the national government as relates to other nations or other things or circumstances outside Australia" (emphasis added). In The Tasmanian Dam Case (at p 97), Gibbs C.J. adopted as accurate that suggested "paraphrase" of the legislative power with respect to external affairs.

16. Whatever may have been the position before the emergence of Australia as a fully independent sovereign State, it should now be accepted that any law which can properly be characterized as a law with respect to any matter, thing or person occurring or situate outside Australia is a law with respect to "External affairs" for the purposes of s.51(xxix). In referring to "a law with respect to any matter ... occurring ... outside Australia", I intend to include, among other things, what Jacobs J. described (see above) as "any matter or thing done or to be done or prohibited to be done outside the boundaries of the Commonwealth". As has been mentioned, that broad view of the scope of the power conforms with settled principles of constitutional construction. It is, as has been seen, arguably part of the ratio decidendi of the Seas and Submerged Lands Case. It is certainly strongly supported by statements in the judgments in that and other recent cases (see, in addition to the above references, Robinson v. Western Australian Museum, at pp 294, 335; The Tasmanian Dam Case, at p 255). It is also supported by the consideration that Commonwealth laws with respect to matters, things or persons outside Australia are likely to operate in areas where there will commonly be no competing State interests with the result that, in the absence of Commonwealth legislative power, there would be a lacuna in the plenitude of combined legislative powers of the various Parliaments of the Australian federation. It has long been recognized in this Court that, subject to express and implied constitutional limitations and guarantees, no such lacuna exists in legislative authority in relation to internal matters (see, e.g., Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Attorney-General for the Commonwealth (1912) 15 CLR 182, at pp 214-215; Smith v. Oldham (1912) 15 CLR 355, at pp 360-361, 365; Reg. v. Duncan; Ex parte Australian Iron and Steel Pty. Ltd. (1983) 158 CLR 535, at pp 590-591). With the emergence of Australia as a fully sovereign and independent nation, there remains no acceptable basis for maintaining any such lacuna in the combined powers of the Parliaments of the federation to legislate for this country with respect to extraterritorial matters beyond that resulting from the limitations which the Constitution itself expressly or impliedly imposes. In that regard, it is important to bear in mind that the question whether s.51(xxix) confers a general plenary legislative power with respect to matters, things and persons occurring or situate outside of Australia does not ordinarily involve what Stephen J. called the "conceptual duality" which applies in a case where the subject matter of a law with respect to external affairs is some matter, thing or person occurring or situate within Australia (see the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, at p 458). As Stephen J. commented (ibid.), "the absence of any State interests means that for that area the Commonwealth may act as if it were a unitary state, without need to draw any distinction, if distinction there be, between internal and external aspects of 'sovereign rights'" (and see, generally, the discussion in the judgment of Jacobs J. in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, at pp 497-498, with which I respectfully agree).

5946

17. To the extent that they provide for the trial and punishment of Australian citizens and residents for acts committed outside Australia and having a specified relationship with the 1939-1945 war or armed conflict which occurred in Europe, the provisions of the Act are clearly a law or laws with respect to matters or things which occurred or were done outside Australia. It follows from what has been said above that, at least to that extent, the Act is a law with respect to "External affairs" within the meaning of that phrase as used in s.51(xxix). It is unnecessary for the purpose of deciding the present case to determine whether the provisions of the Act can also be characterized as a law with respect to "External affairs" to the extent that they provide for the trial and punishment of Australian citizens and residents in respect of acts committed within Australia which have one or other of the specified relationships with the 1939-1945 war or armed conflict which occurred in Europe. The offences involved in the present case are all alleged to have been committed by the plaintiff outside Australia and the operation of the Act in relation to alleged offences committed outside Australia could be severed from the provisions of s.6(1) and (2) which have the effect of including acts committed within Australia in conduct punishable under the Act as a "war crime". Indeed, as I followed the argument, it was not submitted that the provisions of the Act dealing with overseas conduct are invalid on the ground that, even if they be valid to the extent of their own operation, they are inseverable from invalid provisions dealing with conduct within Australia.

18. It should, however, be acknowledged that the question whether the Act can properly be characterized as a law with respect to external affairs for the purposes of s.51(xxix) to the extent that its provisions are made applicable (by s.6(1) and (2)) to acts committed within Australia is a more complicated one than the question whether it can be so characterized to the extent that its provisions apply to acts committed outside Australia. In its purported application to local conduct, the Act operates in an area in which it interacts with State laws. Indeed, s.6(1) makes criminality under the law of the locus State an element of a "war crime". That interaction with State law raises difficult questions about whether the Act, if wholly within constitutional power, should be read down to avoid double jeopardy or double punishment in cases where there has been a trial or conviction under State law for that past criminal conduct and whether State laws are rendered invalid, under s.109 of the Constitution, to the extent that they would provide for future punishment of a "serious crime" that is liable to be punished, under the Act, as a "war crime". In a context where I am unpersuaded that there is any obligation at all upon Australia under customary international law or under any treaty to enact legislation providing for the further punishment of an individual's pre-1945 conduct within Australia (i.e. punishment additional to the penalty already provided under "the law then in force" in the relevant "part of Australia": see s.6(1) and (2)), the answer to the question whether the provisions of the Act are, to the extent that they deal with conduct within Australia, properly to be characterized as a law with respect to external affairs for the purposes of s.51(xxix) ultimately turns upon whether, being a law with respect to acts committed within Australia, they can, in all the circumstances, also be properly characterized as a law with respect to the 1939-1945 war or armed conflict in Europe or whether, if they cannot properly be so characterized, their operation is capable of being reasonably considered to be "appropriate and adapted" to deal with some matter of international concern or to achieve an identified purpose or object which is itself a legitimate subject of external affairs in the sense explained in The Tasmanian Dam Case (at pp 259-261; see, also, Richardson v. Forestry Commission (1988) 164 CLR 261, at pp 291, 309-312, 324, 336, 344-346).

594

19. There remains to be considered the question whether, notwithstanding that the Act (at least to the extent that the provisions apply to acts committed outside Australia) is properly to be characterized as a law with respect to external affairs, it is nonetheless beyond the competence of the Parliament of the Commonwealth by reason of some express or implied limitation upon power to be found in the Constitution. Two possible sources of such a restriction upon the Parliament's legislative power with respect to "External affairs" were raised in the course of argument of the present case. The first suggested source of such a restriction is the phrase "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" in the introductory words of s.51. The second is Ch III of the Constitution.
"for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth"

20. Each of the legislative powers conferred by s.51 is expressly stated, by the introductory words of the section, to be a "power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" with respect to the specified subject matter. It was argued that the words "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" introduce a requirement of some identified connection with Australia and that no such connection exists in relation to acts committed between 1939 and 1945 in Europe by a person who was not, at the relevant time, a citizen or resident of this country. There is a short answer to that argument.

21. The words "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" in s.51 do not impose an objective qualification upon the subject matters of legislative power. They refer to the intended beneficial operation of laws made with respect to those subject matters and simply express the fact that in "a general and remote sense the purpose and design of every law is to promote the welfare of the community" for which the law is made (see Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, at p 308; Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King (1988) 166 CLR 1, at pp 12-13). It is for the Parliament, not for the Court, to decide whether a law will be or is "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth". Where the Parliament decides, by enactment, that a law is "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth", that, of itself, provides sufficient connection between this country and the subject matter of that law for the purposes of s.51 (see, generally, King, at pp 9-13).

22. Moreover, even if, contrary to my own view and to authority, the words "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" introduced a requirement that the particular law have some special connection with this country over and beyond the fact that it is made for Australia by the Australian Parliament, that requirement would be satisfied by the Act. The operation of a law which provides for the trial and, in the event of conviction, punishment of Australian citizens or residents in Australian courts for past conduct in connection with a war in which this country was a belligerent obviously has a close and special connection with Australia regardless of whether the alleged offence was committed overseas or whether, at the time of its commission, the alleged offender had any connection with this country.
Chapter III of the Constitution

23. The Constitution is structured upon the doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers. Chapter III gives effect to that doctrine in so far as the vesting and exercise of judicial power are concerned. Its provisions constitute "an exhaustive statement of the manner in which the judicial power of the Commonwealth is or may be vested" (see, e.g., Reg. v. Kirby; Ex parte Boilermakers' Society of Australia (1956) 94 CLR 254, at p 270). The specific grants of legislative powers contained in s.51 are expressly made subject to the Constitution and it is settled law that those grants of legislative power are subject to the provisions of Ch III identifying the permissible repositories, and controlling the manner of exercise, of Commonwealth judicial power.

S9748

24. The main objective of the sometimes inconvenient separation of judicial from executive and legislative powers had long been recognized at the time of the federation. It is to ensure that "the life, liberty, and property of the subject (is not) in the hands of arbitrary judges, whose decisions (are) then regulated only by their own opinions, and not by any fundamental principles of law" (Blackstone, Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol.I, p 269; and see, to like effect, Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, (1833), s1568). That objective will, of course, be achieved only by the Constitution's requirement that judicial power be vested exclusively in the courts which it designates if the judicial power so vested is exercised by those courts in accordance with the essential attributes of the curial process (cf. Re Tracey; Ex parte Ryan (1989) 166 CLR 518, at p 580). Indeed, to construe ChIII of the Constitution as being concerned only with labels and as requiring no more than that the repository of judicial power be called a court would be to convert it into a mockery, rather than a reflection, of the doctrine of separation of powers. Common sense and the provisions of Ch III, based as they are on the assumption of traditional judicial procedures, remedies and methodology (see below), compel the conclusion that, in insisting that the judicial power of the Commonwealth be vested only in the courts designated by Ch III, the Constitution's intent and meaning were that that judicial power would be exercised by those courts acting as courts with all that that notion essentially requires. Accordingly, the Parliament cannot, consistently with Ch III of the Constitution, usurp the judicial power of the Commonwealth by itself purporting to exercise judicial power in the form of legislation. Nor can it infringe the vesting of that judicial power in the judicature by requiring that it be exercised in a manner which is inconsistent with the essential requirements of a court or with the nature of judicial power. It would, for example, be beyond legislative competence to vest jurisdiction to deal with a particular class of matter in a Ch III court and to provide that, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, the judge or judges constituting the court should disregard both the law and the essential function of a court of law and do whatever they considered to be desirable in the public interest.

25. The ordinary object of the exercise of judicial power is the ascertainment of rights and liabilities or of guilt or innocence under the law. The point was made by the United States Supreme Court in Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co. (1908) 211 US 210, at p 226, in a passage which has been quoted with approval on a number of occasions in this Court (see, e.g., Rola Co. (Australia) Pty. Ltd. v. The Commonwealth (1944) 69 CLR 185, at p 211; Reg. v. Davison (1954) 90 CLR 353, at p 370):

> "A judicial inquiry investigates, declares and enforces liabilities as they stand on present or past facts and under laws supposed already to exist. That is its purpose and end. Legislation on the other hand looks to the future and changes existing conditions by making a new rule to be applied thereafter ..."

Prima facie, the relevant substantive law for determining rights and liabilities is the law which operated at the time of the circumstances from which those rights and liabilities are alleged to arise. Thus, it is a rule of construction that it is to be presumed that it was not the legislative intent that a statutory provision which affects rights or liabilities should operate retrospectively. Nonetheless, the focus of civil litigation is upon the determination of rights and liabilities under the law as it exists at the time of the proceedings. Civil legislation which operates retrospectively in the sense that it extinguishes or alters pre-existing rights or liabilities or deems rights and liabilities which it creates to have existed at an earlier time may, depending on the circumstances, be susceptible of legitimate criticism as unfair or unjustified. Such legislation will not, however, contravene the doctrine of separation of powers merely because it retrospectively creates, extinguishes or alters civil rights and liabilities or because it requires the courts to recognize and enforce, in subsequent civil litigation, the retrospective operation of its provisions (cf., e.g., Reg. v. Kirby; Ex parte Boilermakers' Society of Australia, at p 281). Putting to one side cases of impermissible interference with the proper discharge of judicial power by the courts, it will do so only if it is properly to be seen as involving a purported legislative exercise of the judicial function. Except in quite extreme cases (e.g. a statute providing that there be a verdict for the plaintiff in the amount of $500,000 in pending defamation proceedings in a court), the boundary between what is permissible as falling within the limits of legislative power and what is forbidden as a usurpation of judicial power is likely to be blurred in civil matters. The reason is that both the legislature and the judicature may, within the limits of their respective functions under the doctrine of separation of powers, each settle questions of rights and liabilities under the civil law. The position is different, however, in the case of a law which operates to make criminal an act which was not a crime when done. I turn to explain why that is so. For convenience of discussion, I shall refer to such a law as an "ex post facto criminal law".

5949

26. There are some functions which, by reason of their nature or because of historical considerations, have become established as incontrovertibly and exclusively judicial in their character. One - and the most important - of such functions is the adjudgment of guilt of a person accused of a criminal offence. As such, that function is a matter "appertaining exclusively to (judicial) power" (per Griffith C.J., Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v. J.W. Alexander Ltd. (1918) 25 CLR 434, at p 444) which "could not be excluded from the judicial power" (see, e.g., Reg. v. Davison, at pp 368-369, 383). It follows that, subject only to limited qualifications (see below), the Parliament is incapable of vesting jurisdiction to try a person accused of an offence against a law of the Commonwealth otherwise than in one of the "courts" contemplated by Ch III or of directing that part of such jurisdiction be exercised in a manner inconsistent with the requirements of that Chapter. More important for present purposes, the Parliament is incapable of substituting a legislative enactment of criminal guilt of an offence against a law of the Commonwealth for a trial by a Ch III court. To appreciate the implications of that fundamental constitutional truth, it is necessary to understand the central function of a criminal trial under our system of government.

27. The basic tenet of our penal jurisprudence is that every citizen is "ruled by the law, and by the law alone". The citizen "may with us be punished for a breach of law, but he can be punished for nothing else" (Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th ed. (1959), p 202). Thus, more than two hundred years ago, Blackstone taught (see Commentaries, (1830), vol.I, pp 45-46) that it is of the nature of law that it be "a rule prescribed" and that, in the criminal area, an enactment which proscribes otherwise lawful conduct as criminal will not be such a rule unless it applies only to future conduct. Consequently, it would be contrary to the nature of the legislative function under our system of government, if:

> "... after an action (indifferent in itself) is committed, the legislator then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it. Here it is impossible that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent > law: he had therefore no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust. All laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro, and be notified before their commencement; which is implied in the term 'prescribed'."

5950

Put differently, it is basic to our penal jurisprudence that a person who has disobeyed no relevant law is not guilty of a crime. Of its nature, a crime "is an act committed, or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it" (Blackstone, Commentaries, (1830), vol.IV, p 5). It necessarily involves a contravention of a prohibition contained in an existing applicable valid law. As Lord Atkin wrote, for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General for Canada (1931) AC 310, at p 324:

> "Criminal law connotes only the quality of such acts or omissions as are prohibited under appropriate penal provisions by authority of the State. The criminal quality of an act cannot be discerned by intuition; nor can it be discovered by reference to any standard but one: Is the act prohibited with penal consequences? Morality and criminality are far from co-extensive; nor is the sphere of criminality necessarily part of a more extensive field covered by morality - unless the moral code necessarily disapproves all acts prohibited by the State, in which case the argument moves in a circle. It appears to their Lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to a category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of 'criminal jurisprudence'; for the domain of criminal jurisprudence can only be ascertained by examining what acts at any particular period are declared by the State to be crimes, and the only common nature they will be found to possess is that they are prohibited by the State ..."

Accordingly, the whole focus of a criminal trial is the ascertainment of whether it is established that the accused in fact committed a past act which constituted a criminal contravention of the requirements of a valid law which was applicable to the act at the time the act was done. It is the determination of that question which lies at the heart of the exclusively judicial function of the adjudgment of criminal guilt.

28. That basic tenet of our penal jurisprudence has at times been blurred in the area of so-called "judge-made" criminal law (see, generally, Spencer, Nulla Poena sine Lege in English Criminal Law, The Cambridge-Tilburg Law Lectures 1980; Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State, (1945), p 146). In so far as legislation is concerned, history records some departures from it particularly in times of civil disturbance. At least since the time of Bentham and Mill, however, ex post facto criminal legislation has been generally seen in common law countries as inconsistent with fundamental principle under our system of government. The point was well made by a very strong Court of Exchequer Chamber (Kelly C.B., Martin, Channell, Pigott and Cleasby BB., Willes and Brett JJ.) in a judgment delivered by Willes J. in Phillips v. Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1. Having recognized that some retrospective legislation was "beneficial and just", their Lordships wrote (at p 25):

> "The retrospective Attainder Acts of earlier times, when the principles of law were not so well understood or so closely regarded as in the present day, and which are now looked upon as barbarous and loosely spoken of as ex post facto laws, were of a substantially different character. They did not confirm irregular acts, but voided and punished what had been lawful when done. Mr. Justice Blackstone (1 Bla. Com. 46) describes laws ex post facto of this objectionable class as those by which 'after an action > indifferent in itself is committed, the legislature (Blackstone wrote "legislator") then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it'" (emphasis added).

5951

Obviously, their Lordships were not - any more than was Blackstone - suggesting that ex post facto criminal legislation was beyond the legislative competence of the Imperial Parliament whose powers have never been confined by an entrenched doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers. Nonetheless, their Lordships' comments - like those of Blackstone - are directly relevant to the determination of what lies beyond the limits of the legislative function under a constitution which, like ours, entrenches the doctrine and subjects legislative power to it. In that regard, it is important to note that their Lordships identified the central vice of a Bill of Attainder not as lying in its specific naming of an individual but as lying in its ex post facto operation as a legislative decree that an act which was not criminal when done was "voided and punished" as a crime. A statute which decreed that "any person" who had supported the unsuccessful party in some past period of civil disturbance was, notwithstanding that he had contravened no then existing law, guilty of treason and subject to a death penalty would not be a Bill of Attainder in the strict sense in that a trial would be necessary to determine whether a particular accused had in fact supported the unsuccessful party and the actual sentencing would be by a court. It would, nonetheless, fall squarely within the category of laws which their Lordships condemned as inconsistent with a proper understanding of "the principles of law". So also does any statute which, like s.9(1) of the Act, declares that a person is guilty of a crime against the law of the Commonwealth if he has committed a past act which did not, when committed, contravene any then existing and applicable law of the Commonwealth and was therefore not such a crime.

29. The perception that ex post facto criminal legislation lies outside the proper limits of the legislative function is not confined to countries whose legal traditions can be traced to the British system of government. It is shared by all the nations of the European Economic Community (see Case 63/83 Reg. v. Kirk (1984) EC.R. 2689, at p 2718). It is reinforced by the provisions of international conventions concerned with the recognition and protection of fundamental human rights (see, e.g., Universal Declaration of Human Rights, (1948), Art.11(2); European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, (1950), Art.7; American Convention on Human Rights, (1969), Art.9). In some international conventions and national declarations of fundamental rights, a disavowal of retrospective criminal legislation is made subject to a qualification in respect of an act which was, at the time it was committed, a crime against international law. Such a qualification is not in point in the present case where the conduct made criminal by the Act is not made punishable as, and need not necessarily have been, a crime against international law at the time it occurred.

30. A statutory provision, such as s.9 of the Act, that a "person who" in the past "committed" a specified act "is guilty of" a punishable crime prescribes no rule of conduct. It prohibits nothing. It trespasses upon the exclusively judicial field of determining whether past conduct was a crime, that is to say, whether it was in fact an act or omission which the law "prohibited with penal consequences". Within that field, it negates the ordinary curial process by enacting, and requiring a finding of, criminal guilt regardless of whether there was in fact any contravention of any relevant law. If the specified act was not prohibited by such a law when done, such a statutory provision is a retroactive legislative declaration of past criminal guilt when in fact there was none. If it nominates, either individually or by reference to an identifiable group, the person or persons who have committed the specified act, it constitutes a Bill of Attainder or a Bill of Pains and

Penalties, depending upon the punishment. In such a case, the statutory provision constitutes a legislative declaration of guilt without any trial at all. Plainly, it involves a usurpation of judicial power. As Murphy J. wrote in Victoria v. Australian Building Construction Employees' and Builders Labourers' Federation (1982) 152 CLR 25, at p 107:

> "For centuries the finding that a person has broken the criminal law has been regarded as within the judicial sphere, and outside the sphere of the Parliament and the executive. Bills of attainder by which Parliament entered the sphere of criminal justice are inconsistent with this basic constitutional scheme" (emphasis added).

31. The position is less obvious where such a statutory provision does not nominate a particular person or group of persons but identifies the persons whom it makes punishable for past "crime" by reference only to their having committed some past act which was not criminal when done. In such a case, there will be a need for a trial to determine whether a particular accused falls within the class of those whose past conduct is retroactively made criminal. Nonetheless, such a statutory provision declaring past conduct to have been a criminal offence constitutes a usurpation of judicial power in that, once it is established that the accused has committed the past act, the question whether that act constituted a criminal contravention of the law is made simply irrelevant. To that extent, curial determination of criminal guilt is ousted by legislative decree. The point can be illustrated by dividing the legislation in such a case into its essential components. One component of such legislation is the requirement that there be a "trial" in the courts, in which judicial process must be observed, to determine whether it is established beyond reasonable doubt that a particular person knowingly engaged in the designated conduct. The second component is the enactment that, if it be established that the particular person did in fact engage in that past conduct which was not criminal when done, he is guilty of a punishable crime. That second component of the legislation invades the heart of the exclusively judicial function of determining criminal guilt, that is to say, of determining whether past conduct constituted a criminal contravention of the law. It pre-empts and negates what would otherwise be an inevitable judicial determination that, since the act of the particular person did not constitute a criminal contravention of any Commonwealth law which was applicable at the time when it was done, that person committed no crime under our law. In the place of that inevitable judicial determination, it imposes a legislative enactment of past guilt which it requires the courts, in violation of the basic tenet of our criminal jurisprudence and the doctrine of separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers, to apply and enforce. It is simply not to the point that the first component of the legislation camouflages the usurpation of judicial power involved in the second by requiring a display of the full panoply of judicial process for the purpose of determining whether it is established beyond reasonable doubt that the accused person knowingly did a specified act which was not criminal when done.

32. It follows from what has been written above that Ch III's exclusive vesting of the judicial power of the Commonwealth in courts acting as such does not, at least prima facie, permit the conviction of a person by a court under a statute which declares that a person is guilty of a punishable crime if he has done a past act which was not criminal when done. There are two closely related reasons why the process leading up to such a conviction would prima facie contravene the doctrine of separation of powers embodied in Ch III. It is convenient to restate them in summary form. First, the legislature's interference in that process would go beyond the limits of the legislative function under a constitution structured upon the separation of judicial and legislative powers in that it would involve a usurpation and partial exercise of what lies at the heart of the exclusively judicial function in criminal matters, namely, the determination of whether the accused person has in fact done an act which constituted a criminal contravention of the then applicable law. Second, a court's participation in that process would also be inconsistent with the doctrine of the separation of powers in that it would represent an abdication of the judicial function of determining in a criminal trial whether past conduct had contravened the law in favour of the legislature's decree that a past non-criminal act is to be punished as a crime. It becomes necessary to consider whether anything within the Constitution itself or considerations of context or authority require that the provisions of Ch III be given some more limited effect than that which the doctrine of separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers would prima facie support. I shall consider that question under three headings: "Constitutional provisions and structure", "The United States precedent" and "The effect of decided cases".

Constitutional provisions and structure

33. It can be said at once that there is nothing in the Constitution which militates against construing Ch III as precluding the enactment (by the Parliament) or the application and enforcement (by the courts) of an ex post facto criminal law. To the contrary, some of the specific provisions and the general structure of the Constitution support such a construction.

34. The provisions of Ch III are based on an assumption of traditional judicial procedures, remedies and methodology. They confer "jurisdiction", that is, the curial power of declaration (dictio) of the law (jus): "the power and authority of a court to hear and determine a judicial proceeding" (In re Estate of De Camillis (1971) 322 NYS 2d 551, at p 556). The jurisdiction so conferred is upon "courts" rather than upon the judge or judges who constitute a particular court. Most important, it is with respect to "matters". In a context such as Ch III, the word "matters" denotes controversies of a kind appropriate to come before a court of justice (see, e.g., per Griffith C.J., The State of South Australia v. The State of Victoria ("the Boundaries Case") (1911) 12 CLR 667, at p 675). A matter "must be such that it can be determined upon principles of law" (ibid.; and see, to the same effect, per O'Connor J. at p 708). The "expression" (i.e. "matter" in Ch III) "includes and is confined to claims resting upon an alleged violation of some positive law ..." (per Isaacs J. at p 715). In their joint judgment in In re Judiciary and Navigation Acts (1921) 29 CLR 257, at p 266, Knox C.J., Gavan Duffy, Powers, Rich and Starke JJ. cited the judgments in the Boundaries Case as authority for the proposition, that "a matter under the judicature provisions of the Constitution must involve some right or privilege or protection given by law, or the prevention, redress or punishment of some act inhibited by law" (emphasis added).

35. Section 80 of the Constitution provides clear confirmation of Ch III's assumption of traditional curial standards, procedures and methodology in so far as the criminal law is concerned. It assumes that the determination of criminal guilt will be by "trial" and provides that, when the "trial" is "on indictment", it "shall be by jury". Traditionally, the ultimate question in a criminal trial by jury has been whether the accused did something which was, at the time he did it, contrary to the then law. In that regard, it is quite contrary to all traditional notions of a criminal trial by jury to require the jury to convict a person of a crime by reason of an act which was not criminal when done. In requiring that the trial by jury "shall be held in the State where the offence was committed" (emphasis added), s.80 assumes, what would in any event be implicit in the requirement of trial by jury, that the question of guilt or innocence will be determined by reference to criminality or otherwise as at the time of the alleged offence.

5954

36. Moreover, the structure of the federation and the paramountcy of the Commonwealth's legislative powers with respect to designated subject matters could give rise to extraordinary injustice, difficulty and uncertainty if it lay within the Commonwealth's legislative competence to enact an ex post facto criminal law. If the proscribed act under such a Commonwealth law had been mandatory under an operative and applicable State law at the time when the act was done, the accused would be made retroactively guilty of a crime for doing what the law actually required him to do at the time he did it. If the Commonwealth's ex post facto criminal law covered the field and purported to exclude the operation of any State law, the question would arise whether the exclusion and consequent pro tanto invalidity of the State law could be made fully retroactive (cf. University of Wollongong v. Metwally (1984) 158 CLR 447, at pp 478-479). If it could, State criminal law would assume a provisional character in any area within the reach of Commonwealth legislative power. If, in such a case, the accused had been convicted and punished for an offence against the inconsistent State law, he would have been accused and punished under what retroactively had been made invalid. If the Commonwealth law did not apply retroactively to invalidate the State law but had full cumulative operation, double jeopardy and double punishment would be the result. If it be objected that these problems are hypothetical and far-fetched, one need do not more than refer to the provisions of ss.6(1), 7(1) and 9(1) of the Act. Under those provisions, a person who had been convicted of the offence of "wounding" in 1942 in New South Wales would be retroactively made guilty of a "war crime" under the Act if his offence was committed in any of the circumstances referred to in s.7(1)(c) and (d). In such a case, the elements of the offence of "wounding" under New South Wales law would be elements of the "war crime" under the Act. Unless one can read down the provisions of the Act so that they do not apply to the case where a person has been convicted of the underlying "serious crime" under s.6(1), those provisions would inevitably give rise, in such a case, to serious difficulties and uncertainties about, among other things, the past validity of the State law and the effect of the past trial and conviction in respect of the State offence.

The United States precedent

37. The doctrine of the separation of powers which is incorporated in the Constitution differs from that embodied in the United States Constitution in so far as the relationship between the legislative and executive arms of government is concerned. Chapter III's separation of judicial from executive and legislative power was framed on the United States model. Even in that area, however, there is a relevant and important difference between the two in that the United States Constitution contains express prohibitions of any "Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law" (Art.I, s9, cl.3 (Federal) and Art.I, s10, cl.1 (State): "the Bill of Attainder Clause") which does not appear in our Constitution. It can be argued that the failure of the Constitution to follow the United States precedent in that regard provides grounds for rejecting a construction of Ch III which would preclude the enactment by the Parliament of an ex post facto criminal law. Such an argument is, of course, equally applicable to a Bill of Attainder in the strict sense. A general answer to it is that, in circumstances where the framers of our Constitution took a quite different approach to the need to incorporate express and detailed statements of underlying individual rights and guarantees, it is impermissible to treat the absence of one or other of the express statements of individual rights or guarantees contained in the United States Constitution as, of itself, constituting a reason for rejecting the possibility that the provisions of our Constitution may give rise to the implication of a corresponding individual right or guarantee (cf. Street v. Queensland Bar Association (1989) 168 CLR 461, at pp 521-522). There is, however, a more particular answer which turns the argument on its head.

38. At the time when the Constitution was adopted by the Australian people, it had long been recognized in the United States that the Bill of Attainder Clause did no more than make express what was, in any event, implicit in the doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers. Thus, in Calder v. Bull (1798) 3 US 386, at p 388, Chase J., in the course of what has subsequently been accepted as the classic exposition of the effect of that Clause, wrote:

> "The prohibition against their making any ex post facto laws was introduced for greater caution, and very probably arose from the knowledge, that the parliament of Great Britain claimed and exercised a power to pass such laws, under the denomination of bills of attainder, or bills of pains and penalties; the first inflicting capital, and the other less punishment. These acts were legislative judgments; and an exercise of judicial power" (emphasis added).

In a context where the express prohibition of "ex post facto laws" was seen as merely declaratory of an aspect of the doctrine of separation of powers, it was a natural step to confine the scope of that phrase to its traditional meaning of ex post facto laws dealing with criminal offences. That step was taken in Calder v. Bull where it was laid down that the reference to ex post facto laws in Art.I should be construed in a technical sense and confined to criminal laws which "create or aggravate the crime; or increase the punishment, or change the rules of evidence, for the purpose of conviction" (see per Chase J. at pp 390-391; Watson v. Mercer (1834) 33 US 88, at pp 109-110). As I have indicated, I am, in this judgment, using the phrase "ex post facto criminal law" in the even narrower sense explained by Blackstone, that is to say, as referring only to a law which retroactively makes criminal an act which was not criminal when done.

39. Chase J.'s view that the Bill of Attainder Clause, construed as confined to criminal laws, merely states what is implicit in the doctrine of separation of powers remains the accepted view in the United States. Thus, one finds the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Brown (1965) 381 US 437, at p 442, acknowledging that:

> "The best available evidence, the writings of the architects of our constitutional system, indicates that the Bill of Attainder Clause was intended not as a narrow, technical (and therefore soon to be outmoded) prohibition, but rather as an implementation of the separation of powers, a general safeguard against legislative exercise of the judicial function, or more simply - trial by legislature" (emphasis added).

(And see also, e.g., Ogden v. Blackledge (1804) 2 Cranch (6 US) 272, at p 277; Weaver v. Graham (1981) 450 US 24, at p 29; Tribe, American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. (1988), pp 656ff.; Lehmann, "The Bill of Attainder Doctrine: A Survey of the Decisional Law", Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly, vol.5 (1978), pp 777-780; "The Bounds of Legislative Specification: A Suggested Approach to the Bill of Attainder Clause", The Yale Law Journal, vol.72 (1962), pp 330ff.; but cf. Berger, "Bills of Attainder: A Study of Amendment by the Court", Cornell Law Review, vol.63 (1978), pp 379ff.)

40. It follows that the fact that the provisions of the Constitution incorporating the doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers were obviously influenced by corresponding provisions of the United States Constitution provides no reason for denying that it is implicit in those provisions that the Parliament lacks competence to enact an ex post facto criminal law. To the contrary, the recognition, long before 1900, that a prohibition of ex post facto criminal laws was implicit in the doctrine of separation of judicial power which those United States provisions embodied supports the conclusion that Ch III precludes the enactment of such a law. In that regard, it is relevant to note that at least one of the principal framers of our Constitution saw its adoption of the doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers as involving significant limitation on the powers of the Parliament corresponding to those which had been recognized by the United States decisions as flowing from that doctrine. In his Studies in Australian Constitutional Law, (1901), Mr. Justice Inglis Clark defined a "law" of the Commonwealth as "a rule of conduct prescribed by the Parliament in regard to any matter in respect of which the Parliament is authorised by the Constitution to make laws" (emphasis added). In the course of the following paragraph - opposite the marginal note "The distribution of governmental powers implies a limitation on the power of Parliament" - he wrote (at pp 39-41, emphasis again added):

5956

> "The Constitution does not prohibit the Parliament of the Commonwealth from making retroactive laws; and none of the Constitutions of the States imposes any such prohibition upon the Parliament of the State. But by limiting the governmental authority of the Federal Parliament to the exercise of legislative functions the Constitution of the Commonwealth has indirectly but effectually prohibited to the Parliament any legislation similar in character to some of the legislation which has been enacted in some, if not all, of the colonies which have become States of the Commonwealth. The legislation to which this statement refers has been usually enacted to remedy defects in previous legislation which have been discovered in the course of litigation and have defeated the expectations of the promoters of the previous law. ... Such amending laws have been repeatedly declared by the American courts to be invalid because they were encroachments upon the exclusive province of the Judiciary under a constitution which conferred separately upon different departments of the government the legislative, the executive and the judicial powers exercisable under it (See People v. Board of Supervisors, 16 N.Y., 424; Governor v. Porter, 5 Humph., 165; Mayor andc. v. Horn, 26 Md., 294). The underlying principle of the decisions of the American courts upon this subject was concisely stated by Thompson, J., in the case of Dash v. Van Kleek (7 Johns., 477) in which he said - 'To declare what the law is or has been is a judicial power; to declare what the law shall be is legislative.'"

Clearly enough, the first sentence in the above passage must be read, in context, as referring to a direct constitutional prohibition of retroactive laws. Equally clearly, Inglis Clark's apparent acceptance of the "underlying principle" referred to in the last sentence as applicable to our Constitution would preclude the enactment of an ex post facto criminal law.

The effect of decided cases

41. The only case in this Court in which reasoned consideration has been given to the question of the legislative competence of the Parliament of the Commonwealth to enact an ex post facto criminal law is R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425. In that case, the Court upheld the validity of s.3 of the Crimes Act 1915 (Cth) which had been assented to on 7 May 1915. That Act (by s.2) added conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth to the conspiracies which had been declared by s.86 of the Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) to be indictable offences. Section 3 provided that the amendment was to be deemed to have been in force from the date of the commencement of the 1914 Act (29 October 1914). The Court held, unanimously, that it had been within the legislative competence of the Parliament to make the legislation retrospective.

42. The first thing to be noted about Kidman for the purposes of the present case is that all members of the Court saw the question of the validity of the retrospective provisions as depending "entirely on the meaning of sub-sec.xxxix (i.e. the "incidental" power) of sec.51 of the Constitution" (per Isaacs J. at p 440; and see also at pp 434-435 (Griffith C.J.), 450-451 (Higgins J.), 455 (Gavan Duffy and Rich JJ.), 460-461 (Powers J., who also relied upon the "defence power" conferred by s.51(vi))). Notwithstanding that reference was made to Calder v. Bull, it apparently was not suggested in argument in Kidman that there was any relevant limitation of the plenary legislative powers conferred upon the Parliament by s.51 to be derived from other provisions of the Constitution (see per Higgins J. at p 451). The result was that none of the judgments adverted to the question whether a retroactive criminal law was consistent with s.71's exclusive vesting of judicial power in Ch III courts. With the benefit of hindsight, that may seem to be surprising. It must, however, be remembered that Kidman was decided some three years before the Court was first called upon to "make a critical examination" of the effect of s.71's vesting of judicial power in Ch III courts (see Alexander, at p 441).

5957

43. Kidman is clear authority for the proposition that the fact that a criminal law operates retrospectively does not necessarily preclude it from being properly characterized as a law for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to one or other of the heads of legislative power set out in s.51. In that regard, the case provides support for the conclusion reached earlier in this judgment that the operative provisions of the Act are properly to be characterized as a law with respect to "External affairs" notwithstanding that they relate only to past acts. Thus, Gavan Duffy and Rich JJ. said (at pp 456-457):

> "... in any case Parliament may think and rightly think that punishment of offences committed before the passing of the Act would be likely to deter persons from obstructing the execution of powers in the future. If we take the collection of Customs duties by way of a concrete example of the execution of a power, might not Parliament reasonably think that the most effective means to prevent the perpetration of frauds in the course of such collection, and so protect and facilitate the execution of the power, would be not merely to provide for the punishment of those who offended in the future but to actually punish offenders in the past? If so, Parliament would be at liberty to adopt those means."

There are statements to like effect in the judgments of Isaacs J. (at p 443), Higgins J. (at p 450) and Powers J. (at pp 460-461). By analogy, the Parliament might "reasonably think" that the punishment of present Australian citizens and residents for past acts of barbarism in other countries would act as a deterrent to other Australian citizens and residents from engaging in such conduct in the future. That of course says nothing on the question whether such a law is consistent with Ch III of the Constitution.

44. Even though the possible effect of Ch III was neither raised nor considered in Kidman, Griffith C.J. was troubled by the notion that the Parliament possessed legislative competence to enact an ex post facto criminal law, that is, a law which retroactively makes criminal an act which was indifferent when done. His Honour saw the making and enforcement of such a law as standing quite outside the ordinary enactment and administration of criminal laws with respect to, or for the purposes of, the subject matters of legislative power contained in s.51 (see at pp 432-434). He expressed the view that, if it were necessary to assign an ex post facto criminal law to some definite category, "the true category would be 'Control over the liberty of the subject' ... or 'Reward and punishment of citizens who have deserved well or ill of the State'" and concluded (ibid.) that a law which operates merely as an ex post facto criminal law was not within the legislative power conferred by s.51(xxxix). The Chief Justice's difficulty with the notion that the Parliament could, as a matter of characterization under s.51, have legislative competence to enact an ex post facto criminal law was not shared by the other members of the Court. The discussion of that difficulty in his judgment tends, however, to underline the importance of the fact that no consideration at all was given in Kidman to the possible relevance of Ch III of the Constitution.

5958

45. The basis of Griffith C.J.'s conclusion, in Kidman, that the retrospective provision of the 1915 Act was valid was that the law was not really an ex post facto criminal law at all. In his Honour's view, conduct which constituted conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth had already been a crime at common law before the enactment of the 1915 Act. On that view, all that the 1915 Act did was to enact "in the form of a Statute the unwritten law of the Commonwealth" (at pp 436-437). Griffith C.J.'s view that the legislation in Kidman was not an ex post facto criminal law in the narrow sense in which I have been using that phrase, was apparently shared by Isaacs J. (see at p 442). The judgments of a majority of the Court proceeded, however, on the assumption that the 1915 Act was a truly ex post facto criminal law. That being so, Kidman is properly to be seen as providing technical authority for a denial of the proposition that Ch III of the Constitution precludes the enactment by the Parliament of such a law. However, in circumstances where the effect of Ch III and the question of the validity of that proposition were neither raised in argument nor considered in any of the judgments and where the case was decided before the implications of the adoption by Ch III (and by the Constitution as a whole) of the doctrine of the separation of judicial from administrative and legislative power had been critically examined in this Court, the authority of Kidman in that regard is weak indeed. This Court is the creation and the servant of the Constitution. It would be quite wrong for it to treat an implicit decision of its own in an earlier case on a point which was neither raised in argument nor considered in the judgments as of itself providing a justification for refusing to acknowledge the implications of Ch III's fundamental guarantee of judicial process.

46. Kidman has been mentioned in a number of subsequent cases in the Court. In Moss v. Donohoe (1915) 20 CLR 615, at pp 620-621, Griffith C.J. referred, without discussion, to the dissenting opinion he had expressed in Kidman about the invalidity of a truly retroactive criminal law. The case was referred to, again without discussion, in R. v. Snow (1917) 23 CLR 256, at p 265, and Millner v. Raith (1942) 66 CLR 1 (see at p 9) as authority for the proposition that the Parliament has authority to enact an ex post facto criminal law. Otherwise, subsequent references to the case in the Court have been merely passing and obiter or they have been in civil proceedings or deportation cases without reference to ex post facto criminal legislation. In none of those subsequent cases has there been any advertence to the possible relevance of Ch III of the Constitution. In these circumstances, the subsequent cases in the Court add little to the weight of Kidman as authority on the effect of Ch III.

47. Kidman and the cases referred to in the preceding paragraph aside, there is no real authority on the question whether Ch III precludes the enactment by the Parliament of an ex post facto criminal law. Cases concerning the constitutional law of the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand and other countries without comparable constitutional provisions vesting national judicial power can offer but limited assistance in this particular area. Such cases do, however, disclose a general perception of the inconsistency of ex post facto criminal legislation with accepted minimum standards of fairness in the administration of criminal justice (see, e.g., Waddington v. Miah (1974) 1 WLR 683, at p 694; (1974) 2 All ER 377, at p 379; Federal Republic of Germany v. Rauca (1982) 38 O.R. (2d) 705, at p 717; Reg. v. Kirk, at p 2718). In view of the influence of the United States precedent upon the framing of our

S959

Constitution's vesting of judicial power exclusively in designated courts, th most helpful persuasive decisions from other jurisdictions are the cases in the United States Supreme Court, particularly Calder v. Bull, decided before the adoption of the Australian Constitution. Specific reference has already been made to them (see above). They support the proposition that ex post facto criminal legislation is inconsistent with the exclusive vesting of judicial power in courts under a constitution structured upon the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers. Specific reference should also be made to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (Lord MacDermott, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Lord Guest, Lord Pearce and Lord Pearson) on appeal from the Supreme Court of Ceylon in Liyanage v. The Queen (1967) 1 AC 259.

48. The impugned legislation in Liyanage had been purportedly enacted by the Parliament of Ceylon to deal with a past abortive coup d'etat. It retrospectively widened the existing statutory offence of conspiring to wage war against the Queen. In that regard, however, it would seem not to have been an ex post facto criminal law in the sense explained above since the conduct which was retrospectively included in the offence would clearly have constituted some other criminal offence at the time when it occurred. The substantive retrospective operation of the legislation was plainly directed to the trial and punishment of the persons involved in the coup. Its "pith and substance" was summarized as follows (at p 290): "It legalised their imprisonment while they were awaiting trial. It made admissible their statements inadmissibly obtained during that period. It altered the fundamental law of evidence so as to facilitate their conviction. And finally it altered ex post facto the punishment to be imposed on them." The last sentence is a reference to the fact that the challenged legislation retrospectively prescribed a minimum penalty (ten years' imprisonment) and decreed compulsory forfeiture of property in the case of a conviction of conspiracy "to wage war against the Queen".

49. As their Lordships recognized (at p 286), the Constitution of Ceylon differed from that of Australia and the United States of America in that it did not expressly vest national judicial power in designated courts. However, their Lordships considered (at p 287) that other provisions of the Constitution of Ceylon manifested a similar intention that "judicial power shall be vested only in the judicature". In circumstances where the challenged legislation applied to acts which were, in any event, criminal when done, their Lordships' consideration was confined to the question whether legislation which retrospectively increased the penalty for past criminal conduct and which operated retrospectively to alter the course of particular proceedings was consistent with the exclusive vesting of judicial power in the judicature. In their Lordships' view, the answer to that question depended upon whether the effect of the legislation was that judicial power had been "usurped or infringed by the executive or the legislature". They went on to explain (at p 289):

> "Section 29 (1) of the Constitution says: 'Subject to the provisions of this Order Parliament shall have power to make laws for the peace order and good government of the Island.' These words have habitually been construed in their fullest scope. Section 29 (4) provides that Parliament may amend the Constitution on a two-thirds majority with a certificate of the Speaker. Their Lordships however cannot read the words of section 29 (1) as entitling Parliament to pass legislation which usurps the judicial power of the judicature - e.g., by passing an Act of attainder against some person or instructing a judge to bring in a verdict of guilty against someone who is being tried - if in law such usurpation would otherwise be > contrary to the Constitution. There was speculation during the argument as to what the position would be if Parliament sought to procure such a result by first amending the Constitution by a two-thirds majority. But such a situation does not arise here. In so far as any Act passed without recourse to section 29 (4) of the Constitution purports to usurp or infringe the judicial power it is ultra vires."

5960

50. The importance of the Judicial Committee's decision in Liyanage for present purposes lies in its clear recognition that the exclusive vesting of judicial power in the judicature under the written Constitution of a British Dominion has important and far-reaching implications in so far as the integrity of the judicial process and the exercise of judicial power are concerned. In that regard, the decision that the impugned legislation was invalid for the reason that it represented a legislative usurpation and infringement of judicial power underlined the difference between the situation under such a written Constitution defining the scope of legislative power and the situation in the United Kingdom where the Constitution is unwritten and legislative power is unconfined (see at p 288). Their Lordships stated (at p 289) that they were "not prepared to hold that every enactment in this field which can be described as ad hominem and ex post facto must inevitably usurp or infringe the judicial power". In the case before them, however, they had "no doubt" that the challenged legislation constituted "such interference" (at p 290). The decisive invalidating features of the legislation were the fact that it was directed against those involved in the abortive coup and the fact that it retrospectively prescribed a minimum term of imprisonment and automatic forfeiture of property. Their Lordships said (at pp 290-291):

> "The true nature and purpose of these enactments are revealed by their conjoint impact on the specific proceedings in respect of which they were designed, and they take their colour, in particular, from the alterations they purported to make as to their ultimate objective, the punishment of those convicted. These alterations constituted a grave and deliberate incursion into the judicial sphere. Quite bluntly, their aim was to ensure that the judges in dealing with these particular persons on these particular charges were deprived of their normal discretion as respects appropriate sentences. They were compelled to sentence each offender on conviction to not less than ten years' imprisonment, and compelled to order confiscation of his possessions, even though his part in the conspiracy might have been trivial."

The position would obviously have been a fortiori if the conduct which the legislation retrospectively subjected to the minimum punishment of ten years' imprisonment had not even been an offence under the law of Ceylon at the time when it occurred.

51. It becomes necessary to weigh the considerations favouring acceptance of the general proposition that the effect of s.71's exclusive vesting of the judicial power of the Commonwealth in Ch III courts precludes the enactment by the Parliament of an ex post facto criminal law against any considerations militating against acceptance of that general proposition. On the one hand, considerations of fundamental principle and the implications of the Constitution's doctrine of the separation of judicial from legislative and executive powers dictate acceptance of the proposition. In that, they are reinforced by the general structure of the Constitution, by a number of specific constitutional provisions dealing with other matters and by judgments in United States cases in relation to the effect of the exclusive vesting of the judicial power of the United States in designated courts under the doctrine of separation of powers embodied in that country's Constitution. On the other hand, the bare decision in Kidman, unsupported by relevant express statement or reasoning, stands in opposition supported only by the fact that it was uncritically and unquestioningly accepted in some later cases in which, as in Kidman, no reference at all was made to Ch III. In these circumstances, the validity of the general proposition must be accepted and, to the extent that it denies it, Kidman must be overruled.

Some exclusions from the scope of Ch III

52. The cases establish that s.71's vesting of the judicial power of the Commonwealth exclusively in Ch III courts is subject to at least two exceptions in the area of the trial and punishment of unlawful conduct. The first exception relates to the power of each of the Houses of Parliament to punish for contempt or breach of privilege (see Reg. v. Richards; Ex parte Fitzpatrick and Browne (1955) 92 CLR 157). The second relates to the powers of military tribunals to enforce military discipline by dealing, at least in some circumstances, with offences against military law committed by those who fall under military authority (see R. v. Bevan; Ex parte Elias and Gordon (1942) 66 CLR 452). The first of those exceptions flows from the provisions of s.49 of the Constitution which, unlike s.51, were not expressly made subject to Ch III (see Re Tracey; Ex parte Ryan, at p 581). The second is a largely pragmatic exception based on historical and practical considerations (ibid., at pp 581-583).

