CASE NO. SCSL – 2003 – 08 – PT

ADDITIONAL WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS OF THE PROSECUTION— RECRUITMENT AND USE OF CHILD SOLDIERS

I. INTRODUCTION

1. Pursuant to Article 4(c) of the Statute of the Special Court (the "Statute"), the Special Court has the power to prosecute persons for the crime of "Conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities".

2. Pursuant to Article 1(1) of the Statute, the Special Court may only prosecute such crimes if the crime was committed after 30 November 1996, the date on which the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court commences.

3. The Prosecution submission is that by 30 November 1996, "conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities" had become established as a crime under customary international law.

4. Perhaps the clearest and most direct statement of this (at least in relation to the use of child soldiers) can be found in resolution 1659 (LXIV) of the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity, adopted at a session held from 1-5 July 1996 (that is, some 4 months before the date on which the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court commences). In paragraph 7 of that resolution, the Council of Ministers reaffirmed "that the use of child soldiers in armed conflicts constitutes a violation of their rights and should be considered as war crimes".[1] Sierra Leone was at the time a member State of the Organization of African Unity.

5. The Prosecution submits that if a competent and informed legal adviser had been asked on 30 November 1996 whether it was a crime under international law to conscript or enlist children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or to use them to participate actively in hostilities, the legal adviser should have answered yes. That answer would have been based on the following factors, all of which need to be considered cumulatively as a series of steps in a chain of reasoning:

   (1) In international law, unlike in a national legal system, there is no Parliament with legislative power in respect of the world as a whole. Therefore, there will never be a statute, applying with legal force to the world as a whole, declaring the conduct to be criminal under customary international law as from a specified date. Where certain conduct is criminalised by customary international law, the existence of that rule of customary international law needs to be ascertained through a consideration of a variety of different sources and authorities. (See Section II below.)

   (2) By 1996, it was clearly established that customary international law criminalised certain conduct committed in internal armed conflicts, even though there had never previously been any instrument which stated expressly that conduct committed in an internal armed conflict could be criminal under customary international law. (See Section III below.)

   (3) The Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (the "ICTR Statute") was adopted in 1994 (that is, some two years prior to the commencement of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court). The title of Article 4 of the ICTR Statute is "Violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II". The crimes expressly listed in Article 4 of the ICTR Statute include the conduct prohibited by Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II. (See Section IV below.)

(5) The recruitment or use of child soldiers was by 30 November 1996 contrary to international law in the sense that violations of the rule by a State entailed State responsibility under international law. The question is whether by 30 November 1996 violations of the rule also entailed individual criminal responsibility. The prohibition on the recruitment or use of child soldiers is contained in Article 4 of Additional Protocol II entitled "Fundamental Guarantees", that is, the very same Article of Additional Protocol II containing the conduct recognised by Article 4 of the ICTR Statute to be criminal. In the years immediately prior to 30 November 1996, there was a clearly evident shift in the "dictates of public conscience" (to adopt the language of the Martens clause) in relation to the rights of children in general, and the plight of children in armed conflict in particular, including in relation to the recruitment and use of child soldiers. Prior to 30 the recruitment or use of child soldiers should be regarded as criminal. The Prosecution submits that the cumulative effect of all of these factors is that a rule of customary international law criminalising the recruitment or use of child soldiers in internal armed conflicts had crystallised by 30 November 1996. (See Section VI below.)

II. THE PRINCIPLE OF LEGALITY IN CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW

6. The Prosecution does not take issue with the proposition that it is a fundamental principle of international criminal law that a person is not to be held criminally responsible unless the conduct in question constitutes a crime at the time it is committed. This principle is reflected, for instance, in Article 15(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 22(1) of the Statute of the International Criminal Court (the "ICC"), and in the case law of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (the "ICTY")[2] and the ICTR.[3] However, the case law of the ICTY and ICTR have expounded in more detail the content of this principle in the context of international criminal law. In particular:

   (1) The purpose of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege (that is, the principle against retrospective criminal laws) is to prevent the prosecution and punishment of an individual for acts which he or she reasonably believed to be lawful at the time of their commission. The fact that an

Kunarac et al., Judgement*, Case No. IT-96-23, IT-96-23/1-A, Appeals Chamber, 12 June 2002, para. 67 ("The determination of what constitutes a war crime is therefore dependent on the development of the laws and customs of war at the time when an act charged in an indictment was committed") and para. 372 (noting that the principle of "nullum crimen sine lege" [that is, the principle against retrospective criminal laws] is not in dispute, following the pronouncements of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in *Prosecutor v. accused could not foresee the creation of an international tribunal which would be the forum for prosecution is of no consequence.[4]

(2) It has been said by one Trial Chamber of the ICTY that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege (that is, the principle against retrospective criminal laws) requires that the underlying conduct at the time of its commission was punishable. It is only necessary that it was foreseeable and accessible to a possible perpetrator that his or her concrete conduct was punishable at the time of its commission, and it is not of material importance whether the accused could foresee the specific description of the offence in substantive criminal law, or whether the conduct was punishable as an act or an omission, or whether the conduct may lead to criminal responsibility, disciplinary responsibility or other sanctions.[5]

(3) It has been said by another Trial Chamber of the ICTY that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege requires that a criminal conviction must not be based upon a norm which an accused could not reasonably have been aware of at the time of the acts, and that this norm must make it sufficiently clear what act or omission could engage his or her criminal responsibility.[6] That principle does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime,[7] or from determining an issue through a process of interpretation and clarification as to the elements of a particular crime.[8]

8 Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para. 127. See also Hadzihasanovic Jurisdiction Decision, para. 58 (observing that under the European Convention on Human Rights, "It is not necessary that the elements of an offence are defined, but rather that general description of the prohibited conduct be provided") and para. 61.

7. It cannot be disputed that certain conduct is rendered criminal by customary international law—this has now been established beyond any doubt (see Section III below). However, customary international law, by its very nature, is not created by an international treaty. Much less is it created by international statute enacted by an international parliament with the power to enact legislation binding on the whole world, since there simply does not exist any such international parliament. Rather, customary international law crystallises by means of a process in which new legal norms are created by the cumulative effect of various instances of State practice, expressions of opinions of States, decisions of international tribunals, and the adoption of international treaties (which may, in addition to creating treaty law, reflect or contribute to the crystallisation of rules of customary international law). Thus, the existence of crimes under customary international law cannot be established with the same degree of simplicity or certainty as in the case of a crime under the national law of a State. In particular, it is not possible to determine the date on which a crime came to be part of customary international law with the same degree of certainty as the date on which a statute came into force in the national law of a State. In many cases, it may be impossible to fix a precise date. In the present case, the question is whether the recruitment and use of child soldiers was recognised as a crime under customary international law by 30 November 1996. If so, it is unnecessary in the present case to determine the precise date on which it became so recognised.

8. It cannot be suggested that if it is uncertain whether conduct was criminal or not on a given date that the principle against retrospective criminal legislation necessarily requires an acquittal. Such an argument would be analogous to an argument that an accused cannot be convicted by a majority judgement of a Trial Chamber, because if one of three judge votes to acquit there must by definition be a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of an accused. This latter argument has been rejected by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY.[9] Similarly, the mere fact that reasonable minds may differ as to whether or not particular conduct was criminal under customary international law on a given date does not preclude an international court from finding that it was. The mere fact that it is arguable that conduct was not criminal on a certain date does not mean that the argument is necessarily correct.

9. As a matter of customary international law, conduct may be:

   (1) lawful, even if considered to be undesirable or immoral (Stage 1);

   (2) unlawful, in the sense that the conduct will entail the responsibility under customary international law of the State in question (Stage 2);

   (3) unlawful, in the sense that the conduct will entail not only the responsibility under customary international law of the State in question, but also the individual criminal responsibility of any person engaging in that conduct (Stage 3).

10. The Prosecution submits that in order to determine whether particular conduct has progressed from Stage 1 to Stage 2, it is necessary to apply the ordinary rules governing the creation of rules of customary international law, which are found in any standard textbook on international law. However, the Prosecution submits that in determining whether particular conduct has progressed from Stage 2 to Stage 3, certain considerations may be particularly pertinent. Conduct at Stage 2 is already universally condemned by the international community as illegal under international law. Any individual committing Stage 2 conduct cannot in any sense consider the conduct to be legitimate or lawful. The progression from Stage 2 to Stage 3 is a development by which conduct, that has already for some time been considered as unlawful, is recognised as also entailing individual criminal liability. In the Prosecution's submission, this a smaller step than that from Stage 1 to Stage 2. Accordingly, it should be easier to establish that conduct has progressed from Stage 2 to Stage 3 than it is to establish that conduct has progressed from Stage 1 to Stage 2.

11. The Prosecution submits that one factor in determining whether conduct has progressed from Stage 2 to Stage 3 is the "Martens clause". The Martens clause, which was initially included in the 1899 Hague law,[10] is reflected also in the preamble to the 1977 Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, which states that:

> "in cases not covered by the law in force, the human person remains under the protection of the principles of humanity and the dictates or the public conscience".

As elaborated by a Trial Chamber of the ICTY:

> "International humanitarian law has, as its primary purpose, to regulate the means and methods of warfare and to protect persons not actively participating in armed conflict from harm. As the Trial Chamber held in Furundžija the general principle of respect for human dignity is the basic underpinning and indeed the very raison d'être of international humanitarian law and human rights law. While international humanitarian law is largely derived from treaties and conventions, it also consists of a number of principles that have not been explicitly laid down in legal instruments, but are still considered fundamental to this body of law. Of fundamental importance in this respect is the so-called Martens clause, which can be found in numerous conventions in the field of international humanitarian law, ranging from the Hague Regulations to the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions. According to this clause:
> > Until a more complete code of the laws of war has been issued, the high contracting Parties deem it expedient to declare that, in cases not included in the Regulations adopted by them, the inhabitants and the belligerents remain under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience.
> Although this formulation was first used in the context of a convention applicable to international armed conflicts, this clause has since been considered generally applicable to all types of armed conflicts. As such, it can also be found in the preamble to Additional Protocol II.

[10] The "Martens Clause" was first set forth in the preambular provisions of the 1899 Hague Convention concerning the Laws or customs of War on Land which states: "Until a more complete code of the laws of war is issued, the High Contracting Parties think it right to declare that in cases not included in the Regulations adopted by them, populations and belligerents remain under the protection and empire of the principles of international law, as they result from the usages established between civilised nations, from the laws of humanity, and the requirements of the public conscience": see Prosecutor v. Kupreskic et al., Judgement, Case No. IT-95-16-T, Trial Chamber, 14 January 2000 (the "Kupreskic Trial Judgement"), footnote 779. The International Court of Justice has referred to "the Martens Clause, whose continuing existence and applicability is not to be doubted" (Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, ICJ Reports 1996, para. 87).

> ... One of these fundamental principles underlying international humanitarian law is the principle of criminal responsibility for violations of such law. Although such responsibility is not always explicitly laid down in international humanitarian conventional instruments, it has been applied by national and international judicial organs in the course of the last century."[11]

12. As another Trial Chamber of the ICTY has observed:

> "More specifically, recourse might be had to the celebrated Martens Clause which, in the authoritative view of the International Court of Justice, has by now become part of customary international law. True, this Clause may not be taken to mean that the "principles of humanity" and the "dictates of public conscience" have been elevated to the rank of independent sources of international law, for this conclusion is belied by international practice. However, this Clause enjoins, as a minimum, reference to those principles and dictates any time a rule of international humanitarian law is not sufficiently rigorous or precise: in those instances the scope and purport of the rule must be defined with reference to those principles and dictates.
> Admittedly, there does not seem to have emerged recently a body of State practice consistently supporting the proposition that one of the elements of custom, namely usus or diuturnitas [that is, the "State practice" element of rules of customary international law] has taken shape. This is however an area where opinio iuris sive necessitatis [that is, the "State opinion" element of rules of customary international law] may play a much greater role than usus, as a result of the aforementioned Martens Clause. In the light of the way States and courts have implemented it, this Clause clearly shows that principles of international humanitarian law may emerge through a customary process under the pressure of the demands of humanity or the dictates of public conscience, even where State practice is scant or inconsistent. The other element, in the form of opinio necessitatis, crystallising as a result of the imperatives of humanity or public conscience, may turn out to be the decisive element heralding the emergence of a general rule or principle of humanitarian law."[12]

13. The Prosecution does not suggest that all acts which are sufficiently "abhorrent" or which frustrate "the primary purpose of international humanitarian law" are for that reason alone necessarily crimes under international law.[13] However, the dictates of public conscience may be a crucial element in determining that a violation of a prohibition under general international law entails individual criminal responsibility (see paragraphs 11-12 above). It is also evident that the "dictates of public conscience" will evolve over time, and such evolutions may result in the criminalisation of breaches of increasing numbers of rules of international humanitarian law. As the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY has said: "Principles and rules of humanitarian law reflect 'elementary considerations of humanity' widely recognized as the mandatory minimum for conduct in armed conflicts of any kind. No one can doubt the gravity of the acts at issue, nor the interest of the international community in their prohibition."[14]

III. THE EXISTENCE OF CRIMES UNDER INTERNATIONAL LAW IN THE ABSENCE OF ANY INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENT EXPRESSLY CRIMINALISING THE CONDUCT IN QUESTION

14. Rules of customary international law, by their very nature, may evolve independently of changes in treaty law. Contrary to what the Defence Reply suggests,[15] it is not the case that violations of an international law prohibition can only become criminal offences where the international community takes some express action to declare the conduct criminal. The fact that certain international humanitarian law treaties do not expressly criminalise violations of their provisions at the time of an alleged offence does not necessarily mean that violations of their provisions do not entail individual criminal responsibility under international law.

15. For instance, in 1995 (that is, about a year before the commencement of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court), the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY has held that a person is individually criminally liable for violations of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, dealing with minimum standards in non-international armed conflicts.[16] The Appeals Chamber so held, notwithstanding that common Article 3 contains no explicit reference to criminal liability for violation of its provisions, and notwithstanding that it had previously been widely believed that serious violations of humanitarian law during internal armed conflicts were not criminal under international law.[17]

16. Similarly, on 8 November 1994 (that is, about two years before the commencement of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court), the Statute of the ICTR was adopted by the United Nations Security Council, and the ICTR was brought into existence.[18] Article 4 of the ICTR Statute provides:

> Article 4
> Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II
>
> The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:
>
> (a) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;
> (b) Collective punishments;
> (c) Taking of hostages;
> (d) Acts of terrorism;
> (e) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;
> (f) Pillage;
> (g) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples;
> (h) Threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

17. The crimes enumerated in paragraphs (a) to (f) and (h) of Article 4 of the ICTR Statute reflect the wording of the prohibitions found in Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II. Article 4 of Additional Protocol II provides:

Article 4 - Fundamental guarantees

1. All persons who do not take a direct part or who have ceased to take part in hostilities, whether or not their liberty has been restricted, are entitled to respect for their person, honour and convictions and religious practices. They shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without any adverse distinction. It is prohibited to order that there shall be no survivors.

2. Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, the following acts against the persons referred to in paragraph I are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever:
(a) violence to the life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;
(b) collective punishments;
(c) taking of hostages;
(d) acts of terrorism;
(e) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form or indecent assault;
(f) slavery and the slave trade in all their forms;
(g) pillage;
(h) threats to commit any or the foregoing acts.

3. Children shall be provided with the care and aid they require, and in particular:
(a) they shall receive an education, including religious and moral education, in keeping with the wishes of their parents, or in the absence of parents, of those responsible for their care;
(b) all appropriate steps shall be taken to facilitate the reunion of families temporarily separated;
(c) children who have not attained the age of fifteen years shall neither be recruited in the armed forces or groups nor allowed to take part in hostilities;
(d) the special protection provided by this Article to children who have not attained the age of fifteen years shall remain applicable to them if they take a direct part in hostilities despite the provisions of subparagraph (c) and are captured;
(e) measures shall be taken, if necessary, and whenever possible with the consent of their parents or persons who by law or custom are > primarily responsible for their care, to remove children temporarily from the area in which hostilities are taking place to a safer area within the country and ensure that they are accompanied by persons responsible for their safety and well-being.

18. Article 4 of the ICTR Statute is not a provision of substantive law but a jurisdictional provision—that is, it does not make the conduct to which it refers criminal, but rather, it recognises that the conduct to which it refers is criminal under international law, and confers jurisdiction on the ICTR to prosecute violations of that law.[19] The Statute of the ICTR was the first international instrument which expressly attributed individual criminal responsibility to serious violations of common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II.[20] As noted in paragraph 15 above, prior to the adoption of the ICTR Statute, it was widely believed that the concept of war crimes in non-international armed conflicts did not exist. However, the Statute of the ICTR clearly recognised that certain violations of Additional Protocol II entailed individual criminal responsibility, and the adoption of the ICTR Statute "may serve as evidence of the opinion juris of states in respect of individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of common Article 3 or Additional Protocol II".[21]

19. At the time that the ICTR Statute was adopted by the United Nations Security Council, the United Nations Secretary-General appears to have considered that there was some uncertainty whether violations of Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II entailed individual criminal responsibility.[22] However, this does not of itself mean (Celebici case), Judgement*, Case No. IT-96-21-T, Trial Chamber IIqtr, 16 November 1998, filed as Annex 15 Prosecution Response, para. 310 ("...the United Nations cannot 'criminalize' any of the provisions of international humanitarian law by the simple act of granting subject-matter jurisdiction to an international tribunal. The International Tribunal merely identifies and applies existing customary international law and, as stated above, this is not dependent upon an express recognition in the Statute of the content of that custom, although express reference may be made, as in the statute of the ICTR").

[22] See Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 5 of Security Council resolution 955 (1994), U.N. Doc. S/1995/134, 13 February 1995, paras. 11-12 ("Given the nature of the conflict as non-international in character, the Council has incorporated within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Tribunal violations of international humanitarian law which may either be committed in both international and internal armed conflicts, such as the crime of genocide and crimes against humanity, or may be committed only in internal armed conflict, such as violations of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions, as more fully elaborated in article 4 of Additional Protocol II ... In that latter respect, the Security Council has elected to take a more expansive approach to the choice of the applicable law than the

that the Security Council or its members shared such a doubt. In any event, the ICTR has subsequently held, relying on the decision of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Tadic Jurisdiction Appeal Decision, that in 1994 (that is, during the temporal jurisdiction of the ICTR and some two years prior to the commencement of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court), the provisions of Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II reflected customary international law (even if Additional Protocol II as a whole did not), and that violations thereof entailed individual criminal responsibility.[23]

20. In view of the general principles of public international law relating to the formation of rules of customary international law, and the established case law of the ICTY and the ICTR referred to above, it is not possible to argue that conduct cannot be criminal under customary international law unless there is at the time an express provision in an international instrument declaring it to be so. The Prosecution accepts that it must establish that the recruitment and use of child soldiers was a crime under customary international law by 30 November 1996. However, the Prosecution submits that it is not required, in order to establish this, to point to a specific provision of an international instrument to that effect.

IV. VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 4(2) OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II WERE CRIMES UNDER CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW AT THE RELEVANT TIME

21. For the reasons given in paragraphs 16-20 above, the Prosecution submits that by 30 November 1996, violations of Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II entailed individual criminal responsibility, regardless of whether or not Additional Protocol II

one underlying the statute of the Yugoslav Tribunal, and included within the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Rwanda Tribunal international instruments regardless of whether they were considered part of customary international law or whether they have customarily entailed the individual criminal responsibility of the perpetrator of the crime. Article 4 of the statute, accordingly, includes violations of Additional Protocol II, which, as a whole, has not yet been universally recognized as part of customary international law, and for the first time criminalizes common article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions." (footnotes omitted)).

as a whole reflected customary international law. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether or not Additional Protocol II as a whole reflected customary international law at the time (or indeed, whether it does so today). It may, however, be noted that over 150 States are now parties to Additional Protocol II,[24] almost all of which ratified or acceded prior to 30 November 1996. Sierra Leone acceded to Additional Protocol II without reservation on 21 October 1986.

V. ARTICLE 4(2) WAS NOT THE ONLY PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II ENTAILING INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

22. The opening words of Article 4 of the ICTR Statute state clearly that the jurisdiction of the ICTR "shall not be limited to" those crimes enumerated in Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II. This is a clear recognition that at the time, international law criminalised certain conduct in internal armed conflicts in addition to the conduct specified in Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II.

23. The question in this case is whether that other conduct in internal armed conflicts that was criminalised by customary international law included, by 30 November 1996, the recruitment or use of child soldiers.

VI. VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 4(3)(C) ENTAILED INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY AT THE MATERIAL TIME

24. Article 4(3)(c) of Additional Protocol II provides that "children who have not attained the age of fifteen years shall neither be recruited in the armed forces or groups nor allowed to take part in hostilities".

25. This provision expresses two separate prohibitions, separated by the word "nor". In other words, it is a violation of this provision for children who have not attained the age of fifteen years to be recruited in the armed forces or groups; it is also a separate and distinct violation of this provision for children who have not attained the age of fifteen years to be allowed to take part in hostilities.

26. In the light of the matters referred to above, the Prosecution submits that, for the reasons given below, it must be concluded that by 30 November 1996, violations of this prohibition entailed individual criminal responsibility. The relevant factors and circumstances are as follows:

27. First, the recruitment and use of child soldiers was at the material time clearly already a breach of international law, in the sense that violations of the prohibition entailed State responsibility under international law of the State concerned. In other words, the prohibition had already clearly reached Stage 2 referred to in paragraph 9 above. This is conceded in this case by the Defence. By 30 November 1996, this prohibition had been expressed in both Additional Protocols of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions,[25] and the prohibition had thus by then existed in international law (at least as a matter of treaty law), in respect of both international and non-international armed conflicts, for almost 20 years. The prohibition was also contained in the 1989 United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child,[26] and the 1990 African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child,[27] and by 30 November 1996 clearly had acquired the status of customary international law. Thus, by 30 November 1996, the Sierra Leone ratified both on 21 October 1986. Article 77(2) of Protocol I states "The Parties to the conflict shall take all feasible measures in order that children who have not attained the age of fifteen years do not take a direct part in hostilities and, in particular, they shall refrain from recruiting them into their armed forces. In recruiting among those persons who have attained the age of fifteen years but who have not attained the age of eighteen years the Parties to the conflict shall endeavour to give priority to those who are oldest." Article 4(3)(c) of Protocol II which is applicable to non-international armed conflicts, is quoted in paragraph 19 above.

[26] Convention on the Rights of the Child (U.N.T.S. Vol. 1577, p 3, entry into force 2 September 1990), filed as Annex 2 Prosecution Response, Article 38 (1-4): "States Parties undertake to respect and to ensure respect for rules of international humanitarian law applicable to them in armed conflicts which are relevant to the child. States Parties shall take all feasible measures to ensure that persons who have not attained the age of fifteen years to not take a direct part in hostilities. States Parties shall refrain from recruiting any person who has not attained the age of fifteen years into their armed forces .... In accordance with their obligations under international humanitarian law to protect the civilian population in armed conflicts, States Parties shall take all feasible measures to ensure protection and care of children who are affected by an armed conflict."

[27] African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child adopted by the Organisation of African Unity in 1990, filed as Annex 8 Prosecution Response, states in Article 22(2) that "States parties to the present Charter shall take all necessary measures to ensure that no child shall take direct part in hostilities and refrain in particular from recruiting any child." A "child" is defined in the Charter as anyone below 18 years of age without exception.

recruitment or use of child soldiers could in no way be considered legitimate conduct—on the contrary, it was a clear violation of customary international law rules of humanitarian law. The only question was whether the rule had by then progressed from Stage 2 to Stage 3 referred to in paragraph 9 above—that is, whether by 30 November 1996 violations of the prohibition entailed individual criminal responsibility.

28. Secondly, if it is accepted that by 30 November 1996 Article 4(2) was not the only provision of Additional Protocol II that entailed individual criminal responsibility (see paragraphs 22-23 above), the question arises what are the other such provisions. It is submitted that Article 4(3)(c), prohibiting the recruitment or use of child soldiers, must be considered a very obvious candidate. Article 4(3)(c) is contained in the very same Article of Additional Protocol II that contains the conduct recognised by Article 4 of the ICTR Statute to be criminal under customary international law (see paragraphs 16-17 above). The title of Article 4 of Additional Protocol II is "Fundamental Guarantees". The wording of Article 4(3)(c) contains a clear and unequivocal prohibition which, like the other crimes enumerated in Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II, is eminently suitable to being enforced by criminal sanctions.[28] If violations of an express prohibition in the "fundamental guarantees" provision of Additional Protocol II do not entail individual criminal responsibility, it is difficult to see what other provisions would do so.[29]

[28] The Prosecution acknowledges that the position might be different in relation to the fundamental guarantees in Article 4(3)(a), (b) and (e) of Additional Protocol II, because these provisions impose a positive obligation to take certain types of measures without specifying which individuals will be responsible for a failure to take those measures and without specifying precisely what types of measures would be sufficient to satisfy this obligation. It is therefore possible that these provisions lack the requisite certainty to be capable of giving rise to a crime of omission in the event that the obligations imposed by these provisions are not met. However, it is unnecessary to determine this for the purposes of this case. The Defence Reply, at para. 6, suggests that the wording of Article 38(3) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which requires States to take "all feasible measures" to prohibit child recruitment are too vague to give rise to individual criminal responsibility, but this is immaterial in view of the very clear language of Article 4(3)(c) of Additional Protocol II.

[29] Article 4 of the ICTR Statute would no doubt equally recognize the criminality of breaches of the fundamental guarantee in Article 4(1) of Additional Protocol II, containing a prohibition against ordering that there shall be no survivors, although it is unnecessary to decide this for the purposes of this case. By way of further example, a Trial Chamber of the ICTY has said that Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, which concerns unlawful attacks on civilians or civilian objects, to the extent it echoes the Hague Regulations, entails individual criminal responsibility: Prosecutor v. Kordic and Cerkez, Decision on the

29. Thirdly, in the years immediately prior to 30 November 1996, there was an evolution in the "dictates of public conscience" (to adopt the language of the Martens clause)[30] in relation to individual criminal accountability of violators of international humanitarian law. In particular, the period between the conclusion of the Additional Protocols (8 June 1977) and the date of commencement of the Special Court's temporal jurisdiction (30 November 1996) was a period in which the international community displayed increasing concern to ensure that perpetrators of serious violations of international humanitarian law were held individually criminally liable. During this period, the General Assembly requested the International Law Commission ("ILC") to consider the question of the establishment of an international criminal court,[31] the ILC completed its work on the topic and produced a draft Statute of an international criminal court, and the General Assembly decided to establish an ad hoc committee of Member States, and subsequently a preparatory committee, to review the major issues arising out of the draft statute and to consider arrangements for the convening of an international conference.[32] During this period, the United Nations Security Council established the ICTY and the ICTR. Additionally, during this period, the Security Council adopted a number of resolutions relating to a number of different armed conflicts, affirming that perpetrators of serious violations of international humanitarian law would be individually responsible.[33] Furthermore, in this period there was a renewed activity in national legal systems relating to prosecutions of war crimes committed during the Second World War.[34]

30. Fourthly, in the years immediately prior to 30 November 1996, there was an evolution in the "dictates of public conscience" in relation to the rights of children in general. This increasing concern was manifested, for instance, in the conclusion in 1989 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child,[35] and in 1990 in the African Charter of the Rights and Welfare of the Child.[36]

31. Fourthly, in the years immediately prior to 30 November 1996, there was an evolution in the "dictates of public conscience" in relation to the situation of children in armed conflict in particular. This was evidenced for instance in 1989 by the inclusion of Article 38 in the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Subsequently, in its resolution 48/157 of 20 December 1993,[37] the General Assembly stated that it was "Profoundly concerned about the grievous deterioration in the situation of children in many parts of the world as a result of armed conflicts, and convinced that immediate and concerted action is called for".[38] It added that it was "Convinced that children affected by armed conflicts require the special protection of the international community ...".[39] In that resolution, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to appoint an expert to undertake a comprehensive study of this question.[40] On 26 August 1996, the Secretary-General of the United Nations transmitted to the General Assembly the study prepared by the expert appointed pursuant to that resolution.[41] In that report, the expert (Ms. Graça Machel) stated, inter alia:

> "Whatever the causes of modern-day brutality towards children, the time has come to call a halt. The present report exposes the extent of the problem and proposes many practical ways to pullback from the brink. Its most fundamental demand is that children simply have no part in warfare. The international community must denounce this attack on children for what it is—intolerable and unacceptable."[42]

The Machel Report then went on to deal with the specific issue of recruitment and use of child soldiers,[43] in addition to a variety of other issues.[44] It subsequently stated that:

> "It is difficult, if not impossible, to achieve reconciliation without justice. The expert believes that the international community should develop more systematic methods for apprehending and punishing individuals guilty of child rights abuses. Unless those at every level of political and military command fear that they will be held accountable for crimes and subject to prosecution, there will be little prospect of restraining their behaviour during armed conflicts. Allowing perpetrators to benefit from impunity can only lead to contempt for the law and to renewed cycles of violence."[45]

32. On 27 November 1996, shortly after the Machel Report, and several days before the date on which the Special Court's temporal jurisdiction commences, the Security Council adopted its resolution 1083 (1996),[46] in which it "Condemn[ed] in the strongest possible terms the practice of recruiting, training, and deploying children for combat, and demand[ed] that the warring parties immediately cease this inhumane and abhorrent activity and release all child soldiers for demobilization".[47] A resolution of the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity adopted in July 1996, reaffirmed "that the use of children in armed conflicts constitutes a violation of their rights and should be considered as war crimes".[48]

33. The Prosecution notes that the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the Security Council on the establishment of the Special Court[49] referred to the "doubtful customary nature of the ICC Statutory crime which criminalizes the conscription or enlistment of children under the age of 15, whether forced or voluntary".[50] The draft Statute of the Special Court that was included in the Secretary-General's Report therefore defined this crime more narrowly as "Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities".[51] However, the President of the Security Council advised the Secretary-General that "The members [of the Security Council] suggest the following further adjustments of a technical or drafting nature to the Agreement: ... to article 4 (c) of the Statute of the Court, modifying it so as to conform it to the statement of the law existing in 1996 and as currently accepted by the international community".[52] The amendment proposed by the Security Council was to adopt the wording of the current text of Article 4(c) of the Statute, that is, "Conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities". The Secretary-General subsequently advised the President of the Security Council that the Government of Sierra Leone had been consulted on the amendments proposed by the Security Council and had expressed its willingness to accept the texts.[53] Thus, it must be concluded that not only the members of the Security Council, but ultimately also the Secretary-General and the Government of Sierra Leone, accepted that the text of Article 4(c) of the Statute of the Special Court reflected international law as it existed by 30 November 1996.

53 Letter dated 12 July 2001 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the Security Council, U.N. Doc. S/2001/693, 13 July 2001, first paragraph.

34. In any event, the original Report of the Secretary-General did not suggest that there was no prohibition on the recruitment or use of child soldiers, but merely suggested that there were doubts as to the scope of the crime under customary international law. Even if these doubts were justified (and the members of the Security Council, the Secretary-General and the Government of Sierra Leone ultimately found that they were not), the mere fact that the precise scope of a crime is uncertain at the time of its commission does not mean that prosecutions for that crime would violate the principle against retrospective criminal laws.[54]

35. Accordingly, the Prosecution submits that Article 4(c) of the Statute reflects customary international law as it existed at 30 November 1996.[55]

36. The Defence Reply argues that in determining whether a person is individually criminally liable for violations of the prohibition on the recruitment and use of child soldiers under the age of 15 years, it would be misplaced to rely on the Tadic Jurisdiction Appeal Decision. In that case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber held that violations of common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions entail individual criminal responsibility, even though common Article 3 did not itself expressly so provide.[56] The Defence argues that the factors leading to this conclusion were the similarity between common Article 3 (which applies in non-international armed conflicts) and the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions (which apply in international armed conflicts, and which are expressed to be criminally punishable). The Defence also argues that in the Tadic Jurisdiction Appeal Decision, the ICTY Appeals Chamber formulated a test that requires (1) "the clear and unequivocal recognition of the laws of warfare in international law"; (2) "State practice indicating an intention to criminalize the prohibition"; and (3) "punishment of violations by national courts and military tribunals". The Defence maintains that if this test is

[55] The Prosecution adds, for completeness, that even if it were not established that the prohibition under Article 4(3)(c) was a crime under customary international law, persons could be prosecuted for breaches thereof on the basis that Sierra Leone was at all material times a party to the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols: Rutaganda Trial Judgement, paras. 88-89; Prosecutor v. Kayishema and Ruzindana, Judgement, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, Trial Chamber II, 21 May 1999, paras. 156-158; Akayesu Trial Judgement, paras. 616.

applicable, it is not satisfied in the case of the prohibition on the recruitment or use of child soldiers. In particular, the Defence states that there is no evidence of national courts or military tribunals meting out punishment for child recruitment.

37. However, the Prosecution submits that this is not a test which must be met in order for an international law rule to be one which will entail individual criminal responsibility for its violation. Rather, as is indicated in paragraph 128 of the Tadic Jurisdiction Appeal Decision, these were merely "a number of factors" considered by the Nuremberg Tribunal which were "relevant to its conclusion that the authors of particular prohibitions incur individual responsibility". The Prosecution submits that other factors which exist in the case of other international law prohibitions might be equally sufficient to lead to the same conclusion. As indicated in paragraphs 11-13 above, international humanitarian law may emerge through a customary process under the pressure of the demands of humanity or the dictates of public conscience, even where State practice is scant or inconsistent. The Prosecution relies on the Tadic Jurisdiction Appeal Decision only for the proposition that violations of certain provisions of international humanitarian law treaties may entail individual criminal responsibility under international law, even though the treaty provision itself does not so provide.

VII. FIRST ALTERNATIVE PROSECUTION ARGUMENT: THE CRIME WAS ESTABLISHED IN CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW BY 30 APRIL 1997

38. As an alternative argument only, in the event that the Appeals Chamber were to find that individual criminal responsibility for violations of Article 4(c) of the Statute had not become established in customary international by 30 November 1996, the Prosecution submits that it had become established at a later date before the end of the period material to the Indictment in the present case, so that individual criminal responsibility for violations of this prohibition existed in international law if not for the whole, then at least for a part, of the period relevant to this Indictment.

39. On 30 April 1997, the "Capetown Principles" were adopted by the Symposium on the Prevention of Recruitment of Children into the Armed Forces and Demobilisation and Social Reintegration of Child Soldiers in Africa, organised by UNICEF in cooperation with the NGO Sub-group of the NGO Working Group on the Rights of the Child.[57] Paragraph 4 of the Capetown Principles contained an express provision that "Those responsible for illegally recruiting children should be brought to justice". The Prosecution submits that the Capetown Principles, considered cumulatively with all of the matters referred to above, are sufficient to conclude that violations of the prohibition even on the mere recruitment of child soldiers gave rise to individual criminal responsibility under customary international law by 30 April 1997.

VIII. SECOND ALTERNATIVE PROSECUTION ARGUMENT: THE CRIME WAS ESTABLISHED IN CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW BY 29 JUNE 1998

40. On 29 June 1998, the President of the Security Council made a statement in which he announced that:

> "The Security Council expresses its grave concern at the harmful impact of armed conflict on children ... The Security Council strongly condemns the targeting of children in armed conflicts, including their humiliation, brutalization, sexual abuse, abduction and forced displacement, as well as their recruitment and use in hostilities in violation of international law ... The Security Council calls upon all parties concerned to comply strictly with their obligations under international law ... The Council stresses the obligation of all States to prosecute those responsible for grave breaches of international humanitarian law".[58]

This is evidence that violations on the recruitment and use of child soldiers gave rise to individual criminal responsibility under customary international law by 29 June 1998.

58 U.N. Doc. S/PRST/1998/18, 29 June 1998, reproduced as Annex 18 to the Prosecution Response.

IX. THIRD ALTERNATIVE PROSECUTION ARGUMENT: THE CRIME WAS ESTABLISHED IN CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW BY 17 JULY 1998

41. On 17 July 1998, the Statute of the International Criminal Court (the "ICC Statute") was adopted, with 122 States voting in favour. Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the ICC Statute is in terms materially identical to Article 4(c) of the Statute of the Special Court. The Prosecution submits that at the absolute latest, this was the date on which the prohibition on the recruitment and use of child soldiers came to be regarded as criminal under customary international law.

42. The Defence Reply argues that "the key date with respect to the crystallization of the principle of international law at issue is not the date on which texts were finalized but the date on which the treaty in question entered into force".[59] The Prosecution submits that this is not the case in relation to the issue at hand. It is of course a basic principle of international law that the provisions of a treaty are not legally binding until the treaty enters into force, and that even when it enters into force, it is binding only as a matter of treaty law, and therefore only binding on the parties to the treaty. However, the conclusion of treaties by States constitutes also State practice for the purposes of the principles governing the formation of new rules of customary international law. This may occur in three different alternative ways:

(1) In some cases, a treaty provision may only amount to a treaty obligation at the time that the treaty enters into force, but may contribute to the crystallisation of a new rule of customary international law some time thereafter (Situation 1).[60] Some provisions of the ICC Statute may well fall into this category. The Prosecution does not contend (although it is unnecessary to decide the point in these proceedings) that all of the provisions of the ICC Statute are currently rules of customary international law.

60 Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (5th edn., 1998), pp. 12-13.

(2) In some cases, a treaty provision may be a statement of an emerging norm of customary international law that has previously been in the process of formation but has not yet crystallised. The adoption by a large number of States of the text of a treaty containing that provision may be the very act which completes the crystallisation of that customary norm (Situation 2). In such situations, a treaty provision may be quoted as evidence of customary law even before the treaty has come into force.[61]

(3) In some cases, a treaty provision may, even at the time that the treaty is concluded, merely be a statement of a rule that was previously already part of customary international law (Situation 3). Various provisions of the ICC Statute (such as those dealing with the prohibition on genocide) undoubtedly fall into this category.

43. For all of the reasons given in paragraphs 1 to 40 above, the Prosecution submits that Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the ICC Statute falls into Situation 3 referred to in the previous paragraph, and that the recruitment or use of child soldiers in internal armed conflicts was a crime under customary international law even before the ICC Statute was concluded. However, as a third alternative argument, the Prosecution submits that even if, contrary to the Prosecution's submissions, the prohibition on the recruitment and use of child soldiers did not previously give rise to individual criminal responsibility, in all of the circumstances referred to above, the agreement of 122 States on the adoption of Article 8(2)(e)(vii) of the ICC Statute must be regarded as an acknowledgement by a large number of States of the customary international law status of that particular provision, and the provision therefore fell into Situation 2 referred to in the previous paragraph.

The Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 is seised of appeals against the Trial Judgement rendered by Trial Chamber II on 22 February 2001 in the case of Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kova~ and Zoran Vukovi}.

Having considered the written and oral submissions of the parties, the Appeals Chamber

HEREBY RENDERS ITS JUDGEMENT.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Findings

1. The Appeals Chamber endorses the following findings of the Trial Chamber in general.

2. From April 1992 until at least February 1993, there was an armed conflict between Bosnian Serbs and Bosnian Muslims in the area of Foča. Non-Serb civilians were killed, raped or otherwise abused as a direct result of the armed conflict. The Appellants, in their capacity as soldiers, took an active part in carrying out military tasks during the armed conflict, fighting on behalf of one of the parties to that conflict, namely, the Bosnian Serb side, whereas none of the victims of the crimes of which the Appellants were convicted took any part in the hostilities.

3. The armed conflict involved a systematic attack by the Bosnian Serb Army and paramilitary groups on the non-Serb civilian population in the wider area of the municipality of Fo~a. The campaign was successful in its aim of "cleansing" the Fo~a area of non-Serbs. One specific target of the attack was Muslim women, who were detained in intolerably unhygienic conditions in places like the Kalinovik School, Foča High School and the Partizan Sports Hall, where they were mistreated in many ways, including being raped repeatedly. The Appellants were aware of the military conflict in the Fo~a region. They also knew that a systematic attack against the non-Serb civilian population was taking place and that their criminal conduct was part of this attack.

4. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the findings of the Trial Chamber in relation to each individual Appellant.

1. Dragoljub Kunarac

5. Dragoljub Kunarac was born on 15 May 1960 in Fo~a. The Trial Chamber found that, during the relevant period, Kunarac was the leader of a reconnaissance unit which formed part of the local Fo~a Tactical Group. Kunarac was a well-informed soldier with access to the highest military command in the area and was responsible for collecting information about the enemy.[1] In rejecting Kunarac's alibi for certain specific periods, the Trial Chamber found him guilty on eleven counts for crimes under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute, violations of the laws or customs of war

(torture and rape) and crimes against humanity (torture, rape and enslavement).[2] The Chamber found the following to have been established beyond reasonable doubt.[3]

6. As to Counts 1 to 4 (crimes against humanity (torture and rape) and violations of the laws or customs of war (torture and rape)), Kunarac, sometime towards the end of July 1992, took FWS-75 and D.B. to his headquarters at Ulica Osmana Đikića no 16, where Kunarac raped D.B. and aided and abetted the gang-rape of FWS-75 by several of his soldiers. On 2 August 1992, Kunarac took FWS-87, FWS-75, FWS-50 and D.B. to Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16, where he raped FWS-87 and aided and abetted the torture and rapes of FWS-87, FWS-75 and FWS-50 at the hands of other soldiers. Furthermore, between 20 July and 2 August 1992, Kunarac transferred FWS-95 from the Partizan Sports Hall to Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16, where he raped her.[4]

7. With regard to Counts 9 and 10 (crime against humanity (rape) and violation of the laws or customs of war (rape)), Kunarac took FWS-87 to a room on the upper floor of Karaman's house in Miljevina, where he forced her to have sexual intercourse with him, in the knowledge that she did not consent.[5]

8. As to Counts 11 and 12 (violations of the laws or customs of war (torture and rape)), Kunarac, together with two other soldiers, took FWS-183 to the banks of the Cehotina river in Foča near Velečevo one evening in mid-July 1992. Once there, Kunarac threatened to kill FWS-183 and her son while he tried to obtain information or a confession from FWS-183 concerning her alleged sending of messages to the Muslim forces and information about the whereabouts of her valuables. On that occasion, Kunarac raped FWS-183.[6]

9. Finally, with regard to Counts 18 to 20 (crimes against humanity (enslavement and rape) and violation of the laws or customs of war (rape)), on 2 August 1992, Kunarac raped FWS-191 and aided and abetted the rape of FWS-186 by the soldier DP 6 in an abandoned house in Trnova~e. FWS-186 and FWS-191 were kept in the Trnova~e house for a period of about six months, during which time Kunarac visited the house occasionally and raped FWS-191. While FWS-19 FWS-186 were kept at the Trnova~e house, Kunarac and DP 6 deprived the women of any control over their lives and treated them as their property. Kunarac established these living conditions for FWS-191 and FWS-186 in concert with DP 6, and both Kunarac and DP 6 personally committed the act of enslavement. By assisting in setting up the conditions at the house, Kunarac also aided and abetted DP 6 with respect to his enslavement of FWS-186.[7] 10. The Trial Chamber sentenced Kunarac to a single sentence of 28 years' imprisonment.

2. Radomir Kova~

11. Radomir Kova~ was born on 31 March 1961 in Fo~a. The Trial Chamber found that Kova~ fought on the Bosnian Serb side during the armed conflict in the Fo~a region and was a member of a military unit formerly known as the "Dragan Nikoli} unit" and led by DP 2. The Trial Chamber found Kova~ guilty on four counts for crimes under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute (violations of the laws or customs of war (rape and outrages upon personal dignity) and crimes against humanity (rape and enslavement)). The Trial Chamber found the following to have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.[8]

12. As general background, the Trial Chamber held that, on or about 30 October 1992, FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. were transferred to Kovač's apartment in the Lepa Brena building block, where a man named Jagos Kosti} also lived. While kept in the apartment, these girls were raped, humiliated and degraded. They were required to take care of the household chores, the cooking and the cleaning and could not leave the apartment without Kova~ or Kosti} accompanying them. Kovač completely neglected the girls' diet and hygiene.

13. As to Count 22 (crime against humanity (enslavement)), FWS-75 and A.B. were detained in Kovač's apartment for about a week, starting sometime at the end of October or early November 1992, while FWS-87 and A.S. were held for a period of about four months. Kova~ imprisoned the four girls and exercised his de facto power of ownership as it pleased him. It was Kova~'s intention to treat FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. as his property.

14. With regard to Counts 23 and 24 (crime against humanity (rape) and violation of the laws or customs of war (rape)), throughout their detention, FWS-75 and A.B. were raped by Kova~ and by other soldiers. During the period that FWS-87 and A.S. were kept in Kova~'s apartment, raped FWS-87, while Kosti} raped A.S..

15. Kovač had sexual intercourse with FWS-75, FWS-87 and A.B. in the knowledge that they did not consent and he substantially assisted other soldiers in raping those girls and A.S.. He did this by allowing other soldiers to visit or stay in his apartment and to rape the girls or by encouraging the soldiers to do so, and by handing the girls over to other men in the knowledge that they would rape them.

16. As to Count 25 (violation of the laws or customs of war (outrages upon personal dignity)), whilst kept in Kova~'s apartment, FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. were constantly humiliated and degraded. On an unknown date between about 31 October 1992 and about 7 November 1992, Kova~ forced FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. to dance naked on a table while he watched them. The Trial Chamber found that Kova~ knew that this was a painful and humiliating experience for the three girls, particularly because of their young age.

17. In December 1992, Kova~ sold A.B. to a man called "Dragec" for 200 deutschmarks and handed FWS-75 over to DP 1 and Dragan "Zelja" Zelenovic. On or about 25 February 1993, Kova~ sold FWS-87 and A.S. for 500 deutschmarks each to some Montenegrin soldiers. The Trial Chamber found that the sales of the girls constituted a particularly degrading attack on their dignity.

18. The Trial Chamber sentenced Kova~ to a single sentence of 20 years' imprisonment.

3. Zoran Vukovi}

19. Zoran Vukovi} was born on 6 September 1955 in Brusna, a village in the municipality of Fo~a. The Trial Chamber found that, during the armed conflict, Vukovi} was a member of the Bosnian Serb forces fighting against the Bosnian Muslim forces in the Fo~a region. Vukovi} was a member of the same military unit as the Appellant Kova~. The Trial Chamber found Vukovi} guilty on four counts for crimes under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute (violations of the laws or customs of war (torture and rape) and crimes against humanity (torture and rape)). The Trial Chamber found the following to have been established beyond reasonable doubt.

20. With regard to Vukovi}'s defence in relation to exculpatory evidence, there was no reasonable possibility that any damage to Vukovi}'s testis or scrotum rendered him impotent during the time material to the charges against him. Accordingly, the suggestion that Vuković was u to have sexual intercourse at the relevant time was rejected.

21. As to Counts 33 to 36 (crimes against humanity (torture and rape) and violations of the laws or customs of war (torture and rape)), sometime in mid-July 1992, Vukovi} and another soldier took FWS-50 from the Partizan Sports Hall to an apartment near Partizan where Vuković raped her. Vukovi} had full knowledge that FWS-50 was only 15 years old and did not consent when he forced her to have sexual intercourse with him.[9]

22. The Trial Chamber sentenced Vukovi} to a single sentence of 12 years' imprisonment.

B. Appeal

23. All of the Appellants are now appealing from their convictions and from the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber has identified certain grounds of appeal that are common to two or all three of the Appellants. These common grounds are dealt with in sections III-VII of the Judgement. Where there are separate grounds of appeal relating to one of the Appellants, these are addressed in individual sections of the Judgement.

24. Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kova~ and Zoran Vukovi} have five common grounds of appeal. They allege errors by the Trial Chamber with respect to: (i) its finding that Article 3 of the Statute applies to their conduct; (ii) its finding that Article 5 of the Statute applies to their conduct; (iii) its definitions of the offences charged; (iv) cumulative charging; and (v) cumulative convictions.

25. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the individual grounds of appeal of each Appellant against his convictions and sentence.

1. Dragoljub Kunarac

(a) Convictions

26. The Appellant Kunarac appeals from his convictions on five separate grounds. He alleges errors by the Trial Chamber with respect to: (i) its rejection of his alibi defence; (ii) its evaluation of evidence and findings relating to Counts 1 to 4; (iii) its findings in relation to Counts 9 and 10; (iv) its evaluation of the evidence and its reliance on the testimony of certain witnesses in relati Counts 11 and 12; and (v) its findings relating to Counts 18 to 20.

(b) Sentencing

27. The Appellant Kunarac appeals from his sentence on five separate grounds. He alleges that the Trial Chamber: (i) should have pronounced an individual sentence for each criminal offence for which he was convicted, in accordance with the Rules; (ii) erred in imposing a sentence which exceeded the maximum possible sentence prescribed by the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia; (iii) failed to assess properly various aggravating factors; (iv) erred in overlooking certain mitigating factors; and (v) was ambiguous in its application of Rule 101 of the Rules with respect to credit for time served.

2. Radomir Kova~

(a) Convictions

28. The Appellant Kova~ appeals from his convictions on eight separate grounds. He alleges errors by the Trial Chamber with respect to: (i) its reliance on certain identification evidence; (ii) its findings relating to the conditions in his apartment; (iii) its findings relating to offences committed against FWS-75 and A.B.; (iv) its findings relating to offences committed against FWS-87 and A.S.; (v) its findings relating to outrages upon personal dignity; (vi) its finding that he sold FWS-87 and A.S.; (vii) its findings as regards force used in the commission of the crime of rape; and (viii) his cumulative convictions for both rape and outrages upon personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute.

(b) Sentencing

29. The Appellant Kova~ appeals from his sentence on five separate grounds. He alleges that the Trial Chamber: (i) prejudiced his rights through its retroactive application of Rule 101 of the Rules; (ii) erred in disregarding the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia; (iii) failed to assess properly various aggravating factors; (iv) erred in overlooking certain mitigating factors; and (v) would infringe his rights if it did not allow credit for time served.

[9] Ibid., paras 811-817.

3. Zoran Vukovi}

(a) Convictions

30. The Appellant Vukovi} appeals from his convictions on four separate grounds. He alleges errors by the Trial Chamber with respect to: (i) alleged omissions in Indictment IT-96-23/1; (ii) its acceptance of the unreliable evidence of FWS-50 as a basis upon which to find him guilty of the charges of her rape and torture; (iii) its acceptance of certain identification evidence; and (iv) its rejection of his exculpatory evidence relating to the rape of FWS-50.

(b) Sentencing

31. The Appellant Vukovi} appeals from his sentence on five separate grounds. He alleges that the Trial Chamber: (i) erred in its retroactive application of Rule 101 of the Rules; (ii) erred in disregarding the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia; (iii) failed to assess properly various aggravating factors; (iv) erred in overlooking certain mitigating factors; and (v) was not clear as to whether there would be credit for time served.

C. Findings of the Appeals Chamber

1. Convictions

32. The Appeals Chamber finds that it is unable to discern any error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence or its findings in relation to any of the grounds of appeal set out above. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the appeals of each of the Appellants on their convictions, as well as all common grounds of appeal.

2. Sentencing

33. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber should have considered the family situations of the Appellants Kunarac and Vukovi} as mitigating factors. However, the Appeals Chamber finds that these errors are not weighty enough to vary the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber rejects the other grounds of appeal against sentence of the Appellants Kunarac and Vukovi} and all those of the Appellant Kova~, on the basis that the Trial Chamber came to reasonable conclusions and that no discernible errors have been identified.

34. For the reasons given in the parts of the Judgement that follow, the Appeals Chamber has decided in terms of the disposition set out in section XII below.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

35. Article 25 of the Statute sets out the circumstances in which a party may appeal from a decision of the Trial Chamber. The party invoking a specific ground of appeal must identify an alleged error within the scope of this provision, which states:

> 1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:
> (a) an error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or

36. The overall standard of review was summarised as follows by the Appeals Chamber in the Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement:[10]

> As has been held by the Appeals Chamber on numerous occasions, an appeal is not an opportunity for the parties to reargue their cases. It does not involve a trial de novo. On appeal, parties must limit their arguments to matters that fall within the scope of Article 25 of the Statute. The general rule is that the Appeals Chamber will not entertain arguments that do not allege legal errors invalidating the judgement, or factual errors occasioning a miscarriage of justice, apart from the exceptional situation where a party has raised a legal issue that is of general significance to the Tribunal's jurisprudence. Only in such a rare case may the Appeals Chamber consider it appropriate to make an exception to the general rule.

37. The Statute and settled jurisprudence of the Tribunal provide different standards of review with respect to errors of law and errors of fact.

38. Where a party contends that a Trial Chamber has made an error of law, the Appeals Chamber, as the final arbiter of the law of the Tribunal, must determine whether such an error of substantive or procedural law was in fact made. However, the Appeals Chamber is empowered only to reverse or revise a Trial Chamber's decision when there is an error of law "invalidating the decision". Therefore, not every error of law leads to a reversal or revision of a decision of a Trial Chamber.

39. Similarly, only errors of fact which have "occasioned a miscarriage of justice" will result in the Appeals Chamber overturning the Trial Chamber's decision.[11] The appealing party alleging an error of fact must, therefore, demonstrate precisely not only the alleged error of fact but also that the error caused a miscarriage of justice,[12] which has been defined as "[a] grossly unfair outcon 39-13 judicial proceedings, as when a defendant is convicted despite a lack of evidence on an essential element of the crime."[13] The responsibility for the findings of facts and the evaluation of evidence resides primarily with the Trial Chamber. As the Appeals Chamber in the Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement held:[14]

> Pursuant to the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, the task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left primarily to the Trial Chamber. Thus, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. Only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal of fact or where the evaluation of the evidence is "wholly erroneous" may the Appeals Chamber substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber. It must be borne in mind that two judges, both acting reasonably, can come to different conclusions on the basis of the same evidence.

40. In the Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement it was further held that:[15]

> The reason that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb findings of fact by a Trial Chamber is well known. The Trial Chamber has the advantage of observing witnesses in person and so is better positioned than the Appeals Chamber to assess the reliability and credibility of the evidence. Accordingly, it is primarily for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witness' testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of the reasoning in reaching a decision on these points.

41. Pursuant to Article 23(2) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber has an obligation to set out a reasoned opinion. In the Furund`ija Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber held that Article 23 of the Statute gives the right of an accused to a reasoned opinion as one of the elements of the fair trial requirement embodied in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute. This element, inter alia, enables a useful exercise of the right of appeal available to the person convicted.[16] Additionally, only a reasoned opinion allows the Appeals Chamber to understand and review the findings of the Trial Chamber as well as its evaluation of evidence.

42. The rationale of a judgement of the Appeals Chamber must be clearly explained. There is a significant difference from the standard of reasoning before a Trial Chamber. Article 25 of the Statute does not require the Appeals Chamber to provide a reasoned opinion such as that required of the Trial Chamber. Only Rule 117(B) of the Rules calls for a "reasoned opinion in writing." The purpose of a reasoned opinion under Rule 117(B) of the Rules is not to provide access to all deliberations of the Appeals Chamber in order to enable a review of its ultimate findings and conclusions. The Appeals Chamber must indicate with sufficient clarity the grounds on which a decision has been based.[17] However, this obligation cannot be understood as requiring a detailed response to every argument.[18]

43. As set out in Article 25 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber's mandate cannot be effectively and efficiently carried out without focused contributions by the parties.[19] In a primarily adversarial system,[20] like that of the International Tribunal, the deciding body considers its case on the basis of the arguments advanced by the parties. It thus falls to the parties appearing before the Appeals Chamber to present their case clearly, logically and exhaustively so that the Appeals Chamber may fulfil its mandate in an efficient and expeditious manner. One cannot expect the Appeals Chamber to give detailed consideration to submissions of the parties if they are obscure, contradictory, vague, [18] See García Ruiz v Spain, European Court of Human Rights, no. 30544/96, ECHR, Judgement of 21 January 1999, para 26.

[19] As held by the Appeals Chamber in the Kupreškić Appeal Judgement, at para 27: "[A] party who submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law must at least identify the alleged error and advance some arguments in support of its contention. An appeal cannot be allowed to deteriorate into a guessing game for the Appeals Chamber. Without guidance from the appellant, the Appeals Chamber will only address legal errors where the Trial Chamber has made a glaring mistake. If the party is unable to at least identify the alleged legal error, he should not raise the argument on appeal. It is not sufficient to simply duplicate the submissions already raised before the Trial Chamber without seeking to clarify how these arguments support a legal error allegedly committed by the Trial Chamber."

Chamber has the obligation to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial.[22]

[21] See Kayishema Appeal Judgement, para 137. The second part of this paragraph reads: "One aspect of such burden [showing that the Trial Chamber's findings were unreasonable] is that it is up to the Appellant to draw the attention of the Appeals Chamber to the part of the record on appeal which in his view supports the claim he is making. From a practical standpoint, it is the responsibility of the Appellant to indicate clearly which particular evidentiary material he relies upon. Claims that are not supported by such precise references to the relevant parts of the record on appeal will normally fail, on the ground that the Appellant has not discharged the applicable burden." This burden to demonstrate is now explicitly set out in Rule 108 of the Rules. Furthermore, the "Practice Direction on Formal Requirements for Appeals from Judgement" (IT/201) of 7 March 2002 provides for appropriate sanctions in cases where a party has failed to meet the standard set out: "17. Where a party fails to comply with the requirements laid down in this Practice Direction, or where the wording of a filing is unclear or ambiguous, a designated Pre-Appeal Judge or the Appeals Chamber may, within its discretion, decide upon an appropriate sanction, which can include an order for clarification or re-filing. The Appeals Chamber may also reject a filing or dismiss submissions therein."

[22] As regards the impact of Article 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms to an appeal decision, see Hirvisaari v Finland, European Court of Human Rights, no. 49684/99, ECHR, Judgement of 27 September 2001, paras 30-32.

44. An appellant must therefore clearly set out his grounds of appeal as well as the argument 3916 support of each ground. Furthermore, depending on the finding challenged, he must set out the arguments supporting the contention that the alleged error has invalidated the decision or occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Moreover, the appellant must provide the Appeals Chamber with exact references to the parts of the records on appeal invoked in its support. The Appeals Chamber must be given references to paragraphs in judgements, transcript pages, exhibits or other authorities, indicating precisely the date and exhibit page number or paragraph number of the text to which reference is made.

45. Similarly, the respondent must clearly and exhaustively set out the arguments in support of its contentions. The obligation to provide the Appeals Chamber with exact references to all records on appeal applies equally to the respondent. Also, the respondent must prepare the appeal proceedings in such a way as to enable the Appeals Chamber to decide the issue before it in principle without searching, for example, for supporting material or authorities.

46. In the light of the aforementioned settled jurisprudence, the procedural consequence of Article 25(1)(b) of the Statute is that the Appeals Chamber ought to consider in writing only those challenges to the findings of facts which demonstrate a possible error of fact resulting in a miscarriage of justice. The Appeals Chamber will in general, therefore, address only those issues for which the aforementioned prerequisites have been demonstrated precisely.

47. Consonant with the settled practice, the Appeals Chamber exercises its inherent discretion in selecting which submissions of the parties merit a "reasoned opinion" in writing. The Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to provide comprehensive reasoned opinions on evidently unfounded submissions. Only this approach allows the Appeals Chamber to concentrate on the core issues of an appeal.

48. In principle, therefore, the Appeals Chamber will dismiss, without providing detailed reasons, those Appellants' submissions in the briefs or the replies or presented orally during the Appeal Hearing which are evidently unfounded. Objections will be dismissed without detailed reasoning where:

1. the argument of the appellant is clearly irrelevant;

2. it is evident that a reasonable trier of fact could have come to the conclusion challeng the appellant; or

3. the appellant's argument unacceptably seeks to substitute his own evaluation of the evidence for that of the Trial Chamber. [23]

[23] The test set out, inter alia, in the Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement (para 30) states the following: "Only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal of fact or where the evaluation of the evidence is 'wholly erroneous' may the Appeals Chamber substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber."

III. COMMON GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO ARTICLE 3 OF THE STATUTE

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. The Appellants

49. The Appellants' first contention in respect of Article 3 of the Statute is that the Trial Chamber erred in establishing that there was an armed conflict in two municipalities bordering the municipality of Foča, namely, the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik.[24] The Appellants concede that there was an armed conflict in the area of Foča at the relevant time, that they knew about it and that all three actively participated in carrying out military tasks as soldiers of the army of the Republika Srpska.[25] The Appellants submit, however, that no evidence was adduced before the Trial Chamber which would demonstrate that such an armed conflict was taking place in the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik at the relevant time and that, when they attempted to show the Trial Chamber that no armed conflict existed in those municipalities, they were prevented from presenting the matter.[26] As a result, the Appellants claim, they regarded this issue as being outside the scope of matters being litigated between the parties.[27] The Appellants submit that this was crucial, because, under Article 3 of the Statute, an armed conflict must exist in the location where the crime has allegedly been committed.[28]

50. Secondly, the Appellants argue that, even if the allegations against them were established, their acts were not sufficiently connected to the armed conflict to be regarded, for the purpose of Article 3 of the Statute, as being "closely related to the armed conflict."[29] According to the Appellants, this requirement implies that the crimes could not have been committed but for the existence of an armed conflict, and this must be established in respect of every crime with which they were charged.[30] The Appellants contend that it is not sufficient that there was an armed conflict, that they took part therein as soldiers and that the alleged victims were civilians.[31] 3919

51. Finally, the Appellants claim that Article 3 of the Statute is only concerned with a limited set of protected interests, namely, "the property and proper use of permitted weapons", and only protects the rights of warring parties as opposed to the rights and interests of private individuals.[32] Furthermore, the Appellants contend that this Article of the Statute does not encompass violations of Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.[33]

2. The Respondent

52. The Respondent argues that the Trial Chamber correctly held that it was sufficient that an armed conflict occurred at the time and place relevant to the Indictments and that it is immaterial whether the armed conflict existed only in Foča or whether it extended throughout the neighbouring municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik.[34] The Respondent points out that, in any case, a state of armed conflict existed throughout Bosnia and Herzegovina at the time, and that the Appellants conceded before trial that an armed conflict existed in the area of Foča.[35] Once it is established that there is an armed conflict, the Respondent asserts, international humanitarian law applies to the entire territory under the control of a party to the conflict, whether or not fighting takes place at a certain location, and it continues to apply beyond the cessation of hostilities up until the general conclusion of peace.[36] The Respondent also points out that the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik are contiguous and neighbouring to that of Foča, and that the stipulation made between the parties refers to the area of Foča, not merely to its municipality.[37] The Respondent adds that no suggestion was made during trial that the geographical scope of the armed conflict was not envisaged by both parties to extend to all three municipalities and that an objection to that effect is raised for the first time in this appeal.[38]

53. The Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber's conclusion in respect of the requirec between the acts of the accused and the armed conflict was irreproachable. The Respondent argues that such close nexus could be established, as was done by the Trial Chamber, by demonstrating that the crimes were closely related to the armed conflict as a whole.[39] The Respondent argues that the test propounded by the Appellants is unacceptable and wholly unsupported by any practice.[40] It is unacceptable, the Respondent claims, because each and every crime capable of being committed outside of a wartime context would be excluded from the realm of Article 3 of the Statute and it would render Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions completely inoperative.[41]

54. Finally, the Respondent submits that the scope of Article 3 of the Statute is much broader than the Appellants are suggesting.[42] The Respondent asserts that the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision held that Article 3 of the Statute is a residual clause covering all violations of international humanitarian law not falling under Articles 2, 4 or 5 of the Statute, including offences against a person. The Respondent also refers to the finding of the Appeals Chamber in the Čelebići case, in which it was decided that violations of Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions are within the realm of Article 3 of the Statute.[43]

B. Discussion

1. The Existence of an Armed Conflict and Nexus therewith

55. There are two general conditions for the applicability of Article 3 of the Statute: first, there must be an armed conflict; second, the acts of the accused must be closely related to the armed conflict.[44]

56. An "armed conflict" is said to exist "whenever there is a resort to armed force between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organised armed groups or between such groups within a State".[45]

57. There is no necessary correlation between the area where the actual fighting is taking place and the geographical reach of the laws of war. The laws of war apply in the whole territory of the warring states or, in the case of internal armed conflicts, the whole territory under the contro. party to the conflict, whether or not actual combat takes place there, and continue to apply until a general conclusion of peace or, in the case of internal armed conflicts, until a peaceful settlement is achieved.[46] A violation of the laws or customs of war may therefore occur at a time when and in a place where no fighting is actually taking place. As indicated by the Trial Chamber, the requirement that the acts of the accused must be closely related to the armed conflict would not be negated if the crimes were temporally and geographically remote from the actual fighting.[47] It would be sufficient, for instance, for the purpose of this requirement, that the alleged crimes were closely related to hostilities occurring in other parts of the territories controlled by the parties to the conflict.[48]

58. What ultimately distinguishes a war crime from a purely domestic offence is that a war crime is shaped by or dependent upon the environment – the armed conflict – in which it is committed. It need not have been planned or supported by some form of policy. The armed conflict need not have been causal to the commission of the crime, but the existence of an armed conflict must, at a minimum, have played a substantial part in the perpetrator's ability to commit it, his decision to commit it, the manner in which it was committed or the purpose for which it was committed. Hence, if it can be established, as in the present case, that the perpetrator acted in furtherance of or under the guise of the armed conflict, it would be sufficient to conclude that his acts were closely related to the armed conflict. The Trial Chamber's finding on that point is unimpeachable.

59. In determining whether or not the act in question is sufficiently related to the armed conflict, the Trial Chamber may take into account, inter alia, the following factors: the fact that the perpetrator is a combatant; the fact that the victim is a non-combatant; the fact that the victim is a member of the opposing party; the fact that the act may be said to serve the ultimate goal of a military campaign; and the fact that the crime is committed as part of or in the context of the perpetrator's official duties.

60. The Appellants' proposition that the laws of war only prohibit those acts which are specific to an actual wartime situation is not right. The laws of war may frequently encompass acts which,

[48] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 70.

though they are not committed in the theatre of conflict, are substantially related to it. The law of war can apply to both types of acts. The Appeals Chamber understands the Appellants' argument to be that if an act can be prosecuted in peacetime, it cannot be prosecuted in wartime. This betrays a misconception about the relationship between the laws of war and the laws regulating a peacetime situation. The laws of war do not necessarily displace the laws regulating a peacetime situation; the former may add elements requisite to the protection which needs to be afforded to victims in a wartime situation.

61. Concerning the Appellants' argument that they were prevented from disproving that there was an armed conflict in the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik, the Appeals Chamber makes the following remarks: a party should not be permitted to refrain from making an objection to a matter which was apparent during the course of the trial, and raise it only in the event of a finding against the party.[49] If a party fails to raise any objection to a particular issue before the Trial Chamber, in the absence of special circumstances, the Appeals Chamber will find that the party has waived its right to adduce the issue as a valid ground of appeal.[50] Likewise, a party should not be permitted to raise an issue which it considers to be of significance to its case at a stage when the issue can no longer be fully litigated by the opposing party.

62. In the present instance, the Appellants raised the question of the existence of an armed conflict in the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik for the first time in their Defence Final Trial Brief without substantiating their argument, thereby depriving the Prosecutor of her ability to fully litigate the issue.[51] The Appeals Chamber finds this to be unacceptable. If, as the Appellants suggest, the issue was of such importance to their case, the Appellants should have raised it at an earlier stage, thus giving fair notice to the Prosecutor and allowing her to fully and properly litigate the matter in the course of which she could put this issue to her witnesses. This the Appellants failed to do. This ground of appeal could be rejected for that reason alone.

63. In addition, and contrary to what is alleged by the Appellants, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Appellants were never prevented by the Trial Chamber from raising any issue relevant to their case. In support of their argument on that point, the Appellants refer to an incident which occurred on 4 May 2000. According to the Appellants, on that day, the Trial Chamber prevented them from raising issues pertaining to the existence of an armed conflict in the municipalitie Ga~ko and Kalinovik.[52] It is clear from the record of the trial that the Appellants did not attempt to challenge the existence of an armed conflict in Ga~ko and Kalinovik as they alleged in their appeal, nor that they were in any way prevented from asking questions about that issue in the course of the trial.[53]

64. Finally, the Appellants conceded that there was an armed conflict "in the area of Foča" at the relevant time and that they knew about that conflict and took part therein.[54] Referring to that armed conflict, the Appellants later said that it existed only in the territory of the "Fmğunicipality of Foča".[55] The Appeals Chamber notes that the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik are contiguous and neighbouring municipalities of Foča. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Prosecutor did not have to prove that there was an armed conflict in each and every square inch of the general area. The state of armed conflict is not limited to the areas of actual military combat but exists across the entire territory under the control of the warring parties. The Appeals Chamber finds that ample evidence was adduced before the Trial Chamber to demonstrate that an armed conflict was taking place in the municipalities of Ga~ko and Kalinovik at the relevant time.[56] The Trial Chamber did not err in concluding that an armed conflict existed in all three municipalities, nor did it err in concluding that the acts of the Appellants were closely related to this armed conflict.[57]

65. The Trial Chamber was therefore correct in finding that there was an armed conflict at the time and place relevant to the Indictments, and that the acts of the Appellants were closely related to that conflict pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber does not accept the Appellants' contention that the laws of war are limited to those acts which could only be committed [53] The relevant transcript pages of the hearing show that, when counsel for Kunarac was interrupted by the Presiding Judge who was enquiring about the relevancy of her questions, she was cross-examining a witness about the number of cafés in Ga~ko. When asked what the relevance of her line of questioning was, counsel responded that she was merely testing the credibility of the witness. On the same occasion, counsel was also reminded by one of the Judges that her questions had to be directed to issues relevant to the case, that is, either relevant to a fact that is in issue between the parties or relevant as to the credit of the witness. Counsel responded that she was attempting to determine whether, as the witness claimed in her earlier statement, "nationalistic feelings on the Serb side were burgeoning" in Ga~ko. Despite her failure to explain the relevancy of her line of questioning, counsel was allowed by the Presiding Judge to pursue her line of questioning as she wished (Trial Transcript, T 2985-2990).

in actual combat. Instead, it is sufficient for an act to be shown to have been closely related armed conflict, as the Trial Chamber correctly found. This part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal therefore fails. 3924

2. Material Scope of Article 3 of the Statute and Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions

66. Four conditions must be fulfilled before an offence may be prosecuted under Article 3 of the Statute:[58] (i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law; (ii) the rule must be customary in nature or, if it belongs to treaty law, the required conditions must be met; (iii) the violation must be serious, that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim; and (iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule.

67. The determination of what constitutes a war crime is therefore dependent on the development of the laws and customs of war at the time when an act charged in an indictment was committed. As was once noted, the laws of war "are not static, but by continual adaptation follow the needs of a changing world".[59] There is no question that acts such as rape (as explained in paragraph 195), torture and outrages upon personal dignity are prohibited and regarded as criminal under the laws of war and that they were already regarded as such at the time relevant to these Indictments.

68. Article 3 of the Statute is a general and residual clause covering all serious violations of international humanitarian law not falling under Articles 2, 4 or 5 of the Statute.[60] It includes, inter alia, serious violations of Common article 3. This provision is indeed regarded as being part of customary international law,[61] and serious violations thereof would at once satisfy the four requirements mentioned above.[62]

69. For the reasons given above, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the Appellants' unsupported assertion that Article 3 of the Statute is restricted in such a way as to be limited to the protection of property and the proper use of permitted weapons, that it does not cover serious violations of Common article 3 and that it is only concerned with the rights of warring parti... opposed to the protection of private individuals. This does not represent the state of the law. Accordingly, this part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal relating to Article 3 of the Statute is rejected.

70. All three aspects of the common grounds of appeal relating to Article 3 of the Statute are therefore rejected and the appeal related to that provision consequently fails.

IV. COMMON GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO ARTICLE 5 OF THE STATUTE

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. The Appellants

71. The Appellants raise a number of complaints in respect of the chapeau elements of Article 5 of the Statute as established by the Trial Chamber. First, the Appellants reiterate their contention that their acts, even if established, were not sufficiently connected to the armed conflict to qualify as having been "committed in armed conflict" pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute. The Appellants contend that, pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute, such a link supposes the need for a substantive nexus to be established between the acts of an accused and the armed conflict, and for the acts and the conflict to coincide temporally.[63]

72. Secondly, the Appellants contend that the Trial Chamber erred in establishing that there was an attack against the non-Serb civilian population of Foča, as opposed to a purely military confrontation between armed groups, and that, in coming to its conclusion in that respect, the Trial Chamber took into account inappropriate or irrelevant factors or erred when assessing the evidence relating to the alleged attack.[64] The Appellants further claim that the Trial Chamber failed to give due consideration to their argument concerning what they regard as the Muslims' responsibility for starting the conflict and the existence of a Muslim attack upon the Serb population.[65]

73. The third aspect of the Appellants' ground of appeal in respect of Article 5 of the Statute is the contention that the regrettable consequences which may have been borne by non-Serb citizens of the municipality of Foča were not the consequence of an attack directed against the civilian population as such, but the unfortunate result of a legitimate military operation. In other words, these were "collateral damages".[66] The Appellants also challenge the Trial Chamber's conclusion that an attack may be said to have been "directed against" the non-Serb civilian population of Foča and, in view of their limited number, contest that the victims identified by the Trial Chamber be said to have constituted a "population" pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute.[67]

74. Fourthly, the Appellants argue that the evidence of crimes committed against non-Serb civilians, even if accepted, would not be sufficient for the Tribunal to conclude that the attack was either widespread or systematic.[68] In particular, the Appellants claim that the incidents mentioned by the Trial Chamber are too isolated both in scope and number to amount to a fully fledged widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population.[69] In addition, the Appellants argue that, in law, the attack must be both widespread and systematic.[70]

75. Finally, in their fifth and sixth complaints, the Appellants claim that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that the acts of the Appellants were linked to the attack of which, they assert, they did not even know.[71] The Appellants contend that their acts and activities during the relevant time were limited to and purely of a military sort and that they did not in any manner take part in an attack against the civilian population.[72] In particular, the Appellants contend that the required nexus between the acts with which they were charged and the attack requires that there be a plan or a policy to commit those crimes, as well as knowledge on the part of the Appellants of that plan or policy and a demonstrated willingness to participate therein.[73] The Appellants underline the fact that they did not interact during the war, that they were not related by any common plan or common purpose, and that the Prosecutor failed to establish that there was any plan to commit sexual crimes against Muslim women.[74]

2. The Respondent

76. The Respondent submits that the requirement contained in Article 5 of the Statute, that the crimes be "committed in armed conflict", implies a link between the acts of the accused and the armed conflict of a different and lesser sort than that under Article 3 of the Statute.[75] According to the Respondent, there is no requirement under Article 5 of the Statute for a substantial connection between the acts of the Appellants and the armed conflict; they must merely co-exist in eitl geographical or temporal sense.[76] This requirement is, the Respondent argues, squarely met in the present case.

77. The Respondent further claims that the Appellants' submission that the Muslims should be blamed for causing the attack demonstrates a fundamental misapprehension of the notion of "attack against the civilian population", confusing the legitimacy of resort to armed hostilities with the prohibitions which apply in all types of armed conflicts once under way.[77] According to the Respondent, far from being a device for the attribution of legal responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities, the concept of "attack" is instead an objective contextual element for crimes against humanity.[78] Consequently, the Respondent argues, the issue of which party provoked the attack and the alleged blameworthiness of the Muslims forces in that respect is irrelevant.[79]

78. The Respondent also submits that the Trial Chamber was correct in finding that the notion of "attack against a civilian population" is not negated by the mere fact that a parallel military campaign against the Muslim armed forces might have co-existed alongside the attack against the civilian population.[80] In addition, concerning the Appellants' claim that the victims do not constitute a "population" pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute, the Respondent notes that there is no legal requirement that the population as a whole be subjected to the attack, but merely that the crimes be of a collective nature.[81]

79. The Respondent is of the view that the requirements of "widespreadedness" and "systematicity" apply to the attack and not to the armed conflict or the acts of the accused, and that these requirements are disjunctive in that either or both need to be satisfied.[82] The systematic character of an attack may be inferred, the Respondent claims, from the way in which it was carried out, and from discernible patterns of criminal conduct such as those identified by the Trial Chamber.[83] In the present case, the Respondent submits that the conduct of the Appellants comprised criminal acts on a very large scale and the repeated and continuous commiss... associated inhumane acts against civilians.[84]

80. In addition, the Respondent contends that the Trial Chamber correctly stated that the nexus between the acts of the accused and the attack requires proof that the acts comprised part of a pattern of widespread or systematic crimes directed against a civilian population.[85] Furthermore, she asserts that, as the Trial Chamber ascertained, the notion of a plan is arguably not an independent requirement for crimes against humanity. [86]

81. Finally, concerning the required mens rea for crimes against humanity, the Respondent first points out that the Appellants adduced no credible proof to rebut the factual findings of the Trial Chamber that they knew of the attack and that they were aware that their acts were a part thereof.[87] The Respondent further contends that the alleged perpetrator of a crime against humanity need not approve of a plan to target the civilian population, or personally desire its outcome.[88] According to the Respondent, it was sufficient for the Trial Chamber to establish that the Appellants intentionally carried out the prohibited acts within the context of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population, with knowledge of the context into which these crimes fitted and in full awareness that their actions would contribute to the attack.[89]

B. Discussion

1. Nexus with the Armed Conflict under Article 5 of the Statute

82. A crime listed in Article 5 of the Statute constitutes a crime against humanity only when "committed in armed conflict."

83. As pointed out by the Trial Chamber, this requirement is not equivalent to Article 3 of the Statute's exigency that the acts be closely related to the armed conflict.[90] As stated by the Trial Chamber, the requirement contained in Article 5 of the Statute is a purely jurisdictional prerequisite

[85] Ibid., para 3.13.
[86] Ibid., para 3.26. See also Appeal Transcript, T 222. Further, even if such a requirement existed, the Respondent asserts that the policy or plan would not need to be conceived at the highest level of the State machinery, nor would it need to be formalised or even stated precisely. The climate of acquiescence and official condonation of large-scale crimes would satisfy the notion of a plan or policy.

which is satisfied by proof that there was an armed conflict and that objectively the acts of the accused are linked geographically as well as temporally with the armed conflict.[91]

84. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber's conclusions that there was an armed conflict at the time and place relevant to the Indictments and finds that the Appellants' challenge to the Trial Chamber's finding is not well founded. This part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal therefore fails.

2. Legal Requirement of an "attack"

85. In order to amount to a crime against humanity, the acts of an accused must be part of a widespread or systematic attack "directed against any civilian population". This phrase has been interpreted by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber agrees, as encompassing five elements:[92]

(i) There must be an attack.[93]

(ii) The acts of the perpetrator must be part of the attack.[94]

(iii) The attack must be directed against any civilian population.[95]

(iv) The attack must be widespread or systematic.[96]

(v) The perpetrator must know that his acts constitute part of a pattern of widespread or systematic crimes directed against a civilian population and know that his acts fit into such a pattern.[97]

86. The concepts of "attack" and "armed conflict" are not identical.[98] As the Appeals Chamber has already noted when comparing the content of customary international law to the Tribunal's Statute, "the two – the 'attack on the civilian population' and the 'armed conflict' – must be separate notions, although of course under Article 5 of the Statute the attack on 'any civilian population' must be part of an 'armed conflict'".[99] Under customary international law, the attack could precede, outlast, or continue during the armed conflict, but it need not be a part of it.[100] Also, the attack in the context of a crime against humanity is not limited to the use of armed force; it encompasses any mistreatment of the civilian population. The Appeals Chamber recognises, however, that the Tribunal will only have jurisdiction over the acts of an accused pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute where the latter are committed "in armed conflict".

87. As noted by the Trial Chamber, when establishing whether there was an attack upon a particular civilian population, it is not relevant that the other side also committed atrocities against its opponent's civilian population.[101] The existence of an attack from one side against the other side's civilian population would neither justify the attack by that other side against the civilian population of its opponent nor displace the conclusion that the other side's forces were in fact targeting a civilian population as such.[102] Each attack against the other's civilian population would be equally illegitimate and crimes committed as part of this attack could, all other conditions being met, amount to crimes against humanity.

88. Evidence of an attack by the other party on the accused's civilian population may not be introduced unless it tends "to prove or disprove any of the allegations made in the indictment",[103] notably to refute the Prosecutor's contention that there was a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population. A submission that the other side is responsible for starting the hostilities would not, for instance, disprove that there was an attack against a particular civilian population.[104]

89. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber correctly defined and interpreted the concept of "attack" and that it properly identified the elements and factors relevant to the attack. The Appellants have failed to establish that they were in any way prejudiced by the Trial Chamber's limitations on their ability to litigate issues which were irrelevant to the charges against them and which did not tend to disprove any of the allegations made against them in the Indictments. All of the Trial Chamber's legal as well as factual findings in relation to the atta unimpeachable and the Appeals Chamber therefore rejects this part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal.

3. The Attack must be Directed against any Civilian Population

90. As was correctly stated by the Trial Chamber, the use of the word "population" does not mean that the entire population of the geographical entity in which the attack is taking place must have been subjected to that attack.[105] It is sufficient to show that enough individuals were targeted in the course of the attack, or that they were targeted in such a way as to satisfy the Chamber that the attack was in fact directed against a civilian "population", rather than against a limited and randomly selected number of individuals.

91. As stated by the Trial Chamber, the expression "directed against" is an expression which "specifies that in the context of a crime against humanity the civilian population is the primary object of the attack".[106] In order to determine whether the attack may be said to have been so directed, the Trial Chamber will consider, inter alia, the means and method used in the course of the attack, the status of the victims, their number, the discriminatory nature of the attack, the nature of the crimes committed in its course, the resistance to the assailants at the time and the extent to which the attacking force may be said to have complied or attempted to comply with the precautionary requirements of the laws of war. To the extent that the alleged crimes against humanity were committed in the course of an armed conflict, the laws of war provide a benchmark against which the Chamber may assess the nature of the attack and the legality of the acts committed in its midst.

92. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber correctly defined and identified the "population" which was being attacked and that it correctly interpreted the phrase "directed against" as requiring that the civilian population which is subjected to the attack must be the primary rather than an incidental target of the attack. The Appeals Chamber is further satisfied that the Trial Chamber did not err in concluding that the attack in this case was directed against the non-Serb

[104] The Kupreškić Trial Chamber held that, before adducing such evidence, counsel must explain to the Trial Chamber the purpose for which it is submitted and satisfy the court that it goes to prove or disprove one of the allegations contained in the indictment (Kupreškić Evidence Decision).

civilian population of Foča. This part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal is therefore rejected. 3933

4. The Attack must be Widespread or Systematic

93. The requirement that the attack be "widespread" or "systematic" comes in the alternative.[107] Once it is convinced that either requirement is met, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to consider whether the alternative qualifier is also satisfied. Nor is it the role or responsibility of the Appeals Chamber to make supplementary findings in that respect.

94. As stated by the Trial Chamber, the phrase "widespread" refers to the large-scale nature of the attack and the number of victims,[108] while the phrase "systematic" refers to "the organised nature of the acts of violence and the improbability of their random occurrence".[109] The Trial Chamber correctly noted that "patterns of crimes – that is the non-accidental repetition of similar criminal conduct on a regular basis – are a common expression of such systematic occurrence".[110]

95. As stated by the Trial Chamber, the assessment of what constitutes a "widespread" or "systematic" attack is essentially a relative exercise in that it depends upon the civilian population which, allegedly, was being attacked.[111] A Trial Chamber must therefore "first identify the population which is the object of the attack and, in light of the means, methods, resources and result of the attack upon the population, ascertain whether the attack was indeed widespread or systematic".[112] The consequences of the attack upon the targeted population, the number of victims, the nature of the acts, the possible participation of officials or authorities or any identifiable patterns of crimes, could be taken into account to determine whether the attack satisfies either or both requirements of a "widespread" or "systematic" attack vis-à-vis this civilian population.

96. As correctly stated by the Trial Chamber, "only the attack, not the individual acts of the accused, must be widespread or systematic".[113] In addition, the acts of the accused need only be a part of this attack and, all other conditions being met, a single or relatively limited number of acts on his or her part would qualify as a crime against humanity, unless those acts may be said to be isolated or random.

97. The Trial Chamber thus correctly found that the attack must be either "widespread" or "systematic", that is, that the requirement is disjunctive rather than cumulative. It also correctly stated that the existence of an attack upon one side's civilian population would not disprove or cancel out that side's attack upon the other's civilian population. In relation to the circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber did not err in concluding that the attack against the non-Serb civilian population of Foča was systematic in character. The Appellants' arguments on those points are all rejected and this part of their common grounds of appeal accordingly fails.

5. The Requirement of a Policy or Plan and Nexus with the Attack

98. Contrary to the Appellants' submissions, neither the attack nor the acts of the accused needs to be supported by any form of "policy" or "plan". There was nothing in the Statute or in customary international law at the time of the alleged acts which required proof of the existence of a plan or policy to commit these crimes.[114] As indicated above, proof that the attack was directed

[114] There has been some debate in the jurisprudence of this Tribunal as to whether a policy or plan constitutes an element of the definition of crimes against humanity. The practice reviewed by the Appeals Chamber overwhelmingly supports the contention that no such requirement exists under customary international law. See, for instance, Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter; Nuremberg Judgement, Trial of the Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, Nüremberg, 14 November 1945 – 1 October 1945, in particular, pp 84, 254, 304 (Streicher) and 318-319 (von Schirach); Article II(1)(c) of Control Council Law No 10; In re Ahlbrecht, ILR 16/1949, 396; Ivan Timofeyevich Polyukhovich v The Commonwealth of Australia and Anor, (1991) 172 CLR 501; Case FC 91/026; Attorney-General v Adolph Eichmann, District Court of Jerusalem, Criminal Case No. 40/61; Mugesera et al. v Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, IMM-5946-98, 10 May 2001, Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division; In re Trajkovic, District Court of Gjilan (Kosovo, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia), P Nr 68/2000, 6 March 2001; Moreno v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), Federal Court of Canada, Court of Appeal, Ғ1994ğ 1 F.C. 298, 14 September 1993; Sivakumar v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), Federal Court of Canada, Court of Appeal, Ғ1994ğ 1 F.C. 433, 4 November 1993. See also Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), S/25704, 3 May 1993, paras 47-48; Yearbook of the International Law Commission (ILC), 1954, vol. II, 150; Report of the ILC on the work of its 43rd session, 29 April – 19 July 1991, Supplement No 10 (UN Doc No A/46/10), 265-266; its 46th session, 2 May – 22 July 1994, Supplement No 10 (UN Doc No A/49/10), 75-76; its 47th session, 2 May – 21 July 1995, 47, 49 and 50; its 48th session, 6 May – 26 July 1996, Supplement No 10 (UN Doc No A/51/10), 93 and 95-96. The Appeals Chamber reached the same conclusion in relation to the crime of genocide (Jelisi} Appeal Judgement, para 48). Some of the decisions which suggest that a plan or policy is required in law went, in that respect, clearly beyond the text of the statute to be applied (see e.g., Public Prosecutor v Menten, Supreme Court of the Netherlands, 13 January 1981, reprinted in 75 ILR 331, 362-363). Other references to a plan or policy which have sometimes been used to support this additional requirement in fact merely highlight the factual circumstances of the case at hand, rather than impose an independent constitutive element (see, e.g., Supreme Court of the British Zone, OGH br. Z., vol. I, 19). Finally, another decision, which has often been quoted in support of the plan or policy requirement, has been shown not to constitute an authoritative statement of customary international law (see In re Altstötter, ILR against a civilian population and that it was widespread or systematic, are legal elements of the crime. But to prove these elements, it is not necessary to show that they were the result of the existence of a policy or plan. It may be useful in establishing that the attack was directed against a civilian population and that it was widespread or systematic (especially the latter) to show that there was in fact a policy or plan, but it may be possible to prove these things by reference to other matters. Thus, the existence of a policy or plan may be evidentially relevant, but it is not a legal element of the crime.

99. The acts of the accused must constitute part of the attack.[115] In effect, as properly identified by the Trial Chamber, the required nexus between the acts of the accused and the attack consists of two elements:[116]

> (i) the commission of an act which, by its nature or consequences, is objectively part of the attack; coupled with
> (ii) knowledge on the part of the accused that there is an attack on the civilian population and that his act is part thereof.[117]

100. The acts of the accused must be part of the "attack" against the civilian population, but they need not be committed in the midst of that attack. A crime which is committed before or after the main attack against the civilian population or away from it could still, if sufficiently connected, be part of that attack. The crime must not, however, be an isolated act.[118] A crime would be regarded as an "isolated act" when it is so far removed from that attack that, having considered the context and circumstances in which it was committed, it cannot reasonably be said to have been part of the attack.[119]

14/1947, 278 and 284 and comment thereupon in Ivan Timofeyevich Polyukhovich v The Commonwealth of Australia and Anor, (1991) 172 CLR 501, pp 586-587).

On 30 May 1946, the Legal Committee of the United Nations War Crime Commission held that: "Isolated offences did not fall within the notion of crimes against humanity. As a rule systematic mass action, particularly if it was authoritative, was necessary to transform a common crime, punishable only under municipal law, into a crime against humanity, which thus became also the concern of international law. Only crimes which either by their magnitude and savagery or by their large number or by the fact that a similar pattern was applied at different times and places, endangered the

101. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber identified and applied the proper test for establishing the required nexus between the acts of the accused and the attack and that the Trial Chamber was correct in concluding that there is no requirement in the Statute or in customary international law that crimes against humanity must be supported by a policy or plan to carry them out. The Appeals Chamber is also satisfied that the acts of the Appellants were not merely of a military sort as was claimed, but that they were criminal in kind, and that the Trial Chamber did not err in concluding that these acts comprised part of the attack against the non-Serb civilian population of Foča. This part of the Appellants' common grounds of appeal therefore fails.

6. Mens rea for Crimes against Humanity

102. Concerning the required mens rea for crimes against humanity, the Trial Chamber correctly held that the accused must have had the intent to commit the underlying offence or offences with which he is charged, and that he must have known "that there is an attack on the civilian population and that his acts comprise part of that attack, or at least [that he took] the risk that his acts were part of the attack."[120] This requirement, as pointed out by the Trial Chamber, does not entail knowledge of the details of the attack.[121]

103. For criminal liability pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute, "the motives of the accused for taking part in the attack are irrelevant and a crime against humanity may be committed for purely personal reasons."[122] Furthermore, the accused need not share the purpose or goal behind the attack.[123] It is also irrelevant whether the accused intended his acts to be directed against the targeted population or merely against his victim. It is the attack, not the acts of the accused, which must be directed against the target population and the accused need only know that his acts are part thereof. At most, evidence that he committed the acts for purely personal reasons could be indicative of a rebuttable assumption that he was not aware that his acts were part of that attack.

104. The Appellants' contention that a perpetrator committing crimes against humanity needs to know about a plan or policy to commit such acts and that he needs to know of the details of the international community or shocked the conscience of mankind, warranted intervention by States other than that on whose territory the crimes had been committed, or whose subjects had become their victims" (see, History of the United Nations War Crimes Commission and the Development of the Laws of War, Compiled by the United Nations War Crimes Commission, 1948, p 179).

attack is not well founded. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber rejects this part of the common grounds of appeal.

105. In conclusion, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber correctly identified all five elements which constitute the chapeau elements or general requirements of crimes against humanity under customary international law, as well as the jurisdictional requirement that the acts be committed in armed conflict, and that it interpreted and applied these various elements correctly in the present instance. The Appellants' common grounds of appeal relating to Article 5 of the Statute are therefore rejected.

(a) The Appellants (Kunarac and Kova~)

106. The Appellants Kunarac and Kova~ contend that the Trial Chamber's definition of the crime of enslavement is too broad and does not define clearly the elements of this crime.[124] In particular, the Appellants believe that a clear distinction should be made "between the notion of enslavement (slavery) as interpreted in all the legal sources (...) and the detention as listed in the Indictment".[125] The Appellants put forward the following alternative elements for the crime of enslavement.

107. First, for a person to be found guilty of the crime of enslavement, it must be established that the accused treated the victim "as its own ownership".[126] The Appellants contend that the Prosecutor failed to prove that any of the accused charged with the crime of enslavement behaved in such a way to any of the victims.

108. Secondly, another constitutive element of the crime of enslavement is the constant and clear lack of consent of the victims during the entire time of the detention or the transfer.[127] The Appellants submit that this element has not been proven as the victims testified that they had freedom of movement within and outside the apartment and could therefore have escaped or attempted to change their situation.[128] Similarly, the Appellants contend that the victims were not forced to do household chores but undertook them willingly.[129]

109. Thirdly, the victim must be enslaved for an indefinite or at least for a prolonged period of time.[130] According to the Appellants, the time period must "indicate a clear intention to keep the victim in that situation for an indefinite period of time. Any other shorter period of time could not support the crime of enslavement".[131]

110. Lastly, as far as the mental element of the crime of enslavement is concerned, the Appellants submit that the required mens rea is the intent to detain the victims under constant control for a prolonged period of time in order to use them for sexual acts.[132] The Appellants contend that such an intent has not been proven beyond reasonable doubt by the Prosecutor in respect of any of the Appellants. The Appellant Kova~ argues that such an intent was not proved and did not exist, as he accepted the victims[133] in his apartment in order to organise their transfer outside of the theatre of the armed conflict.[134]

111. The Appellants therefore conclude that the Trial Chamber, by defining enslavement as the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership, has committed an error of law which renders the decision invalid. They further contend that the Prosecutor has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the conduct of the Appellants Kunarac and Kova~ satisfied any of the elements of the crime of enslavement as defined in their submission.[135]

(b) The Respondent

112. The Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber has not committed any error of law which would invalidate the decision. She contends that the Trial Chamber's definition of enslavement correctly reflects customary international law at the time relevant to the Indictments.[136] She asserts that, even if some treaties have defined the concept of slavery narrowly, today "enslavement as a crime against humanity must be given a much broader definition because of its diverse contemporary manifestations".[137] The crime of enslavement is "closely tied to the crime of slavery in terms of its basic definition (...) but encompasses other contemporary forms of slavery not contemplated under the 1926 Slavery Convention and similar or subsequent conventions".[138]

113. The Respondent further contends that the Trial Chamber correctly identified the indicia of enslavement to include, among other factors, the absence of consent or free will of the victims. Such consent is often rendered impossible or irrelevant by a series of influences such as detention, captivity or psychological oppression.[139] She further submits that this series of influences rendered the victims "unable to exert ftheirğ freedom and autonomy".[140]

114. In response to the argument put forward by the Appellants that the victim must be enslaved for an indefinite or at least a prolonged period of time, the Respondent contends that duration is only one of the many factors that the Tribunal can look at and that it generally needs to be viewed in the context of other elements.[141]

115. Lastly, the Respondent submits that the mens rea element identified by the Trial Chamber is correct and that customary international law does not require any specific intent to enslave but rather the intent to exercise a power attaching to the right of ownership.[142]

2. Discussion

116. After a survey of various sources, the Trial Chamber concluded "that, at the time relevant to the indictment, enslavement as a crime against humanity in customary international law consisted of the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person".[143] It found that "the actus reus of the violation is the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person", and the "mens rea of the violation consists in the intentional exercise of such powers".[144]

117. The Appeals Chamber accepts the chief thesis of the Trial Chamber that the traditional concept of slavery, as defined in the 1926 Slavery Convention and often referred to as "chattel slavery",[145] has evolved to encompass various contemporary forms of slavery which are also based on the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership. In the case of these various contemporary forms of slavery, the victim is not subject to the exercise of the more extreme rights of ownership associated with "chattel slavery", but in all cases, as a result of the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership, there is some destruction of the juridical personality;[146] the destruction is greater in the case of "chattel slavery" but the difference is one of degree. The Appeals Chamber considers that, at the time relevant to the alleged crimes, these contemporary forms of slavery formed part of enslavement as a crime against humanity under customary international law.

118. The Appeals Chamber will however observe that the law does not know of a "right of ownership over a person".[147] Article 1(1) of the 1926 Slavery Convention speaks more guardedly "of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised." That language is to be preferred.

119. The Appeals Chamber considers that the question whether a particular phenomenon is a form of enslavement will depend on the operation of the factors or indicia of enslavement identified by the Trial Chamber. These factors include the "control of someone's movement, control of physical environment, psychological control, measures taken to prevent or deter escape, force, threat of force or coercion, duration, assertion of exclusivity, subjection to cruel treatment and abuse, control of sexuality and forced labour".[148] Consequently, it is not possible exhaustively to enumerate all of the contemporary forms of slavery which are comprehended in the expansion of the original idea; this Judgement is limited to the case in hand. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber would also like to refer to the finding of the Trial Chamber in paragraph 543 of the Trial Judgement stating:

> The Prosecutor also submitted that the mere ability to buy, sell, trade or inherit a person or his or her labours or services could be a relevant factor. The Trial Chamber considers that the mere ability to do so is insufficient, such actions actually occurring could be a relevant factor.

However, this particular aspect of the Trial Chamber's Judgement not having been the subject of argument, the Appeals Chamber does not consider it necessary to determine the point involved.

120. In these respects, the Appeals Chamber rejects the Appellants' contention that lack of resistance or the absence of a clear and constant lack of consent during the entire time of the [146] It is not suggested that every case in which the juridical personality is destroyed amounts to enslavement; the concern here is only with cases in which the destruction of the victim's juridical personality is the result of the exercise of any of the powers attaching to the right of ownership.

[147] Trial Judgement, para 539. See also Article 7(2)(c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998 (PCNICC/1999/INF.3, 17 August 1999), which defines enslavement as "the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person and includes the exercise of such power in the course of trafficking in persons, in particular women and children."

detention can be interpreted as a sign of consent. Indeed, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the premise that lack of consent is an element of the crime since, in its view, enslavement flows from claimed rights of ownership; accordingly, lack of consent does not have to be proved by the Prosecutor as an element of the crime. However, consent may be relevant from an evidential point of view as going to the question whether the Prosecutor has established the element of the crime relating to the exercise by the accused of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber considers that circumstances which render it impossible to express consent may be sufficient to presume the absence of consent. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, the circumstances in this case were of this kind.

121. The Appellants contend that another element of the crime of enslavement requires the victims to be enslaved for an indefinite or at least for a prolonged period of time. The Trial Chamber found that the duration of the detention is another factor that can be considered but that its importance will depend on the existence of other indications of enslavement.[149] The Appeals Chamber upholds this finding and observes that the duration of the enslavement is not an element of the crime. The question turns on the quality of the relationship between the accused and the victim. A number of factors determine that quality. One of them is the duration of the relationship. The Appeals Chamber considers that the period of time, which is appropriate, will depend on the particular circumstances of each case.

122. Lastly, as far as the mens rea of the crime of enslavement is concerned, the Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber that the required mens rea consists of the intentional exercise of a power attaching to the right of ownership.[150] It is not required to prove that the accused intended to detain the victims under constant control for a prolonged period of time in order to use them for sexual acts.

123. Aside from the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate in the circumstances of this case to emphasise the citation by the Trial Chamber of the following excerpt from the Pohl case: [151]

> Slavery may exist even without torture. Slaves may be well fed, well clothed, and comfortably housed, but they are still slaves if without lawful process they are deprived of their freedom by > forceful restraint. We might eliminate all proof of ill-treatment, overlook the starvation, beatings, and other barbarous acts, but the admitted fact of slavery - compulsory uncompensated labour - would still remain. There is no such thing as benevolent slavery. Involuntary servitude, even if tempered by humane treatment, is still slavery.

The passage speaks of slavery; it applies equally to enslavement.

124. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that the Trial Chamber's definition of the crime of enslavement is not too broad and reflects customary international law at the time when the alleged crimes were committed. The Appellants' contentions are therefore rejected; the appeal relating to the definition of the crime of enslavement fails.

B. Definition of the Crime of Rape

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellants

125. The Appellants challenge the Trial Chamber's definition of rape. With negligible differences in diction, they propose instead definitions requiring, in addition to penetration, a showing of two additional elements: force or threat of force and the victim's "continuous" or "genuine" resistance.[152] The Appellant Kovač, for example, contends that the latter requirement provides notice to the perpetrator that the sexual intercourse is unwelcome. He argues that "[r]esistance must be real throughout the duration of the sexual intercourse because otherwise it may be concluded that the alleged victim consented to the sexual intercourse".[153]

(b) The Respondent

126. In contrast, the Respondent dismisses the Appellants' resistance requirement and largely accepts the Trial Chamber's definition. In so doing, however, the Respondent emphasises an important principle distilled from the Trial Chamber's survey of international law: "serious violations of sexual autonomy are to be penalised".[154] And she further notes that "force, threats of force, or coercion" nullifies "true consent".[155]

Indeed, it is worth noting that the part of the German Criminal Code penalizing rape and other forms of sexual abuse is entitled "Crimes Against Sexual Self-Determination" (German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch), Chapter 13, amended by law of 23 November 1973).
[155] Prosecution Consolidated Respondent's Brief, para 4.19.

2. Discussion

127. After an extensive review of the Tribunal's jurisprudence and domestic laws from multiple jurisdictions, the Trial Chamber concluded: [156]

> the actus reus of the crime of rape in international law is constituted by: the sexual penetration, however slight: (a) of the vagina or anus of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator or any other object used by the perpetrator; or (b) the mouth of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator; where such sexual penetration occurs without the consent of the victim. Consent for this purpose must be consent given voluntarily, as a result of the victim's free will, assessed in the context of the surrounding circumstances. The mens rea is the intention to effect this sexual penetration, and the knowledge that it occurs without the consent of the victim.[157]

128. The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber's definition of rape. Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber believes that it is worth emphasising two points. First, it rejects the Appellants' "resistance" requirement, an addition for which they have offered no basis in customary international law. The Appellants' bald assertion that nothing short of continuous resistance provides adequate notice to the perpetrator that his attentions are unwanted is wrong on the law and absurd on the facts.

129. Secondly, with regard to the role of force in the definition of rape, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber appeared to depart from the Tribunal's prior definitions of rape.[158] However, in explaining its focus on the absence of consent as the conditio sine qua non of rape, the Trial Chamber did not disavow the Tribunal's earlier jurisprudence, but instead sought to explain the relationship between force and consent. Force or threat of force provides clear evidence of non-consent, but force is not an element per se of rape.[159] In particular, the Trial Chamber wished to explain that there are "factors [other than force] which would render an act of sexual penetration non-consensual or non-voluntary on the part of the victim".[160] A narrow focus on force or threat of force could permit perpetrators to evade liability for sexual activity to which the other party had not consented by taking advantage of coercive circumstances without relying on physical force.

[157] Ibid., para 460.
[158] See, e.g., Furund'ija Trial Judgement, para 185. Prior attention has focused on force as the defining characteristic of rape. Under this line of reasoning, force or threat of force either nullifies the possibility of resistance through physical violence or renders the context so coercive that consent is impossible.
[159] Trial Judgement, para 458.

130. The Appeals Chamber notes, for example, that in some domestic jurisdictions, neither the use of a weapon nor the physical overpowering of a victim is necessary to demonstrate force. A threat to retaliate "in the future against the victim or any other person" is a sufficient indicium of force so long as "there is a reasonable possibility that the perpetrator will execute the threat".[161] While it is true that a focus on one aspect gives a different shading to the offence, it is worth observing that the circumstances giving rise to the instant appeal and that prevail in most cases charged as either war crimes or crimes against humanity will be almost universally coercive. That is to say, true consent will not be possible.

131. Under the chapter entitled "Crimes Against Sexual Self-Determination," German substantive law contains a section penalising sexual acts with prisoners and persons in custody of public authority.[162] The absence of consent is not an element of the crime. Increasingly, the state and national laws of the United States — designed for circumstances far removed from war contexts — support this line of reasoning. For example, it is a federal offence for a prison guard to have sex with an inmate, whether or not the inmate consents. Most states have similar prohibitions in their criminal codes.[163] In State of New Jersey v Martin, the Appellate Division of the New Jersey Superior Court commented on the purpose of such protections: "[the legislature] reasonably recognised the unequal positions of power and the inherent coerciveness of the situation which could not be overcome by evidence of apparent consent".[164] And, in some jurisdictions, spurred by revelations of pervasive sexual abuse of women prisoners, sexual contact between a correctional officer and an inmate is a felony.[165] That such jurisdictions have established these strict liability [161] California Penal Code 1999, Title 9, Section 261(a)(6). The section also lists, among the circumstances transforming an act of sexual intercourse into rape, "where it is accomplished against a person's will by means of force, violence, duress, menace, or fear of immediate and unlawful bodily injury on the person or another" (Section 261(a)(2)). Consent is defined as "positive cooperation in act or attitude pursuant to an exercise of free will" (Section 261.6).

[162] Indeed, a more recently enacted German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch), Chapter 13, Section 177, which defines sexual coercion and rape, recognizes the special vulnerability of victims in certain situations. It was amended in April 1998 to explicitly add "exploiting a situation in which the victim is unprotected and at the mercy of the perpetrator's influence" as equivalent to "force" or "threat of imminent danger to life or limb".

[163] See, e.g., N.J. Stat. Section 2C: 14-2 (2001) (An actor is guilty of, respectively, aggravated and simple sexual assault...[if] "[t]he actor has supervisory or disciplinary power over the victim by virtue of the actor's legal, professional, or occupational status" or if "[t]he victim is on probation or parole, or is detained in a hospital, prison or other institution and the actor has supervisory or disciplinary power over the victim by virtue of the actor's legal, professional or occupational status.").

[164] State of New Jersey v Martin, 235 N.J. Super. 47, 56, 561 A.2d, 631, 636 (1989). Chapter 13 of the German Criminal Code has similar provisions. Section 174a imposes criminal liability for committing "sexual acts on a prisoner or person in custody upon order of a public authority." Section 174b punishes sexual abuse by means of exploiting a position in public office. In neither instance is the absence of consent an element.

[165] See Women Prisoners of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections v District of Columbia, 877 F. Supp. 634, 640 (D.D.C. 1994), rev'd on other grounds, 93 F.3d 910 (D.C. Cir. 1996) and Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1996, Pub. L. 105-119, 18 U.S.C. Section 3626.

provisions to protect prisoners who enjoy substantive legal protections, including access to counsel and the expectation of release after a specified period, highlights the need to presume non-consent here.

132. For the most part, the Appellants in this case were convicted of raping women held in de facto military headquarters, detention centres and apartments maintained as soldiers' residences. As the most egregious aspect of the conditions, the victims were considered the legitimate sexual prey of their captors. Typically, the women were raped by more than one perpetrator and with a regularity that is nearly inconceivable. (Those who initially sought help or resisted were treated to an extra level of brutality). Such detentions amount to circumstances that were so coercive as to negate any possibility of consent.

133. In conclusion, the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber's determination that the coercive circumstances present in this case made consent to the instant sexual acts by the Appellants impossible. The Appellants' grounds of appeal relating to the definition of the crime of rape therefore fail.

C. Definition of the Crime of Torture (Dragoljub Kunarac and Zoran Vukovi})

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellants (Kunarac and Vukovi})

134. Neither Appellant challenges the Trial Chamber's definition of torture.[166] Indeed, the Appellants seem to accept the conclusions of the Trial Chamber identifying the crime of torture on the basis of three elements, these being respectively an intentional act, inflicting suffering, and the existence of a prohibited purpose. Nonetheless, they assert that these three constitutive elements of the crime of torture have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt in relation to either Kunarac[167] or Vukovi}[168] and that their convictions were thus ill-founded.[169]

135. With regard to the first element of the crime of torture, the Appellant Kunarac contends that he committed no act which could inflict severe physical or mental pain or suffering and that the arguments raised by the Prosecutor,[170] as well as the case-law to which she refers, are not sufficient to justify the findings of the Trial Chamber that some of Kunarac's victims experienced such mental pain or suffering.[171] Kunarac states that he never asserted that rape victims, in general, could not suffer, but rather that, in the instant case, no witness showed the effects of physical or mental pain or suffering.[172] In Kunarac's view, therefore, the first element of the crime of torture – the infliction of severe pain or suffering – is not met in his case.

136. The Appellant Vukovi}, referring to paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23-/1, asserts that he was not charged with any act inflicting severe physical or mental pain or suffering.[173] The Appellant Vukovi} further challenges his conviction for torture through rape in the form of vaginal penetration on the basis that FWS-50, who was allegedly raped by Vukovi}, did not mention the use of force or threats.[174] The Appellant appears to conclude from the absence of evidence of the use of physical force that the alleged rape of FWS-50 could not have resulted in severe physical pain or suffering on the part of FWS-50.[175] The Appellant thus asserts that the first element of the crime of torture will only be satisfied if there is evidence that the alleged rape resulted in severe mental pain or suffering on the part of FWS-50.[176] In this regard, the Appellant first contends that FWS-50 did not claim to have been inflicted with severe mental pain or suffering. Secondly, the Appellant seems to argue that, objectively, FWS-50 would not have experienced severe mental pain or suffering as a result of the alleged rape, as she had been raped on previous occasions by other perpetrators. Thirdly, the Appellant notes that two Defence expert witnesses testified that they did not find that the victims of the alleged rapes had suffered severe consequences. Finally, the Appellant states that the Prosecutor failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that FWS-50 was inflicted with severe physical or mental pain or suffering. For these reasons, the Appellant Vukovi} contends that the first element of the crime of torture – the infliction of severe pain or suffering – is not met in his case and that the Trial Chamber erred in its application of the law and in finding him guilty of the crime of torture.[177]

137. The Appellants submit that they did not intend to inflict pain or suffering, rather that their aims were purely sexual in nature.[178] The Appellants, therefore, argue that the second element of the crime of torture – the deliberate nature of the act or omission – has not been proven in either of their cases.[179]

138. Both Appellants deny having pursued any of the prohibited purposes listed in the definition of the crime of torture, in particular, the discriminatory purpose.[180] Kunarac further states that he did not have sexual relations with any of the victims in order to obtain information or a confession or to punish, intimidate or coerce the victim or a third person, or to discriminate on any ground whatsoever.[181] Vukovi} seeks to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred when it established that his acts were committed for a discriminatory purpose because the victim was Muslim.[182] Both Appellants thus conclude that the third constitutive element of the crime of torture – the pursuance of a prohibited purpose – was not established in their cases and that the Trial Chamber erroneously applied the law and committed an error in finding each guilty of the crime of torture.[183]

(b) The Respondent

139. The Respondent claims that the pain and suffering inflicted on FWS-50 through the Appellant Vukovi}'s sexual acts was established.[184] She asserts that, after leaving Fo~a, FWS-50 went to a physician who noted physiological and psychological symptoms resulting from rape,[185] that she felt the need to go to a psychiatrist,[186] and that she testified to having experienced suffering and pain when orally raped by Vukovi} in Buk Bijela.[187]

140. The Respondent asserts that the crime of torture, as defined by customary international law, does not require that the perpetrator committed the act in question with the intent to inflict severe physical or mental suffering, but rather that the perpetrator committed an intentional act for the purpose of obtaining information or a confession, or to punish, intimidate or coerce the victim or a third person, or to discriminate on any ground whatsoever, and that, as a consequence, the victim suffered. There is thus no need to establish that the Appellants committed such acts with the knowledge or intention that those acts would cause severe pain or suffering.[188]

141. According to the Respondent and as noted by the Trial Chamber,[189] there is no requirement under customary international law for the act of the perpetrator to be committed solely for one of the prohibited purposes listed in the definition of torture.[190] The Respondent also claims that the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that the Appellant Vuković intended to discriminate against his victim because she was Muslim.[191] She further submits that, in this case, all the acts of torture could be considered to be discriminatory, based on religion, ethnicity or sex.[192] Moreover, all the acts of sexual torture perpetrated on the victims resulted in their intimidation or humiliation.[193]

2. Discussion

(a) The Definition of Torture by the Trial Chamber

142. With reference to the Torture Convention [194] and the case-law of the Tribunal and the ICTR, the Trial Chamber adopted a definition based on the following constitutive elements: [195]

> (i) The infliction, by act or omission, of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental.
>
> (ii) The act or omission must be intentional.
> (iii) The act or omission must aim at obtaining information or a confession, or at punishing, intimidating or coercing the victim or a third person, or at discriminating, on any ground, against the victim or a third person.