53. The Court has not had occasion in the past to examine the extent to which Ch III of the Constitution is applicable in relation to the trial and punishment of persons accused of crimes against international law. In so far as Australia's participation in the establishment and functioning of an international tribunal for the trial and punishment of such alleged crimes is concerned, the provisions of Ch III would be inapplicable for the reason that the judicial power of the Commonwealth would not be involved. Australia's participation would be as a member State of the International Community and the judicial power involved would be the judicial power of that Community. The position is not so clear in a case where a local tribunal is purportedly vested with jurisdiction in relation to an alleged crime against international law. It may be arguable that, in such a case, the judicial power of the Commonwealth is not involved for so long as the alleged crime against international law is made punishable as such in the local court (see, e.g., Brierly, The Basis of Obligation in International Law, (1958), p 304). Alternatively, at least where violations of the laws and customs of war are alone involved, analogy with the disciplinary powers of military tribunals and largely pragmatic considerations might combine to dictate recognition of a special jurisdiction standing outside Ch III. Those are, however, questions which it is unnecessary to answer for the purposes of the present case.

54. The purported conferral of jurisdiction in the present case is upon Ch III courts. Conduct which the Act makes punishable as a "war crime" is not punishable under the Act as an offence against international law. It is punishable as a distinct and independently defined indictable offence under the municipal law of the Commonwealth. Nor is that conduct confined to violations of international law. The conduct which the Act retroactively makes punishable as a crime under municipal law need not have been a crime against international law at the time it was committed. The elements of the indictable offence of a "war crime" are identified by ss.6, 7, 9 and 10 of the Act without reference to international law. International law becomes relevant only if a defence is raised, under s.17(2), that the conduct which constitutes a "war crime" under ss.6 and 7 was "permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war" and "was not under international law a crime against humanity". That defence can be relied on only if "there is evidence of the existence of the facts" which constitute it (s.17(4)). More important, even where there is such evidence, the validity of a defence under s.17(2) is not to be determined by reference only to international law. Section 17(2) is expressly made subject to s.16 which, subject to presently irrelevant qualifications, excludes (except as a plea of mitigation) the defence of government or superior orders. At the time of the alleged offences in the present case (i.e. prior to June 1943), it is clear beyond real argument that the stage had not been reached where customary international law unqualifiedly regarded a subordinate (as distinct from his State) as being individually guilty of a breach of the law and customs of war in circumstances where he had merely acted in obedience to superior orders which he was bound to obey under his national law (see, e.g., Wheaton's Elements of International Law, 6th ed. (1929), vol.II, pp 1159-1160; Oppenheim, International Law, 5th ed. (1935), vol.II, pp 453-454; the United States Rules of Land Warfare, (1940), Art.347; British Manual of Military Law, 7th ed. (1929), Art.443; Lauterpacht, "The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes", (1944) XXI The British Year Book of International Law 58, at pp 69-74; Pal, Crimes in International Relations, (1955), pp 382-384; Roling, "The Law of War and the National Jurisdiction since 1945", Recueil des Cours, (1960-II), vol.100, pp 372-377; History of the War Crimes Commission, at pp 274-288; Stone, op cit, at p 362; Detter De Lupis, The Law of War, (1987), pp 357-358; and, as regards Australia, the Manual of Military Law 1941 which recognized the defence (Ch XIV, par.443) but which was amended on 30 September 1944 to deny it). The importance of the express exclusion of a defence of superior orders is not so much that such a defence was available at international law at least in some circumstances at the time of an alleged offence under the Act. It is that the legislative exclusion of the defence - like the legislative indifference to the question whether, at the time of an alleged offence, customary international law directly established or made punishable the criminality of individuals for breaches of the law of war (see above) - underlines the fact that what the Act is concerned to make punishable is a new crime against the law of the Commonwealth which the Act itself retrospectively creates. If the elements of an indictable offence as defined by ss.6, 7, 9 and 10 are present and the qualified defence under s.17(2) is not raised or, if raised, does not prevail, it matters not for the purposes of the Act whether the accused was or was not personally guilty of a crime under international law.

55. In these circumstances, the jurisdiction purportedly conferred by the Act is in relation to crimes under Commonwealth law. The consideration that the alleged conduct was not criminal under international law when it occurred may, but will not necessarily, constitute a defence. When conduct is punishable under the Act, it is punishable, in the ordinary municipal courts, solely by reason of the fact that it is an indictable offence under the municipal law of this country. The trial and punishment within Australia of an Australian citizen or resident accused of such an indictable offence under municipal law is part of the ordinary judicial power of the Commonwealth. That being so, the Act is necessarily beyond the competence of the Parliament to the extent that it is properly to be seen as an ex post facto criminal law in the sense that I have explained.

Is the Act an ex post facto criminal law?

56. As a general rule, the question whether an enactment of a particular legislature declaring that a past act is punishable as a crime is an ex post facto criminal law will fall to be determined by reference to the system of law which is subject to the legislative powers of that legislature. The fact that the particular act was a crime under some other system of law at the time when it was done will ordinarily be irrelevant. In a federation such as Australia where the national law encompasses the enactments of a number of different legislatures with authority in designated areas, the question whether a law of a particular legislature is an ex post facto criminal law will ordinarily fall to be determined by reference to the particular area of the national law in relation to which that particular legislature has authority. Thus, it will ordinarily be irrelevant that an act retrospectively made criminal under an enactment of the Parliament of the Commonwealth was already a crime under an enactment of one or more of the State Parliaments. It is, however, possible to envisage circumstances in which the interaction between Commonwealth and State laws could give rise to difficulty in determining whether a law of the Parliament which retrospectively declared a past act to be punishable as a crime was properly to be seen as an ex post facto criminal law. If, for example, the Commonwealth Parliament were, pursuant to a reference (under s.51(xxxvii) of the Constitution) or a request (under s.51(xxxviii)) by the Parliaments of all the States, to enact a national code in relation to a certain type of crime which retrospectively replaced earlier Commonwealth and State laws, it would be arguable that the code was not an ex post facto criminal law to the extent that it retrospectively made criminal under Commonwealth law an act which had been, at the time when it was done, a corresponding crime punishable by a corresponding or greater penalty under the law of the State where it was done. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue such questions for the purposes of the present case. It is not suggested that the acts committed outside Australia to which the Act applies were crimes under any law of this country - Commonwealth, State or Territory - at the time when they were done. In so far as the Act applies to past conduct within Australia, the fact that elements of that conduct (i.e. the s.6(1) elements) were punishable as different, and in many cases much less heinous, crimes under the law of the State or Territory in which the conduct occurred is clearly insufficient to prevent the Act's retroactive declaration that the past conduct (i.e. the s.6(1) elements aggravated by the s.7 elements) is punishable under Commonwealth law as "war crimes" from being an ex post facto criminal law in the relevant sense. Indeed, no submission to the contrary was advanced on behalf of those who argued in support of the validity of the Act.

5963

57. Nor is it necessary to consider whether a law of the Parliament which confers retrospective jurisdiction upon a municipal court to punish a past crime under international law (as such) is an ex post facto criminal law in the relevant sense. As has been seen, the Act does not confine the conduct which it retrospectively makes punishable to acts which were, when they occurred, crimes under international law. Nor does it make that conduct punishable as a crime under international law. What the Act does is to declare past conduct, which may or may not have been a crime under international law, to have been a crime under Commonwealth law which is punishable in its capacity as such. In those regards, the Act differs from the War Crimes Act (Cth) as enacted in 1945 and from legislation enacted in some other countries for the punishment of past acts as war crimes (see, e.g., the Canadian Criminal Code, s.7(3.71)-(3.76); the Netherlands Penal Code, Art.27a; and cf. the War Crimes Act 1991 (UK), s.1). It also makes inapplicable statements in other cases or in learned writings to the effect that an offence is being punished in its capacity as a contravention of international law (see, e.g., Baxter, "The Municipal and International Law Basis of Jurisdiction over War Crimes", (1951) XXVIII The British Year Book of International Law 382, at pp 382-387) and that, for that reason, the retrospective conferral of jurisdiction is not a retroactive or ex post facto criminal law (see, e.g., Reg. v. Finta (1989) 61 DLR (4th) 85, at pp 94-95; and, as to the recent United Kingdom legislation, Steiner, "Prosecuting War Criminals in England and in France", (1991) Criminal Law Review 180, at p 186).

58. It follows that the operative provisions of the Act constitute an ex post facto criminal law and are inconsistent with s.71's exclusive vesting of the judicial power of the Commonwealth in Ch III courts. Accordingly, s.9 of the Act is invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff and the question reserved for consideration should be answered in the affirmative.

59. There is one further matter which I would briefly mention. It is that the enormity of the acts of barbarism perpetrated before and in the course of the 1939-1945 war in Europe should not be allowed to disguise the nature of the critical question addressed in this judgment. The charges against the plaintiff relate to acts allegedly done in the Ukraine. It is common ground that those acts, when and if done, did not contravene any applicable law of the Commonwealth. Yet the charges against the plaintiff are not of breaches of international law or of breaches of the system of law which applied in the Ukraine during the wartime occupation of that country. They are of crimes against the law of the Commonwealth. The only arguable basis of those charges is a statutory provision (the Act, s.9(1)) which purported to declare in 1988 that a "person ... is guilty of an indictable offence" against the law of the Commonwealth if, between 1939 and 1945, he had done an act which was not, when done, an offence against the law of the Commonwealth at all. The critical question upon the answer to which this judgment turns is ultimately one of abstract constitutional law. It is whether the Commonwealth Parliament possesses power to legislate that a "person ... is guilty" of a crime against Commonwealth law if, in the past, he has done some specified thing which was not, when done, such a crime. That question must, in my view, be answered in the negative for the reason that a law which declares that a person "is guilty" of a crime against a law of the Commonwealth if he has done an act which did not, when done, in fact contravene any such law is inconsistent with Ch III of the Constitution. Both in substance and in form, the central operation of the Act is as such a legislative declaration of criminal guilt. It prohibits nothing, prescribes no rule of conduct and is incapable of being contravened since, by its terms, it is inapplicable to acts committed after its enactment. As I have endeavoured to explain, it is not to the point that the Act identifies a "person" whom it declares to be "guilty" of past crimes against the law of the Commonwealth not by name but, in the case of the plaintiff, by reference to whether, within a long past period and in another country, he did an alleged act which was not such a crime when done and which has never, if done where it was allegedly done, been prohibited by any applicable law of the Commonwealth, including the Act. Nor is it to the point that the operation of the Act to declare that such a person "is guilty" of such a past crime is obscured by the requirement of a trial to determine whether a particular accused is in fact such a person. What is to the point for the purposes of the present case is the combined effect of two propositions which are basic to the criminal jurisprudence of this country. The first of those propositions is almost a truism. It is that criminal guilt, under our system of law, means being guilty of a contravention of the requirements of a then existing and applicable penal law: a crime is, as Blackstone wrote (see above), "an act committed, or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it". That proposition lies at the heart of Lord Atkin's comments in the Proprietary Articles Case (see above) when he wrote (emphasis added) that criminal law "connotes only the quality of such acts or omissions as are prohibited under appropriate penal provisions" and that the "criminal quality of an act" cannot "be discovered by reference to any standard but one: Is the act prohibited with penal consequences?" The second of those two propositions is that the function of determining whether a person is in fact guilty of a crime against a law of the Commonwealth is a function which appertains exclusively to, and which cannot be excluded from, the judicial power which our Constitution vests solely in the courts which it designates. That being so, it is beyond the competence of the Parliament to declare, as s.9(1) of the Act purports to do, that a "person ... is guilty" of a crime against a law of the Commonwealth by reason of having committed a past act which did not, when done, contravene any applicable Commonwealth law and was therefore not in fact such a crime.

JUDGE4

5965

DAWSON J. Whilst I have never been able to accept the view that the external affairs power (Constitution, s.51(xxix)) extends to matters of a purely domestic character merely because they form the subject of an international treaty or may otherwise be shown to be of international concern, I have never doubted that the power extends to places, persons, matters or things physically external to Australia. The word "affairs" is imprecise, but is wide enough to cover places, persons, matters or things. The word "external" is precise and is unqualified. If a place, person, matter or thing lies outside the geographical limits of the country, then it is external to it and falls within the meaning of the phrase "external affairs".

2. Whether the external affairs power was always construed in this way is something which need not trouble me. Section 3 of the Statute of Westminster 1931 (Imp) declares and enacts that the Parliament of a Dominion has full power to make laws having extraterritorial operation. That section, amongst others, was adopted by the Statute of Westminster Adoption Act 1942 (Cth), the adoption being given effect from 3 September 1939. As Menzies J. pointed out in Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, at p 300:

> "(Section 3) is not an amending section; it is an amplifying section directed to negativing a conception which in the course of time had perhaps come to be regarded as a misconception as to the nature of a power to legislate granted by the Imperial Parliament to a Dominion Parliament without any affirmation that the power granted extended to the making of laws with extra-territorial operation."

The conception or misconception, which was never anything but obscure, was, in any event, largely disposed of in 1932 by the Privy Council, without any reliance upon the Statute of Westminster, in Croft v. Dunphy (1933) AC 156 when it said, at p 163, of the Canadian Parliament:

> "Once it is found that a particular topic of legislation is among those upon which the Dominion Parliament may competently legislate as being for the peace, order and good government of Canada or as being one of the specific subjects enumerated in s.91 of the British North America Act, their Lordships see no reason to restrict the permitted scope of such legislation by any other consideration than is applicable to the legislation of a fully Sovereign State."

So far as the Australian States were concerned the power contained in each of their Constitutions to legislate for the peace, order and good government of the State (or the equivalent power) continued to be construed as requiring that State legislation with an extraterritorial operation be connected, not too remotely, with the enacting State. That test, however, was never narrowly applied and its operation must now be governed by s.2(1) of the Australia Act 1986 (Cth) and s.2(1) of the Australia Act 1986 (UK), each of which declares and enacts that each State has full power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the State with extraterritorial operation: see Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King (1988) 166 CLR 1, at p 14.

3. Whatever the position may have been or may be with the States, since the Statute of Westminster extended to Australia there is no doubt at all that the Constitution bestows upon the Commonwealth Parliament full and complete power to legislate extraterritorially with respect to those matters enumerated in s.51 which, of their nature, can be the subject of extraterritorial legislation. This was the view of Windeyer J., with which I respectfully agree, in Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd., at pp 306-307:

> "If the Commonwealth Parliament were to legislate gratuitously in respect of foreign persons in foreign territory, in one of the ways fancifully suggested in > argument, an Australian court could not hold the legislation was invalid - provided, always, that it was in respect of one of the matters in s.51. Vis-a-vis the States, the competence of the Commonwealth Parliament remains limited and the Statute of Westminster does not affect this. But in respect of the matters set out in s.51 the Parliament is now in reality fully sovereign, except perhaps in a theoretical unrealistic sense satisfying to convinced Austinians who see the Statute of Westminster as a repealable enactment of the Imperial Parliament. Whatever limitations international comity may impose are the consequences of considerations of political propriety and of the limitations of political power, not of legal capacity."

5966

4. While the old conception or misconception persisted, it may have suggested a restrictive interpretation of the external affairs power in its application to circumstances external to Australia. This was recognized by Jacobs J. when he said in New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, at p 497:

> "It is true that the operation of the (external affairs) power may have been limited in 1900 by the concept that Australia, lacking sovereignty, could legislate only for its territory; but that limitation, if it existed, did not alter the meaning of the words."

That limitation, while it was thought to exist, may have required legislation extending to matters external to Australia to exhibit, even under the external affairs power, some relationship between those matters and Australia in order to provide the necessary territorial connection. But now that the extraterritorial legislative power of the Commonwealth has been put beyond doubt, there is no justification for reading down the words "external affairs" so as to require any such relationship. Externality alone is sufficient.

5. That means that, subject to any express or implied constitutional prohibitions or limitations, the external affairs power is capable by itself of providing the authority for Commonwealth legislation extending to circumstances which are geographically external to Australia, without reference to the other legislative powers conferred by s.51 of the Constitution. That must be the case, for it is beyond question that s.51(xxix) stands as an independent legislative power. A contrary suggestion was shortly disposed of by Latham C.J. in R. v. Burgess; Ex parte Henry (1936) 55 CLR 608, at p 639:

> "It has been argued that sec.51(xxix.) should be construed as giving power to make laws only with respect to some external aspect of the other subjects mentioned in sec.51. Prima facie it would be as reasonable to argue that any other single power conferred by sec.51 is limited by reference to all the other powers conferred by that section - which is really an unintelligible proposition. There is no reason whatever why placitum xxix. should not be given its natural and proper meaning, whatever that may be, as an independent express legislative power."

It is true that in 1936 Latham C.J. viewed s.51(xxix) as being incapable of providing general extraterritorial legislative power because of covering cl.5 of the Constitution. Covering cl.5 relevantly provides that the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth. But if in so providing covering cl.5 reflected a limited conception of Commonwealth extraterritorial legislative power, it has been overtaken by s.3 of the Statute of Westminster. In any event, covering cl.5 appears to have been intended to extend Commonwealth domestic laws to the ships designated, upon the customary basis that they were to be treated as part of Australia, rather than to authorize a limited exercise of extraterritorial legislative power: see Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd., at p 309.

6. I must confess that I have never entirely understood why the words "peace, order, and good government" should have been thought to impose a territorial limitation upon State legislative power, when they otherwise have no practical limiting effect. Indeed, Windeyer J. in Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd., at p 308, thought that the origin of the limitation was otherwise. Nevertheless, it must now be accepted that the limits upon the extraterritorial operation of a State law - now subject to the Australia Act - inhere in the grant of power to the legislature: Port MacDonnell Professional Fishermen's Assn Inc. v. South Australia (1989) 168 CLR 340, at p 370. Be that as it may, in the absence of any territorial limitation upon the Commonwealth's legislative powers, it is clear that the words "peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" in s.51 of the Constitution impose no practical limits upon those powers: see Reg. v. Burah (1878) 3 App Cas 889; Hodge v. The Queen (1883) 9 App Cas 117; Powell v. Apollo Candle Company (1885) 10 App Cas 282; Riel v. The Queen (1885) 10 App Cas 675. These cases were examined by this Court recently in Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King, a case which raised questions concerning the extent of the power of the Parliament of New South Wales to legislate for the peace, welfare and good government of the State. At p 10, this Court said:

> "These decisions and statements of high authority demonstrate that, within the limits of the grant, a power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of a territory is as ample and plenary as the power possessed by the Imperial Parliament itself. That is, the words 'for the peace, order and good government' are not words of limitation. They did not confer on the courts of a colony, just as they do not confer on the courts of a State, jurisdiction to strike down legislation on the ground that, in the opinion of a court, the legislation does not promote or secure the peace, order and good government of the colony. Just as the courts of the United Kingdom cannot invalidate laws made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom on the ground that they do not secure the welfare and the public interest, so the exercise of its legislative power by the Parliament of New South Wales is not susceptible to judicial review on that score. Whether the exercise of that legislative power is subject to some restraints by reference to rights deeply rooted in our democratic system of government and the common law (see Drivers v. Road Carriers ((1982) 1 NZLR 374, at p 390); Fraser v. State Services Commission ((1984) 1 NZLR 116, at p 121); Taylor v. New Zealand Poultry Board ((1984) 1 NZLR 394, at p 398)), a view which Lord Reid firmly rejected in Pickin v. British Railways Board ((1974) AC 765, at p 782), is another question which we need not explore."

The effect of the authorities is that, save possibly for quite extraordinary circumstances, it is for the Commonwealth Parliament alone to judge whether legislation which otherwise falls within power is for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth: Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd., at p 308; Pearce v. Florenca (1976) 135 CLR 507, at pp 515-516.

7. The conclusion that the reach of the external affairs power extends to all places, persons, matters or things geographically external to Australia is, I think, supported by recent authority. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, Barwick C.J., at p 360, expressed the view that the "power extends ... to any affair which in its nature is external to the continent of Australia and the island of Tasmania subject always to the Constitution as a whole". A similar view was expressed by Mason J., at p 470, and by Jacobs J., at p 497. It would seem that Murphy J. placed at least as wide a construction upon the reach of the external affairs power outside Australia as Barwick C.J., Mason and Jacobs JJ. Subsequently, in The Commonwealth v. Tasmania (The Tasmanian Dam Case) (1983) 158 CLR 1, at p 170, Murphy J. expressed the view that the external affairs power authorizes the Parliament to make laws which govern conduct outside Australia. See also Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, at p 162.

8. In Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168, at p 190, Gibbs C.J. said, referring to the Seas and Submerged Lands Case:

> "three members of the Court, Barwick C.J., Mason and Jacobs JJ., relied on the ... ground that the power given by s.51(xxix) was not limited to authorizing laws with respect to Australia's relationships with foreign countries, but extended to any matter or thing situated or done outside Australia (at pp 360, 470-471, 497). It is unnecessary to consider whether the words of par. (xxix) can have this dual operation, i.e. whether the phrase "external affairs" can be used to mean matters outside the Commonwealth as well as matters involving a relationship between Australia and other countries."

In the same case, at p 223, Mason J. reiterated his view, which he said had been accepted in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, that "the power extends to matters and things, and I would say, persons, outside Australia". In Robinson v. Western Australian Museum (1977) 138 CLR 283, at p 294, Barwick C.J. repeated his opinion that "the Commonwealth may take as the subject matter of its law some fact or circumstance which is actually outside the territorial limits of the Commonwealth". Mason J. also repeated his view at p 335. And in The Tasmanian Dam Case, at p 97, Gibbs J. adopted as accurate the paraphrase of par.(xxix) suggested by Stephen J. in Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen, at p 211, namely "... such of the public business of the national government as relates to other nations or other things or circumstances outside Australia".

9. In perceiving that the Constitution requires the exclusion of domestic matters from the ambit of the external affairs power, I have elsewhere pointed to the division of legislative power between the Commonwealth and the States and have observed that, if international concern over entirely domestic matters were sufficient to bring those matters within the external affairs power, par.(xxix) would have the potential to obliterate the division which s.51 was intended to effect. To construe par.(xxxix) in that way would be to disregard entirely its constitutional setting.

10. But if, as I think to be the case, it is necessary to have regard to the scheme of the Constitution in construing the external affairs power, the result is different with regard to circumstances external to Australia. For although the sovereignty of the Australian nation is divided internally between the Commonwealth and the States, there is no division with respect to matters which lie outside Australia. There the sovereignty of the nation is the sovereignty of the Commonwealth which may act as if it were a unitary state without regard to the "conceptual duality" within Australia to which Stephen J. referred to in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, at p 458. There is no corresponding capacity on the part of the States, either singly or together. Indeed, any limitation upon the power of the Commonwealth to legislate with respect to matters outside the country would leave a gap in the totality of legislative power which the Constitution bestows upon the Commonwealth and the States. An interpretation of the Constitution which denies the completeness of Australian legislative power is unacceptable in terms of constitutional theory and practice. Apart from express or implied constitutional prohibitions or limitations, it is not to be contemplated that there are laws which no Parliament has the power to pass: Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada (1912) AC 571, at pp 583-584; Colonial Sugar Refining Co. Ltd. v. Attorney-General for the Commonwealth (1912) 15 CLR 182, at pp 214-215; Smith v. Oldham (1912) 15 CLR 355, at pp 360-361, 365; Reg. v. Duncan; Ex parte Australian Iron and Steel Pty. Ltd. (1983) 158 CLR 535, at pp 590-591.

S969

11. The War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) as amended by the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (Cth) ("the Act") extends to serious crimes committed in the course of hostilities in a war or in the course of an occupation of territory arising out of a war. That appears from s.7. "War" is restricted by s.5 to a war in the period beginning on 1 September 1939 and ending on 8 May 1945 in so far as it occurred in Europe. Under s.7 war crimes also extend to serious crimes committed in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of war or with an occupation or on behalf of, or in the interests of, a power conducting a war or engaged in an occupation. The Act does, therefore, contemplate war crimes committed within Australia. Difficult questions could arise in relation to those provisions which deal with war crimes committed within Australia, particularly as war crimes are defined so as to include acts which are criminal acts under the laws of the States, but those questions do not arise in this case.

12. The war crimes alleged against the plaintiff, who is now an Australian citizen and a resident of South Australia, were said to have been committed in the Ukraine between 1 September 1942 and 31 May 1943. It was not argued that the invalidity of any provisions relating to the commission of war crimes within Australia would, by reason of inseverability or otherwise, affect the validity of the provisions relating to war crimes committed outside Australia if those provisions are otherwise valid. The question reserved for the consideration of the Court is whether s.9 of the Act is invalid in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff. That information relates entirely to events which took place in Europe almost fifty years ago.

13. Section 9 of the Act relevantly provides:

> "(1) A person who:
> (a) on or after 1 September 1939 and on or before 8 May 1945; and
> (b) whether as an individual or as a member of an organisation;
> committed a war crime is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act."

Section 11 provides that a person shall not be charged with an offence against the Act unless he is an Australian citizen or a resident of Australia or of an external Territory, although s.5 defines "person" as meaning a natural person whether or not the person is or has ever been an Australian citizen or a resident of Australia. A serious crime is, under s.7, a war crime if it was committed in the circumstances to which I have already referred. Section 6 provides:

> "(1) An act is a serious crime if it was done in a part of Australia and was, under the law then in force in that part, an offence, being:
> (a) murder;
> (b) manslaughter;
> (c) causing grievous bodily harm;
> (d) wounding;
> (e) rape;
> (f) indecent assault;
> (g) abduction, or procuring, for immoral purposes;

5970

(h) an offence (in this paragraph called the 'variant offence') that would be referred to in a preceding paragraph if that paragraph contained a reference to:
(i) a particular intention or state of mind on the offender's part; or
(ii) particular circumstances of aggravation;
necessary to constitute the variant offence;
(j) an offence whose elements are substantially the same as the elements of an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (h), inclusive; or
(k) an offence of:
(i) attempting or conspiring to commit;
(ii) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of; or
(iii) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the commission of;
an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (j), inclusive.

(2) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) whether or not an act was, under the law in force at a particular time in a part of Australia, an offence of a particular kind, regard shall be had to any defence under that law that could have been established in a proceeding for the offence.

(3) An act is a serious crime if:
(a) it was done at a particular time outside Australia; and
(b) the law in force at that time in some part of Australia was such that the act would, had it been done at that time in that part, be a serious crime by virtue of subsection (1).

(4) The deportation of a person to, or the internment of a person in, a death camp, a slave labour camp, or a place where persons are subjected to treatment similar to that undergone in a death camp or slave labour camp, is a serious crime.

(5) Each of the following is a serious crime:
(a) attempting or conspiring to deport or intern a person as mentioned in subsection (4);
(b) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the deportation or internment of a person as so mentioned;
(c) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the deportation or internment of a person as so mentioned.

(6) For the purposes of subsections (3), (4) and (5), the fact that the doing of an act was required or permitted by the law in force when and where the act was done shall be disregarded."

In addition to setting out in sub-s.(1) the circumstances in which a war crime may be committed, s.7 in sub-ss.(2) and (3) provides:

"(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a serious crime was not committed:
(a) in the course of hostilities in a war; or
(b) in the course of an occupation;
merely because the serious crime had with the hostilities or occupation a connection (whether in time, in time and place, or otherwise) that was only incidental or remote.

(3) A serious crime is a war crime if it was:
(a) committed:
(i) in the course of political, racial or religious persecution; or
(ii) with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such; and

5971

(b) committed in the territory of a country when the country was involved in a war or when territory of the country was subject to an occupation."

14. Under s.16 it is no defence for a person charged under the Act that he or she acted upon superior orders, although that may be taken into account in determining the proper sentence, but under s.17(2) it is a defence that the act alleged against a person charged with an offence was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war and was not under international law a crime against humanity. It was submitted that s.17 operates so as to confine a war crime under ss.6 and 7 to a crime which was not permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war or which was under international law a crime against humanity. However, it is clear that s.17 does not operate in this way. It provides a defence only. Indeed, under s.17(4) a defendant is not entitled to rely on a defence under s.17(2) unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence. If there is evidence, under s.17(5) the onus of displacing the defence lies upon the prosecution in accordance with the criminal standard of proof.

15. The provisions of the Act which I have set out show that there are not inconsiderable problems of interpretation arising from the way in which it was framed, but it is unnecessary for me to tackle those problems for it is quite apparent that, in its application to the plaintiff, the Act deals entirely with places, persons, matters or things which were physically external to Australia. For the reasons which I have given, I consider that the external affairs power extends the legislative reach of the Commonwealth Parliament to those places, persons, matters or things because of their externality and nothing further is required to bring them within the description of "external affairs".

16. Nor do I think that the externality of the circumstances with which the Act relevantly deals is affected by its retrospectivity. Those circumstances, as exemplified by the allegations against the plaintiff, remain physically external to Australia, notwithstanding that they occurred in the past. For that reason they fall within the ambit of the external affairs power. The submission that the retrospectivity of the Act otherwise places it beyond the competence of the Commonwealth Parliament must, in my view, fail.

17. The Act is truly retrospective - that is to say, retroactive - in its application to past events. Actions in the past which were, as a matter of domestic law, not criminal, are made criminal. The Act is, therefore, an ex post facto law. Ex post facto laws may be either civil or criminal, but the description is frequently used to refer only to criminal laws, perhaps because the creation of crimes ex post facto is, for good reason, generally considered a great deal more objectionable than retrospective civil legislation. Blackstone in his Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol.I, pp 45-46, after referring to Caligula's method of prescribing laws by writing them in very small characters and hanging them up on high pillars in order to ensnare the people, said:

"There is still a more unreasonable method than this, which is called making of laws ex post facto: when after an action (indifferent in itself) is committed, the legislator then for the first time declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it. Here it is impossible that the party could foresee that an action, innocent when it was done, should be afterwards converted to guilt by a subsequent law: he had therefore no cause to abstain from it; and all punishment for not abstaining must of consequence be cruel and unjust. All > laws should be therefore made to commence in futuro, and be notified before their commencement; which is implied in the term 'prescribed'."

5972

But Blackstone was not denying the capacity of Parliament to pass ex post facto laws, however undesirable they may be: see Commentaries, 16th ed. (1825), vol.I, p 90. The resistance of the law to retrospectivity in legislation is to be found in the rule that, save where the legislature makes its intention clear, a statute ought not be given a retrospective operation where to do so would be to attach new legal consequences to facts or events which occurred before its commencement: Fisher v. Hebburn Ltd. (1960) 105 CLR 188, per Fullagar J. at p 194; see also Maxwell v. Murphy (1957) 96 CLR 261, at p 267; Geraldton Building Co. Pty. Ltd. v. May (1977) 136 CLR 379; Rodway v. The Queen (1990) 169 CLR 515, at p 518. However, the injustice which might be inflicted by construing an enactment so as to give it a retrospective operation may vary according to its subject matter. Indeed, justice may lay almost wholly upon the side of giving remedial legislation a retrospective operation where that is possible: see George Hudson Ltd. v. Australian Timber Workers' Union (1923) 32 CLR 413, at p 434. With legislation of that character, if the ordinary rule be couched in terms of a presumption against retrospectivity, it must, at best, be a weak presumption: see Doro v. Victorian Railways Commissioners (1960) VR 84, at pp 85-86. With a criminal law, where the injustice of giving it an ex post facto operation will ordinarily be readily apparent, the presumption must be at its strongest.

18. However, the ex post facto creation of war crimes may be seen to be justifiable in a way that is not possible with other ex post facto criminal laws, particularly where the conduct proscribed would have been criminal conduct had it occurred within Australia. The wrongful nature of the conduct ought to have been apparent to those who engaged in it even if, because of the circumstances in which the conduct took place, there was no offence against domestic law. And, of course, if the conduct amounted to genocide or a crime against humanity, that comment would be the stronger. This justification for a different approach with respect to war crimes is reflected in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to which Australia became a signatory on 18 December 1972. Article 15(1) of that Covenant forbids the ex post facto creation of criminal offences, but Art.15(2) provides: "Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations." Because of the view which I take of the external affairs power, I have no need to enter upon the question whether before 1945 genocide or crimes against humanity constituted offences under customary international law; it is sufficient to observe that, even if they did not, the wrongful nature of the conduct would nevertheless have been plainly evident. War crimes of the kind created by the Act simply could not, in any civilized community, have been described as innocent or blameless conduct merely because of the absence of proscription by law.

19. In any event, the intention of the legislature that the Act should have a retrospective operation could not have been more clearly expressed. There is no room for the application of the rule or presumption against giving the legislation a retrospective construction.

20. There is ample authority for the proposition that the Commonwealth Parliament may in the exercise of its legislative powers create retrospective laws, including criminal laws with an ex post facto operation. I have earlier referred to the authorities which establish that the power of the Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth is, in constitutional terms, a sovereign legislative power with respect to the matters enumerated in s.51: see also Ibralebbe v. The Queen (1964) AC 900, at p 923. And sovereignty necessarily involves the power to legislate retrospectively. Whatever the objections which might be raised to ex post facto laws - and as the passage cited from Blackstone shows, they are considerable - there can be no doubt about the capacity of Parliament to pass them.

21. The power of the Parliament to create criminal offences is incidental to the power to legislate with respect to the specific matters enumerated in pars (i) to (xxxviii) of s.51. And s.51(xxxix) gives to the Parliament express power to legislate with respect to matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by the Constitution in Parliament. In R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425, at p 434, Griffith C.J. thought that, for a matter to be incidental to the execution of a power, it must relate to its present execution. An ex post facto law could not, in his view, be incidental to the execution of a power because it operated upon a past event and not with reference to its present execution. This view (which, with respect, is difficult to understand since past events may have a direct bearing upon a present exercise of legislative power as this case demonstrates) was rejected by the rest of the Court. They were of the view that it is incidental to the power of Parliament to make laws with respect to the matters confided to it, to express its condemnation of past actions falling within those matters by attaching criminal penalties to them. As Higgins J. said, at p 451:

> "We have not been referred to any words in the Constitution which point to any limitation of the plenary powers of the Federal Parliament so long as the Parliament keeps within the ambit of the subjects of legislation specifically assigned to it. The British Parliament, admittedly, has power to make its laws retroactive; and I know of no instance in which a Legislature created by the British Parliament has been held to have overstepped its powers by making legislation retroactive. There are plenty of passages that can be cited showing the inexpediency, and the injustice, in most cases, of legislating for the past, of interfering with vested rights, and of making acts unlawful which were lawful when done; but these passages do not raise any doubt as to the power of the Legislature to pass retroactive legislation, if it see fit. The maxim runs: Nova constitutio futuris formam imponere debet, non proeteritis. The word used is 'debet,' not 'potest.'"

22. In R. v. Kidman, legislation creating the indictable offence of conspiring to defraud the Commonwealth was held to be valid, notwithstanding that the legislation was given an ex post facto operation by its application to conspiracies committed before the legislation came into force. The correctness of the decision has never, so far as I am aware, been subsequently doubted: see R. v. Snow (1917) 23 CLR 256, at p 265; Ex parte Walsh and Johnson; In re Yates (1925) 37 CLR 36, at pp 81, 127; Millner v. Raith (1942) 66 CLR 1; Nelungaloo Pty. Ltd. v. The Commonwealth (1948) 75 CLR 495, at pp 503-504; Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth (1951) 83 CLR 1, at p 172; University of Wollongong v. Metwally (1984) 158 CLR 447, at pp 456, 461, 480, 484.

23. In the United States both Congress and the State legislatures are prohibited by the Constitution from passing any bill of attainder or ex post facto law: Art.I, ss.9 and 10. The case law in the United States has grown up around bills of attainder rather than ex post facto laws generally. This would seem to be due in part to the restrictive interpretation given to ex post facto laws within the meaning of the prohibition, whereby they are confined to criminal laws: Calder v. Bull (1798) 3 US 385, at p 390. Moreover, bills of attainder have been held to extend beyond anything which could be so described historically. They have been held to embrace not only what would be described, as a matter of history, as bills of pains and penalties but also as extending to any kind of punishment legislatively inflicted. A bill of attainder in England imposed the penalty of death, forfeiture of land and possessions and "corruption of blood" whereby the heirs of the person attainted were prevented from inheriting his property. A bill of pains and penalties inflicted lesser punishment, involving forfeiture of property and, on occasions, corporal punishment less than death. The wide interpretation of the bill of attainder clause in the United States led the Supreme Court to observe in United States v. Brown (1965) 381 US 437, at p 447:

5974

> "In 1810, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the Court in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 138, stated that '(a) bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.' This means, of course, that what were known at common law as bills of pains and penalties are outlawed by the Bill of Attainder Clause. The Court's pronouncement therefore served notice that the Bill of Attainder Clause was not to be given a narrow historical reading (which would exclude bills of pains and penalties), but was instead to be read in light of the evil the Framers had sought to bar: legislative punishment, of any form or severity, of specifically designated persons or groups."

24. Historically, bills (or, more correctly, acts) of attainder constituted a particular form of law, generally of an ex post facto character, whereby punishment was inflicted upon a designated person or group of persons adjudged by the legislature to have been guilty of crimes, usually of a capital nature, such as treason or murder. The particular objection to bills of attainder was not so much that they may have had an ex post facto operation, but that they substituted the judgment of the legislature for that of a court. In England, the practice evolved of giving the person with whom a bill dealt some sort of a hearing, but the result was still secured by legislation and not by judicial action: see Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth, at p 172. In the United States, where, as I have said, an expanded version of bills of attainder was adopted, it was this aspect which was seen as the vice, not only because it was oppressive, but also because it was thought (at least by 1965) to offend against the separation of powers doctrine. In United States v. Brown the Supreme Court said, at p 442:

> "While history thus provides some guidelines, the wide variation in form, purpose and effect of ante-Constitution bills of attainder indicates that the proper scope of the Bill of Attainder Clause, and its relevance to contemporary problems, must ultimately be sought by attempting to discern the reasons for its inclusion in the Constitution, and the evils it was designed to eliminate. The best available evidence, the writings of the architects of our constitutional system, indicates that the Bill of Attainder Clause was intended not as a narrow, technical (and therefore soon to be outmoded) prohibition, but rather as an implementation of the separation of powers, a general safeguard against legislative exercise of the judicial function, or more simply - trial by legislature."

25. The perception that the bill of attainder clause in the United States Constitution was intended to implement the separation of powers came somewhat late in the history of that clause. It is not without its difficulties, the chief of which is, as was pointed out by White J. in dissent in United States v. Brown, at p 473, in quoting from Dreyer v. Illinois (1902) 187 US 71, at p 84, that State legislatures, as well as Congress, are prohibited from passing bills of attainder and "(w)hether the legislative, executive and judicial powers of a State shall be kept altogether distinct and separate ... is for the determination of the State". Nevertheless, it is perfectly clear that it is only the prohibition against bills of attainder and not the prohibition against ex post facto laws generally which might be traced to the doctrine of the separation of powers. That is because it is not the ex post facto nature of bills of attainder which offends against the doctrine, but the substitution of the judgment of the legislature for that of the courts. That is not a necessary feature of an ex post facto law. Where an ex post facto law penalizes a past activity by means of a generally applicable rule rather than by specifying the persons to be subjected to the penalty, it is not a bill of attainder whatever other objections might be raised to its ex post facto operation. In that situation a court is still left to determine whether an individual is guilty of having engaged in the prohibited activity, albeit an activity which took place before the law created the offence, and the legislature has done no more than lay down a rule of general application which is part of its true function. Even a law which penalizes persons who possess specified characteristics may not be a bill of attainder, provided the characteristics are specified in sufficiently general terms. Legislation will amount to a bill of attainder only where it is apparent that the legislature intended the conviction of specific persons for conduct engaged in in the past. The law may do that by penalizing specific persons by name or by means of specific characteristics which, in the circumstances, identify particular persons. A court in applying such a law is in effect confined in its inquiry to the issue of whether or not an accused is one of the persons identified by the law. If he is, his guilt follows. The proper judicial inquiry as to whether an accused has been guilty of prohibited conduct has thus been usurped by the legislature. Alternatively, a bill of attainder may designate the persons it seeks to penalize by means of some characteristic (such as membership of an organization) that is independent of and not equivalent to the criminal activity which it is the purpose of the law to prohibit or prevent. In United States v. Brown, the Supreme Court struck down as amounting to a bill of attainder an Act which made it a crime for a member of the communist party to serve as an officer or (except in clerical or custodial positions) as an employee of a labour organization. At p 450, the Court said:

> "The statute does not set forth a generally applicable rule decreeing that any person who commits certain acts or possesses certain characteristics (acts and characteristics which, in Congress' view, make them likely to initiate political strikes) shall not hold union office, and leave to courts and juries the job of deciding what persons have committed the specified acts or possess the specified characteristics. Instead, it designates in no uncertain terms the persons who possess the feared characteristics and therefore cannot hold union office without incurring criminal liability - members of the Communist Party."

The Court went on to observe, at p 455:

> "The designation of Communists as those persons likely to cause political strikes is not the substitution of a semantically equivalent phrase ... In a number of decisions, this Court has pointed out the fallacy of the suggestion that membership in the Communist Party, or any other political organization, can be regarded as an alternative, but equivalent, expression for a list of undesirable characteristics."

26. The Commonwealth Constitution contains no provision which corresponds to the bill of attainder clause in the United States Constitution. Nor does it adopt in its entirety the United States theory of the separation of powers.

59.76

That is readily apparent from the fact that responsible government is a central feature of our constitutional scheme. But in Reg. v. Kirby; Ex parte Boilermakers' Society of Australia (1956) 94 CLR 254, this Court pointed out that the federal structure required the provision of a judicature with paramount powers to determine the demarcation of governmental functions between independent governments. That provision is to be found in Ch III of the Constitution, which establishes that no resort can be had to judicial power except in conformity with that Chapter. For that reason, it is beyond the competence of the Parliament to invest with any part of Commonwealth judicial power any body or person except a court created or invested with jurisdiction pursuant to Ch III. To that extent there is clearly a separation of the judicial power of the Commonwealth from its legislative and executive functions.

27. But even accepting for present purposes the expanded notion of a bill of attainder which has prevailed in the United States and accepting that a measure which would fall within that notion would offend against the separation of Commonwealth judicial power, it cannot be said that the War Crimes Act amounts to a bill of attainder. True it is that it operates ex post facto, but that does not, as I have endeavoured to explain, convert it into a bill of attainder nor does it import that quality of a bill of attainder which has been said to constitute an intrusion upon the exercise of judicial power, namely, the substitution of legislative judgment for the judgment of the courts.

28. Those activities which are said by the Act to constitute war crimes are defined in general terms without any attempt to designate any person or group of persons as having engaged in any of those activities. Nor does the Act pick out the persons it seeks to penalize by means of a characteristic which is independent of the prohibited criminal activity; it may have done so had it specified that any person who had been a member of a particular enemy organization was thereby to be held guilty of a war crime, but that is not the approach adopted. The Act confines the period during which, and the field of war in relation to which, those activities will have constituted war crimes, but that in no way usurps the judicial function of determining whether a particular person charged with an offence engaged in conduct which the Act describes as a war crime. The fact that the period specified by the Act occurred before the Act in its amended form came into operation is what gives it an ex post facto operation. But otherwise its provisions are in such a form as to be capable of operating prospectively and, were they to do so, the function of a court applying those provisions would be the same, namely, ascertaining whether a person alleged to have engaged in conduct which the Act proscribes had in fact done so. The Act does not, merely because it penalizes conduct which occurred before it came into operation, supplant the court in the exercise of its ordinary, traditional function. That function is, in the application of the criminal law, the ascertainment in accordance with the law of the guilt or innocence of a person charged with an offence under the law. In designating conduct - whether in the future or in the past - as criminal, a law does not intrude upon the judicial function. It is when the legislature itself, expressly or impliedly, determines the guilt or innocence of an individual that there is an interference with the process of the court. The Act requires no finding of guilt on the part of a person charged with an offence under its provisions, save where that person is found to have contravened the rules of conduct which it lays down. That finding requires the determination of a court after a trial. The fact that the Act lays down rules of conduct in relation to events which occurred before it came into effect does not invest it with the attributes of a bill of attainder, however widely such an instrument is defined.

29. Of course, the real question is not whether the Act amounts to a bill of attainder, but whether it exhibits that characteristic of a bill of attainder which is said to represent a legislative intrusion upon judicial power. In Liyanage v. The Queen (1967) 1 AC 259 there was no bill of attainder (although bills of attainder were referred to by analogy), but the Privy Council held that legislation passed by the Parliament of Ceylon constituted the usurpation of the judicial function in contravention of the separation of judicial power which is embodied in the Constitution of Ceylon. The legislation followed an abortive coup d'etat in January 1962, in respect of which a number of persons identified in a White Paper were charged with a variety of conspiracies. The accused were all (save for one) in custody at the time the two Acts constituting the legislation in question were passed. The Acts were attacked in argument in a manner which the Privy Council said, at p 290, fairly described their effect:

5977

> "The first Act was wholly bad in that it was a special direction to the judiciary as to the trial of particular prisoners who were identifiable (in view of the White Paper) and charged with particular offences on a particular occasion. The pith and substance of both Acts was a legislative plan ex post facto to secure the conviction and enhance the punishment of those particular individuals. It legalised their imprisonment while they were awaiting trial. It made admissible their statements inadmissibly obtained during that period. It altered the fundamental law of evidence so as to facilitate their conviction. And finally it altered ex post facto the punishment to be imposed on them."

The legislation was held to be invalid, not because of its ex post facto operation (although that was a necessary feature of it), but because, far from laying down any general rule of conduct, it was designed to secure the conviction of identifiable individuals. It was, therefore, a legislative attempt to exercise judicial power which, under the Constitution of Ceylon, was confided to the courts. Indeed, the Privy Council said of the Acts, at p 291, that one might fairly apply the words of Chase J. in Calder v. Bull that they were "legislative judgments; and an exercise of judicial power". Earlier, at p 289, the observation was made that:

> "It goes without saying that the legislature may legislate, for the generality of its subjects, by the creation of crimes and penalties or by enacting rules relating to evidence. But the Acts of 1962 had no such general intention. They were clearly aimed at particular known individuals who had been named in a White Paper and were in prison awaiting their fate. The fact that the learned judges declined to convict some of the prisoners is not to the point. That the alterations in the law were not intended for the generality of the citizens or designed as any improvement of the general law is shown by the fact that the effect of those alterations was to be limited to the participants in the January coup and that, after these had been dealt with by the judges, the law should revert to its normal state."

30. The legislation in this case was, by way of contrast, enacted by the legislature "for the generality of its subjects". It is not aimed at "particular known individuals" but at any Australian citizen or resident who, within the specified period, engaged in conduct amounting to the commission of a war crime as defined by the Act. It does not, therefore, represent a legislative usurpation of judicial power.

31. For these reasons, I would answer the question asked in the negative.

JUDGE5

TOOHEY J. The relevant facts and statutory provisions appear in the judgments of other members of the Court. I shall avoid undue repetition.

5978

2. The plaintiff, who is an Australian citizen and a resident of South Australia, is charged with having committed "war crimes" contrary to s.9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth). All references in this judgment to "the Act" are to the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) as amended by the War Crimes Amendment Act 1988 (Cth), unless otherwise stated.

3. It is unnecessary to set out the information in detail. It contains thirteen paragraphs. Some allege that the plaintiff murdered one or more persons in the Ukraine, the persons being identified by name or description. Others allege that the plaintiff was knowingly concerned in or party to the murder of about 850 Jews from the village of Serniki in the Ukraine. All offences are said to have taken place between 1942 and 1943, during and in the course of the German occupation of the Ukraine in World War II. They are said to have been committed "in pursuing a policy of Germany associated with the conduct of the said war and occupation or on behalf of or in the interests of that power being a policy of persecution of the Jewish people of Europe on political, racial or religious grounds" or "with intent to destroy the Jewish people" in the places concerned and, in five cases, in pursuing a policy of annihilating those suspected to be partisans or communists.

4. The question reserved for the consideration of the Court is whether s.9 of the Act is invalid in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff. Nevertheless, the arguments went to the validity of the Act generally. The issues canvassed may be summed up in this way:

1. Is the Act valid as an exercise of the power of the Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to external affairs (s.51(xxix) of the Constitution)?
2. Is the Act valid as an exercise of the power of the Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the naval and military defence of the Commonwealth (s.51(vi) of the Constitution)?
3. If the Act is otherwise valid, does it involve an improper use of the judicial power of the Commonwealth? If it does, what consequences follow for the charges against the plaintiff?

But, in the end, the question to be answered by the Court is the question reserved for its consideration.

External affairs - externality

5. The Commonwealth argued that the external affairs power supports the validity of the Act by reference to what might be termed geographical externality and, in the alternative, on the basis that the Act implements an obligation or a concern to be found in international law or a resolution of an international body or that it is an exercise of a universal jurisdiction in international law. (The Director of Public Prosecutions supported the Commonwealth in its arguments. Nevertheless, it is convenient to speak only of "the Commonwealth" except where some additional argument was advanced by the Director.)

6. I shall deal first with the argument based on geographical externality. It is true that there are passages in earlier judgments of members of the Court suggesting that a law of the Commonwealth may operate with respect to persons or events by reason only of their externality. In New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337 Barwick C.J., at p 360, spoke of "any affair which in its nature is external to the continent of Australia and the island of Tasmania subject always to the Constitution as a whole". Mason J., at p 471, said that the power conferred by s.51(xxix) "extends to matters or things geographically situated outside Australia". Jacobs J., at p 497, spoke of the power "to make laws with respect to places outside, or matters or things done outside the boundaries of the Commonwealth". Murphy J. did not speak in these terms. But in the light of what his Honour said in Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, at p 162, and in The Commonwealth v. Tasmania. The Tasmanian Dam Case (1983) 158 CLR 1, at pp 171-172, he must be taken to have endorsed this general view of s.51(xxix).

7. However, these statements must be taken in context and, when so taken, they do not establish a proposition that there need be no connection whatsoever between Australia and the subject matter of a law which the external affairs power is said to support. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case the statements were made in answer to an argument that the external affairs power was limited to a power to make laws with respect to Australia's relationships with foreign countries: see, for instance, Mason J., at pp 470-471. The legislation under attack in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case did not directly involve another country but it went to the sovereignty of the Commonwealth over the territorial sea, that is, to the very boundaries of Australia. In Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168 Mason J., at p 223, described "external affairs" as covering "any matters or concerns external to Australia". But the context in which the statement was made cannot be ignored; it was the implementation of a treaty obligation.

8. Certainly the word "external" means situated outside and of itself requires no connection with that which it is outside. But in pl.(xxix) "External" is an adjective qualifying "affairs" and it is necessary to have regard to the composite expression. Dictionaries commonly define "affair" by reference to "concern". An external affair is a matter which is external in the sense that it lies outside Australia but it is a matter which is of concern to Australia. This does not mean that it must be a matter touching Australia's relations with another country though that will ordinarily be the case. But it does mean that it is a matter in which Australia has an interest. Whether a matter so qualifies is, in this respect, for the Parliament to determine. But the power assumes the existence of a national interest in some person, thing or matter that enables one to say that the subject of legislation concerns Australia. I am content to accept the explanation given by Stephen J. in Koowarta, at p 211, where his Honour says:

> "The word 'External' must in this constitutional context qualify 'affairs' so as to restrict its meaning to such of the public business of the national government as relates to other nations or other things or circumstances outside Australia. It is legislation for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to such a subject-matter that the words of par.(xxix) appear to envisage."

9. Quick and Garran, The Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, (1901), pp 631-632, give pl.(xxix) a restricted operation. But they do so in the context of the relationship between Australia and the Imperial Parliament at the time of federation. It was through the Imperial Parliament that Australia's external affairs were conducted. With the emergence of Australia as a nation, that restrictive view could no longer stand. However, the issue is one of constitutionality, that is, the power of the Parliament to legislate with respect to a particular matter. A matter does not qualify as an external affair simply because it exists outside Australia. It must be a matter which the Parliament recognises as touching or concerning Australia in some way. Indeed it might be thought more than passing strange that the Constitution solemnly conferred power on the Parliament to legislate with respect to a matter in which it had no interest.
Externality - War Crimes Act

10. The Commonwealth urged that the Act deals with matters geographically external to Australia, hence that it is justified by reference to the external affairs power. The Solicitor-General for the Commonwealth put the matter this way:

> "The Commonwealth is not relying upon the external affairs power to intrude in any way into a field which would otherwise be within State power. The Act is confined to dealing with something done, or the consequence of something done, overseas where the national Parliament thinks that that legislation is desirable."

11. But the Act is not confined in the way suggested by the Solicitor-General. The Commonwealth argued that s.6(1), which refers to conduct "done in a part of Australia", is definitional only; that it provides "the foundation for the structure of a municipal offence", going no further than is warranted by international law; that s.6(3), which picks up the "serious crimes" listed in s.6(1) where the conduct occurred outside Australia, effectively comprises the range of acts which can constitute a war crime; and that the expression "serious crime" in s.6(1) has no operation other than as a step towards an understanding of what is meant by a "war crime" for the purposes of ss.7 and 9. And, it was said, s.7(1) must be read in light of the definition of "war" in s.5. But none of this assists the Commonwealth's broad argument on externality. It is true that the definition in s.5 confines "war" to a "war ... (whether or not involving Australia or a country allied or associated with Australia) in so far as it occurred in Europe in the period beginning on 1 September 1939 and ending on 8 May 1945" (emphasis added). But a serious crime, which is a "war crime" if committed, inter alia, in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of such a war or with an occupation (s.7(1)(c)) or on behalf of, or in the interests of, a power conducting such a war or engaged in an occupation (s.7(1)(d)), may be committed anywhere in the world including Australia. To say that is not to overlook s.7(2) which provides that a serious crime was not committed in the course of hostilities in a war (see s.7(1)(a)) or in the course of an occupation (see s.7(1)(b)) merely because the connection between the serious crime on the one hand and the hostilities or occupation on the other was only incidental or remote. The connection may be very real indeed, wherever the serious crime was committed.

12. A person may not be charged with an offence against the Act unless he or she is an Australian citizen or a resident of Australia or of an external Territory: s.11 of the Act. But that is a status required at the date of charging. The person charged need not have been an Australian citizen or resident at the time of the alleged offence. Indeed, it is clear that the Act is aimed at situations in which neither an Australian offender nor victim is likely to have been involved: see, for instance, the preamble. Furthermore, the definition of "war" in s.5 does not require Australia's involvement. Unquestionably, the Act encompasses conduct which may have occurred within or without Australia. That is borne out not only by the sections to which I have already referred, but in addition by s.18. That section deals with alternative verdicts and speaks of conduct done in Australia and elsewhere.

13. Nevertheless, there is no difficulty in concluding that, in the context of a war in which Australia was directly involved, in which many Australian service personnel and civilians were killed, wounded, imprisoned or ill-treated and which had such significant social, economic and political consequences for this country, an Act purporting to render those who are Australian citizens or residents liable for conduct associated with that war legislates with respect to a matter which is of concern to Australia and to which the public business of the national government relates. It is true, of course, that the definition of "war" in s.5 does not require Australia's involvement. But it would be to turn a blind eye to history to see no connection between the dates and area identified in s.5 and World War II, or to conclude that "war" as defined could relate to a conflict in which Australia had no interest at the time, even if not directly involved. For these reasons the law is one with respect to "External affairs" within s.51(xxix). The fact that the Act creates a liability for past conduct does not of itself remove the legislation from the capacity to deal with an external affair though that matter has other implications to which it will be necessary to refer later in these reasons. Whether the Act can be said to be a law with respect to external affairs, in so far as it encompasses conduct which occurred within Australia, is another matter, with which it is unnecessary to deal. If, in that respect, the Act is beyond power, the relevant provisions are severable. Their severance would not affect the operation of the balance of the Act.

External affairs - international law

14. In its terms, s.9 does not involve an inquiry into international law and, on the view I have taken that the Act is a law with respect to external affairs, it might be thought unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of international law. However, acknowledging the breadth of the argument before the Court, I propose to consider some aspects of that law in arriving at a conclusion as to the validity of the Act. The general scope of the Act has been explained. Reference to international law in terms appears only in s.17(2) which, subject to the exclusion in s.16 of the defence of superior orders, makes it a defence to a charge under the Act, if the doing of the act:

> "(a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
> (b) was not under international law a crime against humanity".

15. The Commonwealth supported the validity of the Act as an exercise of the external affairs power, not only by reference to geographical externality, but also by contending that the Act gives effect to an obligation or concern in international law or that it implements a resolution of an international body. The Commonwealth further argued that the Act facilitates the exercise of a right existing in international law, namely, the universal jurisdiction.

External affairs - international obligation

16. The obligation upon which the Commonwealth relied to support s.9 as a valid exercise of the external affairs power was expressed as an obligation "to search out, bring to trial and, if found guilty, to punish war criminals". In satisfying that obligation, it was said, Australia may itself prosecute and punish or it may extradite the offender to the country where the offence is alleged to have been committed. The plaintiff's response was that no such obligation exists in international law. He said further that, if there is any comparable obligation, it does not go beyond a duty to extradite the offender to the place of the offence.

17. To establish the existence of the wider obligation for which the Commonwealth contended, it is necessary to point to general practice by States and opinio juris. In the Commonwealth's submission, each limb has a bearing on the other in the sense that if State practice is widespread it is less crucial to demonstrate opinio juris. And, it was contended, the obverse is true.

18. I have read what Brennan J. has written in regard to the existence of an international obligation to prosecute and punish as opposed to extraditing. I agree with his Honour's analysis and with his conclusion: "there is no evidence of widespread State practice which suggests that States are under a legal obligation to seek out Axis war criminals and to bring them to trial. There is no opinio juris supportive of such a rule." I have nothing to add to Brennan J.'s analysis and conclusion in this regard. It follows that the Act cannot be supported as an exercise of the external affairs power on the groun that it gives effect to an international obligation.

5982

External affairs - international concern

19. It is convenient to approach this aspect of the case against the background of what was said by Stephen J. in Koowarta, at p 217:

> "A subject-matter of international concern necessarily possesses the capacity to affect a country's relations with other nations and this quality is itself enough to make a subject-matter a part of a nation's 'external affairs'."

It was appropriate for Stephen J., in the context of his judgment, to speak of "a country's relations with other nations". But I do not understand his Honour to exclude any other consideration as constituting a subject matter of international concern. In the light of what he said in Koowarta, at p 211 (the passage quoted earlier in these reasons), his Honour would accept a matter touching the public business of Australia in relation to an event outside Australia as capable of giving rise to a concern that would answer the description - an external affair. See also Mason J. in Koowarta, at p 234.

20. Much of the learning that is relevant to the question whether there is an international obligation on countries to prosecute and punish war criminals whose offences were committed elsewhere is naturally relevant to the question whether it is a matter of international concern to do so. Again, I agree with Brennan J.'s conclusion: "There is insufficient material to show that the apprehension and trial of such (i.e. World War II) war criminals before courts of countries other than those in which the crimes were committed were ever matters of international concern." But this aspect of the case tends to be subsumed in what was referred to in argument as the universal jurisdiction. This jurisdiction, it was said by the Commonwealth, supported the Act as a law with respect to external affairs.

External affairs - universal jurisdiction

21. The Commonwealth contended that, in the event that the Court found no relevant international obligation or concern to exist, the Act is nevertheless a valid exercise of the external affairs power because Australia has jurisdiction in international law to prosecute war crimes and crimes against humanity which occurred outside Australia against non-nationals. The focus of this analysis shifts from inquiry into a substantive obligation or concern, requiring or justifying action on the part of the Australian Government, to the concept of crimes existing in international law and principles of jurisdiction which provide Australia with authority to prosecute those crimes.

22. The term "jurisdiction" has different meanings in international and municipal law. In international law it is used in various ways but it may be taken to refer to "a state's general legal competence and is an aspect of state sovereignty": Triggs, "Australia's War Crimes Trials: A Moral Necessity or Legal Minefield?", (1987) 16 Melbourne University Law Review 382 (hereafter "Triggs"), at p 387. Relevantly, it "refers to a state's legitimate assertion of authority to affect legal interests": Randall, "Universal Jurisdiction Under International Law", (1988) 66 Texas Law Review 785 (hereafter "Randall"), at p 786. The term has legislative, adjudicatory and enforcement dimensions: Randall, at p 786; Triggs, at p 387; Wagner, "U.S. Prosecution of Past and Future War Criminals and Criminals Against Humanity: Proposals for Reform Based on the Canadian and Australian Experience", (1989) 29 Virginia Journal of International Law 887 (hereafter "Wagner"), at p 899. We are here concerned with Australia's authority to make criminal laws applicable to certain persons, events or things with the aim of dealing with an international law crime. We are concerned, therefore, not only with Australia's legislative power in constitutional law, but also with Australia's enforcement and adjudicatory authority in international law because the Commonwealth relies on that authority to support its legislative power.

23. The subjects of international law are primarily, though not exclusively, states: Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, 4th ed. (1990) (hereafter "Brownlie"), Ch III and see Ch XXIV. Individuals are recognized by international law in so far as they are protected by, or, more importantly here, are subject to, international law. There is no exhaustive list of bases upon which a state may exert authority over an individual in international law nor is there precise agreement between commentators as to categorisation. But a common and convenient analysis is that five principles emerge by which the legitimacy of an asserted jurisdiction in criminal matters may be assessed: Kobrick, "The Ex Post Facto Prohibition and the Exercise of Universal Jurisdiction over International Crimes", (1987) 87 Columbia Law Review 1515 (hereafter "Kobrick"), at p 1519; Randall, at pp 787-788; Wagner, at pp 899-900. Cf. Brownlie, at pp 300-307; Triggs, at pp 387-389. They are: 1. the territoriality principle, which applies when an offence occurs within the territory of the prosecuting state; 2. the nationality principle, which applies when the offender is a national of the prosecuting state; 3. the protective principle, which is excited where an extraterritorial act threatens the integrity of the prosecuting state; 4. the passive personality principle, which applies where the victim of the offence is a national of the prosecuting state; and 5. the universality principle.

24. The last of these principles permits jurisdiction to be exercised over a limited category of offences on the basis that the offender is in the custody of the prosecuting state. The jurisdiction is based on the notion that certain acts are so universally condemned that, regardless of the situs of the offence and the nationality of the offender or the victim, each state has jurisdiction to deal with perpetrators of those acts. Since the Act focuses primarily (and, in practice, possibly entirely) on acts committed by non-nationals against non-nationals outside Australia, its likely basis for jurisdiction over war criminals from World War II is the principle of universal jurisdiction: see Wagner, at p 901. There appears to be no consensus that the "nationality of offender" basis for jurisdiction will include the situation where an offender later becomes a national. Cf. Triggs, at p 393, where it is suggested that "territorial jurisdiction over Australian citizens and residents" may be applicable.

25. Before examining material which is relevant in deciding whether war crimes and crimes against humanity in international law are subject to universal jurisdiction, it is useful to look at the doctrine itself because views differ as to its nature. The principle of universality is, at times, used to refer to the authority of states to exercise jurisdiction over certain conduct, regardless of whether it constitutes a crime under customary international law. On this view of the principle it is the universality of the condemnation of, for example, the common crime of murder which allows every state to exert authority over an offender in the absence of other jurisdictional links: Brownlie, at pp 304-305; Triggs, at p 389. In other words, a state may assume jurisdiction over an alleged murder offence where it would otherwise fall within the jurisdiction of another state under its own municipal law. No question of an international law offence arises.

26. However, the principle is most often formulated so that it applies only to crimes which are already constituted as such under international law. In this respect, the principle rests on the existence of an offence in international law; the municipal law under which an individual is prosecuted must be in conformity with that international law. On this view, authority to prosecute the relevant conduct extends to every state under its own laws, even in the absence of one or more of the other jurisdictional links such as territoriality or nationality. But it is the existence of the crime in international law, and not simply the universality of condemnation in states' own municipal laws (though this may be evidence supporting the existence of the crime), which justifies the exception to the requirements of the other jurisdictional bases: Randall, at pp 795-798; American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Third: The Foreign Relations Law of the United States (hereafter "Restatement"), s404; Williams and Castel, Canadian Criminal Law: International and Transnational Aspects, (1981) (hereafter "Williams and Castel"), at p 137. In the context of war crimes and crimes against humanity, it is this formulation of the universality principle, relying as it does on the existence of an offence in international law, which is relevant: Brownlie, p 305; Williams and Castel, Ch 5. And it is this formulation on which the Commonwealth relies.

5984

27. The Commonwealth's use of the concept of a "right" existing in international law by reason of the universality principle is misleading, especially if it is (as it was in argument) associated with a right vested in Australia by treaties and other international agreements. We are concerned here with authority to proceed legally; in that sense Australia may have a right but it is not in the nature of a substantive right created by treaty or, by analogy, contract. The Commonwealth's concern was to emphasise the potency of the principle for the purposes of relying on it for constitutional validity. Thus a distinction was drawn between a "special and limited right" and mere permission. Again terminology may be misleading because universality of jurisdiction is in fact a permissive doctrine. But the proposition that universal jurisdiction is positively conferred by international law and is not merely the absence of prohibition is well founded. Specifically conferred authority to exercise that jurisdiction is a sufficient foundation on which to base a law of the Parliament with respect to external affairs because the universality of the condemnation necessarily touches and concerns Australia. If jurisdiction conferred by principles of international law is a component of sovereignty, then, in the absence of constitutional prohibition or conflict between the scope of federal and State powers, that jurisdiction is a necessary aspect of the Commonwealth's capacity to function effectively in the international community. Therefore the exercise of that jurisdiction where it exists - or rather the perceived commission of an international crime subject to that jurisdiction - is, or may give rise to, an external affair for the purposes of the legislative power of the Commonwealth. That Australia has a choice whether or not to exercise the jurisdiction does not alter that characterisation as an external affair.

Universal jurisdiction: war crimes and crimes against humanity

28. Whether the rationale for the universality principle lies in the proposition that those committing certain offences lose their national character and are therefore subject to any state's jurisdiction, or whether it lies in the fundamental nature of the crime - its particular gravity and heinousness (see Randall, at pp 792-795; In re List (Hostages Trial) (1948) 15 Annual Digest 632, at p 636; Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann (1962) 36 ILR 5, 277 (Supreme Court), at pp 282-283; (1961) 36 ILR 18 (District Court), at p 50), there appears to be general agreement that war crimes and crimes against humanity are now within the category subject to universal jurisdiction: see Brownlie, at pp 305, 562; Kobrick, at pp 1522-1523, 1529; Randall, at p 800; Wagner, at p 905 (with respect to war crimes).

29. In numerous cases of prosecution of war criminals after World War II, for both violations of the international laws of war and crimes against humanity, reliance was placed, inter alia, on the universality principle. For example, in In re Eisentrager (Shanghai, 1947) 14 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 8 (hereafter "L Rep Trials War Crims"), the United States Military Commission rejected the argument of the defendants that, because they were

5985

German citizens residing in China, they were subject only to Chinese law and jurisdiction. The Commission said, at p 15:

> "A war crime ... is not a crime against the law or criminal code of any individual nation, but a crime against the ius gentium. The laws and usages of war are of universal application, and do not depend for their existence upon national laws and frontiers. Arguments to the effect that only a sovereign of the locus criminis has jurisdiction and that only the lex loci can be applied, are therefore without any foundation."

See also The Hadamar Trial (In re Klein) (Wiesbaden, 1945) 1 L Rep Trials War Crims 46; In re Tesch (Zyklon B Case) (1946) 13 Annual Digest 250; In re List; Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann; Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky (1985) 776 F 2d 571, at p 582.

30. In In re List the United States Military Tribunal ("USMT") said, at p 636:

> " An international crime is such an act universally recognized as criminal, which is considered a grave matter of international concern and for some valid reason cannot be left within the exclusive jurisdiction of the state that would have control over it under ordinary circumstances."

31. And the District Court of Jerusalem, in Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann, based its jurisdiction "on a dual foundation: the universal character of the crimes in question and their specific character as intended to exterminate the Jewish people": at p 26. The Court further explained, at p 50:

> "The State of Israel's 'right to punish' the accused derives, in our view, from two cumulative sources: a universal source (pertaining to the whole of mankind), which vests the right to prosecute and punish crimes of this order in every State within the family of nations; and a specific or national source, which gives the victim nation the right to try any who assault its existence."

Both the District Court and Supreme Court judgments described the precedent of universal jurisdiction over piracy, drew an analogy between piratical acts and Nazi atrocities, and found support for the universality principle in the earlier war crimes cases: see at p 26 and pp 290-295.

32. However, to say that war crimes and crimes against humanity were, sometime after World War II, subject to universal jurisdiction does not answer the question whether the conduct of which the plaintiff is accused was a war crime or a crime against humanity before the end of the War nor whether, if they existed, those crimes could then be prosecuted by any state.

33. It may be said that, if a crime is found to have existed at some point in the past but was not the subject of universal jurisdiction, the subsequent expansion of jurisdiction is a procedural matter only and that a state with no other jurisdictional link can prosecute legitimately after the status of universal jurisdiction has been achieved. A better approach in this instance, however, is to examine the relationship between the concepts of "international crime" and "universal jurisdiction". The question whether a crime is constituted as such in international law is, conceptually, distinct from the question whether that crime is the subject of universal jurisdiction: Kobrick, at pp 1522, 1528. A crime created by treaty will not be the subject of universal jurisdiction merely by reason of its conventional existence: see Restatement, s404. It is less clear, however, that crimes having their source in custom can be said not to be the subject of universal jurisdiction unless limitations on the right to prosecute are contained in the definition of the crime itself.

34. Certainly, the two questions - whether a crime exists and the scope of jurisdiction to prosecute - are inextricably linked. An international crime is constituted, precisely, where conduct is identified which offends all humanity, not only those in a particular locality; the nature of the conduct creates the need for international accountability. Where conduct, because of its magnitude, affects the moral interests of humanity and thus assumes the status of a crime in international law, the principle of universality must, almost inevitably, prevail: see Zoller, "Territorial Effect of the Norm on Responsibility" in Ginsburgs and Kudriavtsev (eds), The Nuremberg Trial and International Law, (1990), p 106. This is particularly true of crimes against humanity since they comprise, by definition, conduct abhorrent to all the world.

35. Therefore, while the question whether war crimes and crimes against humanity were subject to universal jurisdiction during World War II remains theoretically distinct, the question whether the crimes existed as such at that time is basic. If such conduct amounted, then, to customary international crimes, their very nature leads to the conclusion that they were the subject of universal jurisdiction.

36. It is convenient to look, first, at the concepts of "war crime" and "crime against humanity" to determine whether they existed in international law between 1942 and 1943 (the period in respect of which the plaintiff is charged) and, if so, to examine the Act in some detail to determine whether its provisions accurately reflect those concepts and are an effective exercise of universal jurisdiction.

International crimes - war crimes and crimes against humanity

37. The term "war crime" in s.9 of the Act looks to two distinct, though overlapping, concepts in international law: "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity". War crimes in international law are contraventions of the laws and customs of war recorded in such documents as the Hague Conventions of 1907 and in military manuals. "Crimes against humanity" in international law is a generic term which refers to crimes of persecution, that is, persecution on political, racial or religious grounds, and to crimes of extermination. It is important to note that the difference between war crimes and crimes against humanity lies in the context in which they are committed. Traditionally, the laws and customs of war governed only conduct between belligerents or between a belligerent and the inhabitants of an occupied country. This is a reflection of the fundamental doctrines of sovereignty and non-intervention between states. Crimes against humanity, on the other hand, are not so confined. They may be carried out by a national against another national of the same country, and in peacetime. Conduct may therefore constitute both a war crime and a crime against humanity.

38. The Commonwealth submitted that s.7 of the Act embraces both kinds of crime at international law. The submission continued in this way. War crimes, including crimes against humanity which also amount to a war crime, are reflected in s.7(1) and (2). And if the terms of sub-s.(3) are satisfied, the conduct may be prosecuted under that sub-section also. Those crimes against humanity which would not also have amounted to a war crime are particularly reflected in s.7(3).

War crimes

39. There is no doubt that war crimes were crimes in international law during World War II. The fourth Hague Convention of 1907, the international Convention concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land ("the Hague Convention"), was ratified by Germany and Russia as well as the major Allied powers. The first Article of the Convention required the contracting states to issue instructions to their land forces in conformity with the Regulations respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land annexed to the Convention ("the Hague Rules"). See Manual of Military Law, 7th ed. (1929) (Great Britain); Manual of Military Law 1941, Australian ed. (hereafter "Australian Military Manual"); the "Kriegsbrauch in Landkriege", instructions issued to the German armed forces following the Hague Conventions.

5987

40. The matters dealt with by the Hague Rules included: the status of belligerents, the humane treatment of prisoners of war, and Arts 42-56 dealt with rules of conduct of a hostile state in occupied territory. Article 46 provided that, where a territory is occupied, "(f)amily honour and rights, individual life, and private property, as well as religious convictions and worship, must be respected." Article 50 read:

> " No collective penalty, pecuniary or otherwise, shall be inflicted upon the population on account of the acts of individuals for which it cannot be regarded as collectively responsible."

The Hague Convention and its annexed Rules provided an undisputed reference in peace negotiations between Germany and the Allies after World War I.

41. With respect to war crimes, the International Military Tribunal ("IMT") exercised jurisdiction over major war criminals after World War II on the basis of Art.6(b) of its Charter ("the Nuremberg Charter"). That Article defines war crimes as:

> "violations of the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to, murder, ill-treatment or deportation to slave labour or for any other purpose of civilian population of or in occupied territory, murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war or persons on the seas, killing of hostages, plunder of public or private property, wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity." (emphasis added)

Article 6(b) does not extend beyond the treatment of civilian populations in occupied territory: see In re Altstotter (The Justice Trial) (1947) 14 Annual Digest 278, at p 282. The IMT claimed that the law contained in Art.6(b) represented existing international law:

> "With respect to War Crimes, ... the crimes defined by Article 6, Section (b), of the Charter were already recognized as War Crimes under international law. They were covered by Articles 46, 50, 52, and 56 of the Hague Convention of 1907, and Articles 2, 3, 4, 46, and 51 of the Geneva Convention of 1929": judgment of the International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg), reproduced in (1947) 41 American Journal of International Law 172, at p 248.

42. It was argued before the IMT that this law did not apply generally because Art.2 of the Hague Convention expressly stated that its provisions bind only contracting parties and do not apply if all parties to an international conflict are not parties to the Convention. Several countries involved in World War II were not parties to the Hague Convention. However, in its judgment the IMT said, at pp 248-249:

> "The rules of land warfare expressed in the Convention undoubtedly represented an advance over existing international law at the time of their adoption. ... but by 1939 these rules laid down in the Convention were recognized by all civilized nations, and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war which are referred to in Article 6(b) of the Charter."

The United Nations General Assembly subsequently adopted, in December 1946, by a unanimous vote, Resolution 95(I) which affirmed the principles of international law "recognized by" the Nuremberg Charter and the IMT's judgment.

5988

43. So, by 1939 the Hague Convention had been in existence for 32 years. By 1941, 41 states had signed the Convention; 25 had deposited ratifications, including Germany (with the reservation of Art.44 of the Rules) though not Australia: Australian Military Manual, p 340. The Convention provided a reference after the major world conflict which occurred during that time and its provisions have been widely reflected and disseminated in various states' military manuals. In light of the precision of these rules and the length of time they had been in existence, together with states' reliance on them, there is sufficient evidence that a contravention of these conventional laws of war amounted to an offence in customary international law at the commencement of World War II.

44. The relevant questions to be asked with respect to a war crime in this narrow sense, then, concern the scope of that crime and whether the Act, on its proper construction, properly implements its prosecution. Those questions will be considered later.

Crimes against humanity

45. As already noted, "crime against humanity" is a generic term in international law encompassing different kinds of maltreatment of civilian populations, including those of the same nationality as the perpetrator. The Commonwealth submitted that there are, in international law, three classes of crimes against humanity: crimes of persecution, which are reflected in s.7(3)(a)(i); crimes of extermination, reflected in s.7(3)(a)(ii); and other serious crimes against members of any civilian population. The Commonwealth said that it was "probably" the case that crimes of persecution and other serious crimes against civilian populations must be committed in the execution of or in connection with war or occupation to be a crime at international law. In the case of crimes of extermination, on the other hand, it was said that no such connection is - and presumably the Commonwealth meant, also, was - required. Although the submission referred to conduct in execution of or in connection with "war or occupation", the thrust of the argument seemed to be in conformity with the limitation imposed on crimes against humanity by Art.6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter, to be discussed later. That is to say, crimes against humanity, apart from crimes of extermination, must have been committed in execution of or in connection with war crimes or the crime of waging aggressive war.

46. There is little doubt that crimes against humanity, in each of these classes, now exist in international law either as treaty law or, probably, as a matter of customary international law: cf. Meron, "The Geneva Conventions as Customary Law", (1987) 81 American Journal of International Law 348. But the question is whether crimes against humanity were crimes in international law before 1945.

47. There was no international agreement creating a crime against humanity. If the crime existed, it was a matter of customary law. A customary law comprises two elements: (i) general practice by states; and (ii) opinio juris, in other words, expressed opinion that such a crime exists. Material sources produced before 1945 are evidence of both of these elements; those produced after 1945 are evidence of opinio juris only, as they are statements of opinion as to the state of international law in the past. A survey of the material is useful.

48. Although the Hague Convention and the Hague Rules did not themselves deal with the conduct of belligerents towards their own citizens, there is some suggestion in the Convention that its provisions (and therefore those of military manuals produced in consequence) were not intended to cover the field of legal protection accorded to civilian populations. The preamble to the Convention includes the so-called Martens clause:

> " Until a more complete code of the laws of war can be drawn up, the High Contracting Parties deem it expedient to declare that, in cases not covered by the rules adopted by them, the inhabitants and the belligerents remain under the protection and governance of the principles of the law of nations, derived from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and from the dictates of the public conscience." (emphasis added)

As can be seen, there is an acceptance that binding humanitarian norms existed apart from the rules dealt with by the Convention itself.

49. After World War I the Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and on Enforcement of Penalties presented a report to the Preliminary Peace Conference at Versailles in March 1919 (reproduced in (1920) 14 American Journal of International Law 95). The Commission made findings as to the progress of the War and made recommendations for prosecutions and for the establishment of an international tribunal. Several times in its report the Commission used the term "laws of humanity" or "dictates of humanity" or similar phrases. For example, one conclusion drawn by the Commission, at p 117, was:

> " All persons belonging to enemy countries ... who have been guilty of offences against the laws and customs of war or the laws of humanity, are liable to criminal prosecution."

In relation to the tribunal to be set up to try the crimes the Commission said, at p 118:

> " Two classes of culpable acts present themselves:
> (a) Acts which provoked the world war and accompanied its inception.
> (b) Violations of the laws and customs of war and the laws of humanity."

50. In In re Altstotter, as reported in 2 L Rep Trials War Crims 1, the USMT said, at p 46:

> "Since the World War of 1914-1918, there has developed in many quarters evidence of ... an international interest and concern in relation to what was previously regarded as belonging exclusively to the domestic affairs of the individual State; and with that interest there has been ... an increasing readiness to seek and find a connection between domestic abuses and the maintenance of the general peace."

Reference was also made to instances in which states had intervened to prevent abuse by another state of its own subjects, including French intervention to check religious atrocities in Lebanon in 1861 and national protests directed towards Roumania and Russia with respect to aggression against Jews and towards Turkey on behalf of persecuted Christian minorities.

51. Oppenheim, International Law, 3rd ed. (1920), vol.I, expressed doubt that there was, then, "really a rule of the Law of Nations" which permitted intervention on humanitarian grounds. However, he said, at p 229:

> " Many jurists maintain that intervention is ... admissible, or even has a basis of right, when exercised in the interest of humanity for the purpose of stopping religious persecution and endless cruelties in time of peace and war. That the Powers have in the past exercised intervention on these grounds, there is no doubt. Thus > Great Britain, France, and Russia intervened in 1827 in the struggle between revolutionary Greece and Turkey."

S990

And Bluntschel, Das Moderne Volkerrecht der Civilisierten Staaten, 3rd ed. (1878), (quoted in In re Altstotter (L Rep Trials War Crims), at p 47) said, at p 270:

> "States are allowed to interfere in the name of international law if 'humanity rights' are violated to the detriment of any single race."

52. Next, the conduct which forms the substance of a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act, namely, murder, manslaughter, wounding, kidnapping and various sexual offences under Australian municipal law, attracted criminal sanctions before 1945 in most, if not all, of the states which were parties to World War II. This does not constitute that conduct an international crime but it is evidence of state practice concerning conduct between nationals of the same country. In determining whether a rule of justice may be declared an international law, it is relevant that each individual state condemns the conduct the subject of the rule: cf. In re List, at p 633.

53. At the end of World War II, crimes against humanity were dealt with in the following way. Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter of 1945 defined "crimes against humanity" as:

> "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated" (emphasis added).

The paragraph contains two important limitations. First, a crime against humanity must comprise conduct directed at a civilian population. Isolated acts against individuals, unconnected with a larger design to persecute or exterminate a population, are not within the definition of the crime, whether committed by an individual or by a state authority: see, for instance, In re Altstotter, (Annual Digest) at p 284. The second limitation is that crimes against humanity must have been committed "in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal", that is, war crimes (Art.6(b)) or crimes against peace or waging aggressive war: Art.6(a). The second limitation applies both to acts of persecution and to acts of extermination. As to the grammatical change made to Art.6(c), which makes the intention of the contracting parties to this effect unequivocal, see Schwelb, "Crimes Against Humanity", (1946) XXIII The British Year Book of International Law 178 (hereafter "Schwelb"), at pp 193-195. Only crimes against humanity committed during the period of the war were held to be capable of founding a conviction because only those acts could be seen to satisfy the limitation. In its judgment, the IMT concluded, at p 249:

> "To constitute Crimes against Humanity, the acts relied on before the outbreak of war must have been in execution of, or in connection with, any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The Tribunal is of the opinion that revolting and horrible as many of these crimes were, it has not been satisfactorily proved that they were done in execution of, or in connection with, any such crime. The Tribunal therefore cannot make a general declaration that the acts before 1939 were Crimes against Humanity within the meaning of the Charter, but from the beginning of the war in 1939 War Crimes were committed on a vast scale, which were also Crimes against Humanity; and insofar as the inhumane acts charged in the Indictment, and committed after the beginning of the war, did not constitute War > Crimes, they were all committed in execution of, or in connection with, the aggressive war, and therefore constituted Crimes against Humanity."

5991

54. The IMT judgment does not throw much light on what "in execution of, or in connection with" means. The Tribunal found that conduct amounting to a crime against humanity either was a war crime or was done in execution of or in connection with a crime against peace. And, if done during the War, that connection seems to have been assumed. Be that as it may, Art.6(c) of the Charter evidences a conceptually distinct crime where the conduct constituting the crime is, in a practical sense, associated with other conduct which amounts to a war crime or a crime against peace.

55. On 20 December 1945 the Control Council for Germany, comprising representatives of Britain, the United States, France and USSR, enacted a law for the punishment of persons guilty of, inter alia, "crimes against humanity". This law, generally known as Control Council Law No.10 ("CC Law No.10"), was passed to effect the prosecution of war criminals other than the major actors dealt with by the IMT. Article II 1(c) of CC Law No.10 defined crimes against humanity in substantially the same terms as did the Nuremberg Charter but, significantly, did not contain the words "in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal".

56. The USMT, whose jurisdiction emanated from CC Law No.10, said, in In re Altstotter, (Annual Digest) at p 282:

> "The (Nuremberg) Charter, the I.M.T. Judgment, and C.C. Law 10 ... constitute authoritative recognition of principles of individual penal responsibility in international affairs which ... had been developing for many years. Surely C.C. Law 10, which was enacted by the authorised representatives of the four greatest powers on earth, is entitled to judicial respect when it states, 'Each of the following acts is recognised as a crime'."

Although the USMT drew a general conclusion concerning CC Law No.10, the context of the statement is a discussion about Art.6(b) of the Nuremberg Charter and its equivalent, Art.II 1(b) of CC Law No.10, not about crimes against humanity. However, later, at p 285, the Tribunal said:

> "Whether the crime against humanity is the product of statute or of common international law, or, as we believe, of both, we find no injustice to persons tried for such crimes. They are chargeable with knowledge that such acts were wrong and were punishable when committed."

57. In In re List the defendants were charged with crimes which all came within the scope of war crimes in international law. But the USMT discussed CC Law No.10 generally, saying, at p 634:

> "The crimes defined in Control Council Law No. 10 ... were crimes under pre-existing rules of International Law - some by conventional law and some by customary law."

58. There were, therefore, significantly different claims by the USMT, operating under the authority of CC Law No.10, and by the IMT, operating under the authority of the Nuremberg Charter, as to the state of international law before 1945. The former tribunal claimed that a crime against humanity was an independent crime under customary international law; the latter tribunal required its connection with a war crime or a crime against peace. The differences may, as Dr Egon Schwelb points out, reflect the difference in the legal nature of the two instruments and in the status of the two tribunals created to exercise jurisdiction: Schwelb, pp 218-219. The IMT was, in addition to being an occupation court for Germany, also, to some extent, an international judicial body administering international law. Being an international judicial organ, the IMT's jurisdiction in domestic matters of Germany was circumscribed. The zonal tribunals applying CC Law No.10, on the other hand, were arguably in the nature of local courts administering primarily municipal law and therefore not limited by the settled boundaries of international law: cf. In re Altstotter, (Annual Digest) at pp 278-279, 287, where the USMT itself concluded that it exercised international jurisdiction.

5992

59. One more kind of evidence relating to crimes against humanity should be considered: enabling legislation of countries which do not have territorial jurisdiction in international law with respect to war criminals from World War II, and the resulting prosecutions of those persons in municipal courts some time after 1945. These sources are evidence of opinio juris of states though their law-making capacity, as practice, is not relevant when considering the state of international law in the past.

60. In 1950, the Israeli Parliament enacted legislation for the prosecution of, inter alia, crimes against humanity, defined substantially in accordance with CC Law No.10: the Nazi and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment) Law 1950 (Israel). Attorney-General of Israel v. Eichmann was prosecuted under this legislation. The Court concluded, at p 283, that the crimes for which the appellant was convicted, including crimes against humanity, "must be regarded as having been prohibited by the law of nations since 'time immemorial'".

61. In 1987 the Canadian Parliament amended the Canadian Criminal Code to provide for the prosecution of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The conduct in the definition of crimes against humanity is similar in scope to that in Art.6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter; but no connection with other crimes is required. The Canadian definition, however, does require conduct amounting to a crime against humanity to constitute a "contravention of customary international law or conventional international law" or to be "criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations": s.7(3.76). This latter formulation corresponds to the terms of the relevant Canadian constitutional provision.

62. The Queen v. Finta (1989) 61 DLR(4th) 85, in the Ontario High Court of Justice, held the Canadian legislation to be constitutionally valid, in that it was not retroactive and because crimes against humanity, as defined in the legislation, existed in international law before 1945. This conclusion was based on a survey of conventions and agreements and other relevant material: see at pp 97-103. However, the Court's opinion as to the limits of a crime against humanity is not clear. In part, the decision was based on the judgment of the IMT. Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. said, at p 101, that he accepted the reasoning of the IMT:

> "who indicated ... that 'by 1939 these rules laid down in the (Hague) Convention were recognized by all civilized nations, and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war'".

But, as Brennan J. points out in his judgment in the present case, the words quoted referred only to war crimes as defined in Art.6(b) and not to crimes against humanity defined in par.(c). Also, as noted earlier, "crimes against humanity" are defined very broadly in the Canadian legislation. Callaghan A.C.J.H.C. concluded, at p 101:

> "I am of the opinion that war crimes and crimes against humanity were, by 1939, offences at international law or criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations" (emphasis added).

The distinction between "general principles" of law and international law, although corresponding to the distinction made in the relevant Canadian constitutional provision (and in equivalent international law, for example, in Art.15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights), was not spelt out.

5993

63. The United Kingdom War Crimes Act 1991 provides for prosecutions for murder, manslaughter or culpable homicide committed between 1 September 1939 and 5 June 1945 in a place which was then part of Germany or under German occupation and which "constituted a violation of the laws and customs of war": s.1(1). Thus no question directly arises as to crimes against humanity. The conclusions contained in War Crimes: Report of the War Crimes Inquiry, Cm.744, (1989) ("the Hetherington Report") informed the preparation of the United Kingdom legislation. The report concluded, at par.5.43:

> " In 1939 there was no internationally accepted definition of crimes against humanity, as there was of violations of the laws and customs of war. The Nuremberg definition of 1945 appears partly to be based on the principle that some crimes are so patently against the laws of all civilised nations as to be regarded as crimes in international law, prosecutable by any nation. ... (However) while the moral justification for trying crimes against humanity at Nuremberg is understandable, the legal justification is less clear."

64. So, there is support in Israel's legislation for the existence at the relevant time of crimes against humanity defined according to CC Law No.10. Also, Canadian legislation, defining crimes against humanity broadly, has been held to be an accurate reflection of the law at the time. But the United Kingdom legislation, by omission, carries the implication that crimes against humanity were not formulated sufficiently before 1945 to be binding rules of law.

Crimes against humanity - conclusion

65. It is impossible, perhaps, to say definitively what were the limits of crimes at international law between 1939 and 1945. This is not merely because of the state of historical record, but because of the nature of international law. The sources of international law and their relative status are not, and were not then, finally fixed. Documents such as those emanating from the United Nations and states' legislation are strong authority, but there is no heirarchy of judicial and legislative organs creating a system of binding precedent as in municipal law. For example, practice contrary to express intention does not necessarily attract legal sanction; and its status - the status of contravening practice - is unsettled also. Since no permanent international court of criminal justice exists to determine authoritatively the scope of international criminal law or to enforce sanctions for its breach, agreements and other documents evidencing international crimes do not function in the same way as statutes in municipal law. This is the case especially where crimes develop from customary practice of nations, but even where treaties exist between states.

66. The absence of consistent enforcement and sanction means that documents evidencing international criminal laws cannot be scrutinised with the same intensity for the exact limits of the provisions they contain. It is not only unrealistic but incorrect to take an excessively technical approach. In In re Piracy Jure Gentium (1934) AC 586, Lord Sankey said, at pp 588-589:

> "Speaking generally, in embarking upon international law, their Lordships are to a great extent in the realm of opinion, and in estimating the value of opinion it is permissible not only to seek a consensus of views, but to select what appear to be the better views upon the question."

5994

67. There is a certain unease and evident moral, and legal, tension surrounding the question of crimes against humanity. This shows itself in various ways, as in the sometimes peremptory dealing with the question by the tribunals. See, for example, the statement of the USMT in In re Altstotter, at p 282 (already quoted), after a discussion of war crimes in the narrow sense:

> "Surely C.C. Law 10, which was enacted by the authorised representatives of the four greatest powers on earth, is entitled to judicial respect when it states, 'Each of the following acts is recognised as a crime'."

And also the readiness of the IMT to make the connection between the conduct in question and other crimes within its jurisdiction. The tension is further illustrated in the divergence of views represented in the current war crimes legislation in Israel, Canada and the United Kingdom.

68. Upon analysis, the moral tension is seen to be between a desire to ensure that fundamental justice is not avoided by an overly technical scrutiny and a fundamental objection to individuals being called to account by victors in a war according to laws which did not exist at the time; a fear, also, of justice being undermined. When analysed legally, and from the perspective of the time, the tension is seen to be between two fundamental notions: on the one hand, the doctrine of sovereignty with its concomitant principle of non-intervention between nations; and, on the other, fundamental principles of human rights, including the right of a people to be protected by the world community if abused by a sovereign power. Certainly, with the development of principles of human rights and the joint responsibility for their protection since, and largely as a result of, World War II, the limitations of a strictly defined doctrine of sovereignty, and exclusive rights with respect to the welfare of a group of people, have become increasingly evident: see, for example, Brilmayer, Justifying International Acts, (1989), Ch 5 and Ch 7. However, humanitarian norms cannot be said to have been absent before 1945. Fundamental values and the laws of war themselves, being rules limiting the means of aggression not rules permitting violence, arise from a desire to preserve humanity and humaneness in relations between all people. They are themselves, in this sense, humanitarian norms.

69. With this analysis in mind, I have reached the following conclusions. There is, on a survey of relevant material, evidence of the existence before 1939 of a consciousness of acts which offend fundamental human rights; these may be called crimes against humanity. This is to be found in diplomatic instances and legal commentary in the nineteenth century; in the report to the Preliminary Peace Conference of 1919; in the Martens clause in the Hague Convention (by implication); and in the consistency of sanction of similar crimes in municipal laws of individual states. Crimes which extended, conceptually, beyond war crimes were contemplated. But before 1939 there was no real indication of the boundaries of these crimes. Reference is made to the "laws of humanity" or the "dictates of conscience" but the scope of the offence does not emerge. Two statements of the scope of crimes against humanity appeared in the Nuremberg Charter and CC Law No.10 in 1945, containing an important difference between them. Given that the IMT was most clearly exercising international jurisdiction and that no precise definition of the crime had emerged prior to that time, the narrower view of the crime contained in the Nuremberg Charter must be preferred.

70. It follows that, at the relevant time, conduct which amounted to persecution on the relevant grounds, or extermination of a civilian population, including a civilian population of the same nationality as the offender, constituted a crime in international law only if it was proved that the conduct was itself a war crime or was done in execution of or in connection with a war crime.

5995

71. The conduct in respect of which the plaintiff is charged is the murder of a number of persons, either Jews or those suspected of being partisans or communists. The paragraphs of the information relating to those suspected of being partisans or communists allege expressly that the conduct was in pursuance of a policy of annihilation "contrary to the laws of war", in other words that the conduct was a war crime. The paragraphs relating to Jewish people allege that the murders were committed during and in the course of the German occupation of the Ukraine, and either in pursuing Germany's policy of persecution of Jewish people or with intent to destroy Jewish people. In so far as the information alleges a murder in pursuance of Germany's policy of persecution, the conduct is done in execution of or in connection with a war crime in international law, the war crime being Germany's planned persecution in occupied Europe of people by reason of their race, or their political or religious beliefs. In so far as the information alleges a murder with intent to destroy the Jewish people, the conduct is alleged to have been committed "during and in the course of" the German occupation. "In the course of", which reflects the terminology of s.7(1) of the Act, implies, in this context, more than a temporal connection between the murder and the occupation. If it meant otherwise, it would add nothing to "during" the occupation. The allegation is sufficient, therefore, to amount itself to a war crime, as well as a crime against humanity. If, for any reason, the allegation of murder with intent to destroy the Jewish people is insufficient, in context, to amount to a war crime, the information would fail to describe conduct which amounted to a crime against humanity as defined in international law at the relevant time and would fail to be within the universal jurisdiction to prosecute that crime. On its face, however, the conduct alleged against the plaintiff constituted a war crime or a crime against humanity at the relevant time.