According to the Prosecutor, the evidence, in particular the discriminatory statements, establish that FWS-75 was tortured with the purpose of humiliating her because she was a Muslim woman: see Prosecution Consolidated Respondent's Brief, para 6.146.
[193] Prosecution Consolidated Respondent's Brief, para 6.145.
[194] Article 1 of the Torture Convention: "For the purposes of this Convention, torture means any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions."
[195] Trial Judgement, para 497.

143. The Trial Chamber undertook a comprehensive study of the crime of torture, including the definition which other Chambers had previously given,[196] and found the Appellant Kunarac[197] and the Appellant Vukovi}[198] guilty of the crime of torture. The Trial Chamber did not, however, have recourse to a decision of the Appeals Chamber rendered seven months earlier[199] which addressed the definition of torture.[200]

144. The Appeals Chamber largely concurs with the Trial Chamber's definition but wishes to hold the following.

145. First, the Appeals Chamber wishes to provide further clarification as to the nature of the definition of torture in customary international law as it appears in the Torture Convention, in particular with regard to the participation of a public official or any other person acting in a non-private capacity. Although this point was not raised by the parties, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is important to address this issue in order that no controversy remains about this appeal or its consistency with the jurisprudence of the Tribunal.

146. The definition of the crime of torture, as set out in the Torture Convention, may be considered to reflect customary international law.[201] The Torture Convention was addressed to States and sought to regulate their conduct, and it is only for that purpose and to that extent that the Torture Convention deals with the acts of individuals acting in an official capacity. Consequently, the requirement set out by the Torture Convention that the crime of torture be committed by an individual acting in an official capacity may be considered as a limitation of the engagement of States; they need prosecute acts of torture only when those acts are committed by "a public official...or any other person acting in a non-private capacity." So the Appeals Chamber in the [196] Ibid., paras 465-497. The Chamber concurs with, in particular, the quite complete review carried out in the ^elebi}i and Furund`ija cases where torture was not prosecuted as a crime against humanity.

[198] Counts 33 (crime against humanity) and 35 (violation of the laws or customs of war), Trial Judgement, para 888.

[199] Furund`ija Appeal Judgement.

[200] In the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement at para 113 it was stated "that a proper construction of the Statute requires that the ratio decidendi of its decisions is binding on Trial Chambers."

[201] See Furund`ija Appeal Judgement, para 111; ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, para 459; Furund`ija Trial Judgement, para 161 and Trial Judgement, para 472. The ICTR comes to the same conclusion: see Akayesu Trial Judgement, para 593. It is interesting to note that a similar decision was rendered very recently by the German Supreme Court (BGH St volume 46, p 292, p 303).

Furund`ija case was correct when it said that the definition of torture in the Torture Convention, inclusive of the public official requirement, reflected customary international law.[202]

147. Furthermore, in the Furund`ija Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber noted that the definition provided in the Torture Convention related to "the purposes of [the] Convention".[203] The accused in that case had not acted in a private capacity, but as a member of armed forces during an armed conflict, and he did not question that the definition of torture in the Torture Convention reflected customary international law. In this context, and with the objectives of the Torture Convention in mind, the Appeals Chamber in the Furund`ija case was in a legitimate position to assert that "at least one of the persons involved in the torture process must be a public official or must at any rate act in a non-private capacity, e.g., as a de facto organ of a State or any other authority-wielding entity".[204] This assertion, which is tantamount to a statement that the definition of torture in the Torture Convention reflects customary international law as far as the obligation of States is concerned, must be distinguished from an assertion that this definition wholly reflects customary international law regarding the meaning of the crime of torture generally.

148. The Trial Chamber in the present case was therefore right in taking the position that the public official requirement is not a requirement under customary international law in relation to the criminal responsibility of an individual for torture outside of the framework of the Torture Convention. However, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Appellants in the present case did not raise the issue as to whether a person acting in a private capacity could be found guilty of the crime of torture; nor did the Trial Chamber have the benefit of argument on the issue of whether that question was the subject of previous consideration by the Appeals Chamber.

(b) The Requirement of Pain and Suffering

149. Torture is constituted by an act or an omission giving rise to "severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental", but there are no more specific requirements which allow an exhaustive classification and enumeration of acts which may constitute torture. Existing case-law has not determined the absolute degree of pain required for an act to amount to torture.

[202] Furund`ija Appeal Judgement, para 111: "The Appeals Chamber supports the conclusion of the Trial Chamber that "there is now general acceptance of the main elements contained in the definition set out in Article 1 of the Torture Convention ŦFurund`ija Trial Judgement, para 161ğ and takes the view that the definition given in Article 1 Ŧof the said Conventionğ reflects customary international law."

150. The Appeals Chamber holds that the assumption of the Appellants that suffering must be visible, even long after the commission of the crimes in question, is erroneous. Generally speaking, some acts establish per se the suffering of those upon whom they were inflicted. Rape is obviously such an act. The Trial Chamber could only conclude that such suffering occurred even without a medical certificate. Sexual violence necessarily gives rise to severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, and in this way justifies its characterisation as an act of torture.[205]

151. Severe pain or suffering, as required by the definition of the crime of torture, can thus be said to be established once rape has been proved, since the act of rape necessarily implies such pain or suffering.[206] The Appeals Chamber thus holds that the severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, of the victims cannot be challenged and that the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that that pain or suffering was sufficient to characterise the acts of the Appellants as acts of torture. The Appellants' grounds of appeal in this respect are unfounded and, therefore, rejected.

152. The argument that the Appellant Vuković has not been charged with any act inflicting severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is erroneous since he is charged, in paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23/1, with the crime of torture arising from rape. Moreover, the fact alleged in the Appeal Brief, that Indictment IT-96-23/1 does not refer to the use of physical force, does not mean that there was none.

(c) Subjective Elements

153. The Appellants argue that the intention of the perpetrator was of a sexual nature, which, in their view, is inconsistent with an intent to commit the crime of torture.[207] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber wishes to assert the important distinction between "intent" and "motivation". The Appeals Chamber holds that, even if the perpetrator's motivation is entirely sexual, it does not follow that the perpetrator does not have the intent to commit an act of torture or that his conduct does not cause severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, since such pain or suffering is a

E/CN.4/1992/SR.21, 21 February 1992, para 35: "Since it was clear that rape or other forms of sexual assault against women held in detention were a particularly ignominious violation of the inherent dignity and right to physical integrity of the human being, they accordingly constituted an act of torture." Other Chambers of this Tribunal have also noted that in some circumstances rape may constitute an act of torture: Furund`ija Trial Judgement, paras 163 and 171 and ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, paras 475-493.

[206] See ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, paras 480 and following, which quotes in this sense reports and decisions of organs of the UN and regional bodies, in particular, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights, stating that rape may be a form of torture.

likely and logical consequence of his conduct. In view of the definition, it is important to establish whether a perpetrator intended to act in a way which, in the normal course of events, would cause severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, to his victims. The Appeals Chamber concurs with the findings of the Trial Chamber that the Appellants did intend to act in such a way as to cause severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, to their victims, in pursuance of one of the purposes prohibited by the definition of the crime of torture, in particular the purpose of discrimination.

154. The Appellant Kunarac claims that the requisite intent for torture, alleged by the Prosecutor,[208] has not been proven.[209] Vukovi} also challenges the discriminatory purpose ascribed to his acts.[210] The Appeals Chamber finds that the Appellants have not demonstrated why the conclusions of the Trial Chamber on this point are unreasonable or erroneous. The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber rightly concluded that the Appellants deliberately committed the acts of which they were accused and did so with the intent of discriminating against their victims because they were Muslim. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber notes that in addition to a discriminatory purpose, the acts were committed against one of the victims with the purpose of obtaining information.[211] The Appeals Chamber further finds that, in any case, all acts were committed for the purpose of intimidating or coercing the victims.

155. Furthermore, in response to the argument that the Appellant's avowed purpose of sexual gratification is not listed in the definition of torture, the Appeals Chamber restates the conclusions of the Trial Chamber[212] that acts need not have been perpetrated solely for one of the purposes prohibited by international law. If one prohibited purpose is fulfilled by the conduct, the fact that such conduct was also intended to achieve a non-listed purpose (even one of a sexual nature) is immaterial.

156. The Appeals Chamber thus finds that the legal conclusions and findings of the Trial Chamber are well-founded and rejects all grounds of appeal relating to the crime of torture.

D. Definition of Outrages upon Personal Dignity (Radomir Kova~)

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

157. The Appellant Kovač submits that, since every humiliating or degrading act is not necessarily an outrage upon personal dignity, the acts likely to be outrages upon personal dignity must be defined, and he further argues that the Trial Chamber did not do so.[213]

158. Moreover, the Appellant asserts that to find a person guilty of outrages upon personal dignity, a specific intent to humiliate or degrade the victim must be established.[214] In his opinion, the Trial Chamber did not prove beyond any reasonable doubt that he acted with the intention to humiliate his victims, as his objective was of an exclusively sexual nature.[215]

(b) The Respondent

159. In response to the Appellant's claim that the Trial Chamber did not state which acts constituted outrages upon personal dignity, the Respondent recalls that the Trial Chamber considered that it had been proved beyond any reasonable doubt that, during their detention in Kova~'s apartment, the victims were repeatedly raped, humiliated and degraded.[216] That the victims were made to dance naked on a table, that they were "lent" and sold to other men and that FWS-75 and FWS-87 were raped by Kova~ while he was playing "Swan Lake" were all correctly characterised by the Trial Chamber as outrages upon personal dignity.

160. As to the requirement of specific intent, the Respondent, relying on the case-law of the Tribunal, asserts that the perpetrator of the crime of outrages upon personal dignity must only be aware that his act or omission could be perceived by the victim as humiliating or degrading. The perpetrator need not know the actual consequences of his act, merely the "possible" consequences of the act or omission in question. Therefore, the Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber correctly concluded that it was sufficient that Kova~ knew that his act or omission might have been perceived by his victims as humiliating or degrading.

2. Discussion

161. The Trial Chamber ruled that the crime of outrages upon personal dignity requires:[217]

> (i) that the accused intentionally committed or participated in an act or an omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity, and (ii) that he knew that the act or omission could have that effect.

(a) Definition of the Acts which may Constitute Outrages upon Personal Dignity

162. Contrary to the claims of the Appellant, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber was not obliged to define the specific acts which may constitute outrages upon personal dignity. Instead it properly presented the criteria which it used as a basis for measuring the humiliating or degrading character of an act or omission. The Trial Chamber, referring to the Aleksovski case, stated that the humiliation of the victim must be so intense that any reasonable person would be outraged.[218] In coming to its conclusion, the Trial Chamber did not rely only on the victim's purely subjective evaluation of the act to establish whether there had been an outrage upon personal dignity, but used objective criteria to determine when an act constitutes a crime of outrages upon personal dignity.

163. In explaining that outrages upon personal dignity are constituted by "any act or omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity",[219] the Trial Chamber correctly defined the objective threshold for an act to constitute an outrage upon personal dignity. It was not obliged to list the acts which constitute outrages upon personal dignity. For this reason, this ground of appeal is dismissed.

(b) Mens rea for the Crime of Outrages upon Personal Dignity

164. According to the Trial Chamber, the crime of outrages upon personal dignity requires that the accused knew that his act or omission could cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity.[220] The Appellant, however, asserts that this crime requires that the accused knew that his act or omission would have such an effect.[221]

[219] Trial Judgement, para 507 (emphasis added).
[221] Kovač Appeal Brief, para 145.

165. The Trial Chamber carried out a detailed review of the case-law relating to the mens rea of the crime of outrages upon personal dignity.[222] The Trial Chamber was never directly confronted with the specific question of whether the crime of outrages upon personal dignity requires a specific intent to humiliate or degrade or otherwise seriously attack human dignity. However, after reviewing the case-law, the Trial Chamber properly demonstrated that the crime of outrages upon personal dignity requires only a knowledge of the "possible" consequences of the charged act or omission. The relevant paragraph of the Trial Judgement reads as follows:[223]

> As the relevant act or omission for an outrage upon personal dignity is an act or omission which would be generally considered to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity, an accused must know that his act or omission is of that character – i.e., that it could cause serious humiliation, degradation or affront to human dignity. This is not the same as requiring that the accused knew of the actual consequences of the act.

166. Since the nature of the acts committed by the Appellant against FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. undeniably reaches the objective threshold for the crime of outrages upon personal dignity set out in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber correctly concluded that any reasonable person would have perceived his acts "to cause serious humiliation, degradation or otherwise be a serious attack on human dignity".[224] Therefore, it appears highly improbable that the Appellant was not, at the very least, aware that his acts could have such an effect. Consequently this ground of appeal is rejected.

VI. CUMULATIVE CHARGING

167. The Appellants argue that they were inappropriately cumulatively charged. The Appeals Chamber has consistently rejected this argument and it is not necessary to rehearse this settled jurisprudence here.[225] These grounds of appeal are, hereby, rejected.

VII. CUMULATIVE CONVICTIONS

A. General Principles

168. The Appeals Chamber accepts the approach articulated in the Čelebići Appeal Judgement, an approach heavily indebted to the Blockburger decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.[226] The Appeals Chamber held that: [227] > fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes justify multiple convictions, lead to the conclusion that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.

> Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld.

169. Care, however, is needed in applying the Čelebići test for, as Judges Hunt and Bennouna observed in their separate and dissenting opinion in the same case, cumulative convictions create "a very real risk of ... prejudice" to the accused.[228] At the very least, such persons suffer the stigma inherent in being convicted of an additional crime for the same conduct. In a more tangible sense, there may be such consequences as losing eligibility for early release under the law of the state enforcing the sentence.[229] Nor is such prejudice cured, as the U.S. Supreme Court warned in Rutledge v U.S.,[230] by the fact that the second conviction's concomitant sentence is served concurrently.[231] On the other hand, multiple convictions serve to describe the full culpability of a particular accused or provide a complete picture of his criminal conduct.[232]

170. Typically, the issue of multiple convictions or cumulative convictions arises in legal systems with a hierarchy of offences in which the more serious offences within a category require proof of an additional element or even require a specific mens rea. It is, however, an established principle of both the civil and common law that punishment should not be imposed for both a greater offence and a lesser included offence. Instead, the more serious crime subsumes the less serious (lex consumens derogat legi consumptae). The rationale here, of course, is that the greater and the lesser included offence constitute the same core offence, without sufficient distinction between them, even when the same act or transaction violates two distinct statutory provisions.[233] Indeed, it is not possible to commit the more serious offence without also committing the lesser included offence.[234]

171. In national laws, this principle is easier to apply because the relative gravity of a crime can normally be ascertained by the penalty imposed by the law. The Statute, however, does not provide a scale of penalties for the various crimes it proscribes. Nor does the Statute give other indications as to the relative gravity of the crimes. Indeed, the Tribunal has explicitly rejected a hierarchy of crimes, concluding instead that crimes against humanity are not inherently graver than war crimes.[235]

172. The ^elebi}i/Blockburger test serves to identify distinct offences within this constellation of statutory provisions.[236] While subscribing to this test, the Appeals Chamber is aware that it is deceptively simple. In practice, it is difficult to apply in a way that is conceptually coherent and promotes the interests of justice.

173. For this reason, the Appeals Chamber will scrutinise with the greatest caution multiple or cumulative convictions. In so doing, it will be guided by the considerations of justice for the accused: the Appeals Chamber will permit multiple convictions only in cases where the same act or transaction clearly violates two distinct provisions of the Statute and where each statutory provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not.

[235] Tadi} Sentencing Appeal Judgement, para 69: "After full consideration, the Appeals Chamber takes the view that there is in law no distinction between the seriousness of a crime against humanity and that of a war crime. The Appeals Chamber finds no basis for such a distinction in the Statute or the Rules of the International Tribunal construed in accordance with customary international law; the authorized penalties are also the same, the level in any particular case being fixed by reference to the circumstances of the case".

[236] With regard to Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber held in the Jelisić Appeal Judgement that, as each has an element of proof of fact not required by the other, neither was a lesser included offence of the other (para 82).

174. The Appeals Chamber wishes to emphasise that whether the same conduct violates two distinct statutory provisions is a question of law. Nevertheless, the Chamber must take into account the entire situation so as to avoid a mechanical or blind application of its guiding principles.

B. The Instant Convictions

1. Inter-Article Convictions under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute

175. The Appeals Chamber will now consider the argument of the Appellants that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting them for the same conduct under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute.

176. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber that convictions for the same conduct under Article 3 of the Statute (violations of the laws or customs of war) and Article 5 of the Statute (crimes against humanity) are permissible and dismisses the appeals on this point.[237] Applying the ^elebi}i test, subsequent judgements of the Appeals Chamber have consistently held that crimes against humanity constitute crimes distinct from crimes against the laws or customs of war in that each contains an element that does not appear in the other.[238] The Appeals Chamber sees no reason to depart from this settled jurisprudence.

177. As a part of this analysis, the Appeals Chamber reaffirms that the legal prerequisites describing the circumstances of the relevant offences as stated in the chapeaux of the relevant Articles of the Statute constitute elements which enter the calculus of permissibility of cumulative convictions.[239] The contrary view would permit anomalous results not intended by the Statute.[240]

178. The Appeals Chamber notes that the permissibility of multiple convictions ultimately turns on the intentions of the lawmakers.[241] The Appeals Chamber believes that the Security Council

[238] See, e.g., Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement, para 388 (holding that Trial Chamber erred in acquitting defendants on counts under Article 5 of the Statute) and Jelisi} Appeal Judgement, para 82 (noting that each of Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute "has a special ingredient not possessed by the other").

[239] The Appeals Chamber notes that the International Criminal Court's Preparatory Committee's Elements of Crimes incorporates the chapeaux into the substantive definitions of the criminal offences. Although the Appeals Chamber does not rely on statutory schemes created after the events underlying this case, the Appeals Chamber observes that the ICC definitions were intended to restate customary international law.

[240] For example, were the Appeals Chamber to disregard the chapeaux, the murder of prisoners of war charged under Article 2 of the Statute could not also, in special circumstances, be considered a genocidal killing under Article 4 of the Statute. The same is true of convictions for crimes against humanity (Article 5 of the Statute) and convictions for crimes against the laws or customs of war (Article 3 of the Statute). In all of the above, different chapeaux-type requirements constitute distinct elements which may permit the Trial Chamber to enter multiple convictions.

[241] See Blockburger v United States, supra n 226. See also Rutledge v United States, supra n 230 (courts assume, absent specific legislative directive, that lawmakers did not intend to impose two punishments for the same offence); intended that convictions for the same conduct constituting distinct offences under several of the Articles of the Statute be entered. Surely the Security Council, in promulgating the Statute and listing in it the principal offences against International Humanitarian Law, did not intend these offences to be mutually exclusive. Rather, the chapeaux elements disclose the animating desire that all species of such crimes be adequately described and punished.

2. Intra-Article Convictions under Article 5 of the Statute

(a) Rape and Torture

179. The Appeals Chamber will now consider the Appellants' arguments regarding intra-Article convictions. The Appellants contend that the Trial Chamber erred by entering convictions for both torture under Article 5(f) and rape under Article 5(g) of the Statute on the theory that neither the law nor the facts can reasonably be interpreted to establish distinct crimes. The Trial Chamber found that the crimes of rape and torture each contain one materially distinct element not contained in the other, making convictions under both crimes permissible.[242] As its earlier discussion of the offences of rape and torture make clear, the Appeals Chamber agrees. The issue of cumulative convictions hinges on the definitions of distinct offences under the Statute which are amplified in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal. That torture and rape each contain a materially distinct element not contained by the other disposes of this ground of appeal. That is, that an element of the crime of rape is penetration, whereas an element for the crime of torture is a prohibited purpose, neither element being found in the other crime.

180. Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber is bound to ascertain that each conviction fits the crime on the facts of the case as found by the Trial Chamber.[243] The Appellants contend that their object was sexual satisfaction, not infliction of pain or any other prohibited purpose as defined in the offence of torture. As has been discussed,[244] the Appeals Chamber does not agree with the [243] The Appeals Chamber defers to the Trial Chamber's findings of fact. The Appeals Chamber will disturb these findings only if no reasonable trier of fact could have so found. See Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement, para 41; Tadi} Appeal Judgement, para 64 and Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 63. The Appeals Chamber in the Kupre{ki} case recently clarified the burden on those contesting a Trial Chamber's factual findings: "The appellant must establish that the error of fact was critical to the verdict reached by the Trial Chamber, thereby resulting in a 'grossly unfair outcome'" (para 29).

[244] See supra 'Definition of the Crime of Torture (Dragoljub Kunarac and Zoran Vukovi})'.

Appellants' limited vision of the crime of torture. It has rejected the argument that a species of specific intent is required.

181. In the ^elebići Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber considered the issue of torture through rape.[245] The Appeals Chamber overturned the Appellant's convictions under Article 3 of the Statute as improperly cumulative in relation to Article 2 of the Statute, but the Trial Chamber's extensive analysis of torture and rape remains persuasive. Grounding its analysis in a thorough survey of the jurisprudence of international bodies, the Trial Chamber concluded that rape may constitute torture. Both the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights have found that torture may be committed through rape. And the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture listed forms of sexual assault as methods of torture.[246]

182. For rape to be categorised as torture, both the elements of rape and the elements of torture must be present. Summarising the international case-law, the Trial Chamber in the ^elebići case concluded that "rape involves the infliction of suffering at a requisite level of severity to place it in the category of torture".[247] By way of illustration, the Trial Chamber discussed the facts of two central cases, Fernando and Raquel Mejía v Peru from the Inter-American Commission and Aydin v Turkey from the European Commission for Human Rights.[248]

183. Mejía v Peru involved the rape of a woman shortly after her husband was abducted by soldiers. Peruvian soldiers entered the Mejías' home and abducted Fernando Mejía.[249] One soldier then re-entered the house, demanded that Raquel Mejía find her husband's identity documents, accused her of being a subversive and then raped her.[250] The Inter-American Commission held that Mejía's rape constituted torture. In analysing the case, the Trial Chamber in the ^elebići case

The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture introduced his 1992 Report to the Commission on Human Rights by stating: "Since it was clear that rape or other forms of sexual assault against women held in detention were a particularly ignominious violation of the inherent dignity and right to physical integrity of the human being, they accordingly constituted an act of torture." observed that "one must not only look at the physical consequences, but also at the psychological and social consequences of the rape".[251]

184. In Aydin v Turkey, the European Commission of Human Rights considered the case of a woman raped in a police station. Prior to referring the case to the European Court of Human Rights, the Commission stated:[252] > it appears to be the intention that the Convention with its distinction between "torture" and "inhuman and degrading treatment" should by the first of these terms attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering...

> In the Commission's opinion, the nature of such an act, which strikes at the heart of the victim's physical and moral integrity, must be characterised as particularly cruel and involving acute physical and psychological suffering. This is aggravated when committed by a person in authority over the victim. Having regard therefore to the extreme vulnerability of the applicant and the deliberate infliction on her of serious and cruel ill-treatment in a coercive and punitive context, the Commission finds that such ill-treatment must be regarded as torture within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention.

"Against this background," the European Court of Human Rights concluded in its turn, "the Court is satisfied that the accumulation of acts of physical and mental violence inflicted on the applicant and the especially cruel act of rape to which she was subjected amounted to torture in breach of Article 3 of the Convention".[253]

185. In the circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber finds the Appellants' claim entirely unpersuasive. The physical pain, fear, anguish, uncertainty and humiliation to which the Appellants repeatedly subjected their victims elevate their acts to those of torture. These were not isolated instances. Rather, the deliberate and co-ordinated commission of rapes was carried out with breathtaking impunity over a long period of time. Nor did the age of the victims provide any protection from such acts. (Indeed, the Trial Chamber considered the youth of several of the victims as aggravating factors.) Whether rousted from their unquiet rest to endure the grim nightly ritual of selection or passed around in a vicious parody of processing at headquarters, the victims endured repeated rapes, implicating not only the offence of rape but also that of torture under Article 5 of the Statute. In the egregious circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber finds that all the elements of rape and torture are met. The Appeals Chamber rejects, therefore, the appeal on this point.

(b) Rape and Enslavement

186. Equally meritless is the Appellants' contention that Kunarac's and Kovač's convictions for enslavement under Article 5(c) and rape under Article 5(g) of the Statute are impermissibly cumulative. That the Appellants also forced their captives to endure rape as an especially odious form of their domestic servitude does not merge the two convictions. As the Appeals Chamber has previously explained in its discussion of enslavement, it finds that enslavement, even if based on sexual exploitation, is a distinct offence from that of rape.[254] The Appeals Chamber, therefore, rejects this ground of appeal.

3. Article 3 of the Statute

(a) Scope of Article 3 of the Statute

187. The Appellants argue that Article 3 of the Statute does not apply to their actions because it is concerned only with battlefield violations (Hague law) and not with the protection of individual physical security. That Article 3 of the Statute incorporates customary international law, particularly Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, is clear from the discussions on the Statute in the Security Council on 25 May 1993, and has since then been confirmed in the consistent jurisprudence of the Tribunal.[255] Alone among the Articles of the Statute, Article 3 is illustrative, serving as a residual clause. It is not necessary to rehearse the arguments here and, therefore, this ground of appeal is rejected.

(b) Intra-Article Convictions under Article 3 of the Statute

188. The Appellants' argument against convictions for rape and torture are made also with regard to intra-Article convictions under Article 3 of the Statute. As with intra-Article convictions for rape and torture under Article 5 of the Statute, the Appellants argue that in the "absence of described distinct infliction of physical or mental pain... the infliction of physical or mental pain is brought down only to the very act of sexual intercourse, without the consent of the victim" and that the convicted person's conduct "can not be deemed to be both the case of a criminal offence of rape and the criminal offence of torture, because one act excludes the other".[256]

189. The Appeals Chamber has already explained in the context of intra-Article 5 crimes why, in the circumstances of this case, the rapes and sexual abuse also amount to torture and that rape and torture each contain an element that the other does not. This holds true for the present discussion. However, in the context of cumulative convictions under Article 3 of the Statute, which imports Common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, the Appeals Chamber acknowledges a specific problem, namely that Common article 3 refers to "cruel treatment and torture" (3(1)(a)), and "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment" (3(1)(c)), but does not refer to rape.

190. The Appeals Chamber finds the invocation and the application of Common article 3, by way of a renvoi through Article 3 of the Statute, entirely appropriate. The Trial Chamber attempted to ground the rape charges in Common article 3 by reference to outrages upon personal dignity.[257] Although the Appeals Chamber agrees that rape may be charged in this manner, it notes that grounding the charge in Common article 3 imposes certain limitations with respect to cumulative convictions. This is because, where it is attempted to charge rape as an outrage upon personal dignity, the rape is only evidence of the outrage; the substantial crime is not rape but the outrage occasioned by the rape. This leaves open the argument that an outrage upon personal dignity is substantially included in torture, with the consequence that convictions for both may not be possible. However, as will be shown below, rape was not in fact charged as an outrage upon personal dignity in this case.

191. Where the Trial Chamber (or indeed the Prosecutor) chooses to invoke Common article 3, it is bound by the text. In other words, each offence must be hanged, as it were, on its own statutory hook. In the present case, a statutory hook for rape is absent in Common article 3. The Indictments acknowledge the absence of an express statutory provision. The Prosecutor charged Kunarac, for instance, with both torture and rape under Article 3 of the Statute but the language of the counts diverges:

> Count 3: Torture, a VIOLATION OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable under Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Common Article 3(1)(a)(torture) of the Geneva Conventions.
> Count 4: Rape, a VIOLATION OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable under Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal.

In the case of torture, there is an express statutory provision, while in the case of rape, there is not.

192. Whether rape is considered to constitute torture under Common article 3(1)(a) or an outrage upon personal dignity under Common article 3(1)(c) depends on the egregiousness of the conduct. The Appeals Chamber notes that in the Furund'ija Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber found sexual abuse to constitute an outrage upon personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute (incorporating Common article 3).[258] The Trial Chamber pronounced the accused guilty of one criminal offence, outrages upon personal dignity, including rape. However, whether one regards rape as an instrument through which torture is committed (Common article 3(1)(a)) or one through which outrages upon personal dignity are committed (Common article 3(1)(c)), in either case, a separate conviction for rape is not permitted under Common article 3, given the absence of a distinct statutory hook for rape.

193. This statutory limitation does not, however, dispose of the matter. As the Appeals Chamber has noted, the Indictments charged Kunarac and Vuković with rape under Article 3 of the Statute without reference to Common article 3. In its discussion of the charges under Article 3 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber noted that the Prosecutor "submitted that the basis for the rape charges under Article 3 lies in both treaty and customary international law, including common Article 3".[259] Notwithstanding its exhaustive analysis of Common article 3 in connection to the charged offences under Article 3 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber's disposition makes no mention of Common article 3.

194. Article 3 of the Statute, as the Appeals Chamber has previously observed, also prohibits other serious violations of customary international law. The Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision outlined four requirements to trigger Article 3 of the Statute: [260]

> (i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law; (ii) the rule must be customary in nature...; (iii) the violation must be 'serious', that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values...; (iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule.

Therefore, so long as rape is a "serious" war crime under customary international law entailing "individual criminal responsibility," separate convictions for rape under Article 3 of the Statute and torture under that Article, by reference to Common article 3(1)(a), are not impermissibly cumulative.

[259] Trial Judgement, para 400. On appeal, the Prosecution invoked the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision to explain the broad scope of Article 3 of the Statute. See Prosecution Consolidated Respondent's Brief, para 2.4.
[260] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 94.

195. In keeping with the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, the Appeals Chamber concludes that rape meets these requirements and, therefore, constitutes a recognised war crime under customary international law, which is punishable under Article 3 of the Statute.[261] The universal criminalisation of rape in domestic jurisdictions, the explicit prohibitions contained in the fourth Geneva Convention and in the Additional Protocols I and II, and the recognition of the seriousness of the offence in the jurisprudence of international bodies, including the European Commission on Human Rights and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, all lead inexorably to this conclusion.[262]

196. In summary, under Article 3 of the Statute, a conviction for rape can be cumulated with a conviction for torture for the same conduct. A question of cumulativeness assumes the validity of each conviction standing independently; it asks only whether both convictions may be made where they relate to the same conduct. The answer to that question will depend on whether each of the two crimes has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other. Without being exhaustive and as already noted, an element of the crime of rape is penetration, whereas an element for the crime of torture is a prohibited purpose, neither element being found in the other crime. From this, it follows that cumulative convictions for rape and torture under Article 3 of the Statute are permissible though based on the same conduct. Furthermore, as already explained in paragraphs 180 to 185 of this Judgement relating to the question of cumulation in respect of intra-Article 5 crimes, the rapes and sexual abuses amount to torture in the circumstances of this case. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, dismisses the Appellants' grounds of appeal relating to cumulative convictions with regard to the intra-Article 3 convictions.

4. The Appellant Kovač's Separate Ground of Appeal

197. The Appellant Kovač argues that he was impermissibly convicted of both rape and outrages upon personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber rejects the argument, considering that the Trial Chamber did not base its convictions on the same conduct.[263] suffering in the victim. In addition to the violence suffered at the time it is committed, the victims are commonly hurt or, in some cases, are even made pregnant".

198. All other grounds of appeal relating to cumulative convictions are rejected.

VIII. ALLEGED ERRORS OF FACT (DRAGOLJUB KUNARAC)

A. Alibi

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kunarac)

199. The Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber erred in not accepting his alibi presented at trial in connection with the following periods: 7-21 July 1992 ("first period"); 23-26 July 1992 ("second period"); 27 July-1 August 1992 ("third period"); and 3-8 August 1992 ("fourth period").

200. As to the first and second periods, the Appellant alleges that he was "on war tasks" in the areas of Čerova Ravan[264] and Jabuka[265] respectively. As to the third period, the Appellant submits that he was first in the area of Dragocevo and Preljuca, and then, on 31 July, moved to the zone of Rogoj where he stayed until the evening of 2 August 1992 when, around 10 p.m., he arrived in Vele~evo in Foča.[266] Lastly, the Appellant affirms that during the fourth period he was "on the terrain in Ftheğ zone Fof theğ Kalinovik-Rogoj mountain pass".[267]

201. The Appellant asserts that these submissions are supported by a number of Defence witnesses, including Vaso Blagojević,[268] Gordan Mastilo, D.J., Radoslav Djurović and D.E., and that the Trial Chamber erred in relying exclusively upon the Prosecutor's witnesses.[269]

202. Lastly, the Appellant adds that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that, on 2 August 1992, he took several women from Kalinovik and other women, namely FWS-75, FWS-87, FWS-50 and [268] This witness claimed to have known the whereabouts of Kunarac at all times during the period of 23-26 July (Trial Judgement, para 598) and to have seen Kunarac around Čerova Ravan in the period between 7-21 July (Trial Judgement, para 605). However, the witness never claimed to have seen Kunarac around Čerova Ravan on 27 July, as held by the Trial Chamber (Trial Judgement, para 599).

D.B., from the Partizan Sports Hall to the house at Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16.[270] The Appellant asserts that on this day he was at the Rogoj pass.[271]

(b) The Respondent

203. The Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber correctly rejected Kunarac's alibi. The Respondent explains that the Trial Chamber carefully evaluated the evidence, including the testimony of Kunarac's witnesses and found several deficiencies therein. She recalls, inter alia, that the Trial Chamber stressed that Kunarac himself admitted to having had a role in the abduction of women from the Partizan Sports Hall, although he stated that this happened on 3 August and not on 2 August 1992. The Respondent concludes that Kunarac's submissions concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of his alibi are unfounded and therefore should be rejected.

2. Discussion

204. At the outset, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber thoroughly and comprehensively dealt with the alibi put forward by Kunarac in connection with the aforementioned periods. The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber conducted a careful analysis of the evidence before it and provided clearly articulated reasons. The Trial Chamber observed that the alibi did not cover all the periods alleged in Indictment IT-96-23.[272] It further noted that the alibi provided by some Defence witnesses "covered limited periods: hours, sometimes even a few minutes."[273] With regard to the third period, it found that the only witness providing evidence for the Defence was the accused himself.[274] The Trial Chamber stressed that Kunarac himself conceded that "he took FWS-87, D.B., FWS-50 and another girl from Partizan Sports Hall", although he claimed that this happened on 3 August and not 2 August 1992 as alleged in Indictment IT-96-23.[275] In light of the above and even though there were Defence witnesses who claimed to have known Kunarac's whereabouts during longer periods of time, the Trial Chamber came to the conclusion that "there is Fnotğ any reasonable possibility that Dragoljub Kunarac was away from the places where and when the rapes took place".[276]

[274] Ibid., para 597.
[275] Ibid., para 619.
[276] Ibid., para 625.

205. The Appeals Chamber considers that by rejecting the alibi, the Trial Chamber came to a possible conclusion in the sense of one that a reasonable trier of fact could have come to. On appeal, the Appellant has simply attributed more credibility and importance to his witnesses than to those of the Prosecutor and this cannot form the basis of a successful objection.

206. In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disturb the findings of the Trial Chamber. Accordingly, this ground of appeal fails.

B. Convictions under Counts 1 to 4

1. Rapes of FWS-75 and D.B.

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

207. The Appellant challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that, at the end of July 1992, he took FWS-75 and D.B. to the house at Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16, where he raped D.B. while a group of soldiers raped FWS-75.

208. First, the Appellant submits that the conviction against him cannot stand because of a material discrepancy between the date of the incident as found by the Trial Chamber ("at the end of July 1992")[277] and the date set out in paragraph 5.3 of Indictment IT-96-23 ("on or around 16 July 1992"). In particular, the Appellant claims that the date set out in Indictment IT-96-23 is so vague that it cannot be used to test the credibility of witnesses testifying about this incident.[278] He thus challenges the testimony of FWS-75 and D.B. on the basis of inconsistency as to the dates on which the incidents occurred.[279]

209. With regard to FWS-75, the Appellant argues that the witness contradicted herself in her testimony at trial. He asserts that FWS-75 initially declared that she was taken to the house at Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16 by the Appellant, Gaga and Crnogorac some 5 or 6 days after her arrival at

[278] Appeal Transcript, T 145.
[279] Kunarac Appeal Brief, para 37.

Partizan,[280] but subsequently stated that she was not taken there by the Appellant and raped by him until 15 days after her arrival at Partizan.[281]

210. In relation to D.B., the Appellant recalls that the witness testified that she was in the house in question on two occasions, the first of which was several days before the second occasion on 2 August 1992. The Appellant contends that if, as claimed by D.B., the first rape took place only several days before 2 August 1992, that rape could not have occurred on 16 July 1992 or "around that date", as claimed by the Prosecutor.[282] Furthermore, based on D.B.'s statement to FWS-75 that she was at Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16 on two occasions and was not raped on the first of those occasions in July 1992, the Appellant argues that D.B. could only have been raped during her second stay in the house in August 1992. However, if D.B. was raped in August, the incident ascribed to the Appellant under paragraph 5.3 of Indictment IT-96-23 must be the same as that described at paragraph 5.4 of that Indictment, which did indeed occur in August 1992. In this regard, the Appellant recalls that in his first interview he admitted to having had sexual intercourse with D.B. on 3 August 1992.[283]

211. Secondly, the Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he possessed the requisite mens rea in relation to the rape of D.B.. The Appellant concedes that he had sexual intercourse with D.B. but denies being aware that D.B.'s consent was vitiated because of Gaga's threats,[284] and stresses that D.B. initiated the sexual contact with him and not vice versa, because, until that moment, he had no interest in having sexual intercourse with her.[285] Further, the Appellant alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in reaching the conclusion that he had committed the crimes with a discriminatory intent solely on the basis of the testimony of a single witness stating that, when he raped women, the Appellant told them that they would give birth to Serb babies or that they should "enjoy being fucked by a Serb".[286]

(ii) The Respondent

212. The Respondent rejects the Appellant's argument concerning the discrepancy between the date of the rape of FWS-75 in Indictment IT-96-23 and the date identified by the Trial Chamber.

She contends that minor differences in time are irrelevant because the specific incident referred to in the relevant Indictment was proved and could not be mistaken for another incident on another date. Indeed, the incident described in paragraph 5.3 of the said Indictment relates to two victims and cannot be confused with that at paragraph 5.4 of the same Indictment, which relates to four victims.[287]

213. As to any inconsistencies between FWS-75's statement and her testimony, the Respondent submits that the Appellant has failed to establish that the alleged inconsistencies were so grave that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have relied on FWS-75's evidence.[288] In the Respondent's view, the Trial Chamber correctly determined that any discrepancies were explained by the fact that FWS-75 was referring to events which had occurred 8 years before.[289] Analogously, the Respondent contends that the Trial Chamber's finding that the Appellant was aware that D.B. did not freely consent to the sexual intercourse was entirely reasonable due to the condition of captivity in which she was held.[290] The Respondent notes that the Appellant himself admitted to having had intercourse with D.B. and recalls, inter alia, the Appellant saying at trial: "I tried to pacify her, to convince her Ŧthat there wasğ no reason to be frightened".[291]

214. Finally, the Respondent recalls FWS-183's testimony that while a soldier was raping her after she had just been raped by the Appellant, "...he - Žaga [the Appellant] was saying that I would have a son and that I would not know whose it was, but the most important thing was it would be a Serb child".[292] The Respondent submits that the evidence provides a firm basis for the Trial Chamber's finding that the Appellant committed crimes for a discriminatory purpose.

(b) Discussion

215. At the outset, the Appeals Chamber identifies the two core components of the Appellant's argument as follows. First, that there was a failure on the part of the Trial Chamber to indicate the precise dates of the rapes of FWS-75 and D.B., which impacts upon the credibility of those witnesses. Secondly, that the Prosecutor did not prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Appellant raped D.B., because the Appellant was not aware that D.B. had not consented to the sexual intercourse. These contentions will be dealt with in turn.

[290] Prosecution Consolidated Respondent's Brief, paras 6.32-6.35 and Appeal Transcript, T 310.

216. With respect to the dates of the rapes of FWS-75 and D.B., the Trial Chamber found, on the basis of the consistent testimony provided by the victims, that the rapes occurred at the end of July 1992 and not in mid-July 1992 as stated in Indictment IT-96-23. The Trial Chamber was also satisfied that these events were proved beyond reasonable doubt and that they were consistent with the description provided at paragraph 5.3 of Indictment IT-96-23. It found some support for this conclusion, inter alia, in the Appellant's own admission to having had sexual intercourse with D.B., made in his statement to the Prosecutor of March 1998 and admitted into evidence as Ex P67.[293]

217. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence and its findings on these points are reasonable. While the Trial Chamber did not indicate the specific day on which the crimes occurred, it did mention with sufficient precision the relevant period. Moreover, in the view of the Appeals Chamber, minor discrepancies between the dates in the Trial Judgement and those in the Indictment in this case go to prove the difficulty, in the absence of documentary evidence, of reconstructing events several years after they occurred and not, as implied by the Appellant, that the events charged in Indictment IT-96-23 did not occur. This is all the more so in light of the weight that must be attached to eyewitness testimony and to the partial admissions of the Appellant.

218. Turning now to the issue of D.B.'s consent, the Trial Chamber found that, given the circumstances of D.B.'s captivity in Partizan, regardless of whether he knew of the threats by Gaga, the Appellant could not have assumed that D.B. was consenting to sexual intercourse. Analogously, the Trial Chamber correctly inferred that the Appellant had a discriminatory intent on the basis, inter alia, of the evidence of FWS-183 regarding comments made by the Appellant during the rapes in which he was involved. Although caution must be exercised when drawing inferences, after having carefully reflected and balanced the details and arguments of the parties, the Appeals Chamber considers these inferences reasonable. The special circumstances and the ethnic selection of victims support the Trial Chamber's conclusions. For these reasons, this part of the grounds of appeal must fail.

2. Rape of FWS-95

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

219. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting him for the rape of FWS-95 on the basis of the testimony provided by FWS-95 and FWS-105.

220. First, the Appellant claims that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on FWS-95's identification of him at trial. In this regard, the Appellant recalls that, in a statement rendered on 9-12 February 1996, FWS-95 described him as a man with a beard and moustache, as did FWS-105 in her statement of the same period. However, according to the Appellant, he never had a beard or moustache. The Appellant then submits that, in a statement given on 25-26 April 1998, FWS-95 was unable to describe him. Nor was she able to recognise him from a photo-spread presented by the Prosecutor at trial. The Appellant asserts that the in-court identification by FWS-95 is vitiated by the fact that when both he and FWS-95 were in the courtroom, the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber called the Appellant's name to ascertain that he could follow the proceedings, thereby de facto identifying him.

221. Secondly, the Appellant contends that, since the Trial Chamber found that FWS-95's evidence with regard to the second of the two rapes lacked credibility, it should likewise have rejected her evidence as to the first rape. In support of this assertion, the Appellant claims that in her first statement to the Prosecutor's investigators in 1996, FWS-95 did not mention his name despite stating that some soldiers had raped her. The Appellant also observes that there is no evidence, other than her testimony, to prove that it was he who raped FWS-95.

(ii) The Respondent

222. The Respondent argues that the Appellant's arguments do not meet the requisite threshold for review. As stated in the ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, the Appellant must prove that the "evidence could not reasonably have been accepted by any reasonable person Fandğ that the Trial Chamber's evaluation was wholly erroneous".[294] The Prosecutor notes that the Trial Chamber considered the discrepancies between FWS-95's prior statement and her testimony in court as minor and accepted that they could be explained by the psychological trauma suffered by the witness.[295] The Prosecutor recalls that the Trial Chamber did not give any positive probative value to in-court identification and adds that FWS-95 clarified her evidence during her testimony before the Trial Chamber.[296] The Trial Chamber accepted the position that FWS-95 had not recognised the Appellant in the photo-spreads because they were of poor quality, and that inconsistencies in FWS-95's description of the Appellant arose from the simple fact that the soldiers were not shaved at the time the rapes took place.[297] The Respondent contends that these findings by the Trial Chamber were reasonable and should be confirmed by the Appeals Chamber.

(b) Discussion

223. In view of the submissions tendered by the Appellant on this ground of appeal, the issue before the Appeals Chamber is that of determining whether or not the Trial Chamber erred in relying on the evidence provided by FWS-95.

224. As to the inconsistencies in FWS-95's testimony, the Trial Chamber held that: [298]

> The Trial Chamber does not regard the various discrepancies between the pre-trial statements dated 25-26 April 1998, Ex D40, of FWS-95 and her testimony in court, to which attention was drawn, as grave enough to discredit the evidence that she was raped by Dragoljub Kunarac during the incident in question.

Furthermore, the Trial Chamber stated that:[299]

> In particular, the Trial Chamber is satisfied of the truthfulness and completeness of the testimony of FWS-95 as to the rape by Kunarac because, apart from all noted minor inconsistencies, FWS-95 always testified clearly and without any hesitation that she had been raped by the accused Kunarac.

225. The Trial Chamber was well aware of the inconsistencies in FWS-95's various declarations, but this did not prevent it from relying upon her testimony, in light of the manner in which she gave it before the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber does not have the Trial Chamber's advantage of observing FWS-95 when she testified. It was, however, within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to rely upon the evidence provided at trial by FWS-95 and to reject the Defence's complaint about alleged inconsistencies. Further, in the circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber does not see any reason for disturbing the Trial Chamber's findings as to the alleged inconsistencies. These were dealt with at trial and, as correctly held by the Trial Chamber, do not appear so grave as to undermine FWS-95's testimony.

226. With regard to the issue of identification, although the Trial Chamber unnecessarily stated that: "FWS-95 was able to identify Kunarac in the courtroom...."[300] in the Trial Judgement, it also asserted that: "[t]he Trial Chamber has not relied upon the identification made in court" of Kunarac by FWS-95.[301] Moreover, the Trial Chamber explained that:[302]

> Because all of the circumstances of a trial necessarily lead such a witness to identify the person on trial (or, where more than one person is on trial, the particular person on trial who most closely resembles the man who committed the offence charged), no positive probative weight has been given by the Trial Chamber to these "in court" identifications.

227. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber accepted FWS-95's identification on the basis of a witness testimony and not on the basis of an in-court identification. Indeed, the Trial Chamber held that: "The identification of Dragoljub Kunarac by FWS-95 is supported by evidence provided by FWS-105".[303] For this reason, the Appellant's allegation appears misplaced.

228. The Appellant was charged only with taking FWS-95 to Ulica Osmana \iki}a no 16, where she was raped by other soldiers. The Appellant was acquitted on the charge contained in Indictment IT-96-23, because FWS-95 "was not able to say who took her out of Partizan on this occasion".[304] Therefore, contrary to what was alleged by the Appellant, the Trial Chamber did not call the credibility of FWS-95 into question. Additionally, it has to be recalled that there is no general rule of evidence which precludes acceptance in part of the statement of a witness if good cause exists for this distinction, as was the case here. This being so, the Appellant's contention appears unfounded.

229. For the foregoing reasons, after careful analysis of the development of FWS-95's testimony in exhibits and transcripts, the Appeals Chamber finds no basis upon which to disturb the Trial Chamber's findings. Accordingly, this ground of appeal must fail.

C. Convictions under Counts 9 and 10 - Rape of FWS-87

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kunarac)

230. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that, sometime in September or October 1992, he went to "Karaman's house" and raped FWS-87 in a room on the upper floor of that house.

231. While conceding that he visited Karaman's house on either 21 or 22 September 1992, the Appellant claims that he merely spoke to FWS-87 on that occasion, and that he did not have sexual intercourse with her. In this regard, the Appellant refers to the testimony given at trial by D.B. who, following a precise question by the Prosecutor, recalled having seen the Appellant only once at Karaman's house, on which occasion he was merely talking with D.B.'s sister (FWS-87) in the living room.[305] The Appellant adds that it was unacceptable in criminal law for the Trial Chamber to infer that he would not have been simply talking to FWS-87, but must have raped her, based only on his alleged "total disregard of Muslim women".[306]

232. The Appellant notes, inter alia, that FWS-87 did not mention the Appellant in her first statement given to the Prosecutor's investigators on 19-20 January 1996, when naming many of those whom she claimed to have raped her. This was despite the witness's admission at trial that her memory in 1996 when she gave that first statement was much better than when she gave her in-court testimony. Only in her second statement of 4-5 May 1998 did FWS-87 declare having been raped by the Appellant, and then only in response to a leading question by the investigator. The Appellant contends that FWS-87's reliability is further called into question due to the fact that, despite having allegedly been raped by him, she did not remember where he was wounded or on which part of his body he was wearing a cast.[307]

(b) The Respondent

233. The Respondent agrees with the Trial Chamber's findings that the inconsistencies described in the Appellant's submissions were minor and did not invalidate the whole of FWS-87's testimony.[308] Further, the Prosecutor observes that the inconsistencies in FWS-87's prior statements relating to the Appellant's presence at Karaman's house were resolved by the Appellant's own admission that he was at that house on 21 or 22 September 1992.[309] The Prosecutor suggests that it was entirely reasonable for the Trial Chamber to dismiss the Appellant's claim that he only talked to FWS-87 as improbable, in light of the Appellant's total disregard for Muslim women. The Prosecutor submits that FWS-87's failure to recall on which body part the Appellant was wearing a cast can be explained by both the passage of time and the trauma suffered by the witness.[310]

2. Discussion

234. The Appeals Chamber finds that the discrepancies identified by the Appellant in the witnesses' testimony are minor when compared with the consistent statements made regarding the presence of the Appellant in Karaman's house, including the admission of the Appellant himself.[311] In the circumstances of this case and in light of FWS-87's testimony, the Appeals Chamber considers the Trial Chamber's inference, that the Appellant would not have simply talked to FWS-87 at Karaman's house because of his lack of respect for Muslims and the fact that he had previously raped FWS-87, as reasonable.

235. With regard to the discrepancy between FWS-87's statements in 1996 and 1998, identified by the Appellant, the Appeals Chamber notes that each testimony complements the other, and that the fact that FWS-87 identified the Appellant later rather than sooner does not render that identification incredible.

236. Finally, as to the uncertainty of FWS-87 regarding whether the Appellant was wounded and on which part of his body he was wearing a cast, the Appeals Chamber observes that FWS-87 did declare in her testimony that the Appellant was wounded, that he was wearing a cast and that "[h]e had something bandaged up somewhere."[312] While FWS-87 did not remember the exact position of the cast, this fact cannot be considered sufficient to place in reasonable doubt the recognition of the Appellant by this witness.

237. In view of the foregoing factors, the Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disturb the Trial Chamber's findings. Accordingly, this ground of appeal is rejected.

D. Convictions under Counts 11 and 12 - Rape and Torture of FWS-183

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kunarac)

238. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in establishing the facts leading to his conviction for the crimes of torture and rape of FWS-183 in mid-July 1992.

239. The Appellant contends that these facts were established on the basis of testimony given by FWS-183 and FWS-61, which was inconsistent and contradictory regarding the specific time when the incident occurred.[313] The Appellant claims, in particular, that there is a discrepancy in that FWS-183 stated that the incident charged in Indictment IT-96-23 occurred in the middle of July 1992, while FWS-61 declared that it occurred "5 or 6 days" before her departure from Fo~a on 13 August 1992. The Appellant asserts that the Trial Chamber incorrectly took the view that it was not necessary to prove the exact date on which the crimes occurred given that there was evidence to establish the essence of the incident pleaded,[314] and that this approach prejudiced the Appellant's defence of alibi.[315]

240. Furthermore, the Appellant submits that FWS-61's contradictory statements discredit her identification of him. FWS-61 stated in her testimony at trial that she had never known the Appellant (referred to in the Kunarac Appeal Brief as Žaga) prior to his arrival at the house where she was staying with FWS-183.[316] In addition, FWS-61 declared to the Prosecutor's investigators that she had identified the Appellant upon his arrival because a soldier called Tadi} had told her that a group of soldiers would come to FWS-61's house led by the Appellant. However, at trial FWS-61 admitted that Tadi} did not indicate to her which one of the three soldiers was the Appellant, and that she identified him only because of the respect shown towards him by the other soldiers.[317]

[317] Kunarac Appeal Brief, para 76.

241. Lastly, the Appellant recalls that, although FWS-61 claimed that FWS-183 told her everything of what happened to her, FWS-61 only testified that soldiers forced FWS-183 to touch them on certain parts of their bodies and not that they raped FWS-183, as held by the Trial Chamber. In the view of the Appellant, this fact goes to prove that FWS-183 was not raped.

(b) The Respondent

242. The Respondent points out that the Trial Chamber addressed the alleged inconsistencies as to the dates when events occurred, and established the general proposition that minor inconsistencies do not invalidate a witness's testimony.[318] The Prosecutor stresses that FWS-183 identified the Appellant as the leader among the men at her apartment on the basis of the respect shown towards him by the other soldiers and that, subsequently, FWS-61 confirmed for FWS-183 the identity of the Appellant as the person in command. Lastly, the Prosecutor considers that the argument that FWS-183 would have told FWS-61 about everything that had happened to her is wholly irrelevant, as FWS-183 identified the Appellant as the person who raped her.[319]

2. Discussion

243. Upon review of the supporting material, the Appeals Chamber finds that the discrepancies as to the dates of the events do not suggest any specific error in the evaluation of the evidence by the Trial Chamber. In particular, the Appeals Chamber notes that FWS-61 testified that the torture and rape of FWS-183 occurred at the end of July and not in August 1992, whereas FWS-183 declared that it was around 15 July. On this basis, the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that the relevant incident occurred in the second part of July. As to the alibi of the Appellant, the Appeals Chamber has already stated its grounds for rejecting this defence and will not reiterate those reasons for each ground of appeal. For the reasons previously stated, the Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber did all that was possible and necessary to establish the date of the crime, which was undoubtedly committed as described in Indictment IT-96-23, as precisely as possible.

244. As to the identification of the Appellant, the Appeals Chamber considers that it was perfectly reasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely upon the testimony of FWS-183 and FWS-61. Although the Trial Chamber did not dwell on this point, the Appeals Chamber finds it reasonable that, as correctly suggested by the Prosecutor, FWS-183 could have deduced the identity of the Appellant by talking to FWS-61, and, contrary to what the Appellant seems to suggest, a "formal indication" from the soldier Tadi} was not needed.

245. Finally, as to the Appellant's contention that the evidence of FWS-61 establishes that FWS-183 was merely forced to touch soldiers and not raped, the Appeals Chamber concurs with the Prosecutor that this argument is irrelevant in light of the convincing nature of the testimony of FWS-183.

246. Overall, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Appellant has failed to identify any specific error by the Trial Chamber and, for the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal must fail.

E. Convictions under Counts 18 to 20 - Rapes and Enslavement of FWS-186 and FWS-191

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kunarac)

247. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber's findings that, on 2 August 1992, he took FWS-191, FWS-186 and J.G. from the house at Ulica Osmana \iki}a no.16 to an abandoned house in Trnova~e and that, once there, he raped FWS-191 while the soldier DP 6 raped FWS-186, are "unacceptable".[320] To prove this point, the Appellant challenges the testimony rendered by FWS-186 and FWS-191.

248. As to FWS-186, the Appellant appears to contend that this witness is not credible because in her first statement, given to the Bosnian government authorities in November 1993, she did not mention his name.[321] The Appellant recalls that FWS-186 stated at trial that this failure to mention his name was due to her embarrassment about speaking in front of three men, and was not, as found by the Trial Chamber, an attempt to protect J.G..[322] The Appellant further alleges, without providing details, that pressure was put on FWS-186, because in her second statement to the Bosnian government authorities she did not confirm that she had been raped.[323]

[321] Ibid. (with reference to Ex-P 212 and 212a).
[323] Kunarac Appeal Brief, para 80.

249. With regard to FWS-191, the Appellant claims that her testimony contradicts that of witnesses. He notes that FWS-191 stated that, on the night of 2 August 1992, although she was taken from the Kalinovik School with other girls, she was alone at Ulica Osmana \icki}a no.16. However, FWS-87, FWS-75, FWS-50 and D.B. testified that they were present at the house as well, and FWS-87 and FWS-50 testified to having been raped by the Appellant.[324] The Appellant also argues that he had no knowledge that FWS-186 and FWS-191 were likely to be raped in Trnova~e.[325] He merely recalls taking FWS-186 and FWS-191 up to Miljevina with the intention of confronting a journalist on 3 August 1992.[326]

250. Furthermore, the Appellant argues that the conclusions of the Trial Chamber regarding the rapes and enslavement of FWS-191 and FWS-186 during the six month period at the house in Trnova~e are untenable, because both witnesses were staying there voluntarily.[327] As proof of this fact, the Appellant submits that he had obtained passes which enabled both FWS-191 and FWS-186 to leave Trnova~e to go to Tivat in Montenegro to stay with his family,[328] but that both witnesses refused to do so.[329] Furthermore, the Appellant submits that both FWS-186 and FWS-191 confirmed that they were free to move in and around the house and to visit neighbours.

251. The Appellant denies that FWS-191 was his personal property. He stresses that FWS-191 stated at trial that the Appellant protected her from being raped by a drunken soldier who had offered money to be with her.[330] Furthermore, the Appellant contends that he did not have any role in keeping FWS-191 at the house in Trnova~e because that house was the property of DP 6.[331] He states that FWS-191 had asked DP 6 if she could stay in the house and that DP 6 had offered her security,[332] explaining that if they left the house she and FWS-186 "would be raped by others".[333]

(b) The Respondent

252. With regard to the inconsistencies in FWS-186's and FWS-191's testimony, the Prosecutor reiterates that this argument was put at trial and that the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that the identification evidence of FWS-186 was credible and that, in any case, the alleged inconsistencies were minor.

253. As to the crime of enslavement, the Prosecutor argues that the Trial Chamber identified a comprehensive range of acts and omissions demonstrating the Appellant's exercise of the rights of ownership over FWS-186, thus satisfying the criteria of enslavement.[334] The Prosecutor contends that the Appellant's submissions are mere reiterations of his defence arguments which were rejected at trial, and that the Appellant has not demonstrated how or why the Trial Chamber's factual conclusions were erroneous.[335] In the view of the Prosecutor, there is no contradiction in the finding of the Trial Chamber that the Appellant forbade other men to rape FWS-191. Rather, it submits, this fact indicates a level of control and ownership consistent with the crime of enslavement.[336]

2. Discussion

254. As regards the alleged inconsistencies, the Trial Chamber relied on the testimony provided at trial by FWS-186, as confirmed by FWS-191, when coming to the conclusion that the two witnesses were kept in the Trnova~e house for five to six months. Throughout this period, FWS-186 was raped repeatedly by DP 6, while FWS-191 was raped by the Appellant during a period of about two months. The Appellant pointed out some minor differences between the various statements of FWS-186 but, inter alia, conceded that FWS-186's failure to mention the name of the Appellant in her first statement was justified. These minor discrepancies do not cast any doubt on the testimony and thereby on the findings of the Trial Chamber. On the contrary, given that discrepancies may be expected to result from an inability to recall everything in the same way at different times, such discrepancies could be taken as indicative of the credibility of the substance of the statements containing them. In light of these factors, the Appeals Chamber is unable to discern any error in the assessment of the evidence by the Trial Chamber.

255. Lastly, as to the crime of enslavement, the Trial Chamber found that the women at Trnova~e "were not free to go where they wanted to even if, as FWS-191 admitted, they were given the keys to the house at some point".[337] In coming to this finding, the Trial Chamber accepted that "...the girls, as described by FWS-191, had nowhere to go, and had no place to hide from Dragoljub Kunarac and DP 6, even if they had attempted to leave the house...."[338] The Appeals Chamber considers that, in light of the circumstances of the case at bar in which Serb soldiers had exclusive control over the municipality of Foča and its inhabitants, and of the consistent testimony of the victims, the findings of the Trial Chamber are entirely reasonable. For the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal fails.

F. Conclusion

256. For the foregoing reasons, the appeal of the Appellant Kunarac on factual findings is dismissed.

IX. ALLEGED ERRORS OF FACT (RADOMIR KOVA^)

A. Identification

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

257. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on the testimony of FWS-75 to establish his participation in the fighting that took place in Mješaja and Trošanj on 3 July 1992.[339] He contends that there are inconsistencies in the descriptions of him given by FWS-75 in her statements.[340] He adds that poor visibility on 3 July 1992 and the fact that she did not know him before the conflict made it difficult for FWS-75 to identify him at the scene, and he suggests that the witness actually saw his brother.[341] The Appellant stresses that he was not involved in the fighting of 3 July 1992, because he was on sick leave from 25 June to 5 July 1992, which was confirmed by DV and recorded in a log book produced by the Defence.[342]

(b) The Respondent

258. As regards the Appellant's involvement in the armed conflict, the Respondent contends that the Trial Chamber was correct in concluding that the Appellant took an active part in the armed conflict in the municipality of Foča from as early as 17 April 1992.[343]

259. With respect to the credibility of FWS-75's evidence identifying the Appellant, the Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber did not err in accepting this evidence, because it was unequivocal and based on FWS-75's detailed description of the Appellant's appearance.[344] The Respondent further claims that there is evidence consistent with that of FWS-75[345] which establishes that the Appellant was involved in combat activities around Mješaja and Trošanj,[346]

whereas there is no evidence to support the Appellant's claim that he was injured and on military leave at the time in question, as DV's evidence does not confirm that claim.[347]

2. Discussion

260. The Appellant's convictions in this case are based on the acts he committed on female civilians held in his apartment from about 31 October 1992. He contests the credibility of FWS-75's evidence as to his participation in the armed conflict that broke out on 3 July 1992. The findings of the Trial Chamber do not indicate that the Appellant was guilty of acts which took place in the conflict of 3 July 1992. With regard to the Appellant's convictions, this ground of appeal has little relevance, except perhaps for the purpose of showing that the Appellant knew of the context in which his acts against the victims were committed. For this, however, there is ample other evidence.[348] As regards the credibility of FWS-75's evidence, the Appeals Chamber concurs with the arguments of the Respondent and incorporates them in this discussion. This ground of appeal is dismissed.

B. Conditions in Radomir Kova~'s Apartment

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

261. The Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber erred in not evaluating the evidence as to the manner in which, whilst at his apartment, FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. were allegedly subjected to rape and degrading and humiliating treatment, and, at times, slapped and exposed to threats.[349] The Appellant argues that FWS-75 was once slapped on her face, but that this was because he found her drunk and not for other reasons.[350] He submits that the girls were sent to his apartment because normal conditions of life no longer existed in their previous place in Miljevina.[351] He also contends that it was not, as the Trial Chamber has found, proved beyond reasonable doubt that he completely ignored the girls' diet and hygiene and that they were sometimes left without food.[352] He maintains that the girls had access to the whole apartment,[353] that they could watch television and videos,[354] that they could cook and eat together with him and Jagos Kosti},[355] and that they went to cafés in town.[356]

(b) The Respondent

262. The Respondent argues that it was open to the Trial Chamber, on the basis of the evidence presented at trial, to conclude that FWS-75, FWS-87, A.S. and A.B. were detained in the Appellant's apartment and subjected to assault and rape.[357] The Respondent argues that the Appellant has failed to specify any error on the part of the Trial Chamber, but has merely reiterated his defence at trial.[358] The Respondent argues that the fact that the Trial Chamber chose to believe certain witnesses and not others does not in itself amount to an error of fact.[359] Further, the findings of the Trial Chamber relating to the conditions in the Appellant's apartment and the mistreatment of the girls therein render the claim of the Appellant that he acted with good intentions incredible.[360] The Respondent also points out that the Trial Chamber has found that FWS-75 was slapped on occasion for refusing sexual intercourse and beaten up for having a drink.[361]

2. Discussion

263. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber discussed what the Appellant stated in his defence at trial.[362] Further, the Trial Chamber discussed at length the conditions in the Appellant's apartment,[363] with reference to the specific abuses suffered by the victims.[364] The proof accepted by the Trial Chamber describes in detail the manner in which the lives of the victims unfolded in the Appellant's apartment and in which physically humiliating treatment was meted out to them. The Appeals Chamber considers that the relevant findings of the Trial Chamber were carefully considered and that the correct conclusions were drawn in the Trial Judgement. The ground of appeal is obviously ill-founded and is therefore dismissed.

C. Offences Committed against FWS-75 and A.B.

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

264. The Appellant submits that it is necessary to determine with greater precision the time and place of the offences in order to convict him.[365] He questions the credibility of FWS-75's testimony with regard to the times when certain incidents occurred and the fact that no other witnesses corroborated her testimony.[366] Further, he points to discrepancies in her testimony.[367]

(b) The Respondent

265. As regards the alleged need for greater precision, the Respondent argues that, in view of the traumatic experiences of FWS-75 and A.B.[368] and their lack of any reason to notice specific days and the means to measure the passing days,[369] the Trial Chamber was correct in accepting the range of the approximate dates which the Prosecution mentioned in Indictment IT-96-23.[370] The Respondent claims that it was never her contention that these dates constituted the precise dates when the events took place.[371] Finally, the Respondent contends that an inability to pinpoint the exact date or dates of events was not detrimental to the credibility of FWS-75 and A.B.,[372] nor did it cause prejudice to the Appellant.[373]

266. With respect to the credibility of FWS-75, it is the view of the Respondent that the Trial Chamber was entitled to come to its conclusions in light of the overwhelming evidence presented by FWS-75, FWS-87 and A.S., which supported each other in all material aspects.[374] In this regard, the Respondent recalls that A.B. confided in FWS-75 that the Appellant had raped her,[375] and that

FWS-87 further testified that A.B. was obviously affected by the abuse that was inflicted upon her.[376] The Respondent adds that FWS-75 was a careful witness who did not exaggerate.[377]

2. Discussion

267. As to the alleged lack of precision, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Judgement is not vague as to the main place where the Appellant committed his crimes against the victims, namely, his apartment. In respect of the time of the crimes, the Trial Chamber found that FWS-75 and A.B. were kept in the Appellant's apartment "for about a week, starting sometime at the end of October or early November 1992",[378] and FWS-87 and A.S., for about four months from "on or around 31 October 1992".[379] In connection with the abuses of FWS-75 and A.B., the Appellant was found to have raped them, to have let other soldiers into his apartment to rape them, and to have handed them over to other soldiers in the knowledge that they would be raped.[380] In relation to the sufferings of FWS-87 and A.S., the Trial Chamber found that they had been repeatedly raped during the four-month period.[381] Given the continuous or repetitive nature of the offences committed by the Appellant on the four women under his control, it is only human that the victims cannot remember the exact time of each incident. In the case of FWS-87 and A.S., for instance, the Trial Chamber was satisfied that the former was raped "almost every night" by the Appellant when he spent the night at his apartment and that the Appellant's flatmate, Jagos Kosti}, "constantly raped A.S.".[382] More reasoning cannot be expected. This first argument fails.

268. On the issue of corroborating evidence, the Appeals Chamber reaffirms its settled jurisprudence that corroboration is not legally required; corroborative testimony only goes to weight. Subject to this, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Appellant focused on two incidents in particular. First, FWS-75 and A.B. were returned to the Appellant's apartment at a particular time before they were given away to other soldiers by the Appellant. Second, at that time, the Appellant was at his apartment.

269. The first incident, the Appellant argues, ended with the return of the victims not earlier than 22 or 23 December 1992. This runs counter to the finding of the Trial Chamber that the return took place between the first and second weeks of December 1992. This submission of the Appellant contains a miscalculation:[383] from 16 November 1992, as suggested by the Appellant, the victims stayed in the apartment near Pod Masala for about 7 to 10 days, which would put the time in late November 1992, rather than "at least until December 22, 1992", as proposed by him.[384] This miscalculation also renders pointless the alleged alibi that he was present in his apartment only till 19 December 1992.

270. In addition, the Appeals Chamber accepts and incorporates the Respondent's convincing argument in this discussion.

271. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this ground of appeal.

D. Offences Committed against FWS-87 and A.S.

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

272. The Appellant questions the credibility of FWS-95's testimony. According to him, the Trial Chamber ought not to have accepted her testimony because she was unable to remember the place where the rapes were committed against her or even some of the perpetrators.[385] He questions the credibility of other witnesses due to their young age and the fact that they experienced traumatic events.[386] He submits that the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting his claim that he was engaged in a mutual, emotional relationship with FWS-87.[387] He raises arguments, which are similar to those he advanced in relation to the offences committed against FWS-75 and A.B., regarding the conditions in his apartment, that the victims enjoyed freedom of movement, that they had sufficient food, and that the hygiene conditions were normal.[388] The Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber erred in not requiring corroborative evidence to be adduced to prove the charges of rape.[389]

[388] Ibid., paras 85-87.
[389] Ibid., para 79.

(b) The Respondent

273. The Respondent asserts that it was open to the Trial Chamber to accept the testimony of FWS-95 and other witnesses without admitting defence expert evidence relating to rape.[390] In the view of the Respondent, the weight, if any, to be attached to the evidence of an expert is a matter entirely for the trier of fact, and the Appellant has identified no error on the part of the Trial Chamber.[391]

274. As regards the alleged relationship between the Appellant and FWS-87, the Respondent contends that it was open to the Trial Chamber to reject this unsubstantiated claim[392] and to conclude on the basis of the evidence presented at trial that the above relationship was, in reality, one of cruel opportunism, abuse and domination.[393]

275. According to the Respondent, the Trial Chamber correctly concluded that FWS-87 and A.S. could not move about freely.[394] In support of this contention, the Respondent highlights the evidence, presented at trial, that the above witnesses could not leave the locked apartment unless accompanied by the Appellant and/or his associate Kosti},[395] and that on trips to cafés and pubs those witnesses were made to wear hats and other items bearing the Serb army insignias.[396]

276. With regard to the issue of corroborative evidence, the Respondent argues that the Trial Chamber acted in accordance with Rule 96 of the Rules in accepting without corroboration the evidence of FWS-87 and A.S. that sexual assaults occurred.[397]

277. The Respondent concludes by recalling that an appeal is not a trial de novo, and that the Appellant has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in the exercise of its discretion.[398] The Respondent states that all the facts disputed by the Appellant were argued and adjudicated at trial, that no good cause has been shown on appeal to justify a re-examination of the Trial

Chamber's factual findings, and that the Trial Chamber has not been shown to have been unreasonable in its evaluation of the witnesses' evidence and its factual conclusions.[399]

2. Discussion

278. As to the Appellant's claim that FWS-95's testimony was not credible, the Appeals Chamber states that the Appellant was not found guilty of any act committed against FWS-95.

279. As to the effect of age and the degree of suffering upon the credibility of the witnesses, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber has clearly indicated that it was aware of this aspect of the case.[400] The Trial Chamber did not lower the threshold of proof below the standard of beyond reasonable doubt. The Appellant has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed an error of fact in admitting evidence from traumatised young victims.

280. As to the alleged relationship between the Appellant and FWS-87, the Appeals Chamber refers to the convincing and exhaustive findings in the Trial Judgement that it "was not one of love as the Defence suggested, but rather one of cruel opportunism on Kovač's part, of constant abuses and domination over a girl who, at the relevant time, was only about 15 years old".[401]

281. With regard to corroborative evidence, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber was, in accordance with Rule 96 of the Rules, entitled not to require corroboration for the testimony of rape victims. The Trial Chamber, therefore, committed no error in this regard and at the same time was aware of the inherent problems of a decision based solely on the testimony of the victims.

282. For the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal is dismissed.

E. Outrages upon Personal Dignity

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

283. The Appellant questions the Trial Chamber's findings of fact with regard to the incidents of naked dancing, by arguing that there were several such incidents and that the witnesses confused

[399] Ibid., para 5.86.
[400] Trial Judgement, paras 564 and 566.

them.[402] He also points out alleged discrepancies in the evidence with regard to the time, [illegible] (where exactly in the apartment the incidents occurred) and details of the incidents (the type of table upon which the dances occurred) for which he was found responsible.[403]

(b) The Respondent

284. As a general proposition, the Respondent contends that it was open to the Trial Chamber to reach the findings it did in relation to the naked dancing incident.[404] The Respondent specifically submits that the inconsistencies and discrepancies in the witnesses' testimony were not material in the sense that they destroyed the credibility of the witnesses.[405] Further, the Respondent claims that the Trial Chamber took those inconsistencies and discrepancies into account in evaluating the evidence and reaching its findings.[406]

2. Discussion

285. Revisiting the arguments in detail, the Appeals Chamber accepts and incorporates the Respondent's arguments in its discussion of this ground of appeal. The Appeals Chamber is persuaded that the Trial Chamber made no error in this respect. This ground of appeal is dismissed.

F. Sale of FWS-87 and A.S.

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Kovač)

286. The Appellant Kova~ argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that a sale occurred, because there were discrepancies in the testimony with regard to the price of sale,[407] and there were contradictions between FWS-87's and A.S.'s statements and their testimony at trial.[408] He also submits that the sale as described by the Trial Chamber was highly improbable because of some details of the sale.[409]

[408] Ibid., paras 97-102.
[409] Ibid., para 103.

(b) The Respondent

287. The Respondent asserts that the Trial Chamber did not err in finding that the Appellant sold FWS-87 and A.S.. The Respondent submits that the alleged differences in the testimonies of the above witnesses are insignificant and have no effect on the credibility of those witnesses.[410] The Respondent also argues that the Appellant's complaints are trivial and do not provide a sufficient basis for challenging the Trial Chamber's findings.[411]

2. Discussion

288. The Appellant has not demonstrated a link between the alleged error and his convictions. This ground of appeal is dismissed as evidently unfounded.

G. The Rape Convictions

289. To the extent that the Appellant tries to demonstrate errors of fact as regards force used in the commission of the crime of rape, his submissions are disposed of by the definition of rape endorsed by the Appeals Chamber in Chapter V, Section B, above.

H. Conclusion

290. For the foregoing reasons, the appeal of the Appellant Kova~ on factual findings is dismissed.

X. ALLEGED ERRORS OF FACT (ZORAN VUKOVI])

A. Alleged Omissions in Indictment IT-96-23/1

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Vuković)

291. In the Appellant's view, the Trial Chamber could not draw any factual conclusions from the following alleged incidents because none of them was charged in Indictment IT-96-23/1 or followed by a conviction.[412] The Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber erred in using the oral rape of FWS-50 in Buk Bijela on 3 July 1992 and FWS-75's testimony indicating that on the same day the Appellant led FWS-75's uncle away covered in blood as evidence of his involvement in the attack against the civilian population of Fo~a.[413] Further, the Appellant claims that the Trial Chamber erred in using FWS-75's testimony alleging her rape by the Appellant for the purposes of identification,[414] notwithstanding that no conviction was entered in relation to this incident.[415]

292. The Appellant adds that he learned about these additional alleged incidents only at trial and therefore did not have an opportunity to prepare his case to meet the charge.[416]

(b) The Respondent

293. First, the Respondent submits that, once admitted into evidence, the Trial Chamber was fully entitled to use the testimony of FWS-50 and FWS-75 to prove the Appellant's knowledge of the widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population and for identification purposes. The Respondent claims that, although she has an obligation to set out the material facts of the case in sufficient detail, she is not required to plead all of her evidence in an indictment.[417]

[417] Prosecution Respondent's Brief, paras 2.15 and 2.48, citing Trial Judgement, paras 589, 789 and 796.

294. Secondly, the Respondent observes that both FWS-50 and FWS-75's evidence was disclosed to the Appellant before those witnesses testified[418] and that adequate notice was given to the Appellant in the form of a memorandum prepared by the Prosecutor's investigators. The Prosecutor remarks that FWS-50 gave evidence in the examination-in-chief and was cross-examined by the Appellant, who did not object to the admission of that evidence.[419]

2. Discussion

295. The Trial Chamber found that the Appellant orally raped FWS-50 in Buk Bijela on 3 July 1992[420] and also accepted FWS-75's testimony stating that the Appellant on that occasion led her uncle away covered in blood. These findings were used for the purpose of demonstrating that the Appellant had knowledge of the attack against the civilian population, one of the necessary elements for entering a conviction for crimes against humanity. The Trial Chamber also accepted, for identification purposes, the testimony of FWS-50 that the Appellant orally raped her in the Appellant Kova~'s apartment.[421]

296. In the Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber made the following statement with regard to the Prosecutor's obligation, under Article 18(4) of the Statute and Rule 47(C) of the Rules, to set out in that Indictment a concise statement of the facts of the case and of the crimes with which the accused is charged: [422]

> In the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, this translates into an obligation on the part of the Prosecution to state the material facts underpinning the charges in the indictment, but not the evidence by which such material facts are to be proven. Hence, the question whether an indictment is pleaded with sufficient particularity is dependent upon whether it sets out the material facts of the Prosecution case with enough detail to inform a defendant clearly of the charges against him so that he may prepare his defence.

297. The Appeals Chamber observes that, in the instant case, the testimony of FWS-50 and FWS-75 did not relate to "material facts underpinning the charges in the indictment" which must have been pleaded in Indictment IT-96-23/1. Indeed, the facts established were not used as a basis for conviction but constituted evidence used to prove material facts pleaded in the Indictment. Therefore, on the basis of its case-law, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber did not err in relying upon those facts as evidence.

[422] Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgement, para 88.

298. Moreover, as to the alleged inability to prepare his defence, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Appellant has not put forward any discernible error in the application of the Rules governing disclosure and the handling of evidence at trial to justify reconsideration of the Trial Chamber's conclusions.

299. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber sees no error in the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence. This ground of appeal must accordingly fail.

B. Rape of FWS-50

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Vuković)

300. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of FWS-50's testimony and that, consequently, the charges relating to the rape and torture of FWS-50 in an apartment in mid-July 1992, alleged in paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23/1, were not proven beyond reasonable doubt.

301. First, the Appellant notes that FWS-50 made no reference to him[423] or to the alleged oral rape at Buk Bijela in her first statement to the Prosecutor's investigators,[424] and claims that discrepancies exist between that statement and her testimony at trial.[425] In particular, the Appellant points out inconsistencies between the testimony of FWS-50 and that of FWS-87.[426] At trial, FWS-50 testified that, after threatening her mother (FWS-51), the Appellant and another Serb soldier took her and FWS-87 from Partizan Sports Hall to an abandoned apartment, where the Appellant raped her.[427] For her part, FWS-87 denied being taken out of Partizan Sports Hall with FWS-50. Further, FWS-87 testified to having seen the Appellant "only twice: once when she was raped by him at Fo~a High School and later when he came to Radomir Kova~'s apartment".[428]

302. Secondly, the Appellant contends that FWS-50 did not provide any detail as to the place where she was taken and raped.[429] Given that the Trial Chamber accepted FWS-50's evidence in [423] Vuković Appeal Brief, para 129.

[424] Ibid., para 126.
[425] Ibid., para 123.
[427] Appeal Transcript, T 202.
[428] Trial Judgement, para 246.
[429] Vuković Appeal Brief, para 125.

spite of this omission, the Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber used a different standard when evaluating FWS-50's evidence than when evaluating that of FWS-75 and FWS-87.[430]

303. Lastly, the Appellant claims that FWS-51 (FWS-50's mother) did not confirm that FWS-50 was taken by him from Partizan Sports Hall despite the fact that she was allegedly present when he took her daughter.[431] He alleges that FWS-51's inability to properly identify him calls into question FWS-50's credibility.[432]

(b) The Respondent

304. The Respondent contends that FWS-50's failure to refer to the Appellant and to the oral rape at Buk Bijela in her first statement to the Prosecutor's investigators does not diminish her reliability as a witness. Indeed, during cross-examination, FWS-50 explained that she did not mention this rape because she was ashamed of it.[433] The Respondent adds that FWS-50's trial testimony is remarkably consistent with her prior statement to the Prosecutor's investigators, with only insignificant discrepancies due to the passage of time.[434]

305. The Respondent points out that the Appellant erroneously stated that FWS-87 denied that FWS-50 was taken from Partizan Sports Hall and raped by the Appellant, as in fact FWS-87 merely stated that she did not remember this incident. Therefore, the Trial Chamber's decision not to convict the Appellant for the rape of FWS-87 stemmed from that witness's failure to remember the incident in question and not from any denial that it took place.[435] The Respondent submits that, at any rate, the failure by FWS-87 to recall being taken from Partizan Sports Hall and raped is fully understandable, given the frequency with which she was raped by a large number of men.[436] The Respondent claims that the lack of evidence from FWS-87 does not undermine the value of FWS-50's testimony indicating that the Appellant raped her.[437]

306. The Respondent stresses that FWS-50 gave detailed evidence of being taken to an abandoned apartment near Partizan and raped, and that she should not be expected to identify an exact location for that apartment. Therefore, the Appellant's related contention that the Trial

Chamber used different standards when evaluating the evidence of FWS-75 and FWS-87 fails to a lack of support.[438]

307. Finally, with regard to FWS-51, the Respondent recalls that this witness recognised the Appellant in court as "being familiar" and asserts that, even if FWS-51 could not identify the Appellant with certainty, this fact does not affect FWS-50's ability to identify the Appellant as the man who raped her.[439]

2. Discussion

308. The Appeals Chamber notes that the essential point of the Appellant's submissions is that, due to the unreliability of FWS-50's evidence, the Trial Chamber erred in relying upon that evidence to find him guilty of the charges of rape and torture of FWS-50 in an apartment in mid-July 1992.

309. At trial, FWS-50 explained her failure to mention the first rape at Buk Bijela on earlier occasions. The Appeals Chamber takes the view that, based upon her testimony, it was not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that this first rape was particularly painful and frightening for FWS-50,[440] and that this omission in her first statement did not affect her reliability. The alleged inconsistencies between FWS-50's prior statement and her testimony at trial have been reviewed by the Appeals Chamber and are not sufficiently significant to cast any doubt upon the credibility of FWS-50. On the contrary, the absence of such natural discrepancies could form the basis for suspicion as to the credibility of a testimony.

310. With regard to the alleged inconsistency between the evidence of FWS-87 and that of FWS-50, the Appeals Chamber observes that FWS-87 stated simply that she did not recall the particular incident referred to by FWS-50 and not that it did not occur. The mere fact that FWS-87 could not remember being taken out of Partizan with FWS-50 does not cast any doubt upon FWS-50's own credibility.

311. In reply to the Appellant's submission that FWS-50 did not explain where she was taken and where she was raped, the Appeals Chamber observes that the witness testified at trial that she was taken to a room on the left side of the corridor of an abandoned apartment.[441] The Appeals Chamber considers that it would be unreasonable in the circumstances to expect the witness to identify an exact location or a street address for this apartment.

[440] Trial Transcript, T 1293-1294.

312. Lastly, with regard to FWS-51, the Appeals Chamber observes that she did testify that FWS-50 was taken from Partizan Sports Hall,[442] even though she did not specify who took her. FWS-51 did not, as the Appellant seems to imply, deny that the incident charged at paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23/1 took place. There is no basis for upholding the Appellant's contention.

313. For the foregoing reasons, the Trial Chamber's finding that FWS-50's evidence was a reliable basis on which to convict the Appellant for the crimes alleged in paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23/1 remains undisturbed. This ground of appeal accordingly fails.

C. Issue of Identification

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Vuković)

314. The Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting the identification of him provided by FWS-50 and FWS-75.[443] To prove this point, he makes the following submissions.

315. Firstly, the Appellant claims that FWS-50 identified him only at trial and that her courtroom identification was incorrectly performed in violation of criminal law principles.[444]

316. Further, the Appellant submits that, although FWS-62 testified that she saw her husband (FWS-75's uncle) being led away by the Appellant, she was not able to identify him when called to testify at trial.[445] The Appellant claims that the Trial Chamber could not rely on the identification provided by FWS-75, as this witness's unreliability is demonstrated by the fact that the Trial Chamber did not believe her evidence regarding the acts of the alleged rape in the Appellant Kovač's apartment.[446]

[443] Vuković Appeal Brief, para 129.
[444] Ibid.
[445] Ibid., para 130.
[446] Ibid., para 131.

317. The Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber's decision to accept FWS-75's identification of him contradicts the position held by the Trial Chamber in the Kupreskić case that caution must be exercised when evaluating the evidence of a witness who has suffered intense trauma.[447]

(b) The Respondent

318. The Respondent argues that the Trial Chamber was entitled to place some weight on FWS-50's in-court identification of the Appellant, even though conceding that the Trial Chamber did not attach positive probative weight to that evidence. The Respondent stresses, however, that FWS-50 saw the Appellant in Buk Bijela in early July 1992 when she was orally raped and in mid-July when he took her out of Partizan Sports Hall and raped her. In this regard, the Respondent points out that the Appellant has not indicated any discernible error on the part of the Trial Chamber in relying upon such evidence. Moreover, FWS-50 recognised the Appellant in photos shown to her by the Prosecutor's investigators in September 1999.[448] The Respondent claims that FWS-62's inability to recognise the Appellant at trial does not undermine the credibility of the evidence provided by FWS-50 or FWS-75.[449]

319. Lastly, the Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber examined the evidence concerning identification in a very careful manner and that it was acutely aware of the traumatic circumstances these witnesses faced.[450]

2. Discussion

320. With regard to the probative value of courtroom identifications, the Appeals Chamber reiterates its previous finding that the Trial Chamber was correct in giving no probative weight to in-court identification.[451]

321. As to the alleged inability of FWS-62 to identify the Appellant, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber relied mainly upon the testimony of FWS-50, who indicated with certainty that, inter alia, the Appellant was the person who raped her orally at Buk Bijela in an abandoned apartment.[452] Although caution is necessary when relying primarily upon the testimony of a single witness, in the circumstances of this case it was wholly understandable that the Trial Chamber attributed more weight to the evidence provided by FWS-50 than to that of FWS-62.

322. The Appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting FWS-75's identification of the Appellant because it did not accept her evidence that the Appellant raped her[453] misstates the Trial Chamber's position. The Trial Chamber did accept FWS-75's evidence that the Appellant raped her in Kovač's apartment. Its failure to use that evidence for conviction or sentencing purposes stemmed from the fact that this act was not charged in Indictment IT-96-23/1 and not, as the Appellant suggests, from a belief that FWS-75 was unreliable.[454] The Trial Chamber, however, did use this particular evidence provided by FWS-75 for the purposes of identification, as it was entitled to do.[455] In view of this, the Appeals Chamber cannot find a discernible error on the part of the Trial Chamber.

323. Finally, with regard to the Appellant's contention that the Trial Chamber did not exercise sufficient caution in its use of FWS-75's, the Appeals Chamber takes note of the following finding of the Trial Chamber: [456]

> The Trial Chamber attaches much weight to the identification of Vukovi} by FWS-75 because of the traumatic context during which the witness was confronted with Vukovi} in Buk Bijela as well as in Radomir Kovač's apartment. The Trial Chamber is therefore satisfied that the identification of Vukovi} by FWS-75 was a reliable one.

324. The Appeals Chamber agrees that, in principle, there could be cases in which the trauma experienced by a witness may make her unreliable as a witness and emphasises that a Trial Chamber must be especially rigorous in assessing identification evidence. However, there is no recognised rule of evidence that traumatic circumstances necessarily render a witness's evidence unreliable. It must be demonstrated in concreto why "the traumatic context" renders a given witness unreliable. It is the duty of the Trial Chamber to provide a reasoned opinion adequately balancing all the relevant factors. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in the present case, the Trial Chamber has provided relatively short but convincing reasoning.

325. In view of the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal fails.

D. Discussion of Exculpatory Evidence

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) The Appellant (Vuković)

326. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting him of the rape of FWS-50 because, as shown by the evidence at trial regarding an "injury" to his testicle, he was impotent at the relevant time and thus could not have committed the crime.[457]

327. The Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber should have concluded from the evidence given by Defence witnesses DP and DV that he had suffered an injury to his testicle at the relevant time. He argues that the Trial Chamber erred in ruling that a logbook of DV was inadmissible because it failed to mention the nature of Vukovi}'s injury.[458]

328. The Appellant furthermore claims that the Trial Chamber erred in preferring the evidence given by the Prosecution's expert Dr. de Grave to that of the Defence witness Professor Dunjić.[459] Vukovi} submits that both expert witnesses left open the possibility of impotence arising from his injury.[460] The Appellant asserts that Dr. de Grave's expert experience is limited in comparison to that of Professor Dunji}.[461]

329. In the Vukovi} Reply Brief, the Appellant reiterates that the Trial Chamber erroneously rejected the evidence of Professor Dunji} in favour of that of Dr. de Grave, who concluded that the impotence resulting from this injury would only last for three days.[462] The Appellant re-emphasises that the Trial Chamber did not determine with certainty the date when the rape alleged in paragraph 7.11 of Indictment IT-96-23/1 occurred, and hence it is not possible to exclude the existence of the Appellant's impotence at the relevant time.[463]

(b) The Respondent

330. The Respondent rejects Vukovi}'s "submissions regarding the Trial Chamber's findings as to Vukovi}'s injury and its impact on his ability to have sexual intercourse at the relevant time".[464] The Respondent notes that the Trial Chamber gave considerable attention to the evidence raised by the Defence.[465] It recalls that the Trial Chamber found that "the Defence adduced no credible evidence concerning the seriousness or even the exact nature of the injury sustained by the accused on that occasion".[466] Finally, the Respondent stresses that Dr. de Grave's testimony revealed that Vukovi}'s alleged impotence would not have lasted longer than 3 days and that the Trial Chamber rightfully rejected Professor Dunji}'s medical opinion on the ground that "he was unable to conclude that such impotence actually occurred".[467]

2. Discussion

331. At the outset, the Appeals Chamber notes that the bulk of the submissions tendered by Vukovi} in this ground of appeal has already been raised during trial and satisfactorily dealt with in the Trial Judgement.

332. The Trial Chamber rejected the defence of impotence put forward by Vukovi} on the following grounds. First, it established that the injury to Vukovi}'s testicle occurred on 15 June 1992 and that the first rape ascribed to him occurred on 6 or 7 July 1992. On this basis, it held that, without excluding the possibility that Vukovi} could have been impotent for a certain period of time, by the date the crime occurred "the accused would have recovered from his injury."[468] As to the seriousness of Vukovi}'s injury, the Trial Chamber referred to the testimony of DV suggesting that the accused might have exaggerated the gravity of his injury in order to avoid being sent back to the frontline.[469] In this regard, it stressed that although indicating that Vukovi} was injured on 15 June 1992, the logbook referred to by DV said nothing about the seriousness of this injury.[470] In addition, the Trial Chamber relied on the testimony of DP, a confidant of the accused, who, although testifying that he had taken the accused to hospital for treatment 4 or 5 times, said nothing about the nature of the consequences of the injury. Finally, the Trial Chamber noted that Professor Dušan Dunjić, the medical expert called by Vukovi}, indicated that an unspecified temporary impotence could result as a consequence of an accident of the sort described by the accused, but that Professor Dunjić was unable to conclude that such impotence actually occurred. On these grounds, the Trial Chamber concluded that: [471]

> ...there is no reasonable possibility that any damage to the accused's testis or scrotum led to the consequence that he was rendered impotent during the time material to the charges against him.

333. The Appeals Chamber finds that, on the basis of the evidence presented before it at trial, the conclusion of the Trial Chamber is reasonable. All arguments presented by the Appellant were analysed by the Trial Chamber. The mere assertion that one expert witness is more experienced than another has no value. The Appellant failed to demonstrate in detail and on the basis of a qualified expertise the scientific superiority of Professor Dunjić. Additionally, it must be taken into account that the underlying facts of the expert's opinion are extremely vague and allow for the conclusions which were drawn.

334. In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disturb the Trial Chamber's finding and thus this ground of appeal must fail.

E. Conclusion

335. For the foregoing reasons, the appeal of the Appellant Vukovi} on factual findings is dismissed.

XI. GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO SENTENCING

A. The Appellant Dragoljub Kunarac's Appeal against Sentence

336. The Appellant Kunarac has received a single sentence of 28 years' imprisonment for convictions on five counts of crimes against humanity and six counts of violations of the laws or customs of war. His appeal against the sentence consists of the following grounds: 1) a single sentence is not allowed under the Rules and each convicted crime should receive an individual sentence; 2) the Trial Chamber should follow the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia in the sense that the sentence under appeal cannot exceed the maximum sentence prescribed for the courts of the former Yugoslavia; 3) his crimes do not deserve the maximum penalty because certain aggravating factors in relation to his crimes were not properly assessed; 4) two mitigating factors should have been taken into account in the assessment of the sentence; and 5) the Trial Chamber was ambiguous as to which version of the Rule regarding credit for time served was applied.

1. Whether the Single Sentence is in Conformity with the Rules

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

337. The Appellant submits, in effect, that the Trial Chamber should have pronounced an individual sentence for each criminal offence for which he was convicted at the conclusion of the trial, in accordance with the provision of Rule 101(C) of the Rules then in force.[472] He argues that that version of Rule 101(C) "in no case allowed for the single sentence to be pronounced", for if this were not the case, there would have been no need to amend the Rule shortly after the conclusion of the trial.[473] He further contends that the Trial Chamber did not respect the principles that each crime receives one sentence and that a composite sentence for all crimes cannot be equal to the sum of the individual sentences nor be in excess of the highest determined sentence for an individual crime.[474]

[473] Kunarac Appeal Brief, para 150.

(ii) The Respondent

338. The Respondent submits that the Appellant has not shown, in terms of Rule 6(D) of the Rules, how the application of the Rules in this connection has prejudiced his rights as an accused.[475] She argues that the amendment in question codified the practice of the Tribunal of allowing a global sentence to be imposed for crimes "committed in a geographically limited area over a limited period of time" since "the imposition of a single sentence is therefore more appropriate to reflect the totality of...ŧthe Appellants'ğ respective conduct."[476] Although citing another relevant rule, Rule 87 of the Rules, the Respondent fails to address the Appellant's arguments concerning Rule 101(C).

(b) Discussion

339. The Trial Chamber merely states that it "is satisfied that the rights of the three accused are not prejudiced by the application of the latest amended version" of the Rules, in accordance with Rule 6 of the Rules,[477] and that it will follow the provision of Rule 87(C) of the Rules in imposing a single sentence.[478]

340. Rule 101(C) of the Rules (18th edition, 2 August 2000) provides:

> The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

This provision was deleted at the Plenary Meetings of the Tribunal held in December 2000. Rule 87(C) of the 18th edition of the Rules provides:

> If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more of the charges contained in the indictment, it shall at the same time determine the penalty to be imposed in respect of each finding of guilt.

The version of Rule 87(C) contained in the 19th edition of the Rules (19 January 2001) provides thus:

> If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more of the charges contained in the indictment, it shall impose a sentence in respect of each finding of guilt and indicate whether such sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently, unless it decides to exercise its power to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused.

[477] Trial Judgement, para 823, footnote 1406.

This newer version of Rule 87(C) of the Rules combined the provisions of Rule 87(C) and Rule 101 (C) of the 18th edition of the Rules, in addition to its recognising the power of a Trial Chamber to impose a single sentence. Rule 6(D) of the Rules, the text of which remained unchanged between these two editions, states:

> An amendment shall enter into force seven days after the date of issue of the official Tribunal document containing the amendment, but shall not operate to prejudice the rights of the accused in any pending case.

341. The Appeals Chamber interprets this ground of appeal as alleging a legal error. The consequence of applying the newer Rule 87(C) of the Rules by the Trial Chamber was clear: the imposition of a single sentence was within the power of the Chamber. The question to be answered by the Appeals Chamber is whether the imposition of a single sentence in accordance with the newer Rule 87(C) of the Rules prejudiced the rights of the accused at the conclusion of his trial.

342. The Appeals Chamber considers that the version of Rule 101(C) contained in the 18th edition of the Rules did not expressly require a Trial Chamber to impose multiple sentences for multiple convictions. It merely required the Trial Chamber to indicate whether multiple sentences, if imposed at all, would be served consecutively or concurrently. This was a rule intended to provide clarity for the enforcement of sentences. This interpretation is also that implicitly adopted in the Bla{ki} Trial Judgement.[479] In that Judgement, the Trial Chamber further reasoned that:[480]

> Here, the crimes ascribed to the accused have been characterised in several distinct ways but form part of a single set of crimes committed in a given geographic region during a relatively extended time-span, the very length of which served to ground their characterisation as a crime against humanity, without its being possible to distinguish criminal intent from motive. The Trial Chamber further observes that crimes other than [sic] the crime of persecution brought against the accused rest fully on the same facts as those specified under the other crimes for which the accused is being prosecuted... In light of this overall consistency, the Trial Chamber finds that there is reason to impose a single sentence for all the crimes of which the accused has been found guilty.

343. In the disposition of the Bla{ki} Trial Judgement, it is clear that the accused was convicted on different counts for the same underlying acts for which he was held responsible. It is clear from this Judgement that, in certain cases, a single, composite sentence may be more appropriate than a set of individual sentences for individual convictions. The fundamental consideration in this regard is, according to the ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, that "the sentence to be served by an accused must reflect the totality of the accused's criminal conduct".[481]

344. The Appeals Chamber holds that neither Rule 87(C) nor Rule 101(C) of the 18th edition of the Rules prohibited a Trial Chamber from imposing a single sentence, and the precedent of a single sentence was not unknown in the practice of the Tribunal or of the ICTR.[482] The newer version of Rule 87(C) of the Rules, on which the Trial Chamber relied for sentencing purposes in the present matter, simply confirmed the power of a Trial Chamber to impose a single sentence. If the Appellant had no doubt as to the fairness of Rule 101(C) of the 18th edition of the Rules, as is the case here, he could not fault the fairness of Rule 87(C) of the 19th edition of the Rules, which did no more than absorb Rule 101(C) of the earlier edition and codify a precedent in the practice of the Tribunal. This ground of appeal thus fails.

2. The Recourse to the Sentencing Practice in the Courts of the Former Yugoslavia

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

345. The Appellant argues that a Trial Chamber must comply with Article 24(1) of the Statute and Rule 101(B)(iii) of the Rules, which means that "the pronounced sentence or sentences can not exceed the general maximum prescribed by the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia, as the courts of the former Yugoslavia can not pronounce sentences in excess to the maximum prescribed sentence".[483] He submits that "the Trial Chamber erred and venture [sic] outside its discretionary framework given in Article 24 of the Statute, since the par 1 of the Article 24 of the Statute is limiting the authority of the Trial Chambers in the Tribunal to pronounce sentences over 20 years of imprisonment, except in cases where they pronounce explicitly regulated sentence of life imprisonment".[484] The maximum sentence the Appellant could foresee was a 20-year imprisonment for war crimes.[485]

(ii) The Respondent

[484] Kunarac and Kova~ Reply Brief, para 6.58.
[485] Kunarac Appeal Brief, para 154.

346. The Respondent submits that the fact that the Trial Chamber is not bound by the practi[illegible] of the courts of the former Yugoslavia is "beyond any serious dispute".[486]

(b) Discussion

347. The Trial Chamber states that the wording of Article 24(1) of the Statute and Rule 101(B)(iii) of the Rules "suggests that the Trial Chamber is not bound to follow the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia."[487] In this context, references are made to the existing case-law, which shows a uniform approach of the Chambers in this connection.[488] There is not "an automatic application of the sentencing practices of the former Yugoslavia".[489]

348. Article 24(1) of the Statute requires that:

> The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the court of the former Yugoslavia.

Rule 101(B)(iii) of the Rules (19th edition) requires a Trial Chamber to "take into account" the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia.

349. The case-law of the Tribunal, as noted in the Trial Judgement, has consistently held that this practice is not binding upon the Trial Chambers in determining sentences.[490] Further, in the instant case the Trial Chamber did consider the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia by way of hearing a defence expert witness in this respect, and it thus complied with the provisions of Article 24(1) of the Statute and Rule 101(B)(iii) of the Rules. The question here is whether the Trial Chamber, while considering the practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia in relation to the sentencing aspect of the present case, ventured outside its discretion by ignoring the sentencing limits set in that practice. Article 24(1) of the Statute prescribes imprisonment, but no gradation of sentence has been laid down. The Chambers have to weigh a variety of factors to decide on the scale of a sentence. In the present case, the Trial Chamber followed all the necessary steps. The Appeals Chamber considers, therefore, that the Trial Chamber did not abuse its power or make an error in this regard. The ground of appeal is rejected.

3. Aggravating Factors

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

350. The Appellant asserts that the Trial Chamber should have satisfied itself first that he deserved the maximum penalty under the 1977 Penal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("the 1977 Penal Code"), which was one of 20 years' imprisonment (in lieu of the death penalty).[491] His reasoning is that, if various aggravating factors had been assessed properly, he would not have received the maximum term of imprisonment. The Appellant claims that the aggravating factors found by the Trial Chamber are erroneous because: 1) the vulnerability of victims is an element of the crime of rape, not an aggravating factor; 2) there is a contradiction between the findings in paragraphs 858 and 863 of the Trial Judgement; 3) the age of certain victims, all but one younger than 19 years, cannot be an aggravating factor; 4) prolonged detention is an element of the crime of enslavement, not an aggravating factor; and 5) discriminatory grounds are an element of Article 5 offences, not an aggravating factor.

(ii) The Respondent

351. The Respondent submits that vulnerability is not an element of the crime of rape, according to the definition given by the Appellant at the trial, and moreover that considering elements of crimes as aggravating factors is anyway not unknown in the practice of the ICTR.[492] She also opines that the Trial Chamber "was probably referring to the status of women and children who are specifically accorded protection under the Geneva Conventions and other international humanitarian law instruments in times of armed conflicts".[493] In that light, "it was reasonable to conclude that the callous attacks on defenseless women merited specific assessment".[494] The Respondent argues that the Appellant has not shown any discernible errors on the part of the Trial Chamber.[495] She does not comment on the issue of the young age of the victims, but states that the Trial Chamber was correct in its approach.[496] Similarly, she merely states that the prolonged period of detention being used to aggravate the sentence was not unreasonable.[497] Further, she argues that discriminatory motives can constitute an aggravating factor.[498] In her view, there are many aggravating factors in Kunarac's case.[499]

[494] Ibid.
[496] Ibid., para 8.21.

(b) Discussion

352. The Appeals Chamber notes that point 1) of this ground of appeal, regarding the factor of vulnerability of the victims, is raised in reference to the consideration of that factor given by the Trial Chamber. In particular, the Trial Chamber stated "[l]astly, that these offences were committed against particularly vulnerable and defenceless women and girls is also considered in aggravation."[500] The Trial Chamber considered the factor of the vulnerability of the victims in terms of the gravity of the offences.[501] Article 24(2) of the Statute requires that Trial Chambers consider the gravity of the offence in imposing sentences. Whether or not the vulnerability of the victim is an element of the crime of rape does not affect its being evidence of the gravity of the crime, which can duly be considered in the course of sentencing as a matter of statutory law. The Trial Chamber committed no error in this regard, and this point of the ground of appeal is thus rejected.

353. As to point 2) of this ground of appeal, the Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber reached contradictory findings with regard to his role in the armed conflict in the former Yugoslavia. In paragraph 858 it makes statements to the effect that none of the accused played relatively significant roles "in the broader context of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia"; whereas it states in paragraph 863 that "the evidence clearly shows that this accused [i.e. Kunarac] played a leading organisational role and that he had substantial influence over some of the other perpetrators". The Appeals Chamber considers that the Appellant has overlooked the different contexts of these two findings. The Trial Chamber found the Appellant not to be in any position of command in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, thus being low down the hierarchy of power in the territory. This does not, however, contradict the finding of his role in the crimes for which he was held responsible, those crimes being confined to a particular area of the former Yugoslavia. Both paragraphs state clearly that he was not regarded as a commander in relation to the crimes. This particular part of the ground of appeal is thus without merit and is dismissed.

[499] Appeal Transcript, T 326.

354. As to point 3), the Appellant has not elaborated on his argument that girls of 16-17 years age might be allowed to marry in the former Yugoslavia. A person may still be regarded as young even if he or she is eligible for marriage according to law. In Article 73 of the 1977 Penal Code, a person between 16-18 years old was considered a "senior juvenile", thus to be treated differently from adults in terms of criminal sanction. Article 1 of the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child,[502] effective for the former Yugoslavia since 2 February 1991, defines a child to be a human being under the age of 18 years unless national law provides the child with a younger age of majority. Young as they were (the victims concerned in this part of the appeal were aged between 15 and a half and 19 years), there was no provision in the 1977 Penal Code, or more specifically the 1977 Penal Code of the Socialist Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, that would aggravate the sentence for a convicted rapist due to the age of a victim who might be under 16 years but older than 14 years. Article 91 of the latter code imposed a heavier sentence for the rape of a juvenile under 14 years of age.

355. The Trial Chamber has considered the defence expert witness's evidence with regard to the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia for the offence of rape, which shows that the youth of victims of sexual crimes constituted an aggravating circumstance in that practice.[503] The witness confirmed in court that the rape of young girls under 18 years of age led to aggravated sentences in the former Yugoslavia.[504] In the view of the Appeals Chamber, the expert evidence did not contradict the prevailing practice in the former Yugoslav Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and was rightly considered by the Trial Chamber in this regard. There still was an inherent discretion of the Trial Chamber to consider a victim's age of 19 years as an aggravating factor by reason of its closeness to the protected age of special vulnerability. No doubt it was for this reason that the Trial Chamber spoke of these different ages as "relatively youthful".[505] Also, the Trial Chamber was right to distinguish between crimes committed in peacetime and in wartime. Young and elderly women need special protection in order to prevent them from becoming easy targets. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was not in error by taking into account the young age of victims specified in the Trial Judgement. This part of the ground of appeal therefore fails.

356. Point 4) of this ground of appeal concerns the aggravating factor of enslavement over a prolonged period. The Trial Chamber found, in relation to the count of enslavement, that two victims were subject to abuses over a period of two months.[506] The Appellant contends that duration is an element of the crime of enslavement, and therefore cannot be an aggravating factor. However, as previously stated, the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber that duration may be a factor "when considering whether someone was enslaved".[507] This means that duration is not an element of the crime, but a factor in the proof of the elements of the crime. The longer the period of enslavement, the more serious the offence. The Trial Chamber properly exercised its discretion in considering a period of two months to be long enough to aggravate the sentence for the offence. This part of the ground of appeal therefore fails.

357. In point 5) of this ground of appeal it is alleged that the Trial Chamber erred in regarding the discriminatory objective as an aggravating factor, as this constitutes an element of Article 5 crimes. In this context, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Tadić Appeal Judgement, which states that a discriminatory intent "is an indispensable legal ingredient of the offence only with regards to those crimes for which this is expressly required, that is, for Article 5(h) of the Statute, concerning various types of persecution".[508] It is not an element for other offences enumerated in Article 5 of the Statute. This part of the ground of appeal thus fails.

4. Mitigating Factors

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

358. The Appellant claims that the fact that none of the witnesses has suffered any severe consequences at his hands should be considered as a mitigating factor. In his view, the fact that he is a father of three young children should likewise be a mitigating factor, as it would in the practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia.[509]

(ii) The Respondent

[508] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 305.
[509] Kunarac Appeal Brief, paras 158-159.

359. The Respondent makes no submission in this respect, except for a remark that "the Trial Chamber is not bound to accept the testimony of experts and more so in the case where the suffering and harmful consequences are so apparent".[510]

(b) Discussion

360. The part on the sentencing of the Appellant in the Trial Judgement contains no mention of either ground being raised by the Appellant, as the Trial Chamber simply states that "there are no other relevant mitigating circumstances to be considered with respect to" the Appellant.[511] The Appeals Chamber takes this ground of appeal to be based on the complaint that the Trial Chamber did not give consideration to the factors in question.

361. The argument regarding an alleged lack of grave consequences was not included in the sentencing section of the Defence Final Trial Brief. Nor was it asserted during the closing arguments. The Trial Chamber, therefore, committed no error in not mentioning this fact. Under Article 47(2) of the 1977 Penal Code, the grave consequences of an offence such as rape would aggravate the sentence. However, that Code contains no provision entitling perpetrators of crimes without grave consequences to mitigation of their punishment. The Trial Chamber, on the other hand, has found that the offences of which the Appellant is convicted are "particularly serious offences." The inherent gravity of those offences, as the starting point for the sentencing procedure, demands severe punishment, which will not be diminished because the offences are claimed to have produced no serious consequences for the victims. This ground of appeal is therefore dismissed.

362. As to the factor that the Appellant is the father of three young children, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Defence raised this point during trial as a matter "significant for sentencing of the Accused Dragoljub Kunarac", and that the Defence actually submitted the point as a significant mitigating circumstance.[512] This point was raised again at the hearing of closing arguments.[513] It is not clear why the Trial Chamber decided not to consider this issue. The Appeals Chamber considers this factor to be a mitigating factor, following the existing case-law of the Tribunal and having recourse to the practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia. In the Erdemovi} Sentencing Judgement, the fact that the accused had a young child was considered as a personal circumstance under the heading of "Mitigating factors".[514] In the Tadić Sentencing Judgement, the personal circumstances of the accused, including his marriage, were considered separately from mitigating factors.[515] Article 24(2) of the Statute requires the Trial Chambers to take into account "the individual circumstances of the convicted person" in the course of determining the sentence. Such circumstances can be either mitigating or aggravating. Family concerns should in principle be a mitigating factor. Article 41(1) of the 1977 Penal Code required the courts of the former Yugoslavia to consider circumstances including the "personal situation" of the convicted person. The Appeals Chamber holds that this should have been considered as a mitigating factor. This ground of appeal is thus partly successful. However, in view of the number and severity of the offences committed, the Appeals Chamber finds that the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber is the appropriate one and thus upholds the Trial Chamber's decision in this respect.