The Act and crimes in international law

72. The next matter for consideration is whether the definition of "war crime" in s.7 of the Act represents a valid exercise of Commonwealth legislative power as an appropriate exercise of universal jurisdiction conferred in international law with respect to war crimes, in the narrow sense, or crimes against humanity. "Appropriate" in this context means, of course, "effective"; it does not imply a power in this Court to review the desirability of the exercise of the jurisdiction.

73. The question for the Court here is: does the Act permit a person to be convicted of an offence under s.9 in circumstances where the conduct alleged against the person would not have amounted to a war crime or a crime against humanity under international law? Section 17 of the Act plays a decisive role in this determination. Sub-section (2) of that section is the central provision. It reads:

> " Subject to section 16, it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:
>
> (a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
>
> (b) was not under international law a crime against humanity."

It follows from the earlier discussion as to crimes against humanity that par.(b) of s.17(2) can have only an operation consistent with the restricted understanding of that crime in international law. As to par.(a), since, as Baxter says, the international law of war is "'prohibitive law' ... Belligerent acts in war are facts, not legal rights" ("The Municipal and International Law Basis of Jurisdiction over War Crimes", (1951) XXVIII The British Year Book of International Law 382 (hereafter "Baxter"), at p 388), it is not accurate to speak of acts which are "permitted" by the laws, customs and usages of war. However, although inaccurate, the meaning of s.17(2)(a) is not unclear. Questions of onus of proof aside, there is no difficulty in construing the positive language of the paragraph as invoking the prohibitive provisions of the laws of war. The words "was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war" must be taken to refer to conduct which "did not contravene the laws, customs and usages of war".

5996

74. The Commonwealth submitted that s.17 is properly to be considered integral to the formation of the offence contained in s.9, with the result that the offence created by that section is confined by the limits of the relevant crimes at international law. This conclusion was said to result from two possible constructions of the relevant sections. The first is that the provisions of s.17 have the effect of creating an implied element in the offence created by the Act. In other words, it was submitted, words should be read into both s.7(1) and s.7(3), after "A serious crime is a war crime", to the effect: "which is a war crime or a crime against humanity at international law". This would involve the prosecution proving, in every case, beyond reasonable doubt, the facts which constitute the elements of the international crime alleged to have been committed. The analogy, on this construction, is the Crown's onus in a prosecution for murder to prove an intention on the part of the accused to kill or do grievous bodily harm.

75. If an "element of an offence" is to be understood in this strict sense, the suggested construction of ss.7 and 17 is not supported by the words and structure of the Act. Section 9 contains the elements of the offence created by the Act. A person is guilty of an indictable offence if he or she has (1) committed a "war crime", (2) between 1 September 1939 and May 1945. With no express reference to war crimes or crimes against humanity in international law in s.9, or in ss.6 or 7, and without more compelling reason than a general evocation of international law in, for example, the terms of s.7(3)(a)(i) and (ii), there is no justification for implying those crimes as an element (in the strict sense referred to) of the offence in s.9.

76. This does not mean, however, that the offence created by the Act may not be limited by the scope of crimes at international law referred to in s.17. As an alternative construction, the Commonwealth submitted that s.17 and the provisions of the Act as a whole have this effect because s.17 makes contravention of an international criminal law a "prerequisite of guilt", rather than an element of the offence. There are two ways, it was said, in which the "defence" in s.17(2), may be so raised. The accused may, in effect, demur to the indictment by claiming that the allegations in the charge do not, as a matter of law, constitute an offence against the laws, customs and usages of war or a crime against humanity. This would be a matter for the judge to decide and, if satisfied of the accused's submission, the prosecution would not proceed. If no facts needed to be determined, the jury would not be involved. An analogy here is a question as to the jurisdiction of a court. The prosecution, or a plaintiff in a civil case, need not prove that the claim made falls within the jurisdiction of a court; but if the issue is raised it must be resolved in favour of the prosecution, or plaintiff, before the proceedings may continue. Mason C.J. and Dawson J. observed in Thompson v. The Queen (1989) 169 CLR 1, at p 12:

> "Proof of jurisdiction is a prerequisite of guilt but otherwise it is not an element in proof of the commission of the offence except in those cases in which the offence is so defined that commission of it in a place or locality is made an element of the offence charged."

77. The second way in which it was said that an accused may raise the "defence" and claim that liability under the Act does not attach is to introduce additional facts which take the conduct alleged out of the category of a crime in international law. The facts alleged by the prosecution may, if proved, constitute a war crime in international law and for the purposes of the Act. For example, the facts alleged may amount to the manslaughter of civilians in occupied territory. But additional facts may raise a sufficient doubt as to the military necessity of the conduct. Section 17(3) expressly provides that conduct arising from military necessity is permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war. If this is the way liability is denied - by the assertion of additional facts - s.17(4) requires that there be evidence of the existence of those facts.

5997

78. The language of s.17(4) does suggest that this second way is the only way to deny liability under s.17(2) but this literal reading cannot be taken to preclude the right to demur. Sub-section (4) is concerned to preclude reliance on sub-s.(2) where the defendant relies on additional facts but there is no evidence of them, merely assertion. As to that situation, see s.13(5).

79. In so far as a denial of liability does require evidence of additional facts, a defendant has an evidentiary onus in that regard. The word "defence" is used inaptly in s.17 because of the onus cast upon the prosecution if there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence: see s.17(5). However, there is nothing unusual in a defendant having an evidentiary onus nor, for that matter, in an inapt use of the word "defence" in a statute. An analogy for this view of the operation of s.17(2) is self-defence in the criminal law. The absence of circumstances which may amount to self-defence is not, in the strict sense, an element of murder. An evidentiary onus lies on an accused to adduce facts which are capable of raising a doubt as to whether the conduct in relation to which he or she is charged was done by way of self-defence. But, despite the name, self-defence is not a defence in the sense that an accused must prove the facts on which he or she relies.

80. I have dealt in some detail with this view of s.17, involving the proposition that the section has the effect of limiting the operation of ss.7 and 9 without creating an implied element in s.7, because it seems to me the correct construction. Prosecutions under s.9 must be in accordance with the whole Act. Apart from the particular provisions of s.17, there are indications in the Act - in specific provisions and general structure - which point strongly to the offence created in s.9 being predicated on the international law crimes of war crimes and crimes against humanity as formulated at the relevant time. The indications are as follows:

Specific provisions

(i) The terms of s.7(3) correspond to phrases and concepts in both Art.6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter and Art.II of the 1948 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (the "Genocide Convention"). Article 6(c) speaks of "persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds"; s.7(3)(a)(i) speaks of a serious crime committed "in the course of political, racial or religious persecution". The difference between sub-pars (i) and (ii) of s.7(3)(a) also corresponds to the distinction between acts of persecution and acts of extermination, central to Art.6(c). With respect to acts of extermination, the reference in s.7(3)(a)(ii) to serious crimes committed "with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group" corresponds precisely to the language of Art.II of the Genocide Convention.

(ii) Section 7(1) provides that a serious crime may be a "war crime" in either of two contexts: during hostilities or in the course of an occupation. These are the two contexts dealt with by the laws and customs of war and which distinguish violations of those laws and customs from crimes against humanity per se. And nothing in s.7(1) requires there to be conduct, for the purposes of s.9, which is inconsistent with conduct which amounts to a war crime in the narrow sense.

The plaintiff relied on s.7(2), which makes a merely incidental or remote connection, whether in time, in time and place, or otherwise, insufficient to constitute conduct "in the course of" hostilities or an occupation, in order to support the proposition that a mere temporal or spatial connection would, in some circumstances, be sufficient to found a prosecution so long as it was not "incidental or remote". This, on its face, would exceed international law. The Commonwealth, on the other hand, argued that s.7(1), read in the light of sub-s.(2), requires a strong, substantial connection and that mere temporal or spatial connection is insufficient. This latter construction is the better view. The use of brackets, instead of commas, in s.7(2) has the effect of emphasising the main text of the sub-section, which simply makes incidental or remote connection insufficient. The subject matter of the provision is the degree, not the kind of connection. Although not conclusive, this construction lends support to the proposition that s.7(1) remains within the limits of international law. Such a construction is supported by the ordinary meaning of the phrase "in the course of" which carries with it the idea of a relationship between the substance of the two things connected. Conduct need not be calculated by sober military minds to achieve a military end; neither need war crimes in international law. The sexual assault of women inhabitants by occupying soldiers during an occupation would be "in the course of" the occupation and would be a war crime in international law but need not be (though it may be) calculated to further the ultimate military object of occupation.

(iii) The language of ss.16, 6(6) and, by implication, s.20 of the Act also refers to concepts familiar in international law. See the discussion of ss.16 and 20 later in these reasons.

Structure

(iv) The structure of s.7 itself, divided into two substantive parts - sub-ss.(1) and (3), reflects the two categories of crimes under discussion and contemplated in virtually all literature in this area of international law: war crimes and crimes against humanity.

(v) The structure of the "definition" of a "war crime" for the purposes of the Act indicates that the Act should properly be construed to stay within the limits of international law referred to in s.17. A "serious crime" in s.6 is defined by reference to municipal law; s.7 defines the circumstances within which those notional municipal offences can be prosecuted under the Act. Section 7 itself would be unnecessary if no invocation of international law were intended. The dual structure of the s.9 offence, therefore, supports the proposition that two systems of law are contemplated in the application of the Act.

(vi) Section 9 is the first section in Pt III of the Act, entitled "War Crimes". Many of the sections in that Part which follow s.9 have the effect of limiting the scope of the prosecutions possible under s.9. Some limit the prosecutions procedurally only: see, for example, s.14. Some sections, on the other hand, have a substantive operation, creating, in effect, a condition precedent for prosecution. For instance, s.11 limits prosecutions to those against Australian citizens or residents. This is not an element of the offence but, if the question is raised, the prosecution must be able to establish the citizenship or residency of the accused. Thus it is consistent with the scheme of the Act that s.9 be read in accordance with the limitations contained in Pt III of the Act.

5999

The Act and international law

81. Subject to a qualification to be discussed shortly, the Act evidences a sufficient intention that it does not seek to trespass beyond the boundaries of international law as they have been discussed in this judgment. Although a "war crime" is defined in terms which do not of themselves attract notions of international law, the scope of s.17 and the Act as a whole warrant a conclusion that the Act is in accord with what international law understands as war crimes and crimes against humanity at the relevant time.

82. The qualification in question exists by reason of s.16 which reads:

> " Subject to subsections 6(2) and 13(2), the fact that, in doing an act alleged to be an offence against this Act, a person acted under orders of his or her government or of a superior is not a defence in a proceeding for the offence, but may, if the person is convicted of the offence, be taken into account in determining the proper sentence."

The language of s.16 is very close to that of Art.8 of the Nuremberg Charter agreed to on 8 August 1945 and, no doubt, was taken from that instrument. Section 20 of the Act reads: "Subsection 6(6) and section 16 are enacted to avoid doubt." The "doubt" was not clearly identified in the submissions of counsel; indeed virtually nothing was said of s.16 in the course of argument.

83. If s.16 reflects international law at the times specified in the information, the correspondence between the Act and that law may, broadly speaking, be said to be complete. But what if it does not? Referring to the various trials by Allied courts after World War II, Professor Starke has commented:

> " It appears clearly established also by the above-mentioned post-war trials (see, for example, the judgment of the Nuremberg Court) that orders by superiors, or obedience to national laws or regulations, do not constitute a defence, but may be urged in mitigation of punishment": Introduction to International Law, 9th ed. (1984), p 529.

84. Of course the question in the present case is the state of international law between 1942 and 1943 when the offences alleged against the plaintiff are said to have been committed. The view that the doctrine of superior orders was available to service personnel charged with war crimes was asserted by Professor Oppenheim in his International Law as late as the fifth edition, published in 1935: see 5th ed., vol.II, pp 453-454. That view was reflected in the Australian Military Manual which, at the outbreak of World War II, said, in Ch XIV, Art.443:

> "It is important, however, to note that members of the armed forces who commit such violations of the recognized rules of warfare as are ordered by their Government, or by their commander, are not war criminals and cannot therefore be punished by the enemy."

85. But when Professor Lauterpacht edited the sixth edition of Oppenheim in 1940, he rejected the earlier view and expressed his opinion in terms corresponding to s.16 of the Act: see 6th ed., vol.II, pp 453-454. The Australian Military Manual was amended to give effect to the changed opinion on 30 September 1944.

86. In In Re List, at p 650, the USMT said of the defence of superior orders:

> " The defence relies heavily upon the writings of Prof. L. Oppenheim to sustain their position. It is true > that he advocated this principle throughout his writings. As a co-author of the British Manual of Military Law, he incorporated the principle there. It seems also to have found its way into the United States Rules of Land Warfare (1940). We think Professor Oppenheim espoused a decidedly minority view. ... The fact that the British and American armies may have adopted it for the regulation of their own armies as a matter of policy, does not have the effect of enthroning it as a rule of International Law."

6000

87. It is significant that as early as 1921, in the case of The Llandovery Castle (1921) 2 Annual Digest 436, a German court held the defence of superior orders to be unavailable if the order were "universally known ... to be ... against the law".

88. Now it is true that the author of a major study - Dinstein, The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law, (1965) (hereafter "Dinstein") - ends, at p 253, with these words: "I cannot help but conclude my study of the subject of obedience to superior orders in international law with some incertitude." But, as noted, there is a body of authority and opinion that between 1942 and 1943 the defence of superior orders was not available in the case of a prosecution for a war crime. The point does not seem to have been debated in relation to crimes against humanity as opposed to war crimes in the narrower sense. But, given that crimes against humanity need not be defined by reference to military relationships, this may not be surprising.

89. Section 16 of the Act says no more than that "the fact that ... a person acted under orders ... is not a defence". It says nothing of duress, other defences made available by ss.6(2) and 13(2)(f) of the Act, or the implications of an order for the mens rea of the defendant: in this respect, see the discussion in Dinstein, at pp 251-252. The section is in truth very limited in its operation.

90. To the extent that there may be "doubt" (s.20) as to the availability of the defence of superior orders in the "war" to which the Act applies, I do not think that the doubt is sufficient to destroy the general correspondence between the Act and international law. It follows then that the Act is supportable as an exercise of the universal jurisdiction and, in that regard, as an exercise of the external affairs power.

Return to externality

91. I return now to where this judgment began, namely, that the Act is a law with respect to external affairs because it relates to conduct that took place during a war which touched and concerned Australia, whether or not Australia was directly involved in the particular conflict from which the conduct arose.

92. On this approach, the Act is viewed simply as municipal law which penalizes certain conduct answering the statutory definition of a "war crime" between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945. And, subject to what follows concerning Ch III of the Constitution, the Act is a valid exercise of the external affairs power.

Defence power

93. The Commonwealth contended that the Act is supportable as an exercise of the defence power in s.51(vi). But, for the reasons given by Brennan J., to which I do not wish to add, the Act is not so supportable. It is therefore unnecessary to say more about this aspect of the case.

Constitutional limitations - Chapter III

94. Placitum (xxix) of s.51 of the Constitution, as with the other placita of that section, is expressed to be "subject to this Constitution". It is necessary therefore that the Act does not offend any part of the Constitution, relevantly, that it does not offend Ch III - The Judicature.

6001

95. The provisions of Ch III of the Constitution function to achieve the independence of the judiciary for two related ends. First, they ensure the institutional separation of the site of judicial power from those of executive and legislative powers so that the courts may operate as a check, through review, on the other arms of government. Secondly, the independence of the judiciary is protected so as to ensure that cases are decided free from domination by other branches of government and in accordance with judicial process. See Harris v. Caladine (1991) 65 ALJR 280, at p 300; 99 ALR 193, at pp 227-228.

96. The limits of judicial power are difficult to ascertain precisely; the line between an essentially legislative or executive function and a judicial function is not always obvious. However, it is clear that the determination of criminal liability is, historically and by its nature, the exercise of a purely judicial power: Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v. J.W. Alexander Ltd. (1918) 25 CLR 434, at pp 443-444.

97. The essence of judicial power was stated by Kitto J. in The Queen v. Trade Practices Tribunal; Ex parte Tasmanian Breweries Pty. Ltd. (1970) 123 CLR 361, at p 374, when his Honour said:

> "Thus a judicial power involves, as a general rule, a decision settling for the future, as between defined persons or classes of persons, a question as to the existence of a right or obligation, so that an exercise of the power creates a new charter by reference to which that question is in future to be decided as between those persons or classes of persons. In other words, the process to be followed must generally be an inquiry concerning the law as it is and the facts as they are, followed by an application of the law as determined to the facts as determined; and the end to be reached must be an act which, so long as it stands, entitles and obliges the persons between whom it intervenes, to observance of the rights and obligations that the application of law to facts has shown to exist."

Legislation enacted by the Parliament pursuant to s.51 of the Constitution, which purported to require a court to which Ch.III applies to act otherwise than in accordance with these principles, would offend Ch III.

Bills of Attainder

98. Bills of attainder (which impose the death penalty) and bills of pains and penalties (which impose a lesser penalty) may be defined as legislative acts imposing punishment on a specified person or persons or a class of persons without the safeguards of a judicial trial: see Lehmann, "The Bill of Attainder Doctrine: A Survey of the Decisional Law", (1978) 5 Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 767, at pp 790-791.

99. Legislative acts of this character contravene Ch III of the Constitution because they amount to an exercise of judicial power by the legislature. In such a case, membership of a group would be a legislative assessment as to the certainty, or at least likelihood to the criminal standard of proof, of an accused doing certain acts or having certain intentions. Those acts or intentions would not themselves be open to scrutiny by the court. The vice lies in the intrusion of the legislature into the judicial sphere: Murphy J. in Victoria v. Australian Building Construction Employees' and Builders Labourers' Federation (1982) 152 CLR 25, at p 107.

6902

100. The Act, however, does not answer the description of a bill of attainder. It specifies no particular persons and it requires a trial. As to the kind of bill of attainder which confers guilt according to membership of a group, the Act confines the class of persons in relation to which it operates in the following ways. It deals only with conduct occurring between 1939 and 1945; war crimes outside of that time are not within its operation. More importantly perhaps, the Act's operation is confined to the European field of war, indicating that, at least in practice, it is the agents of European Axis countries who are the focus of the Act. But this falls short of the Act impliedly operating with respect to a specific class of persons. Guilt of a war crime for the purposes of s.9 is to be determined, in substance, not just form, by an assessment of conduct and intent on the part of the accused. Proof of conduct and of the necessary state of mind which constitutes murder, manslaughter, wounding or the various sexual offences is too particular in its nature to amount, in these circumstances, to a disguised description of group membership. Even though it may be that members of a group are likely to be the ones prosecuted, no assumption is made that members of that group, by virtue of that membership, have, or are likely to have, acted in one or more of these ways.

Retroactivity

101. The Commonwealth submitted that there is no consitutional prohibition against the Parliament enacting retroactive legislation. It is of some importance to see how the submission was couched. Mr Rose, of counsel for the Commonwealth, said in relation to the external affairs power:

> "of course the power is, like all the other powers in< section 51, subject to Chapter III, but, ... once the law is characterised as one with respect to external affairs, then like any of the legislation enacted under the other powers, Chapter III does not enable a court to say, for example, that this is an unjust law".

102. Whether a court may declare a statute to be invalid because it is unjust is a question that goes to the very heart of the relationship between the courts and Parliament: see, among the writings on the subject, Walker, "Dicey's Dubious Dogma of Parliamentary Sovereignty: A Recent Fray with Freedom of Religion", (1985) 59 Australian Law Journal 276. But that question does not arise here. The question is rather whether a law, which requires a court to which Ch III applies to act contrary to accepted notions of judicial power, contravenes Ch III and is therefore invalid to that extent. The question is not answered by the characterization of the law with respect to the placita of s.51. If the law is not in truth a law with respect to a particular head of power, it is not a valid law. It is only if the law meets that test that Ch III need arise for consideration. When it does so arise, it operates to invalidate a law that does not comply with what it requires.

103. I do not accept the submission of the Commonwealth in the absolute terms in which it was proffered. In legislation, judicial decisions and statements of principles, both of municipal and international law, there has emerged a general abhorrence of retroactive criminal law. The notion that there should be no crime or punishment, except in accordance with law, was recognized as early as 1651, when Hobbes wrote:

> "No law, made after a fact done, can make it a crime ... For before the law, there is no transgression of the law": Leviathan, (1651), Chs.27-28, quoted in Glanville Williams, Criminal Law: The General Part, 2nd ed. (1961) (hereafter "Williams"), p 580.

104. The principle was formulated in Art.8 of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1789, it re-appeared in the French Constitution of 1791 and remains in the French Code Penal. It headed the German Penal Code of 1871 and was guaranteed by the Weimar Constitution. Art.I, s.9, cl.3 of the United States Constitution expressly prohibits ex post facto laws. See generally Williams, at pp 575-581; Hall, "Nulla Poena Sine Lege", (1937) 47 The Yale Law Journal 165.

6003

105. In international law the principle of non-retroactivity is enshrined in Art.15(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, (1966), which reads, inter alia:

> " No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed."

(See also Art.7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, (1950); Art.11(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, (1948); Art.9 of the American Convention on Human Rights, (1969); Art.7 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, (1981).) There has been considerable debate surrounding Art.15, tending to focus on a concern that it should not function to undermine the validity of agreements and legislation and resulting prosecutions of war criminals after World War II: see Bossuyt, Guide to the "Travaux Preparatoires" of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, (1987), p 330; also the comments of The European Commission of Human Rights in X v. Belgium (1961) 4 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 324. It is generally agreed, however, that non-retroactivity is a fundamental principle in international law: Reshetov, "The Temporal Operation of Norms on Criminal Responsibility" in Ginsburgs and Kudriavtsev (eds), The Nuremberg Trial and International Law, (1990), p 111, at pp 111-113.

106. All these general objections to retroactively applied criminal liability have their source in a fundamental notion of justice and fairness. They refer to the desire to ensure that individuals are reasonably free to maintain control of their lives by choosing to avoid conduct which will attract criminal sanction; a choice made impossible if conduct is assessed by rules made in the future. Thus, in Calder v. Bull (1798) 3 US 385, Chase J. said, at p 388:

> "no man should be compelled to do what the laws do not require; nor to refrain from acts which the laws permit".

Laws should function to give reasonable warning of their operation and permit individuals to rely on that scope and meaning until expressly altered. Another nineteenth-century rationale for the principle was expressed in terms of specific deterrence:

> "The reason why these laws are so universally condemned is, that they overlook the great object of all criminal law, which is, to hold up the fear and certainty of punishment as a counteracting motive, to the minds of persons tempted to crime, to prevent them from committing it. But a punishment prescribed after an act is done, cannot, of course, (prevent) any such motive": Jacquins v. Commonwealth (1852) 63 Mass. 279, at p 281.

107. Prohibition against retroactive laws protects a particular accused against potentially capricious state action. But the principle also represents a protection of a public interest. This is so, first, in the sense that every individual is, by the principle, assured that no future retribution by society can occur except by reference to rules presently known; and secondly, it serves to promote a just society by encouraging a climate of security and humanity.

6004

108. In so far as the principle of non-retroactivity protects an individual accused, it is arguably a mutable principle, the right to protection dependent, to some extent, on circumstances. Where, for example, the alleged moral transgression is extremely grave, where evidence of that transgression is particularly cogent or where the moral transgression is closely analogous to, but does not for some technical reason amount to, legal transgression, there is a strong argument that the public interest in seeing the transgressors called to account outweighs the need of society to protect an individual from prosecution on the basis that a law did not exist at the time of the conduct. But it is not only the issue of protection of an individual accused at the point of prosecution which is raised in the enactment of a retroactive criminal law. It is both aspects of the principle - individual and public interests - which require fundamental protection.

109. In Calder v. Bull, Chase J. delineated the scope of the provision in the United States Constitution which prohibits ex post facto laws. He concluded, at p 390, that it proscribed four types of laws. They were: (i) laws that make an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punish such action; (ii) laws that aggravate a crime, or make it greater than it was, when committed; (iii) laws that change the punishment, and inflict a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed; and (iv) laws that alter the legal rules of evidence, and receive less, or different, testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offence, in order to convict the offender.

110. It is not the case that a law (even a criminal law) that operates retroactively thereby offends Ch III of the Constitution. It is only if a law purports to operate in such a way as to require a court to act contrary to accepted notions of judicial power that a contravention of Ch III may be involved. It is conceivable that a law, which purports to make criminal conduct which attracted no criminal sanction at the time it was done, may offend Ch III, especially if the law excludes the ordinary indicia of judicial process. Such a law may strike at the heart of judicial power: see Liyanage v. The Queen (1967) 1 AC 259, at pp 289-290. But it is unnecessary to pursue this topic further because, as will appear, I do not consider that the Act, in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff, is retroactive in any offensive way. Likewise, I find it unnecessary to consider whether the decision in The King v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425 is consistent with the operation of ChIII as described in this judgment, though it is apparent that I do not share dicta which may be thought to suggest that an ex post facto law can never offend Ch III: see, for instance, Isaacs J., at pp 442-443; Higgins J., at p 451; Powers J., at p 462. The Court was not invited to overrule Kidman and, in the absence of full argument on the point, it is preferable to say no more on this aspect.

Retroactivity: The Act

111. The Act is not offensively retroactive in relation to the information laid against the plaintiff. The information, except for par.2 and the relevant part of par.12, alleges that the plaintiff murdered one or more persons. Paragraphs 2 and 12 contain allegations that the plaintiff was "knowingly concerned in or party to the murders" of about 850 Jewish people in the village of Serniki.

112. Section 9 of the Act refers only to conduct done in the past. Those who "committed a war crime" are guilty of an offence. The offence under s.9 (strictly, unnamed, since "war crime" simply identifies certain conduct which amounts to the s.9 offence) did not exist in Australian law at the time of the conduct, so the section is, in some sense at least, retrospective. But the Act causes no detriment to an accused where the offence charged rests on the notional crime of murder referred to in s.6(1) and, by implication, s.6(3).

6005

Under the laws of the Australian States, the intentional killing of a person in the absence of authorisation, justification or excuse was at the relevant time an offence punishable by, at least, a maximum penalty no less than that imposed by s.10 of the Act for an offence involving the wilful killing of a person: imprisonment for life. And there was no suggestion in argument that the law prevailing in the Ukraine at the relevant time was any more beneficial to an accused. Further, the universality of the condemnation of murder in municipal laws generally is reflected in the existence in international law of war crimes and crimes against humanity, both of which (so far as it is relevant here) are predicated on conduct which all Australian States and Territories would have identified as murder. Where the conduct alleged is murder, the circumstances described in s.7, which must be satisfied to establish the offence in s.9, do not alter the nature of the conduct which is punishable so as to take it outside the scope of the municipal crime of murder. They describe the circumstances in which a crime of murder will be a "war crime". Conduct constituting such an offence under the Act was conduct which attracted the sanction of criminal laws generally, not just the censure of moral codes. In those circumstances, it cannot be said that an individual is caused detriment to which he or she would not have been subject at the time of the conduct, or that he or she had "no cause to abstain" from that conduct.

113. In its application to the information in pars 2 and 12, alleging that the plaintiff was "knowingly concerned in" the murder of several hundred Jewish people, the scope of the Act is less clear. The phrase reflects that in s.6(1)(k)(iii) of the Act which is part of the sub-section increasing the range of parties to a crime who may be caught by the scope of s.6. Those who attempt, conspire to commit, aid, abet, counsel or procure, or who are knowingly concerned in one of the crimes mentioned in pars (a) to (j) of the sub-section are also subject to its provisions. To be "knowingly concerned" is not generally an element of criminal conduct or a component of being a party to an offence in State criminal law involving offences to the person. The breadth of this phrase is made even larger by the language preceding it. Those who are "in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in" a relevant offence may be prosecuted. Nevertheless, par.(k)(iii) is part of s.6(1) and is therefore qualified by the words "and was, under the law then in force ..., an offence". The plaintiff did not argue that the words "knowingly concerned" should be struck out and I am not persuaded that their inclusion in s.6 affects the validity of s.9.

114. Section 6 of the Act invokes State law offences whereas s.9 creates a Commonwealth offence. The notional offences on which the "war crime" is based did not exist in Commonwealth law. But it does not follow from this that the Act is retroactive in any relevant sense. If it is insufficient that the crime of murder existed as a crime within Australian law as a whole, then, at least in the case of murder, it is sufficient that the principles on which the doctrine of non-retroactivity is based are not contravened. Questions may perhaps arise with respect to other criminal offences as to whether there was cause to abstain, but not in the case of murder. Likewise, questions may arise in relation to par.(j) of s.6(1) which speaks of "an offence whose elements are substantially the same as the elements of an offence referred to" in the preceding paragraphs. But it too is qualified by the opening words of sub-s.(1). It is unnecessary to explore these matters.

115. In its application to the information against the plaintiff the Act is not retroactive in a way offensive to Ch III of the Constitution.

Summary of conclusions

116. There is an element of risk in attempting to summarise the contents of any judgment. But, having regard to the length of this judgment and the range of issues it canvasses, there is some justification for making the attempt.

6006

What follows is a summary of the judgment; it need hardly be said that the summary cannot be divorced from the context in which it appears.

1. The power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to "External affairs" (s.51(xxix) of the Constitution) includes a power to make laws with respect to matters external to Australia which touch or concern Australia in some way.
2. The Act is a law with respect to a matter external to Australia, touching or concerning the national interest of Australia, in so far as it relates to conduct occurring outside Australia arising from "war" as defined.
3. There is insufficient evidence of any international obligation to seek out war criminals and bring them to trial to support the Act as an exercise of the external affairs power.
4. Likewise, there is insufficient evidence of any international concern that war criminals be tried in countries other than those in which their crimes were committed to support the Act as an exercise of the external affairs power.
5. The power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to "External affairs" includes a power to make laws with respect to international crimes which are subject to the universal jurisdiction.
6. The Act is a law with respect to external affairs in so far as it is an exercise of the universal jurisdiction to prosecute war crimes and crimes against humanity as formulated in international law at the relevant time.
7. The Act cannot be supported by reference to the defence power in s.51(vi) of the Constitution.
8. The validity of the Act may be tested against the requirements of Ch III of the Constitution, that is, the Act must not call for an exercise, by a court to which the Chapter applies, of what is not truly judicial power.
9. In its application to the information against the plaintiff, the Act does not offend Ch III of the Constitution.

117. It follows then that I answer the question reserved for the consideration of the Court as follows: Section 9 of the Act is not invalid in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff.

JUDGE6

GAUDRON J. The relevant facts, statutory provisions and legislative history are set out in the judgments of Brennan J. and of Deane J. They reveal, amongst other things, that the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) ("the Act") was amended with effect from 25 January 1989 to create an indictable offence, called a "war crime", to be prosecuted in the courts of the States and internal Territories of Australia. See ss.9 and 13 of the Act.

2. The acts which constitute the offence created by s.9 of the Act are confined to acts which occurred between 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945 and which were connected in one or other of the ways specified in s.7 of the Act with the Second World War in Europe or with an occupation arising out of that war. See the definitions of "occupation" and "war" in s.5 of the Act. See also s.7 and s.9(1)(a). As a matter of construction, the offence may be constituted by acts committed in Australia or acts committed outside Australia. See ss.6 and 7. Also as a matter of construction, the acts may have been committed by persons who were then citizens or residents of Australia or by persons then having no connection with this country. See, again, ss.6 and 7. However, s.11 of the Act provides that only an Australian citizen or resident may be charged with a "war crime". It seems from the preamble to the Act, inserted by the 1988 amendments, that the expectation of the Parliament may have been that the Act would, in the main, operate with respect to "persons who committed serious war crimes in Europe during World War II (and who) since have entered Australia and (become) Australian citizens or residents".

6007

3. An information has been laid against the plaintiff charging him with a number of "war crimes". The crimes were allegedly committed on various dates between 1 September 1942 and 31 May 1943 in the Ukraine during or in the course of German occupation of that territory, in pursuit of German policy associated with that occupation or with the war, or on behalf of or in the interests of Germany, or, in some cases, with intent to destroy a racial group. See s.7(1)(b), (c) and (d) and s.7(3)(a)(ii) and (b). At no time during the period 1 September 1942 to 31 May 1943 was the plaintiff a citizen or a resident of Australia. He is now an Australian citizen, resident in South Australia.

4. The question asked in the present case pursuant to s.18 of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) is this:

> "Is Section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 as amended, invalid in its application to the information laid ... against the plaintiff?"

The assumption implicit in that question is that the operation of s.9 with respect to the acts alleged in the information may be severed from the wider operation effected by ss.6 and 7 of the Act. The arguments of the plaintiff and of the defendants were based on the further assumption that severability may be effected on the basis that the acts alleged occurred wholly outside Australia. For reasons which will later appear, it is unnecessary to decide the issue of severability, but, in my view, the assumptions to which I have referred are correct. See Bank of N.S.W. v. The Commonwealth (1948) 76 CLR 1, per Dixon J. at pp 369-371; R. v. Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration; Ex parte Whybrow and Co. (1910) 11 CLR 1, per Isaacs J. at p 54.

5. The question referred pursuant to s.18 of the Judiciary Act may be approached from various perspectives. By reason of the assumptions implicit in the question and in the arguments, I shall first consider whether, to the extent and by reason of its application to events which occurred wholly outside Australia, s.9 is a law with respect to external affairs.

6. In Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168 Mason J. said (at p 223) that New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, "decided that the (external affairs) power extends to matters and things ... outside Australia". And Stephen J. (at p 211) was of the same view. However, I do not think that the decision in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case was to that effect.

7. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case the sufficiency of the externality of the matter or thing to which the law in question applied was expressly accepted by Mason J. (at p 471) and by Jacobs J. (at p 497). It may be that, as was accepted by Gibbs C.J. in Koowarta (at p 190), Barwick C.J. expressed his acceptance of its sufficiency when, having indicated that various matters did not limit the power, his Honour stated (at p 360) that "(t)he power extends ... to any affair which in its nature is external to the continent of Australia and the island of Tasmania". However, that depends on what his Honour meant by the word "affair". Nothing else in the judgments in that case tends in favour of the view that externality is, of itself, sufficient to attract the power. Although that view was later expressly adopted by Murphy J. in The Commonwealth v. Tasmania (The Tasmanian Dam Case) (1983) 158 CLR 1, at pp 171-172, his Honour's decision in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case was based on the view (at p 503) that "(t)he Constitution, particularly s.51(xxix), is intended to enable Australia to carry out its functions as an international person, fulfilling its international obligations and acting effectively as a member of the community of nations."

6008

8. Had the Seas and Submerged Lands Case decided that the external affairs power extends to matters or things outside Australia it would dictate the conclusion that, in its application to the matters alleged in the information - being, as already indicated, matters which occurred wholly outside Australia, s.9 of the Act is a law with respect to external affairs. Equally, were there a decision to the opposite effect, that would dictate the opposite result. But there is no decision one way or the other. Thus, it is necessary to ascertain whether the power with respect to external affairs extends to acts, matters or things which are outside Australia by reference to the meaning of the words conferring the power.

9. The legislative power conferred by s.51(xxix) of the Constitution is a power "to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to ... (e)xternal affairs". The extent of that power depends on the meaning of the words "external affairs", ascertained in accordance with the ordinary rule of constitutional interpretation that they "be construed with all the generality which the words ... admit": Reg. v. Public Vehicles Licensing Appeal Tribunal (Tas.); Ex parte Australian National Airways Pty. Ltd. (1964) 113 CLR 207, at p 225. In particular, their meaning is not cut down by the words "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth". Those words neither identify nor limit the subject matter of legislative power, and they do not now (and it is very much to be doubted that they ever did) import a limitation upon the ability to legislate extraterritorially. Moreover, they indicate that, so long as the proposed measure is one with respect to some subject matter entrusted to the Parliament, it is for the Parliament to decide the nature and extent of the measure, if any, to be enacted on that topic. See Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, at pp 306-308. See also Pearce v. Florenca (1976) 135 CLR 507, at pp 515-516, and Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King (1988) 166 CLR 1, at pp 12-13.

10. The word "affairs" in the expression "external affairs" is a word of considerable generality. In its ordinary usage, "affair" may import a connection or relationship, but not necessarily of any precise or formal kind. Rather, "affair" signifies a relationship of a vague and general kind involving some interest or concern transcending mere curiosity. If that notion of connection or relationship is imported into the phrase "(e)xternal affairs" in s.51(xxix), the phrase extends to acts, matters or things external to Australia which attract the interest or concern of the Australian body politic. And that interest or concern is necessarily established if an external act, matter or thing has been selected by the Parliament of the Commonwealth as the act, matter or thing to which its legislation should apply. Thus, when the validity of legislation is in question, it will necessarily be a law with respect to external affairs if it applies to "matters or things geographically situated outside Australia": the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, per Mason J. at p 471.

11. The view that a law enacted by the Parliament of the Commonwealth is necessarily a law with respect to external affairs to the extent that it operates upon acts, matters or things external to Australia, although not dictated by the decision in the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, is one which received considerable support in that case. It also receives support from statements in the judgments in Robinson v. Western Australian Museum (1977) 138 CLR 283 (per Barwick C.J. at p 294, per Mason J. at p 335, and per Murphy J. at p 343), Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88 (per Murphy J. at p 162), Koowarta (per Stephen J. at p 211, and per Mason J. at p 223) and The Tasmanian Dam Case (per Murphy J. at pp 171-172). However, and more fundamentally, it is a view which proceeds from the ordinary meaning of the words "(e)xternal affairs" in s.51(xxix). Accordingly, in my view, s.9 of the Act is properly to be characterized as a law with respect to external affairs to the extent and by reason that it operates upon acts, matters or things outside Australia. More particularly, it is a law on that topic to the extent of its claimed application to the information laid against the plaintiff, that information being based on acts which are said to have taken place in the Ukraine, a place geographically external to Australia.

6009

12. The conclusion that s.9 of the Act is a law with respect to external affairs to the extent and by reason that it operates upon acts, matters or things outside Australia makes it unnecessary to consider whether some other feature also renders it, either to some greater or lesser extent, a law on that topic. Nor is it necessary to consider whether, as argued on behalf of the defendants, it is a law with respect to defence. However, as s.9 operates only with respect to events which occurred during the period of and in connection with the Second World War in Europe or an occupation arising out of that war and as that conflict came to an end almost forty-five years before s.9 came into effect, it is very difficult to see any connection at all between it and "the ... defence of the Commonwealth (or) of the several States" (s.51(vi) of the Constitution).

13. The defence power has been described as a "purposive power", meaning that it will support a law which is reasonably capable of being seen as appropriate and adapted to the purpose of defence. See Stenhouse v. Coleman (1944) 69 CLR 457, at p 471. Even so, save for those considerations embodied in the phrase "pour encourager les autres", there is no basis on which s.9 can be said to be in the slightest degree relevant to defence. And those considerations, of doubtful validity in circumstances which are proximate in time, become even more questionable as events recede into history. But cf. R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425, per Powers J. at p 460. In my view, those considerations will not stamp a law applying to events which occurred during a war which came to an end some forty-five years earlier as a law with respect to defence.

14. The legislative powers conferred by s.51 are conferred "subject to this Constitution". Thus, laws passed on a subject entrusted to the Parliament under s.51 are invalid if they offend a constitutional prohibition. On behalf of the plaintiff it was argued that s.9, in its application to the information laid against him, offends a prohibition deriving from Ch III of the Constitution or, more particularly, from s.71 which provides that "(t)he judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in ... the High Court of Australia, and in such other federal courts as the Parliament creates, and in such other courts as it invests with federal jurisdiction." The latter courts are identified in s.77(ii) as "the courts of the States".

15. It is not in doubt that Ch III is the source of important prohibitions which, amongst other things, operate to guarantee the independence of the federal judiciary. See, for example, Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v. J.W. Alexander Ltd. (1918) 25 CLR 434; Reg. v. Kirby; Ex parte Boilermakers' Society of Australia ("the Boilermakers' Case") (1956) 94 CLR 254; and Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Australia v. The Queen (1957) 95 CLR 529. The prohibition which was asserted on behalf of the plaintiff was not identified in precise terms. Rather, Mr Charles Q.C., senior counsel for the plaintiff, pointed to the features of the offence created by s.9 and the features of the proceedings contemplated by the Act and argued that one or more of those features offend Ch III.

16. The offence created by s.9 of the Act is constituted by a "serious crime" (a concept which is elaborated in s.6) committed during the period specified in s.9(1)(a) and in one or other of the circumstances specified in s.7. As earlier indicated and in broad terms, s.7 and s.9(1)(a) require the offence to have been committed during the period of and to have been connected with the Second World War in Europe or with an occupation arising out of that war.

6010

17. The information in this case is based on s.6(3) of the Act which provides:-

> "An act is a serious crime if:
> (a) it was done at a particular time outside Australia; and
> (b) the law in force at that time in some part of Australia was such that the act would, had it been done at that time in that part, be a serious crime by virtue of subsection (1)."

The information relies on "serious crimes" (murder, and being knowingly involved in murder) as specified in s.6(1)(a) and (k)(iii) of the Act. Sub-section (1) of s.6 operates by reference to several legal categories and provides as follows:

> "An act is a serious crime if it was done in a part of Australia and was, under the law then in force in that part, an offence, being:
> (a) murder;
> (b) manslaughter;
> (c) causing grievous bodily harm;
> (d) wounding;
> (e) rape;
> (f) indecent assault;
> (g) abduction, or procuring, for immoral purposes;
> (h) an offence (in this paragraph called the 'variant offence') that would be referred to in a preceding paragraph if that paragraph contained a reference to:
> (i) a particular intention or state of mind on the offender's part; or > (ii) particular circumstances of aggravation;
> necessary to constitute the variant offence;
> (j) an offence whose elements are substantially the same as the elements of an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (h), inclusive; or
> (k) an offence of:
> (i) attempting or conspiring to commit;
> (ii) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of; or > (iii) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the commission of;
> an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (j), inclusive."

Mention should also be made of s.6(2) which provides:-

> "In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) whether or not an act was, under the law in force at a particular time in a part of Australia, an offence of a particular kind, regard shall be had to any defence under that law that could have been established in a proceeding for the offence."

18. Assuming it was committed during the period and in the circumstances required by s.9(1)(a) and s.7 of the Act, the conduct which, by virtue of s.6(1) and (3), constitutes a "war crime" is any conduct which is capable of being assigned to a legal category designated in s.6(1) by the hypothetical application of a law of the Commonwealth or of some State or Territory as that law stood at the time of the conduct involved.

19. Section 17(2) allows a defence to a charge of war crime as follows:

> "Subject to section 16, it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:

6011

(a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
(b) was not under international law a crime against humanity."

That defence is further elaborated by s.17(3), (4) and (5). And s.16 provides that, subject to any defence available pursuant to s.6(2) or s.13(2), it is not a defence that the person concerned "acted under orders of his or her government or of a superior".

20. A number of matters should be noted by reference to s.17. First, it is sufficient to state, without going to the terms of s.17(3), (4) and (5), that I agree with Deane J., for the reasons that his Honour gives, that s.17(2)(a) must be construed to mean that the acts in question did not infringe the rules of international law prohibiting certain conduct in the course of and in connection with the waging of war.

21. Secondly, and subject to s.16(2) and any wider area of defence that may be permitted by s.17(3), I also agree with Deane J. that s.17(2) permits a defence, as a matter of law, that the conduct in question was neither a war crime nor a crime against humanity under the rules of international law as those rules stood at the time of the commission of the acts alleged, as well as a defence that, as a matter of fact, that conduct did not offend those rules. It is with respect to a defence of the latter kind that s.17(4) operates so that the defence cannot be relied upon unless there is evidence of facts which raise the defence.

22. Thirdly, I agree with Brennan J. and with Deane J. that it is not an element of the offence created by s.9 that the conduct should amount to a war crime or a crime against humanity under the rules of international law. There is no need for an implication to that effect, and the presence of s.17(2) makes that implication impossible. See John v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1989) 166 CLR 417, at pp 434-435.

23. Fourthly, the availability of a defence under s.17(2) does not effect the consequence that only that conduct which, at the time of its commission, involved an infringement of the rules of international law creating war crimes or crimes against humanity is made punishable by the Act. I agree with Deane J., for the reasons that his Honour gives, that, at least for a large part of the period of 1 September 1939 to 8 May 1945, international law did not exclude the defence of superior orders which is excluded by s.16 of the Act. There is thus a substantial and significant disconformity between the area in which the Act operates and the area occupied by the rules of international law by reference to which s.17(2) is formulated. And, as Deane J. points out, that disconformity extends to the period covered by the information. Moreover, as Brennan J. points out, to the extent that a defendant might wish to rely on a factual defence as permitted by s.17(2), he or she must be able to point to or call evidence before the defence can be raised.

24. The first and most unusual feature of the offence created by s.9 of the Act is that it is confined to past conduct and, it is common ground, to conduct which, at the time of its commission, was not subject to any law of this country. In particular, it was not then governed by the criminal law of this country and, thus, could not then form the basis of a criminal prosecution in this country.

25. Another unusual feature of the offence created by s.9 is that, at least to the extent involved in the information laid against the plaintiff, it is constituted by acts which are described in terms of particular legal categories rather than in terms assigning particular acts or omissions to some legal category.

6012

26. The proceedings contemplated by the Act for an offence against s.9 also have an unusual feature in that, to the extent that they are based on s.6(3), the assignment of conduct to a legal category involves the application of a body of law contrived for the proceedings. The first step in that process is dictated by s.6(1) which, as earlier indicated, requires that the law should have been in force when the act was done. The next step is directed by s.13(2) which relevantly provides that:

> "Where a person is charged with an offence against this Act, then, for the purposes of:
>
> ...
>
> (b) an exercise of jurisdiction by ... a court (of a State or internal Territory) in relation to the offence;
>
> ...
>
> this Act has effect, in relation to an act that is, or is alleged to be, the offence, as if:
>
> (e) a reference in subsection 6(3) or section 18 to a part of Australia were a reference to that State or Territory; and
>
> (f) without limiting subsection 6(2), all defences under the law in force in that State or Territory when the person is charged with the offence had been defences under the law in force in that State or Territory at the time of the act."

Section 18 provides for alternative verdicts. It need not be further considered.

27. In a prosecution based on s.6(3), the combined effect of s.6(1) and s.13(2) is to contrive a body of law to determine, not whether the offence of "war crime" was committed, but whether the acts constitute a "serious crime". That body of law is comprised of the law of the State or Territory in whose court the prosecution is brought as that law stood at the time of the acts alleged, but notionally amended to incorporate defences available when the charge was laid. Because it must be contrived for each prosecution, that body of law is necessarily variable. There is some rational basis for variation according to the time of the acts alleged. However, the contrived body of law may also vary according to the time when the charges are laid and according to the State or Territory in which the proceedings are brought.

28. The initial selection of the State or Territory in which proceedings are to be brought is for the prosecutor. However, s.14 of the Act allows for an application to be made for an order transferring the proceedings to another State or Territory. It is provided by s.14(3) that such an application must be made "as soon as reasonably practicable" after a charge is laid or "at such later time as the magistrate or judge allows". By s.14(4), the application must be granted unless the person charged is a resident of the State or Territory in which the proceedings were brought or is not a resident of the State or Territory to which the transfer is sought. Although s.14 makes residence the dominant factor in determining the State or Territory in which the matter is to be prosecuted, it stops short of an absolute requirement that a prosecution be brought in the State or Territory in which the defendant resides.