5. Credit for Time Served

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kunarac)

363. The Appellant submits that, in this regard, the Trial Chamber "gave an ambiguous formulation" in the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement by recalling Rule 101 of the Rules without explaining which version of the Rule was applied. He further asserts that if credit for time served is to be calculated from the date of 4 March 1998, "there is no error of the Trial Chamber regarding the application of law."[516]

(ii) The Respondent

364. The Respondent agrees with the Appellant that "no order has been made" in the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement as to the credit for time served, and invites the Appeals Chamber to clarify this point.[517] However, she points out that the Trial Chamber orally stated on 22 February 2001 that the time spent in custody should be credited towards all three convicted persons.[518]

(b) Discussion

365. The Trial Chamber notes that the Appellant "surrendered to the International Tribunal on 4 March 1998".[519] The Appeals Chamber considers that the issue of credit for time could only be regarded as a ground of appeal if an erroneous reading was made by the Appellant of the Trial Chamber Judgement in this respect. However, the heading of the paragraph of the Trial Judgement in question, "Credit for Time Served", read in conjunction with Rule 101(C) and Rule 102 of the 19th edition of the Rules, referred to in the paragraph in question, is clear enough as to the thrust of the paragraph. The Trial Chamber has already stated clearly in footnote 1406 that it would apply the 19th edition of the Rules in this part of the Judgement. The older version of Rule 101(C) of the Rules would be unrelated to the issue of credit for time served. As the Prosecutor correctly submits, the Trial Chamber did make an oral statement, on 22 February 2001, stating that the time spent in custody should be credited to the sentences of the three convicted persons. If the Appellant had had any doubt, he could have, through his counsel, raised this matter immediately before the Trial Chamber for clarification. That would have been the proper forum. The ground of appeal is thus dismissed, provided that the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement be read together with the oral statement of the Trial Chamber of 22 February 2001. In effect, the Appellant will receive credit for his time served in detention as calculated from his surrender into the custody of the Tribunal.

6. Conclusion

366. For the reasons indicated above, the Appeals Chamber dismisses grounds 1 through 5, except for one part of ground 4. Considering, however, the relative weight of the Appellant's family situation as a mitigating factor, the Appeals Chamber decides not to revise the sentence under appeal.

B. The Appellant Radomir Kova~'s Appeal against Sentence

367. The Trial Chamber has sentenced the Appellant Kova~ to a single sentence of imprisonment of 20 years for his convictions on two counts of crimes against humanity and two counts of violations of the laws or customs of war. His appeal against the sentence relies on the following grounds: 1) the retrospective application of the amended Rule 101 of the Rules by the Trial Chamber has prejudiced the Appellant's rights before the Tribunal; 2) the Trial Chamber erroneously applied Article 24(1) of the Statute by disregarding the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia; 3) there is a misunderstanding of aggravating factors by the Trial Chamber; 4) the Trial Chamber erred in considering that there was no mitigating factor in relation to the Appellant's case; and 5) the Trial Judgement is not clear as to the credit given for time served by the Appellant. The Appellant states clearly that he will not ask for a clarification of the finding of the Trial Chamber with regard to the issue of the legality of his arrest.[520]

1. The Issue of a Single Sentence and the Severity of the Sentence

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kova~)

368. The Appellant submits that the retroactive application by the Trial Chamber of the amended Rule 101 of the Rules "prejudiced" his rights. He argues that "it is unacceptable" and "directly opposed to the principle of legality" for crimes to be punished without "prescribed sentences" being designated for those crimes.[521] He explains that, in allowing the imposition of a single sentence for multiple convictions, the amended Rule 101 of the Rules, "seriously breaches the principle that each criminal offence must have a prescribed penalty (nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege)"[522] and has prejudiced his rights.[523] Along the same line of reasoning, he also questions the application of Rule 87(C) of the 19th edition of the Rules.[524] The Appellant further contends that "in view of the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia and the past practices" of the Tribunal, the Trial Chamber should not have imposed "such a high and severe sentence" on him.[525]

(ii) The Respondent

369. The Respondent argues that Rule 87(C) of the Rules (19th edition) codified the pre-existing practice of the Tribunal of allowing single sentences to be imposed for several crimes in situations when to do so would better reflect the totality of the convicted person's conduct.[526]

(b) Discussion

370. As to the propriety of applying Rule 101 and in particular Rule 87(C) of the 19th edition of the Rules, the Appeals Chamber refers to its discussion in paragraphs 339-344, above.

371. As to the argument that Rule 87(C) of the 19th edition of the Rules, in allowing a single sentence to be imposed for multiple convictions, breaches the principle of legality, the Appeals Chamber considers that this argument is premised on a misconception that the Statute should function as a penal code, with prescribed minimum and maximum sentences for specific offences.

372. Ultimately, the Appellant is not challenging the Trial Judgement on the ground of the maxim nullum crimen sine lege but that of nulla poena sine lege. The former is not in dispute, following the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision and the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement. However, the latter principle, as far as penalty is concerned, requires that a person shall not be punished if the law does not prescribe punishment.[527] It does not require that the law prescribes a precise penalty for each offence depending on the degree of gravity. Be it a common law system or a civil law system, it is not the case that national legislation anticipates every possible offence with a prescribed sentence. On the contrary, it is a fact that a penal code frequently prescribes a range for sentencing with regard to an offence; that is, it often sets out both the maximum and minimum sentences. Within the range, judges have the discretion to determine the exact terms of a sentence, subject, of course, to prescribed factors which they have to consider in the exercise of that discretion.

373. The Statute does not set forth a precise tariff of sentences. It does, however, provide for imprisonment and lays down a variety of factors to consider for sentencing purposes. The maximum sentence of life imprisonment is set forth in Rule 101(A) of the Rules (correctly interpreting the Statute) for crimes that are regarded by States as falling within international jurisdiction because of their gravity and international consequences. Thus, the maxim nulla poena sine lege is complied with for crimes subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. As the Permanent Court of International Justice once stated in relation to the principles of nullem crimen sine lege and nulla poena sine lege:[528]

> The law alone determines and defines an offence. The law alone decrees the penalty. A penalty cannot be inflicted in a given case if it is not decreed by the law in respect of that case.

374. Moreover, the Statute requires the Trial Chambers to have recourse to the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia. In each sentencing matter, parties are given sufficient time to make their submissions. A sentence is reached only after all relevant factors are considered by the Trial Chamber. Such a procedure leaves little risk of the rights of the accused being disrespected. In practice, the Trial Chamber does not, therefore, wield arbitrary powers in the sentencing process, and there is always the safeguard of appeal. This ground of appeal therefore fails.

2. The Recourse to the Sentencing Practice in the Courts of the Former Yugoslavia

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kova~)

375. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber cannot disregard the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia, and that "the maximum sentence to be pronounced, notwithstanding the life sentence, is 20 years of imprisonment".[529]

(ii) The Respondent

376. The Respondent asserts that the Tadi} Appeal Judgement has settled the question as to whether "the sentence of 20 years is within the discretionary framework provided to the Trial Chambers by the Statute".[530] In the instant case, the Respondent notes, the Trial Chamber took into account the practice of the former Yugoslavia, but it selected a higher sentence because of the gravity of the Appellant's offences.[531]

(b) Discussion

377. As previously stated,[532] a Trial Chamber must consider, but is not bound by, the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia. It is only where that sentencing practice is silent or inadequate in light of international law that a Trial Chamber may consider an approach of its own. In the Tadi} Sentencing Appeal Judgement, it is stated that "the wording of Sub-rule 101(A) of the Rules, which grants the power to imprison for the remainder of a convicted person's life, itself shows that a Trial Chamber's discretion in imposing sentence is not bound by any maximum term of imprisonm applied in a national system".[533] This statement is even more persuasive given that it was made in considering the appeal of Tadi} in that case against his 20-year jail term, which is equivalent to what the Appellant has received as punishment. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber in the instant case did take into account the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia.[534] This ground of appeal is thus dismissed.

3. Aggravating Factors

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kova~)

378. The Appellant argues that "the absence of all elements of grave physical or mental torture which would be the substance of the criminal offence, indicate that not one single aggravating circumstance could be found in the case of the accused Radomir Kova~ which would be of significance in the sentencing decision justifying the pronounced sentence in the duration of 20 years of incarceration of the accused".[535] This ground of appeal consists of the following points: 1) the relatively young age of certain victims; 2) the duration of mistreatment of certain victims; 3) the vulnerability of victims; 4) the fact of multiple victims; and 5) that retribution as a sentencing purpose is outdated.

379. As to point 1), the Appellant argues that the age of one of the victims, A.S., 20 years, should not have been considered as an aggravating factor.[536] As to point 2), the Appellant submits that, during the period of about four months, FWS-87 and A.S. "practically had the [sic] protection", and that during about one month, FWS-75 and A.B. were not in contact with the Appellant.[537] The Appellant argues in relation to point 3) that vulnerability or defencelessness is an element of the criminal offences of enslavement, rape and outrages upon personal dignity, and is therefore not an aggravating factor.[538] As to point 4), the Appellant contends that "[t]he involvement of more than one victim in the offences of the accused is also considered in aggravation".[539] He submits under point 5) that the Trial Chamber accepted retribution as one of the purposes of sentencing, whereas the international trend is "to consider punishment as general prevention, which ultimately must lead to global prevention".[540]

(ii) The Respondent

380. The Respondent submits in respect of point 1) that even if this argument had some truth in it, the fact would remain that several other victims were younger than 18 years and one, A.B., was only 12 years old.[541] With regard to point 3), the Respondent submits that vulnerability is not an element of the crime of enslavement, rape or outrages on personal dignity. In relation to point 5), she submits that this is a "main, general sentencing factor" in the practice of the Tribunal,[542] and that the Trial Chamber did not place undue weight on this factor.[543]

(b) Discussion

381. Concerning point 1), the Appeals Chamber recalls what it stated in paragraphs 354-355, above. The Trial Chamber was not in error in considering the age of the victim, 20 years, as an aggravating factor. This aspect of the ground of appeal thus fails.

382. As regards point 2), the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber in considering as aggravating factors the duration of the crimes of enslavement, rape and outrages upon personal dignity entered, namely, from about one to four months. The Appeals Chamber finds it absurd to argue that FWS-87 and A.S., both having been subjected to rape, enslavement and outrages upon personal dignity for a long period of time, were in fact being protected. Further, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is not clear why the Appellant claims that he had no contact with the victims over the period in which they were detained at his apartment,[544] or when he visited them from time to time at the other places to which they were moved temporarily.[545] This part of the ground of appeal thus fails.

383. As regards point 3), the Appeals Chamber repeats what it stated in paragraph 352, above. This ground of appeal is therefore dismissed.

384. The Appellant offers no arguments to substantiate point 4). The Appeals Chamber considers that there is no need to pass on this point and rejects this part of the ground of appeal.

385. In respect of point 5), the Trial Chamber relies on the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement in considering retribution as a general sentencing factor.[546] The case-law of both this Tribunal and the ICTR is consistent in taking into account the factor of retribution,[547] retribution being "interpreted by Fthe Trialğ Chamber as punishment of an offender for his specific criminal conduct".[548] The Appellant has failed to substantiate his claim of an alleged trend in international law which speaks differently from the one followed by this Tribunal and the ICTR. This ground of appeal is therefore rejected.

4. Mitigating Factors

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Kova~)

386. The Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber should have taken the following mitigating factors into account: 1) the Appellant had no prior intention to harm Muslims nor the knowledge that his actions formed part of a widespread and systematic attack; 2) the presence of the Appellant "when any harm could be done to any Muslims";[549] and 3) the Appellant's relationship with FWS-87 and the protection he extended to her and to A.S..

(ii) The Respondent

387. The Respondent dismisses the above arguments, stating that either they are "encompassing litigated facts and rejected by the Trial Chamber or they do not constitute mitigating factors".[550]

(b) Discussion

388. The Trial Chamber has found that all three accused, "in their capacity as soldiers, took an active part" in the conflict that broke out between the Serb and Muslim forces in Fo~a.[551] It states that the Appellant "was fully aware of the attack against the Muslim villages and aware of the fact that his acts were part of the attack",[552] that he knew that the four women in his control were civilians,[553] and that he "abused them and raped three of them many times, thereby perpetuating the attack upon the Muslim civilian population".[554] The Appeals Chamber finds that these factors should have been argued in relation to the elements of the offences. Before the sentencing proceedings, the Trial Chamber had already accepted these factors as being proved beyond reasonable doubt, resulting in a conviction. The Appellant thus cannot re-litigate this issue in the course of the sentencing appeal. This part of the grounds of appeal is thus dismissed.

389. The second factor is unclearly pleaded and without reasoning. The Appeals Chamber merely notes that the four women the Appellant kept in his apartment and abused were Muslims.[555] This part of the grounds of appeal therefore fails.

390. In relation to the third factor, the Trial Chamber has found that the relationship between the Appellant and FWS-87 was not one of love, "but rather one of cruel opportunism on Kova~'s part, of constant abuses and domination over a girl who, at the relevant time, was only about 15 years old".[556] The Trial Chamber also finds that the Appellant "substantially assisted Jagos Kosti} in raping A.S.".[557] The Appeals Chamber concurs with the findings of the Trial Chamber in this respect, and therefore dismisses this part of the grounds of appeal.

5. Credit for Time Served

391. The Appellant submits that if credit were not to be given for his time in detention as from 2 August 1999, his rights would be infringed.[558]

(ii) The Respondent

392. The Respondent, while agreeing that no order was made in the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement with regard to credit for time served, submits that the Trial Chamber did state orally on 22 February 2001 that the time spent in custody be credited.[559]

(b) Discussion

393. The Appeals Chamber recalls its reasoning in paragraph 365, above, and dismisses this ground of appeal, provided that the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement be read together with the oral statement of the Trial Chamber of 22 February 2001. In effect, the Appellant will receive credit for his time served in detention as calculated from the moment of his being taken into the custody of the Tribunal.

6. Conclusion

394. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the Appellant Kova~'s appeal on sentencing in total.

C. The Appellant Zoran Vukovi}'s Appeal against Sentence

395. The Appellant Vukovi} has been sentenced to a single term of imprisonment of 12 years for convictions on two counts of crimes against humanity and two counts of violations of the laws or customs of war. His appeal is based on the following grounds: 1) each conviction should receive a sentence and to impose a single sentence for all convictions is against the Rules; 2) the Tribunal is obligated to have recourse to the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia, under which rape as a war crime does not incur a heavier sentence than rape committed in peacetime; 3) the Trial Chamber has misapplied aggravating factors in relation to FWS-50; 4) the Appellant's help to Muslim families and his family situation should be considered as mitigating factors; and 5) the Trial Chamber has miscalculated the credit for time served.

1. Retroactive Application of the Rules that Resulted in a Single Sentence

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Vukovi})

396. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in imposing a single sentence for multiple convictions.[560] He submits that both the 1977 Penal Code and the penal codes of the new countries in the territory of the former Yugoslavia allow for a single sentence for multiple convictions, subject to the condition that this sentence cannot exceed the severity of the heaviest sentence established by law. Nor can it represent the total of all sentences for the convictions.[561] Further, he argues that by not applying Rule 101(C) of the 18th edition of the Rules, the Trial Chamber acted in contravention of the principle against retroactive application of the Rules.[562] The Appellant adds that if it were possible for the Trial Chamber to impose a single sentence in accordance with "the earlier provisions of ICTY then there would not [be a] need to codify Rule 87(C) of the Rules."[563]

(ii) The Respondent

397. The Respondent submits that "the Appellant's reliance on Rule 101(C) is misplaced", because that Rule referred to the duty of a Trial Chamber to determine "how multiple sentences should be served."[564] She further asserts that the provision did not require the Chamber to impose multiple sentences.[565] The Respondent refers to the Kambanda Appeal Judgement, asserting that it expressly endorses the practice of imposing a single sentence for multiple convictions.[566] She also submits that the Appellant has failed to explain "why the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in imposing a single sentence", and "how the imposition of a global sentence prejudices his rights".[567]

(b) Discussion

398. The Appeals Chamber discerns two parts in this ground of appeal: 1) the allegedly retroactive application of the Rules allowing the imposition of a single sentence; and 2) whether the imposition of a single sentence is subject to similar requirements to those of the 1977 Penal C[illegible] Part 2) will be dealt with in the discussion on the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia.

399. As for part 1), the Appeals Chamber refers to the discussion in paragraphs 339-344, above, and repeats that Rule 87(C) of the 19th edition of the Rules simply confirmed the power of a Trial Chamber to impose a single sentence. This ground of appeal therefore fails.

2. The Recourse to the Sentencing Practice in the Courts of the Former Yugoslavia

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Vukovi})

400. The Appellant submits, in effect, that the Trial Chamber was obligated to comply with the requirement in Article 24(1) of the Statute to have recourse to the sentencing practice in the courts of the former Yugoslavia, and that this would mean that the heaviest penalty for criminal offences was 20 years' imprisonment.[568] He argues that the appropriate comparison is not between life imprisonment, allowed under the Statute, and the capital sentence, permitted in the penal codes of the republics of the former Yugoslavia, but between life imprisonment and the sentence of 20 years' imprisonment known at the relevant time.[569] He further argues that the Trial Chamber should have considered the sentencing practice with regard to rape convictions in the former Yugoslavia as presented by the defence expert witness. In relation to that testimony, the Appellant submits that it is not relevant that the witness focused on the peacetime practice, as sexual freedom is protected in peacetime and in armed conflict.[570] He suggests that a sentence of imprisonment of up to three years might be imposed.[571] The Appellant further points out that the practice in the former Yugoslavia, referred to in the Statute, was that of peacetime.[572] He tentatively argues that rape would be a more severe offence than torture, if both offences contained the same elements.[573] He also argues against retribution as a sentencing purpose.[574]

401. The Respondent submits that "the Trial Chamber is not bound to apply the law of the for. Yugoslavia in matters of sentencing but only to take it into account".[575]

(b) Discussion

402. This ground of appeal essentially repeats Kunarac's and Kovač's arguments. The Appeals Chamber refers to its reasoning in paragraphs 347 to 349 and 377. The Appeals Chamber adds that the Trial Chamber has taken into account the evidence given by the defence expert witness regarding the sentencing practice in the former Yugoslavia, with an emphasis on the crime of rape.[576] However, as the Trial Chamber noted, the expert witness's testimony is "of little relevance" because it centred upon rape during peacetime.[577] Rape as a crime against humanity or a violation of the laws or customs of war requires proof of elements that are not included in national penal codes, such as attack upon any civilian population (in the case of the former) or the existence of an armed conflict (in the case of both). The severity of rape as a crime falling under the jurisdiction of the Tribunal is decidedly greater than that of its national counterpart. This is shown by the difference between the maximum sentences imposed respectively by the Statute and, for instance, the 1977 Penal Code of the Socialist Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, upon the offence of rape. This ground of appeal therefore fails.

3. Aggravating Factor

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Vukovi})

403. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that FWS-50's age at the time of the offences in question was 15 and a half years, when in fact her age was 17 years. He further asserts that she would have been allowed to enter into marriage, and that her age should not be considered as an aggravating factor.[578] He also contends that it was not an aggravating circumstance that FWS-50 was especially vulnerable and helpless.[579]

(ii) The Respondent

[577] Ibid.
[578] Vukovi} Appeal Brief, para 186.

404. The Respondent contends that the Trial Chamber "did not err in concluding that the [illegible] was youthful and that this was an aggravating factor", even though her age might not have be[illegible] and a half years.[580] Further, she argues that the vulnerability and defencelessness of the victim are not elements of the crimes,[581] and that there is no error on the part of the Trial Chamber in considering these factors in aggravation.[582]

(b) Discussion

405. As to the question of the age of the victim as an aggravating factor, the Appeals Chamber refers to its reasoning in paragraphs 354-355, above. The Appeals Chamber considers that the slight difference between the age of the victim as found in one part of the Trial Judgement, about 16 years,[583] and that referred to in another part, 15 and a half years,[584] does not negate the fact that the victim was at a young age when the offences in question were committed against her. The Appeals Chamber concurs with the findings of the Trial Chamber that this fact can aggravate the sentence against the Appellant. As to the argument relating to the factor of vulnerability and helplessness, the Appeals Chamber refers to its reasoning in paragraph 352, above. This ground of appeal thus fails.

4. Mitigating Factors

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Vukovi})

406. The Appellant argues that he helped "numerous of [sic] Muslim families", and that this should be considered as a mitigating factor, not, as the Trial Chamber found, as proof that he had knowledge about the attack upon the Muslim population.[585] In addition, the Appellant argues that the lack of serious consequences arising from his acts and the fact that no force or compulsion was used should be a mitigating factor.[586] Further, he submits that the fact that he is married and has two children should be considered in mitigation.[587]

(ii) The Respondent

407. The Respondent submits that the Trial Chamber did not err in not considering as a mitigating factor that the Appellant provided some help to Muslims, as it was concerned with "what sentence to impose for the rape of this victim, not his acts to persons who he was friendly with previously".[588] However, the Respondent agrees that the Trial Chamber erred in not considering the Appellant's family situation as a mitigating factor, although this factor would not affect the sentence.[589]

(b) Discussion

408. The Appeals Chamber holds that the Appellant's help to other Muslims in the conflict does not change the fact that he committed serious crimes against FWS-50. If he is to be punished for his acts against FWS-50, it is to these acts that any possible mitigating factors should be linked. However, the Appeals Chamber also agrees that the Appellant's family situation should have been considered as a mitigating factor. This particular part of the ground of appeal, therefore, succeeds. However, the Appeals Chamber concurs with the length of the imprisonment decided by the Trial Chamber.

409. As to the Appellant's argument that the lack of consequences arising from his acts should be considered as a mitigating factor, the Appeals Chamber recalls the finding in the Trial Judgement that the rape of FWS-50 "led to serious mental and physical pain for the victim".[590] The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber's findings that the Appellant's acts had serious consequences. In respect of the rape of the same witness, the Trial Judgement states that "[s]he was taken out of Partizan Sports Hall to an apartment and taken to a room by Vukovi} where he forced her to have sexual intercourse with full knowledge that she did not consent".[591] This finding shows that force or compulsion was used prior to rape. In this context, the Appeals Chamber further refers back to its finding that the coercive circumstances of this case made consent to the sexual act by the Appellants impossible.[592] This argument is, therefore, without merit and is rejected.

5. Credit for Time Served

(a) Submissions of the Parties

(i) The Appellant (Vukovi})

410. The Appellant submits that the Trial Judgement is not clear in this respect and that it would be erroneous not to take his period of detention since 23 December 1999 into account when imposing the sentence.[593]

(ii) The Respondent

411. The Respondent notes that, although the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement contains no order with regard to credit for time served, the Trial Chamber did state orally on 22 February 2001 that the time spent in custody by each of the three convicted persons be credited.[594]

(b) Discussion

412. The Appeals Chamber refers to its reasoning in paragraph 365, above. This ground of appeal is dismissed, provided that the last paragraph of the Trial Judgement be read together with the oral statement of the Trial Chamber of 22 February 2001. In effect, the Appellant will receive credit for his time served in detention as calculated from the moment of his being taken into custody of the Tribunal.

6. Conclusion

413. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the appeal of the Appellant Vukovi}, except the submission that his family concerns should be considered as a mitigating factor. However, in the circumstances of this case, which involves a serious offence, this factor does not change the scale of the sentence imposed in the Trial Judgement.

D. Conclusion

414. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the appeals of the Appellants Kunarac, Kova~ and Vukovi}. For the reasons previously stated, the Appeals Chamber confirms the sentences imposed on the Appellants by the Trial Chamber with appropriate credit for time served.

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1 The International Tribunal

1. This Judgement is rendered by Trial Chamber I of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (the "Tribunal") composed of Judge Laïty Kama, presiding, Judge Lennart Aspegren, and Judge Navanethem Pillay, in the case of The Prosecutor v. Georges Anderson Nderubumwe Rutaganda.

2. The Tribunal was established by the United Nations Security Council, pursuant to resolution 955 of 8 November 1994, after it had considered United Nations Reports[1] which indicated that genocide and systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in Rwanda. The Security Council determined that this situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, and was convinced that the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in Rwanda. The Security Council established the Tribunal, under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

3. The Tribunal is governed by its Statute (the "Statute") annexed to Security Council

[1] Preliminary Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council resolution 935 (1994), Final Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council resolution 935 (1994) (Document S/1994/1405) and Reports of the Special Rapporteur for Rwanda of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (Document S/1994/1157, annexes I and II).

Resolution 955, and by its Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the "Rules"), which were adopted by the Judges, on 5 July 1995 and subsequently amended.[2]

[2] The Rules were successively amended on 12 January 1996, 15 May 1996, 4 July 1996, 5 June 1997, 8 June 1998, and 4 June 1999.

1.2 The Indictment

4. The Indictment (the "Indictment") against Georges Anderson Nderubumwe Rutaganda (the "Accused") was submitted by the Prosecutor on 13 February 1996 and was confirmed on 16 February 1996. The Indictment is set out here in full:

> "The Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, pursuant to his authority under Article 17 of the Statute of the Tribunal charges:

General Allegations

3. Unless otherwise specified, all acts set forth in this indictment took place between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 in the prefectures of Kigali and Gitarama, territory of Rwanda.

4. In each paragraph charging genocide, a crime recognized by Article 2 of the Statute of the Tribunal, the alleged acts were committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical or racial group.

5. The victims in each paragraph charging genocide were members of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group.

6. In each paragraph charging crimes against humanity, crimes punishable by Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal, the alleged acts were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on political, ethnic or racial grounds.

7. At all times relevant to this indictment, a state of internal armed conflict existed in Rwanda.

8. The victims referred to in this indictment were, at all relevant times, persons taking no active part in the hostilities.

9. The accused is individually responsible for the crimes alleged in this indictment. Under Article 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal, individual criminal responsibility is attributable to one who plans, instigates, orders, commits or otherwise aids and abets in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal.

Charges

10. On or about April 6, 1994, Georges RUTAGANDA distributed guns and other weapons to Interahamwe members in Nyarugenge commune, Kigali.

11. On or about April 10, 1994, Georges RUTAGANDA stationed Interahamwe members at a roadblock near his office at the "Amgar" garage in Kigali. Shortly after he left the area, the Interahamwe members started checking identity cards of people passing the roadblock. The Interahamwe members ordered persons with Tutsi identity cards to stand on one side of the road. Eight of the Tutsis were then killed. The victims included men, women and an infant who had been carried on the back of one of the women.

12. In April 1994, on a date unknown, Tutsis who had been separated at a roadblock in front of the Amgar garage were taken to Georges RUTAGANDA and questioned by him. He thereafter directed that these Tutsis be detained with others at a nearby building. Later, Georges RUTAGANDA directed men under his control to take 10 Tutsi detainees to a deep, open hole near the Amgar garage. On Georges RUTAGANDA's orders, his men killed the 10 Tutsis with machetes and threw their bodies into the hole.

13. From April 7 to April 11, 1994, thousands of unarmed Tutsi men, women and children and some unarmed Hutus sought refuge at the Ecole Technique Officielle ("ETO school") in Kicukiro sector, Kicukiro commune. The ETO school was considered a safe haven because Belgian soldiers, part of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda forces, were stationed there.

14. On or about April 11, 1994, immediately after the Belgians withdrew from the ETO school, members of the Rwandan armed forces, the gendarmerie and militia, including the Interahamwe, attacked the ETO school and, using machetes, grenades and guns, killed the people who had sought refuge there. The Interahamwe separated Hutus from Tutsis during the attack, killing the Tutsis. Georges RUTAGANDA participated in the attack at the ETO school, which resulted in the deaths of a large number of Tutsis.

15. The men, women and children who survived the ETO school attack were forcibly transferred by Georges RUTAGANDA, members of the Interahamwe and soldiers to a gravel pit near the primary school of Nyanza. Presidential Guard members awaited their arrival. More Interahamwe members converged upon Nyanza from many directions and surrounded the group of survivors.

16. On or about April 12, 1994, the survivors who were able to show that they were Hutu were permitted to leave the gravel pit. Tutsis who presented altered identity cards were immediately killed. Most of the remainder of the group were attacked and killed by grenades or shot to death. Those who tried to escape were attacked with machetes. Georges RUTAGANDA, among others, directed and participated in these attacks.

17. In April of 1994, on dates unknown, in Masango commune, Georges RUTAGANDA and others known to the Prosecutor conducted house-to-house searches for Tutsis and their families. Throughout these searches, Tutsis were separated from Hutus and taken to a river. Georges RUTAGANDA instructed the Interahamwe to track all the Tutsis and throw them into the river.

18. On or about April 28, 1994, Georges RUTAGANDA, together with Interahamwe members, collected residents from Kigali and detained them near the Amgar garage. Georges RUTAGANDA and the Interahamwe demanded identity cards from the detainees. A number of persons, including Emmanuel Kayitare, were forcibly separated from the group. Later that day, Emmanuel Kayitare attempted to flee from where he was being detained and Georges RUTAGANDA pursued him, caught him and struck him on the head with a machete and killed him.

19. In June 1994, on a date unknown, Georges RUTAGANDA ordered people to bury the bodies of victims in order to conceal his crimes from the international community.

1.3 Procedural Background

5. On 13 February 1996 the Prosecutor submitted an Indictment against Georges Rutaganda for confirmation, pursuant to Article 17 of the Statute of the Tribunal.

6. On 16 February 1996, Judge William H. Sekule, after having reviewed the Indictment and accompanying supporting material, confirmed the Indictment against the Accused, pursuant to Articles 18 of the Statute and Rule 47 of the Rules. On the same day the learned Judge issued a Warrant of Arrest for the Accused, which requested the Republic of Zambia to transfer the Accused to the custody of the Tribunal. The Accused was subsequently transferred to the Tribunal detention facility in Arusha, Tanzania, on 26 May 1996.

7. The Accused made his initial appearance before the Tribunal on 30 May 1996, pursuant to Rule 62 of the Rules, and he was formally charged. At this hearing the Accused was represented by Counsel, and he pleaded not guilty to all the counts in the Indictment.

8. On 8 September 1996, the Defence filed an extremely urgent motion requesting the postponement of all criminal proceedings against the Accused and the provisional release of the Accused, due to his state of health. The Chamber subsequently held that the Defence had not satisfied the provisions of Rule 65 of the Rules and denied this motion. Due to the ill health of the Accused, the Chamber adjourned the commencement of trial to 6 March 1997.[3]

9. On 6 December 1996, the Defence filed another motion requesting the provisional release of the Accused, on the grounds of the Accused's state of ill health and his need for medical treatment. The Chamber denied this motion and held that the Tribunal was able to provide adequate medical care to the Accused, and that there had been neither serious regression in his medical condition nor had other exceptional circumstances arisen which justified his provisional release.

10. The Accused requested the assignment of Counsel to represent him. The Registrar, after having established that the Accused was indigent, assigned Counsels Luc De Temmerman and Tiphaine Dickson to represent him. However, on 25 August 1997, the Accused requested the withdrawal of Mr. Luc De Temmerman, stating that he had lost confidence in the said Counsel because he had failed to provide sufficient legal and strategic support to his defence. Mr. De Temmerman subsequently withdrew and the Accused was represented by Ms Tiphaine Dickson throughout the trial. The Prosecutor was represented during the trial by Mr. James Stewart, Mr. Udo Herbert Gehring and Ms Holo Makwaia.

11. On 6 March 1997, the Chamber adjourned the trial for two weeks, following a request to this effect from the Prosecutor. The trial commenced on 18 March 1997. Twenty seven prosecution witnesses, including five experts, testified before the Prosecutor closed her case on 29 May 1998. The Defence case commenced on 8 February 1999. Fourteen witnesses, including three experts, testified on behalf of the Defence. The Defence closed its case on 23 April 1999. The Parties presented their closing submissions on 16 and 17 June 1999.

12. During the course of the pre-trial and trial stages of the criminal proceeding, the Parties filed many motions on various procedural and substantive issues, including motions for disclosure of witness statements, a motion requesting that the deposition of sixteen witnesses be given by means of a video conference, pursuant to Rule 71 of the Rules, and a motion pertaining to the false testimony of a witness.

13. Both Parties filed motions, requesting protective measures for their witnesses, pursuant to Article 19 and 21 of the Statute and Rule 69 an 75 of the Rules. The Chamber granted these motions and ordered inter alia that the names, addresses and other identifying information of the witnesses shall not be disclosed to the media and public, the witnesses will be assigned pseudonyms and they will be referred to by these pseudonyms in all criminal proceedings before the Chamber and in discussions with the Parties. Therefore, most of the witnesses referred to in this Judgement are referred to by their assigned pseudonyms.

14. In her closing arguments, the Prosecutor requested an amendment of the time periods alleged in paragraphs 10, 16 and 19 of the Indictment. The Chamber finds the Prosecutor's request inadmissable.

1.4 Evidentiary Matters

15. The Chamber finds that it is necessary to address certain issues relevant to the assessment of the evidence presented at trial.

16. The Chamber notes that Rule 89(A) of the Rules provides that it is not bound by the rules of procedure and evidence of any particular national jurisdiction and concurs with the finding in the Judgement in The Prosecutor v. Jean-Paul Akayesu (the "Akayesu Judgement") which held:

> "[...] the Chamber [...] is not restricted under the Statute of the Tribunal to apply any particular legal system and is not bound by any national rules of evidence"[4].

17. In all pre-trial and trial proceedings and in the admission and evaluation of all evidence and exhibits presented at the trial, the Chamber has applied the Rules in a manner best favoured to a fair determination of the matter before it, and which is consonant with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law.

[4] The Prosecutor v. Jean-Paul Akayesu (Case No. ICTR-96-4-T), Judgement of 2 September 1998, para. 131.

18. The Chamber notes that, pursuant to Rule 96(i) of the Rules, no corroboration of the victim's testimony is required in the case of rape and sexual violence. The Chamber concurs with both the Akayesu Judgement [5] and the judgement of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in The Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic, (the "Tadic Judgement")[6], judgements which held that the fact that Rules stipulate that corroboration of the victims testimony is not required for crimes of sexual assault, does not justify the inference that corroboration of witnesses' testimony is, in fact, required, for other crimes. The Chamber's approach is that it will rely on the evidence of a single witness, provided such evidence is relevant, admissible and credible. Pursuant to Rule 89 of the Rules, the Chamber may assess all relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value. The Rules do not exclude hearsay evidence, and the Chamber has the discretion to consider such evidence. Where the Chamber decides to consider such evidence, it is inclined to do so with caution.

19. The Chamber notes that during the trial, the Prosecutor and the Defence relied on pre-trial statements from witnesses for the purposes of direct and cross-examination. In many instances, inconsistencies and contradictions between the pre-trial statements of witnesses and their testimonies at trial were pointed out by the Defence. The Chamber concurs with the reasoning in the Akayesu Judgement, which held:

[6] The Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic (Case No. IT-94-1-T) Judgement of 7 May 1997, para. 535 to 539.

"[...] these pre-trial statements were composed following interviews with witnesses by investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor. These interviews were mostly conducted in Kinyarwanda, and the Chamber did not have access to transcripts of the interviews, but only translations thereof. It was therefore unable to consider the nature and form of the questions put to the witnesses, or the accuracy of interpretation at the time. The Chamber has considered inconsistencies and contradictions between these statements and testimony at trial with caution for these reasons, and in the light of the time lapse between the statements and the presentation of evidence at trial, the difficulties of recollecting precise details several years after the occurrence of the events, the difficulties of translation, and the fact that several witnesses were illiterate and stated that they had not read their written statements. Moreover, the statements were not made under solemn declaration and were not taken by judicial officers. In the circumstances, the probative value attached to the statements is, in the Chamber's view, considerably less than direct sworn testimony before the Chamber, the truth of which has been subjected to the test of cross-examination."[7]

20. During the trial proceedings, the Defence filed motions requesting investigations of alleged false testimony against two of the Prosecutor's witnesses. These motions were dismissed by the Chamber and this decision was appealed by the Defence. The Appeals Chamber dismissed these appeals. This Chamber reaffirms its position that false testimony is a deliberate offence which requires wilful intent on the part of the perpetrator to mislead the Judge and thus to cause harm[8]. The onus is on the party pleading a case of false testimony to prove the falsehood of the witness' statements and to establish that they were made with harmful intent, or, at least, that they were made by a witness who was fully aware that they were false. To only raise doubt as to the credibility of the statements made by the witness is not sufficient to reasonably demonstrate that the witness may have knowingly and wilfully given false testimony. In the Chamber's view, false testimony cannot be based solely on inaccurate statements made by the witness, but rather requires wilful intent to give false testimony. The Appeals Chamber pointed out that there is a clear distinction between the credibility of witness testimony and false testimony of a witness. The testimony of a witness may lack credibility, but this does not necessarily mean that it amounts to false testimony falling within the ambit of Rule 91[9].

[8] The Prosecutor v. Georges Anderson Nderubumwe Rutaganda, (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T) Decision on the Defence Motion to Direct the Prosecutor to Investigate the Matter of False Testimony by Witness E.

[9] The Prosecutor v. Georges Anderson Nderubumwe Rutaganda, (Case No. ICTR-96-3-T) Decision on Appeals against the Decisions by Trial Chamber I Rejecting the Defence Motions to Direct the Prosecutor to Investigate the Matter of False Testimony by witnesses "E" and "CC", 8 June 1998, para. 28.

21. The Chamber notes the Defence submission that some of the Prosecution witnesses are unreliable because they testified to events that they previously heard other people talk about, and that therefore the Prosecution's case is marred by "contamination". The Defence also submitted that some of the evidence was obtained by illegal means, which rendered it inadmissible[10]. The Chamber finds that this is neither a matter of "contamination", nor of "illegal means of collecting information", but of hearsay.

22. Many of the witnesses who testified before the Chamber in this case have seen atrocities committed against members of their families and close friends and/or have themselves been the victims of such atrocities. Some of these witnesses became very emotional and cried in the witness box, when they were questioned about certain events. A few witnesses displayed physical signs of fear and pain when they were asked about certain atrocities of which they were victims. The Chamber has taken into consideration these factors in assessing the evidence of such witnesses.

23. The Chamber has also taken into consideration various social and cultural factors in assessing the testimony of some of the witnesses. Some of these witnesses were farmers and people who did not have a high standard of education, and they had difficulty in identifying and testifying to some of the exhibits, such as photographs of various locations, maps etc. These witnesses also experienced difficulty in testifying as to dates, times, distances, colours and motor vehicles. In this regard, the Chamber also notes that many of the witnesses testified in Kinyarwanda and as such their testimonies were simultaneously translated into French and English. As a result, the essence of the witnesses' testimonies was at times lost. Counsel questioned witnesses in either English or French, and these questions were simultaneously translated to the witnesses in Kinyarwanda. In some instances it was evident, after translation, that the witnesses had not understood the questions.

1.5 The Accused

24. On 8 April 1999, the Accused testified that he was born on 28 November 1958 in Ngoma, in Gishyita Commune, Kibuye Préfecture in Rwanda. He grew up in Gitarama and Kibuye Préfecture, before studying and working in Butare and Kigali Préfectures.

25. The Accused testified that his father, Esdras Mpamo, held many civil, public and political offices and government appointments, such as the Prefect of Kibuye, Cyangugu, and Butare Préfectures, the Rwandese Ambassador to Uganda and Germany and the Bourgmestre of Masango Commune, in the Gitarama Préfecture. The Accused testified that although he traveled a lot he considered his origin to be Masango Commune in the Gitarama Préfecture because his father was the Bourgmestre in this Commune, and he returned there throughout his youth. The Accused also testified that his father was a devout Seventh Day Adventist, and that his father's religious and political beliefs significantly influenced his upbringing and subsequent political decisions.

26. The Accused testified that he is married and he is a father of three children. He stated that he received a degree in agricultural engineering in 1985, from National University of Rwanda and thereafter he was appointed agricultural engineer. He stated that as an agricultural engineer, he conducted agricultural research and he managed a farm which served as a model farm to the farmers of Huye Commune. According to the Accused, he was allowed to purchase this farm by virtue of a Presidential decree.

27. The Accused testified that he applied to the Agricultural Ministry to be transferred from Butare in 1991, because of threats he had received from certain people in the Huye Commune, following his purchase of the farm that he managed. He stated that he was subsequently transferred to a post with the Rwandese Ministry of Agriculture in Kigali, although his family remained in Butare.

28. The Accused testified that, in June 1991, he commenced work as a business man in Kigali, dealing with import, under the name of Rutuganda SARL. He stated that Rutaganda SARL was a highly profitable enterprise, and maintained exclusive imports and distribution agreements with a number of European food and beverage producers, as well as exclusive supply agreements with smaller bars, distributors, and organizations in Rwanda.

29. The Accused testified that he joined the MRND on or about September or October 1991. He stated that various political parties offered him membership, but he joined the MRND because he believed that this political party was in a position to provide the best economic and military protection, both of which were significant concerns for him as a business proprietor in Rwanda.

30. The Accused testified that, after he joined the MRND party in 1991, he became the second vice president of its youth wing, the Interahamwe za MRND. He stated that he was involved in the creation of the Interahamwe za MRND and met regularly with its other leaders.

2. THE APPLICABLE LAW

2.1 Individual Criminal Responsibility

31. The Accused is charged under Article 6(1) of the Statute with individual criminal responsibility for the crimes alleged in the Indictment. Article 6(1) provides that:

> "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime".

32. In the Akayesu Judgement findings were made on the principle of individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute. The Chamber notes that these findings are, in the main, the same as those made in the Tadic Judgement and in the judgements in The Prosecutor v. Clément Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana (the "Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement")[11] and The Prosecutor versus Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic, Esad Landzo: 'The Celebici Case', (the "Celebici Judgement")[12]. The Chamber is of the view that the position as derived from the afore-mentioned case law, with respect to the principle of individual criminal responsibility, and as articulated, notably, in the Akayesu Judgement is sufficiently established and is applicable in the instant case.

33. The Chamber notes, that under Article 6 (1), an accused person may incur individual criminal responsibility as a result of five forms of participation in the commission of one of the three crimes referred to in the Statute. Article 6 (1) covers various stages in the commission of a crime, ranging from its initial planning to its execution.

34. The Chamber observes that the principle of individual criminal responsibility under Article 6 (1) implies that the planning or preparation of a crime actually leads to its commission. However, the Chamber notes that Article 2 (3) of the Statute, on the crime of genocide, provides for prosecution for attempted genocide, among other acts. However, attempt is by definition an inchoate crime, inherent in the criminal conduct per se irrespective of its result. Consequently, the Chamber holds that an accused may incur individual criminal responsibility for inchoate offences under Article 2 (3) of the Statute and that, conversely, a person engaging in any form of participation in other crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, such as those covered in Articles 3 and 4 of the Statute, could incur criminal responsibility only if the offence were consummated.

35. The Chamber finds that in addition to incurring responsibility as a principal offender, the Accused may also be held criminally liable for criminal acts committed by others if, for example, he planned such acts, instigated another to commit them, ordered that they be committed or aided and abetted another in the commission of such acts.

36. The Chamber defines the five forms of criminal participation under Article 6(1) as follows:

37. Firstly, in the view of the Chamber, "planning" of a crime implies that one or more persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both its preparatory and execution phases.

38. In the opinion of the Chamber, the second form of participation, that is, incitement to commit an offence, under Article 6(1), involves instigating another, directly and publicly, to commit an offence. Instigation is punishable only where it leads to the actual commission of an offence desired by the instigator, except with genocide, where an accused may be held individually criminally liable for incitement to commit genocide under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute, even where such incitement fails to produce a result.[13]

39. In the opinion of the Chamber, ordering, which is a third form of participation, implies a superior-subordinate relationship between the person giving the order and the one executing it, with the person in a position of authority using such position to persuade another to commit an offence.

40. Fourthly, an accused incurs criminal responsibility for the commission of a crime, under Article 6(1), where he actually "commits" one of the crimes within the jurisdiction rationae materiae of the Tribunal.

41. The Chamber holds that an accused may participate in the commission of a crime either through direct commission of an unlawful act or by omission, where he has a duty to act.

42. A fifth and last form of participation where individual criminal responsibility arises under Article 6(1), is "[...] otherwise aid[ing] and abett[ing] in the planning or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4".

43. The Chamber finds that aiding and abetting alone is sufficient to render the accused criminally liable. In both instances, it is not necessary that the person aiding and abetting another to commit an offence be present during the commission of the crime. The relevant act of assistance may be geographically and temporally unconnected to the actual commission of the offence. The Chamber holds that aiding and abetting include all acts of assistance in either physical form or in the form of moral support; nevertheless, it emphasizes that any act of participation must substantially contribute to the commission of the crime. The aider and abettor assists or facilitates another in the accomplishment of a substantive offence.

2.2 Genocide (Article 2 of the Statute)

1. In accordance with the provisions of Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute, which stipulate that the Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons responsible for genocide, the Prosecutor has charged the Accused with genocide, Count 1 of the Indictment.

44. The definition of genocide, as given in Article 2 of the Tribunal's Statute, is taken verbatim from Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (the "Genocide Convention")[14]. It reads as follows:

> "Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:
> (a) Killing members of the group;
>
> (b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
>
> (c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
>
> (d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

[14] The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 9 December 1948.

45. The Genocide Convention is undeniably considered part of customary international law, as reflected in the advisory opinion issued in 1951 by the International Court of Justice on reservations to the Genocide Convention, and as noted by the United Nations Secretary-General in his Report on the establishment of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia[15].

46. The Chamber notes that Rwanda acceded, by legislative decree, to the Convention on Genocide on 12 February 1975[16]. Therefore the crime of genocide was punishable in Rwanda in 1994.

47. The Chamber adheres to the definition of the crime of genocide as it was defined in the Akayesu Judgement.

48. The Chamber accepts that the crime of genocide involves, firstly, that one of the acts listed under Article 2(2) of the Statute be committed; secondly, that such an act be committed against a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, specifically targeted as such; and, thirdly, that the "act be committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the targeted group".

[16] Legislative Decree of 12 February 1975, Official Gazette of the Republic of Rwanda, 1975, p.230. Rwanda acceded to the Genocide Convention but stated that it shall not be bound by Article 9 of this Convention.

The Acts Enumerated under Article 2(2)(a) to (e) of the Statute

49. Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute, like the corresponding provisions of the Genocide Convention, refers to "meurtre" in the French version and to "killing" in the English version. In the opinion of the Chamber, the term "killing" includes both intentional and unintentional homicides, whereas the word "meurtre" covers homicide committed with the intent to cause death. Given the presumption of innocence, and pursuant to the general principles of criminal law, the Chamber holds that the version more favourable to the Accused should be adopted, and finds that Article 2(2)(a) of the Statute must be interpreted in accordance with the definition of murder in the Criminal Code of Rwanda, which provides, under Article 311, that "Homicide committed with intent to cause death shall be treated as murder".

50. For the purposes of interpreting Article 2(2)(b) of the Statute, the Chamber understands the words "serious bodily or mental harm" to include acts of bodily or mental torture, inhumane or degrading treatment, rape, sexual violence, and persecution. The Chamber is of the opinion that "serious harm" need not entail permanent or irremediable harm.

51. In the opinion of the Chamber, the words "deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part", as indicated in Article 2(2)(c) of the Statute, are to be construed "as methods of destruction by which the perpetrator does not necessarily intend to immediately kill the members of the group", but which are, ultimately, aimed at their physical destruction. The Chamber holds that the means of deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction, in whole or in part, include subjecting a group of people to a subsistence diet, systematic expulsion from their homes and deprivation of essential medical supplies below a minimum vital standard.

52. For the purposes of interpreting Article 2(2)(d) of the Statute, the Chamber holds that the words "measures intended to prevent births within the group" should be construed as including sexual mutilation, enforced sterilization, forced birth control, forced separation of males and females, and prohibition of marriages. The Chamber notes that measures intended to prevent births within the group may be not only physical, but also mental.

53. The Chamber is of the opinion that the provisions of Article 2(2)(e) of the Statute, on the forcible transfer of children from one group to another, are aimed at sanctioning not only any direct act of forcible physical transfer, but also any acts of threats or trauma which would lead to the forcible transfer of children from one group to another group.

Potential Groups of Victims of the Crime of Genocide

54. The Chamber is of the view that it is necessary to consider the issue of the potential groups of victims of genocide in light of the provisions of the Statute and the Genocide Convention, which stipulate that genocide aims at "destroy[ing], in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such."

55. The Chamber notes that the concepts of national, ethnical, racial and religious groups have been researched extensively and that, at present, there are no generally and internationally accepted precise definitions thereof. Each of these concepts must be assessed in the light of a particular political, social and cultural context. Moreover, the Chamber notes that for the purposes of applying the Genocide Convention, membership of a group is, in essence, a subjective rather than an objective concept. The victim is perceived by the perpetrator of genocide as belonging to a group slated for destruction. In some instances, the victim may perceive himself/herself as belonging to the said group.

56. Nevertheless, the Chamber is of the view that a subjective definition alone is not enough to determine victim groups, as provided for in the Genocide Convention. It appears, from a reading of the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention[17], that certain groups, such as political and economic groups, have been excluded from the protected groups, because they are considered to be "mobile groups" which one joins through individual, political commitment. That would seem to suggest a contrario that the Convention was presumably intended to cover relatively stable and permanent groups.

57. Therefore, the Chamber holds that in assessing whether a particular group may be considered as protected from the crime of genocide, it will proceed on a case-by-case basis, taking into account both the relevant evidence proffered and the political and cultural context as indicated supra.

The Special Intent of the Crime of Genocide.

58. Genocide is distinct from other crimes because it requires dolus specialis, a special intent. Special intent of a crime is the specific intention which, as an element of the crime, requires that the perpetrator clearly intended the result charged. The dolus specialis of the crime of genocide lies in "the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such". A person may be convicted of genocide only where it is established that he committed one of the acts referred to under Article 2(2) of the Statute with the specific intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a particular group.

59. In concrete terms, for any of the acts charged to constitute genocide, the said acts must have been committed against one or more persons because such person or persons were members of a specific group, and specifically, because of their membership in this group. Thus, the victim is singled out not by reason of his individual identity, but rather on account of his being a member of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group. The victim of the act is, therefore, a member of a given group selected as such, which, ultimately, means the victim of the crime of genocide is the group itself and not the individual alone. The perpetration of the act charged, therefore, extends beyond its actual commission, for example, the murder of a particular person, to encompass the realization of the ulterior purpose to destroy, in whole or in part, the group of which the person is only a member.

60. The dolus specialis is a key element of an intentional offence, which offence is characterized by a psychological nexus between the physical result and the mental state of the perpetrator. With regard to the issue of determining the offender's specific intent, the Chamber applies the following reasoning, as held in the Akayesu Judgement:

> " [...] intent is a mental factor which is difficult, even impossible, to determine. This is the reason why, in the absence of a confession from the accused, his intent can be inferred from a certain number of presumptions of fact. The Chamber is of the view that the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged can be inferred from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership of a particular group, while excluding the members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act."[18]

61. Similarly, in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, Trial Chamber II held that :

> "[...] The Chamber finds that the intent can be inferred either from words or deeds and may be determined by a pattern of purposeful action. In particular, the Chamber considers evidence such as [...] the methodical way of planning, the systematic manner of killing. [...]"[19]

[19] Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 93.

62. Therefore, the Chamber is of the view that, in practice, intent can be, on a case-by-case basis, inferred from the material evidence submitted to the Chamber, including the evidence which demonstrates a consistent pattern of conduct by the Accused .

2.3 Crimes against Humanity (Article 3 of the Statute)

63. The Chamber notes that the Akayesu Judgement traced the historical development and evolution of crimes against humanity, as far back as the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg. The Akayesu Judgement also considered the gradual evolution of crimes against humanity in the cases of Eichmann, Barbie, Touvier and Papon[20]. The Chamber concurs with the historical development of crimes against humanity, as set forth in the Akayesu Judgement.

64. The Chamber notes that Article 7 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court defines a crime against humanity as any of the enumerated acts committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack. These enumerated acts are murder; extermination; enslavement; deportation or forcible transfer of population; imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law; torture; rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity; persecution against any identifiable group or collectivity on political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender or other grounds that are universally recognised as impermissible under international law, in connection with any act referred to in this paragraph or any other crime within the jurisdiction of the court; enforced disappearance of persons; the crime of apartheid; other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering or serious injury to body or mental or physical health.[21]

Crimes against Humanity pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal

65. Article 3 of the Statute confers on the Tribunal the jurisdiction to prosecute persons for various inhumane acts which constitute crimes against humanity. The Chamber concurs with the reasoning in the Akayesu Judgement that offences falling within the ambit of crimes against humanity may be broadly broken down into four essential elements, namely:

(a) the actus reus must be inhumane in nature and character, causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health

(b) the actus reus must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack

(c) the actus reus must be committed against members of the civilian population

4584

(d) the actus reus must be committed on one or more discriminatory grounds, namely, national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds.[22]

The Actus Reus Must be Committed as Part of a Widespread or Systematic Attack

66. The Chamber is of the opinion that the actus reus cannot be a random inhumane act, but rather an act committed as part of an attack. With regard to the nature of this attack, the Chamber notes that Article 3 of the English version of the Statute reads "[...] as part of a widespread or systematic attack. [...]" whilst the French version of the Statute reads "[...] dans le cadre d'une attaque généralisée et systématique [...]". The French version requires that the attack be both of a widespread and systematic nature, whilst the English version requires that the attack be of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both.

67. The Chamber notes that customary international law requires that the attack be either of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both. The English version of the Statute conforms more closely with customary international law and the Chamber therefore accepts the elements as set forth in Article 3 of the English version of the Statute and follows the interpretation in other ICTR judgements namely: that the "attack" under Article 3 of the Statute, must be either of a widespread or systematic nature and need not be both.[23]

68. The Chamber notes that "widespread", as an element of crimes against humanity, was defined in the Akayesu Judgement, as massive, frequent, large scale action, carried out collectively with considerable seriousness and directed against a multiplicity of victims, whilst "systematic" was defined as thoroughly organised action, following a regular pattern on the basis of a common policy and involving substantial public or private resources[24]. The Chamber concurs with these definitions and finds that it is not essential for this policy to be adopted formally as a policy of a State. There must, however, be some kind of preconceived plan or policy.[25]

69. The Chamber notes that "attack", as an element of crimes against humanity, was defined in the Akayesu Judgement, as an unlawful act of the kind enumerated in Article 3(a) to (i) of the Statute, such as murder, extermination, enslavement etc. An attack may also be non-violent in nature, like imposing a system of apartheid, which is declared a crime against humanity in Article 1 of the Apartheid Convention of 1973, or exerting pressure on the population to act in a particular manner may also come under the purview of an attack, if orchestrated on a massive scale or in a systematic manner[26]. The Chamber concurs with this definition.

70. The Chamber considers that the perpetrator must have:

> "[...]actual or constructive knowledge of the broader context of the attack, meaning that the accused must know that his act(s) is part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and pursuant to some kind of policy or plan."[27]

The Actus Reus Must be Directed against the Civilian Population

71. The Chamber notes that the actus reus must be directed against the civilian population, if it is to constitute a crime against humanity. In the Akayesu Judgement, the civilian population was defined as people who were not taking any active part in the hostilities[28]. The fact that there are certain individuals among the civilian population who are not civilians does not deprive the population of its civilian character[29]. The Chamber concurs with this definition.

The Actus Reus Must be Committed on Discriminatory Grounds

72. The Statute stipulates that inhumane acts committed against the civilian population must be committed on "national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds." Discrimination on the basis of a person's political ideology satisfies the requirement of 'political' grounds as envisaged in Article 3 of the Statute.