29. Apart from the convenience of the judge and, possibly, the lawyers involved, there is no obvious reason for the selection of the law of the State or Territory in whose court the proceedings are brought as the reference point for contriving a body of law to determine whether the acts charged constitute a "serious crime". And, at least where the conduct involved occurred outside Australia and, hence, outside that State or Territory, no reason is provided because, at least ordinarily, it will be where the defendant resides. The State or Territory in which he or she resides may be the result of chance or of the merest circumstance, and one might expect that its laws will have been framed without regard to the events in wartime Europe. To the extent that a body of law is contrived by reference to the law of some State or Territory other than that in which the defendant resides, that will often be the consequence of the initiative of the prosecutor, the inertia of the defendant, the discretion of the judge or a combination of one or more of those matters. Thus, to a significant extent, the body of law contrived to determine whether the acts involved in any particular case constitute a "serious crime" is not only variable, but results from circumstances which are either remote from or irrelevant to conduct which, as here and as contemplated by s.6(3), occurred outside Australia and is made the subject of s.9 of the Act.

30. One other feature of the proceedings contemplated by the Act should be mentioned. Section 13(4)(b) relevantly provides that "(n)othing in Part II or subsection 9(1) shall be taken to ... limit ... the powers of a court to take action to prevent an abuse of process." However, s.13 further provides:

> "(5) Where, on the trial of a person for an offence against this Act, the person satisfies the judge, on the balance of probabilities, that:
>
> (a) the person is unable to obtain evidence that he or she would, but for the lapse of time or some other reason beyond his or her control, have been able to obtain;
>
> (b) the person's inability to obtain that evidence has substantially prejudiced, or will substantially prejudice, the preparation or conduct of his or her defence; and
>
> (c) the interests of justice require the making of an order under this subsection;
>
> the judge may make such order as he or she thinks appropriate for a stay of proceedings for the offence.
>
> (6) Nothing in subsections (4) and (5) limits the generality of anything else in those subsections."

31. It was argued that s.13(5), not being within Pt II of the Act, must be taken as an exhaustive statement of the circumstances which will justify a stay of proceedings under the Act and, hence, a limitation upon the inherent power of a Court to control its own process.

32. The inherent power of a court to stay proceedings is a power which is closely confined: see Jago v. District Court (N.S.W.) (1989) 168 CLR 23. However, the power is an essential attribute of a superior court and exists for the purpose of ensuring that proceedings serve the ends of justice and are not themselves productive of or an instrument of injustice. See Cocker v. Tempest (1841) 7 M and W 502, at pp 503-504 (151 ER 864, at p 865). In my view, an intention to interfere with such an important and essential power must be revealed by unmistakable language before a provision of a statute will be construed as having that effect. See Cameron v. Cole (1944) 68 CLR 571, per Rich J. at p 589. And, in that event, a question might arise, at least in circumstances which would call for the exercise of that power, whether its curtailment or abrogation transformed the power purportedly vested in the court into something other than judicial power and, thus, brought the provision into conflict with Ch III. Notwithstanding that s.13(4), (5) and (6) are curious both in form and in substance, they do not, in my view, reveal an unmistakable intention to curtail or abrogate the inherent power of a court to stay its proceedings.

33. It was said in the Boilermakers' Case (at pp 270-271, 289) that s.71, being a complete and exhaustive statement with respect to the judicial power of the Commonwealth, requires that only judicial power and powers ancillary or incidental thereto be conferred on a court as named or indicated in s.71. The correctness of the principal conclusion of the Boilermakers' Case was doubted by Barwick C.J. and by Mason J. in Reg. v. Joske; Ex parte Australian Building Construction Employees and Builders' Labourers' Federation (1974) 130 CLR 87, at pp 90 and 102 respectively. However, it is not in doubt that s.71 imposes limits as to the powers which the Parliament may confer on a court. See Hilton v. Wells (1985) 157 CLR 57, at p 68 and at pp 81-82. See also Reg. v. Spicer; Ex parte Australian Builders' Labourers' Federation (1957) 100 CLR 277, at pp 290-291; Reg. v. Commonwealth Industrial Court; Ex parte The Amalgamated Engineering Union, Australian Section (1960) 103 CLR 368; and Mikasa (N.S.W.) Pty. Ltd. v. Festival Stores (1972) 127 CLR 617.

6014

34. An essential feature of judicial power is that it be exercised in accordance with the judicial process. I attempted to identify the features of that process in Harris v. Caladine (1991) 65 ALJR 280, at 307; (1991) 99 ALR 193, at p 239, and in Re Nolan; Ex parte Young (1991) 65 ALJR 486; 100 ALR 645. To adopt the words of Kitto J. in Reg. v. Trade Practices Tribunal; Ex parte Tasmanian Breweries Pty. Ltd. (1970) 123 CLR 361, at 374, the essential features of that process include the determination of legal rights, obligations or consequences by the ascertainment of the facts as they are and as they bear on the matter for determination, and the identification of the applicable law, followed by an application of that law to those facts. Those features may be more or less obvious, depending on the issues involved and the nature of the law to be applied. At one extreme, the law to be applied may require the assigning of future rights and obligations attaching to or in consequence of a legal relationship in the exercise of a judicial discretion in which no particular matter is decisive. At the other extreme, the law may assign distinct legal consequences by reason that a person has committed a particular proscribed act. Criminal laws are laws of the latter kind. But whatever the issues and whatever the nature of the law being applied, the power vested in a court can be exercised only on the basis of the discovered facts and by application of the law which determines the legal consequences attaching to those facts.

35. A power to be exercised by the application of law to facts invented by Parliament or invented according to some statutory formula or prescription would not be a power to be exercised in accordance with the judicial process and would not be judicial power. That is not to say that statutory fictions may not be employed in the course of and for the purpose of formulating the legal rights, obligations or consequences attaching to a relationship or to conduct. And, of course, they may be applied by the courts when those rights, obligations or consequences are in issue. However, the relationship or the conduct which is the basis of those rights, obligations or consequences must be real and not fictitious. A law assigning legal consequences on the basis of fictitious or invented facts may sometimes, on that account, be characterized as other than a law on a subject matter within legislative power. See Actors and Announcers Equity Association v. Fontana Films Pty. Ltd. (1982) 150 CLR 169. Quite apart from that consideration, a law conferring power on a court to determine legal consequences on the basis that a person is who he is not or on the basis that he did what he did not would be invalid for offending Ch III. It would be invalid because the power in question would involve a travesty of the judicial process and would, thus, be a power which, by virtue of s.71, could not validly be conferred on a court.

36. Equally, it would be a travesty of the judicial process if, in proceedings to determine whether a person had committed an act proscribed by and punishable by law, the law proscribing and providing for punishment of that act were a law invented to fit the facts after they had become known. In that situation, the proceedings would not be directed to ascertaining guilt or innocence (which is the function of criminal proceedings and the exclusive function of the courts), but to ascertaining whether the Parliament had perfected its intention of declaring the act in question an act against the criminal law. That is what is involved if a criminal law is allowed to take effect from some time prior to its enactment. Of course, the position is different if the law re-enacts an earlier law which applied when the acts were committed. At least that is so to the extent that that earlier law has not been brought to bear on conduct falling or alleged to fall within it. In this regard, it is sufficient to state that, in my view, a law would not be a law re-enacting an earlier law if it purported to apply cumulatively upon it. And the position is different again in the case of a law which acts retrospectively upon civil rights, obligations or liabilities. The function of a court in civil proceedings is the determination of present rights, obligations or liabilities. In that context, a retrospective civil law is very much like a statutory fiction in that it is a convenient way of formulating laws which, by their application to the facts in issue, determine the nature and extent of those present rights, obligations or liabilities.

6015

37. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that it was decided in Kidman that it is within the power of the Parliament to pass a criminal law taking effect from some time prior to its enactment. Kidman concerned a provision creating the statutory offence of conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth.

38. It is now obvious, if it was not when Kidman was decided, that conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth constituted on offence at common law. Thus, the provision considered in Kidman merely re-enacted a law which applied at the earlier time. It was that feature which, in the judgment of Griffith C.J. (at p 436), served to signal that the provision was within legislative power. And Isaacs J., at p 442, expressed a similar consideration, namely, that the provision was not "ex post facto converting a lawful act into an unlawful act". However, the other Justices in that case proceeded on the basis or assumed without deciding (see Higgins J., at p 448) that the provision created a new offence constituted, so far as it operated during a period prior to its enactment, by acts which were not then proscribed by law.

39. As Deane J. points out in this case, the significance of Ch III was neither raised nor considered in Kidman. Accordingly, in my view, Kidman is authority only for what it actually decided, namely, that it is within the legislative power of the Parliament to create a statutory offence taking effect prior to its enactment if it merely gives statutory form to an earlier common law offence. However, if Kidman is authority for some wider proposition, then in my view, for the reasons given by Deane J., it should be re-examined. In particular, it does not rest upon a principle that has been carefully worked out in a succession of cases and, it is not a decision which, outside the present case, appears to have been acted upon. See The Commonwealth v. Hospital Contribution Fund (1982) 150 CLR 49, at pp 56-57.

40. The true nature of what is commonly called an "ex post facto law" or a "retroactive law" is revealed in the judgment of Powers J. in Kidman (at p 457) where his Honour described a law of that kind as "a law by which, after an act has been committed which was not punishable ... at the time it was committed, the person who committed it is declared to have been guilty of a crime and to be held liable to punishment". As is there made clear, it is the statute or the Act of the Parliament, and not the determination of a court, by which a person is declared to have been guilty. That is the usurpation (see Liyanage v. The Queen (1967) 1 AC 259, at p 289) of power which is exclusively judicial. See Huddart, Parker and Co. Proprietary Ltd. v. Moorehead (1909) 8 CLR 330, per Griffith C.J. at p 357, and per Isaacs J. at p 383; Alexander, per Griffith C.J. at p 442, and per Isaacs and Rich JJ. at pp 463, 465; Trade Practices Tribunal, per Kitto J. at p 374; and Re Tracey; Ex parte Ryan (1989) 166 CLR 518, per Deane J. at p 580.

41. The usurpation of judicial power by a law which declares a person guilty of an offence produces the consequence that the application of that law by a court would involve it in an exercise repugnant to the judicial process. It is repugnant to the judicial process because the determination of guilt or innocence is foreclosed by the law. The only issue is whether the person concerned was a person declared guilty by the law. And all that involves is the determination, as a matter of fact, whether some person is the person, or answers the description (whatever form it takes) of the persons, declared guilty by the Act. It does not involve, and indeed negates, that which is the essence of judicial power in a criminal proceeding, namely, the determination of guilt or innocence by the application of the law to the facts as found. Accordingly, such a law is invalid as infringing s.71 because it involves the exercise by Parliament of a power which can be exercised only by the courts named or indicated in s.71 and because its application by a court would involve it in exercising a power repugnant to the judicial process. If Kidman holds otherwise, it should no longer be followed.

6016

42. It remains to be considered whether, in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff, s.9 is invalid by reason that it offends Ch III. I have already indicated that, in my view, a law which merely re-enacts a law which applied to acts at the time of their commission, provided that that earlier law has not already been brought to bear on those acts, would not come into conflict with Ch III. And I see no reason why, assuming it to be a law with respect to a subject matter entrusted to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the Parliament might not re-enact the common law, the law of a State or of a Territory or reproduce the law of some foreign country or a rule of international law. However, validity would depend on the faithful re-enactment or reproduction of that law and, should an issue arise, it would be for the Commonwealth to establish - by evidence if necessary - that its law faithfully re-enacted or reproduced the earlier law. See Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth (1951) 83 CLR 1, per Dixon J. at pp 200-202, per Williams J. at pp 222-223, per Webb J. at p 244, and per Fullagar J. at pp 261-262.

43. It was not suggested that the Act is a re-enactment or a reproduction of an earlier law, save to the extent that the defendants pointed to the rules of international law with respect to war crimes and crimes against humanity. As already indicated, the Act is not confined to the area of operation of those rules as they stood from time to time in the period 1 September 1939 to 8 May 1945 and by reference to which the defence allowed by s.17(2) is formulated. Accordingly, it is not a faithful reproduction of those rules.

44. Moreover, despite the complexity of ss.6(3) and 13 and the way in which they are formulated, the proceedings contemplated by the Act do not involve the application of law to facts as found to determine their legal consequence. Rather, the complexity and the contrived nature of those provisions indicate that what is involved is the application of a formula which, in essence, directs an enquiry whether the person charged did acts outside Australia which, if done within Australia, would have amounted to an offence in Australia if the law had then been the same as that contrived for the proceedings. That task is not altered by reason that the Act allows a "defence" which, as already indicated, differs from the rules of international law by reference to which it is formulated. The "defence" is merely part of the formula providing a description of the persons whom the Act declares to be guilty. And, thus, the task involved in the proceedings contemplated by the Act is no more than that of ascertaining, as a matter of fact, whether a person charged under the Act fits that description. Were that task to be divorced from the consequence which ss.9 and 10 seek to attach, it might properly be conferred on a Royal Commission of Inquiry or some similar body possessed of investigative powers. However, whether divorced from or attached to that consequence, it cannot be conferred on a court named or indicated in s.71 of the Constitution for the simple reason that the process involved is one that denies an essential feature of the judicial process, namely, the application of law to facts to determine their legal consequence.

6017

45. It makes no difference to the validity of s.9, in its application to the information laid against the plaintiff, that jurisdiction is also conferred on the courts of the internal Territories. Although the courts of the Territories are in a somewhat different position from the courts named and indicated in s.71 (see Capital T.V. and Appliances Pty. Ltd. v. Falconer (1971) 125 CLR 591 and Hilton v. Wells, at pp 67-68), s.9 is, in any event, invalid by reason that it involves the usurpation of a power which can be exercised only by a court in accordance with the judicial process.

46. The question referred pursuant to s.18 of the Judiciary Act should be answered "Yes".

JUDGE7

McHUGH J. The question reserved for consideration of the Full Court in this case is whether s.9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth) as amended ("the Act") is invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff. In my opinion that question should be answered in the negative.

2. The facts and contentions of the parties are set out in other judgments. Except for the purpose of explaining my reasons, I shall not repeat them.

3. Upon its proper construction, the Act applies to conduct which constitutes a war crime (within the meaning of the Act) whether that conduct occurred inside or outside Australia. The terms of s.6(1) of the Act when read with s.7(1)(c) or (d) or s.7(3) and the terms of s.6(3) when read with s.7 make it clear that s.9(1) applies to a person who committed an act constituting a war crime whether that act occurred inside or outside Australia. The most relevant provisions of the Act are as follows:

> "6.(1) An act is a serious crime if it was done in a part of Australia and was, under the law then in force in that part, an offence, being:
>
> (a) murder;
> (b) manslaughter;
> (c) causing grievous bodily harm;
> (d) wounding;
> (e) rape;
> (f) indecent assault;
> (g) abduction, or procuring, for immoral purposes;
> (h) an offence (in this paragraph called the 'variant offence') that would be referred to in a preceding paragraph if that paragraph contained a reference to:
> (i) a particular intention or state of mind on the offender's part; or > (ii) particular circumstances of aggravation;
> necessary to constitute the variant offence;
> (j) an offence whose elements are substantially the same as the elements of an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to (h), inclusive; or
> (k) an offence of:
> (i) attempting or conspiring to commit;
> (ii) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of; or > (iii) being, by act or omission, in any way, directly or indirectly, knowingly concerned in, or party to, the commission of;
> an offence referred to in any of paragraphs (a) to

6018

(j), inclusive.

(2) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) whether or not an act was, under the law in force at a particular time in a part of Australia, an offence of a particular kind, regard shall be had to any defence under that law that could have been established in a proceeding for the offence.

(3) An act is a serious crime if:

(a) it was done at a particular time outside Australia; and

(b) the law in force at that time in some part of Australia was such that the act would, had it been done at that time in that part, be a serious crime by virtue of subsection (1)."

Section 7 provides:

"(1) A serious crime is a war crime if it was committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war;

(b) in the course of an occupation;

(c) in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of a war or with an occupation; or

(d) on behalf of, or in the interests of, a power conducting a war or engaged in an occupation.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), a serious crime was not committed:

(a) in the course of hostilities in a war; or

(b) in the course of an occupation;

merely because the serious crime had with the hostilities or occupation a connection (whether in time, in time and place, or otherwise) that was only incidental or remote.

(3) A serious crime is a war crime if it was:

(a) committed:

(i) in the course of political, racial or religious persecution; or

(ii) with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group, as such; and

(b) committed in the territory of a country when the country was involved in a war or when territory of the country was subject to an occupation.

(4) Two or more serious crimes together constitute a war crime if:

(a) they are of the same or a similar character;

(b) they form, or are part of, a single transaction or event; and

(c) each of them is also a war crime by virtue of either or both of subsections (1) and (3)."

Section 9(1) provides:

"A person who:

(a) on or after 1 September 1939 and on or before 8 May 1945; and

(b) whether as an individual or as a member of an organisation;

committed a war crime is guilty of an indictable offence against this Act."

Section 16 provides:

"Subject to subsections 6(2) and 13(2), the fact that, in doing an act alleged to be an offence against this Act, a person acted under orders of his or her government or of a superior is not a defence in a proceeding for the offence, but may, if the person is convicted of the offence, be taken into account in determining the proper sentence."

Section 17 provides:

"(1) This section has effect for the purposes of a > proceeding for an offence against this Act.

> (2) Subject to section 16, it is a defence if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence:
> (a) was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and
> (b) was not under international law a crime against humanity.
> (3) To avoid doubt, the doing of the act by the defendant was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war if it was reasonably justified by the exigencies and necessities of the conduct of war.
> (4) The defendant is not entitled to rely on a defence under subsection (2) unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence.
> (5) However, if there is such evidence, the onus of establishing, beyond a reasonable doubt, that those facts either do not exist or do not constitute the defence lies on the prosecution."

4. The Commonwealth contended that s.6(1) was definitional and that the Act operated only in respect of conduct which occurred in Europe during the period 1 September 1939 and 8 May 1945. It is true that the first paragraph of the preamble, the definitions of "war" and "occupation", and the terms of ss.16 and 17 of the Act suggest that the Act was aimed only at those persons who committed war crimes in Europe during that period. But the terms of s.6(1) are too emphatic to be read down by these considerations. The words "(a)n act ... if it was done in a part of Australia" in that sub-section cannot be read as if they meant "an act done outside Australia". Moreover, the contrast between s.6(1), which makes an act of a certain kind a serious crime "if it was done in a part of Australia", and s.6(3), which makes an act of a certain kind a serious crime "if it was done at a particular time outside Australia", is explicable only on the ground that the Parliament of the Commonwealth intended that an act committed in Australia can constitute a war crime for the purposes of the Act. By s.11, however, only a person who is at the present time an Australian citizen or resident of Australia or an external Territory can be charged with an offence against the Act.

5. The Commonwealth also submitted that s.7 contained an implication that the conduct in question had to constitute a war crime or a crime against humanity under international law before it amounted to a war crime for the purposes of s.7. But nothing in the Act gives any support for that proposition. Indeed, the inference to be drawn from s.17 is to the contrary. That section makes it a defence "if the doing by the defendant of the act alleged to be the offence ... was permitted by the laws, customs and usages of war; and ... was not under international law a crime against humanity". The word "permitted" in this context is erroneous. As Baxter has pointed out, in "The Municipal and International Law Basis of Jurisdiction over War Crimes", (1951) XXVIII The British Year Book of International Law 382, at p 388:

> "The international law of war is 'prohibitive law' and its purpose is to place curbs upon the otherwise unrestrained violence of war. Belligerent acts in war are facts, not legal rights ..."

To make sense of the section, therefore, the words "permitted by" should be read as meaning "not in breach of". When the section is so read, it provides an answer to a charge under s.9(1) where the act of the defendant was not in breach of the laws, customs and usages of war and was not under international law a crime against humanity. Nevertheless, s.17(4) provides that the "defence" is not open "unless there is evidence of the existence of the facts constituting the defence". Unless there is such evidence, the prosecution is not required to prove that those facts do not exist or do not constitute such a "defence". It follows that a conviction under s.9(1) may ensue without proof that the act of the defendant was in breach of the laws, customs and usages of war (that is to say, was a "war crime" for the purposes of international law) or was under international law a crime against humanity. That being so, it is not a necessary element of a charge under s.9(1) that the act of the defendant was in breach of the laws, customs and usages of war or was under international law a crime against humanity. Neither s.7 nor any other provision of the Act can be read as containing any implication to the contrary.

6020

6. The constitutional validity of the Act, therefore, depends upon two questions:

(a) Did the Parliament have power in 1988 to punish an Australian resident or citizen for conduct falling within ss.6(3) and 7 of the Act when that conduct occurred outside Australia more than forty years previously?

(b) Did the Parliament have power in 1988 to punish an Australian resident or citizen for conduct falling within ss.6(1) and 7 of the Act when that conduct occurred in Australia more than forty years previously?

The external affairs power

7. In my opinion, in so far as the Act penalises conduct constituting a war crime which occurred outside Australia, the Act is validly enacted pursuant to the external affairs power. According to a substantial body of dicta, but no express decision, in this Court, s.51(xxix) of the Constitution authorises a law for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to any matter, thing or conduct occurring outside Australia: New South Wales v. The Commonwealth ("the Seas and Submerged Lands Case") (1975) 135 CLR 337, at pp 360, 471, 497, and cf. pp 503-504; Robinson v. Western Australian Museum (1977) 138 CLR 283, at p 294, and cf. pp 335, 343; Viro v. The Queen (1978) 141 CLR 88, at p 162; Koowarta v. Bjelke-Petersen (1982) 153 CLR 168, at pp 222-223. In the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, Jacobs J. said (at p 497) that, under the external affairs power, "the Commonwealth has the power to make laws in respect of any person or place outside and any matter or thing done or to be done or prohibited to be done outside the boundaries of the Commonwealth".

8. I can see no reason for giving the power conferred by s.51(xxix) any narrower interpretation than that expounded by Jacobs J. Subject to any express or implied limitations in the Constitution, a grant of power conferred by s.51 is to "be construed with all the generality which the words used admit": Reg. v. Public Vehicles Licensing Appeal Tribunal (Tas.); Ex parte Australian National Airways Pty. Ltd. (1964) 113 CLR 207, at p 225. The ordinary meaning of the word "external" is "outside". The meaning of the word "affairs" varies considerably according to its context. But it is a word which is capable of a very wide meaning. The Macquarie Dictionary, 2nd rev.ed. (1987), includes among the meanings of "affair":

> "1. anything done or to be done; that which requires action or effort; business; concern: ... 2. (pl.) matters of interest or concern; particular doings or interests: ... 3. an event or a performance; a particular action, operation, or proceeding: ... 4. thing; matter (applied to anything made or existing, with a descriptive or qualifying term): ... 5. a private or personal concern; a special function, business or duty".

9. Moreover, since the adoption of s.3 of the Statute of Westminster Act 1931 (Imp.) by the Statute of Westminster Adoption Act 1942 (Cth), no question can arise as to the extraterritorial operation of Commonwealth legislation. But, independently of the effect of that legislation, once a subject matter is found to be within the terms of s.51, the Commonwealth has, and always has had, power to give extraterritorial operation to a law on that subject matter: see Croft v. Dunphy (1933) AC 156, at p 163. The contrary view was based on a misconception: Reg. v. Foster; Ex parte Eastern and Australian Steamship Co. Ltd. (1959) 103 CLR 256, at p 300. In so far as the nature of any subject matter specified in s.51 is capable of being given an extraterritorial operation, therefore, the Commonwealth has the constitutional power to give it that operation. If the Parliament of the Commonwealth in exercising its powers under s.51 "were to legislate gratuitously in respect of foreign persons in foreign territory, ... an Australian court could not hold the legislation ... invalid": Reg. v. Foster, at p 306.

6021

10. Furthermore, the words "peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth" do not require that a law with respect to "external affairs" should be a law whose subject matter has some recognisable connection with Australia. Those words do not impose any limitation on the power conferred on the Parliament of the Commonwealth by s.51 of the Constitution. They do not require legislation to be held invalid because, in the opinion of the Court, the legislation does not promote or is not in fact for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth: Union Steamship Co. of Australia Pty. Ltd. v. King (1988) 166 CLR 1, at p 10. The words "peace, order, and good government" are a recognition of the fact that, for the purposes of constitutional theory, "the purpose and design of every law is to promote the welfare of the community": Harrison Moore, The Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia, 2nd ed. (1910), pp 274-275, cited in Reg. v. Foster, per Windeyer J. at p 308.

11. Accordingly, the term "external affairs" should be interpreted to include any matter, thing, event or relationship existing or arising or which might exist or arise outside Australia. Section 51(xxix) is not confined, therefore, to the making of laws authorising arrangements with other nations or implementing arrangements properly entered with other nations: see the Seas and Submerged Lands Case, at p 360. Nor is it confined to affairs which concern Australia's relations with other countries or affect Australia's standing in the community of nations or which have some recognisable connection with Australia. A law which punishes an Australian resident or citizen in respect of conduct occurring outside Australia is a law for the peace, order and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to "external affairs". Thus, in so far as the Act operates in respect of "war crimes" committed by Australian residents or citizens outside Australia, it would have been validly enacted under the external affairs power if it had been enacted on 1 September 1939. On that hypothesis, the Act would have operated prospectively to punish Australian citizens and residents in respect of conduct occurring outside Australia with respect to a war occurring in Europe. The critical question, however, is whether the retrospective operation of the Act means that it is not a law with respect to external affairs even though the Act punishes conduct which has occurred outside Australia.

12. In R. v. Kidman (1915) 20 CLR 425, this Court unanimously held that the Parliament of the Commonwealth had the power to deem a law, which made conspiracy to defraud the Commonwealth an offence, to have been in force from a date prior to the enactment of that law. A majority of the Court were of the opinion that the retrospective operation of the law was authorised by s.51(xxxix) of the Constitution, which provides that the Parliament has power to make laws with respect to:

> "Matters incidental to the execution of any power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal Judicature, or in any department or officer of the Commonwealth".

In Kidman, Higgins J. said (at p 453):

> "It is clear that pl.xxxix. of sec.51 was not meant to > limit, it was meant to increase, the powers of Parliament to make laws; and there is not one word, from first to last, to indicate an intention to withhold from the Federal Parliament the same absolute discretion as the British Parliament itself has, with regard to past events as well as present and future - provided that the Federal Parliament confine itself to the specified subjects and matters incidental to the execution of the legislative executive and judicial powers."

6022

13. The present Act punishes conduct which occurred outside Australia more than forty years before the enactment of the Act. For the reasons which I have given, however, s.51(xxix) of the Constitution vests in the Parliament the power to make a law with respect to such conduct. Upon the assumption that Kidman was correctly decided - a question with which I have to deal in determining whether the Act offends the provisions of Ch III of the Constitution - the retrospective operation of the Act was authorised by s.51(xxxix) of the Constitution since that operation was a matter "incidental to the execution of (a) power vested by this Constitution in the Parliament".

14. Accordingly, in my opinion, in so far as the Act punishes conduct occurring outside Australia at a time prior to the commencement of the Act, the Act is authorised by s.51(xxix) and (xxxix) of the Constitution.

15. In my opinion, the Act is also valid in so far as it punishes an Australian resident or citizen for an act "done in a part of Australia" which is a "serious crime" within the meaning of s.6(1) of the Act. Before a person can be punished under s.9(1) for such an act, the "serious crime" must be a "war crime" within the meaning of s.7 of the Act: see s.8(2), (3) and (4) and s.9(1). The terms of s.7 have already been set out.

16. Section 5 of the Act defines "occupation" to mean:

> "(a) an occupation of territory arising out of a war; or > (b) without limiting the generality of paragraph (a), an occupation of territory in Latvia, Lithuania or Estonia as a direct or indirect result of:
> (i) the agreement of 23 August 1939 between Germany and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; or > (ii) any protocol to that agreement".

That section also defines "war" to mean:

> "(a) a war, whether declared or not;
> (b) any other armed conflict between countries; or
> (c) a civil war or similar armed conflict;
> (whether or not involving Australia or a country allied or associated with Australia) in so far as it occurred in Europe in the period beginning on 1 September 1939 and ending on 8 May 1945."

Because of the definitions of "war" and "occupation", it is not possible for a person who has committed an act which is a serious crime within the meaning of s.6(1) to have committed a war crime within the meaning of s.7(1)(a) or (b). But a person who has committed an act which is a serious crime within the meaning of s.6(1) will have committed a "war crime" within the meaning of s.7(1)(c) or (d) if his or her act was done in pursuing a policy associated with the conduct of a war or occupation (as defined) or on behalf of or in the interests of a power conducting such a war or engaged in such an occupation. Moreover, since Australia was involved "in a war", it is theoretically possible for a person who committed an act in Australia to have done so in circumstances which make it a "war crime" by reason of s.7(3).

6023

17. It would be surprising if there is any person who has committed a war crime within the meaning of the Act by reason of an act done in Australia. However, the constitutional validity of s.9(1), in so far as it depends upon the combined operation of ss.6(1) and 7, has to be determined by reference to the terms of those provisions and not by reference to the likelihood of their operation in respect of acts committed in Australia.

18. The question, therefore, is whether a law which punishes an act committed in Australia in circumstances which make it a "war crime" by reason of s.7 is a valid enactment under the external affairs power.

19. In my opinion, the external affairs power extends to conduct engaged in in Australia for the purpose of carrying out some object external to Australia. Thus, a law which prohibits persons from doing any act or thing in Australia with intent to overthrow by force or violence a foreign government is a law with respect to external affairs: cf. s.24AA of the Crimes Act 1914 (Cth). Similarly, the external affairs power would support a law which prohibits persons from preparing in Australia for an incursion into a foreign State for the purpose of engaging in hostile activities: cf. s.7 of the Crimes (Foreign Incursions and Recruitment) Act 1978 (Cth). Although the acts which ss.6(1), 7 and 9(1) of the Act penalise were acts occurring within Australia, they were acts which were committed in the course of or for the purpose of events occurring outside Australia. Consequently, ss.6(1), 7 and 9(1), which punish such acts, were validly enacted under the external affairs power. For the reasons I have already given, the retrospective operation of these sub-sections does not take them outside the scope of the external affairs power.

Chapter III

20. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that, by reason of Ch III of the Constitution, the Parliament of the Commonwealth cannot "pass legislation requiring Federal Courts to act in a manner which is inconsistent with basic requirements of justice". In support of his contention that the Act infringed Ch III, he relied on its retroactive operation, the burden of proof of an accused under s.17(4), the nature of the proof required from an accused under s.17(2) and the effect of s.13(5) and (6) of the Act on the common law doctrine of abuse of process. Only the retroactive nature of the Act, however, raises any arguable question that the Act is invalid because of the provisions of Ch III of the Constitution.

21. Unless Kidman is overruled - and counsel for the plaintiff did not suggest that it should be - the decision in that case seems to me to be a complete answer to the suggestion that the retrospective operation of a law of the Parliament constitutes an infringement of Ch III of the Constitution. Kidman upheld the constitutional validity of a statute which retrospectively made it a criminal offence to conspire to defraud the Commonwealth. It is a direct authority on the point in issue in this case. It is true that the legislation in Kidman made it an offence to do what was already a common law offence. But, so far as the present case is concerned, that distinction is one without a difference. Like the present case, Kidman was concerned with the retrospective operation of a law of the Parliament which created a criminal offence.

22. The correctness of the decision in Kidman has not hitherto been doubted in any judgment of this Court. To the contrary, it has frequently been cited as an authority: see, for example, R. v. Snow (1917) 23 CLR 256, at p 265; Ex parte Walsh and Johnson; In re Yates (1925) 37 CLR 36, at pp 86, 124-125; Australian Communist Party v. The Commonwealth (1951) 83 CLR 1, at p 172; University of Wollongong v. Metwally (1984) 158 CLR 447, at p 484. In Ex parte Walsh and Johnson, Isaacs J. said (at p 81):

6024

> "Whatever the Parliament enacts with respect to any of the named subject matters for any period or point of time subsequent to the establishment of the Commonwealth is, subject to any prohibition or qualification in the Constitution itself or in any controlling Imperial law, binding throughout the Commonwealth and on certain British ships beyond the Commonwealth (secs.51 and 52 and covering sec.V). Such laws may be made prospectively or retrospectively, the Commonwealth Parliament having in this respect the power of the Imperial Parliament".

In Nelungaloo Pty. Ltd. v. The Commonwealth (1948) 75 CLR 495, Williams J. pointed out (at pp 503-504):

> "It is trite law that the powers conferred upon the Commonwealth Parliament by s.51 of the Constitution are plenary powers of legislation as large and of the same nature as those of the Imperial Parliament itself".

No one doubts the power of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to enact retrospective criminal laws. English law has rejected Hobbes' statement that:

> "No law, made after a fact done, can make it a crime ... For before the law, there is no transgression of the law."

(Leviathan, (1651), Chs 27-28, cited by Williams in Criminal Law: The General Part, 2nd ed. (1961), at p 580.) Even Blackstone, who was strongly critical of ex post facto laws, did not deny the power of Parliament to pass such laws: see Commentaries on the Laws of England, (1765), at p 46. Throughout the centuries, the Imperial Parliament has passed numerous laws, civil and criminal, having a retrospective operation.

23. Moreover, numerous Commonwealth statutes, most of them civil statutes, have been enacted on the assumption that the Parliament of the Commonwealth has power to pass laws having a retrospective operation. Since Kidman, the validity of their retrospective operation has not been challenged. And I can see no distinction between the retrospective operation of a civil enactment and a criminal enactment: see Kidman, per Isaacs J. at pp 442-443.

24. Notwithstanding this course of authority and practice, however, two members of the Court are of the opinion that the Parliament of the Commonwealth has no power to pass criminal laws which have a retrospective operation. They hold that such laws are an invalid exercise of judicial power. They point out that the effect of Ch III was not the issue in Kidman. In those circumstances, it seems proper to re-examine the question of the validity of retrospective criminal laws notwithstanding the course of authority in this Court, the accepted constitutional doctrine and the practice of successive Parliaments during the last seventy-five years in enacting such laws.

25. In my opinion, the enactment of laws having a retrospective operation does not infringe the constitutional guarantee that the judicial power of the Commonwealth can be exercised only by courts established and judges appointed in accordance with Ch III of the Constitution, and by such other courts as are invested with federal jurisdiction.

26. The Constitution of the United States of America expressly prohibits the passing of Bills of Attainder and ex post facto laws: Art.I, s.9, cl.3 and Art.I, s.10, cl.1. At common law, Bills of Attainder were special Acts under which the legislature inflicted capital punishments upon persons alleged to be guilty of treason and other felonies "without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings": Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, 5th ed. (1891), vol.II, at p 216. The sentence of death also meant that the person concerned was "attainted" which had the consequence, inter alia, that his or her goods and chattels and land and tenements held in fee or in tail for term of life were forfeited to the Crown: Lord Coke's First Institute, (1818), vol.3, at pp 567-568. Other special Acts inflicting lesser punishment than death were technically known as Bills of Pains and Penalties. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries Bills of Attainder and Bills of Pains and Penalties were passed on numerous occasions by the English Parliament, particularly "in times of rebellion, or of gross subserviency to the crown, or of violent political excitements": Story, at p 217. During the American Revolution, a number of such Bills were passed by the thirteen colonies: see United States v. Brown (1965) 381 US 437, at p 442.

6025

27. The Supreme Court of the United States has given the term "Bill of Attainder" in the U.S. Constitution a wide meaning. It extends to all "legislative acts, no matter what their form, that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial": United States v. Lovett (1946) 328 US 303, at p 315. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has construed the term "ex post facto Law" in the US Constitution narrowly so that it applies only to criminal and penal laws. In Calder v. Bull (1798) 3 US 386, Chase J. said (at p 391):

> "Every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective; but every retrospective law is not an ex post facto law: the former only are prohibited. Every law that takes away or impairs rights vested, agreeable to existing laws, is retrospective, and is generally unjust, and may be oppressive; and it is a good general rule, that a law should have no retrospect: but there are cases in which laws may justly, and for the benefit of the community, and also of individuals, relate to a time antecedent to their commencement; as statutes of oblivion or of pardon. They are certainly retrospective, and literally both concerning and after the facts committed. But I do not consider any law ex post facto, within the prohibition, that mollifies the rigor of the criminal law: but only those that create or aggravate the crime; or increase the punishment, or change the rules of evidence, for the purpose of conviction".

In Fletcher v. Peck (1810) 10 US 87, Marshall C.J. said (at p 138):

> "An ex post facto law is one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. Such a law may inflict penalties on the person, or may inflict pecuniary penalties which swell the public treasury."

In Johannessen v. United States (1912) 225 US 227, the Supreme Court said (at p 242):

> "It is, however, settled that this prohibition is confined to laws respecting criminal punishments, and has no relation to retrospective legislation of any other description."

28. The framers of our Constitution were much influenced by the model of the U.S. Constitution. They "felt the full fascination of its plan": Dixon, Jesting Pilate, (1965), at p 113. Yet, although Chs I, II and III reflect Arts I, II and III of the United States model, our Constitution does not prohibit Bills of Attainder or ex post facto laws. The omission must have been deliberate. It is a powerful indication that the Parliament was intended to have the power to enact ex post facto laws. Furthermore, I have not seen anything in the historical materials which would indicate that the framers of the Commonwealth Constitution believed or assumed that giving a criminal statute a retrospective operation was an exercise of, or an interference with the exercise of, judicial power. Inglis Clark later wrote that "any exposition of the purport of the language of an existing law, or any declaration of the existence of any rights or liabilities as the result of it enactment, is not an exercise of legislative power ... it is an attempted encroachment on the province of the Judiciary and is therefore invalid" (my emphasis): Studies in Australian Constitutional Law, (1901), at p 39. But he accepted that "(t)he Constitution does not prohibit the Parliament of the Commonwealth from making retroactive laws": ibid., at pp 39-40.

6026

29. A law which creates a criminal offence but operates retrospectively is not the same as a Bill of Attainder or a Bill of Pains and Penalties. Such Bills are an interference with the exercise of judicial power. Bills of Attainder and Bills of Pains and Penalties constitute a legislative punishment "of specifically designated persons or groups": United States v. Brown, at p 447. Such Bills are "legislative judgments; and an exercise of judicial power": Calder v. Bull, at p 388. I think that the enactment of a Bill of Attainder or a Bill of Pains and Penalties would infringe the provisions of ChIII of the Constitution. But the fact that the Constitution impliedly forbids the enactment of Bills of Attainder and Bills of Pains and Penalties does not mean that the Constitution prohibits the making of criminal laws having a retrospective operation. Retrospectivity is not itself sufficient to offend Ch III of the Constitution. I cannot accept the argument that the determination of guilt or innocence is foreclosed by a criminal law which has a retrospective operation. Under such a law, it is still the jury, and not the legislature, which determines what the facts of the case are and which applies the law, as determined by the judge, to those facts for the purpose of determining whether the accused is guilty or innocent of the charge against him or her. Such a law is not an exercise of, or an interference with the exercise of, judicial power.

30. Kidman was correctly decided.

31. The Act in question in this case is not a Bill of Attainder or a Bill of Pains and Penalties. It differs from an ordinary criminal statute only in the fact that it operates retrospectively and not prospectively. It does not select a specifically designated person or group and impose a punishment on that person or group. It does not make any determination of fact. It does not adjudge any person or group to be guilty of any offence. There is not a scintilla of difference between the roles of the judge and jury in a trial under this Act and the roles of the judge and jury in a trial under a hypothetical law, in substantially identical terms to this Act, passed on 1 September 1939 and operating prospectively. The only difference between the present Act and that hypothetical law would be that the present Act makes it a legislative offence to do what was not a legislative offence at the time when it was done. That is to say, the difference is that the present Act retrospectively, and not prospectively, imposes penal sanctions on prescribed conduct. The imposition of penal sanctions on prescribed conduct, however, is an exercise of legislative, not judicial, power. Accordingly, the present Act does not interfere in any way with the judicial process or with the judicial power of the Commonwealth.

Conclusion

32. The Act is a valid enactment under s.51(xxix) and (xxxix) of the Constitution. It does not infringe the provisions of Ch III.

33. I would answer the question asked in the negative.

ORDER

Answer the question reserved as follows:

Is section 9 of the War Crimes Act 1945 (Cth), as amended, invalid in its application to the information laid by the second defendant against the plaintiff?

6027

Answer: No.

No order as to costs.

ANNEX 13:

R v. Finta [1994] 1 SCR 701.

6029.

Her Majesty The Queen Appellant

v.

Imre Finta Respondent

and

Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, League for Human Rights of B'Nai Brith Canada,
Canadian Jewish Congress and InterAmicus Interveners

Indexed as: R. v. Finta

File Nos.: 23023, 23097.

1993: June 2, 3; 1994: March 24.

Present: Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Major JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Criminal law -- War crimes and crimes against humanity -- Nature and proof of offences -- Allegations arising from detention, robbery and deportation to concentration camps of Jewish persons in Nazi-controlled World War II Europe -- Defence of police officer following lawful orders -- Trial judge calling own evidence -- Whether war crimes and crimes against humanity separate crimes from included Criminal Code offences or whether Code provisions jurisdictional allowing Canadian courts to exercise jurisdiction in situations of war crimes or crimes against humanity over criminal activity occurring abroad -- Whether necessary for the jury to decide, beyond a reasonable doubt not only guilt under applicable Criminal Code charges but also whether acts war crimes and/or crimes against humanity -- Whether requisite mens rea for each offence requiring the Crown to prove intent to commit criminal offence and knowledge of factual characteristics of war crimes and/or crimes against humanity -- Whether "peace officer defence" available and nature of that defence -- Whether trial judge's instructions to the jury adequately overcoming prejudice caused by defence counsel's inflammatory and improper jury address --

6030

Whether police statement and deposition of deceased person admissible even though within recognized exception to the hearsay rule -- Whether trial judge properly calling own evidence -- Whether trial judge's instructions to the jury relating to the Crown's identification evidence appropriate -- Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, ss. 6(2), 7(3.71)(a)(i), (ii), (iii), (b), (3.72), (3.74), (3.76), 15, 25(1), (2), (3), (4), 736.

page 702

Constitutional law -- Charter of Rights -- War crimes and crimes against humanity -- Nature and proof of offences -- Allegations arising from detention, robbery and deportation to concentration camps of Jewish persons in Nazi-controlled World War II Europe -- Defence of police officer following lawful orders -- Whether infringement of principles of fundamental justice (s. 7), the right to be informed without unreasonable delay of the specific offence (s. 11(a)), the right to trial within a reasonable time (s. 11(b)), the right to be presumed innocent (s. 11(d)), the requirement that an act or omission constitute an offence (s. 11(g)), the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment (s. 12) or the equality guarantees (s. 15) -- If so, whether infringement justified under s. 1 -- Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 11(a), (b), (d), (g), 12, 15.

Respondent, a legally trained captain in the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie, was commander of an investigative unit at Szeged when 8,617 Jewish persons were detained in a brickyard, forcibly stripped of their valuables and deported under dreadful conditions to concentration camps as part of the Nazi regime's "final solution". The only authority for implementing this barbarous policy in Hungary was the Baky Order, a decree of the Hungarian Ministry of the Interior directed to a number of officials including the commanding officers of the gendarme (investigative) subdivisions. This order placed responsibility for executing the plan on the Gendarmerie and certain local police forces.

Respondent was charged under the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, with unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter of the victims of Szeged. There were in effect four pairs of alternate counts -- one series as crimes against humanity and the other as war crimes. After the war a Hungarian court tried respondent in absentia and convicted him of "crimes against the people". His punishment in that country became statute-barred and he later benefitted from a general amnesty. The Hungarian trial and conviction were found to be nullities under Canadian law and the amnesty was found not to be a pardon. The pleas of autrefois convict or pardon were therefore not available. Expert opinion at trial was that the Baky Order was manifestly illegal and that a person trained in Hungarian law would have known so.

page 703

The Crown's case depended in large measure on the testimony of 19 witnesses who had been interned at Szeged and deported to the concentration camps. The evidence of these survivors fell into four general groups. Six witnesses who knew respondent before the events in issue testified as to things said and done by him at the brickyard and at the train station. A second group consisting of three witnesses who did not know respondent beforehand identified him as having said or done certain things at the brickyard and at the station. A third group consisting of three witnesses who did not know respondent beforehand also testified as to things said and done at the brickyard and at the station. However, this last group based their identification of respondent on statements made to them by others. The fourth group, consisting of eight witnesses who did not know respondent beforehand and did not identify him, gave evidence as to events at the brickyard and the train station. In addition to the evidence of the survivors, the Crown relied on photographs, handwriting and fingerprint evidence to identify respondent as a captain in the Gendarmerie at Szeged at the relevant time. Expert and documentary evidence was tendered to establish the historical context of the evidence, the relevant command structure in place in Hungary in 1944 and the state of international law in 1944.

603 1

During the trial, the trial judge, on behalf of the defence, called the evidence of two eye-witnesses, Ballo and Kemeny. The statement and minutes of a third witness, Dallos, whose testimony was given at respondent's Hungarian trial, was also admitted. Dallos, a survivor of the brickyard who died in 1963, gave evidence of the existence of a lieutenant who might have been in charge of the confinement and deportation of the Jews at the brickyard. The trial judge ruled that, although the evidence was of a hearsay nature, it was admissible. He also stated that, together with other evidence, it could leave the jury with a reasonable doubt about the responsibility of respondent for confinement and brickyard conditions. The trial judge warned the jury in his charge about the hearsay nature of the evidence.

page 704

Respondent was acquitted at trial and a majority of the Court of Appeal dismissed the Crown's appeal from that acquittal. This judgment was appealed and cross-appealed.

Several issues were raised on appeal. Firstly, was s. 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code merely jurisdictional in nature or did it create two new offences, a crime against humanity and a war crime, and define the essential elements of the offences charged such that it was necessary for the jury to decide, beyond a reasonable doubt, not only whether the respondent was guilty of the 1927 Criminal Code offences charged, but also whether his acts constituted crimes against humanity and/or war crimes as defined in ss. 7(3.71) and 7(3.76)? Secondly, did the trial judge misdirect the jury as to the requisite mens rea for each offence by requiring the Crown to prove not only that the respondent intended to commit the 1927 Criminal Code offences charged, but also that he knew that his acts constituted war crimes and/or crimes against humanity as defined in s. 7(3.76)? Thirdly, did the trial judge err in putting the "peace officer defence" (s. 25 of the Code), the "military orders defence" and the issue of mistake of fact to the jury and did he misdirect the jury in the manner in which he defined those defences? Fourthly, did the trial judge's instructions to the jury adequately correct defence counsel's inflammatory and improper jury address so as to overcome the prejudice to the Crown and not deprive it of a fair trial? Fifth, was the Dallos "evidence" (police statement and deposition) admissible and, in particular, in finding it admissible even though it did not fall within any of the recognized exceptions to the hearsay rule? Sixth, did the trial judge err calling the Dallos evidence and the videotaped commission evidence as his own evidence, thereby making it unnecessary for the defence to do so and as a result depriving the Crown of its statutory right to address the jury last, and if so, did it result in a substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice? Seventh, were the trial judge's instructions to the jury relating to the Crown's identification evidence appropriate.

page 705

6032

The constitutional questions stated on the cross-appeal queried whether s. 7(3.74) and s. 7(3 of the Code violate ss. 7 (the principles of fundamental justice), 11(a) (the right to be informed without unreasonable delay of the specific offence), 11(b) (the right to trial within a reasonable time), 11(d) (the right to be presumed innocent), 11(g) (the requirement that an act or omission constitute an offence), 12 (the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment) or 15 (the equality guarantees) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and if so, whether they were justifiable under s. 1.

Held (La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Held: The cross-appeal should be dismissed. Sections 7(3.74) and 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code do not violate ss. 7, 11(a), (b), (d), (g), 12 or 15 of the Charter.

Per Gonthier, Cory and Major JJ.:

The Appeal

Jurisdiction

Canadian courts have jurisdiction to try individuals living in Canada for crimes which they allegedly committed on foreign soil only when the conditions specified in s. 7(3.71) are satisfied. The most important of those requirements, for the purposes of the present case, is that the alleged crime must constitute a war crime or a crime against humanity. It is thus the nature of the act committed that is of crucial importance in the determination of jurisdiction. Canadian courts may not prosecute an ordinary offence that has occurred in a foreign jurisdiction. The only reason Canadian courts can prosecute these individuals is because the acts alleged to have been committed are viewed as being war crimes or crimes against humanity. A war crime or a crime against humanity is not the same as a domestic offence. There are fundamentally important additional elements involved in a war crime or a crime against humanity.

The Requisite Elements of the Crime Described by Section 7(3.71)

Canadian courts normally do not judge ordinary offences that have occurred on foreign soil but have jurisdiction to try individuals living in Canada for crimes which they allegedly committed abroad when the conditions specified in s. 7(3.71) are satisfied. Here, the most important of those requirements is that the alleged crime must constitute a war crime or a crime against humanity which, compared to a domestic offence, has fundamentally important additional elements. It is thus the nature of the act committed that is of crucial importance in the determination of jurisdiction.

page 706

In order to constitute a crime against humanity or a war crime, there must be an element of subjective knowledge on the part of the accused of the factual conditions which render the actions a crime against humanity. The mental element of a crime against humanity must involve an awareness of the facts or circumstances which would bring the acts within the definition of a crime against humanity. It is not necessary, however, to establish that the accused knew that his or her actions were inhumane. Similarly, for war crimes, the Crown would have to establish that the accused knew or was aware of the facts or circumstances that brought his or her actions within definition of a war crime. The accused would have to have known that a state of war existed and that his or her actions even in a state of war, would shock the conscience of all right thinking people. Alternatively, the mens rea requirement of both crimes against humanity and war crimes would be met if it were established that the accused was wilfully blind to the facts or circumstances that would bring his or her actions within the provisions of these offences.

6033

The wording of the section, the stigma and consequences that would flow from a conviction all indicate that the Crown must establish that the accused committed a war crime or a crime against humanity. This is an integral and essential aspect of the offence. It is not sufficient simply to prove that the offence committed in Canada would constitute robbery, forcible confinement or manslaughter. An added element of inhumanity must be demonstrated to warrant a conviction under this section. The mental element required to be proven to constitute a crime against humanity is that the accused was aware of or wilfully blind to facts or circumstances which would bring his or her acts within the definition of a crime against humanity. However it would not be necessary to establish that the accused knew that his or her actions were inhumane. It is sufficient if the Crown establishes that the actions viewed by a reasonable person in the position of the accused were inhumane.

page 707

Similarly for war crimes the Crown would have to establish that the accused knew or was aware of facts that brought his or her action within the definition of war crimes, or was wilfully blind to those facts. It would not be necessary to prove that the accused actually knew that his or her acts constituted war crimes. It is sufficient if the Crown establishes that the acts, viewed objectively, constituted war crimes.

The Defences

The defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer defence are available to members of the military or police forces in prosecutions for war crimes and crimes against humanity. Those defences are subject to the manifest illegality test: the defences are not available where the orders in question were manifestly unlawful. Even where the orders were manifestly unlawful, the defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer defence will be available in those circumstances where the accused had no moral choice as to whether to follow the orders. There can be no moral choice where there was such an air of compulsion and threat to the accused that he or she had no alternative but to obey the orders.

Trial Judge's Calling Evidence

The trial judge, in order to take the unusual and serious step of the court's calling witnesses, must believe it essential to exercise his or her discretion to do so in order to do justice in the case. Here, where the trial judge had decided that certain evidence was essential to the narrative, it was a reasonable and proper exercise of this discretion to call the evidence if the Crown refused to do so. It is essential in a case where the events took place 45 years ago that all material evidence be put before the jury. With the passage of time it becomes increasingly difficult to get at the truth of events: witnesses die or cannot be located, memories fade, and evidence can be so easily forever lost. It is then essential that in such a case all available accounts are placed before the court. The argument that all cases pose difficulties in presenting a defence fails to recognize that this case, because of the time elapsed, presents very real difficulties for the defence in getting at the truth which is not comparable to other cases.

6034

page 708

The trial judge properly took into account the fact that if he did not call the evidence the defence would be required to do so and as a result lose its right to address the jury last. Where the trial judge has found that the evidence in question should have been called by the Crown, the issue of who addresses the jury last is indeed relevant. If this were not so it would be open to the Crown not to call certain evidence in order to force the defence to give up its right to address the jury last. (The Crown here did not act for improper reasons.) The opportunity for such abuse should not be left open. Further, the trial judge's concern for the order of addresses to the jury was secondary to his finding that the evidence was essential to the narrative.

Finally, the trial judge did not need to wait until after the defence had decided whether or not to call evidence before he called the evidence in question. The trial judge could not wait until the defence had finished its case without risking offending the rule that a trial judge should not call evidence him- or herself after the close of the defence case unless the matter was unforeseeable. If the trial judge had waited, and the defence had elected not to call evidence, the trial judge would have been prevented from calling the evidence at that time, as the matter was readily foreseeable, and calling it at that point would have been prejudicial to the defence.

The Cross-Appeal

Does Section 7(3.74) and (3.76) of the Criminal Code Violate Section 7 of the Charter Because these Purport to Remove the Protection of Section 15 of the Criminal Code?

Respondent, even though he acted in obedience to the law (the Baky Order), could not argue that he had an honest but mistaken belief that that decree was lawful so as to absolve him of fault. He still had the guilty mind required to found a conviction. Section 7(3.74) does not, by permitting the removal of this defence, result in a breach of fundamental justice in violation of s. 7 of the Charter. When the Criminal Code provides that a defence is to be expressly excluded it is because Parliament has determined that the criminal act is of such a nature that not only is the disapprobation of society warranted, but also the act cannot be justified by the excluded defence. Such a legislative provision will not generally violate s. 7 when a defence is inconsistent with the offence proscribed in that it would excuse the very evil which the offence seeks to prohibit or punish.

page 709

Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate the Charter by Reason of Vagueness?

International law prior to 1944 provided fair notice to the accused of the consequences of breaching the still evolving international law offences. The legislation is not made uncertain merely because the entire body of international law is not codified and that reference must be made to opinions of experts and legal writing in interpreting it. Differences of opinion of international law experts as to these provisions and the questions of fact and law that arise in interpreting and applying them do not render them vague or uncertain. It is the court that must ultimately interpret them.

6035

Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate Section 7 and Section 11(g) of the Charter?

Although the average citizen is not expected to know in detail the law with respect to a war crime or a crime against humanity, it cannot be argued that he or she had not substantive fair notice of it or that it is vague. Everyone has an inherent knowledge that such actions are wrong and cannot be tolerated whether this perception arises from a moral, religious or sociological stance. These crimes, which violate fundamental human values, are vehemently condemned by the citizens of all civilized nations and are so repulsive, reprehensible and well understood that the argument that their definition is vague or uncertain does not arise. Similarly, the definitions of "war crimes" and "crimes against humanity" do not constitute a standardless sweep authorizing imprisonment. The standards which guide the determination and definition of crimes against humanity are the values that are known to all people and shared by all.

The impugned sections do not violate ss. 7 and 11(g) of the Charter because of any allegedly retrospective character. The rules created by the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and applied by the Nuremberg Trial represented "a new law". The rule against retroactive legislation is a principle of justice. A retroactive law providing individual punishment for acts which were illegal though not criminal at the time they were committed, however, is an exception to the rule against ex post facto laws. Individual criminal responsibility represents certainly a higher degree of justice than collective responsibility. Since the internationally illegal acts for which individual criminal responsibility has been established were also morally the most objectionable and the persons who committed them were certainly aware of their immoral character, the retroactivity of the law applied to them cannot be considered as incompatible with justice. Justice required the punishment of those committing such acts in spite of the fact that under positive law they were not punishable at the time they were performed. It follows that it was appropriate that the acts were made punishable with retroactive force.

page 710

Did the Pre- and Post-Charge Delay Violate Sections 7, 11(b) and 11(d) of the Charter?

The pre- and post-charge delay does not violate the Charter principles of fundamental justice (s. 7), the right to trial without unreasonable delay (s. 11(b)) and the right to be presumed innocent (s. 11(d)). The principles set out in R. v. Askov accordingly need not be extended to the situation here. Indeed, the delay was far more likely to be prejudicial to the Crown's case than it was to that of the defence. The documentary and physical evidence not available to the defence was probably destroyed during the war and therefore would not have been available for trial even if held a few years after the war. With regard to post-charge delay, the indictment was preferred less than a year after the legislation was proclaimed. This was a minimal and very reasonable period of delay.

Do the Impugned Sections of the Code Violate Sections 7 and 15 of the Charter?

The impugned sections do not infringe the equality provisions of s. 15 of the Charter. The fact that the legislation relates only to acts or omissions performed by individuals outside Canada is not based on a personal characteristic but on the location of the crime. The group of persons who commit a war crime or a crime against humanity outside of Canada cannot be considered to be discrete and insular minority which has suffered stereotyping, historical disadvantage or vulnerability to political and social prejudice. Similarly, these sections, notwithstanding the allegation that they allegedly subject the individual to prosecution based on an extension of jurisdiction for crimes for which the people of Canada are not criminally liable, are not contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.

6036

page 711

Do the Impugned Provisions Violate Section 12 of the Charter?

No argument was made with respect to s. 12 (cruel and unusual punishment) of the Charter. It was not necessary to consider the application of s. 1.

Per Lamer C.J.: The appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Cory J. The cross-appeal should be dismissed as being moot.

Per La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ. (dissenting [1]): Section 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code confers jurisdiction on Canadian courts to prosecute foreign acts amounting to war crimes or crimes against humanity domestically, according to Canadian criminal law in force at the time of their commission. The provision does not create any new offences. The person who commits the relevant act is not declared guilty of an offence as in all other criminal offences. On the contrary, the nucleus of the provision is its predicate, "shall be deemed to commit that act or omission in Canada at that time". Moreover, no penalty is stipulated. A finding of war crime or crime against humanity does not result in punishment but rather merely opens the door to the next procedural step -- the placing before the jury of the charges against the accused for offences defined in the Code in respect of acts done outside the country, so long as those acts constitute crimes against humanity or war crimes.
The war crimes and crimes against humanity provision stands as an exception to the general rule regarding the territorial ambit of criminal law. Parliament intended to extend the arm of Canada's criminal law in order to be in a position to prosecute these extraterritorial acts if the alleged perpetrators were discovered here. Although exceptions to s. 6 (which limits the Code's application to Canada) can also take the form of offence-creating provisions that expressly embrace extraterritorial acts, the wording of s. 7(3.71) closely resembles that of other purely jurisdiction-endowing provisions and can be contrasted with these offence-creating provisions. Had Parliament wished specifically to make war crimes and crimes against humanity domestic offences, it would have been much easier to do so directly.

page 712

No distinction should be made between territorial jurisdiction of the court (going to the determination of the proper Canadian court to hear a case) and territorial reach of the criminal law (affecting the definition of the offences themselves). Section 6(2) of the Code does not render Canadian territoriality a defining element of its offences. Rather, it merely precludes a person's conviction or discharge for an offence when committed outside Canada in response to the structure of international order which entrusts prosecution of a criminal act to the state in which that act was committed. The fact that an act or an omission may have taken place outside Canada's borders does not negate its quality as culpable conduct.

6037

Questions of jurisdiction are matters of law entrusted to the trial judge. The terms of s. 6 are absolute; they specifically envision exceptions, whether in the Code itself or in other Acts of Parliament. Deciding questions of jurisdiction has been found to be properly entrusted to the trial judge in other circumstances in R. v. Balcombe and no reason exists for a different rule to apply to the s. 6 inquiry. Whether the criteria in s. 7(3.71), (whether the act amounts to a war crime or crime against humanity, whether it constituted an offence pursuant to Canadian law at the time of commission, and whether identifiable individuals were involved) creating the exception to s. 6 have been met is a question of law entrusted to the trial judge and not to the jury. If these requirements are not satisfied, the exception to the rule of no extraterritorial application is not met, and the court must decline jurisdiction and acquit the accused even if all the elements of the offences of manslaughter, robbery, confinement or assault may be satisfied.

The jury's role will be similar to that exercised in an ordinary prosecution under our domestic law. Its function, and the charge made to it, will be like those that would be made to a jury determining the underlying offence only. The sole difference will be in relation to justifications, excuses and defences. Section 7(3.73) provides the accused with the benefit of pleading all available international justifications, excuses and defences in addition to those existing under domestic law. The one domestic defence made unavailable, by the operation of s. 7(3.74), is the defence of obedience to de facto law.

page 713

The requirements for jurisdiction need not be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial judge, however, must consider the evidence to satisfy the jurisdiction requirements and not simply base his or her assessment of these requirements on the charges as alleged. Because some of the facts necessary to establish jurisdiction are not the same as those necessary for the jury's determination of the underlying offence, all the findings of fact cannot be left to the jury. Here, since the jury will have to hear much of the same evidence related to the offences as the trial judge would have to hear in relation to the jurisdiction issue, it will usually be more efficient to have the trial judge consider the jurisdiction issue at the same time as the jury hears the evidence related to the offence. If desired, and to keep a jury's mind clear, the parts of the evidence or expert testimony that are completely irrelevant to the jury's concerns can be heard in the jury's absence. At the close of the evidence, the judge will decide whether the conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction have been met. If so, then the court can proceed to hear the jury's verdict.

War crimes and crimes against humanity do not require an excessively high mens rea going beyond that required for the underlying offence. In determining the mens rea of a war crime or a crime against humanity, the accused must have intended the factual quality of the offence. In almost if not every case, the domestic definition of the underlying offence will capture the requisite mens rea for the war crime or crime against humanity as well. Thus, the accused need not have known that his or her act, if it constitutes manslaughter or forcible confinement, amounted to an "inhumane act" either in the legal or moral sense. One who intentionally or knowingly commits manslaughter or kidnapping would have demonstrated the mental culpability required for an inhumane act. The normal mens rea for confinement, robbery, manslaughter, or kidnapping, whether it be intention, knowledge, recklessness or wilful blindness, is adequate.

The additional conditions of the actus reus requirement under international law are intended to be used to ascertain whether the factual conditions are such that the international relations concerns of extraterritorial limits do not arise. Since in almost if not every case the mens rea for the war crime or crime against humanity will be captured by the mens rea required for the underlying offence that will have to be proved to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, the trial judge will rarely, if ever, have to make any additional findings in relation to the mens rea to satisfy the jurisdiction requirements.

6038

page 714

If a justification, excuse or defence that would have been available had the accused been charged with the crime under international law rather than the underlying crime is available, it should be referred to the jury with appropriate instructions whether the issue arises on the evidence presented by the Crown or the accused. Under s. 7(3.73) of the Code, an accused may rely on any "justification, excuse or defence available . . . under international law" as well as under the laws of Canada. The jury would then have to decide the issue with any reasonable doubt decided in favour of the accused.

The scheme in s. 7(3.71)-(3.77) does not deprive the accused of his or her rights in a manner inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice. The accused cannot be found guilty of the offence charged (the underlying domestic offence) unless the jury finds the relevant mental element on proof beyond a reasonable doubt. This mental element coincides with that of the war crime or crime against humanity. And if any excuse, justification or defence for the act arises under international law, the accused is entitled to the benefit of any doubt about the matter, including any relevant mens rea attached to such excuse, justification or defence. Charter jurisprudence relating to fundamental justice does not require, merely because a special stigma might attach to certain offences, that only the jury be entrusted with finding mens rea and only on a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Any stigma attached to being convicted under war crimes legislation does not come from the nature of the offence, but more from the surrounding circumstances of most war crimes and often is a question of the scale of the acts in terms of numbers.

Under the jurisdictional portion of s. 7(3.71), the inquiry goes to assessing whether Canadian courts are able to convict or discharge the perpetrator of the relevant conduct. The preliminary question, whether the relevant conduct constitutes a situation evaluated by the international community to constitute one warranting treatment exceptional to the general precepts of international law, involves an assessment of Canada's international obligations and other questions concerning the interrelationship of nations. The culpability of the acts targeted by this provision, from Canada's perspective, arises from, and will be assessed according to Canadian standards of offensive behaviour as embodied in the Code. The preliminary question of war crimes or crimes against humanity is more of a political inquiry than one of culpability and accordingly does not traditionally fall within the province of the jury. The international community actively encourages the prosecution of those whose criminal conduct also constitutes war crimes or crimes against humanity.

page 715

It is not unfair or contrary to our philosophy of trial by jury to entrust determination of jurisdiction to the trial judge rather than the jury. The assignment of this task is just and well-designed given the technical nature of the actual factual findings that must be made by the trial judge on the preliminary jurisdictional question, as well as the complicated nature of the international law with which he or she must grapple. The technical nature of these inquiries, unrelated as they are to matters of culpability, do not form part of the special capacity of the jury.

6039

The jury's role in the prosecution remains extensive. As in any other domestic prosecution, the jury is the sole arbitrator of whether both the actus reus and the mens rea for the offence charged are present and whether any domestic defences are available. Moreover, in addition to its normal functions, the jury also decides whether any international justification, excuse or defence is available. These determinations are not merely technical findings to supplement the extensive role of the trial judge; on the contrary, they go to the essence of the accused's culpability. The jury alone decides whether the accused is physically and mentally guilty of the offence charged, on proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The only element removed from the jury's usual scope of considerations in regular domestic prosecutions is the de facto law defence (s. 7(3.74)).

Section 7(3.74) does not violate the s. 7 of the Charter by removing available defences. Subsections 7(3.73) and (3.74) qualify each other and together indicate that the accused has the benefit of all available international and domestic justifications, excuses or defences. The operation of s. 7(3.73) only rules out resort to the simple argument that, because a domestic law existed, the conduct was authorized and so excused. The whole rationale for limits on individual responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity is that there are higher responsibilities than simple observance of national law. That a law of a country authorizes some sort of clearly inhumane conduct cannot be allowed to be a defence.

page 716

The peace officer and the military orders defences put to the jury here exist under Canadian domestic law and relate to arguments based on authorization or obedience to national law. The rationale for these defences is that a realistic assessment of police or military organizations requires an element of simple obedience; there must be some degree of accommodation to those who are members of such bodies. At the same time, totally unthinking loyalty cannot be a shield for any human being, even a soldier. The defence is not simply based on the idea of obedience or authority of de facto national law, but rather on a consideration of the individual's responsibilities as part of a military or peace officer unit. Essentially obedience to a superior order provides a valid defence unless the act is so outrageous as to be manifestly unlawful. Further, an accused will not be convicted of an act committed pursuant to an order wherein he or she had no moral choice but to obey.

The war crime provisions do not violate ss. 7 and 11(g) of the Charter because they are retroactive. The accused is not being charged or punished for an international offence, but a Canadian criminal offence that was in the Code when it occurred.

International law in this area was neither retroactive nor vague. Even on the basis of international convention and customary law, there are many individual documents that signalled the broadening prohibitions against war crimes and crimes against humanity. Numerous conventions indicated that there were international rules on the conduct of war and individual responsibility for them. International law, as expressed by international and national tribunals, continues to maintain that crimes against humanity and war crimes were well established. The strongest source in international law for crimes against humanity, however, are the common domestic

6040

page 717

prohibitions of civilized nations. The conduct listed under crimes against humanity was of the sort that no modern civilized nation was able to sanction.

The Code provisions do not violate s. 11(g) as being retroactive. Section 11(g) of the Charter specifically refers to the permissibility of conviction on the basis of international law or the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations. One of the factors motivating the terms of the provision was to remove concerns about otherwise preventing prosecution of war criminals or those charged with crimes against humanity.

Section 7(3.71) (relating to the generality of the definitions of war crimes and crimes against humanity) read with s. 7(3.76) does not violate s. 7 of the Charter by reason of vagueness. The offence with which the accused is charged and for which he will be punished is the domestic offence in the 1927 Code, and it is readily apparent that the cross appeal is not concerned with arguing that these standard Code provisions are unconstitutionally vague. The standard of vagueness necessary for a law to be found unconstitutional is that the law must so lack in precision as not to give sufficient guidance for legal debate. The contents of the customary, conventional and comparative sources provide enough specificity to meet this standard for vagueness.

The pre-trial delay of 45-odd years between the alleged commission of the offence and the laying of charges did not violate ss. 7, 11(b) and 11(d) of the Charter. Pre-charge delay, at most, may in certain circumstances have an influence on the assessment of whether post-charge delay is unreasonable but of itself is not counted in determining the delay. The Charter does not insulate accused persons from prosecution solely on the basis of the time that elapsed between the commission of the offence and the laying of the charge. No complaint was made as to post-charge delay.

Section 7(3.71) does not violate ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter by applying only to acts committed outside Canada. This provision is jurisdictional and creates no new offences. Whether impugned conduct is committed abroad or in Canada, the accused would be charged with the same offence and subject to the same penalty, if convicted. Indeed, any difference in treatment favours the extraterritorial perpetrator.

page 718

Cases Cited

By Cory J.

Considered: Dover Castle, 16 A.J.I.L. 704 (1921); Llandovery Castle, 16 A.J.I.L. 708 (1921); R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606; referred to: R. v. Finta (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 557; The Case of the S.S. "Lotus" (1927), P.C.I.J., Ser. A, No. 10; Balcombe v. The Queen, [1954] S.C.R. 303; R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636; R. v. Whyte, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 3; R. v. Chaulk, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1303; R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697; R. v. Sault Ste.

6041

Marie, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1299; R. v. Wholesale Travel Group Inc., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 154; R. v. Martineau, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 633; R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944; R. v. Hess, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 906; R. v. Prue, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 547; Beaver v. The Queen, [1957] S.C.R. 531; Pappajohn v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 120; United States v. Bevans, 24 Fed. Cas. 1138 (1816), rev'd on jurisdictional grounds, 3 Wheat. 336 (1818); R. v. Smith (1900), 17 S.C. 561; Ofer v. Chief Military Prosecutor (the Kafr Qassem case), [Appeal 279-283/58, Psakim (Judgments of the District Courts of Israel), vol. 44, at p. 362], in Pal. Y.B. of Int'l L. (1985), vol. 2, p. 69; The Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 Trials of War Criminals 470 (1948); Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, vol. 22, (1946) (Official Text in the English Language); Kelsey v. The Queen, [1953] 1 S.C.R. 220; Parnerkar v. The Queen, [1974] S.C.R. 449; Dunlop v. The Queen, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 881; R. v. Faid, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 265; R. v. Khan, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 531; R. v. Williams (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 356; R. v. Rowbotham (1988), 41 C.C.C. (3d) 1; R. v. Smith, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 915; R. v. B. (K.G.), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 740; Campbell v. The Queen (1982), 31 C.R. (3d) 166; R. v. S. (P.R.) (1987), 38 C.C.C. (3d) 109; R. v. Harris (1927), 20 Cr. App. R. 86; R. v. Holden (1838), 8 Car. & P. 606, 173 E.R. 638; R. v. Brown, [1967] 3 C.C.C. 210; R. v. Bouchard (1973), 24 C.R.N.S. 31; R. v. Black (1990), 55 C.C.C. (3d) 421; R. v. Tregear, [1967] 2 Q.B. 574; United States v. Lutwak, 195 F.2d 748 (1952), aff'd 344 U.S. 604 (1952), rehearing denied 345 U.S. 919 (1953); United States v. Marzano, 149 F.2d 923 (1945); United States v. Liddy, 509 F.2d 428 (1974), certiorari denied 420 U.S. 911 (1975); Young v. United States, 107 F.2d 490 (1939); Estrella-Ortega v. United States, 423 F.2d 509 (1970); United States v. Pape, 144 F.2d 778

page 719

(1944); Steinberg v. United States, 162 F.2d 120 (1947); United States v. Browne, 313 F.2d 197 (1963); United States v. Ostrer, 422 F. Supp. 93 (1976); R. v. Holmes, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 914; R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30; R. v. Penno, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 865; Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1 (1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.) (Prostitution Reference), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123; Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927; R. v. Askov, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 1199; Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863; R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296.

By La Forest J. (dissenting [2])

R. v. Symes, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695; Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, vol. 22, (1946) (Official Text in the English Language); Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Eichmann (1961), 36 I.L.R. 5, aff'd (1962), 36 I.L.R. 277; The Almelo Trial, 1 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 35 (1945); Trial of Lothar Eisentrager, 14 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 8 (1949); Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (1985), certiorari denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986); Josef Altstötter Trial (The Justice Trial), 6 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 1 (1947); The Case of the S.S. "Lotus" (1927), P.C.I.J., Ser. A, No. 10;

McVey (Re); McVey v. United States of America, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 475; R. v. Finta (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 557; Polyukhovich v. Commonwealth of Australia (1991), 101 A.L.R. 545; Balcombe v. The Queen, [1954] S.C.R. 303; Bolduc v. Attorney General of Quebec, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 573; R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944; R. v. Théroux, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 5; West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. v. The King, [1905] 2 K.B. 391; R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636; R. v. Lyons, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309; Libman v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 178; Ofer v. Chief Military Prosecutor (the Kafr Qassem case), [Appeal 279-283/58, Psakim (Judgments of the District Courts of Israel), vol. 44, at p. 362], in Pal. Y.B. Int'l L. (1985), vol. 2, p. 69; R. v. Bernard, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 833; R. v. Penno, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 865; R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606; United Nurses of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 901; R. v. Morin, [1992] 1

6042

S.C.R. 771; R. v. Kalanj, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1594; R. v. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 1091.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 11(a), (b), (d), (f), (g), 12, 15, 24(1).

Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Art. 6(c), 8.

page 720

Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land (Hague Convention IV, 1907).

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, c. 36.

Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 213(a).

Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, ss. 6(2) [rep. & sub. R.S.C., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 4; am. French version, R.S.C., 1985, c. 1 (4th Supp.), s. 18, Schedule 1, item 1], 7(3) [rep. & sub. R.S.C., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 5(1)], (3.1) [ad. ibid., s. 5(3)], (3.71) [ad. R.S.C., 1985, c. 30 (3rd Supp.), s. 1], (3.72) [ad. idem], (3.73) [ad. idem], (3.74) [ad. idem], (3.76) [ad. idem], (3.77) [ad. R.S.C., 1985, c. 10 (3rd Supp.), s. 1], (4), 14, 15, 19, 25, 74(2), 465(1)(a) [rep. & sub. R.S.C., 1985, c. 27 (1st Supp.), s. 61(1)], (3) [rep. & sub. ibid., s. 61(4)], 477.1 [ad. S.C. 1990, c. 44, s. 15], 607(6) [ad. R.S.C., 1985, c. 30 (3rd Supp.), s. 1].

Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 614(a).

Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 31.

Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armies in the Field, 27 July 1929, 118 L.N.T.S. 303.

Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 85.

Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in time of War of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 287.

Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 135.

Order in Council, P.C. 1985-348.

Statute of the International Court of Justice, Art. 38(1).

War Crimes Act 1991, 1991 (U.K.), c. 13.

War Crimes Amendment Act 1988, 1989 (Aust.), No. 3.

6043

Authors Cited

American Law Institute. Restatement (Third) of the Law, the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, vol. 1. St. Paul, Minn.: American Law Institute Publishers, 1987.

Annot., 53 A.L.R. Fed. 498.

Annot., 67 A.L.R.2d 538.

Archbold, John Frederick. Pleading, Evidence and Practice in Criminal Cases, 45th ed. General editor, P. J. Richardson. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1993.

Bakker, Jeanne L. "The Defense of Obedience to Superior Orders: The Mens Rea Requirement" (1989), 17 Am. J. Crim. L. 55.

page 721

Bassiouni, M. Cherif. Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, 1992.

Brownlie, Ian. Principles of Public International Law, 4th ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.

Canada. Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals. Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals Report, Part I: Public. Jules Deschênes, Commissioner. Ottawa: The Commission, 1986.

Canada. Law Reform Commission. Our Criminal Law. Ottawa: Information Canada, 1976.

Canada. Parliament. Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada. Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, Issue no. 41 (January 20, 1981) and Issue no. 47 (January 28, 1981). First Session of the Thirty-second Parliament, 1980-81. Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1981.

Cross, Rupert, Sir. Cross on Evidence, 7th ed. By the late Sir Rupert Cross and Colin Tapper. London: Butterworths, 1990.

Dinstein, Yoram. The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law. Leyden, The Netherlands: A. W. Sijthoff, 1965.

Fenrick, W. J. "The Prosecution of War Criminals in Canada" (1989), 12 Dalhousie. L. J. 256.

Green, Leslie Claude. Note. "Canadian Law, War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity" (1988), 59 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 217.

Green, Leslie Claude. International Law: A Canadian Perspective, 2nd ed. Toronto: Carswell, 1988.

Green, Leslie Claude. "Superior Orders and Command Responsibility" (1989), 27 Can. Y.B. Int'l L. 167.

6044

Green, Leslie Claude. "Superior Orders and the Reasonable Man". In Essays on the Modern Law of War. Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.: Transnational Publishers, 1985.

Green, Leslie Claude. Superior Orders in National and International Law. Leyden, The Netherlands: A. W. Sijthoff, 1976.

Green, Leslie Claude. "The Defence of Superior Orders in the Modern Law of Armed Conflict" (1993), 31 Alta. L. Rev. 320.

Greenspan, Morris. The Modern Law of Land Warfare. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959.

Kelsen, Hans. "The Rule Against Ex Post Facto Laws and the Prosecution of the Axis War Criminals" (1945), 2:3 Judge Advocate J. 8.

Kelsen, Hans. "Will the Judgment in the Nuremberg Trial Constitute a Precedent in International Law?" (1947), 1 Int'l L.Q. 153.

Lachs, Manfred. War Crimes: An Attempt to Define the Issues. London: Stevens & Sons, 1945.

page 722

Lauterpacht, Hersch. "The Law of Nations and the Punishment of War Crimes" (1944), 21 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 58.

Matas, David. Justice Delayed: Nazi War Criminals in Canada. By David Matas with Susan Charendoff. Toronto: Summerhill Press, 1987.
Maxwell-Fyfe, David, Sir. Foreword. In R. W. Cooper, The Nuremberg Trial. London: Penguin Books, 1947.

McCormick, Charles Tilford. McCormick on Evidence, vol. 1, 4th ed. By John William Strong, General Editor. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1992.

McWilliams, Peter K. Canadian Criminal Evidence, 3rd ed. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1988 (loose-leaf).

Newark, Michael and Alec Samuels. "Let the Judge Call the Witness", [1969] Crim. L. Rev. 399.

Oppenheim, L. International Law: A Treatise, 6th ed., vol. 2. Edited by H. Lauterpacht. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1944.

Phipson, Sidney Lovell. Phipson on Evidence, 14th ed. By Michael Newman Howard, Peter Crane and Daniel A. Hochberg. London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1990.

Schwarzenberger, Georg. International Law as Applied by Intentional Courts and Tribunals, vol. 2, The Law of Armed Conflict. London: Stevens & Sons, 1968.

Schwelb, Egon. "Crimes Against Humanity" (1946), 23 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 178.

6045

Smith, J. C. and Brian Hogan. Criminal Law, 7th ed. London: Butterworths, 1992.

Sopinka, John, Sidney N. Lederman and Alan W. Bryant. The Law of Evidence in Canada. Toronto: Butterworths, 1992.

Stenning, Philip C. "One Blind Man To See Fair Play: The Judge's Right To Call Witnesses" (1974), 24 C.R.N.S. 49.

Stone, Julius. Legal Controls of International Conflict. Holmes Beach, Florida: Wm. W. Gaunt & Sons, Inc., 1974.

Szegedi uj Nemzedék, April 9, 1944.

Triggs, Gillian. "Australia's War Crimes Trials: A Moral Necessity or Legal Minefield?" (1987), 16 M.U.L.R. 382.

United Nations. General Assembly. United Nations Resolution on Principles of international cooperation in the detection, arrest, extradition, and punishment of persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity. G.A. Res. 3074, 28 U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 30) 78, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1973).

page 723

United Nations. International Law Commission. Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal. U.N. GAOR, 5th Sess., Supp. No. 12 (A/1316).

Wigmore, John Henry. Evidence in Trials at Common Law, vol. IA. Revised by Peter Tillers. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1983.

Williams, S. A. and A. L. C. de Mestral. An Introduction to International Law, 2nd ed. Toronto: Butterworths, 1987.

APPEAL AND CROSS-APPEAL from a judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal (1992), 92 D.L.R. (4th) 1, 73 C.C.C. (3d) 65, 14 C.R. (4th) 1, 53 O.A.C. 1, 9 C.R.R. (2d) 91, dismissing an appeal from acquittal by Campbell J. sitting with jury. Appeal dismissed, La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ. dissenting. Cross-appeal dismissed. Sections 7(3.74) and 7(3.76) of the Criminal Code do not violate ss. 7, 11(a), (b), (d), (g), 12 or 15 of the Charter.

C. A. Amerasinghe, Q.C., and Thomas C. Lemon, for the appellant.

Douglas H. Christie and Barbara Kulaszka, for the respondent.

David Matas, for the intervener League for Human Rights of B'Nai Brith Canada.

Edward M. Morgan, for the intervener Canadian Jewish Congress.

Joseph R. Nuss, Q.C., and Lieba Shell, for the intervener InterAmicus.

The following are the reasons delivered by LAMER C.J. -- I have read the reasons of my colleagues, Justice La Forest and Justice Cory. For the reasons given by Cory J. I would dismiss the appeal. This being so, I would dismiss the cross-appeal as being moot.

6046

page 724

The reasons of La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin JJ. were delivered by

LA FOREST J. (dissenting) -- This case concerns the proper understanding of s. 7(3.71)-(3.73) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, which constitutes the scheme designed by Parliament to bring war criminals and perpetrators of crimes against humanity to justice in Canada. It also raises a number of issues concerning the constitutional validity of this legislation under several provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The legislation was enacted pursuant to the Report of the Deschênes Commission on War Criminals, Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals Report, Jules Deschênes, Commissioner (1986). The Commission was established by Order-in-Council No. 1985-348, which stated, in part, that the "Government of Canada wishes to adopt all appropriate measures necessary to ensure that any . . . war criminals currently resident in Canada . . . are brought to justice". Although the report, released December 30, 1986, named 774 alleged war criminals resident in Canada, to date there have been no convictions obtained using s. 7(3.71)-(3.73). This appeal concerns the first prosecution ever attempted under this legislation.

Facts

The accused, Imre Finta, was born in Kolozsvar, Hungary (now a part of Romania) in 1912. During the 1930s, he lived and studied law in Szeged, Hungary. In 1935, Mr. Finta enrolled in the Royal Hungarian Military Academy and in January 1939 he was commissioned as an officer in the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie. The Gendarmerie is most accurately described as an armed paramilitary police force which served the Hungarian government by wielding political muscle in the country's more rural areas. By 1942, Mr. Finta had achieved the rank of captain in this notorious organization.

page 725

In March 1944, Mr. Finta was posted to Szeged as commander of the investigative subdivision of the Gendarmerie. That same month Hungary had been occupied by the forces of the Third Reich. Despite the fact that Hungary had joined the Axis powers in 1940, Germany proceeded to install an even more pro-German puppet government in the Hungarian capital of Budapest. Thus, throughout the relevant period, Hungary was a de facto occupied state. The Hungarian police and the Gendarmerie came under the direct command of the German SS, and these two organizations were instrumental in administering the anti-Jewish laws adopted by the Nazi government of Germany and the Hungarian government under its control.

The charges against Mr. Finta stem from his time in Szeged. Mr. Finta is alleged to have been in charge of the "de-jewification" of Szeged during the spring of 1944. This activity was authorized by the so-called "Baky Order", the Hungarian Ministry of the Interior Order passed on April 7, 1944. In its essentials, the "Baky Order" called for the isolation, complete expropriation, ghettoization, concentration, entrainment, and eventual deportation (primarily to Auschwitz and Birkenau) of all Hungarian Jews. Once there, these Jews faced either immediate extermination or forced labour followed by eventual extermination. The events at Szeged were duplicated in villages and towns across Hungary throughout that unfortunate spring. There can be no doubt that this process, which my colleague, Justice Cory, has described in all its horrific detail, was an integral part of what the Nazis themselves dubbed the "final solution" to the "Jewish problem", namely the systematic slaughter of every last European Jew.

6047

In 1947-48, Mr. Finta was tried and convicted, in absentia, by a Szeged court for "crimes against the people" relating to his role as a Gendarmerie captain during the spring of 1944 purge of Szeged's Jewish population. In 1951, Finta immigrated to Canada. In 1956 he became a Canadian citizen, and has lived in this country ever since.

page 726

Mr. Finta was charged with unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter of 8,617 Jews between May 16 and June 30, 1944 at or about Szeged, Hungary, thereby committing an offence under the definitions of these crimes in the Criminal Code existing at the time the offences were committed. The indictment added that such offences constituted crimes against humanity and war crimes under what is now s. 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code. The latter reference was added because prosecution for crimes committed abroad cannot ordinarily take place in Canada since criminal offences are generally confined to conduct that takes place in Canada (s. 6 of the Code), and the conduct alleged here took place in Hungary. Section 7(3.71), however, permits prosecution for conduct outside Canada if such conduct constitutes a crime against humanity or a war crime and would have been a crime in Canada at the time it took place had it been committed here. As Cory J. states, the principal issue in this case concerns a proper understanding of this and related provisions permitting persons to be prosecuted in Canada for crimes against Canadian law if these crimes also constitute crimes against humanity or war crimes under international law.

My colleague has set forth the judicial history of the case and I need not repeat it except as may be necessary in setting forth my views. For the moment, it suffices to set forth the basic procedural steps in the proceedings. Following a pre-trial motion before the late Callaghan A.C.J. of the Ontario Court, General Division, to consider a number of constitutional issues regarding the validity of the legislation under the Charter, a trial was held before Campbell J. sitting with a jury. The accused was acquitted and the acquittal was affirmed by a majority of the Ontario Court of Appeal, Dubin C.J. and the late Tarnopolsky J.A.

page 727

dissenting. From that decision, the Crown appealed to this Court, raising seven grounds of appeal.

The Issues

It is only necessary for me to deal with the first two grounds of appeal. These relate to (1) the proper understanding of the jurisdictional nature of the war crimes provisions, and (2) the requirements of international law in relation to the mental element in such crimes. That is because, in my view, serious errors were made in respect of these issues that require the ordering of a new trial. That being so, it is unnecessary for me to address the other issues, which for the most part to the particular manner in which the trial was conducted. It is right to say, however, that had the provisions been interpreted in the manner I propose, some of the problems, notably in relation to the inflammatory address by defence counsel, could have been avoided or at least mitigated.

6048

In dealing with the two issues I have outlined, I propose to confine myself to attempting to discern the intention of Parliament in enacting the war crimes provision by reference to the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation. The trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal attempted to interpret it in light of certain concerns they had about the implications of the Charter. While I agree that where a possible interpretation of a provision is consistent with the Charter, and another is not, the former is to be preferred, that approach cannot go so far as to permit the courts to rewrite the section; see R. v. Symes, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 695. At all events, I do not think the provision as interpreted in accordance with the ordinary canons of statutory construction in any way breaches Charter values. I shall discuss the Charter issues that constitute the leitmotif of the respondent's interpretative approach later, and conclude with the other Charter challenges raised in the cross-appeal.

Before entering into a detailed examination of the issues I have just outlined, it is important first to set forth the general economy of s. 7(3.71)-

page 728

(3.77) and the interrelationship of these provisions with international law for, in my view, this constitutes a necessary first step to a consideration of the specific issues. For a failure to grasp these general issues seems to me to lie at the root of much of the confusion that has arisen in this case.

Interrelationship of International Law and Section 7(3.71)-(3.76)

War crimes and crimes against humanity are crimes under international law. They are designed to enforce the prescriptions of international law for the protection of the lives and the basic human rights of the individual, particularly, as befits an international prescription, against the actions of states. They are acts universally recognized as criminal according to general principles of law recognized by the community of nations. While some of these crimes have been given a considerable measure of definition in international documents, as a whole they have not been reduced to the precision one finds in a national system of law. Crimes against humanity, in particular, are expressed in broad compendious terms relying broadly on principles of criminality generally recognized by the international community. Consequently, s. 7(3.76) defines crimes against humanity and war crimes as follows:

7. . . .

(3.76) For the purposes of this section,

. . .

"crime against humanity" means murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution or any other inhumane act or omission that is committed against any civilian population or any identifiable group of persons, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law or is criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

6049

page 729

"war crime" means an act or omission that is committed during an international armed conflict, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of the customary international law or conventional international law applicable in international armed conflicts.

Since war crimes and crimes against humanity are prescriptions governing the international legal order, it follows that they must apply against states, which have indeed been brought to account in various international fora. But a state must obviously act through individuals and it would frustrate the prosecution and punishment of war crimes and crimes against humanity if individuals could be absolved of culpability for such crimes by reason only that it was not illegal under the law of the state on behalf of which they acted. Consequently, it is clear that the mere existence of such law cannot be a defence to an individual charged with a war crime. This was well stated in Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, vol. 22, (1946) (Official Text in the English Language), in the following passage, at pp. 465-66:

It was submitted that international law is concerned with the actions of sovereign states and provides no punishment for individuals; and further, that where the act in question is an act of state, those who carry it out are not personally responsible, but are protected by the doctrine of the sovereignty of the state. In the opinion of the Tribunal, both these submissions must be rejected.

. . .

...individuals can be punished for violations of international law. Crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced.

This principle was adopted in the Canadian legislation. Section 7(3.74) of the Criminal Code, reads as follows:

page 730

7. . . .
(3.74) Notwithstanding subsection (3.73) and section 15, a person may be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71) even if the act or omission is committed in obedience to or in conformity with the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission.

The existence of such de facto laws is not, however, totally irrelevant in considering situations where a person had no moral choice in doing what he or she did. This can be seen from the formulation by the International Law Commission in 1950 of the Principles of the Nuremberg Charter and Judgment; see U.N. General Assembly Official Records, 5th Sess., Supp. No. 12 (A/1316). Principle IV reads:
PRINCIPLE IV

6050

The fact that a person acted pursuant to orders of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him from responsibility under international law, provided a moral choice was in fact possible to him.

Having said this, I note in passing that there is ordinarily nothing all that subtle about war crimes. The moral aspect leaps immediately to the consciousness of anyone with any moral sensitivity. The shooting of civilians in the absence of a mistake of fact or a superior order is an example. In the latter case, the accused may raise this as a defence only if he has no moral choice, in which case there are defences available both under international and domestic law. Apart from this, such acts obviously involve moral culpability on the part of the perpetrator. That is surely so of the facts here where the rounding up of 8,617 defenceless people, men, women and children, and confining and transporting them under unspeakable conditions outside the country to meet their fate strikes one as morally vile and inexcusable if it appears that an accused has done this without a valid justification, excuse or defence.

Since war crimes and crimes against humanity reflect the views of the members of the family of nations as they may be found not only in international conventions but also in customary international law in respect of such crimes, it follows that they would be subject to similar justifications, excuses and defences as apply in respect of such crimes in domestic law. For one of the sources of international law is "the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations" (see Art. 38(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, Acts and Documents Concerning the Organization of the Courts, No. 4, Charter of the United Nations, Statute and Rules of Court and Other Documents (1978)), a matter specifically referred to in the definition of "crimes against humanity". Consequently, then, provision for these justifications, excuses and defences are provided in s. 7(3.73) of the Code. Of particular relevance to war crimes would be issues going to the mental intent, necessity, duress and mistake of fact, as well as defences specifically available to peace officers and military forces. There are, as well, additional defences available for these international crimes, such as military necessity, superior orders and reprisals. By virtue of s. 7(3.73), any justification, excuse or defence available under international law as well as under the law of Canada at the time of the commission of the alleged offence are made available to an accused charged by virtue of the Canadian legislation. Section 7(3.73) reads as follows:

page 731

7. . . .

(3.73) In any proceedings under this Act with respect to an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71), notwithstanding that the act or omission is an offence under the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission, the accused may, subject to subsection 607(6), rely on any justification, excuse or defence available under the laws of Canada or under international law at that time or at the time of the proceedings.

It follows from the ordinary principles of criminal law followed in Canadian courts that any reasonable doubt on these matters is to be determined in favour of the accused.

Since war crimes and crimes against humanity are crimes against international prescriptions and, indeed, go to the very structure of the international legal order, they are not under international law subject to the general legal prescription (reflected in s. 6(2) of our Code) that crimes must ordinarily be prosecuted and punished in the state where they are committed; see Attorney-General of the Government of Israel v. Eichmann (1961), 36 I.L.R. 5. Indeed the international community has encouraged member states to prosecute war crimes and crimes against humanity wherever they have been committed. See the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 (Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 31, Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 85, Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 135, and Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in time of War of August 12, 1949, 75 U.N.T.S. 287); United Nations Resolution on Principles of international cooperation in the detection, arrest, extradition and punishment of persons guilty of war crimes and crimes against humanity, G.A. Res. 3074, 28 U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 30) 78, U.N. Doc. A/9030 (1973); War Crimes Amendment Act 1988, 1989 Aust., No. 3; War Crimes Act 1991, 1991 (U.K.), c. 13; Restatement (Third) of the Law, the Foreign Relations Law of the United States, vol. 1, [sect] 404 (1987); Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, supra, at p. 461; The Almelo Trial, 1 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 35 (1945) (U.S.M.T. Almelo); Trial of Lothar Eisentrager, 14 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 8 (1949) (U.S.M.T. Shanghai), at p. 15; The Eichmann Case, supra, at p. 50, aff'd (1962), 36 I.L.R. 277, at p. 299 (Isr. S.C.); Demjanjuk v. Petrovsky, 776 F.2d 571 (6th Cir. 1985), at pp. 582-83, certiorari denied, 475 U.S. 1016 (1986); I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (4th ed. 1990), at p. 305; S. A. Williams and A. L. C. de Mestral, An Introduction to International Law (2nd ed. 1987), at pp. 130-31. It would be pointless to rely solely on the state where such a crime has been committed, since that state will often be implicated in the crime, particularly crimes against humanity. This concept was forcefully and unequivocally expressed by the U.S. Military Tribunal in the justice trials (Josef Altstötter Trial (The Justice Trial)), 6 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 1 (1947) (U.S.M.T. Nuremberg), at p. 49, where it was stated:

605 1

page 732

page 733

> The very essence of the prosecution case is that the laws, the Hitler decrees and the Draconic, corrupt, and perverted Nazi judicial system themselves constituted the substance of war crimes and crimes against humanity and that participation in the enactment and enforcement of them amounts to complicity in crime. We have pointed out that governmental participation is a material element of the crime against humanity. Only when official organs of sovereignty participated in atrocities and persecutions did those crimes assume international proportions.
>
> The central concern in the case of crimes against humanity is with such things as state-sponsored or sanctioned persecution, not the private individual who has a particular hatred against a particular group or the public generally. Extraterritorial prosecution is thus a practical necessity in the case of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Not only is the state where the crime took place unlikely to prosecute; following the cessation of hostilities or other conditions that fostered their commission, there also is a tendency for the individuals who perpetrated them to scatter to the four corners of the earth. Thus, war criminals would be able to elude punishment simply by fleeing the jurisdiction where the crime was committed. The international community has rightly rejected this prospect.