73. Inhumane acts committed against persons not falling within any one of the discriminatory categories may constitute crimes against humanity if the perpetrator's intention in committing these acts, is to further his attack on the group discriminated against on one of the grounds specified in Article 3 of the Statute. The perpetrator must have the requisite intent for the commission of crimes against humanity.[30]

[29] Ibid para. 582, Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflict; Article 50.

74. The Chamber notes that the Appeals Chamber in the Tadic Appeal ruled that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that all crimes against humanity require a discriminatory intent. The Appeals Chamber stated that a discriminatory intent is an indispensable element of the offence only with regard to those crimes for which this is expressly required, that is the offence of persecution, pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (the "ICTY").[31]

75. The Chamber considers the provisions of Article 5 of the ICTY Statute, as compared to the provisions of Article 3 of the ICTR, Statute and notes that, although the provisions of both the aforementioned Articles pertain to crimes against humanity, except for persecution, there is a material and substantial difference in the elements of the offence that constitute crimes against humanity. This stems from the fact that Article 3 of the ICTR Statute expressly provides the enumerated discriminatory grounds of "national, political, ethnic, racial or religious", in respect of the offences of Murder; Extermination; Deportation; Imprisonment; Torture; Rape; and; Other Inhumane Acts, whilst the ICTY Statute does not stipulate any discriminatory grounds in respect of these offences..

The Enumerated Acts

[31] The Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic; Appeals Judgment of 15 July 1999; para. 305; p. 55.

76. Article 3 of the Statute sets out various acts that constitute crimes against humanity, namely: murder; extermination; enslavement; deportation; imprisonment; torture; rape; persecution on political, racial and religious grounds; and; other inhumane acts. Although the category of acts that constitute crimes against humanity are set out in Article 3, this category is not exhaustive. Any act which is inhumane in nature and character may constitute a crime against humanity, provided the other elements are satisfied. This is evident in (i) which caters for all other inhumane acts not stipulated in (a) to (h) of Article 3.

77. The Chamber notes that in respect of crimes against humanity, the Accused is indicted for murder and extermination. The Chamber, in interpreting Article 3 of the Statute, will focus its discussion on these offences only.

Murder

78. Pursuant to Article 3(a) of the Statute, murder constitutes a crime against humanity. The Chamber notes that Article 3(a) of the English version of the Statute refers to "Murder", whilst the French version of the Statute refers to "Assassinat". Customary International Law dictates that it is the offence of "Murder" that constitutes a crime against humanity and not "Assassinat".

79. The Akayesu Judgement defined Murder as the unlawful, intentional killing of a human being. The requisite elements of murder are:

(a) The victim is dead;

(b) The death resulted from an unlawful act or omission of the accused or a subordinate;

(c) At the time of the killing the accused or a subordinate had the intention to kill or inflict grievous bodily harm on the deceased having known that such bodily harm is likely to cause the victim's death, and is reckless as to whether or not death ensures;

(4) The victim was discriminated against on any one of the enumerated discriminatory grounds;

(5) The victim was a member of the civilian population; and

(6) The act or omission was part of a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population.[32]

80. The Chamber concurs with this definition of murder and is of the opinion that the act or omission that constitutes murder must be discriminatory in nature and directed against a member of the civilian population.

Extermination

81. Pursuant to Article 3(c) of the Statute, extermination constitutes a crime against humanity. By its very nature, extermination is a crime which is directed against a group of individuals. Extermination differs from murder in that it requires an element of mass destruction which is not a pre-requisite for murder.

[32] Akayesu Judgement, para. 589 and 590.

82. The Akayesu Judgement, defined the essential elements of extermination as follows:

(a) the accused or his subordinate participated in the killing of certain named or described persons;

(b) the act or omission was unlawful and intentional;

(c) the unlawful act or omission must be part of a widespread or systematic attack;

(d) the attack must be against the civilian population; and

(e) the attack must be on discriminatory grounds, namely: national, political, ethnic, racial, or religious grounds.

83. The Chamber concurs with this definition of extermination and is of the opinion that the act or omission that constitutes extermination must be discriminatory in nature and directed against members of the civilian population. Further, this act or omission includes, but is not limited to the direct act of killing. It can be any act or omission, or cumulative acts or omissions, that cause the death of the targeted group of individuals.

2.4 Serious Violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II

Article 4 of the Statute

84. Pursuant to Article 4 of the Statute, the Chamber shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed serious violations of Article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include, but shall not be limited to:

> (a) violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;
> (b) collective punishments;
>
> (c) taking of hostages;
>
> (d) acts of terrorism;
> (e) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment, rape, enforced prostitution and any form of indecent assault;
> (f) pillage;
> (g) the passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgment pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples;

(h) threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

Applicability of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II

85. In applying Article 4 of the Statute, the Chamber must be satisfied that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege is not violated. Indeed, the creation of the Tribunal, in response to the alleged crimes perpetrated in Rwanda in 1994, raised the question all too familiar to the Nuremberg Tribunal and the ICTY, that of jurisdictions applying ex post facto laws in violation of this principle. In establishing the ICTY, the Secretary-General dealt with this issue by asserting that in the application of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege the International Tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law. However, in the case of this Tribunal, it was incumbent on the Chambers to decide whether or not the said principle had been adhered to[33], and whether individuals incurred individual criminal responsibility for violations of these international instruments.

[33] See Akayesu Judgement, para. 603 to 605.

86. In the Akayesu Judgement, the Chamber expressed its opinion that the "norms of Common Article 3 had acquired the status of customary law in that most States, by their domestic penal codes, have criminalized acts which, if committed during internal armed conflict, would constitute violations of Common Article 3". The finding of the Trial Chamber in this regard followed the precedents set by the ICTY[34], which established the customary nature of Common Article 3. Moreover, the Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement held that, although not all of Additional Protocol II could be said to be customary law, the guarantees contained in Article 4(2) (Fundamental Guarantees) thereof, which reaffirm and supplement Common Article 3, form part of existing international law. All of the norms reproduced in Article 4 of the Statute are covered by Article 4(2) of Additional Protocol II.

87. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber in the Akayesu Judgement concluded that violations of these norms would entail, as a matter of customary international law, individual responsibility for the perpetrator. It was also recalled that as Rwanda had become a party to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and their 1977 Additional Protocols, on 5 May 1964 and 19 November 1984, respectively, these instruments were in any case in force in the territory of Rwanda in 1994, and formed part of Rwandan law. Thus, Rwandan nationals who violated these international instruments incorporated into national law, including those offences as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute, could be tried before the Rwandan national courts[35].

88. In the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, Trial Chamber II deemed it unnecessary to delve into the question as to whether the instruments incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute should be considered as customary international law. Rather the Trial Chamber found that the instruments were in force in the territory of Rwanda in 1994 and that persons could be prosecuted for breaches thereof on the basis that Rwanda had become a party to the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols. The offences enumerated in Article 4 of the Statute, said the Trial Chamber, also constituted offences under Rwandan law[36].

[34] See Tadic Judgement and Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction of 2 October 1995.

89. Thus it is clear that, at the time the crimes alleged in the Indictment were perpetrated, persons were bound to respect the guarantees provided for by the 1949 Geneva Conventions and their 1977 Additional Protocols, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute. Violations thereof, as a matter of custom and convention, incurred individual responsibility, and could result in the prosecution of the authors of the offences.

The Nature of the Conflict

90. The 1949 Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol I generally apply to international armed conflicts, whereas Common Article 3 extends a minimum threshold of humanitarian protection to persons affected by non-international armed conflicts. This protection has been enhanced and developed in the 1977 Additional Protocol II. Offences alleged to be covered by Article 4 of the Statute must, as a preliminary matter, have been committed in the context of a conflict of a non-international character satisfying the requirements of Common Article 3, which applies to "armed conflict not of an international character" and Additional Protocol II, applicable to conflicts which "take place in the territory of a High Contracting Party between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations and to implement this Protocol".

[36] See Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 156 and 157.

91. First to be addressed is the question of what constitutes an armed conflict under Common Article 3. This issue was dealt with extensively during the 1949 Diplomatic Conference of Geneva leading to the adoption of the Conventions. Of concern to many participating States was the ambiguous and vague nature of the term "armed conflict". Although the Conference failed to provide a precise minimum threshold as to what constitutes an "armed conflict", it is clear that mere acts of banditry, internal disturbances and tensions, and unorganized and short-lived insurrections are to be ruled out. The International Committee of the Red Cross (the "ICRC"), specifies further that conflicts referred to in Common Article 3 are armed conflicts with armed forces on either side engaged in hostilities: conflicts, in short, which are in many respects similar to an international conflict, but take place within the confines of a single country[37]. The ICTY Appeals Chamber offered guidance on the matter by holding "that an armed conflict exists whenever there is [...] protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State. International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until [...] in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is reached"[38].

92. It can thence be seen that the definition of an armed conflict per se is termed in the abstract, and whether or not a situation can be described as an "armed conflict", meeting the criteria of Common Article 3, is to be decided upon on a case-by-case basis. Hence, in dealing with this issue, the Akayesu Judgement suggested an "evaluation test", whereby it is necessary to evaluate the intensity and the organization of the parties to the conflict to make a finding on the existence of an armed conflict. This approach also finds favour with the Trial Chamber in this instance.

93. In addition to armed conflicts of a non-international character, satisfying the requirements of Common Article 3, under Article 4 of the Statute, the Tribunal has the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of the 1977 Additional Protocol II, a legal instrument whose overall purpose is to afford protection to persons affected by non-international armed conflicts. As aforesaid, this instrument develops and supplements the rules contained in Common Article 3, without modifying its existing conditions of applicability. Additional Protocol II reaffirms Common Article 3, which, although it objectively characterized internal armed conflicts, lacked clarity and enabled the States to have a wide area of discretion in its application. Thus the impetus behind the Conference of Government Experts and the Diplomatic Conference[39] in this regard was to improve the protection afforded to victims in non-international armed conflicts and to develop objective criteria which would not be dependent on the subjective judgements of the parties. The result is, on the one hand, that conflicts covered by Additional Protocol II have a higher intensity threshold than Common Article 3, and on the other, that Additional Protocol II is immediately applicable once the defined material conditions have been fulfilled. If an internal armed conflict meets the material conditions of Additional Protocol II, it then also automatically satisfies the threshold requirements of the broader Common Article 3.

94. Pursuant to Article 1(1) of Additional Protocol II the material requirements to be satisfied for the applicability of Additional Protocol II are as follows:

[39] Conference of Government Experts on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflicts, 24 May to 12 June 1971, and 3 May to 3 June 1972; Diplomatic Conference on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflicts, 20 February to 29 March 1974, 3 February to 18 April 1975, 21 April to 11 June 1976 and 17 March to 10 June 1977.

(i) an armed conflict takes place in the territory of a High Contracting Party, between its armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups;

(ii) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups are under responsible command;

(iii) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups are able to exercise such control over a part of their territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations; and

(iv) the dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups are able to implement Additional Protocol II.

Ratione Personae

The Class of Perpetrator

95. Under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, the perpetrator must belong to a "Party" to the conflict, whereas under Additional Protocol II[40] the perpetrator must be a member of the "armed forces" of either the Government or of the dissidents. There has been much discussion on the exact definition of "armed forces" and "Party", discussion, which in the opinion of the Chamber detracts from the overall protective purpose of these instruments. A too restrictive definition of these terms would likewise dilute the protection afforded by these instruments to the victims and potential victims of armed conflicts. Hence, the category of persons covered by these terms should not be limited to commanders and combatants but should be interpreted in their broadest sense.

[40] See Article 1(1) of Additional Protocol II

96. Moreover, it is well established from the jurisprudence of International Tribunals that civilians can be held as accountable as members of the armed forces or of a Party to the conflict. In this regard, reference should be made to the Akayesu Judgement, where it was held that:

> "It is, in fact, well-established, at least since the Tokyo trials, that civilians may be held responsible for violations of international humanitarian law. Hirota, the former Foreign Minister of Japan, was convicted at Tokyo for crimes committed during the rape of Nanking. Other post-World War II trials unequivocally support the imposition of individual criminal liability for war crimes on civilians where they have a link or connection with a Party to the conflict. The principle of holding civilians liable for breaches of the laws of war is, moreover, favored by a consideration of the humanitarian object and purpose of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols, which is to protect war victims from atrocities."[41]

97. Consequently, the duties and responsibilities of the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols will normally apply to individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or to individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts. It will be a matter of evidence to establish if the accused falls into the category of persons who can be held individually criminally responsible for serious violations of these international instruments, and in this case, of the provisions of Article 4 of the Statute.

The Class of Victims

98. Paragraph 8 of the Indictment states that the victims referred to in this Indictment were persons taking no active part in the hostilities. This wording stems from the definition to be found in Common Article 3(1) of the Geneva Conventions, which affords protection to "persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of the armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat", and is synonymous to Article 4 of Additional Protocol which refers to "all persons who do not take a direct part in the hostilities or who have ceased to take part in the hostilities".

99. From a reading of the Indictment, it can be adduced that the victims were all allegedly civilians. There is no concise definition of "civilian" in the Protocols. As such, a definition has evolved through a process of elimination, whereby the civilian population[42] is made up of persons who are not combatants or persons placed hors de combat, in other words, who are not members of the armed forces[43]. Pursuant to Article 13(2) of the Additional Protocol II, the civilian population, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. However, if civilians take a direct part in the hostilities, they then lose their right to protection as civilians per se and could fall within the class of combatant. To take a "direct" part in the hostilities means acts of war which by their nature or purpose are likely to cause actual harm to the personnel and equipment of the enemy armed forces[44].

100. It would be beyond the scope of the matter at hand for the Chamber to attempt to provide an exhaustive list of all categories of persons who are not considered civilians under the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols. Rather the Chamber considers that a civilian is anyone who falls outside the category of "perpetrator" developed supra, "perpetrators" being individuals of all ranks belonging to the armed forces under the military command of either of the belligerent parties, or to individuals who were legitimately mandated and expected, as public officials or agents or persons otherwise holding public authority or de facto representing the Government, to support or fulfil the war efforts. The class of civilians thus broadly defined, it will be a matter of evidence on a case-by-case basis to determine whether a victim has the status of civilian.

Ratione Loci

101. The protection afforded to individuals under the Geneva Conventions and the Additional Protocols, extends throughout the territory of the State where the hostilities are occurring, once the objective material conditions for applicability of the said instruments have been satisfied.

102. This was affirmed in the Akayesu Judgement[45] and by the ICTY[46] (with regard in particular to Common Article 3), where it has been determined that the requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II apply in the whole territory where the conflict is occurring and are not limited to the "war front" or to the "narrow geographical context of the actual theater of combat operations".

The Nexus between the Crime and the Armed Conflict

[45] See Akayesu Judgement para. 635-636.

[46] See ICTY Tadic decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction of 2 October 1995, para. 69.

103. In addition to the offence being committed in the context of an armed conflict not of an international character satisfying the material requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II, there must be a nexus between the offence and the armed conflict for Article 4 of the Statute to apply. By this it should be understood that the offence must be closely related to the hostilities or committed in conjunction with the armed conflict[47].

[47] See Akayesu Judgement para. 643 and ibid, para. 70.

104. The Chamber notes the finding made in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, whereby the term nexus should not be defined in abstracto[48]. Rather, the evidence adduced in support of the charges against the accused must satisfy the Chamber that such a nexus exists. Thus, the burden rests on the Prosecutor to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that, on the basis of the facts, such a nexus exists between the crime committed and the armed conflict.

The Specific Violation

105. The crime committed must represent a serious violation of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute. A "serious violation" is one which breaches a rule protecting important values with grave consequences for the victim. The fundamental guarantees included in Article 4 of the Statute represent elementary considerations of humanity. Violations thereof would, by their very nature, be deemed serious.

106. The Accused is charged under Counts 4, 6 and 8 of the Indictment for violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions, as incorporated by Article 4(a) (murder) of the Statute of the Tribunal. If all the requirements of applicability of Article 4, as developed supra, are met, the onus is on the Prosecutor to then prove that the alleged acts of the Accused constituted murder. The specific elements of murder are stated in Section 2.3 on Crimes against Humanity in the Applicable law.

2.5 Cumulative Charges

107. In the indictment, the Accused, by his alleged acts in relation to the events described in paragraphs 10-19, is cumulatively charged with genocide (count 1) and crimes against humanity (extermination) (count 2). Moreover, by his alleged acts in relation to the killings at the École Technique Officielle described in paragraph 14, his acts at the gravel pit in Nyanza described in paragraphs 15 and 16, and for the alleged murder of Emmanuel Kayitare described in paragraph 18, Rutaganda is charged cumulatively with crimes against humanity (murder) (counts 3, 5 and 7) and violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions (murder) (counts 4, 6 and 8).

108. Therefore, the issue before the Chamber is whether, assuming that it is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that a particular act alleged in the indictment and given several legal characterizations under different counts has been established, it may adopt only one of the legal characterizations given to such act or whether it may find the Accused guilty on all the counts arising from the said act.

109. The Chamber notes, first of all, that the principle of cumulative charges was applied by the Nuremberg Tribunal, especially regarding war crimes and crimes against humanity.[49]

49. The indictment against the major German War Criminals presented to the International Military Tribunal stated that "the prosecution will rely upon the facts pleaded under Count Three (violations of the laws and customs of war) as also constituting crimes against humanity(Count Four)". Several accused persons were convicted of both war crimes and crimes against humanity. The judgement of the International Military Tribunal delivered at Nuremberg on 30 September and 1 October 1946 ruled that "[...]from the beginning of the war in 1939 war crimes were committed on a vast scale, which were also crimes against humanity." The commentary on Justice case held the same view: "It is clear that war crimes may also constitute crimes against humanity; the same offences may amount to both types of crimes." The trials on the basis of Control Council Law No. 10 followed the same approach. Pohl, Heinz Karl Franslau, Hans Loerner, and Erwin Tschentscher were all found to have committed war crimes and crimes against humanity. National cases, such as Quinn v. Robinson, the Eichmann case and the Barbie case also support this finding. In the Tadic case, the Trial Chamber II of ICTY, based on the above reasoning, ruled that "acts which are enumerated elsewhere in the Statute may also entail additional culpability if they meet the requirements of persecution." Thus, the same acts, which meet the requirements of other crimes--grave breaches of Geneva Conventions, violation of the laws or customs of war and genocide, may also constitute the crimes against humanity for persecution.

110. Regarding especially the concurrence of the various crimes covered under the Statute, the Chamber, in the Akayesu Judgement, the first case brought before this Tribunal, considered the matter and held that:

> "[...]it is acceptable to convict the accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the previous creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did. However, the Chamber finds that it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where (a) one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, [...]or (b) where one offence charges accomplice liability and the other offence charges liability as [...]"[50].

111. Trial Chamber II of the Tribunal, in its Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, endorsed the afore-mentioned test of concurrence of crimes and found that it is only acceptable:

> "(1) where offences have differing elements, or (2) where the laws in question protect differing social interests."[51]

[51] Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement, para. 627.

112. Trial Chamber II ruled that the cumulative charges in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement in particular were legally improper and untenable. It found that all elements including the mens rea element requisite to show genocide, "extermination" and "murder" in the particular case were the same, and the evidence relied upon to prove the crimes were the same. Furthermore, in the opinion of Trial Chamber II, the protected social interests were also the same. Therefore, it held that the Prosecutor should have charged the Accused in the alternative.[52]

113. Judge Tafazzal H. Khan, one of the Judges sitting in Trial Chamber II to consider the said case, dissented on the issue of cumulative charges. Relying on consistent jurisprudence he pointed out that the Chamber should have placed less emphasis on the overlapping elements of the cumulative crimes.

> "What must be punished is culpable conduct; this principle applies to situations where the conduct offends two or more crimes, whether or not the factual situation also satisfies the distinct elements of the two or more crimes, as proven."[53]

114. In his dissenting opinion, the Judge goes on to emphasized that the full assessment of charges and the pronouncement of guilty verdicts are important in order to reflect the totality of the accused's culpable conduct.

> "[...]where the culpable conduct was part of a widespread and systematic attack specifically against civilians, to record a conviction for genocide alone does not reflect the totality of the accused's culpable conduct. Similarly, if the Majority had chosen to convict for extermination alone instead of genocide, the verdict would still fail to adequately capture the totality of the accused's conduct."[54]

115. This Chamber fully concurs with the dissenting opinion thus entered. It notes that this position, which endorses the principle of cumulative charges, also finds support in various decisions rendered by the ICTY. In the case of the Prosecutor v. Zoran Kupreskic and others, the Trial Chamber of ICTY in its decision on Defence challenges to form of the indictment held that:

"The Prosecutor may be justified in bringing cumulative charges when the articles of the Statute referred to are designed to protect different values and when each article requires proof of a legal element not required by the others."[55]

116. Furthermore, the Chamber holds that offences covered under the Statute - genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of Article 3 common to Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II - have disparate ingredients and, especially, that their punishment is aimed at protecting discrete interests. As a result, multiple offenses may be charged on the basis of the same acts, in order to capture the full extent of the crimes committed by an accused.

117. Finally, the Chamber notes that in Civil Law systems, including that of Rwanda, there exists a so called doctrine of concours idéal d'infractions which allows multiple charges for the same act under certain circumstances. Rwandan law allows multiple charges in the following circumstances:

"Penal Code of Rwanda: Chapter VI - Concurrent offences:

Article 92: Where a person has committed several offences prior to a conviction on any such charges, such offences shall be concurrent.

Article 93: Notional plurality of offences occurs:

1. Where a single conduct may be characterized as constituting several offences;

2. Where a conduct includes acts which, though constituting separate offences, are interrelated as deriving from the same criminal intent or as constituting lesser included offences of one another.

In the former case, only the sentence prescribed for the most serious offence shall be passed while, in the latter case, only the sentence provided for the most severely punished offence shall be passed, the maximum of which may be exceeded by half".[56]

Article 92 - Il y a concours d'infractions lorsque plusieurs infractions ont été commises par le même auteur sans qu'une condamnation soit intervenue entre ces infractions.

Article 93 - Il y a concours idéal :

1. Lorsque le fait unique au point de vue matériel est susceptible de plusieurs qualifications ;

2. Lorsque l'action comprend des faits qui, constituant des infractions distinctes, sont unis entre eux comme procédant d'une intention délictueuse unique ou comme étant les uns des circonstances aggravantes des autres.

Seront seules pronocées dans le premier cas les peines déterminées par la qualification la plus sévère, dans le second cas les peines prévues pour la répression de l'infraction la plus grave, mais dont le maximum pourra être alors élevé de moitié".

118. Consequently, in light of the foregoing, the Chamber maintains that it is justified to convict an accused of two or more offences for the same act under certain circumstances and reiterates the above findings made in the Akayesu Judgement.

3. THE DEFENCE CASE

119. The Accused pleaded not guilty to all counts of the Indictment at his initial appearance on 30 May 1996. The Defence case consisted of two main arguments. The first of these was a general defence. The second was a defence of alibi.

3.1 The Arguments of General Defence

120. The Defence developed several main lines of argument. The Defence argued that the political activity of the Accused was minimal. The Accused testified and, his Counsel argued, that his involvement in the Interahamwe za MRND was limited to participation in meetings of this organization in its earliest stage, which it was argued was as a "think tank" or "group of reflection"[57]. The Defence also argued that the meaning of Interahamwe changed significantly between 1991 and 1994. The Defence argued that the Accused was a member of the Interahamwe za MRND at its embryonic stage, and that the term Interahamwe later included people who were not all members of the Interahamwe za MRND.

121. The Defence Counsel questioned the credibility and reliability of several Prosecution witnesses. Counsel for the Defence submitted that the case file was "contaminated"[58] by virtue of testimony given concerning the "Hindi Mandal" building in the Amgar garage complex. The Defence further submitted that certain evidence gathered by Captain Luc Lemaire was illegally collected and thus could not be tendered as evidence by the Prosecutor. The Defence argued that the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda ("UNAMIR") contingent, of which Captain Lemaire was a part, had been prohibited from gathering intelligence[59].

122. The Defence called fourteen witnesses, including the Accused, who testified at length about the role of the Accused as second Vice-President of the Interahamwe. The Chamber notes that a number of Defence witnesses testified that the Accused took action to help others, including Tutsi refugees. The Defence further argued that, contrary to the allegations that the Accused detained Tutsi civilians in the "Hindi Mandal" building at the Amgar garage, that Tutsis actually sought refuge there and that the Accused permitted this and that he provided them with basic foodstuffs and medicine.

123. The Accused testified before the Chamber that prior to the advent of multiparty politics in Rwanda in 1991, he was a businessman with no interest in political participation. After being released from a presidentially assigned post in June 1991, he stated, he worked for himself, operating an import and distribution business registered as "Rutaganda SARL." The Accused testified that he focused on his business to the exclusion of any other civic, political, or administrative activities.

124. The Accused stated that he joined the MRND party in September or October 1991, in an atmosphere of increasing political tension in order to benefit from its protection and to safeguard his business interests. This tension was as a result of increasing competition between President Habyarimana's ruling MRND party and new opposition parties as they vied for members. It was in this context, the Accused testified, that he chose to join the MRND party because of the specific protections it afforded. He further submitted that although his father had been a member of the MDR, the strong regional affiliations which the MDR was reputed to have did not seem to him to be beneficial in light of the political climate in Kigali in 1991. It was at his father's urging, he stated, that he joined the MRND party in 1991. The Accused was, he claimed, simply a member of the MRND party – with no time for, or interest in, wielding political influence within the party or among the general population.

125. Nonetheless, in November 1991,the Accused was invited to attend an initial meeting of intellectuals who sought to find ways to recruit for and promote the MRND party. The Accused told the Chamber that he was also to become an elected representative in the national committee of the MRND in April 1993, as a representative of Gitarama Préfecture.[60] As such, he was one among fifty-five representatives, five from each Préfecture, who met at National Assemblies and voted on party decisions and actions.

126. A select group of persons, whom the Accused referred to as intellectuals, convened in order to devise strategies for attracting new members and for furthering the MRND party's objectives in the new, multiparty political environment. This group was known as the Interahamwe za MRND. The Accused indicated to the court that this was an embryonic "think tank" for the MRND. The Accused testified that he did not know when this initial "think tank" was organized, but that he was nonetheless involved in the initial impetus behind the creation of this committee. He participated in meetings of this group, he testified, in order to contribute his own ideas to the party. He stated that although more people joined this core group, they were all personally invited rather than publicly recruited. He stated that he attended one of their meetings for the first time in November 1991, at the invitation of Pheneas Ruhumuriza, who was later to become first Vice-President of the Interahamwe za MRND.[61]

127. According to the testimony given by the Accused, Interahamwe is a Kinyarwanda word that was used frequently by persons in political parties or other associations, which indicated a close relationship between people who did something together. This name was drawn, he explained, from a popular and patriotic song from the 1960s, which was associated with the MDR. Witness DNN gave a similar description of the source of the term Interahamwe.[62]

128. The Accused testified that the Interahamwe za MRND quickly grew from its embryonic form and gained both senior members and young recruits. The five members who were to compose the National Committee of the Interahamwe za MRND were selected by a larger assembly. The Accused was appointed as second vice president even though he declined to be a candidate in elections. He testified, however, that the five official positions comprising the National Committee, as those of ensuing committee heads and organizers were really only formalities, with no attached responsibility or authority.

129. The Accused stated that although the Committee had a clear structure and its members had titles which suggested a hierarchy of responsibility and authority, his position as second vice-president was a mere formality, and he did not act in a capacity commensurate with the responsibility such a title might suggest. The Accused testified that there was no real leadership structure, budget, or autonomy - but that the titles, communiques, and meetings simply reflected a hope for future actions of the Interahamwe za MRND. The Accused also testified that as second vice president and member of this National Committee, he acted as a mediator and liaison between the National Committee of the MRND party and the young members who joined the party, quite possibly as a response to the organization and initiative of the Interahamwe za MRND.

130. According to the testimony of the Accused, the size and character of the Interahamwe za MRND changed significantly between its inception and the events which followed the death of President Habyarimana in April 1994. During his testimony, the Accused described a transformation in the popular usage and understanding of the word Interahamwe, as well as an increase in the number of people who joined the MRND, and in particular the Interahamwe za MRND. The Accused testified that the Interahamwe za MRND was initially composed of a small number of men who were mostly between the ages of thirty and forty. The Accused later referred to the Interahamwe as "the youth", and also stated that increasing numbers of Rwandan youth were drawn to the party and were subsequently organized. The Accused testified that by 6 April 1994 the Interahamwe had become an entirely different organization than the one in which he was originally involved. The Accused stated that the organization had already changed by mid-1992, and continued its transformation through 1994.

131. The Accused testified that the evolution of the Interahamwe as a youth wing of the party was an organic development, which he did not foresee when he joined this committee at its inception. Responding to questions concerning President Habyarimana's opinion of the Interahamwe, the Accused testified that in May 1992 President Habyarimana expressed his approval and encouraged "the youth" to join the organization.

132. The Accused stated to the court that the Interahamwe was popularly understood to encompass many more people than the Interahamwe za MRND. The word Interahamwe, and even Interahamwe za MRND, gained a pejorative, or negative meaning in popular usage and was used to describe a large and loosely organized militia which is said to have fought against the RPF[63], as well as to connote certain persons who had committed acts of banditry and violence[64]. While stating that popular understanding of the word Interahamwe had changed, the Accused added that the way in which this term was used after 6 April 1994 had little to do with the MRND, and that he had little knowledge of the persons perpetrating such acts, much less any political, social, or ideological connection with them.

133. Testifying about roadblocks that Interahamwe members were alleged to have manned, and where the Accused was alleged to have been, the Accused stated that roadblocks were initially set up and manned by civilians, largely through efforts of the civil defence, which was a multi-ethnic corps of citizens rallying together against the Rwandan Patriotic Front (the "RPF") army. Some confusion may have arisen, he suggested, because some people wore clothing falsely said to be a uniform of the Interahamwe. He further testified that the Interahamwe did not create or monitor roadblocks, and was not officially or unofficially involved at the roadblock sites, or in criminal acts allegedly committed there and therefrom.

134. Testifying about special clothing worn by Interahamwe and alleged Interahamwe members, the Accused submitted that there were both official and unofficial clothing and accessory items which were worn and promoted by the MRND. He also stated that there was no official uniform as such. He further stated that impostors wore clothing which had been associated with the MRND or Interahamwe when committing "evil" or criminal acts. This was the subject of a communiqué issued by the National Committee of the Interahamwe za MRND, addressed to the International Community and signed by the Accused, which discouraged members from wearing their "uniforms." According to the Accused, this communiqué was intended to dissociate the Interahamwe from Rwandan youths who were not members of, but who were publicly perceived as being members of and acting under the auspices of, the Interahamwe za MRND and who committed criminal or violent acts.

135. Witness DNN testified, to the contrary, that Interahamwe za MRND members did have a uniform, made out of kitenge fabric in yellow, blue and black colours. However, some wore clothes of the same colour as the party flag, that is black, yellow and green. This uniform was needed to distinguish the members of Interahamwe from members of the youth wings of other political parties.[65]

136. Finally, the Accused testified that although he did not officially resign after 6 April 1994, his position in the Interahamwe and MRND was effectively rendered irrelevant, in what he described as "chaos", both within the organization and throughout Rwanda.

3.2 Defence of Alibi

137. The Defence case included submission of a defence of alibi. In his testimony, the Accused stated that he was in locations other than those alleged to be crime sites, or involved in activities other than those alleged during the times at which the crimes enumerated in the indictment were allegedly committed.

[65] See Testimony of Witness DNN, 16 February 1999.

138. In her closing argument, Defence Counsel stated that a notice of alibi. The Chamber notes that no record of a notice of alibi was filed at any time, and that there is no record of such a notice in the judicial archives or within the judicial record. Notwithstanding this, the Trial Chamber finds it appropriate and necessary to examine the defence of alibi, pursuant to Rule 67(B) of the Rules which states that "Failure of the defence to provide such notice under this Rule shall not limit the right of the Accused to rely on the above defences."[66]

139. The Accused, Witness DF, Witness DD, and Witness DDD testified regarding the whereabouts of the Accused between the evening of 6 April 1994 to 9 April 1994.

[66] See Rules of Procedure and Evidence, Rule 67.

140. The Defence submitted that in the first days following the crash of the aeroplane carrying President Habyarimana, the Accused was busy seeking protection for his family, trying to obtain news, and searching for food and other goods. The Accused testified that on the night of 6 April 1994, he and his friends were taken out of a car at a location close to the Kimihurura roundabout. They were first told to sit down and later they were told to lie down on the road. They were finally released, the Accused testified, at 3:00 a.m. on 7 April 1994. They were then stopped at another roadblock manned by gendarmes in Kicukiro. At that time, they were asked to get out of the car, to show their identity cards and to sit on a hill by the side of the road before being allowed to continue on their way. The Accused testified that he then passed "Sonatubes," the airport, Bugesera and the town before reaching his home. The Accused stated that he remained at home on 7 April 1994.[67]

141. Witness DF stated that he had a drink with the Accused on the evening of 6 April 1994, and that DF left the Accused at 9:00 p.m. that night. [68]

142. Witness DD testified that he had a drink with the Accused on the evening of 6 April 1994. Witness DD further testified that he and the Accused separated on the night of 6 April 1994. Witness DD stated that he telephoned the home of the Accused on the morning of 7 April 1994 and the Accused's wife told DD that the Accused had not yet returned. Witness DD stated that at about 1:00 p.m. he contacted the Accused. During this conversation, the Accused told DD that he had encountered problems at Kimihurura on the night of 6 April 1994. Witness DD testified that the Accused told him that members of the Presidential Guard had stopped him there, and that he had spent the night sleeping on the ground.[69]

143. Witness DDD testified that she saw the Accused at 3:00 am on 7 April 1994. At this time, the Accused told DDD that many roadblocks had been erected. Witness DDD testified that the Accused told her that he was stopped at a roadblock at Kimihurura roundabout at 9:00 p.m. on 6 April 1994 and left that roadblock after 12:00 a.m. on 7 April 1994. Witness DDD testified that she and the Accused stayed at home together on 7 April 1994.[70]

144. The Accused stated that on 8 April 1994, he walked towards the city from Kicukiro neighbourhood with a friend in order to find out whether his family should remain at home or leave. The Accused testified that he and his friend were shot at by the RPF as they neared a gendarmerie squad. After this, he decided to move his family. He stated that he took the road towards Rebero and left his family at the Rebero hotel. The Accused testified that he returned back in the evening and went to the parish mission by car. At the mission, he testified, he found a number of people whom he stated to the Chamber were seeking refuge from the RPF. The Accused proceeded, he testified, to visit the Conseiller to inquire where these refugees would spend the night. He testified that at his suggestion, some of these people followed him to his home where they spent the night.

145. The Accused testified that he went to the Rebero hotel on the morning of 9 April 1994, passing through roadblocks in front of the ETO school and around the air station. He testified that he returned with his family along the same route by which he had come. Arriving home, the Accused testified that he called his father, who informed him that his friend Jean Sebagenzi and his family had been killed. The Accused testified that he then went to see the Conseiller to get permission to move within the sector, in order to follow his father's wishes and bury the Sebagenzi family. The Accused testified that he was denied this permission by the Conseiller.

146. Witness DDD stated that she and the Accused went to the Rebero hotel, located on Rebero hill behind Kicukiro Sector on 8 April 1994. DDD testified that she next saw the Accused on 9 April 1994, at which time they left the Rebero hotel and returned to their house. Witness DDD stated that at that time a curfew had been imposed, and that the Accused went to the Sector office seeking special permission to move freely. DDD further testified that the Accused was denied such permission at the Sector office.

147. The Accused, Witness DD, Witness DF, and Witness DDD testified as to the whereabouts of the Accused on 10 April 1994.

148. The Accused testified that he returned to see the Conseiller on Sunday 10 April 1994. At this time he was granted a permit allowing free movement and exempting him from the curfew which was in place. The Accused testified that he reached the home of a friend in Muyima, where caskets containing the bodies of the Sebagenzi family were being loaded into a pickup truck. The Accused stated to the Chamber that he continued along with these people as they made their way to Nyirambo to bury these people. En route, he testified, they passed through many roadblocks - where the caskets were even opened to verify that they contained only dead bodies.

149. Witness DDD testified that the Accused received permission to move on 10 April 1994. Witness DDD learned of this when the Accused returned home in order to take a vehicle to go to the abovementioned burial. DDD testified that the Accused returned at 7:00 p.m. on the evening of 10 April 1994. Upon his return he explained to DDD that it had taken a long time because they had been stopped at many roadblocks, they had been searched, and that the caskets were even searched at the Agakingiro roadblock, where also that there were six people to bury.

150. Witness DF stated that he saw the Accused at this burial, which DF thought took place on 10 April 1994. Witness DF further testified that people manning the roadblock at Agakingiro wanted to open the caskets being transported for burial, and that they were also stopped close to a mosque at Biryogo and at a roadblock close to St Andrews school in Nyirambo.

151. Witness DD provided a detailed description of the day of the burial of 7 people in 5 coffins. He testified that they were detained at the Agakingiro roadblock, 10 metres from Amgar, while the coffins that he and the Accused were transporting were searched. Witness DD could not remember if the date was April 10; however, he thought that it took place on a Sunday afternoon.

152. The Accused, Witness DDD, Witness DF, and Witness DS gave testimony concerning the whereabouts of the Accused between 11 and 14 April 1994.

153. The Accused stated that at 7:30 a.m. on 11 April 1994, he left Kicukiro along with thirteen other people in a "505" sedan. They stopped at the house of an acquaintance where, the Accused testified, he wished to leave his family. Since this was not possible, they returned to his house. The Accused stated that they drove to Masango Commune instead, and that they arrived in Karambi in Masango at around 5:30 p.m. The Accused testified that he remained in his house in Karambi on the night of 11 April 1994. He stated that he had never been into the ETO compound, and was not near the premises on 11 April 1994. The Accused testified that early in the morning of 12 April 1994, he began thinking about how to finish construction of his house in Karambi. He testified that he drew up a contract with a trader and a mason for the construction work. He supervised the commencement of this work on 13 April 1994. The Accused stated that he returned to Kigali on the evening of 14 April 1994. He further testified that he could not reach Kicukiro because of the danger involved. Instead, he stated, he remained at the Amgar garage complex. The Accused testified that he found people hiding there. He stated to the Chamber that he took pity on these people and fed and cared for them. He also began to think of a strategy to evacuate them.

154. Witness DDD stated that she arrived in Kiyovu with the Accused at 9:00 a.m. on 11 April 1994 and stayed with a friend who was living there until about midday on that same day. DDD testified that they did not receive any special treatment at the roadblocks. Each of the adults had to show their identity card at the roadblocks. Witness DDD stated that the officials manning the roadblocks did not have a special reaction to any of the occupants of the vehicle she traveled in. They crossed Nyabarongo and arrived in Masango at about 6:00 p.m. Witness DDD testified that the accused remained there for three days, departing for Kigali on 14 April 1994. Witness DDD testified that over the course of these three days, the Accused did not participate in any meetings.

155. Witness DF testified that the Accused left after the burial on 10 April 1994, and came back after two days. Witness DF stated that he saw the Accused at the Amgar garage. DF further stated that all of the people at the Amgar garage were there willingly, and had not been taken there by force.

156. The Accused, Witness DDD, Witness DEE, and Witness DS gave testimony concerning the whereabouts of the Accused from 15-18 April 1994.

157. The Accused testified that he arrived at the Amgar complex on 14 April 1994 and remained there on 15 April 1994. He also tried to collect money before returning to Masango Commune, where he told the Chamber he remained during the night of 16 April 1994. The Accused stated that he returned to Kigali early in the morning on 17 April 1994. The Defence Counsel submitted that the Accused organized the evacuation of vulnerable persons from the Amgar garage complex. The Chamber notes that the Accused did not specify a date on which the said evacuation occurred. The Accused stated that he met his mother and sister at the Red Cross in Kiyovu. He took them to the Amgar complex, he testified, and later a convoy was organized to move them. This was done with great difficulty. The Accused testified that they were sent back during their first attempt. The Accused testified that he remained in Kigali from 17 April 1994 until 29 April 1994.

158. Witness DEE testified that on 12 April 1994, she went to CHK hospital in Kigali. DEE stated that she then spent two days there and on the third she went to the Amgar complex. DEE stated that she spent two days there, and that she saw the Accused there on both days. Witness DEE testified that when she saw the Accused there, he was wearing civilian clothing. DEE further testified that she never saw him enter the house carrying a weapon. Witness DEE testified that she spent two days at the Amgar complex and that on the third day the Accused organized the departure for their respective préfectures.

159. Witness DEE testified that she, the Accused , and four other people, departed in a vehicle which the Accused drove. Witness DEE testified that they were stopped at roadblocks. On 9 February 1999, DEE stated to the Chamber that at the first roadblock everyone in the car, including the Accused, was asked to produce their identity cards. However, on 10 February 1999, during her second day of testimony, she stated that they were not even asked for their identity cards[71]. This Witness testified that there was no special recognition or relationship between the Accused and the roadblock controller, and that this was evident because the Accused was asked to produce his identity card.

160. At a second roadblock which the witness stated was near the petrol station at Nyabugogo, the Accused was asked again to show his identity card. The people manning the roadblock also demanded the identity card of Witness DEE. Upon seeing it, these people told the witness that they should kill her. At this point, Witness DEE testified, the Accused begged them not to do so and gave them money. The Witness testified that the people at the roadblock did not know the Accused, which surprised her. DEE stated that she found this surprising because she thought that the Accused was well known throughout the country as he was an official of the MRND party.[72]

161. At a third roadblock, which was not far from the second, and was situated along the road, in the direction of the road to Gitarama, there were many people who had been stopped. DEE testified that on the evening before this trip, the RTLM had broadcast that the vehicle in which they were traveling was being sought because the vehicle was said to have been used to find Tutsi and hide them. The witness testified, however, that the owner alleged by the RTLM was not the Accused, but was a person who was at the Amgar garage. This car was identified at the roadblock, but its passengers were not required to produce their identity cards. They turned around and went straight back to the Amgar complex. Witness DEE testified that the Accused organized another trip the next day. They traveled in a different car and reached Masango that night, 17 April 1994. They stayed in Masango at the house of the Accused's father.

162. Witness DDD stated that the Accused returned to Masango on 16 April 1994. DDD testified that the Accused left for Kigali again on the evening of 17 April 1994. Witness DDD further testified that the Accused did not do anything special when he was at Masango, and that all he did was bring back food.

163. The Accused testified that he remained in Kigali without leaving between 17April 1994 and 29 April 1994. He testified that he was very busy selling out his stocks of beer during this time. The Accused testified that he was approached by the Red Cross during the week of 17 to 24 April 1994. The Accused testified that the Red Cross asked him to draw up a communiqué appealing to MRND members, and in particular to members of the Interahamwe za MRND, if they were involved in killing, to stop, and to facilitate the transport of the wounded. The Accused stated that he left Kigali on 29 April 1994 and went to deposit his money at a bank in Gitarama. He then went to Masango to visit his family and stayed the night there. The Accused stated that he returned to Amgar on the following day and stayed there for about a week. On 8 May 1994, the Accused returned to Masango. He stated that he tried once again to deposit money in Gitarama before leaving. This did not work, so he asked his wife to deposit this money. He testified, without providing a date, that he went immediately back to Kigali and tried to shut down his business. The Accused testified that he could not state that he remained at Amgar permanently during the month of May 1994. Rather, he testified, he moved around a great deal and tried to attend to many matters.

164. Witness DDD stated that the Accused went to Kigali from Masango on the evening of 17 April 1994 and did not return for a period of two to three weeks.

165. Witness DEE testified that she saw the Accused in Butare once but that they did not have any interaction. DEE stated that this was either at the end of April or the beginning of May 1994. DEE testified that Rutaganda did not stay in Butare for the month or so that followed. Witness DEE believed that the Accused was in Masango staying either with his parents or at his home. However, DEE never actually saw the Accused in Masango.

166. The Accused, Witness DDD, Witness DS, Witness DD, Witness DF, and Witness DEE gave testimony concerning the whereabouts of the Accused from the end of May 1994 to the beginning of July 1994.

167. Defence Counsel submitted that the Accused left Kigali on 25 May 1994 and that he did not return there again. The Accused stated that he left the Amgar complex in Kigali on 27 May 1994. The Defence further stated that the Accused reached Cyangugu on 31 May 1994. The Accused testified that one week later, around 10 June 1994, he left Rwanda. He further testified that he returned to Rwanda twice to see his family. He stated that he did not return to Rwanda after the end of June 1994.

168. Witness DDD testified that the Accused arrived at Masango on the evening of 27 May 1994. According to her testimony, DDD and the Accused departed for Gitarama together on 28 May 1994. DDD stated that they then went to Ngange, in Kivumu Commune before returning to Masango. According to the testimony of DDD they then departed for Cyangugu on the following day, 29 May 1994. They passed through roadblocks. At each one they had to present identity cards. DDD testified that the people manning the roadblocks did not recognize the Accused. DDD testified that they reached Cyangugu on the night of 31 May 1994. DDD testified that they stayed there together for a month, before leaving on 1 July 1994, and that the Accused did not return to Kigali.

169. Witness DS testified that he and the Accused left Kigali on 27 May 1994 and that they went to Gitarama.

170. Witness DD testified to having left the Amgar complex in company of the Accused on 27 May 1994. They experienced difficulties crossing roadblocks, and had to pay people who were manning the roadblocks. Witness DD testified that their trip lasted three days, and that this was due to the difficulties they encountered trying to cross the roadblocks. DD stated that he saw the Accused often when the Accused came to visit his family in Cyangugu.

171. Witness DF stated that DF and the Accused left the Amgar complex on the same day, on 27 May 1994. DF testified that the Accused was at first not allowed to pass through the Gikongoro roadblock, and that if he had been able to do so they would not have spent so many days there. DF stated that they reached Cyangugu on 31 May 1994. Witness DF stated that DF left Rwanda on 17 July. DF thought that the Accused departed two weeks earlier. DF testified that when the Accused reached Cyangugu, the Accused did not go to Kigali or Gikongoro.

172. Witness DEE stated that around 17 to 19 June 1994, she left Gikongoro for Cyangugu with the Accused and others. At a roadblock the Accused's vehicle was searched. DEE testified that the Accused's attitude was not that of someone in control when they were at the roadblocks. DEE testified that other people were supervising and controlling the roadblocks. DEE testified that on the following day the Accused suggested that he should take them to Bukavu, Zaire. They went to Zaire at some point not later than 26 June 1994.[73]

173. The Chamber considers the defence of alibi, after having reviewed the Prosecutor's case in the factual findings on the relevant paragraphs of the Indictment.[74]

[74] See Chapter 4 of this Judgement.

4. FACTUAL FINDINGS

4.1 Paragraph 10 of the Indictment

174. Paragraph 10 of the indictment reads as follows:

> "On or about April 6, 1994, Georges Rutaganda distributed guns and other weapons to Interahamwe members in Nyarugenge commune, Kigali."

Events alleged

175. Witness J, a Tutsi man who lived in the Cyahafi sector in the Nyarugenge Commune, testified that he had known the Accused since he was young because they were in neighboring Communes. He knew the Accused as the President of a sports team, as a Tuborg beer importer, and as someone he had seen leading several demonstrations of the Interahamwe of the MRND party. Witness J said that on 15 April, a policeman named Munyawara arrived in Cyahafi from Kimisagara and said that the Inyenzi had attacked and shot at the councillor of Cyahafi sector. The policeman gathered people together, including Witness J, and told them to follow him to go and fight the Inyenzi who were coming down.

176. Witness J said the group stopped just below a bar called Mount Kigali by a public standpipe near Mr. Shyirakera's house. At 3:00 p.m., they saw a pick-up truck arrive and stop near the standpipe. They approached the truck and saw two people in front and two people in back in the open bed of the truck. The Accused got out on the passenger side, and went to the back of the truck. He opened the cab and they saw him distributing weapons to young people, some of whom Witness J said he recognized as Interahamwe. Among these he named Bizimungo, Ziad, Muzehe, Cyuma and Polisi and said they were Interahamwe who had gone for training in the Commune of Bicumbi. He said they were his neighbors and he knew them. Witness J said that he was close to the vehicle, indicating the length of the courtroom as a measure. He clarified on examination that the Accused did not himself distribute the weapons but was standing next to the truck as they were distributed. After this distribution of weapons, according to Witness J, the shooting started. Witness J testified that Muzehe immediately shot someone called Rusagara, who was standing with them, and Rusagara died on the spot. He estimated that from the time of the arrival of the vehicle to the time of this first shot, less than ten minutes passed. When he heard the shot, Witness J immediately fled. The shooting continued, and Muzehe and Bizimungo shot at young people known to Witness J, whom he named as Kalinda Viater and Musoni Emmanuel. Witness J saw them fall immediately and jumped over their bodies as he fled home. He stated that all the men he saw shot were Tutsi.

177. On cross-examination, the Defence produced two pre-trial written statements of Witness J. In the first statement, which was dated 5 December 1995, the witness said the event described had occurred on 6 April 1994. In the second statement, which was dated 3 May 1996, the witness had corrected this date to read 7 April 1994. Witness J maintained that it was either 15 or 16 April that Munyawera came to gather people together and stated that he had said it was 16 April at the time he made the statement. Witness J noted that it must have been 16 April, as on 6 April the plane had not yet been shot down. He said it was not possible that this happened on 7 April either because there was still calm on that date. He also stated that he did not remember saying to the Office of the Prosecutor that the event took place on 7 April.

178. Witness J was also questioned as to whether the councillor of Cyahafi was shot before or after the distribution of arms. In his testimony he indicated the shooting was beforehand and in the pre-trial statement it was indicated as having happened afterwards. The witness stated that the councillor was shot during a meeting which took place before the firearms arrived. He suggested that what he said might not have been written down accurately. He explained that he had been in a hurry to get back to work when the interpreter translated the statement into Kinyarwanda. The interpreter had said he would come back to him with a revised statement but Witness J said he never did. When asked whether he had not met with investigators again on 3 May 1996, he said he didn't really remember that.

179. Witness J confirmed on cross-examination that the Accused did not distribute the weapons but that he got out and stood next to the vehicle while those in the back distributed the weapons. Witness J was also questioned as to when he fled - whether it was after Mr. Rusagara had been shot as he stated on direct examination, or as soon as people began getting out of the pickup truck, as reported in the pre-trial written statement. He responded that when the young men received weapons and approached them, they thought they were going to be defended. But then the firing began and at that time he fled.

180. Witness M, a Tutsi man, testified that he was in Nyarugenge Commune, in the sector of Kimisagara, when he heard of the President's plane crash on RTLM radio. On the next day, 7 April, he went to take refuge at the CHK hospital, which was 8 km from his house, after seeing people who had been killed by the Interahamwe and left strewn along the road, including neighbors he knew. On the way to the hospital he saw Interahamwe who were armed and bodies of people who had just been killed. He also saw two roadblocks, manned by soldiers and Interahamwe, with dead bodies lying nearby. He avoided these roadblocks for fear of being killed. At the hospital, Witness M saw many refugees and many dead bodies, three of which he recognized as Minister Zamubarumbao Fredrick and his daughter, and councillor Ngango Felistian. On 12 April, Witness M left the hospital and went to the Cyahafi sector, where he took refuge in the home of Nyamugambo, a Tutsi man, who told him that the sector was being protected by soldiers.

181. Witness M said that the sector was peaceful until 15 April, when the Accused "had the killings started". He said he saw the Accused at 9:30 a.m. with six people inside a pick-up truck. They were armed with guns and wearing UNAMIR clothing and vests. Witness M was at a standpipe with other people, and had been there about one hour when the Accused arrived, wearing a military uniform, and stopped in front of the house of Shirakara Nishon. After he arrived, Witness M saw the Accused giving the guns he had brought to the Interahamwe, and saw him give a gun to a man named Muzehe. Witness M said the Accused sent his driver, Francois, to look for Interahamwe to whom the guns would be distributed. He said the guns were short black rifles, which he saw himself, and he said he knew the men were Interahamwe because the person leading them was the vice-president of the Interahamwe and they were wearing the clothing of the MRND party. He said that the Accused told the Interahamwe to kill the Tutsi and if they did not, he would bring in a tank to exterminate them all. Witness M said he was eight to ten meters a way from the vehicle and that the Accused, whom he identified in court, was speaking in a loud voice.

182. Witness M said that the killing began that afternoon. After hearing the Accused say that the Tutsi should be killed, Witness M went back to where he was staying. In the afternoon, Muzehe shot Nyamugambo, the person who had provided refuge to Witness M, with the gun he had received from the Accused and then he came to loot the house. Witness M heard Muzehe say to an Interahamwe who was with him that he was going to tell the Accused that he had already started the job, and Muzehe left directly to go towards the Accused. Witness M was not able to hear what was said thereafter because he fled immediately. He stated that Muzehe did not kill him immediately because Muzehe was his friend and a taxi driver for whom he was a client. According to Witness M, of the 31 people who took refuge in Nyamugambo's house prior to the 15 April, the others were all killed by the Interahamwe. He said he knew they died because he hadn't seen them since. Witness M subsequently sought refuge with Alexander Murego, whose house was nearby, and he stayed in this house until the end of the war, during which his parents were killed.

183. On cross-examination, Defence counsel questioned the circumstances in which Witness M went to the CHK. The witness stated that he went alone and that all those in the house with him separated when they fled. Defence counsel questioned the date on which Witness M saw the Accused, which he testified had been 15 April. In the pre-trial written statement dated December 4, 1995, the date had been recorded as 16 April. The witness maintained that it was 15 April when he saw the Accused. The Defence pointed out to the witness that on direct examination he had testified that he was with five to ten people at the standpipe, whereas his written statement had indicated that eighty people were there, and that while he testified that the date on which he left his house for refuge was 7 April, the pre-trial written statement indicated this date as 9 April. Witness M affirmed that there were eighty people at the standpipe as he had said in the pre-trial statement. He maintained that he left his house on 7 April, suggesting that it may have been written down incorrectly.

184. The Defence also challenged Witness M to explain why he had testified that he went to the standpipe to get water, while the pre-trial written statement indicates that he said he went to the standpipe to get guns, which he heard would be handed out for protection of the Tutsi. Witness M affirmed that he went to get guns as stated in his pre-trial statement and he said he thought he had testified to this on direct examination. Defence counsel pointed out that Witness M's statement says that when he reached the standpipe the Accused had already arrived, whereas in his testimony Witness M said that he had been there for an hour when the Accused arrived. Defence counsel questioned Witness M as to how he knew that the people with the Accused were Interahamwe. He said he knew a number of them and that they were the ones carrying guns and killing. Witness M was also questioned on his testimony that they were wearing UNAMIR clothing, which he said he had heard had been taken from the Belgian soldiers who were killed.

185. Witness M reaffirmed on cross-examination that he heard the Accused say to the Interahamwe that they should go and kill the Tutsi or he would bring tanks to exterminate them. He was asked why he had not mentioned having heard this in his pre-trial statement, and he indicated that the statement he made at that time had been limited, whereas the Tribunal had not limited him and asked him for many more facts. He affirmed that the statement made by the Accused was the immediate provocation to begin killings. When asked how he could have forgotten to mention such an important statement, he said his memory was not good.

186. Defence counsel questioned Witness M on a number of other details relating to the incident. In response to the question of whether or not Muzehe was armed before he received a weapon from the Accused, Witness M stated that he did not remember well, that he had given approximate dates and numbers, and that his statement had been made a long time ago. He again reviewed details of the event, stating that the eighty people present were crowded but not too closely, and reaffirming the details of his earlier testimony of the killing of Nyamugambo and that he witnessed this killing.

187. Witness U testified that after the death of the President, the Interahamwe began killing in Nyarugenge. After two days, he left his home because of the killing. He said the Interahamwe stopped him and others with him, arrested them and took them to a place where they were killing people. According to Witness U, soldiers from the Kigali camp arrived at around 2:30 p.m. to calm down the situation. They told the Interahamwe to stop killing, which they did briefly, and the soldiers went back to their camp. Afterwards, Witness U said that the Accused arrived, driving a pickup truck which was filled with firearms and machetes which he himself saw. Witness U stated that he knew the Accused because he had a shop in the business district which sold beer. Witness U said the Accused distributed the weapons to the Interahamwe and ordered them to work, and the Accused said there was a lot of dirt that needed to be cleaned up. The Accused remained there with a rifle which he had over his shoulder.

188. Seeing this, Witness U said he left the place because they had started killing the people who remained. He hid in bushes below a nearby garage, which appeared to the Chamber to be the Amgar garage. At this time it was 3:00 p.m. and there was no one at the garage. Witness U then saw the Accused arrive, with many other Interahamwe who seemed to be his guards. Witness U estimated that they were approximately thirty in number. Witness U was very near the garage and said he could see clearly through the bush. He said the Accused spoke loudly as there were many people, and Witness U was able to hear. Witness U said this incident took place just below the garage. He said he did not know the name of the owner of the garage. Witness U left the bushes and went further down. When he turned around he saw that they were killing people with machetes and throwing them in the hole.

189. On cross examination, Witness U was asked how he knew the Accused, how often he had seen him and where. The witness replied that he used to see the Accused in Kigali, in his shop or when he passed by on the way to meetings. He said he knew the Accused was President of the Interahamwe from the radio and from the meetings, and the fact that he took the floor at the meetings and spoke on the radio. On further questioning regarding how he knew the Accused to be President of the Interahamwe and the relationship between the MRND and the Interahamwe, Witness U said he had heard the Accused on the radio encouraging people to kill one another but that this was before the war.

190. When questioned on the distribution of weapons he witnessed, Witness U affirmed that this event took place two days after the President's plane was shot down. When confronted by Defence counsel with his pre-trial written statement, which recorded him as having said that the distribution took place on a Friday at the end of April 1994, he said he did not remember telling investigators that it was at the end of April. He said the day Agakingiro was attacked was the same day the weapons were distributed and the killings took place.

191. Witness U affirmed having said to investigators that he hid near the Accused's garage. When Defence counsel recalled that on direct examination he had said he did not know whose garage it was he hid near, he affirmed having said that he did not know the owner of the garage. Defence counsel elicited further detail from the witness on the circumstances prior to the arrival of the Accused in a pickup with weapons, and the witness affirmed that soldiers told the Interahamwe, who he said were from Kimisagara and Cyahafi, to stop killing. He stated that the soldiers did not seize the weapons and left the Interahamwe armed.

192. Witness T testified that he was a neighbour of the Accused in Cyahafi sector, and that he knew him. He said that the killings that started after the death of the President on 6 April did not reach Cyahafi until late April because there was a group of Abakombozi, people from the Parti Social Democrate ("PSD"), defending the sector from Interahamwe from neighboring sectors. He said that around the time of 24 April, the Interahamwe attacked the Abakombozi and the killings started at around 5 p.m. He said the Interahamwe used guns in the attack. Witness T said that the Accused was present during the attack and had a red pick-up in which he brought weapons. He said that the Accused was standing in the vehicle and at that time the Tutsis and Hutus were separated and that when the killings were taking place, the Accused was sitting in the vehicle. He had an Uzzi gun, and Uzzi guns were being used for the killings. Witnes T said there were guns in the pick-up and that the Accused distributed some of them and the rest stayed in the pick-up. He said the Accused was assisted by the senior Interahamwe in the neighborhood, including Francois, the President of the Interahamwe in Cyahafi. He said the Accused gave the weapons to the President of the Interahamwe, who in turn distributed them. He said the Interahamwe gave weapons to those in the neighborhood who did not have any. On cross-examination, Witness T was asked about the weapons that he saw the Accused distribute, and specifically whether there pistols or only guns. He replied that the only type of weapon brought by the Accused was the Uzzi, although the Interahamwe may have gotten pistols from elsewhere.

193. Witness Q also stated that the Accused distributed firearms. Responding to questions from the Judges on the connection between the Accused and the Interahamwe, Witness Q testified that the Accused was a leader of the Interahamwe and cited the fact that he was the one who distributed firearms and ordered the distribution of firearms. Witness Q also stated that everyone said that the Accused was distributing weapons at the Commune level. Witness Q was not cross-examined on this statement.

Factual Findings

194. Witness J and Witness M both testified about a distribution of firearms which took place in mid-April in Cyahafi Sector, Nyarugenge Commune. The Chamber found Witness J to be credible. He was consistent in his testimony on cross-examination and provided reasonable responses to the questions raised on cross-examination with regard to inconsistencies between his testimony and his pre-trial statement. Witness M, however, stated on cross-examination, that his memory had been affected by the events he had witnessed. The Chamber considers the testimony of Witness M to be unreliable with respect to details, particularly on dates, time, numbers and the sequence of events. The inconsistencies which arose in his testimony during cross-examination as well as the inconsistencies between his testimony and his pre-trial written statement are of a material nature in some cases. Although parts of his evidence are corroborated by the evidence of Witness J, other parts are materially inconsistent with the evidence of Witness J. Although the Chamber found Witness M to be a credible witness in that he made a sincere effort truthfully to recall what he saw and heard, and readily acknowledged his memory lapses, the Chamber considers that it cannot rely on the testimony of Witness M in its findings. The Chamber found Witness U, Witness T and Witness Q to be credible in their testimonies.

195. The Chamber notes that the testimony of the Accused and Witness DDD indicates that the Accused did leave his house on 8 April, and that he was in Kigali at the Amgar office on 15 April and on 24 April. His defence to the allegations set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment is a bare denial. The Chamber notes that under cross-examination, the Defence did not suggest to the Prosecution witnesses that the Accused had not participated in the distribution of weapons, or that he was not present at Nyarugenge Commune on 8, 15 and 24 April 1994. Further the Defence did not produce any witnesses to confirm an alibi by testifying that the Accused was elsewhere when the events described by the Prosecution witnesses took place, as he does in respect of other allegations in the Indictment. A number of Defence witnesses testified that the Accused was very busy selling beer after his return to Kigali on 14 April, but the Chamber considers that selling beer would not have precluded the Accused from also engaging in the distribution of guns as alleged by the Prosecutor. For these reasons, the Chamber considers that the Defence has not provided evidence which effectively refutes the evidence presented by the Prosecutor in support of the allegations set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment.

196. The Chamber finds that on 15 April 1994 in the afternoon, the Accused arrived in a pick-up truck, with a driver and two men in the back, at a public standpipe in Cyahafi Sector, Nyarugenge Commune. In the back of the pickup truck were guns. The Accused got out of the vehicle, opened the back of the truck, and the men in the back distributed the guns to Interahamwe, including Bizimungo, Ziad, Muzehe, Cyuma and Polisi, while the Accused stood by. A crowd of people, including Witness J, had been gathered together at the standpipe by a policeman named Munyawara before the arrival of the Accused. Immediately following the distribution of the guns, Muzehe shot Rusagara, who died on the spot, and the shooting continued. Kalinda Viater and Musoni Emmanuel were shot by Muzehe and Bizimungo and fell immediately. All of the men shot were Tutsi. The crowd did not immediately disperse when the guns were distributed because they had been led to believe the Interahamwe who had received the weapons would protect them.

197. The Chamber finds that on the afternoon of 8 April 1994, the Accused arrived in a pickup truck at a place in Nyarugenge where the Interahamwe had been taking and killing people from the Commune. The pickup truck was filled with firearms and machetes, which the Accused distributed to the Interahamwe. He ordered them to work and said that there was a lot of dirt that needed to be cleaned up. The Accused was armed with a rifle slung over his shoulder and a machete hanging from his belt.

198. The Chamber finds that on or about 24 April in Cyahafi sector, the Accused distributed Uzzi guns to the president of the Interahamwe of Cyahafi during an attack by the Interahamwe on the Abakombozi.

199. In its findings on these three incidents, the Chamber notes certain common features. In each case, the Accused arrived in a pick-up truck with guns, which he distributed or had distributed, to Interahamwe in Nyarugenge Commune. The distribution of these weapons was immediately followed by the killing of people who, in at least two of the incidents, had been gathered together at these places prior to the arrival of the Accused.

200. The Chamber notes that the dates of the three incidents - 8 April, 15 April, and 24 April - vary from the date on or about 6 April, which is set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment[75]. The phrase "on or about" indicates an approximate time frame, and the testimonies of the witnesses date the events within the month of April. The Chamber does not consider these variances to be material or to have prejudiced the Accused. The Accused had ample opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. In reviewing the allegation set forth in this paragraph of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that the date is not of the essence. The essence of the allegation is that the Accused distributed weapons in this general time period.

4.2. Paragraph 11 of the Indictment

201. Paragraph 11 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "On or about 10 April 1994, Georges Rutaganda stationed Interahamwe members at a roadblock near his office at the "Amgar" garage in Kigali. Shortly after he left the area, the Interahamwe members started checking identity cards of people passing the roadblock. The Interahamwe members ordered persons with Tutsi cards to stand on one side of the road. Eight of the Tutsis were then killed. The victims included men, women and an infant who had been carried on the back of one of the women".

202. The Chamber is of the opinion that for the sake of clarity with respect to its findings on the events alleged in paragraph 11 of the Indictment, it is necessary to discuss successively the events relating to:

- Firstly, the fact that Georges Rutaganda stationed Interahamwe members at a roadblock near the Amgar garage;

- Secondly, the fact that the Interahamwe members checked the identity cards of people passing the roadblock and ordered persons with Tutsi cards to stand on one side of the road; and

- Thirdly, the fact that eight Tutsis were then killed and the victims included men, women and an infant who had been carried on the back of one of the women.

Regarding the fact that Georges Rutaganda stationed Interahamwe members at a roadblock near the "Amgar" garage:

203. The Chamber is of the opinion that as far as the above allegation is concerned, the Prosecutor must not only prove that a roadblock or a barrier was erected near the Amgar garage and manned by Interahamwe members but also that the Accused himself had stationed Interahamwe members there.

204. Prosecution Witnesses AA and HH identified in the slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 144, the location where the roadblock obstructing traffic was mounted, the location of the traffic lights and, on the left of the same slide, the wall of the Amgar Garage. According to the Prosecutor, the Amgar garage was located at the boundary of the Cyahafi secteur, in the Nyarugenge Commune, Préfecture of Kigali-ville. The main entrance to the garage opened onto the Avenue de la Justice where the said roadblock had allegedly been erected and which was indeed the location that witnesses AA and HH had identified as the location of the roadblock.

205. Witness HH, a Tutsi man, testified before the Chamber under direct examination that the roadblock near the Amgar garage was manned by members of the Interahamwe whom he could recognized by the Interahamwe uniform they wore, made out of red, yellow and green kitenge material, which was similar to the MRND party flag. During his cross-examination, the Defence asked Witness HH to explain the inconsistencies between his testimony and the statement he made to the investigators, as recorded in the transcripts of his questioning, to the effect that the roadblock was manned by soldiers. Witness HH replied that some Interahamwe dressed like soldiers.

206. Witness HH also testified before the Chamber that the young people manning the roadblock and with whom he had been in touch, had told him that the roadblock in front of Amgar was "Georges'". Witness HH, stated that he had been hiding near the Amgar garage and as a result witnessed what took place at that roadblock. He testified that he saw the Accused come to the said roadblock many times, often in a Peugeot pick-up. According to Witness HH, the roadblock was the Accused's, indeed, like all roadblocks in Kigali and Rwanda, which were all under his control.

207. Witness HH also testified before the Tribunal that, on 20 May 1994, the Interahamwe had closed the road on which the said roadblock was erected. Witness HH asserted that he witnessed the arrival of the Accused at the roadblock around 9:00 a.m. According to HH, the Accused ordered the Interahamwe to open the road and they complied.

208. Prosecution Witness AA testified that, up until 18 April 1994, the road in front of Amgar Garage, like the neighbourhood, was controlled by the inhabitants of Agakingiro (Cyahafi). The people had erected a roadblock on that road which the Interahamwe destroyed on 18 April 1994. According to Witness AA, after the Interahamwe had attacked the neighbourhood and taken control of it, the Accused had a new roadblock erected in front of the gate to his garage. That roadblock was solidly built, with beer cases and wreckage from cars spanning the entire width of the road.

209. Witness AA stated that among the Interahamwe who used to come to the roadblocks, some were dressed in military uniforms while others wore Interahamwe uniforms.

210. According to Witness AA, the Accused was a famous man and the Amgar Garage, which belonged to him, was referred to at the time as a venue for the Interahamwe. According to the witness, people even spoke of "Rutaganda's soldiers"at that time.

211. Prosecution Witness T testified that soldiers of the Rwandan Armed Forces had erected a roadblock on the paved road, by a kiosk, near the Agakingiro market. Once resistance waned in Cyahafi, towards the end of April, that roadblock was then controlled by the Interahamwe, who took over from the soldiers, who had gone to the frontline.

212. Prosecution Witness BB testified that he was arrested at the roadblock near the Accused's home. There were more than 10 people there, some of whom wore items of military uniform and others the Interahamwe uniform. BB explained, however, that none of those people was a real soldier. Some wore berets, with the sign of a pruning hook and a small hoe, identifying them as belonging to the Interahamwe. They were armed with guns, clubs, pangas, hammers, and knives. Witness BB stated that the Interahamwe had told him that their leaders were Robert Kajuga and Georges Rutaganda. The people manning the roadblocks said they would not kill anyone without prior instruction from Robert Kajuga or Georges Rutaganda.

213. Three defence witnesses confirmed that there was a roadblock in front of Amgar Garage. Witnesses DSS and DF stated that a roadblock had been mounted in front of Amgar Garage from 9 April 1994. According to Witness DD, the roadblock was erected from 7 April 1994 and was located about ten metres away from the garage, close to the traffic lights on Avenue de la Justice.

214. Witness DD testified that the people manning that roadblock were "bandits". He explained that some of them were armed, but that he saw neither uniforms nor any other signs suggesting that they were members of the Interahamwe. Witness DD also saw no distinctive signs or symbols that identified the people manning the roadblock with any political group whatsoever.

Regarding the matter of the Interahamwe checking the identity cards of persons who passed through the roadblock and ordering persons whose identity cards indicated they were Tutsi to stand on one side of the road:

215. Prosecution Witness HH testified that he passed the roadblock on 8 April 1994. He stated that people crossing the roadblock had to show their identity cards and also raise their hands so that their pockets could be checked for grenades. According to Witness HH, the people manning the roadblock shot at persons whose identity cards indicated they were Tutsi. Witness HH testified before the Chamber that he managed to cross that roadblock despite the fact that he was Tutsi because he was in the middle of a crowd and he was carrying his identity card at arm's length so that his pockets could be searched.

216. During cross-examination, the Defence asked Witness HH to explain an apparent difference between his testimony and a pre-trial statement he made to the Prosecution investigators. Witness HH had told the investigators that he passed through the roadblock without showing his identity card because there was a crowd of people around.

217. Witness HH added that from the location where he was hiding near the roadblock, he had heard the Accused tell the Interahamwe manning the roadblock to check the identity cards very well. Witness HH specified that when the Interahamwe saw a card with the reference "Tutsi", they took the holder into a house nearby. According to HH, people were arrested in this way every day.

218. Prosecution Witness AA testified that, at the time of the alleged events, the roadblocks, including the one near Amgar Garage, were used by the Interahamwe to "do their job", which, according to AA, meant to arrest Tutsis or other persons and to strip them of their belongings. According to AA, to pass a roadblock, one had to show one's identity card or other document that indicated the holder's identity.

219. Prosecution Witness BB testified that he was arrested at the roadblock near the residence of the Accused where he was asked to produce his identity card. According to BB, when the Interahamwe who manned the roadblock realized that he was Tutsi, they told him that they had received orders that very day to present anyone who had been apprehended at the roadblock to their president or vice-president. Two Interahamwe, one of whom carried a gun and the other grenades, removed his shoes and took him to the Accused at Amgar Garage. BB was then allegedly beaten by one of the Interahamwe. According to BB, the Accused then left and returned a little later and asked why BB who was Tutsi had not been killed. BB than held the Accused by the leg of his pants and asked him why he had not yet allowed the Interahamwe to kill him. BB testified that the Accused then kicked him and sent him away to do some work, gathering dirt in some area close by.

220. Under cross-examination, Witness BB acknowledged that upon his arrival at Amgar, when he was taken to the Accused, he was given tea because he was very weak. BB also admitted that a servant had brought him food. He then explained that it was indeed after he had been given the tea and food that the Accused had kicked him.

221. Defence Witness DD testifed that he could not confirm that the people manning the roadblock in front of Amgar Garage checked identity cards. He stated that he did not see anyone being taken aside and made to stand on one side of the road. Defence Witnesses DD, DDD and DNN testified that identity cards were checked at the roadblocks in order to identify RPF "infiltrators".

Regarding the fact that eight Tutsis had been killed, including men, women and an infant on the back of one of the women:

222. Prosecution Witness HH testified that immediately after crossing the roadblock, he had heard the sound of gunfire as he ran away; he had turned around and seen dead bodies on the ground. Witness HH testified before the Chamber that they were eight of them including, children, men and women. One of the women who fell was carrying an infant on her back. Witness HH testified further that the youths manning the roadblock later gave him protection. They told him that they had killed men, women and children.

223. Under cross-examination, Witness HH initially testified that on crossing the roadblock, he had not paid attention to whether the identity cards of people in the crowd were being checked. In reply to the Judges' question as to the material discrepancy between his testimony under direct examination and his statement under cross-examination, Witness HH stated that Tutsis who appeared at the roadblock were detained there.

224. Prosecution Witness AA, after testifying that the Interahamwe stopped Tutsis or anyone else at roadblocks to strip them of their belongings, explained that when people were arrested, they were led away and the sound of gunfire could then be heard close to Amgar.

Factual Findings

225. Based on corroborated testimonies, the Chamber finds that as from an unspecified date in mid-April, a roadblock was erected by Interahamwe on the Avenue de la Justice near a traffic light not far from the entrance to the Amgar Garage at the Cyahafi Sector boundary, in Nyarugenge Commune of the Kigali-ville Préfecture. The Chamber holds that, at the said roadblock, the Interahamwe checked the identity cards of those who crossed it and detained those who carried identity cards bearing the "Tutsi" ethnic reference or were otherwise considered as "Tutsi" because they had stated that they were not in possession of an identity card. However, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has not led evidence to the effect that the Interahamwe manning the roadblock had been stationed there by the Accused. Hence, the Chamber finds that it has not been proven beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused stationed Interhamwe members at the said roadblock.

226. With respect to the allegation regarding the killing of eight Tutsis, including men, women and an infant carried on her back by one of the women, the Chamber notes that just one witness - Witness HH - had testified to those specific events. However, it notes that the Prosecution Witness HH was unable to provide a convincing explanation of the material inconsistencies, identified by the Defence, in his testimony before the Chamber and his earlier statement to the Prosecution investigators, as recorded. Accordingly, the Chamber has decided to disregard his testimony. Since the Prosecutor had not called any other witness, apart from Witness HH, to testify to such events, the Chamber finds that the allegation regarding the killing of eight Tutsis has not been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

4.3 Paragraph 12 of the Indictment

227. Paragraph 12 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "In April 1994, on a date unknown, Tutsis who had been separated at a roadblock in front of the Amgar garage were taken to Georges RUTAGANDA and questioned by him. He thereafter directed that these Tutsis be detained with others at a nearby building. Later, Georges RUTAGANDA directed men under his control to take 10 Tutsi detainees to a deep, open hole near the Amgar garage. On Georges RUTAGANDA's orders, his men killed the 10 Tutsis with machetes and threw their bodies into the hole."

Regarding the allegations that on a date unknown, in April 1994, Tutsis who had been separated at a roadblock in front of the Amgar garage were taken to Georges Rutaganda and questioned by him. He thereafter directed that they be detained with others at a nearby building:

228. The Chamber notes that the said allegation follows the allegations contained in paragraph 11 of the Indictment. The Chamber, in its findings supra on the allegations set forth in paragraph 11, held that a roadblock had indeed been erected by the Interahamwe on Avenue de la Justice, near a traffic light, not far from the entrance to the Amgar Garage, at the Cyahafi sector boundary in Nyarugenge Commune.

229. Prosecution Witness BB testified before the Chamber that he was arrested at the roadblock near the residence of the Accused because he was a Tutsi. There were many people there, some of whom wore items of military uniform, while others were clad in Interahamwe uniform. According to Witness BB, the people at the roadblock said that they would kill no person without prior instruction from Robert Kajuga or Georges Rutaganda. When they realized that BB was Tutsi, the Interahamwe told him that they had received orders that very day to take anyone apprehended at the roadblock to "the president or vice-president". Two Interahamwe, one of whom carried a gun and the other grenades, removed his shoes.

230. They took him to a location which Witness BB identified on the slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 145 as the Amgar garage. Witness BB was taken to the Accused in his office . An Interahamwe hit him. The Accused left the office and returned later. Witness BB testified that he held the Accused by the leg of his trousers and asked him why he had not yet allowed the Interahamwe to kill him. Witness BB testified that he begged for mercy but the Accused kicked him and sent him away to do some work, gathering dirt in a place where a cellar was under construction. Witness BB explained that the Accused had forced him to work on the cellar construction site without payment. In his opinion, he was therefore a slave of the Accused's. Witness BB testified that he stayed at Amgar until Kigali was captured by the RPF because he could no longer move about as he had thrown his identity card in some latrine.

231. Under cross-examination, Witness BB explained that the cellar was not under construction but that they were actually assigned to demolish part of a wall to create an entrance into the cellar from the Amgar garage. Witness BB also admitted that a mason had been hired to do the work and that the people, including himself, who were involved in such work were not prisoners, but mere workmen. Witness BB stated that there were no prisoners at that time and that, in fact, there were ordinary workmen who went home in the evenings.

232. Moreover, under cross-examination, when asked by the Defence to explain why, if the Accused had been the leader of a group of killers, BB had chosen to stay at the Accused's place rather than to move about and had found it safer to do so, Witness BB stated that he could not provide any explanation to that.

233. Prosecution Witness T who had testified that, at the time of the alleged events, he lived near Amgar garage, indicated that a neighbour of his, a Tutsi man, told him that, for a while, he was forced to live inside Amgar garage. Around the end of May 1994, that man was killed. That same day, Witness T, his brother and their employee were arrested. The latter two men were also killed.

234. Prosecution Witness Q testified that, around 21 April 1994, he arrived at the Agakingiro roadblock where he was arrested because he did not have an identity card and because one of the people there, Vedaste Segatarama, had recognized him. Around 8 a.m., he was led into a garage, together with three other people who had also been detained at the roadblock because they had been identified as Tutsis on the basis of their identity cards.

235. Witness Q testified that he had not been to that garage before. He identified it before the Chamber on the slide which had been tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 145.

236. Witness Q stated that he was led, along with the three other Tutsis who had also been arrested, into the Chief's office. He testified before the Chamber that he recognized the office of the Accused to which he had been taken on the slide that had been filed as exhibit 149. They were introduced to the Accused, who ordered that they be locked up in the prison because they were Inyenzi. Witness Q explained that, in that office, the people who had been arrested were undergoing some kind of registration.

237. According to Witness Q, the prison where they were detained was in an Indian temple with the inscription "Hindi Mandal". He recognized it on a slide, tendered as exhibit 165. Witness Q stated that the temple was full, with about two hundred people. Only a small room, located behind the building and used for storage, was not full. Witness Q said that he was there for some three hours. The Accused then returned and said that 10 people should be taken out.

238. Defence Witnesses DD, DF and DDD testified before the Chamber that, in April, the Accused continued to sell beer within the premises of the Amgar garage. Witness DD stated that he knew the people who had come to take refuge at Amgar. According to Witness DF people of various ethnic groups had been given refuge at Amgar, and no one was held against his or her will. Both Witnesses DD and DF testified that they saw no prisoners at Amgar. However, Witness DD explained that he did not go around the property to check.

239. Defence Witness DS testified that he remained with the Accused at Amgar from 14 April to 27 May 1994. Throughout that period, he never saw any prisoners or anyone being mistreated.

240. Defence Witness DEE stayed at Amgar from 14 to 17 April 1994. She explained that she was not the only Tutsi there. She knew some of the other Tutsis there. Of the Tutsis she did not know, she was told that they were hiding at Amgar. Witness DEE testified that she never saw any prisoners during her stay at Amgar, nor did she see anyone beaten, tortured or killed.

Regarding the allegations that Georges Rutaganda later directed men under his control to take 10 Tutsi detainees to a deep, open hole near the Amgar garage, and that upon his orders, his men had killed the 10 Tutsis with machetes and thrown their bodies into the hole:

241. Prosecution Witness BB identified on the slide tendered as exhibit 169, a site located between the ETM and the Accused's garage, where according to him the Tutsis were killed. According to Witness BB, at the time of the events referred to in the Indictment, there was a metal sheet wall near the blue fence located at the back to the right. It was at that spot that the Tutsis had been shot.

242. Prosecution Witness Q testified that after spending approximately three hours in the Indian temple, he was brought out, on the orders of the Accused, who had ordered that 10 people be taken outside. Witness Q stated that he himself, the three people who had been arrested with him at the roadblock and 10 other detainees were led away, around 10 or 11 a.m., to a pit, by men acting on the orders of the Accused. The pit was behind the garage, where there was a house with a tiled roof and a fence. Witness Q identified the metal sheet fence on a slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 156. He recognized the location of the pit on the slide as exhibit 172, explaining that the metal item pictured on the slide was not there at the time of the events alleged.

243. At the said pit, the 14 persons were made to sit down in a hole, the location of which Witness Q recognized on a slide, tendered as exhibit 168, and ordered to look down. The people who had taken them to the pit then asked the Accused, who was present at the site, whether to use guns or machetes to kill them. The Accused allegedly told them "to kill with guns, is a waste of bullets." Witness Q stated that the people who had taken them to the pit then started to kill with machetes. At that point he bowed his head and then he lost consciousness upon seeing two persons die.

244. During cross-examination, the Defence asked Witness Q to explain why his statement to the investigators reflected that he had fainted after one man had killed three persons and a second person had killed three others. Witness Q confirmed before the Chamber that he fainted after two persons had been killed. He asserted that he had made the same statement to the investigators.

245. According to Witness Q, after those two persons had been put to death, the other four persons still alive, including himself, were made to get up and bury them. Witness Q testified before the Chamber that at that point he had no strength left and the Accused spared him and another man. The Accused kicked Witness Q and told him to leave, and told him that he would be killed on the day of Habyarimana's burial.

246. During cross-examination, the Defence asked Witness Q to explain the disparity between his testimony before the Tribunal and his earlier statement to the investigators. In the said statement, Witness Q had indicated that the Accused had ordered the four persons still alive to throw the bodies of the victims into the pit and that, once they had finished doing that, the Accused kicked Witness Q who further explained that he then left with the four other persons.

247. In reply to the question, Witness Q testified before the Chamber that he did not bury the people and that when the investigators had read out the statement to him before he signed it, it did not include any reference to the effect that he had buried the bodies.

248. Defence Witness DD testified that he knew about the pit behind the Amgar garage and that around 26 April 1994, the Accused had a closed sheet metal fence built in front of the pit. Defence Witness DF also testified that the Accused had a metal fence built to protect his beer stocks. The said fence had no door. Witness DF explained that it was impossible to hear what was going on behind the fence from the garage. According to Witness DF, he was not aware that killings were going on at that location, but explained, however, that after the fence had been built, he could not know what was happening there. He did not hear any gunshots from the said location, but rather from the valley behind the "Hindi Mandal" temple.

249. Defence Witness DEE testified that on 14 April 1994, the day he arrived at the Amgar garage, she saw a group of about 10 people including men, women and children there. She spoke to some of them and they told her that they had found refuge there. Witness DEE who was not sure where the others had come from, thought that they were the Accused's family members.

250. During the time that she was at Amgar, from 14 to 17 April 1994, DEE heard gunshots and grenade explosions, but she was not sure where they came from. She explained that she was pregnant and sick at the time and was often lying down.

Factual Findings

251. The Chamber finds that all the Prosecution witnesses who testified to the aforementioned allegations are credible, including Witnesses BB and Q, and consequently decides to admit their testimonies. Indeed, the Chamber is of the opinion that although under cross-examination the Defence pointed out some contradictions in the testimonies of Witnesses BB and Q, such contradictions are not of a material nature and do not vitiate the consistency of the substance of their testimonies, as to their account of the facts at issue in the instant case.

252. With respect to Witness Q in particular, the Chamber holds that the said contradictions can probably be attributed to the trauma he may have suffered from having to recount the painful events he witnessed and of which he was a victim. The Chamber stresses further that the time lapse between the events and the testimony of the witness must be taken into account in assessing the recollection of details.

253. Further, the Chamber recalls that the inconsistencies in the witnesses's testimonies and their pre-trial statements must be assessed in light of the difficulties inherent inter alia in interpreting the questions asked to the witnesses. It also important to note that these statements were not made under oath before a commissioner of oaths.

254. The Chamber notes that the testimonies of Defence Witnesses DD, DF, DS, DEE and DDD do not refute the fact that the Accused was in his office at the Amgar garage from 15 to 24 April 1994. Such testimonies were offered to prove that the Accused was transacting business at Amgar during that period. The Defence submitted that the Accused welcomed into Amgar refugees of diverse ethnic groups including Tutsis and that no one was held at Amgar against his or her will, nor mistreated, or tortured or killed. The Chamber considers that, in any case, these facts would not exclude the Accused's participation in the events alleged in paragraph 12 of the Indictment.

255. The Chamber notes, furthermore, that Witness Q identified the hole where the ten persons were killed and where their bodies were thrown on the slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 168. The Chamber observes that the said slide shows the site identified as RUG-1 by Professor William Haglund, a forensic anthropologist, who appeared as an expert witness for the Prosecution. According to Professor Haglund, who exhumed several sites near Amgar garage, three bodies were exhumed from the hole identified as site "RUG-1". Dr. Nizam Peerwani, a pathologist, who had worked jointly with Professor Haglund and who also appeared as an expert witness for the Prosecutor submitted the following findings on the three exhumed bodies: the first body was that of a man aged between 35 and 45 at the time of death, the probable cause of which was homicide; the second body was that of a woman, aged between 30 and 39 at the time of death, the probable cause of which was homicide; and the third body was that of a man, aged between 35 and 45 at the time of death, the probable cause of which was blunt force trauma.

256. Firstly, the Chamber, on the basis of the testimony by Dr. Kathleen Reich, a forensic anthropologist, called by the Defence as an expert witness, is not satisfied that the scientific method used by Professor Haglund is such as to allow the Chamber to rely on his findings in the determination of the case.

257. Secondly, and above all, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor failed to show a direct link between the findings of Professor Haglund and Dr. Peerwani and the specific allegations in the Indictment. Consequently, the Chamber holds that the findings of the said expert witnesses should not be admitted in the instant case.

258. Accordingly, the Chamber holds that the findings of the said expert witnesses do not help the Chamber determine the facts of the case. Moreover, the Chamber is not satisfied that the grave site referred to by Witness Q and the one exhumed by Professor Haglund are one and the same.

259. Thus, on the basis of the corroborating testimonies of Witnesses Q and BB, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that, in April 1994, Tutsis who had been separated at a roadblock in front of Amgar garage were taken to the office of the Accused inside Amgar garage. Based on the corroborating testimonies of Witnesses Q and T, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused ordered that the Tutsis thus brought to him be detained within the premises of the Amgar garage.

260. Based on the testimony of Witness Q, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that the Accused ordered men under his control to take fourteen detainees, including at least four Tutsis, to a deep hole located near Amgar garage and that on the orders of Georges Rutaganda and in his presence, his men killed ten of the said detainees with machetes. The bodies of the victims were thrown into the hole.

"On or about April 12, 1994, the survivors who were able to show that they were Hutu were permitted to leave the gravel pit. Tutsis who presented altered identity cards were immediately killed. Most of the remainder of the group were attacked and killed by grenades or shot to death. Those who tried to escape were attacked with machetes. Georges Rutaganda, among others, directed and participated in these attacks".

Events Alleged

266. Witness A, a Tutsi man who had worked for the Accused as a mason, testified that on 7 April 1994 he went with his wife and five children to the ETO, a kilometre away from his house, to seek refuge and protection because the UNAMIR troops were stationed there. Upon his arrival, he realized he had not brought any food or blankets and returned home for supplies, leaving his family in the ETO compound. According to Witness A, there were approximately six thousand refugees in the ETO compound, outside and inside the buildings. When Witness A returned that evening, after circumventing the Interahamwe he encountered outside, he was unable to re-enter the compound for there were too many people. He spent the night near the sports field of the ETO.

267. According to Witness A, the next day Colonel Leonides Rusatila arrived and asked the Hutus to separate themselves from the group. Thereafter approximately 600 to 1,000 Hutus left the compound. The witness testified that on 10 April 1994, UNAMIR troops left the compound, although the refugees begged them to stay, as the Interahamwe had already surrounded the ETO compound. The departure of the UNAMIR troops created panic among the refugees and caused many of them to leave the ETO entrance; as a result, Witness A was able to re-enter the compound where he was reunited with his family. The Interahamwe also came in at that time and mixed in with the crowd of refugees inside the building. According to Witness A, the refugees then decided to proceed together to the Amahoro stadium. They therefore left the ETO and headed in that direction but were diverted en route by soldiers at a roadblock. They were gathered together with their arms up over their heads, and ordered to lie on the ground. A soldier with a

4.4 Paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment

261. The charges set forth in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment are as follows.

262. Paragraph 13 reads as follows:

> "From April 7 to April 11, 1994, thousands of unarmed Tutsi men, women and children and some unarmed Hutus sought refuge at the École Technique Officielle "ETO school" in Kicukiro sector, Kicukiro Commune. The ETO school was considered a safe haven because Belgian soldiers, part of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda forces, were stationed there."

263. Paragraph 14 reads as follows:

> "On or about April 11, 1994, immediately after the Belgians withdrew from the ETO school, members of the Rwandan armed forces, the Gendarmerie and militia, including the Interahamwe, attacked the ETO school and, using machetes, grenades and guns, killed the people who had sought refuge there. The Interahamwe separated Hutus from Tutsis during the attack, killing the Tutsis. Georges Rutaganda participated in the attack at the ETO school, which resulted in the deaths of a large number of Tutsis."

264. Paragraph 15 reads as follows:

> "The men, women and children who survived the ETO school attack were forcibly transferred by Georges Rutaganda, members of the Interahamwe and soldiers to a gravel pit near the primary school of Nyanza. Presidential Guard members awaited their arrival. More Interahamwe members converged upon Nyanza from many directions and surrounded the group of survivors."

265. Paragraph 16 reads as follows:

megaphone then came to them and told them it was not a good idea to go to the stadium and suggested instead that they go to Nyanza, where he said they would be safe.

268. Thereupon, Witness A and his family headed for Nyanza in a group of approximately 4,500 persons, flanked on both sides by Interahamwe. According to the Witness, at this time the Interahamwe, armed with machetes, clubs, axes, spears, and nail studded metal sticks had started killing people along the way, threatening people, forcibly taking young girls, spitting on them and committing atrocities. Along the way, Witness A saw the Accused coming in the opposite direction from Nyanza in his vehicle. He pulled over to the side of the road, got out, and stood leaning against the vehicle. Witness A saw a mason who had worked for the Accused pleading him for help, but the Accused waved him away.

269. Upon arrival at Nyanza, Witness A saw the Accused again who was directing the Interahamwe into position to surround the refugees who had been gathered together in one spot. Armed soldiers had taken position on the hill overlooking this spot. A sack full of grenades was brought by a man, and Hutus were told to show their identity cards. These Hutus were allowed to leave. Some Tutsis who tried to pass for Hutus were killed on the spot by the Interahamwe who knew them, and others were forced back into the group. A grenade was then hurled into the crowd and the soldiers began to fire their guns. Those who tried to flee from the group were snatched back by the Interahamwe surrounding them. Witness A saw the child his wife was carrying on her back blown off by a grenade. He was shot and fell to the ground, still holding another of his children in his arms. Others fell on top of him.

270. When the shooting stopped, Witness A heard the soldiers tell the Interahamwe to go to work, and the latter proceeded to kill people with clubs and other types of weapons. They also singled out some girls and put them aside. According to the witness they "had their way" with these girls and then killed them. Most of the women killed were stripped of their clothing, "so that Tutsi women could be seen naked." The Interahamwe continued to "have their way" until they left satisfied at around 11 p.m. Witness A's wife and four of his children were killed in this attack. His five year old child, whom he had shielded in his arms, sustained injuries from a grenade explosion. According to Witness A, when the Interahamwe returned the next day at dawn, he pretended to be dead. His injured arm was stepped on and he was hit on the head with a sharp object to see if he was alive, but he did not move. He spent that day, which he testified was Tuesday 12 April, at that spot, while the Interahamwe looted the bodies. In the morning of 13 April, RPF soldiers came and took him and other survivors away. Witness A testified that there were approximately two hundred survivors.

271. During the cross-examination, Defence counsel challenged the testimony of Witness A as being inconsistent with his prior statement dated 7 December 1995 made to OTP investigators. He had stated that he had three children, all of whom had died in the attack. When asked about his prior statement as to the number of children he had the witness maintained that four of his children had died in the attack and that only one had survived. He testified that he had no interest in saying there was a survivor among his children if they had all been killed.

272. Witness A was also asked about which radio station he was listening to on the morning of 7 April 1994. On direct examination he had testified that on that day he had tuned in to RTLM. The Witness explained that he generally listened to RTLM but that on that particular morning he had tuned in to Radio Rwanda. He further testified that RTLM broadcast only in the afternoon and that he had also learnt about the death of the President on RTLM on 7 April 1994 in the afternoon. Defence counsel also asked him how he had managed to listen to the radio, as he had testified that he did not own a radio. The witness explained that he listened to the radio at his neighbour's house.

273. The Defence also asked the witness whether he knew the Accused well. The witness answered that he had never spoken to the Accused but had known him for six years, having seen him many times and having worked for him. Through further examination, Defence elicited additional details with respect to Witness A's earlier testimony regarding such matters as there being other persons with the Accused in his vehicle and the Accused positioning the Interahamwe at Nyanza.

274. Witness H, a Tutsi man from Kicukiro, testified that his house was attacked and searched in February 1994 by Interahamwe, armed with clubs, who had arrived shortly before a vehicle. Witness H was told that General Karangwa and the Accused, who owned the vehicle, were inside it. The Witness said that the Accused was his neighbour and lived 600 metres from his house. He knew the Accused as a businessman who imported beer, and he also knew him as the vice-president of the Interahamwe. When the killings began after the plane crash on 6 April, Witness H took his family to the ETO school, for their protection, where UNAMIR troops told them to come inside the compound. He stated that there were 3,500 to 4,000 refugees at the ETO, some of whom were in buildings but most of whom were on the sports field where Witness H was. The witness testified that the Interahamwe, armed with guns, grenades and other weapons, came and surrounded the ETO, but that they did not attack because they were afraid of the UNAMIR troops.

275. On 11 April 1994, Witness H saw the UNAMIR troops packing up to leave. A group of refugees, including the Witness, positioned themselves in front of a UNAMIR vehicle and begged the troops to stay, but they would not. According to Witness H, once UNAMIR left the ETO compound, the Interahamwe immediately entered and proceeded to attack, firing guns and hurling grenades. At that time, Witness H saw the Accused with Gerard Karangwa, the President of the Interahamwe at the commune level. According to the Witness, as an Interahamwe official at the national level, the Accused ranked higher than Karangwa. They were in the group in front of him, and the group began throwing grenades and firing. The Witness saw the Accused before the shots were fired.

276. Witness H testified that he left the ETO with others and headed for the Amahoro stadium which he thought would be safe as it was under RPF control. En route, they were stopped by the Interahamwe and led to a road where they found soldiers who ordered them to sit down on the road. Thereafter, a military commander came and told them that he was taking them to Nyanza where he could ensure their safety. Led by Colonel Rusatila and surrounded on both sides by soldiers and Interahamwe, the group of refugees was escorted to Nyanza. Along the way, the Interahamwe, who were armed with machetes, grenades, spears and other weapons, beat and threatened the refugees. Of the four thousand refugees, many were injured en route to Nyanza. Witness H saw the Accused on the way to Nyanza, at the Kicukiro centre. The Accused was in a separate group talking to a number of people, including Mr. Kagina, a teacher at the ETO school whom he knew to be a member of the Interahamwe. When they arrived at Nyanza, the Interahamwe and the soldiers ordered the refugees to stop and to sit down. The Hutus were told to identify themselves and to stand up. They showed their identity cards and were told to leave. Thereafter, grenades were thrown and shots fired at the group. Witness H managed to escape and hide under a small bush sixty metres away. From that location, the witness heard shots and cries of pain. When the soldiers ran out of grenades and bullets, they asked the Interahamwe to begin killing people with knives. The killing lasted for more than an hour. Witness H heard the soldiers tell the Interahamwe to look around for people who were not dead yet and finish them off. Witness H testified that he did not see the Accused at Nyanza. He had waited until nightfall, and then fled to Kicikuro.

277. Under cross-examination, Witness H confirmed that he had been at the ETO compound from 7 to 11 April. The Defence asked Witness H whether he had met Interahamwe on the way to the ETO, to which he replied that he had seen several groups of Interahamwe carrying weapons, but that they had not prevented him from going to the ETO. The Defence also asked Witness H to state specifically where he was located on the ETO sports field, the number of UNAMIR troops and their location. Witness H stated that he had moved around on the sports field during his stay at the ETO. He testified that the UNAMIR troops were camped near the sports field. When questioned on the activities of the Interahamwe before the soldiers left, and the circumstances of his departure from the ETO, Witness H stated that while he was at the ETO the Interahamwe did launch small-scale attacks, which were repelled by the UNAMIR troops.

278. Defence counsel also asked Witness H how the refugees reacted to being diverted from the road to Amahoro stadium towards Nyanza, whether they believed what they had been told about their safety, how they felt, his location within the crowd of refugees, en route to Nyanza, and the location of the bush at Nyanza where he hid during the attack on the refugees as well as the location of the Interahamwe and the soldiers during that attack. To those and related questions from the Defence, Witness H replied by providing additional information that had remained unclear under direct examination.

279. Witness DD, a Tutsi man who was a high school student in 1994, testified that he was a neighbour of the Accused and also knew him as the vice-president of the Interahamwe. When he learned of the death of the President, Witness DD and his family fled to the ETO for refuge because the UNAMIR troops were there and they thought their safety would be ensured. While at ETO, Witness DD saw the Interahamwe, some on foot and others in vehicles. They were armed, but Witness DD said they felt safe because of the UNAMIR presence. At the ETO, Witness DD stayed on the sports field, and had gone into one of the buildings only once. He estimated that there were approximately 5,000 refugees on the ETO premises. On 11 April, when the UNAMIR troops left, Witness DD saw the Interahamwe attack. He testified that Interahamwe leaders were present and named the Accused as well as the councillor of Kicukiro, who was also his neighbour, as having been among these leaders. He saw the Accused at about fifty metres away from the ETO entrance, together with the councillor and many others he was unable to identify. According to Witness DD, all of them were armed, and the Accused had a gun. Witness DD fled the ETO when the Interahamwe attacked and was thus separated from his family.

280. Witness DD went to the Sonatube factory, where he and other persons were stopped by soldiers who ordered them to sit on the ground, which they did. The soldiers said they would take them to Nyanza where they would provide them with assistance. According to Witness DD, the women with children were forcibly separated from the group and raped by the Interahamwe. Witness DD stated that he learned only later that the women had been raped, when he saw them again and they told him that the Interahamwe had made them their wives, raped them and impregnated them. When they arrived at Nyanza, the refugees were assembled and surrounded by soldiers and Interahamwe. The Hutus were then asked to show their identity cards and to separate themselves from the group, following which they were allowed to leave. Witness DD also saw a person who tried to pass for a Hutu, shot on the spot. Once the Hutus had been separated, the soldiers began to kill people and throw grenades. When they stopped throwing grenades, they asked the Interahamwe to check the bodies for any survivors and to finish them off. Witness DD testified that he did not see the Accused again after the ETO.

281. During cross-examination, Defence counsel asked Witness DD about the circumstances in which he had seen the Accused at the ETO - where precisely it had been, and whether it was an open space with unobstructed view. The witness testified that he had been on the sports field when he saw the Accused. The Defence counsel submitted that in his pre-trial statement, Witness DD had stated that he had seen the Accused when he left the classroom with his family and that the Accused was in the school yard. The witness maintained that he had been on the sports field, and reiterated that he had come out of the classroom to see members of his family. He stated that the confusion stemmed from the fact that there was a basketball court near the entrance to the ETO. The Defence Counsel noted that there were several buildings between the sports field and the ETO entrance and that the witness could have had an open, unobstructed view. The witness responded that he had been on the sports field and that there were no buildings there.

282. Witness W, a Tutsi man, also a neighbour of the Accused's, testified that he knew the Accused as the vice-president of the Interahamwe, and also as an engineer and a business man. On the morning of 7 April, Witness W fled his home, for Luberizi. On the way, he met the Accused setting up a roadblock in the company of the Interahamwe.

283. There were many people at that location and Witness W was able to return to his house, where he hid in the nearby bushes until nightfall, when he fled to the ETO together with four of his sister's children. He went to the ETO because the UNAMIR troops were there. Witness W testified that after the UNAMIR troops left, the Interahamwe and the Presidential Guard immediately entered the ETO compound, armed with grenades, machetes and clubs. He recognized some of the Interahamwe he had seen with the Accused at the roadblock on his way to the ETO but did not see the Accused. The Interahamwe then began to throw grenades onto the sports field and between the buildings where there were many people. His older brother's children and other people he knew were killed in that attack. Witness W also saw his mother die from a blow from a club. He himself was injured though not seriously and was able to flee through the back of the ETO compound to the house of a white person he knew. The latter who could not keep him in his house advised him to go to Sonatube.

284. Witness W walked towards Sonatube, together with others who had fled the ETO. They were stopped at Sonatube by soldiers who told them that Rusatila had ordered that they be sent to Nyanza where their security would be ensured. There were approximately 4, 500 refugees at Sonatube. They sat on the ground for about 30 minutes, and were forced towards Nyanza by the Interahamwe and soldiers of the Presidential Guard. Along the way, the refugees, surrounded by the Interahamwe, were mistreated. Some were stripped off their clothing or money, and others were killed by the Interahamwe and the Presidential Guards. Witness W recognized some of the Interahamwe on the road to Nyanza, and he observed the vehicle of the Accused bringing in Interahamwe as reinforcements. He testified that the Accused could have been in this vehicle, which he only saw from afar, but he did not actually see the Accused. As they approached Nyanza, Witness W realized that they would be killed rather than protected. He and about 150 of his companions broke away from the group and fled. Some of them were shot from behind by the Interahamwe. Witness W and his companions hid in the forest nearby waiting for nightfall, during which time they heard gunfire from the Nyanza hill. They then fled to an RPF zone, the group of 150 having been reduced to only 60 by the time they arrived.

285. During cross-examination, Defence counsel asked Witness W which members of his family arrived at the ETO school with him. The Witness stated that his father, the children of his elder brother and others living in the house were with him. When confronted with his testimony on direct examination, he explained that he had mistakenly said he was with the children of his sister but that he meant his brother. Most of the cross-examination of Witness W related to other events and not to his experience at the ETO and Nyanza.

286. Luc Lemaire, a captain in the Belgian army who served with UNAMIR, testified that he was stationed at the ETO school, until the departure of UNAMIR troops from ETO on 11 April. He testified that there were approximately 2,000 refugees in the ETO compound by the time

UNAMIR left. Captain Lemaire testified that at that time there was increased aggression by the Interahamwe near the ETO and that the latter were gathering quite near the compound, and were seen sometimes with weapons. Under cross-examination, Captain Lemaire was questioned about the Interahamwe. He stated that he had not seen Interahamwe in uniform near the ETO, but that he knew that the people he had seen were Interahamwe for they were able to move about freely and he had been told so by those at the ETO compound who knew them.

287. Defence Witness DZZ, a Hutu woman from Kicukiro, testified that she fled to a nearby church mission on 7 April, after hearing the sound of shooting. From there, on the same day she was taken by a Belgian priest to the ETO, about one and a half kilometres away, along with a group of 25 other refugees. She testified that when she arrived, there were about 2,000 refugees at the ETO. More people came subsequently, and Witness DZZ said she continued to hear gunshots. While she was at the ETO, she said that RPF soldiers in uniform came to take away some people who were Tutsi. On 9 April, the UNAMIR soldiers told Witness DZZ that they would be leaving, and she left the next day, on 10 April. Witness DZZ said that about 500 people remained at ETO by the time she left, and that many of those who left went to the Amahoro stadium. Witness DZZ returned home, which was approximately three kilometres away. She testified that she did not see any bodies or any roadblocks on the way. Under cross-examination, Witness DZZ stated that she could not testify to what happened at the ETO after she left on 10 April, or to what happened subsequently at Nyanza.

288. Defence Witness DPP testified that in April 1994 she was living in Kicukiro, approximately 400 to 500 metres from the ETO. She said that she saw the UNAMIR troops leave the ETO on 11 April on her way to get medicine for her sick child. After they left, she saw about fifty people including some people she knew go into ETO. She testified that they were not wearing uniforms and that some of them were armed. She heard gunshots, but from far away. Witness DPP saw people coming out of the ETO, carrying away school property, and then she saw men, women and children leaving the compound. She stated that they were not running and were unharmed. She testified that she did not see the Accused. In May 1994, Witness DPP sought refuge at the ETO. She said that at that time bullets were falling on the ETO, and she encountered some people who had taken refuge there after 6 April and stayed there throughout this period. She testified that there were mostly Tutsi but some Hutu refugees as well. After 11 May, Witness DPP said that Government soldiers came to camp at the ETO as well, and that there was no problem between them and the Tutsis there. She testified that on 23 May everyone left the ETO, as the RPF were shooting. During cross-examination, Witness DPP stated that she stayed by the ETO for two hours on 11 April. She said that she did not see people in the ETO being attacked and clarified that she saw people entering but could not see the place where the refugees were from where she was. She stated that one person she spoke to told her they were on the way to the stadium but had been stopped en route and forced back. This person also told her that when they reached where they were going some were killed by knives or shot dead.

289. The Accused testified that on the morning of 11 April, his neighbour woke him up to tell him that the RPF were already in the neighbourhood and that they had killed a child. The Accused decided that he and his family had to leave their house in Kicukiro. They left around 7:30 a.m., with 14 people in his vehicle, and they drove to the house of an acquaintance, passing through many roadblocks. He found his acquaintance about to leave for Kibuye with his family. They left the house of this acquaintance around noon, and after much trouble at the roadblocks, arrived around 5:30 p.m. in Masango, where the Accused had a house in Karambi. The Accused described a mass exodus from the city, with many people on foot and others in vehicles. The Accused said he was never in the ETO, at the entrance or in the compound, on 11 April or any other time. He said he knew of the buildings there only through the slides which had been presented during the trial proceedings and that he had had no reason to go to the ETO. The Accused said he remained in Masango commune until 14 April, when he returned to Kigali. During cross-examination, the Accused said that he had not been aware of the fact that there were refugees at the ETO.

290. Defence Witness DDD testified that she and the Accused and their family had left their home on the morning of 11 April and gone to the house of a family friend in Kiyovu, where they arrived at around 9 a.m. They found that this friend was leaving Kiyovu for security reasons. After managing to obtain petrol, Witness DDD said they left Kiyovu around mid-day for Masango, where they arrived at 6 p.m. She said that the Accused remained in Masango until 14 April.

Factual Findings

291. Having heard and reviewed the testimony of the Prosecution witnesses regarding the allegations set forth in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment, the Trial Chamber finds Witness A, Witness H, Witness DD, Witness W and Captain Luc Lemaire all to be credible witnesses. They presented a similar account of the refugee situation at the ETO, the attack by the Interahamwe following the departure of UNAMIR troops, the diversion of refugees heading towards Amahoro stadium to Nyanza, and the massacre of refugees by soldiers and the Interahamwe which took place at Nyanza. Extensive cross-examination of the witnesses primarily elicited further details and background, without revealing any material inconsistencies. The Chamber considers that such inconsistencies as pointed out were not material and could for the most part be attributed to external factors relating to pre-trial statements and other language and translation issues. For example, the Defence highlighted the fact that the trial testimony of Witness A that he had four children who died and one who survived was inconsistent with the pre-trial statement he signed in 1995 stating that he had three children, all of whom died. The Chamber considers that the witness knew how many children he had and how many of them died, and that the error can be attributed to difficulties of transcription and translation, as addressed under the Evidentiary Matters.

292. Having heard and reviewed the testimony of the Defence witnesses, including the Accused, regarding the allegations set forth in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment, the Trial Chamber makes the following findings with regard to their evidence.

293. The Chamber notes that Witness DZZ was not, and did not claim to be, an eyewitness to the events at the ETO compound and at Nyanza on 11 April. Her testimony confirms that there were refugees at the ETO compound, but as she left prior to the events alleged in the Indictment, her testimony cannot challenge the eyewitness accounts of these events presented by the Prosecution. Her assertion that most refugees had left the compound and that only about 500 remained there by the time she left on 10 April, is inconsistent with the testimony of all the witnesses who were still there on 11 April when UNAMIR left, including Captain Luc Lemaire, who estimated - as they all did - that there were several thousand refugees at the ETO compound on 11 April.

294. Witness DPP was on the road in front of the ETO on 11 April, and she saw the UNAMIR troops leaving. She saw other people, including some armed, enter the compound, but she could not see inside the compound from where she was standing. She heard gunshots, although she said they were far away. She subsequently saw some people departing from the ETO but those people were not harmed and they were not running. The Chamber considers that much of this testimony is consistent with evidence provided by Prosecution witnesses, with regard to the departure of the UNAMIR troops and the subsequent incursion of others who were armed. Witness DPP concluded that these others went to loot the building, but testified that she was not in a position to see what was happening inside.

295. The Chamber accepts the evidence of Defence Witness DZZ and Defence Witness DPP but finds that this evidence does not refute the evidence presented by the Prosecution with respect to the allegations set forth in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment.

296. The Chamber has considered the testimony of the Accused and Witness DDD, jointly, as their testimony is consistent and puts forward a defence of alibi, claiming that the Accused was en route to Masango on 11 April and was not present at the ETO, at Nyanza, or at any of the locations on the way to the ETO from Nyanza where Witness A, Witness H, Witness DD and Witness W testified that they saw him on that day. The Chamber notes that the alibi defence was not introduced until near the end of the trial, after the Prosecution rested its case. Neither the Accused nor Witness DDD mentioned the alibi at the time of the arrest of the Accused or during any of the pre-trial proceedings.