6052

Turning again to the interrelationship between war crimes and crimes against humanity and Canadian criminal law, it is notable that the Deschênes Commission was of the view that a prosecution could be launched against a war criminal before a Canadian superior court of criminal jurisdiction on the basis of a violation of "the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations". This finding was based on two factors: (1) s. 11(g) of the Charter, which, in the Commission's view, adopted "customary" international law lato sensu into Canadian law, and (2) the principle of universal jurisdiction; see Deschênes Commission, supra, at p. 132. However, the Commission dismissed this option on the grounds that "[a] prosecution under international law appears too esoteric"; ibid., at p. 133. The Commission took the view that a preferable vehicle for the prosecution of war criminals would be for Parliament to pass enabling legislation whereby prosecution of war criminals could be pursued in Canada based on crimes known to Canadian criminal law. The international aspect of these crimes would, pursuant to the principle of universality inherent in these grievous acts, continue to provide the jurisdictional link to Canada, so long as the international crimes were known to international law at the time and place of their commission.

page 734

Despite the Deschênes Commission's assumption that s. 11(g) of the Charter, coupled with the universality jurisdiction associated with these war crimes and crimes against humanity, could ground a prosecution in Canada, it is not self-evident that these crimes could be prosecuted in Canada in the absence of legislation. On the analogy of other international authority in the area, it is certainly arguable that the international norm regarding universality of jurisdiction is permissive only (see The Case of the S.S. "Lotus" (1927), P.C.I.J., Ser. A, No. 10), and the language of s. 11 (g) of the Charter also appears to be framed in permissive terms. Thus it is by no means clear that prosecution could automatically be pursued for these crimes before the courts of the various states, especially Canada where, barring express exception, crimes must comply with the requirement that they were committed within Canada's territory (s. 6 of the Code). Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that Parliament saw fit by s. 7(3.71) of the Code, to confer jurisdiction on Canadian courts by providing expressly that, notwithstanding any provision in the Code or any other Act, a war crime or crime against humanity shall be deemed to have been an act committed in Canada.

page 735

But Parliament, like the Commission, quite rightly in my view, accepted the position that war crimes and crimes against humanity would be crimes in Canada. For although they may not, in those terms, be crimes under Canadian law, they are in essence reflections of general principles of law recognized by the community of nations, and so would, if committed in Canada, be subject to prosecution here under various provisions. It is evident that compendious expressions like "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution, or any other inhumane act or omission" include acts and omissions that comprise such specific underlying crimes as confinement, kidnapping, robbery and manslaughter under our domestic system of law. A somewhat similar relationship between compendiously described unlawful acts in international treaties and specific crimes under domestic law exists in the law of extradition; see McVey (Re); McVey v. United States of America, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 475, at pp. 514-15.

6053

I should note, however, that war crimes and crimes against humanity often include additional circumstances relating them to the international law norms they subserve. Thus crimes against humanity are aimed at giving protection to the basic human rights of all individuals throughout the world, and notably against transgression by states against these rights. That is why such crimes are aimed at an "act or omission that is committed against any civilian population or any identifiable group of persons, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission"; see s. 7(3.76). The law referred to in that expression is, of course, the local domestic law, not international law, as counsel for respondent argued. For these crimes were at the relevant period violative of the law of nations. As Callaghan A.C.J. ruled in his pre-trial ruling in the present case (R. v. Finta (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 557 (Ont. H.C.), at p. 569):

page 736

A brief review of international conventions, agreements and treaties, clearly demonstrate [sic] that, by World War II, war crimes or crimes against humanity were recognized as an offence at international law, or criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations.

This proposition is well supported by the international sources cited by Callaghan A.C.J. and I shall have occasion to return to this later. For the moment, I would simply note that many of the defendants tried in Nuremberg also raised this plea, in the form of nullum crimen sine lege, and this defence was rejected; Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, supra, at pp. 461-65; Josef Altstötter, supra, at pp. 41-49. The following words of Sir David Maxwell-Fyfe (Foreword to R. W. Cooper, The Nuremberg Trial (1947)), are apt (at p. 11):

With regard to "crimes against humanity", this at any rate is clear: the Nazis, when they persecuted and murdered countless Jews and political opponents in Germany, knew that what they were doing was wrong and that their actions were crimes which had been condemned by the criminal law of every civilized State. When these crimes were mixed with the preparation for aggressive war and later with the commission of war crimes in occupied territories, it cannot be a matter of complaint that a procedure is established for their punishment.

I again, however, underline the fact -- which finds expression in the statement just quoted -- that the acts comprised in war crimes and crimes against humanity are in this country in essence crimes that fall under the familiar rubrics of our law such as confinement, kidnapping, and the like. They would be equally blameworthy if done by private individuals or criminal groups for other similar vile motives. The additional circumstances are added to crimes against humanity to tie them to the international norm and permit extraterritorial prosecution by all states.

page 737

The same approach applies to war crimes. There must, of course, be an "international armed conflict". In other cases, other conditions may be imposed. Shooting at enemy forces is generally not a war crime, but shooting at civilians is subject to more stringent requirements. Other conditions under which one acts may also determine the difference between whether such acts are war crimes or not. As in the case of the existence of a state of war, these conditions are what ties them to international norms and empowers extraterritorial prosecution.

6054

In enacting enabling legislation respecting war crimes and crimes against humanity, Parliament could have proceeded in one of two ways. These crimes could have been simply made offences in their own terms in Canada even though committed abroad. This, I understand, is what has been done, for instance, in Australia; see Polyukhovich v. Commonwealth of Australia (1991), 101 A.L.R. 545 (Aust. H.C.). Another technique is to enable prosecution under domestic law by the device of deeming the acts constituting a war crime or crime against humanity to have been committed in Canada. Since these acts are then deemed to have been committed in Canada, the person accused of having committed them may be charged with any of the relevant underlying offences that encompass these acts under the law of Canada. That is the course that was taken by Parliament, an approach somewhat similar to that followed in Great Britain; see War Crimes Act 1991, 1991 (U.K.), c. 13. By section 7(3.71), a provision cited and discussed at length later, Parliament provided that a person who has committed an act or omission outside Canada that constitutes a war crime or crime against humanity shall be deemed to have committed that act in Canada. The provision adds a second requirement for the operation of this clause. To avoid punishing someone for an act that would not at the time have been a crime under Canadian law, it further requires that the act must constitute a crime in Canada according to the law at the time, a provision reinforced by s. 7(3.72) which requires that any prosecution in respect of such act be conducted according to the then existing laws of evidence and procedure.

page 738

There are obvious advantages to the second approach. The judge and especially the jury are able to function largely pursuant to a system of law which, being our own, is more familiar to us and more precise. As much as possible, the intricacies of what constitutes international law and how it functions (with which even the judge is often unfamiliar) are avoided. The judge is able to instruct the jury secure in his or her knowledge of Canadian law. With the exception of international defences, which are available to the accused, the jury can then perform its function pursuant to Canadian law which demands proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused committed the offence -- a Canadian offence -- with which he or she is charged.

Interpretation of Section 7(3.71)

General

I turn now to the first ground of appeal concerning the correct interpretation of s. 7(3.71). Ignoring for the moment the Charter issues at stake, a clear understanding of the intention of the legislature can, in my view, be ascertained through the normal rules for the interpretation of legislative provisions.

To clarify the issue, it is useful to examine how it was dealt with in the courts below. It first arose before Callaghan A.C.J. in the course of dealing with the constitutionality of s. 7(3.71) and (3.74) in a pre-trial ruling. In his view, s. 7(3.71) is of a procedural nature and does not create new offences, but merely confers retrospective and extraterritorial jurisdiction to Canadian courts over acts that would have been offences under Canadian law at the time of their occurrence if they had taken place in Canada, so long as those acts constitute war crimes or crimes against humanity.

6055

page 739

Though the trial judge agreed with Callaghan A.C.J.'s ruling that s. 7(3.71) is exclusively jurisdictional in nature, he determined that the question of jurisdiction, though ordinarily a matter determined by the trial judge as a matter of law, should in this case be left with the jury. Under this ruling, the trial judge, it is true, would determine abstract legal questions such as whether crimes against humanity constituted a contravention of customary or conventional law or was criminal according to the law of nations, but it was for the jury to decide whether the respondent's acts or omissions constituted a war crime or crime against humanity.

The majority of the Court of Appeal (1992), 92 D.L.R. (4th) 1, upheld the conclusion of the trial judge but on another basis. They did not agree that s. 7(3.71) was procedural and relevant only to the jurisdiction of the court to try the respondent for the domestic offences such as confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter. As they put it, at p. 108:

. . . we arrive at the same conclusion reached by the trial judge, although we interpret s. 7(3.71) differently. We do not regard the allegations that Finta's acts or omissions constituted war crimes or crimes against humanity as going to the jurisdiction of the trial court so as to bring them within the purview of the judgment in Balcombe [Balcombe v. The Queen, [1954] S.C.R. 303]. Instead, we view these issues as integral to the fundamental question of whether Finta committed the offences which were alleged against him in the indictment.

As Dubin C.J. put it, at p. 20, ". . . the upshot of the majority view is that s. 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code creates two new offences, namely, a crime against humanity and a war crime. . . ." Like

page 740

Dubin C.J. and Tarnopolsky J.A., and for that matter Callaghan A.C.J., I respectfully disagree with the position taken by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal. I do so for the following reasons.

On a literal reading of s. 7(3.71), an appreciation of its legislative context along with analogous provisions in the Code and an understanding of its legislative history, I conclude that s. 7(3.71) is unquestionably intended to confer jurisdiction on Canadian courts to prosecute domestically, according to Canadian criminal law in force at the time of their commission, foreign acts amounting to war crimes or crimes against humanity. The provision does not create any new offences. Section 7(3.71) reads:

7. . . .

(3.71) Notwithstanding anything in this Act or any other Act, every person who, either before or after the coming into force of this subsection, commits an act or omission outside Canada that constitutes a war crime or a crime against humanity and that, if committed in Canada, would constitute an offence against the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission shall be deemed to commit that act or omission in Canada at that time if,

6056

(a) at the time of the act or omission,

(i) that person is a Canadian citizen or is employed by Canada in a civilian or military capacity,

(ii) that person is a citizen of, or is employed in a civilian or military capacity by, a state that is engaged in an armed conflict against Canada, or

(iii) the victim of the act or omission is a Canadian citizen or a citizen of a state that is allied with Canada in an armed conflict; or

(b) at the time of the act or omission, Canada could, in conformity with international law, exercise jurisdiction over the person with respect to the act or omission on the basis of the person's presence in Canada and, subsequent to the time of the act or omission, the person is present in Canada. [Emphasis added.]

I am quite unable to see anything in s. 7(3.71) that creates new offences of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Nowhere is it declared, as it is in the case of all other Code offences, that a person who commits the relevant act is guilty of an offence. On the contrary, the nucleus of the provision is its predicate, "shall be deemed to commit that act or omission in Canada at that time". All the rest gravitates towards this focus. Moreover, no penalty is stipulated. The subjection to domestic prosecution that results from a finding of war crime or crime against humanity is not punishment; it is, rather, merely the next procedural step. What the provision does is empower the prosecution to lay charges against the accused for offences defined in the Code in respect of acts done outside the country, so long as those acts constitute crimes against humanity or war crimes.

page 741

This reading of s. 7(3.71) also makes sense when viewed in its legislative context. Found in Part I, the "General" section of the Criminal Code, the provision stands as an exception to the general rule regarding the territorial ambit of criminal law, which appears in the immediately preceding section. Section 6(2) of the Code reads:

6. . . .

(2) Subject to this Act or any other Act of Parliament, no person shall be convicted or discharged under section 736 of an offence committed outside Canada.

The perpetration of acts constituting war crimes and crimes against humanity, of course, transcends national borders, yet the perpetrators are often not identified until later, after they have displaced themselves to a new country. Parliament's intention was to extend the arm of Canada's criminal law in order to be in a position to prosecute these extraterritorial acts if the alleged perpetrators were discovered in our midst. The enactment of s. 7(3.71) was necessary because Parliament's plan derogated from the general principle of s. 6(2). As I noted earlier, by specifically deeming the extraterritorial act to have taken place in Canada,

page 742

Parliament has expressed its view that the normal concerns about extraterritoriality are not present.

6057

Similarly structured deeming provisions that also embrace extraterritorial acts are found among the other subsections of s. 7; see s. 7(3) in relation to offences committed against internationally protected persons or their property, s. 7(3.1) in relation to hostage-taking and s. 7(4) in relation to public service employee offenders. Similarly worded provisions are found in other parts of the Code, as well. Section 477.1 deems to be committed in Canada acts occurring in, above or beyond the continental shelf. A close parallel can be drawn with the conspiracy provision set forth in s. 465(3) of the Code, which reads:

465. . . .

(3) Every one who, while in Canada, conspires with any one to do anything referred to in subsection (1) in a place outside Canada that is an offence under the laws of that place shall be deemed to have conspired to do that thing in Canada.

The nature of this provision was considered by this Court in Bolduc v. Attorney General of Quebec, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 573, where, at pp. 577 and 581, it is stated:

It is apparent on its face that this subsection does not create an offence. It creates a presumption of territoriality so as to make the conspiracy an offence punishable in Canada. Where, as in the case at bar, persons conspire in Canada to effect an unlawful purpose in the United States, which would not in itself be an offence punishable in Canada, they "shall be deemed to have conspired to do in Canada that thing". The result is to introduce the essential aspect which would otherwise be absent, and to make the offence punishable in Canada.

. . .

The offence charged is common law conspiracy committed in Canada, to effect an unlawful purpose. Causing persons to enter the United States unlawfully constitutes an offence under American law, just as causing persons to come into Canada unlawfully constitutes an offence under Canadian law. As a consequence of the presumption of s. 423(3) [currently s. 465(3)], the conspirators are deemed to have conspired to commit the offence in Canada. It is as if they had conspired to cause persons to come into Canada unlawfully. [Emphasis added.]

page 743

As in the case of s. 7(3.71), s. 465(3) deems Canadian territoriality where a criterion is met. While the criterion for s. 465(3) is the unlawfulness of the act conspired according to the law of the place of the conspired act, the criteria for s. 7(3.71) are threefold: that the act constitutes a war crime or crime against humanity; that the act was unlawful in Canada at the time of its commission; and that specifically defined individuals are involved. Just as the offence charged in the former case is conspiracy committed in Canada, the charge in the latter is that of the underlying domestic offence, be it murder, robbery or the like. The similarity of the structure of these two provisions supports a consistent interpretation.

Admittedly, exceptions to s. 6 can also take the form of offence-creating provisions that expressly embrace extraterritorial acts. However, the wording of s. 7(3.71) closely resembles that of other purely jurisdiction-endowing provisions and can be contrasted with these offence-creating provisions. For example, another conspiracy provision reads:

6058

465. (1) . . .

(a) every one who conspires with any one to commit murder or to cause another person to be murdered, whether in Canada or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a maximum term of imprisonment for life;

This section deals, inter alia, with conspiracy to murder abroad. The provision itself makes this extraterritorial act an offence and attaches a sanction to it. A similar approach is taken with respect to the criminalization of piracy, in s. 74(2):

page 744

74. . . .

(2) Every one who commits piracy while in or out of Canada is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life.

The distinction between this Code treatment of extraterritorial acts and that embodied by s. 7 (3.71) and its kin is obvious. The former reflects Parliament's intention to approach the relevant acts as domestic offences unto themselves, in contrast to the latter's effect of deeming the acts to come within the scope of offences already created elsewhere in the Code.

Parliament's intention to confine itself to a rule governing the application of offences is also evident from the position of s. 7(3.71) in the Code. It appears, I repeat, in Part I of the Code, which is appropriately titled "General". No offence is created in that Part. It deals, as its name implies, with interpretive matters, application, enforcement, defences and other general provisions. Offences are dealt with in other parts of the Code, and are usually entitled as such, among others "Part II. Offences Against Public Order", "Part VIII. Offences Against the Person and Reputation", "Part IX. Offences Against Rights of Property", and so on. One should assume some minimal level of ordering in an Act of Parliament. Had Parliament wished specifically to make war crimes and crimes against humanity domestic offences, it would have been much easier to do so directly, and I cannot imagine why it would have done so in the General Part of the Code.

This reading of s. 7(3.71) is bolstered by its legislative history. Sections 7(3.71)-(3.77) represent the consummation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals (the "Deschênes Commission"). The crux of the Commission's recommendations, we saw, was not the domestic creation of these international offences, but rather, the removal of the obstacle of extraterritoriality and the enablement of Canada to serve as a forum for the domestic prosecution of these offenders. This thrust of the Report is reflected, at p. 158, as follows:

page 745

Need it be stressed again: we are not aiming to make acts, which were deemed innocent when committed, criminal now; such would be unacceptable retroactivity. But extermination of a civilian population, for instance, was already as much criminal in 1940 as it would be today, under the laws of all so-called civilized nations. We are only trying to establish now in Canada a forum where those suspected of having committed such offences may be tried, if found in Canada.

6059

In formulating its recommendations, the Commission specifically commented, at p. 165, that "[t]he Code must contain an express grant of jurisdiction to the courts in Canada". Tarnopolsky J.A. made this observation as well, at p. 60, in the Court of Appeal:

Rather than creating a substantive offence of war crime or crime against humanity, Parliament chose, on the recommendation of the Deschênes Commission, to extend the applicability of existing Criminal Code provisions extant at the time of the acts.

The Commission's view, as I read it, is that new offences did not have to be created; censure of the actual relevant acts was already provided for in the Canadian Criminal Code, as it was in the law of most civilized nations. So any such acts could have been prosecuted under the ordinary Canadian criminal provisions if committed here. What Canadian courts had to be equipped with was the capacity to hear and decide the prosecutions. Consistent with the requirements of international law, the link to international law concepts of war crimes and crimes against humanity was the mechanism selected to ensure that only the cases envisioned by the Report would endow a Canadian court with the capacity to serve as a forum for the prosecution of extraterritorial acts. The question of the presence of war crimes or crimes against humanity is thus one of jurisdiction. The offence with which the accused is charged, on the other hand, is the underlying domestic offence, drawn from the already existing Canadian criminal law at the time of commission.

page 746

Questions of jurisdiction are matters of law entrusted to the trial judge. In Balcombe v. The Queen, supra, Fauteux J., speaking for this Court, had this to say, at pp. 305-6:

The question of jurisdiction is a question of law -- consequently, for the presiding Judge -- even if, to its determination, consideration of the evidence is needed. It is a question strictly beyond the field of these matters which under the law and particularly under the terms of their oath, the jury have to consider. They are concerned only with the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar. Indeed the lawful fulfilment of their duties rests on the assumed existence of the jurisdiction of the Court to try, at the place where it is held, the accused for the crime charged. They are concerned with facts as they may be related to guilt or innocence but not to jurisdiction. [Emphasis added.]

Being a question of law, the trial judge would make his or her determination of whether the act or omission in question amounted to a war crime or a crime against humanity on a balance of probabilities. The jury's duty is to determine the guilt of the accused of the offence with which he or she was charged.

The majority of the Court of Appeal would distinguish Balcombe on the grounds that all of the essential elements of the offence must be put to the jury, and that this includes the offence of a war crime or crime against humanity. As will become clear, I do not view the existence or non-existence of a war crime or crime against humanity as an essential element of the offence but rather as the jurisdictional link grounding prosecution for the underlying Canadian domestic offence. At the same time, however, the jury would of course have to consider whether as a fact the acts that constitute the war crime or crime against humanity occurred in determining whether the offence under Canadian law was committed. The jury is not acting in a vacuum.

page 747

6060

I respectfully reject the distinction drawn by the majority of the Court of Appeal between territorial jurisdiction of the court and territorial reach of the criminal law. The majority seems to have attempted to differentiate between the former, which it characterizes as going to the determination of the proper Canadian court to hear a case, and the latter, which it identifies as affecting the definition of the offences themselves.

With respect, s. 6(2) of the Code does not render Canadian territoriality a defining element of its offences. Rather, it merely precludes a person's conviction or discharge for an offence when committed outside Canada. This general principle of our criminal law system reflects, in addition perhaps to the need for accommodation in the interest of efficiency, Canada's acceptance of the general premise of the sovereignty of nations that underlies international relations. The fact that an act or an omission may have taken place outside Canada's borders does not negate its quality as culpable conduct in the eyes of Canadians and the underlying values of Canadian criminal law. This is reflected, as well, in the law of immigration, deportation and extradition. The principle of territoriality simply responds to the structure of the international order; the prosecution of the perpetrator of a criminal act is normally entrusted to the state in which the act was committed.

Questions of territoriality in all cases deal with the same matter: where did the event take place? Of course, the result of this determination may differ depending on whether the inquiry involves distinguishing between two provinces, on the one hand, or between Canada and another country, on the other. In the former case, the proper provincial court is determined, while in the latter, the capacity to try at all pursuant to the Code is at stake. In either case, however, the skill called upon to make the determination is the same: the technical ability to demarcate the location of the relevant act. In Balcombe, supra, this Court held that this function was properly entrusted to the trial judge. I see no reason why a different rule should apply to the s. 6 inquiry.

page 748

The terms of s. 6 are not absolute; they specifically envision exceptions, whether in the Code itself or in other Acts of Parliament. In making the territorial determination dictated by s. 6, the trial judge must consider whether these exceptional provisions apply. These exceptional provisions typically deem territoriality where relevant specified criteria are met. Although perhaps not enacted neatly in one Code provision, s. 6 and its exceptions constitute a united inquiry, destined to establish whether the court in question can hear the prosecution of the accused. In order to decide on the application of the general rule, the application of the exceptions would have to be assessed. To entrust the latter decision to the jury, while leaving the general question to the judge, would be an illogical division of labour and could only result in unnecessary confusion. The entire question of jurisdiction should therefore be assigned to the trial judge as a matter of law.

Section 7(3.71) of the Code is one of these exceptional provisions. Its criteria, whether the act amounts to a war crime or crime against humanity, whether it constituted an offence pursuant to Canadian law at the time of commission, and whether identifiable individuals were involved, are thus questions of law entrusted to the trial judge and not to the jury.

The Role of Judge and Jury

On this interpretation of the jurisdiction sections, a clear role for both judge and jury emerges.

6061

The role of the jury will be similar to its role in an ordinary prosecution under our domestic law. Its function, and the charge made to it, will be like those that would be made to a jury determining the underlying offence only. The sole difference will be in relation to justifications, excuses and defences. Section 7(3.73) provides the accused with the benefit of pleading all available international justifications, excuses and defences in addition to those existing under domestic law. The one domestic defence made unavailable, by the operation of s. 7(3.74), is the defence of obedience to de facto law. I shall have more to say about this in discussing the constitutionality of the scheme. It is enough to say here that it is clear to me that this is the scheme contemplated by Parliament.

page 749

For his or her part, the trial judge must determine whether all the conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction are met. If the requirements set by Parliament are not satisfied, then the exception to the rule of no extraterritorial application is not met, and the court must decline jurisdiction and the accused acquitted even if all the elements of the offences of manslaughter, robbery, confinement or assault may be satisfied.

It is evident from my earlier comments that I do not agree with the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal that the requirements for jurisdiction be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Unlike the dissenting judges in the Court of Appeal, however, I believe that the trial judge will have to consider the evidence to satisfy the jurisdiction requirements. The judge cannot simply base his or her assessment of these requirements on the charges as alleged, and leave all the findings of fact to the jury, because some of the facts necessary to establish jurisdiction are not the same as those necessary for the jury's determination of the underlying offence. Thus, for example, a jurisdiction requirement of a war crime requires that the action be done during an international military conflict, a fact that need not be found by a jury determining whether there was manslaughter or kidnapping, (though inevitably these facts will be before them and may, in some cases, be relevant to their task in relation to some justification, excuse or defence under international law).

page 750

I see no procedural quagmire in the different functions of judge and jury, although it may at times call for some procedural ingenuity. Certainly, if the charges even as alleged do not meet the jurisdiction requirements, then on motion the judge can decline jurisdiction. Beyond that, however, the judge will have to examine the evidence to determine that the jurisdictional facts are established. In ordinary cases, the judge hears the evidence in relation to the jurisdictional point in a voir dire, since most of it is irrelevant for the jury's issues. However, since in this case the jury will have to hear much of the same evidence related to the offences as the trial judge would have to hear in relation to the jurisdiction issue, it will usually be more efficient to have the trial judge consider the jurisdiction issue at the same time as the jury hears the evidence related to the offence. If desired, and to keep a jury's mind clear, the parts of the evidence or expert testimony that are completely irrelevant to the jury's concerns can be heard in the absence of the jury. At the close of the evidence, the judge will decide whether the conditions for the exercise of jurisdiction have been met. If so, then the court can proceed to hear the verdict of the jury.

6062

The Mental Element Required for War Crimes or Crimes Against Humanity

While my finding on the first ground of appeal is sufficient to allow this appeal, I shall also deal with the second ground of appeal which relates to the requirements of international law regarding the mental element in war crimes and crimes against humanity. The appellant argues that the trial judge seriously erred in his understanding of the requirements of these crimes, and in particular, that the judge set far too high a requirement for the mental element required for there to be a war crime or crime against humanity. For reasons that will appear I agree that the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal erred on the second ground of appeal as well.

page 751

In making his determination on the issue of jurisdiction, the judge must determine that there was a war crime or crime against humanity. What these entail is partly set out by the Code (s. 7 (3.76)), but will also require reference to international law. This creates some complexity, but the requirements can be deciphered by reference to theoretical constructs of criminal law already familiar to us. The structure of most of the international law in relation to war crimes and crimes against humanity can be conveniently examined under the familiar analysis of the elements of the act (the actus reus), the mental elements and defences. The judge must examine the evidence and compare it to the international law to determine whether the requirements of the crime are satisfied, as well as what defences may be available.

Actus Reus Requirement

The issue raised is confined to the mens rea relating to a war crime or crime against humanity, but to understand that issue, it is necessary to examine briefly the requirements of the actus reus necessary to constitute a war crime or crime against humanity. Both the Code and international law contain requirements of particular types of acts or omissions. Thus, for example, the war crime of mistreatment of civilians requires that the accused have done actions that amount to mistreatment. As Manfred Lachs, War Crimes: An Attempt to Define the Issues (1945), chapter 7, observed, these acts are usually characterized by violence. In addition, particular circumstances are frequently required. This is clearly exemplified by the requirement that war crimes involve actions that occurred during a state of war. At times, the actions may also have to be directed at certain objects. For example, some actions, though permissible against enemy soldiers in the field, are war crimes if committed against civilians or prisoners. The trial judge must be satisfied that these particular requirements required by international law and by the Code are met for there to have been a crime against humanity or a war crime. While this may at times raise difficult and complex issues, the general idea of an act or omission, and possibly consequences and circumstances, is well understood; see Lachs, supra, at pp. 16-24; L. C. Green, International Law: A Canadian Perspective (2nd ed. 1988), Part VI, at [sect][sect] 359-64.

page 752

A good example is the requirement that to constitute a crime against humanity the impugned act have been directed at "any civilian population or any identifiable group" (see s. 7(3.76)). Again one must return to the international system perspective to understand this requirement. As mentioned earlier, this is the specific factor that gives the crime the requisite international dimension and that permits extraterritorial prosecution, thus distinguishing it from an "ordinary crime" that the state is expected to prosecute. Unlike ordinary crimes, it is of direct concern to the international community and may be prosecuted wherever the alleged offender may be found. As earlier mentioned, this exception to the ordinary principle that criminal law is territorially limited is made necessary by a number of considerations. As mentioned, where the crime is especially widespread in that it is directed against an entire population (whether of a town, or region, or even nationally) or an identifiable group within the population, foreign enforcement is especially important because there is often the possibility that the government in the state where the crime occurs may not be willing to prosecute; indeed it may be the source of the crimes. For this reason, international law permits other states to exercise jurisdiction to try such crimes. Given that this is the condition to assuming jurisdiction, the trial judge would have to find that the criminal conduct was directed at a civilian population or identifiable group.

6063

page 753

Apart from his error in putting this question to the jury, the trial judge seems to have had a good sense of the actus reus requirements under international law. Thus he specifically noted such requirements as that for war crimes there must be international conflict, and that the accused had to be an agent of an occupying force. To cover other elements of a war crime, he also referred to the acts having to be of the "factual quality" of war crimes or crimes against humanity. This appears to be too ambiguous and should have more specifically been considered against specific types of war crimes or crimes against humanity. This concept illustrates some of the problems of putting this entire question to the jury: this determination clearly involves an assessment of the legal quality of the acts as well as their factual components. This aspect of the judge's understanding of war crimes or crimes against humanity would, however, appear to be adequate if the question were decided, as I have indicated it should be, by the judge as a question of law.

More serious was that the trial judge at several points referred to the accused's actions having "risen up" to the quality of a war crime or crime against humanity. This is not strictly accurate; there may be different considerations for the offences under international law, and they may have some additional requirements to those for domestic offences, but these are not always higher and may not be related to individual culpability. To use language that suggests that somehow there is a higher degree of culpability required in relation to the international crimes is misleading.

Mens Rea Requirement

The trial judge was quite rightly concerned that the acts or omissions should be of a type that is prohibited as war crimes or crimes against humanity as defined in the Code and under international law. But from this the judge drew some seriously erroneous implications about the mental element required to find that there was a war crime or crime against humanity. With all respect, the trial judge, in my view, made two types of errors, which are related in their effect: first, in requiring that there be a mental element for each and every component of a war crime or crime against humanity, and secondly, partly as a result of the first error, in suggesting that the accused needed to have known that his actions were illegal. The simple fact, as I see it, is that there is no need for the jury to be concerned with the mental element in relation to the war crimes and crimes against humanity beyond those comprised in the underlying domestic offence with which the accused is charged. In other words, as I will attempt to demonstrate, the mental blameworthiness required for such crimes is already captured by the mens rea required for the underlying offence. The additional circumstances of the actus reus required in terms of the international system to justify extraterritorial jurisdiction do not require that the accused individually have knowledge of these matters. These components of the actus reus really have nothing to do with individual culpability. As I see it, the law does not require that the accused individually have had knowledge of these factors. Such a requirement cannot be found in either Canadian or international law.

page 754

6064

In neither the jurisdiction nor the definition section of the Code (s. 7(3.71) and s.7 (3.76) respectively) is any mental element specifically alluded to; all that is stated is that there be behaviour that constitutes an act or omission that is contrary to international law. In turn, the requirements for the mental element under international law are often not as clearly established as under our national law. I suspect that this lack of express discussion of the requirement is largely because nobody ever really thought that there was a need for an individual mens rea that went beyond that required for the basic nature of the conduct, whether that be murder, assault, robbery or kidnapping. In international law, the mental element frequently seems to be ignored, and focus is instead placed on the special factual circumstances in which the culpable conduct occurred. However, if a detailed refutation is required, it seems justified to use our established common law rules of mens rea where the international law does not have specific standards.

page 755

Most criminal offences require that there be a mens rea in relation to the basic act or omission. At times, but by no means invariably, some form of mens rea, sometimes knowledge, sometimes recklessness or even inadvertence, is required in relation to consequences and circumstances as well. In the present case, however, the trial judge insisted that there be a subjective mental element in relation to all the elements of the act that constitute the war crime or crime against humanity. For example, in relation to the first count of unlawful confinement, the trial judge considered the necessary mental element to be:

Essential Elements of Count 1: Confinement: Crime Against Humanity

(3)The accused knew that the confinement had the factual quality of a crime against humanity in the sense that it was

(1)enslavement or

(2)inhumane or persecutorial deportation or

(3)racial or religious persecution or

(4)an inhumane act and

(4)The accused knew that the people confined were a civilianpopulation or any identifiable group of persons and

(5)The accused knew the confinement was in execution of or inconnection with the conduct... of war or any war crime. [Emphasis added.]

6065

Moreover, he emphasized that this was a subjective condition which the particular accused must satisfy; any such knowledge could not be simply inferred from the conduct or intent or knowledge to do the simple act. The judge instructed the jury on the second count in exactly the same way except that he substituted "crime against humanity" with "war crime", and he followed a similar pattern in respect of robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter.

page 756

In my view, this is far too high a standard; a mens rea need only be found in relation to the individually blameworthy elements of a war crime or crime against humanity, not every single circumstance surrounding it. This approach receives support in Canadian domestic law. In R. v. DeSousa, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 944, at pp. 964-65, this Court held that reading in such a requirement for every element of an offence misconstrues and overgeneralizes earlier decisions of this Court. Rather, the proper approach, it noted, was that "there must be an element of personal fault in regard to a culpable aspect of the actus reus, but not necessarily in regard to each and every element of the actus reus" (p. 965). [Emphasis added.]
This reasoning is especially appropriate in dealing with circumstances related to international offences that do not involve culpability but are of a more technical nature. For example, the trial judge, in my view, erred in requiring for a finding of war crime that the accused knew that he was an agent of an occupying force or that there was actually war. Had the accused acted not as an agent but on his own, his individual culpability would be no less -- he might, indeed, be more culpable. The same would be true if he had committed the acts charged in peace time. As I have already indicated, all that matters is that these factual conditions be present. In the scheme as set out by the legislature, these conditions constitute a justification in the international system for extraterritorial prosecution rather than matters going to individual culpability. They go to jurisdiction.

The same is true of the trial judge's instruction that it was necessary that the accused know that the actions were directed against a civilian population or an identifiable group. I would argue that such knowledge on the part of the accused is strictly irrelevant to his individual culpability. To forcibly confine or kidnap 8,617 people is equally blameworthy whether he knew or did not know that they were Jews. On a practical level, the lack of real relevance of knowledge about such matters is evident from the circumstances. Can anyone doubt that an adequate knowledge would be that difficult to find? When one is aware that the actions are directed at a large number of people with the same characteristic, such knowledge would be easily inferred. In this case, for example, since Jews had expressly been the only subject of all these actions to the knowledge of those involved, then it seems readily apparent that the requisite knowledge in relation to this circumstance is met. Similar considerations apply to other issues of this kind, such as whether a state of war existed.

page 757

I should at this stage, however, underline that there may be a requirement of a mental element for certain justifications, excuses and defences under international law, but, as previously noted, these are made available to the accused in defending himself or herself of the domestic offence, e.g., kidnapping, with which he is charged. If any such justification, excuse or defence arises on the evidence, it must be put to the jury and if the jury has any reasonable doubt respecting that mental element it must, of course, resolve that doubt in favour of the accused, as is the case of ar defence available to the accused under Canadian law.

6066

As earlier noted, the trial judge's overemphasis on knowledge on the part of the accused led him to a different, if intertwined, type of error. It led him to confuse the difference between the mental element in relation to the factual nature of the impugned act and its legal or moral quality. As Dubin C.J. noted this confusion is best exemplified in the instruction in relation to the term "inhumane act" contained in the definition of "crime against humanity" in s. 7(3.76). This general category should not be taken to import a knowledge of the inhumanity of the behaviour. If an accused knowingly confines elderly people in close quarters within boxcars with little provision for a long train ride, then the fact that the accused subjectively did not consider this inhumane should be irrelevant.

page 758

This confusion between appreciation of the factual as opposed to the moral or legal quality of the accused's actions was exacerbated by further comments in the trial judge's charge that indicated his view of the mens rea requirement. While the judge did refer on a number of occasions to the accused's knowledge of the factual quality of a crime against humanity, as Dubin C.J. points out, he returned again and again to his view that the jury had to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused knew that the act he did was inhumane (i.e., a crime against humanity). Dubin C.J. refers to a number of these instances (at pp. 32-33). I cite a few here:

Remember always that before the accused can be convicted, it has to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, whatever he did to his knowledge rose up to the level of a war crime or rose up to the level of a crime against humanity.

Even if the Crown proved beyond a reasonable doubt the accused committed confinement, robbery, kidnapping or manslaughter; you must acquit unless the Crown also proves beyond a reasonable doubt that to the knowledge of the accused what he did rose up to the level of a war crime or rose up to the level of a crime against humanity.

. . .

One of the ways for the Crown to prove Count 1 is to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused personally knew that the confinement had the factual quality of a crime against humanity in the sense that it was an inhumane act. Now, this is just one element. Of course, there are six or seven other things the Crown has to prove, but this is one example of one element the Crown has to prove. So it is an essential element on that count that the Crown has to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the accused knew that the confinement was an inhumane act. [Emphasis added by Dubin C.J.]

page 759

In my view, these instructions introduced elements of knowledge of both the legal and moral status of the conduct, in a way that is not required by either domestic or international law. It is well established in our domestic criminal law jurisprudence that knowledge of illegality is not required for an accused. Section 19 of the Code echoes a requirement found in earlier codes

6067

(including the one in effect at the time the actions in this case were alleged to have been committed): ignorance of the law by one who commits an offence is not an excuse for committing the offence. At common law the principle is well established. As Smith and Hogan, Criminal Law (7th ed. 1992), put it, at p. 81:

It must usually be proved that D intended to cause, or was reckless whether he caused, the event or state of affairs which, as a matter of fact, is forbidden by law; but it is quite immaterial to his conviction (though it might affect his punishment) whether he knew that the event or state of affairs was forbidden by law. [Emphasis in original.]

Nor should it be forgotten that awareness that the act is morally wrong is also immaterial. Smith and Hogan, supra, note, at p. 53:

A man may have mens rea, as it is generally understood today, without any feeling of guilt on his part. He may, indeed, be acting with a perfectly clear conscience, believing his act to be morally, and even legally, right, and yet be held to have mens rea.

In R. v. Théroux, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 5, at p. 18, McLachlin J. emphasized that regardless of the nature of the circumstances or consequences required:

First, as Williams underlines, this inquiry has nothing to do with the accused's system of values. A person is not saved from conviction because he or she believes there is nothing wrong with what he or she is doing. The question is whether the accused subjectively appreciated that certain consequences would follow from his or her acts, not whether the accused believed the acts or their consequences to be moral.

page 760

The underlying rationale behind the mens rea requirement is that there is a lack of sense of personal blame if the person did not in some way even intend to do the action or omission. In finding a war crime or crime against humanity, the trial judge must, of course, look for the normal intent or recklessness requirement in relation to the act or omission that is impugned. However, there is rarely any requirement that the accused know the legal status or description of his or her behaviour. This is not part of the rules of our criminal law and, in my view, is not required under international law. It would be strange if it were. For as counsel for the intervener B'Nai Brith observed, in the case of crimes against humanity, for example, the issue of humaneness would have to be judged in terms of the moral values of the perpetrator of the prohibited act, rather than the moral views of the international community that established the norm.

The Crown's international law expert, Professor Bassiouni, it is true, did at some point in his testimony suggest that an accused must have had knowledge of international law in order to find that he or she has committed a war crime or crime against humanity. While he readily agreed with the Crown that an accused need not know that his or her actions comprised some particular offence under international law, he suggested that the accused would have to have a "general sense" that his or her conduct was illegal under international law. Representative of his somewhat confusing viewpoint is the following exchange with crown counsel:

Q. Does he have to know that his conduct amounts to a war crime or crime against humanity at international law?

6668

A. He doesn't have to know that with the specificity that you're claiming it, and I suppose by my analogy is, does a person who commits murder know that the act of murder constitutes murder in the first degree in that time of a statute. So it is the general knowledge that there is a prohibition by law that you're supposed to have, as opposed to a specific knowledge of the specific type of crime that you might be committing.

page 761

Q. And so would the victim or the -- ignorance of the law is no excuse in the application of international law?

A. Yes, indeed, because it is a general principle of law because it exists in every legal system of the world.

Q. So what is it that a perpetrator must know in order to attract culpability or liability at international law for war crimes or crimes against humanity?

A. Well, the individual must obviously have knowledge of the nature of the acts he is engaging in. He must know that these acts are a violation of the law. He does not have to know the specific label of the violation that he has committed. And he must act with knowledge or intent.

M. Cherif Bassiouni in his later book, Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law (1992), suggests that there should be a "rebuttable presumption" of knowledge of international criminal law. He states, at p. 364:

This rebuttable presumption includes knowledge of the illegality of the act performed, based on the standard of reasonableness. Notwithstanding this standard of reasonableness, an individual may present the defense of ignorance of the law. Thus, this legal standard is not ultimately objective, but subjective.

Given this basic viewpoint, the trial judge was not surprisingly confused as to the mens rea requirement.

It is instructive at this point to say something about the utility of the views of learned writers such as Professor Bassiouni in determining the applicable international law. They are extremely useful, of course, in bringing before the Court the various relevant sources of law, and as Lord Alverstone observed in West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. v. The King, [1905] 2 K.B. 391, at p. 402, they also render "valuable service in helping to create the opinion by which the range of the consensus of civilized nations is enlarged". But, as he went on to add (at p. 402), "in many instances their pronouncements must be regarded rather as the embodiments of their views as to what ought to be... the conduct of nations inter se, than the enunciation of a rule or practice as universally approved or assented to [by nation states] as to be fairly termed . . . `law'". In a word, international conventions and the practices adopted and approved as law by authoritative decision makers in the world community, along with the general principles of law recognized by civilized countries are what constitute the principal sources of international law. The pronouncements of learned writers on international law are extremely useful in setting forth what these practices and principles are, but the personal views of learned writers in the field, though useful in developing consensus, are of a subsidiary character in determining what constitutes international law. This approach, which is universally accepted by the international community, is authoritatively set down in Art. 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice which reads:

page 762

6069

Article 38

1. The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:

(a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States;

(b) international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;

(c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;

(d) subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. [Emphasis added.]

On an examination of these sources of international law, I am in complete agreement with the dissenting judges in the Court of Appeal that international law does not require such a high mental element as the majority in that court and the trial judge thought necessary. In fact, Bassiouni does not represent the consensus of legal writers. He himself made it clear that the majority view among international law scholars was that there was no requirement of knowledge of the international legal quality of the actions. Clearly, this is not the international law emerging out of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, for which no such knowledge requirement is included. Nor was it considered to be a requirement in the war crimes and crimes against humanity decisions at Nuremberg. And if we turn to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations, Bassiouni in the passage in the testimony produced above accepted the principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse in that application of international law "because it exists in every legal system of the world".

page 763

Indeed, as one goes back through the history of international law, knowledge of international law has never been a requirement for culpability. Traditionally, the western and Christian conception of international law especially in this area can be seen to coincide with the dictates of natural law; under the Roman Law, for example the jus gentium which was applied to non-Romans was presumed because it coincided with the jus naturalis. In Grotius' theory of international law, which applied to all individuals as well, the dictates of international law followed as dictates of natural reason. Piracy or slavery would be contrary to international law as long as the accused had preyed on ships or traded in slaves, regardless of whether the pirates or slavedealers were aware of how their conduct was classified under international law. In the international realm as much as the domestic, blameworthiness in criminal law does not consist of knowingly snubbing the law, but rather in deliberately engaging in certain types of conduct that international law prohibits.

6070

It is evident from his book that Bassiouni required a knowledge of the legal quality of the actions because of his concerns about the state of international law prior to World War II. I will more fully address the issue of the alleged retroactivity of the international law below. It suffices at this point to say that this view appears to be based on an impoverished view of the nature and sources of international law. As Bassiouni himself noted in testimony, his view is a minority one. In relation to war crimes, the content of the prohibited actions was incontestably well established. And in relation to crimes against humanity (with which Bassiouni was concerned in his comments above), the more representative view is that these crimes were well established by the customs of international law as evidenced in practice and in a variety of earlier conventions, and their existence was justified, in particular, on the basis of the widespread practice of many national laws, including those of Germany, which criminally sanctioned such conduct. For example, Schwarzenberger, International Law, vol. 2, The Law of Armed Conflict (1968), at pp. 23-27, emphasizes that the foundation of the Nuremberg decisions on crimes against humanity was the existing prohibitions in civilized nations. For still greater certainty, this alternative (but well established) source for international law is, as noted earlier, specifically referred to in the definition of "crime against humanity" set forth in s. 7(3.76), which alludes to the three alternative sources of international law, conventional international law, customary international law and "the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations".

page 764

To summarize, then, the correct approach, in my view, is that the accused have intended the factual quality of the offence, e.g. that he was shooting a civilian, or that he knew that the conditions in the train were such that harm could occur to occupants. It is not possible to give an exhaustive treatment of which circumstances must have an equivalent knowledge component. Whether there is an equivalent mental element for circumstances will depend on the particular war crime or crime against humanity involved. However, in almost all if not every case, I think that our domestic definition of the underlying offence will capture the requisite mens rea for the war crime or crime against humanity as well. Thus, the accused need not have known that his act, if it constitutes manslaughter or forcible confinement, amounted to an "inhumane act" either in the legal or moral sense. One who intentionally or knowingly commits manslaughter or kidnapping would have demonstrated the mental culpability required for an inhumane act. The normal mens rea for confinement, robbery, manslaughter, or kidnapping, whether it be intention, knowledge, recklessness or wilful blindness, would be adequate. As Egon Schwelb notes in "Crimes Against Humanity" (1946), 23 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 178, at pp. 196-97, almost all the serious crimes of the municipal law of civilized nations are also in some basic sense culpable offences in the minds of humanity; for a similar view, see Law Reform Commission of Canada, Our Criminal Law (1976), at pp. 3, 5 and 7. The additional conditions of the actus reus requirement under international law are intended to be used to ascertain whether the factual conditions are such that the international relations concerns of extraterritorial limits do not arise. Since in almost all if not every case the mens rea for the war crime or crime against humanity will be captured by the mens rea required for the underlying offence that will have to be proved to the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, the trial judge will rarely, if ever, have to make any additional findings in relation to the mens rea to satisfy the jurisdiction requirements.

page 765

6071

From what I have been able to determine, the issue does not arise in this case, but assuming there may in certain cases be circumstances relating to crimes against humanity and war crimes that involve the individual culpability of an accused that is not captured by the mental element in the underlying offence, I do not think this could lead to any unfairness. It must be remembered that under s. 7(3.73) of the Code, an accused may rely on any "justification, excuse or defence available . . . under international law" as well as under the laws of Canada. If a justification, excuse or defence that would have been available had the accused been charged with the crime under international law rather than the underlying crime, it should be referred to the jury with appropriate instructions whether the issue arises on the evidence presented by the Crown or the accused. The jury would then have to decide the issue, with any reasonable doubt decided in favour of the accused.

page 766

For these reasons, I conclude that the trial judge and majority of the Court of Appeal erred in requiring an excessively high mens rea, one going beyond the mens rea for the underlying offence.

Charter Issues

Up to this point, I have focused on distilling the proper interpretation of s. 7(3.71)-(3.77) of the Criminal Code, which I have found to be a jurisdiction-endowing provision, and on defining the precise limits of the trial judge's role in ruling on the preliminary jurisdictional question. I now turn to the constitutional issues raised by the respondent and by the courts below. As I earlier noted, the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal intermixed the interpretative exercise with accommodation of Charter concerns. I prefer first to extract the true intention of Parliament in accordance with the ordinary canons of statutory interpretation, and only then to measure that interpretation by constitutional standards. This approach is especially appropriate in the present case since, as I see it, that interpretation does not pose Charter difficulties. I shall now set forth the questions raised and my response to them.

Does the Interpretation of Section 7(3.71) of the Criminal Code as a Jurisdictional Section Violate Sections 7 and 11(f) of the Charter, by Taking

page 767

From the Jury the Determination of War Crime/Crime Against Humanity?

This challenge was not raised by the respondent as a ground of cross-appeal per se; rather, it underlies his argument and the majority reasons in the Court of Appeal regarding the proper interpretation of s. 7(3.71)-(3.77). For the respondent, the concern lies more with s. 7 of the Charter. He argues that those on trial as a result of s. 7(3.71)-(3.77) are highly stigmatized. Consequently, he argues, unless the accused's guilt of war crimes or of crimes against humanity is found by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt and knowledge and subjective mens rea attach to such crimes, the exigencies of fundamental justice would not be met.

6072

This argument reflects a misunderstanding of this Court's jurisprudence on the dictates of fundamental justice respecting mens rea for an offence that involves special stigma. In R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636, at p. 653, this connection between stigma and necessary mens rea was expressed by Lamer J. (as he then was):

. . . there are, though very few in number, certain crimes where, because of the special nature of the stigma attached to a conviction therefor or the available penalties, the principles of fundamental justice require a mens rea reflecting the particular nature of that crime.

I observed, at p. 665, that:

. . . because of the stigma attached to a conviction for murder, the principles of fundamental justice require a mens rea reflecting the particular nature of that crime, namely one referable to causing death. . . . It is sufficient to say that the mental element required by s. 213(d) of the Criminal Code is so remote from the intention specific to murder (which intention is what gives rise to the stigma attached to a conviction for that crime) that a conviction under that paragraph violates fundamental justice.

page 768

I do not take our reasons in Vaillancourt, supra, to have dictated a necessary standard of proof or to have required that the jury decide certain matters, in cases of special stigma, in order to accord with the principles of fundamental justice. As I read it, the Court viewed certain offences, which import a high degree of stigma, as demanding a higher degree of mens rea, on a substantive level, reflecting the nature of the relevant offence. The debate arises on a substantive, not a procedural plane. The issue is one of finding where, on the objective-to-subjective scale of intent, a particular offence falls. Our assessment of fundamental justice in Vaillancourt, supra, and in all subsequent cases, did not lead us to conclude that because a special stigma might attach to certain offences, only the jury is to be entrusted with finding mens rea and only on a standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. I note that in R. v. Lyons, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309, this Court has held that a hearing for the "labelling" of a convicted person as a dangerous criminal does not require the determination of dangerousness by a jury, though such a determination clearly carries a serious stigma.

The scheme set up by Parliament in s. 7(3.71)-(3.77) of the Code does not deprive the accused of his or her rights in a manner inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice. The accused cannot be found guilty of the offence with which he or she was charged, i.e., the underlying domestic offence, unless the jury finds the relevant mental element on proof beyond a reasonable doubt, a mental element which, we saw, coincides with that of the war crime or crime against humanity. And if any excuse, justification or defence for the act arises under international law, the accused is entitled to the benefit of any doubt about the matter, including any relevant mens rea attached to such excuse, justification or defence.

I would add that any stigma attached to being convicted under war crimes legislation does not come from the nature of the offence, but more from the surrounding circumstances of most war crimes. Often it is a question of the scale of the acts in terms of numbers, but that is reflected in the domestic offence; for example, a charge of the kidnapping or manslaughter of a hundred people in the domestic context itself raises a stigma because of the scale, but one that s. 7 is not concerned about. Similarly, the jurisprudence does not allow for stigma that may also result from being convicted of an offence in which the surrounding circumstances are legally irrelevant but public disapproval strong. Thus one convicted of a planned and deliberate murder can face additional stigma because his or her actions were particularly repulsive or violent, but our system does not make any additional allowance for that.

page 769

6073

A separate but related concern is that reflected in the Court of Appeal majority's interpretation of s. 7(3.71). The majority looked to the Charter right of trial by jury, found in s. 11(f), to reinforce its other justifications for reading s. 7(3.71) as creating the offences of war crime and crime against humanity. The majority observed that the function of the jury is strongly rooted in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused. In its view, the determination of whether the accused's conduct amounts to a war crime or crime against humanity involves a question of culpability and thus must be entrusted to the jury. At page 111 of its reasons, the majority explained:

There can be no doubt that the allegations that Finta committed war crimes and crimes against humanity go to his culpability. Without these allegations Canada has no interest in and no justification for bringing Finta before a Canadian criminal court to answer for his conduct. The moral claim that Canada has against those who have committed the offences referred to in s. 7(3.71) outside Canada comes not from the mere alleged violation of Canadian domestic criminal law but from the additional allegation that the violation reached the dimension and status of a war crime or a crime against humanity. Canada's international obligation to prosecute such offences rests on the same foundation.

page 770

The question, in the eyes of the Court of Appeal, thus was properly left to the jury.

In my view, Canada always has an interest, or a moral claim, in bringing those who commit acts that it regards as offensive behaviour to justice. Conduct is not viewed as any less culpable merely because it is committed abroad; murder of anybody anywhere is something we find abhorrent. This is reflected, as I earlier noted, in our laws of immigration and extradition. However, because of Canada's respect for the underlying premises of international relations, i.e., comity and respect for the sovereignty of independent states, a self-imposed limit is placed on its ability to prosecute these culpable acts when committed outside its territory. As part of our respect for sovereignty and part of our confidence in the standards of other nations, we would normally expect that other nations would punish the culpable conduct. Such a limit is also justified on the basis of efficacy of prosecution; it is usually more efficient and effective to prosecute in the place where the criminal act actually occurred. Nevertheless, we should never forget that, throughout, in our view, this conduct constitutes culpable conduct in violation of our legal standards. This perspective is reflected in s. 6 of the Code, explored above. The general principle embodied therein does not strip extraterritorially committed offences of their culpability in Canadian eyes; rather, the ability to convict or to discharge is removed.

The concern towards which the jurisdictional portion of s. 7(3.71) is directed is, rather, the determination of the appropriate court to hear the case. Put another way, the inquiry goes to assessing whether Canadian courts are able to convict or discharge the perpetrator of the relevant conduct. The international community agreed, presumably because of the general revulsion for these types of conduct and their recognition of the need for cooperation because of the difficulty in bringing offenders to justice in the place where they were committed, that war crimes and crimes against humanity presented cases worthy of exception to the general concerns of international law. The preliminary question in s. 7(3.71), whether the relevant conduct constitutes a situation evaluated by the international community to constitute one warranting treatment exceptional to the general precepts of international law, involves an assessment of Canada's international obligations and other questions concerning the interrelationship of nations. The culpability of the acts targeted by this provision, from Canada's perspective, arises from, and will be assessed according to our standards of offensive behaviour as embodied in the Code. In the absence of international accord, we would still have found the conduct criminal and culpable, but for other policy reasons, would not have prosecuted in our courts. It is this domestic evaluation of culpability that served as the instigator for Canada's agreement to be bound by international conventions in this area. The decision to give Canadian courts jurisdiction in the case of war crimes and crimes against humanity, as is the case in the other situations of extraterritorial jurisdiction granted in s. 7 of the Code, is based not on culpability, but on other often totally unrelated policy considerations. The preliminary question of war crime or crime against humanity is more of a political inquiry than one of culpability. As such, the issue is not one that is viewed as traditionally falling within the province of the jury. Admittedly, the standard used to determine whether these exceptional cases are present is one of international "crimes". However, this does not take away from the fact that the considerations underlying this determination will involve questions of international obligations, with which the trial judge is better equipped to deal.

6074

page 771

In my view, this situation is similar to that on which I commented on in Libman v. The Queen,

page 772

[1985] 2 S.C.R. 178, a case concerning Canadian criminal jurisdiction. I there noted that the concerns of international comity normally called for restraint in the extraterritorial application of Canadian criminal law. But I added that, in the context there, the dictates of international comity were not offended because there was a substantial Canadian element in the criminal activities involved. Moreover, I noted that our respect for the interest of other states was in fact served by assisting in the prosecution of offences having a transnational impact on other states. In an increasingly interdependent world, I observed (at p. 214), "we are all our brother's keepers" -- we are all responsible for the welfare of those in other societies. Nowhere can our international responsibility be more at stake than in the situation of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The international community has not only stated that it does not object to our exercising jurisdiction in this field; it actively encourages the prosecution of those whose criminal conduct also constitutes war crimes or crimes against humanity. From the sheer viewpoint of our moral responsibility, I fail to see any injustice in prosecuting these crimes in accordance with our normal criminal procedures.

When one considers the technical nature of the actual factual findings that must be made by the trial judge on the preliminary jurisdictional question, as well as the complicated nature of the international law with which he or she must grapple, it is apparent that the assignment of this determination to the trial judge is just and well-designed. As noted earlier, the factual issues involve matters specific to war, state policy and the classification of groups or individuals. In the case of a specific war crime, the trial judge would be confronted with questions of circumstances, such as whether the actions occurred during a state of war, as well as of definition of the objects of the relevant conduct, such as whether the victims were enemy soldiers, surrendered prisoners or civilians. Where a crime against humanity is alleged, the trial judge's findings would have to include such issues as whether the impugned conduct was the practical execution of state policy and whether the conduct targeted a civilian population or other identifiable group of persons. The technical nature of these inquiries, unrelated as they are to matters of culpability, do not form part of the special capacity of the jury. This leads me to conclude that it is not unfair or contrary to our philosophy of trial by jury to entrust these issues to the trial judge rather than the jury.

6075

page 773

Moreover, even among the authorities, much confusion exists as to the distillation of the contents of international law. No clear articulation of the physical and mental elements of the international offences of war crimes and crimes against humanity and their defences is found among scholars in this area. This confusion is understandable and unavoidable in our system of international law among sovereign nations. Although some aspects of these offences are delineated in conventions, this is not the case for all; another important source of international law is custom. To establish custom, an extensive survey of the practices of nations is required. Moreover, in the case of crimes against humanity, the Criminal Code definition is informed by the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations. As L. C. Green remarks, "Canadian Law, War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity" (1988), 59 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 217, at p. 226:

> . . . a major problem would arise in seeking to ascertain just what is meant by the `general principles of law recognized by the community of nations'. . . . The difficulty lies in determining what are `general principles of law' and what percentage of the world's States constitutes a sufficient proportion to be considered `the community of nations'. Does this collection have to include every major power or be representative of all the leading legal systems of the world?

It is, of course, not an answer to this complicated task to say that the contents of international offences are too difficult to distill and, therefore, that the accused cannot be found guilty; the confusion is the reality of the international law which Canada has obliged itself to observe and apply. This abandonment of international obligation, however, is likely to occur where the jury is called upon to determine the contents of the international offences. The necessary confusion could mislead the jury into believing that international norms are not really law and opens the door to manipulative lawyering. The questions of pinpointing international law, therefore, are best left in the hands of the trial judge whose training better equips him or her for the task. Not only is the judge better trained than the jury in evaluating international law, but, in fact, his or her interpretation of international law bears some force internationally (see Art. 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice). Again, the inquiries required are not of a kind immediately related to the accused's culpability for the domestic offence; rather, they are more legal and technical. There can, in my view, be no doubt that justice is better served by leaving the question of international law to the trial judge. I can perhaps make the point that the process bears some similarity to that of determining the content and application of common law, except that the latter, fluid and moveable as it may be, is far more precise.

page 774

6076

The approach taken in the courts below leads to the following incongruous result. War crimes and crimes against humanity were viewed as so heinous as to require a procedure so unmanageable as to make successful prosecution unlikely. This is certainly not called for by the Charter. From R. v. Lyons, supra, onwards, this Court has repeatedly reiterated that s. 7 requires a fair procedure, not the procedure most favourable to the accused that can be imagined, and that fairness requires a proper consideration of the public interest (at p. 362). And here the public interest is no less than Canada's obligation as a responsible member of the world community to bring to justice those in our midst who have committed acts constituting war crimes and crimes against humanity -- an obligation clearly contemplated by the Charter (s. 11(g)). This procedure, devised by Parliament, is essential to underline the fundamental values shared by Canadians with the world community. It must be workable not only to render justice in relation to the horrors of the past. It must also respond to the ongoing atrocities that daily assault our eyes whenever we turn on the television and that, we all have reason to fear, will continue into the future. And, of course, the procedure, as devised by Parliament, is fair. With appropriate modifications to ensure that Canada is respectful of the jurisdictional limits under the law of nations and the additional defences it provides, it is the same procedure we use to prosecute Canadians for crimes committed in Canada. With one exception required by international law, those accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity are accorded no less. They deserve no more.

page 775

As we have seen, many cogent reasons justify Parliament's choice to entrust to the trial judge the preliminary jurisdictional question of the presence of a war crime or a crime against humanity to be determined on a balance of probabilities. It must be realized, however, that the jury's role in the prosecution remains extensive. As in any other domestic prosecution, the jury is the sole arbitrator of whether both the actus reus and the mens rea for the offence with which the accused is charged are present and whether any domestic defences are available to the accused. Moreover, in addition to its normal functions, the jury also decides whether any international justification, excuse or defence is available. These determinations are not merely technical findings to supplement the extensive role of the trial judge; on the contrary, they go to the essence of the accused's culpability. The jury alone decides whether the accused is physically and mentally guilty of the offence charged, on proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

page 776

The only element removed from the jury's usual scope of considerations in regular domestic prosecutions is the de facto law defence (s. 7(3.74)). This constitutes the respondent's second ground of cross-appeal, to which I now turn.

Does Section 7(3.74) of the Criminal Code Violate Section 7 of the Charter by Removing Available Defences?

6077

Section 7(3.74) must be read in conjunction with s. 7(3.73) in understanding the overall sch of defences permitted by the Code. For convenience, I will repeat them:

7. . . .

(3.73) In any proceedings under this Act with respect to an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71), notwithstanding that the act or omission is an offence under the laws of Canada in force at the time of the act or omission, the accused may, subject to subsection 607(6), rely on any justification, excuse or defence available under the laws of Canada or under international law at that time or at the time of the proceedings.

(3.74) Notwithstanding subsection (3.73) and section 15, a person may be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission referred to in subsection (3.71) even if the act or omission is committed in obedience to or in conformity with the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission.

The correct interpretation of these two sections is that they qualify each other. Section 7(3.73) does not in my view contradict s. 7(3.74). Together they indicate that the accused has the benefit of all available international and domestic justifications, excuses or defences. All that is ruled out by the operation of s. 7(3.74) is the simple argument that because a domestic law existed that authorized the conduct, that in itself acts as an excuse. I have indicated earlier that this rule is taken from the international law on the subject, and is founded on the very rationale for the existence of that law; see

page 777

Principles of the Nuremberg Charter and Judgment, Principle IV, supra.

The inclusion of the international justifications, excuses and defences will allow any recognized doctrines peculiar to the international context to be included. An example of a peculiar form of international defence is that of reprisals or the more general doctrine of military necessity; see, for example, W. J. Fenrick, "The Prosecution of War Criminals in Canada" (1989), 12 Dalhousie L.J. 256, at pp. 273-74. However, no such international justifications, excuses or defences are claimed here, and none applies.

The two defences put to the jury in this case are ones that exist under our domestic law. They are the peace officer and military orders defences, which are both related to arguments based on authorization or obedience to national law. These defences are not simply based on a claim that there existed a national law under which the accused acted. The rationale for these defences is that a realistic assessment of police or military organizations requires an element of simple obedience; there must be some degree of accommodation to those who are members of such bodies.

At the same time, it is generally recognized that totally unthinking loyalty cannot be a shield for any human being, even a soldier. The Canadian domestic provisions are probably more generous than required under international law. For example, a number of international lawyers have observed that the superior orders defence lacks official recognition under international law; see for example, Yoram Dinstein, The Defence of 'Obedience to Superior Orders' in International Law (1965). The Charter of the International Military Tribunal and the trials pursued under it did not accept such a defence, except in mitigation of punishment. The defence, however, is part of the military law of many nations. The American military trial of soldiers for the horrendous My Lai massacre during the Vietnam War is a widely known military case where the defence was raised 6078

In my

page 778

view, the defence is part of our national law, as explained notably in the work of L. C. Green; see, for example, Superior Orders in National and International Law (1976). The defence is not simply based on the idea of obedience or authority of de facto national law, but rather on a consideration of the individual's responsibilities as part of a military or peace officer unit. For these reasons, such a defence can be considered by the jury, and is not excluded under s. 7(3.74).

Essentially obedience to a superior order would appear to provide a valid defence unless the act is so outrageous as to be manifestly unlawful. Further, in any case, an accused will not be convicted of an act committed pursuant to an order wherein he or she had no moral choice but to obey. The flavour of the defence and the circumstances under which it may apply can perhaps be caught by excerpts from relevant authorities on the matter, many of which are reproduced in L. C. Green,"The Defence of Superior Orders in the Modern Law of Armed Conflict" (1993), 31 Alta. L. Rev. 320. I set forth a few of these. Lauterpacht, having referred to British and American manuals of military law, has this to say about it in his revised edition of Oppenheim's International Law (6th ed. 1944), vol. 2, at pp. 452-53:

. . . a Court confronted with the plea of superior orders adduced in justification of a war crime is bound to take into consideration the fact that obedience to military orders, not obviously unlawful, is the duty of every member of the armed forces and that the latter cannot, in conditions of war discipline, be expected to weigh scrupulously the legal merits of the order received. . . . However, . . . the question is governed by the major principle that members of the armed forces are bound to obey lawful orders only and that they cannot therefore escape liability if, in obedience to a command, they commit acts which both violate unchallenged rules of warfare and outrage the general sentiment of humanity.

page 779

That there is nothing unfair in not permitting superior orders as a defence where the act is "manifestly unlawful" is evident when one considers the nature of a manifestly unlawful order as it appears in Ofer v. Chief Military Prosecutor (the Kafr Qassem case) [Appeal 279-283/58, Psakim (Judgments of the District Courts of Israel), vol. 44, at p. 362], cited in appeal before the Military Court of Appeal, Pal. Y.B. Int'l L. (1985), vol. 2, p. 69, at p. 108, where the Military Court of Appeal of Israel approved the following judgment:

The identifying mark of a `manifestly unlawful' order must wave like a black flag above the order given, as a warning saying: `forbidden'. It is not formal unlawfulness, hidden or half-hidden, not unlawfulness that is detectable only by legal experts, that is the important issue here, but an overt and salient violation of the law, a certain and obvious unlawfulness that stems from the order itself, the criminal character of the order itself or of the acts it demands to be committed, an unlawfulness that pierces the eye and agitates the heart, if the eye be not blind nor the heart closed or corrupt. That is the degree of `manifest' illegality required in order to annul the soldier's duty to obey and render him criminally responsible for his actions.

In this area, the trial judge did a balanced job in setting out the requirements of the defence. For the peace officer defence he instructed the jury that the Crown must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that: (1) no reasonable person in the position of the accused would honestly (even if mistakenly) believe that he or she had lawful authority; or, (2) any reasonable person in the position of the accused would know that the offence (e.g., confinement) had the factual quality of a crime against humanity or a war crime; or, (3) the accused used unnecessary or excessive force. For the military orders defence, the judge instructed the jury that the Crown had to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that: (1) no reasonable person in the position of the accused would honestly (even if mistakenly) believe that the order was lawful, or, (2) any reasonable person in the position of the accused would know that the confinement had the factual quality of a crime against humanity or a war crime; and, (3) the accused had a moral choice to disobey because no reasonable person in the position of the accused would honestly (even if mistakenly) believe on reasonable grounds that he or she would suffer harm equal to or greater than the harm he or she caused. In my view, such limits on these defences give effect to the intent of the s. 7(3.74) exclusion of the claim simpliciter of obedience to de facto national law.

6079

page 780

It must be remembered that "the requirements of fundamental justice are not immutable; rather, they vary according to the context in which they are invoked"; see Lyons, supra, at p. 361. I would agree with Callaghan A.C.J. at p. 586 that "[t]here is no statutory or common law rule that supports the proposition that all defences are applicable to all offences". In R. v. Bernard, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 833, a majority of this Court agreed that the removal of a particular defence does not violate the principles of fundamental justice in s. 7 of the Charter even when that defence, drunkenness, arguably concerns the existence of mens rea. This is particularly the case where the exculpatory defence would undermine the entire purpose of an offence; for example, the defence of drunkenness cannot be used as a defence to impaired driving because it constitutes the very nature of the offence; see R. v. Penno, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 865. Less controversially, justifications and excuses are commonly restricted in their application, and there is no suggestion that this violates the principles of fundamental justice. For example, s. 14 of the Code prevents the operation of the defence of consent in relation to offences of causing death.

The whole rationale for limits on individual responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity is that there are higher responsibilities than simple observance of national law. That a law of a country authorizes some sort of clearly inhumane conduct cannot be allowed to be a defence. Indeed, one main concern of both war crimes and especially crimes against humanity relates to state-sponsored or authorized cruelty. To allow the state to authorize and immunize its agents from any responsibility simply by enacting a law authorizing behaviour that is contrary to the principles of international law and the general principles of law observed by all civilized nations is in my view untenable. The basic viewpoint of a country such as Canada that recognizes that the standards of international law are part of our domestic law cannot allow for other states simply to deny or violate observation of the standards of international law by the enactment of contrary domestic laws.

page 781

Before turning to the remaining Charter issues raised in the cross-appeal, I should say that I largely accept the reasoning of both Callaghan A.C.J. and the Court of Appeal judges as more than adequate to dispose of these remaining issues, but I would make some additional observations.

6080

The reasons I have just given in no way detract from the findings of Callaghan A.C.J., accepted b the unanimous Court of Appeal, regarding the four remaining Charter issues on the cross-appeal.

Do the War Crime Provisions Violate Sections 7 and 11(g) of the Charter Because They Are Retroactive?

On its face, the jurisdiction provision, s. 7(3.71), specifically requires that the impugned conduct be illegal under both the Canadian law and the international law at the time. The simplest answer to this Charter argument is again that the accused is not being charged or punished for an international offence, but a Canadian criminal offence that was in the Criminal Code when it occurred. Nevertheless, the accused argues that the international law in this area was both retroactive and vague. This argument is in my view based on a shallow understanding of the nature and contents of international law.

page 782

The definitions of "war crime" and "crime against humanity" in s. 7(3.76) requires that the act "at that time and . . . place, constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law". The definition of "crime against humanity" expressly allows for a third alternative, that the act be "criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations".

The nature of a decentralized international system is such that international law cannot be conveniently codified in some sort of transnational code. Its differing sources may alarm some strict legal positivists, but almost all international lawyers now recognize that such a crude analogy to the requirements of a domestic law system is simplistic; see, for example, Williams and de Mestral, supra. The most common sources for international law are in the custom of international state practice and in international conventions. But other sources are also well established. For example, Art. 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice provides as a third source, "the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations".

Even on the basis of international convention and customary law, there are many individual documents that signalled the broadening prohibitions against war crimes and crimes against humanity. Particularly with regard to war crimes there were numerous conventions that indicated that there were international rules on the conduct of war and individual responsibility for them. These limits were found in Christian codes of conduct, in rules of chivalry and in the writing of the great international law writers such as Grotius. All of this customary European law was confirmed and developed in a number of treaties and conventions through the 19th and 20th Centuries, for example, in the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907. This impressive list of prohibited forms of conduct in war extended to treatment of non-combatants, innocent civilians and the imprisoned, the sick and the wounded.

page 783

As well, one should note that international law continues to maintain that crimes against humanity and war crimes were well established. This remains the official view of both international and national tribunals. As Bassiouni, supra, notes, at pp. 534-35:

6081

. . . arguments challenging the legality of the Charter's enunciation of "crimes against humanity" were consistently raised at the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials, the post-Nuremberg prosecutions under CCL [Allied Control Council Law] 10, before the proceedings conducted by the Allies in their occupation zones, and in the special military tribunals set up by the United States in the Far East. Similar claims were also raised in national tribunals, such as in the Eichmann and Barbie trials held, respectively, in Israel and France. They have always been rejected.

Bassiouni himself continued to have concerns about the somewhat uncertain status of crimes against humanity. It is part of his view that an entirely separate international court and a separate and elaborate international code is required. While these are admirable objectives, the absence of such ideal conditions should not be allowed to confuse the issue of whether crimes against humanity were retroactive in 1944 or not. The actions impugned as crimes against humanity had their own solid foundation.

As regards crimes against humanity, I prefer the reasoning of writers such as Schwarzenberger, supra, who have emphasized that the strongest source in international law for crimes against humanity was the common domestic prohibitions of civilized nations. The conduct listed under crimes against humanity was of the sort that no modern civilized nation was able to sanction: enslavement, extermination, and other inhumane acts directed at civilian populations or identifiable groups. These types of actions have been so widely banned in societies that they can truly be said to fall to the level of acts that are mala in se. Even Bassiouni, supra, at p. 168, observes that the "historical evolution demonstrates that what became known as `crimes against humanity' existed as part of `general principles of law recognized by civilized nations' long before the Charter's formulation in 1945".

page 784

The drafters of our Charter realized that those with impoverished views of international law might argue that enforcing the contents of international law could be retroactive. Thus, s. 11(g) specifically refers to the permissibility of conviction on the basis of international law or the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations. A review of the drafting history of this provision reveals that one of the factors motivating the terms of the provision was the concern about preventing prosecution of war criminals or those charged with crimes against humanity; see the Deschênes Commission Report, supra, at pp. 137-48, especially at pp. 144-46; Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada Issue no. 47, (January 28, 1981), at pp. 47:57-47:59, and Issue no. 41, (January 20, 1981), at p. 41:99.

For these reasons, I think it clear that the Code provisions do not violate s. 11(g) as being retroactive.

Does Section 7(3.71) Read with Section 7(3.76) Violate Section 7 of the Charter by Reason of Vagueness?

The respondent argues that the legislation in respect of the charges he faces is unconstitutional because it is too vague. This, of course, relates to the generality of the definitions of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Again the simple answer is that the offence with which the accused is charged and for which he will be punished is the domestic offence in the 1927 Criminal Code, and it is readily apparent that the cross-appeal is not concerned with arguing that these standard Code provisions are unconstitutionally vague.

6082

page 785

To the extent that arguments of vagueness apply to the jurisdiction section, as I have outlined earlier, I consider this to be based first of all on a limited view of the nature and content of international law. As Williams and de Mestral, supra, at p. 12, note, even though there is no comprehensive codification, international law can nevertheless be determined. Given our common law tradition, we should be used to finding the law in a number of disparate sources. The definition section (s. 7(3.76)) instructs us that a war crime is partly defined under customary or conventional international law, and a crime against humanity, under customary or conventional international law, or under the general principles observed by civilized nations.

As noted earlier, the requirements of international law in 1944 in relation to war crimes are seen to be quite elaborate and detailed. And in relation to crimes against humanity, while somewhat more difficult, the reference to the national laws of most civilized nations at the time would indicate that such conduct would be excluded under the national laws. Finally, as already explained, much of this conduct is illegal under international law because it is considered so obviously morally culpable that it verges on being malum in se.

The standard for unconstitutional vagueness has been discussed by this Court in several cases. In R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606, Gonthier J., at p. 643, thus summed up the standard of vagueness: "a law will be found unconstitutionally vague if it so lacks in precision as not to give sufficient guidance for legal debate". In United Nurses of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 901, McLachlin J. for the majority wrote, at p. 930:

page 786

The union cites the principle that there must be no crime or punishment except in accordance with fixed, pre-determined law. But the absence of codification does not mean that a law violates this principle. For many centuries, most of our crimes were uncodified and were not viewed as violating this fundamental rule. Nor, conversely, is codification a guarantee that all is made manifest in the Code. Definition of elements of codified crimes not infrequently requires recourse to common law concepts: see R. v. Jobidon, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 714, where the majority of this Court, per Gonthier J., noted the important role the common law continues to play in the criminal law. In my view, the contents of the customary, conventional and comparative sources provide enough specificity to meet these standards for vagueness.

Did the Pre-Trial Delay Violate Sections 7, 11(b) and 11(d) of the Charter?

The respondent also attempts to argue that the 45-odd years that have elapsed between the alleged commission of the offences and the charging of Mr. Finta constitutes a violation of his Charter guarantees. This contention has no merit. This Court has already held that pre-charge delay, at most, may in certain circumstances have an influence on the assessment of whether post-charge delay is unreasonable but of itself is not counted in determining the delay, R. v. Morin, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 771, at p. 789. More commonly, pre-charge delay is not given any weight in this assessment; see R. v. Kalanj, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1594. The Charter does not insulate accused persons from prosecution solely on the basis of the time that has elapsed between the commission of the offence and the laying of the charge; see R. v. L. (W.K.), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 1091, at p. 1100. As the respondent does not seem to complain about any post-charge delay, this ground of cross-appeal must be dismissed.

6083

page 787

Does Section 7(3.71) Violate Sections 7 and 15 of the Charter by Applying Only to Acts Committed Outside Canada?

This ground assumes that s. 7(3.71) of the Code creates the new offences of war crimes and crimes against humanity. As has been discussed above, this provision is a jurisdictional one and creates no new offences. Whether impugned conduct is committed abroad or in Canada, the accused would be charged with the same offence, be it murder, robbery, kidnapping or forcible confinement, as in this case, and subject to the same penalty, if convicted. In fact, any difference in treatment favours the extraterritorial perpetrator of the relevant act or omission. Whereas the local perpetrator can only be convicted upon the jury's finding of both actus reus and mens rea and that no domestic defence avails, the conviction of the extraterritorial perpetrator requires, in addition to the surmounting of those same hurdles, the jury's rejection of any applicable international justification, excuse or defence and the trial judge's finding that the requirements of war crime or crime against humanity have been met. In this way, the extraterritorial offender actually benefits from double protection as a result of s. 7(3.71).

Conclusion and Disposition

Before concluding I should refer to a further technical question. The indictment alleged two counts each of unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter; each of these offences alleged, in separate counts, a war crime or a crime against humanity. From what I have stated earlier, it will be obvious that I agree with Tarnopolsky J.A. that it was unnecessary to charge each of the underlying offences twice, once as constituting a crime against humanity and once as a war crime. To give jurisdiction to Canadian courts, it is sufficient that the act charged constituted a crime against humanity or a war crime, so there were in essence four counts and not eight as framed.

page 788

I would allow the appeal on the basis of the first and second grounds of appeal, set aside the judgment of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal and order a new trial on four counts, one each of unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter, each count alternatively constituting a war crime or crime against humanity. I would dismiss the cross-appeal on the Charter issues.

The judgment of Gonthier, Cory and Major JJ. was delivered by CORY J. -- How should the section of the Criminal Code dealing with war crimes and crimes against humanity be interpreted? That is the fundamental issue to be resolved in this appeal.

6084

I. Historical and Factual Background

Some facts, well known to all must be set out. In September 1939, the Second World War began in Europe. It ended on that continent with the surrender of Germany on May 8, 1945. Canada, as one of the allied powers, was at war with the axis countries (Germany and Italy) during the war. Hungary joined the axis powers in 1940, and was officially in armed conflict with Canada between December 7, 1941 and January 20, 1945.

Throughout the war Germany was led by Adolf Hitler and the National Socialist German Workers' Party (the Nazi Party). The German government pursued a cruel and vicious policy directed against Jewish people. When the war broke out, this same cruel policy was extended to all the areas under German influence and occupation, including Hungary. The implementation of the "final solution" by the German government meant that Jews were deprived of all means of earning an income, of their property, and eventually were deported to camps in eastern Europe, where they provided forced labour for the German war effort. In these dreadful camps many were put to death.

page 789

In Hungary, between 1941 and 1944 a series of anti-Jewish laws were passed. They culminated in the promulgation of a law containing a formula for the identification of Jews and requiring them to wear the yellow star. The Jews were therefore an identifiable group for the purposes of Hungarian law.

In March 1944, German troops invaded Hungary. The existing government was removed and an even more servile pro-German puppet government was installed. After the invasion, although Hungary appeared to exist as a sovereign state, it was in fact an occupied country. In order to obtain complete control over Hungary's economic and military resources, the German government established a command structure which flowed directly from Heinrich Himmler, the Reichsführer SS and chief of German police, through the German-appointed Higher SS and police leader for Hungary in Budapest, and thence to the various German police and SS units that were stationed throughout the country, and from there to the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie and the Hungarian police force.

The Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie was an armed paramilitary public security organization. It provided police services in rural areas and acted as a political police force. The German forces occupying Hungary were instructed not to disarm the Gendarmerie as it was in the process of being restructured so that it would be available to the Hungarian Higher SS and the Police Leader. Following the German occupation the new puppet government quickly passed a series of anti-Jewish laws and decrees. A plan for the purging of Jews from Hungary was incorporated in Ministry of Interior Order 6163/44, dated April 7, 1944. This was the infamous Baky Order. It was the only "authority" for the confinement of all Hungarian Jews, the confiscation of their property and their deportation.

page 790

It was the Baky Order which provided the master plan for the implementation of the final solution, which was to take place in six phases, namely: Isolation, Expropriation, Ghettoization, Concentration, Entrainment and Deportation. To carry out this plan, Hungary was divided into six zones under the command of the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie. The City of Szeged was designated as one of seven concentration centres in Zone 4. The Baky Order was addressed to a number of officials, including all Gendarme District Commands, all Commanding Officers of the Gendarme (Detective) Subdivisions and the Central Detective Headquarters of the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie. It placed responsibility for carrying out the plan on the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie and certain local police forces.

6085

Shortly after the issuance of the Baky Order the six phases of the final solution were put into effect in Szeged. The Jewish people of the city were rounded up and forced into a fenced-in ghetto. Usually the Jews remained in the ghetto for a couple of weeks. They were then either transferred directly to a brickyard, or first to a sports field and then a few days later to the brickyard. By June 20, 1944, 8,617 Jews had been collected in the brickyard.

The brickyard was filthy, with grossly inadequate sanitary facilities. It consisted of a large open area containing an enormous kiln, a chimney and several buildings used for drying bricks. Jewish men, women and children were crowded together. They slept on the ground in the drying sheds, which had roofs but no walls. The compound was surrounded by a fence and guarded by gendarmes.

Announcements were repeatedly made over the loudspeaker ordering the Jews to surrender their remaining valuables, gold or jewellery. When the Jews were gathered for these announcements, a basket or hamper was presented for the collection of the valuables and the people were told that anyone who failed to comply with the orders would be executed.

page 791

In the days between June 24 and 30, 1944, the Jews in the brickyard were marched by the gendarmes to the Rokus train station. There they were forced into box cars on three trains which took them from their homes in Hungary to the stark horror of the concentration camps.

Some 70 to 90 Jews together with their luggage were forced into each boxcar. These cars measured roughly eight metres by two metres. There was no artificial lighting in them. The crowding was so intense that most were forced to remain standing throughout the dreadful journey. The doors on the boxcars were padlocked shut. The only openings for air were small windows with grilles located in each of the four upper corners of the boxcar.

Usually the boxcars contained two buckets, one for water and the other for toilet facilities. However, during the journey the toilet buckets quickly overflowed with human excrement. The crowding was so bad that the buckets were inaccessible to many of the prisoners who were forced to relieve themselves where they stood or sat.

As a result of the intolerable conditions in the boxcars, some of the Jews, particularly the elderly, died during the journey. Neither the gendarmes nor the German guards permitted the bodies to be removed prior to the train's reaching its destination. The stench of decaying flesh was added to that of human excrement. Truly, these were nightmare journeys into hell.

Imre Finta was born on September 2, 1912 in the town of Kolozsvar. He studied law at the university in Szeged in the 1930s. In 1935 he enrolled at the Royal Hungarian Military Academy, and on January 1, 1939 was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie. On April 5, 1942, he was promoted to the rank of captain. He was transferred to Szeged as the commander of an investigative unit of the Gendarmerie.

6086

In the post-war confusion Finta left Hungary. In 1947-48, he was tried in absentia in the People's

page 792

Tribunal of Szeged and convicted of "crimes against the people". He was sentenced to five years of forced labour (later commuted to five years' imprisonment), confiscation of property, loss of employment and loss of the right to political participation for ten years. In 1951, Finta emigrated to Canada, and in 1956 became a Canadian citizen.

On January 27, 1958, as a result of a statutory limitation that existed under Hungarian law, the punishment of Finta in that country became statute-barred. In 1970, the Presidential Council of the Hungarian People's Council issued a general amnesty which, by its terms, applied to Finta. In Canada, the trial judge found that the general amnesty did not, either in its own terms or by operation of Hungarian law, constitute a pardon. Further, he found that the Hungarian trial and conviction were nullities under Canadian law. As a result, he concluded that Finta was not entitled to plead autrefois convict or pardon.

II. The Evidence

Expert Evidence as to the Validity of the Baky Order

Dr. Revesz testified that the Baky Order was manifestly illegal. He also stated that members of the Gendarmerie were involved in the conduct of criminal investigations. They were thus required to have a thorough training in Hungarian law and procedure. Dr. Revesz concluded that, given a gendarme's knowledge of the law and the decrees published prior to the Baky Order, such an officer would have known that the Baky Order was beyond the prerogative of the Under Secretary of State and contained at least 14 violations of Hungarian law.

The trial judge directed the jury that the Baky Order was unlawful as violating Hungarian law, including a number of principles of the Hungarian Constitution.

page 793

Evidence Pertaining to Finta's Involvement in Events at Szeged

Finta was charged with unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter under the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1927, c. 36, as amended. There are in effect four pairs of alternate counts. For example, count one describes the forcible confinement of 8,617 Jews as a crime against humanity, whereas count two characterizes that same forceable confinement as a war crime. The indictment alleges that in May and June of 1944 Finta forcibly confined 8,617 Jews in the brickyard at Szeged where he robbed them of their personal effects and valuables. It further alleges that in June 1944 at the Rokus railway station he kidnapped 8,617 Jews and caused the deaths of some of those persons.

6087

The Crown's case depended in large measure on the testimony of 19 witnesses who had been interned in the brickyard and deported on one of the three trains. Some gave viva voce evidence before the jury. Others were examined by way of commission evidence taken in Israel and Hungary and their evidence was then presented at trial on videotape. Additionally, the trial judge at the request of the defence, directed that the videotape of commission evidence of two other survivors be placed before the jury.

The evidence of the survivors fell into four general groups. Six witnesses who knew Finta before the events in issue testified as to things said and done by him at the brickyard and at the train station. A second group consisting of three witnesses who did not know Finta beforehand identified him as having said or done certain things at the brickyard and at the station. A third group consisting of three witnesses who did not know Finta beforehand also testified as to things said and done at the brickyard and at the station. However, this last group based their identification of Finta on statements made to them by others. The fourth group, consisting of eight witnesses who did not know Finta beforehand and did not identify him, gave evidence as to events at the brickyard and the train station.

page 794

Of the six witnesses who testified that they knew Finta before their imprisonment in the brickyard, four testified that Finta was in charge of the brickyard and one testified that everyone referred to Finta as the commander of the brickyard. Two of these six witnesses testified that Finta made the daily announcements in the brickyard demanding that the prisoners relinquish all their valuables on pain of death. Three of them testified that he supervised the confiscation of the detainees' valuables. Two of them testified that Finta was at the train station supervising the loading of the prisoners into the boxcars.

Among the second group of witnesses, one witness testified that, as Finta was in charge of the brickyard, all the announcements made or commands given in the brickyard were issued by him or on his behalf and that he supervised the confiscations. This witness testified further that Finta commanded the gendarmes when the Jews were escorted from the ghetto to the brickyard and that he supervised their loading by the gendarmes at the train station.

6088

Another witness in this group testified that Finta broke the silver handle off her mother's cane and confiscated it.

Several witnesses who identified Finta on the basis of what had been said by others gave testimony to the effect that Finta was in charge of the brickyard and supervised the confiscations. One of these witnesses testified that she saw a person identified to her as Finta give the announcements for the surrender of valuables and that, from her observations, that person was in charge at the railway station. Three other witnesses in this group testified that they were told by others that the person making the announcements, and in one case, the person in charge at the railway station, was Finta. The trial judge instructed the jury that they could not rely on the identification of Finta by these witnesses in so far as it depended on what others had told them as to the identity of the person they believed to be Finta.

page 795

The eight witnesses who did not identify Finta described the conditions in the brickyard, the deportation from Szeged and the conditions in the boxcars.

In addition to the evidence of the survivors, the Crown relied on photographs, handwriting and fingerprint evidence to identify Finta as a captain in the Gendarmerie at Szeged at the relevant time.

Expert and documentary evidence was tendered to establish the historical context of the evidence, the relevant command structure in place in Hungary in 1944 and the state of international law in 1944.

III. Decisions Below

Pre-Trial Motions (Callaghan A.C.J.H.C.)

Including pre-trial motions, the trial lasted eight months. On one of these pre-trial motions, Callaghan A.C.J.H.C., as he then was, upheld the constitutional validity of the war crimes provisions in the Criminal Code. This decision has now been reported (R. v. Finta (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 557).

Trial (Campbell J. Sitting With a Jury)

At trial, the Crown contended that Finta was the senior officer of the Gendarmerie at the Szeged concentration centre and had effective control over the operation and guarding of the centre, thus committing the acts in question. Alternatively it was said that through his supervisory role, he procured, aided or abetted others who actually performed the acts alleged. Though acknowledging his presence at the time and place of the alleged offences, Finta denied that he was in a position of authority at the brickyard and stated that he was subject at the time to the command of the German SS. He denied responsibility for the alleged offences.

6089

page 796

During the trial, the Crown called 43 witnesses, including 19 eyewitnesses. The trial judge, on behalf of the defence, called the evidence of two eyewitnesses, Ballo and Kemeny. The statement and minutes of a third witness, Dallos, whose testimony was given at Finta's Hungarian trial, were also admitted. Mr. Dallos, a survivor of the brickyard who died in 1963, gave evidence of the existence of a Lieutenant Bodolay, who might have been in charge of the confinement and deportation of the Jews at the brickyard. Campbell J. ruled that, although the evidence was of a hearsay nature, it was admissible. He also stated that, together with other evidence, it "could leave the jury with a reasonable doubt about the responsibility of Finta for confinement and brickyard conditions." The trial judge warned the jury in his charge about the hearsay nature of the evidence.

The jury acquitted Finta on all counts.

Ontario Court of Appeal (1992), 92 D.L.R. (4th) 1, 73 C.C.C. (3d) 65, 14 C.R. (4th) 1, 53 O.A.C. 1, 9 C.R.R. (2d) 91, (Arbour, Osborne and Doherty JJ.A.; Dubin C.J. and Tarnopolsky J.A. dissenting)

A summary of the Court of Appeal's position on the principal issues and their final disposition is set out below.

(i) The Evidentiary Issue

The majority of the Court of Appeal (Arbour, Osborne and Doherty JJ.A.) found the evidence of Dallos called by the trial judge to be admissible, despite its hearsay, and in one instance, double-hearsay nature. The majority affirmed the reasons given by the trial judge, both with respect to the unique features of the trial, and the principles underlying the exceptions to the hearsay rule relating to reliability, necessity and fairness.

However, the majority concluded that the trial judge erred in introducing this evidence himself before the defence had elected whether or not to call evidence. Though the majority observed that parts of the defence's final address were improper, they concluded that the trial judge's directions pertaining to the address negated any prejudice that might have resulted.

page 797

The substance of the judge's error, in their view, was to deprive the Crown of its statutory right to address the jury last. However, the majority could not conclude that, had the trial judge not called the evidence in question, the verdict of the jury might well have been different. The majority therefore ruled that this error did not occasion a substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice which would require that the jury's acquittal of Finta be reversed.

6090

Like the majority, Dubin C.J. found that the trial judge erred in the manner in which he admitted the evidence on behalf of the defence. He noted that the entire defence theory rested on the impugned evidence. As a result of the trial judge's calling the evidence rather than the defence, the defence retained the right to address the jury last. In his view, at p. 37, this "inflammatory address tainted the trial" and served to aggravate the error. Dubin C.J. concluded that it could not be said that no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice resulted from the cumulative effect of the trial judge's error.

Tarnopolsky J.A. concurred with the reasons and disposition of Dubin C.J. with respect to the evidentiary question.

(ii) The Interpretation of Section 7(3.71) and the Mens Rea Issue

The following passage, at pp. 104-5, summarizes the majority's approach with respect to the legislation in question:

In our opinion, s. 7(3.71) speaks not to the jurisdiction of the court but to the territorial scope of the offences referred to in that section. It does so by expanding the territorial reach of the criminal law beyond Canada to the rest of the world whenever the acts or omissions in question meet the dual criminality requirement of the section.

page 798

For example, to establish the commission of a "normal" charge of robbery the Crown must prove that the robbery occurred in Canada. Where the Crown alleges robbery contrary to s. 7 (3.71), instead of proving that the robbery occurred in Canada, the Crown must prove that:

--had the act occurred in Canada, it would have amounted to robbery under the then operative Criminal Code, and

--the act amounted to a war crime or a crime against humanity.

As for the standard of mens rea to be applied by the jury, the majority approved of the charge given by the trial judge, which directed the jury to convict the accused of a war crime or a crime against humanity only if "the accused knew that his acts had the factual quality that made them war crimes", or if he knew his acts had a factual quality that "raised them up from the level of an ordinary crime to the international level of a crime against humanity".

In Dubin C.J.'s view, both the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal misconstrued the purpose of s. 7(3.71) when they determined that the effect of this legislation was to create two new offences under the Criminal Code. He stated at p. 20:

In my opinion, that subsection does not create two new offences, namely, a crime against humanity and a war crime, nor does it define the essential elements of the offences with which the respondent was charged.... Section 7(3.71) provides a mechanism for persons to be convicted for violating the Criminal Code of Canada for acts or omissions committed abroad if those acts or omissions are deemed to have been committed in Canada and thus subject to the Criminal Code of Canada. Forcible confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter, contrary to the provisions of the 1927 Criminal Code, were the only offences for which the respondent stood trial.

6091

He also rejected the proposition that the legislation alters the jurisdiction over a person or the territorial jurisdiction of a court; rather, he viewed the section simply as concerning the culpability in Canada for conduct outside Canada.

page 799

Therefore, he held that it was within the power of the trial judge to determine whether the acts alleged, if committed in Canada, would have violated the Criminal Code, and to determine, as a matter of law, whether such acts constituted a war crime or a crime against humanity. It then remained for the jury to assess whether the acts were in fact committed. With respect to the mens rea requirement of this section, Dubin C.J. at p. 29 concurred with Tarnopolsky J.A. that the test was an objective one: "... it is quite irrelevant whether the respondent knew that those acts fell within the legal definition of a crime against humanity or whether he believed such acts to be inhumane".

Tarnopolsky J.A. was of the view that the Crown does not have to prove that the accused knew he was committing a war crime or a crime against humanity in order to convict him under s. 7 (3.71).

Like Dubin C.J., Tarnopolsky J.A. contended that s. 7(3.71) does not create new substantive Criminal Code offences; rather, he stated at p. 53 that the section is:
... merely procedural in nature, in that it confers jurisdiction on Canadian courts with respect to acts committed outside Canada, which would have been offences against Canadian law in force at the time of their occurrence, by deeming such acts to have occurred in Canada. [Emphasis in original.]

(iii) Jurisdiction and the Role of Judge and Jury

The majority determined that s. 7(3.71) sets out the elements of the offence. Those elements require that the act committed be a war crime or a crime against humanity. It follows that it is for the jury to decide whether the acts in question are war crimes or crimes against humanity.

page 800

Dubin C.J. found that pursuant to s. 7(3.71) of the Code, it is for the trial judge to determine first, whether the alleged acts would constitute, as a matter of law, a war crime or a crime against humanity, if the accused committed such acts outside Canada. The trial judge also must decide whether, as a matter of law, the alleged acts constitute an offence under the provisions of the Code then in force. It remains for the jury to decide if the accused did in fact commit the alleged acts. After reviewing the facts of this case, Dubin C.J. concluded at p. 29:

In my view, the trial judge in this case would have no difficulty in concluding, as a matter of law, that, if the respondent had confined the victims in the manner alleged in the evidence, such conduct would constitute a crime against humanity.

6092

In this case, I do not think that a trial judge should have had any doubt that such acts, if committed, would constitute the offence of forcible confinement.