297. The Chamber particularly notes that Defence counsel did not mention the alibi of the Accused in her opening statement or in her cross-examination of any of the Prosecution witnesses who testified over a period of 18 months. Consequently, Witness A, Witness H, Witness DD and Witness W were never confronted with and given an opportunity to respond to the assertion that the Accused was not present on 11 April at the ETO or at Nyanza and that their testimony must therefore be false. The Chamber has found these Prosecution witnesses to be credible, and finds the extremely delayed revelation of an alibi defence to be suspect. The inference to be drawn is that this defence was an afterthought and that the account of dates was tailored by the Accused and Defense Witness DDD, following the conclusion of the Prosecution's case. The only witness to support the alibi of the Accused is Witness DDD, and the Chamber is mindful that she has a personal interest in his protection. For these reasons, the Chamber does not accept the testimony of the Accused and Witness DDD that they were on the way to Masango on 11 April.

298. On the basis of the testimony cited above, the Chamber finds it established beyond a reasonable doubt that from 7 April to 11 April 1994, several thousand people, primarily Tutsis, sought refuge at the ETO. As all of the witnesses testified, they went to the ETO because UNAMIR troops were stationed there and they thought they would find protection there. The Interahamwe, armed with guns, grenades, machetes and clubs, gathered outside the ETO compound, effectively surrounding it. Colonel Leonides Rusatila separated Hutus from Tutsis at the ETO, prior to the attack, and several hundred Hutus left the ETO compound. When the UNAMIR troops left the ETO on 11 April 1994, the Interahamwe and members of the Presidential Guard entered and attacked the compound, throwing grenades, firing guns and killing with machetes and clubs. A large number of Tutsis, including many family members and others known to the witnesses, were killed in this attack.

299. Witness H saw the Accused at the time of this attack on the ETO, just before shots were fired, together with Gerard Karangwa, the President of the Interahamwe at the Commune level, in a group which began throwing grenades and firing. Witness DD also saw the Accused at the time of the attack, armed with a gun, about 50 metres away from the ETO entrance. Based on this evidence, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was present and participated in the attack on Tutsi refugees at the ETO school.

300. Many of the refugees who escaped or survived the attack at ETO headed in groups towards the Amahoro Stadium, where they thought they would be safe as it was under RPF control. These groups were stopped en route by soldiers, gathered together near the Sonatube factory and diverted, having been told that Colonel Rusatila had ordered them to Nyanza where their safety would be ensured. Some women were taken forcibly from the group and subsequently raped. Flanked on both sides by Interahamwe, approximately 4,000 refugees were then forcibly marched to Nyanza. Along the way, these refugees were abused, threatened and killed by soldiers and by the Interahamwe surrounding them, who were armed with machetes, clubs, axes, and other weapons.

301. When they arrived at Nyanza, the refugees were stopped by the Interahamwe, assembled together and made to sit down in one spot, below a hill on which there were armed soldiers. They were surrounded by Interahamwe and soldiers. Hutus were told to stand up and identify themselves and were allowed to leave. Some Tutsis who tried to leave, pretending they were Hutus, were killed on the spot by Interahamwe who knew them. Grenades were then thrown into the crowd by the Interahamwe, and the soldiers began to fire their guns from the hillside. Those who tried to flee were brought back by the Interahamwe surrounding them. This attack took place on 11 April, in the late afternoon and into the evening. Many were killed in this attack, including Witness A's wife and four of their five children. Following the shooting and grenades, the soldiers told the Interahamwe to begin killing people. The Interahamwe then began killing people with clubs and other weapons. Some girls were selected, put aside, and raped before they were killed. Clothing had been removed from many of the women who were killed. The killing lasted more than an hour. The soldiers then told the Interahamwe to look for those who were not dead and finish them off. The Interahamwe left at approximately 11:00 p.m. and returned on the morning of 12 April, when they came back to loot and to kill all surviving refugees. Approximately 200 people survived the massacre.

302. On the way to Nyanza, Witness A saw the Accused coming in a vehicle from the direction of Nyanza, pull over to the side of the road and get out. Thereafter, he saw the Accused wave away a person who had worked for him and approached him from the marching group of refugees for assistance. Witness H also saw the Accused on the way to Nyanza, standing in a group talking to a member of the Interahamwe whom he recognized and other people.

303. Witness W saw a vehicle belonging to the Accused bringing in Interahamwe as reinforcements. At Nyanza, Witness A again saw the Accused, directing the Interahamwe who were armed with grenades, machetes and clubs - into position to surround the refugees just prior to the massacre. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was present and participated in the forced diversion of refugees to Nyanza and that he directed and participated in the attack at Nyanza.

304. Paragraph 17 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "In April of 1994, on dates unknown, in Masango Commune, Georges Rutaganda and others known to the Prosecutor conducted house-to-house searches for Tutsis and their families. Throughout these searches, Tutsis were separated from Hutus and taken to a river. Georges Rutaganda instructed the Interahamwe to track all the Tutsis and throw them into the river".

Regarding allegations according to which in April of 1994, on dates unknown, in Masango Commune, Georges Rutaganda and others known to the Prosecutor conducted house-to-house searches for Tutsis and their families, and that throughout these searches, Tutsis were separated from Hutus and taken to a river:

305. Prosecution Witness EE testified that he saw, on three occasions, the father of the accused and other Interahamwe go to pick up Tutsis in vehicles, telling them that they were taking them to a safe location. Witness EE testified that he had seen these vehicles go to the river. He also explained that other people were led on foot to the river. He testified that his neighbours had told him that the people taken to the river had been thrown into it. Witness EE also stated that, from the window of his house, he heard people say they were returning from the river where they had just thrown Tutsis.

306. Under cross-examination, in reply to the Defence, EE indicated that he could not see the river from his house.

307. Prosecution Witness C also testified before the Chamber that, in Masango, the people who were tracking the Tutsis went to collect those who had sought refuge at the Bureau communal in order to beat and kill them. Witness C testified that many Tutsis had therefore been killed in the Masango region. Those who sought refuge at the river were thrown into it while others were thrown into mass graves. In reply to questions from the Chamber, Witness C specified clearly that he did not see the Accused participate in the said massacres.

Regarding the allegations formulated as follows "Georges Rutaganda instructed the Interahamwe to track all the Tutsis and throw them into the river":

308. Prosecution Witness O testified before the Chamber that he saw the accused, on 22 April 1994, at about 5 p.m., in Masango. According to Witness O, the Accused was in mufti, armed with a short firearm and was driving a white Toyota pick-up which he parked at some 15 metres from Witness O's shop. Witness O then stated that he saw at the rear of this vehicle, guns partially covered with a tarpaulin. Witness O also testified that the Accused was accompanied by Robert Kajuga, National President of the Interahamwe and some 10 other people including about four in military uniform and others in the distinctive green, red and yellow Interahamwe uniform. Witness O testified that some of the men accompanying the Accused carried grenades or firearms and that Kajuga was carrying grenades on his belt. Witness O further stated that he saw the Accused speak with a certain Karera, in charge of the Youth Wing of the local Interahamwe za MRND, in Masango, near a pole from which a flag flew.

309. Prosecution Witness V testified before the Chamber that the Accused held a meeting at a place known as Gwanda (sic), located between Masango and Karambi, on a date he could not accurately recall. During the examination-in-chief, Witness V situated this meeting at the beginning of the month of May 1994 and, under cross-examination, he stated that it was rather in April 1994. Witness V stated that the Accused conducted this meeting in his capacity as Vice-President of the Interahamwe. Witness V testified that the Accused said during that meeting that it was necessary to stop eating the cows of Tutsis and to get rid of the Tutsis instead. Witness V, a Tutsi man, who attended the meeting, fled to safety. According to Witness V, the massacres in Masango started after the Accused had held the said meeting. Witness V testified that prior to that there had been some looting but no killings.

310. Prosecution Witness C saw the Accused attending an MRND meeting at Masango. According to the witness, the Accused was wearing the uniform of the Interahamwe. The father of the Accused, Esdras Mpamo, was also in attendance as well as a certain Jean-Marie Vianney Jyojyi. The two individuals who took the floor, Mwanafunzi Anteri and a Protestant pastor urged the gathering not to support the Arusha Accords and to fight the enemy. According to Witness C, the RPF and the Tutsis were referred to as "the enemy" at the time. The witness also testified that the proverbs used at the meeting were meant to convey the notion that Tutsis, their families and children were to be tracked. Witness C noted that the Accused was present throughout the meeting and did not object to the statements made there. He was seated with Mwananfuzi Anteri and Sebuhuro at the table facing the gathering. His father, Esdras Mpamo, a former Bourgmestre of Masango who at the time of the events alleged was an MRND parliamentarian was also seated at the table next to the speakers. Witness C testified that the attacks against the Tutsis started after that meting.

311. Prosecution Witness EE, for his part, testified before the Chamber that he had attended a meeting, after 6 April 1994, at which the father of the Accused, Mpamo, who was chairing the meeting, had declared that Tutsis had to be killed to prevent them from taking over. The meeting was held near the Masango Communal Office. According to EE, the Accused was in attendance and was seated next to his father, at a table facing the audience. He explained that the Accused and his father were not the only ones seated at the table and that the Accused had not taken the floor.

312. Under cross-examination, Witness EE testified that he had attended that meeting because he had received a written invitation from Esdras Mpamo. He confirmed that he was personally surprised at the statements made at the meeting and that he had not reacted, nor had the bourgmestre, Louis, who was also present. Witness EE then indicated that he was also seated at the table, next to the speakers, facing the audience.

Factual Findings

313. The Chamber notes that the Prosecutor had led no evidence in support of the allegations that in April 1994, the Accused had conducted house-to-house searches for Tutsis and their families in Masango Commune and that, throughout these searches, Tutsis were separated from Hutus and taken to a river.

314. Regarding the allegations that Georges Rutaganda had ordered the Interahamwe to track down all Tutsis and throw them into the river, the Chamber is satisfied, based on the testimonies of Witnesses C, V and EE, that the Accused had attended at least one meeting at which specific statements of incitement to kill Tutsis were made. The Chamber notes that the Accused did not object to such statements and that, in view of the authority he exercised over the population and the position he occupied during that meeting, being seated at the table of speakers next to his father, the former bourgmestre of the Commune, he had acquiesced to such statements. The Chamber notes however that only Prosecution Witness V had testified that the Accused had chaired the meeting and had taken the floor. The Chamber notes that V's testimony on this point is not corroborated by those of Witnesses C and EE, both of whom had declared that the Accused was indeed present at the meeting and had taken a seat at the table of speakers but had himself not taken the floor. Accordingly, the Chamber holds that, on the basis of uncorroborated testimonies presented to it, it has not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused ordered that all Tutsis be tracked and thrown into the river.

315. Paragraph 18 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "On or about April 28, 1994, Georges Rutaganda, together with Interahamwe members, collected residents from Kigali and detained them near the Amgar garage. Georges Rutaganda and the Interahamwe demanded identity cards from the detainees. A number of persons, including Emmanuel Kayitare, were forcibly separated from the group. Later that day, Emmanuel Kayitare attempted to flee from where he was being detained and Georges Rutaganda pursued him, caught him and struck him on the head with a machete and killed him."

Regarding the allegations that on or about April 28, 1994, the Accused, together with Interahamwe members, collected residents from Kigali and detained them near the Amgar garage and demanded identity cards from them:

316. Prosecution Witness U testified before the Chamber that, on a day, that he was unable to pin point but that he put after 6 April 1994, at about 3 p.m., he hid in a bush near a garage of which he knew neither the name nor the owner. Later, Witness U recognized the said garage on a slide tendered by the Prosecutor as Exhibit 143. The Chamber notes that the garage identified is Amgar.

317. The witness testified that he clearly saw the following events unfold near the garage from where he was hiding. The Accused and some 30 Interahamwe, some of whom were in military uniform and others in mufti, armed with tools such as machetes, took away some 30 people there to kill them. According to Witness U, the Interahamwe looked like the bodyguards of the Accused.

318. Prosecution Witness AA testified that on 28 April 1994, around 10 a.m., Interahamwe conducted a house-to-house search in the Agakingiro neighbourhood asking the people to show their identity cards. They took away those they detained towards the "Hindi Mandal" temple, located near the Amgar garage and a mass grave, at a place now called Jango. According to Witness AA, streams of people who had been forced out of their homes headed up towards that location. Witness AA was among the persons detained and led near the garage. He testified that the Accused was present at the location where the detainees were gathered. According to Witness AA, the Accused was the leader of those Interahamwe. He wore a military uniform, comprising a coat and trousers, and carried a rifle.

319. Under cross-examination, Witness AA reiterated his testimony that the Accused himself did not directly conduct searches, at least he did not see him do so. The Accused was present at the location where the detainees were gathered, near Amgar garage. The accused was already there when AA arrived. Also under cross-examination, Witness AA testified that the Accused carried a pistol and not a rifle, and that he also carried grenades on his belt.

320. According to Witness AA, the persons who managed to leave this site where people had been assembled were Hutus. Those who were kept behind were either Tutsis or people from another ethnic group, known as member of political parties opposed to the government. According to Witness AA, those persons were later killed and buried on the spot.

Regarding the allegations that a number of persons, including Emmanuel Kayitare, were forcibly separated from the group and that when Emmanuel Kayitare attempted to flee, the Accused pursued him, caught him and struck him on the head with a machete and killed him:

321. Witness AA testified that the Accused was on the spot where the detainees including him were assembled. According to Witness AA, all the persons detained had their eyes riveted on the Accused in the hope that he would have mercy. Witness AA testified that the people were afraid and that whenever the Accused looked at them they cast their eyes downwards. Witness AA was seated, crouching some 10 or 20 metres away from the Accused.

322. According to Witness AA, the detainees included Emmanuel Kayitare, nicknamed Rujindiri. Witness AA knew Emmanuel Kayitare's younger brother, Michel Kayitare very well. A man called Cekeri told Emmanuel that he knew him and that he was aware that he was going to the CND. Witness AA testified during the examination-in-chief that Emmanuel took fright and took off running. Witness AA saw the Accused grab Emmanuel by the collar to prevent him from escaping. The Accused seized a machete from Cekeri with which he struck Emmanuel on the neck.

323. In answer to questions from the Bench, Witness AA reiterated that the Accused did kill Emmanuel not with a bullet but rather with a machete. Witness AA then explained that the Accused was not carrying a gun but rather a pistol. When reminded by the Defence that he had testified before the Chamber, just as he had stated to the investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor that the Accused was carrying a gun, Witness AA replied that it was a pistol.

324. Under cross-examination, Witness AA testified that the Accused had grabbed Emmanuel by the collar of his shirt when the latter stood up to run and therefore had not chased after him. He further stated that the Accused had not even taken a step; he had merely turned around and grabbed Emmanuel. In answer to the Defence, Witness AA added that the Accused had seized Emmanuel with one hand while holding the weapon with the other hand. Witness AA confirmed that the Accused did not run after Emmanuel. Witness AA then stated that when he was called by Cekeri, Emmanuel stood up as if to walk towards him. Emmanuel walked by the Accused. That was when the Accused grabbed him by the neck.

325. Witness AA then insisted on the fact that the Accused held Emmanuel by the collar of his shirt and not by the neck as he had previously stated to the investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor.

326. Under cross-examination, Witness AA reiterated his statement to the effect that the Accused had struck Emmanuel on the neck with a machete. In response to the Defence pointing out an inconsistency between his testimony and his statement to the investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor in which he had alleged that the Accused had split Emmanuel's skull, Witness AA stated that he had seen the Accused strike Emmanuel with a machete, that there had been a splash of blood and that he had covered his eyes with his hands.

327. In answer to the Bench which had asked whether the splash of blood was from the front or the back of the head, Witness AA stated that Emmanuel had fallen with his head to the ground and that there was so much blood that neither his face nor his hair could be seen.

328. Prosecution Witness U testified before the Chamber that Emmanuel and another person, nicknamed Venant, were among those arrested and taken near the garage close to where he was hiding. U knew Emmanuel very well. He stated that Emmanuel and Venant were tied together with their shirts lest they escaped. The Accused untied them.

329. Witness U testified that he had then heard the Accused, speaking out loud so as to be heard, telling those who were with him that he was going to show them how they should work. According to U, the Accused had a machete hanging from his belt with which he hit Emmanuel on the head . Witness U testified that Emmanuel's head was split in two. Emmanuel fell dead instantly. According to Witness U, Emmanuel was killed by machete in a single blow.

330. Witness U testified further that when Emmanuel fell, the Accused then took the kalachnikov which he was carrying on his shoulder and shot Venant who also fell beside Emmanuel.

331. Again according to Witness U, the Accused then picked up their bodies and threw them into a pit with the help of those who were with him. Witness U identified the pit into which Emmanuel and Venant were thrown on the slide tendered as Prosecution Exhibit No.169. According to U, Emmanuel was a Tutsi and Venant, a Hutu who did not approve of the killings.

332. Witness U also stated that as he attempted to flee, he saw the Accused engaged in killing with a machete assisted by Interahamwe. The bodies were then thrown into a pit. Witness U stated that there were two pits - a small one into which two bodies were thrown and a larger into which a lot of bodies were dumped.

Factual Findings

333. The Chamber is of the opinion that Witness AA is credible and, consequently, accepts his testimony. Although contradictions emerged under cross-examination in his testimony with regards to details, such contradictions are not material and do not impugn the substance of his testimony on the circumstances of the death of Emmanuel Kayitare. The Chamber finds that such contradictions may be attributed to the possible trauma caused to Witness AA as a result of recounting the painful events he had witnessed and the period of time between the said events and AA's appearance before the Chamber. Additionally, the Chamber recalls that the inconsistencies between the witness testimony and statements made before the trial must be analysed in the light of difficulties linked, particularly, to the interpretation of the questions asked and the fact that those were not solemn statements made before a commissioner of oaths.

334. In the instant case, the Chamber notes, for instance, that the difficulties Witness AA faced in describing accurately the type of weapon carried by the Accused, that is, whether it was a rifle or a pistol, may be explained by lack of knowledge of weapons and by the fact that the witness is unable to tell apart the two types of weapons. Similarly, the Chamber is of the opinion that Witness AA's inability to indicate whether the blow unleashed by the Accused cut off the head or neck of the victim cannot call into question the reliability of his testimony since it is difficult for a lay person to ascertain the respective limits of the head and the neck.

335. Based on AA's testimony, as substantially corroborated by Witness U, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that, on 28 April 1994, the Interahamwe conducted a house-to-house search in the Agakingiro neighbourhood, asking people to show their identity cards. The Tutsi and people belonging to certain political parties were taken towards the "Hindi Mandal" temple, near Amgar garage. The Accused was present at the location where the people caught were gathered. He wore a military uniform, comprising a coat and trousers, and carried a rifle.

336. Furthermore, after considering the respective testimonies of Witnesses AA and U, the Chamber is satisfied that they are corroborative as regards the circumstances surrounding the killing of Emmanuel Kayitare, a Tutsi, by the Accused.

337. The Chamber notes that Witness U identified the grave where Emmanuel and Venant were killed and into which their bodies were thrown on the slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 169.

338. The Chamber observes that said slide tendered as exhibit 169 shows the same view as the one tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 269, which has been referred to by Professor William Haglund, a forensic anthropologist, who had appeared as an expert witness for the Prosecutor, as an exhumation site identified as "RUG-1".

339. According to Professor Haglund, three bodies were exhumed from the hole shown on the slide tendered as exhibit 269[76]. Dr. Nizam Peerwani, a pathologist, who had worked jointly with Professor Haglund and who had also appeared as an expert witness for the Prosecutor, submitted the following findings on the three bodies exhumed: The first body was that of a man aged between 35 and 45 years at the time of his death the probable cause of which, according to Dr. Peerwani, was homicide. The second body was that of a woman, aged between 30 and 39 years at the time of her death the probable cause of which was homicide. The third exhumed body was that of a man aged between 35 and 45 at the time of his death the probable cause of which, according to Dr. Peerwani, was blunt force trauma injuries.

[76] See Chapter 4, section 3 (of the present Judgement), factual findings on the allegations contained in paragraph 12 of the Indictment.

340. Firstly, the Chamber, on the basis of the testimony by Dr. Kathleen Reich, a forensic anthropologist, called by the Defence as an expert witness, is not persuaded that the scientific method used by Professor Haglund is such as to allow the Chamber to rely on his conclusions in the determination of the case.

341. Secondly and, above all, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has failed to show a direct link between the findings of Professor Haglund and Dr. Peerwani and the specific allegations in the Indictment or even to call the attention of the Chamber to the fact that the slide tendered by the Prosecutor as exhibit 169, identified by Witness U as showing the hole where Emmanuel and Venant were killed and into which their bodies were thrown shows the same view as the slide tendered as exhibit 269, featuring the exhumation site "RUG-1".

342. Consequently, the Chamber holds that the said findings are not helpful to the Chamber in determining the facts of the case. Moreover, the Chamber is not satisfied that the grave site referred to by Witness U and Witness AA and that exhumed by Professor Haglund is one and the same.

343. Finally, on the basis of the testimonies of Witnesses AA and U, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond any reasonable doubt that the Accused struck Emmanuel Kayitare with a machete and that the latter died instantly.

4.7 Charges as set forth in Paragraph 19 of the Indictment.

344. Paragraph 19 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> "In June 1994, on a date unknown, Georges RUTAGANDA ordered people to bury the bodies of victims in order to conceal his crimes from the international community."

Events Alleged

345. In respect of the aforementioned allegation, Witness Q testified in direct examination that he was hiding in the house that belonged to a person he identified as Thomas when an Interahamwe named Cyuma took him and a young girl to a hole behind the Technical school of Muhazi (École technique de Muhazi). The Witness said that when he arrived at this hole he saw the corpse of this nephew lying inside. He said that the young girl was killed by an Interahamwe named Karangwa, on the orders of Cyuma and he was about to be killed when a woman he identified as Martha, who at that time was the head of the cell, stopped Cyuma and the others from killing him.

346. Witness Q testified in direct examination that, whilst at the hole behind the Technical school of Muhazi, he saw another hole that he referred to in his evidence as the third hole and he stated that he saw the Accused, in the company of other people, standing in the vicinity of this hole. The Witness stated that, from where he was, he could see this hole but he could not get to it. The Witness stated that the Accused thereafter called Martha who immediately went to him, whereupon the Accused ordered a stop to all killings during the day and the dead buried immediately, as the killings were badly perceived by the people the Witness described as "whites" and "foreigners". According to the Witness, the Accused further ordered that killing should only take place at night.

347. Witness Q testified in direct examination that the Accused was addressing all those people in the vicinity of this third hole when he ordered that all killings be stopped and all corpses buried. The Witness stated that he did not hear the Accused give these orders but that he had learnt of these orders when Martha returned to the vicinity of the hole behind the Technical school and conveyed them to Cyuma, Karangwa and the others who had been participating in killings. When the Witness was asked by the Prosecutor to state what Martha said, in conveying the orders of the Accused, the Witness stated that Martha said that it was necessary to stop the killing. The remaining people will be killed after the burial of the Late President Juvenal Habyarimana.

348. Under cross examination Witness Q stated that Martha conveyed the orders of the Accused when she stated that the killing must stop and the dead must be buried immediately, because the foreigners were not in favour of the killing. In the tail end of his cross examination, the Witness stated that he saw and he heard the Accused give orders to Martha and the other people that were in the vicinity of the third hole. The Witness also testified that this incident took place at the end of April 1994.

349. Witness AA testified in chief, that on 28 April 1994 he saw the Accused kill Emmanuel behind the Amgar garage. The Witness also testified that there was a mass grave site at this location and many bodies, including that of Emmanuel were later exhumed from this mass grave.

350. Witness HH testified that he was hiding in a bush near a roadblock and he saw Prefect Renzaho telling people manning a roadblock to stop the killings during the day because there was a satellite that was monitoring their activities.

351. The Accused testified that he was taken by a member of UNAMIR to a roadblock where a UNAMIR convoy was stopped. He stated that there were 72 adults in the convoy. He stated that the roadblock was manned by angry people who were armed and soldiers. He stated that on his arrival at the roadblock, people from the neighbourhood, some of whom were armed with sticks and machettes, gathered around. The Accused stated that the people at the roadblock were intent on killing those traveling in the convoy. The Accused said that when the people saw him alight the UNAMIR motor vehicle, they mocked him. The Accused stated that he spoke to some of the people at the roadblock and he told them that they were being monitored by satellite, in an attempt to persuade them to allow the convoy to pass.

352. Under cross-examination, the Accused confirmed saying to people that they were monitored by satellite and therefore people should not be killed. He stated that he made these statements to remind people of their responsibility. According to the Accused, he also used another argument to remind people of their responsibility. He would say that the International Community would not come to their assistance if they knew about any killings, but the Accused stated that he did not have any contact with anybody in the International Community.

Factual Findings

353. The Chamber considers that Witness Q identified the Accused in court, he knew of the Accused and of his father, before the events of 1994 and he described the Accused as a rich business man who lived in the neighbouring Commune of Masango. The Witness also testified that, after having been stopped at a roadblock at Agakingiro, he was taken by a person he identified as Vedaste Segatarama to the Accused. The Witness described how he was made to enter a little office and presented to the Accused. The Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Witness Q is able to positively identify the Accused and that the Accused was present at this hole that served as a mass grave, as testified to by the Witness.

354. The Chamber notes that there are discrepancies in the testimony of Witness Q, such as his factual account of the exact words used by the Accused, in conveying his (the Accused's) orders. Despite these discrepancies, the Witness nevertheless conveyed clearly the crux of what was ordered, that is the killing should stop and the bodies buried in order to conceal the dead from the foreigners.

355. It is clear from Witness Q's evidence that the Accused was present at this mass grave site and that he ordered the burial of bodies. However there is no evidence that the Accused gave these orders, in order to conceal his crimes from the International Community. The Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Accused ordered the burial of bodies in order to conceal the dead from foreigners. The Chamber is however not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, that in giving the said order the Accused sought to conceal his crimes from the International Community.

4.8 General allegations (Paragraphs 3-9 of the Indictment)

356. The Chamber now considers the general allegations in Paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the Indictment.

Paragraph 6 alleges: "In each paragraph charging crimes against humanity, crimes punishable by Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal, the alleged acts were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on political, ethnic or racial grounds";

Paragraph 7 alleges: "At all times relevant to this Indictment, a state of internal armed conflict existed in Rwanda";

Paragraph 8 alleges: "The victims referred to in this indictment were, at all relevant times, persons taking no active part in the hostilities":

357. In respect of the allegations in Paragraph 6 of the Indictment, Witness C testified that at a MNRD meeting held in April 1994, it was stated that Tutsis were the accomplices of the RPF. It was also stated that every Tutsi was the enemy[77]. Witness EE testified that a meeting was held at the Commune office, following the death of President Habyarimana. During this meeting the Accused's father stated that Tutsis had to be killed, to prevent them from assuming power[78]. Witness Hughes testified that, following radio announcements calling for the apprehension of Tutsis, people actively sought Tutsis at roadblocks and on the streets. Tutsis were terrified to walk the streets. Hughes stated that Tutsis were in hiding, even in areas where the killings had not begun[79]. Witness W testified that following the death of the President, people in vehicles used megaphones to spread propaganda messages about the Inkotanyi. Following this announcement Tutsis were killed, their houses looted and burned, and their cattle killed.

358. The Chamber considers that Witnesses A, B, H, W, O, Z, BB and HH testified about the construction of roadblocks immediately after the death of President Habyarimana. People fleeing for safety, were intercepted at such roadblocks. Some people were selected to be killed, whilst others were allowed to proceed. Such selection and separation process began with the erection of such roadblocks.[80]

359. Witness W testified that the Accused ordered Councillors and heads of cellules to erect roadblocks. Roadblocks were immediately erected and all persons passing through these roadblocks, who produced identity cards indicating their Tutsi ethnicity, were apprehended and some were immediately killed.[81]

[80] See supra, Chapter 4, part 2, on Factual Findings, para. 11

[81] See Testimony of Witness W, transcript of 28 May 1997

360. Witness A testified to having observed Tutsis separated from Hutus at the Nyanza crossroads[82]. Witness DD also testified that, at Nyanza, soldiers and members of the Interahamwe surrounded her group. According to the witness Hutus were asked to leave such group. Hutus were then asked to produce their identity cards. On producing their cards, a man who had lied about his ethnicity was immediately killed. The Tutsis were thereafter attacked by soldiers and members of the Interahamwe. The witness recalled that grenades were used in such attack[83]. Witness H also testified, that soldiers were everywhere. The soldiers asked them to sit down and told Hutus to identify themselves and leave. They attacked the remaining group of people, by throwing grenades and firing guns into the group. The Interahamwe also participated killing people, with their knives[84]. Mr Hughes testified that a group of survivors from the Nyanza massacre were found with machete wounds to the back of their heads and limbs.[85]

361. Witness Z, a Hutu living in Kicukiro, testified that when he came out of his house, he observed corpses of men and women near a roadblock. He stated that he and others were divided into four groups to dig holes, collect and bury bodies[86].

362. An expert witness for the Prosecutor, Mr Nsanzuwera testified that the Accused held a high position within the Interahamwe and exercised authority over members of the Interahamwe. The witness also testified that the Accused was often present at roadblocks and barriers, issuing orders[87]. The Accused testified that after he joined the MRND party in 1991, he was involved in the creation of its youth wing, the Interahamwe za MRND, and was subsequently its second vice-president.

363. Defence witness DNN testified to hearing that the Interahamwe received military training. The witness also stated that such training commenced at the beginning of the war[88]. Witness DNN confirmed that they received this training[89].

364. Defence Witness DZZ stated that she had heard about the Interahamwe receiving military training, but only after the beginning of the war[90]. Defence Witness DNN confirmed that the Interahamwe received such training.[91]

365. Defence witnesses DDD[92], DD[93], DNN[94] and DZZ[95] testified that RPF infiltrators were identified at roadblocks, by virtue of their falsified identity cards. Defence Witness DEE testified that identity cards were verified at all roadblocks she passed through in Kigali, except the roadblock near the hospital. She stated that being in possession of an identity card, indicating Tutsi ethnicity, was justification enough to be killed.[96]

366. Witnesses H and DD testified to hiding in the house of a Burundian and survived house to house searches. Defence Witness DF testified to house to house searches conducted in Kigali. Witnesses U, T, J and Q testified that the Accused was present and participated in the distribution of weapons to the Interahamwe. It has been established that weapons were distributed to the Interahamwe. The Accused was present and participated in the distribution of weapons on at least three occasions.

367. The Accused testified that:

"It developed a situation such that the people who were identified as RPF unfortunately I regret the fact and most of them were Tutsis. 90 percent were Tutsis and this led to a generalisation and excessive behaviour which also affected people who I – you know – old men, children and so on and so forth."[97]

[97] See Testimony of the Accused, transcript of 21 April 1999. In French this reads:
"Il a évolué, et une situation telle que les gens identifiés comme au FPR, malheureusement je regrette, étaient à plus de 90% Tutsi. Ce qui a conduit à une globalisation que je déplore – et même jusqu'à maintenant - à une globalisation et à un excès, un débordement... un débordement qui a touché également les personnes vraiment que moi je... des personnes, des vieillards, des enfants, tout ça."

"What happened in my country – in our country is an incident which I would call a tragedy, a tragedy. It's a series of massacres, of killings which affected people from the RPF and the Inkotanyi. Yesterday, I spoke about the generalisation of the Tutsis and this even affected children."[98]

"Ce qui s'est passé dans notre pays c'est un incident, mais pas un incident, moi je le qualifie de drame, de drame. C'est une série de massacres, de tueries, qui ont gardé les gens du FPR et les Inkotanyi, j'ai expliqué hier dans la globalisation des Tutsis, qui a connu même des débordements jusqu'à atteindre les enfants."

368. According to Expert Witness Nsanzuwera, the Tutsi were systematically targeted as such, because they were considered to be opponents of the regime. Mr Nsanzuwera testified that, the militia, including the Interahamwe, killed Tutsis and Hutus who opposed the Hutu Regime, the victims of these massacres being civilians. Mr Nsanzuwera also confirmed that the Interahamwe's involvement in the killing of Tutsis was not spontaneous but well planned[99].

369. Professor Reyntjens, an expert witness for the Prosecution, testified to the existence of a plan formulated years prior to the events of 1994 in Rwanda, which suggests that the attacks were systematic[100]. Mr Hughes testified that the attacks appeared to be pre-planned due to their consistent pattern.[101]

370. The Chamber finds that there is sufficient evidence of meetings held to organise and encourage the targeting and killings of the Tutsi civilian population as such and not as "RPF Infiltrators", as testified to by Defence Witnesses DDD, DD, DNN and DZZ. The Chamber also finds that this organisation and encouragement took the form of radio broadcasts calling for the apprehension of Tutsi, the use of mobile announcement units to spread propaganda messages about the Inkontanyi, the distribution of weapons to the Interahamwe militia, the erection of roadblocks manned by soldiers and members of the Interahamwe to facilitate the identification, separation and subsequent killing of Tutsi civilians and, the house to house searches conducted to apprehend Tutsis, clearly suggest that a systematic attack on the Tutsi civilian population existed throughout Rwanda in 1994.

371. The Chamber accepts the testimony of expert Witnesses Mr Nsanzuwera and Professor Reyntjens that the attack on the Tutsi population was of a systematic character. The Chamber also accepts Mr. Nsanzuwera's evidence that the victims of the massacres were civilians. The Chamber finds that the attack on the Tutsi population occurred in various parts of Rwanda, such as in Nyanza, Nyarugenge Commune, Kiemesakara Sector in the Kigali Prefecture, Nyamirambo, Cyahafi, Kicukiro, Masango. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the attack on the Tutsi civilian population was of a widespread and systematic character.

With regard to the allegation in paragraph 5, which alleges that : "The victims in each paragraph charging genocide were members of a national, ethnical, racial or religious group".

372. As indicated supra in the discussion on the applicable law, the Chamber holds that in assessing whether a particular group may be considered as protected from the crime of genocide, it will proceed on a case-by-case basis, taking into account both the relevant evidence proferred and the political, social and cultural context.[102]

373. The Chamber concurs with the Akayesu Judgement[103], that the Tutsi population does not have its own language or a distinct culture from the rest of the Rwandan population. However, the Chamber finds that there are a number of objective indicators of the group as a group with a distinct identity. Every Rwandan citizen was, before 1994, required to carry an identity card which included an entry for ethnic group, the ethnic group being either Hutu, Tutsi or Twa. The Rwandan Constitution and laws in force in 1994 also identified Rwandans by reference to their ethnic group. Moreover, customary rules existed in Rwanda governing the determination of ethnic group, which followed patrilineal lines. The identification of persons as belonging to the group of Hutu or Tutsi or Twa had thus become embedded in Rwandan culture, and can, in the light of the travaux préparatoires of the Genocide Convention, qualify as a stable and permanent group, in the eyes of both the Rwandan society and the international community. In Rwanda in 1994, the Tutsi constituted an ethnic group.

374. The reference to ethnic origin exists in the Rwandan life today as it did before 1994, although with different connotations, but still used by most Rwandans, inside and outside of the country. All witnesses heard referred to the Tutsi as a particular group and identified themselves before the Chamber by ethnicity.

375. The Chamber notes that the Defence did not challenge the fact that the Tutsi constitutes a group protected under the Genocide Convention, and further notes that the Kayishema and Ruzindana Judgement [104] and the Akayesu Judgement [105] establish that the Tutsi group is a group envisaged by the Genocide Convention.

376. Consequently, after having reviewed all the evidence presented, the Chamber finds that the Tutsi group is characterised by its stability and permanence and is generally accepted as a distinct group in Rwanda. Therefore, the Chamber considers that it constitutes a group protected by the Genocide Convention and, thence, by Article 2 of the Statute.

Regarding paragraph 7, which alleges that at all times relevant to this indictment, a state of internal armed conflict existed in Rwanda:

377. Paragraph 7 of the Indictment alleges that there existed in Rwanda at the time set out in the Indictment a state of internal armed conflict. According to the testimony of Professor Reyntjens, in the early 1990's Rwanda experienced a period of political turmoil while in transition to a multiparty political system. During this time several political parties were organised in opposition to the ruling party MRND. These parties included the Mouvement Démocratique Républicain (MDR), Parti Social Démocrate (PSD), Parti Libéral (PL), Parti Démocrate Chrétien (PDC) and the Coalition pour la Défense de la République (CDR). The Accused testified that these political parties competed to recruit new members. Among the activities to attract newcomers was the creation of youth wings, and the Interahamwe was the youth wing of the MRND.

378. According to the Accused, the term Interahamwe attained a negative connotation and came to be used to describe in popular usage, after 6 April 1994, a large or loosely organized militia which is said to have fought against the RPF[106].

379. Mr Nsanzuwera testified that the Interahamwe evolved from the youth wing of a political party into a militia[107]. Mr Nsanzuwera further testified that, on 5 January 1994, the President of Rwanda was sworn in but he did not swear in a government and the National Assembly as intended by the Arusha Peace Accords. Moreover certain obstacles remained that prevented the full participation of other political parties in the interim government. Consequently, widespread insecurity prevailed in Kigali. On 6 April 1994 the plane carrying President Habyarimana crashed. The interim government appealed to the population to join the civil defence and the RAF to fight against the RPF and eliminate the moderate wing within the government[108].

380. The armed conflict between the government and the RPF resumed. The RPF battalion engaged in hostilities with the RAF, according to testimonies by Mr Reyntjens and Mr Nsanzuwera. Immediately, roadblocks were erected in and around Kigali and later extended to the rest of the country to prevent the penetration of RPF. However, according to testimonies of eyewitnesses heard by the Chamber, and of Mr Reyntjens as expert witness for the Prosecutor[109], one only needed to be a suspected sympathiser of the RPF to be targeted. This resulted in a globalisation of crimes with Tutsis being systematically targeted and eliminated for representing the majority of RPF infiltrators. The Accused further testified that roadblocks were set up initially by civilians who, as the "civil defence" were rallying together against the RPF[110]. According to Mr Nsanzuwera, the civil defence was mainly composed of Interahamwe members and radical youth wings of other political parties like the CDR which aimed at the elimination of the Tutsi as a support for the RPF[111]. The Defence expert witness, Professor Mbonimpa, called the RPF a militia and agreed that militia also had a command structure, wore a different uniform, was armed, and capable of carrying out war. Both sides mobilised people for war through their radios, including the RTLM radio on the government's side. He stated that the RPF said that any force that intervened in the conflict was regarded as an enemy force[112].

381. The Chamber notes the findings in the Akayesu Judgement and finds that the evidence establishes that there existed an internal armed conflict in Rwanda during the time period alleged in the Indictment.

5. LEGAL FINDINGS

5.1 Count 1: Genocide

382. Count 1 covers all the acts described in the Indictment. It is the Prosecutor's contention that, by his acts as alleged in paragraphs 10 to 19 of the Indictment, the Accused committed the crime of genocide punishable by Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute.

383. In its findings supra[113] on the law applicable to the crime of genocide, the Chamber held that for the crime of genocide to be established, it was necessary, firstly, that one of the acts enumerated under Article 2(2) of the Statute be perpetrated; secondly, that such act be directed against a group specifically targeted as such on ethnic, racial or religious grounds; and thirdly, that such act be committed with intent to destroy the targeted group in whole or in part.

Regarding the acts alleged in paragraphs 10 to 19 of the Indictment and based on its factual findings supra, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt of the following:

384. Regarding the facts alleged in paragraph 10, the Chamber finds that it is established beyond any reasonable doubt that, on the afternoon of 8 April 1994, the Accused arrived at Nyarugenge in a pick-up truck, filled with firearms and machetes. The Accused personally distributed weapons to the Interahamwe and ordered them to go to work stating that there was a lot of dirt that needed to be cleaned up. The Accused was carrying a rifle slung over his shoulder and a machete hanging from his belt. The Chamber also finds that it is established beyond any reasonable doubt that on 15 April 1994 in the afternoon, the Accused arrived at the Cyahafi Sector, Nyarugenge Commune, in a pick-up truck. The pick-up was parked near a public standpipe. The Accused got out of the vehicle, opened the back of the truck where the guns were kept. The men who had come with him distributed the weapons to members of the Interahamwe. Immediately after the distribution of rifles, those who received them started shooting. Three persons were shot dead; all were Tutsis. The Chamber also finds that it is established beyond a reasonable doubt that on or about 24 April 1994, in the Cyahafi Sector, the Accused distributed Uzzi guns to the President of the Interahamwe of Cyahafi during an attack by the Interahamwe on the Abakombozi.

385. In the opinion of the Chamber, the Accused is individually criminally responsible by reason of such acts for having aided and abetted in the preparation for and perpetration of killings of members of the Tutsi group and for having caused serious bodily or mental harm to members of said group.

386. With respect to the acts alleged under paragraph 11 of the Indictment, the Prosecutor failed to satisfy the Chamber that such acts are proven beyond any reasonable doubt and that the Accused incurs criminal responsibility as a result.

387. Regarding the allegations included in paragraph 12 of the Indictment, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that in April 1994, Tutsis who had been separated at a roadblock in front of Amgar garage were taken to the office of the Accused inside Amgar garage and that the Accused thereafter directed that these Tutsis be detained within Amgar. The Accused subsequently directed men under his control to take fourteen detainees, at least four of whom were Tutsis, to a deep hole near Amgar garage. On the orders of the Accused and in his presence, his men killed ten of the detainees with machetes. The bodies of the victims were thrown into the hole.

388. In the opinion of the Chamber, the Accused is individually criminally responsible as charged for having ordered, committed, aided and abetted in the preparation and execution of killings of members of the Tutsi group and caused serious bodily or mental harm to members of said group.

389. As concerns the acts alleged in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that these have been established beyond any reasonable doubt. From 7 April to 11 April 1994, several thousand persons, most of them Tutsis, sought refuge at the ETO. Members of the Interahamwe, armed with rifles, grenades, machetes and cudgels gathered outside the ETO. Prior to the attack, the Hutus were separated from the Tutsis who were at the ETO, following which hundreds of Hutus then left the ETO compound. When UNAMIR troops withdrew from the ETO on 11 April 1994, members of the Interahamwe and of the Presidential Guard surrounded the compound and attacked the refugees, throwing grenades, firing shots and killing people with machetes and cudgels. The attack resulted in the deaths of a large number of Tutsis. The Accused was present during the ETO attack, armed with a rifle in the midst of a group of attackers who proceeded to throw grenades and fire shots. He was seen about fifty metres away from the entrance to the ETO. The Chamber finds that it is established beyond any reasonable doubt that the Accused was at the ETO and that he participated in the attack against the Tutsi refugees.

390. A large number of the refugees who managed to escape or survived the attack on the ETO then headed in groups for the Amahoro Stadium. On their way, they were intercepted by soldiers who assembled them close to the Sonatube factory and diverted them towards Nyanza. They were insulted, threatened and killed by soldiers and members of the Interahamwe who were escorting them and who were armed with machetes, cudgels, axes and other weapons. At Nyanza, the Interahamwe forced the refugees to stop; they were assembled and made to sit at the foot of a hill where armed soldiers stood. The refugees were surrounded by Interahamwe and soldiers. The Hutus were asked to stand up and identify themselves and were subsequently allowed to leave. Some Tutsis who tried to leave pretending to be Hutus were killed on the spot by members of the Interahamwe who knew them. Grenades were then hurled into the crowd by the Interahamwe and the soldiers on the hill started shooting. Those who tried to escape were escorted back by the Interahamwe. Many people were killed. After firing shots and throwing grenades at the refugees, the soldiers ordered the Interahamwe to start killing them. Thereupon the Interahamwe started killing, using cudgels and other weapons. Some young girls were singled out, taken aside and raped before being killed. Many of the women who were killed were stripped of their clothing. The soldiers then ordered the Interahamwe to check for survivors and to finish them off. The Accused directed the Interahamwe who were armed with grenades, machetes and clubs into position to surround the refugees just prior to the massacre. The Chamber finds that it has been established beyond any reasonable doubt that the Accused was present and participated in the Nyanza attack. Furthermore, it holds that by his presence, the Accused abetted in the perpetration of the crimes.

391. With respect to the acts alleged against the Accused, as described in paragraphs 13 to 16 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that individual criminal responsibility attached to the Accused for having committed, aided and abetted in the killings of members of the Tutsi group and having caused serious bodily or mental harm to members of the Tutsi group.

392. With respect to the allegations made in paragraph 17 of the Indictment, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has failed to lead evidence in support of the allegations that, in April 1994, the Accused conducted searches in the Masango Commune. Nor has the Prosecutor satisfied the Chamber beyond any reasonable doubt that the Accused instructed that all Tutsis be tracked down and thrown into the river.

393. The Chamber finds, with regard to the events alleged in paragraph 18, that it is established beyond any reasonable doubt that, on 28 April 1994, Interahamwe conducted house-to-house searches in the Agakingiro neighbourhood demanding identity cards from people. Tutsis and people belonging to certain political parties were taken to the "Hindi Mandal" temple, near Amgar garage. The Accused was present at the location where the detainees had been gathered. He was dressed in military uniform, including a coat and trousers, and was carrying a rifle. Among the detainees was Emmanuel Kayitare, alias Rujindiri, a Tutsi. A man called Cekeri told Emmanuel that he knew him and that he was aware that he was going to the National Development Council (CND). Emmanuel became frightened and took off running. The Accused caught Emmanuel by the collar of his shirt to prevent him from running away. He struck Emmanuel Kayitare on the head with a machete, killing him instantly.

394. The Chamber finds that the Accused incurs individual criminal responsibility for such acts for having personally killed a Tutsi and for having aided and abetted in the preparation or causing of serious bodily and mental harm on members of the Tutsi group.

395. Regarding the events alleged in paragraph 19 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that, while it is established that the Accused ordered that the bodies of the victims be buried, the Prosecutor, however, failed to satisfy the Chamber beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused gave such orders in order to conceal his crimes from the international community.

396. In light of the foregoing, the Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused incurs criminal responsibility, under Article 6(1) of the Statute, for having ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the preparation or execution of murders and the causing of serious bodily or mental harm on members of the Tutsi group.

As to whether the above-mentioned acts were committed against the Tutsi group, specifically targeted, as such, and whether the Accused had the requisite intent in committing the above - mentioned acts for which he incurs criminal responsibility:

397. In its findings on the applicable law with respect to the crime of genocide[114], the Chamber held that, in practice, intent may be determined, on a case by case basis, through a logical inference from the material evidence submitted to it, and which establish a consistent pattern of conduct on the part of the Accused. Quoting a text from the findings in the Akayesu Judgement, it holds:

> "On the issue of determining the offender's specific intent, the Chamber considers that the intent is a mental factor which is difficult, even impossible, to determine. This is the reason why, in the absence of a confession from the Accused, his intent can be inferred from a certain number of presumptions of fact. The Chamber considers that it is possible to deduce the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership of a particular group, while excluding the members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act".[115]

398. The Chamber notes that many corroborating testimonies presented at trial show that the Accused actively participated in the widespread attacks and killings committed against the Tutsi group. The Chamber is satisfied that the Accused, who held a position of authority because of his social standing, the reputation of his father and, above all, his position within the Interahamwe, ordered and abetted in the commission of crimes against members of the Tutsi group. He also directly participated in committing crimes against Tutsis. The victims were systematically selected because they belonged to the Tutsi group and for the very fact that they belonged to the said group. As a result, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that, at the time of commission of all the above-mentioned acts which in its opinion are proven, the Accused had indeed the intent to destroy the Tutsi group as such.

399. Moreover, on the basis of evidence proffered at trial and discussed in this Judgement under the section on the general allegations,[116] the Chamber finds that, at the time of the events referred to in the Indictment, numerous atrocities were committed against Tutsis in Rwanda. From the widespread nature of such atrocities, throughout the Rwandan territory, and the fact that the victims were systematically and deliberately selected owing to their being members of the Tutsi group, to the exclusion of individuals who were not members of the said group, the Chamber is able to infer a general context within which acts aimed at destroying the Tutsi group were perpetrated. Consequently, the Chamber notes that such acts as are charged against the Accused were part of an overall context within which other criminal acts systematically directed against members of the Tutsi group, targeted as such, were committed.

400. The Chamber recalls that, in its findings on the general allegations, it also indicated that, in its opinion, the Tutsi group clearly constitutes a protected group, within the meaning of the Convention on genocide.

[116] See Chapter 4, Section 8 of this Judgement.

401. In light of the foregoing, the Chamber is satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt; firstly, that the above-mentioned acts for which the Accused incurs individual responsibility on the basis of the allegations under paragraphs 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 18 of the Indictment, are constitutive of the material elements of the crime of genocide; secondly, that such acts were committed by the Accused with the specific intent to destroy the Tutsi group as such;, and thirdly, that the Tutsi group is a protected group under the Convention on genocide. Consequently, the Chamber finds that the Accused incurs individual criminal responsibility for the crime of genocide.

5.2 Count 2: Crime Against Humanity (extermination)

402. Count 2 of the Indictment charges the Accused with crimes against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Article 3(b) and Article 6(1) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 10 to 19 of the Indictment.

403. In respect of paragraph 10 of the Indictment, the Chambers finds that on 8 April 1994, the Accused arrived at Nyarugenge Commune in a pick-up truck, carrying firearms and machetes. The Accused distributed weapons to the Interahamwe and ordered them to go to work, stating that there was a lot of dirt that needed to be cleaned up.

404. The Chamber finds that on the afternoon of 15 April 1994, the Accused went to Cyahafi Sector, Nyarugenge Commune in a pick-up truck. The Accused opened the back of the truck and the men who were with him distributed weapons to the Interahamwe. The Chamber also finds that on or about 24 April 1994 and in the Cyahafi sector, the Accused distributed fire arms to the President of the Interahamwe of Cyahafi, during an attack by the Interahamwe on the Abakombozi.

405. In respect of the allegations in paragraph 12 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that in April 1994 Tutsis were singled out at a roadblock near the Amgar garage and taken to the Accused, who ordered the detention of these people. The Accused subsequently ordered that 14 detainees be taken to a hole near the Amgar garage. On the orders of the Accused and in his presence, ten of these detainees were killed and their bodies were thrown into the hole.

406. In respect of the allegations in paragraphs 13 and 14 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that several thousand people, mostly Tutsis, sought refuge at the ETO, from 7 to 11 April 1994. Following the departure of UNAMIR from the ETO, on 11 April 1994 , Colonel Leonides Rusatila went into the ETO compound and separated Hutus from Tutsis and several hundred Hutus left the ETO. Thereafter the Interahamwe, together with the Presidential Guard attacked the people in the compound. The Accused was present and participated in this attack. A number of Tutsis, including many family members and others known to the witnesses were killed in the attack.

407. In respect of the allegations in paragraphs 15 and 16 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that the Accused was present and participated in the forced diversion of refugees to Nyanza and that he directed and participated in the attack at Nyanza on 11 April 1994.

408. The Chamber notes that paragraph 16 of the Indictment alleges that certain events, namely the separation of Hutus and Tutsis refugees and the attack on the Tutsis refugees, took place on or about 12 April 1994. As noted by the Prosecutor, these events took place on 11April 1994. The Chamber does not consider this variance to be material, particularly in light of the language "on or about". The sequence of events leading to the massacre is described in paragraphs 14, 15 and 16 of the Indictment as having commenced on 11 April 1994. Moreover, the killing at Nyanza was resumed on the morning of 12 April 1994. The Chamber considers that 11 April 1994 constitutes "on or about April 12, 1994".

409. The Chamber further notes that paragraphs 15 and 16 of the Indictment allege that refugees were transferred to a gravel pit near the primary school of Nyanza, where they were surrounded and attacked. As the Defence indicated in her closing statement, none of the witnesses described the site of the massacre as a gravel pit. The evidence establishes that the refugees were assembled and surrounded at a site at Nyanza, at the base of a nearby hill. The Chamber does not consider the description of this site as a gravel pit in the allegation, to be of the essence to the charges set forth in the Indictment and finds that the allegations set forth in paragraph 15 and 16 of the Indictment have been proved, beyond a reasonable doubt.

410. In respect of the allegations in paragraph 18 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 28 April 1994, Emmanuel Kayitare, together with other people, were taken to the "Hindi Mandal" temple, near the Amgar Garage, where they were detained. The Accused was present at this location, and when Emmanuel Kayitare tried to escape by running off, the Accused grabbed him by his collar and struck him on his head with a machete, which resulted in his death.

411. The Chamber relies on this factual finding to hold the Accused criminally responsible for crimes against humanity (murder), as charged in Count 7 of the Indictment. The Chamber finds that the act of killing Emmanuel Kayitare, taken together with other proven acts, such as, the distribution of fire arms and machetes to the Interahamwe and the killings at ETO and Nyanza, cumulatively form the basis for crimes against humanity (extermination). The Chamber will therefore take into consideration the factual findings in paragraph 18, together with other proven acts, when assessing the responsibility of the Accused, in respect of Count 2.

412. In respect of the allegation in paragraph 19 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that the accused ordered the burial of bodies, in order to conceal the dead from the "'foreigners". The Chamber finds that there is no evidence to suggest that the Accused ordered the burial of bodies to conceal his crimes from the international community. The allegation in paragraph 19 has therefore only been proved in part.

413. In respect of the allegations in paragraphs 11 and 17 of the Indictment, the Chamber finds that these allegations have not been proved, beyond a reasonable doubt.

414. The Chamber notes that Article 6(1) of the Statute, provides that a person who "planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime."

415. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused: aided and abetted in the killings by distributing weapons to the Interahamwe on 8, 15 and 24 April 1994; ordered the killing of 10 people in April 1994 who were subsequently killed in his presence; participated in an attack on the people who sought refuge at the ETO; directed and participated in the attack at Nyanza; murdered Emmanuel Kayitare and by his conduct intended to cause the death of a large number of people belonging to the Tutsi ethnic group, because of their ethnicity.

416. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in the time periods referred to in the indictment there was a widespread and systematic attack on the Tutsi ethnic group, on ethnic grounds. The accused had knowledge of this attack, and he intended his conduct to be consistent with the pattern of this attack and to be a part of this attack.

417. The Chamber therefore finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is individually criminally responsible for crimes against humanity (extermination), pursuant to Articles 2(3)(b) and 6(1) of the Statute.

5.3 Count 3: Crime Against Humanity (murder)

418. Count 3 of the Indictment charges the Accused with crimes against humanity (murder), pursuant to Articles 3(a) and 6(1) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraph 14 of the Indictment.

419. The Chamber notes that pursuant to Count 2 of the Indictment, the Accused is charged for crimes against humanity (extermination), under Articles 3(b) and 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 10-19 of the Indictment, which acts include the attack on the ETO compound, as alleged in paragraph 14. The allegations in paragraph 14 of the indictment also form the basis for Count 3, crimes against humanity (murder)

420. The Chamber concurs with the reasoning in the Akayesu Judgement[117] that:

> "[...] it is acceptable to convict the accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did. However, the Chamber finds that it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where (a) one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, for example, murder and grievous bodily harm, robbery and theft, or rape and indecent assault; or (b) where one offence charges accomplice liability and the other offence charges liability as a principal, e.g. genocide and complicity in genocide."

421. As crimes against humanity, murder and extermination share the same constituent elements of the offence of a crime against humanity, that it is committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds. Both murder and extermination are constituted by unlawful, intentional killing.

Murder is a the killing of one or more individuals, whereas extermination is a crime which is directed against a group of individuals.

422. The Chamber notes that in the Akayesu Judgement, a series of murder charges set forth in individual paragraphs of the Indictment were held collectively to constitute extermination. In that case the individual allegations which formed the basis for counts of murder and at the same time formed the basis for a collective count of extermination were incidents in which named persons had been murdered. In this case, the single allegation of the ETO attack, although charged as murder, is in itself an allegation of extermination, that is the killing of a collective group of individuals.

423. Having held the Accused criminally responsible for his conduct, as alleged in paragraph 14 of the Indictment, in respect of crimes against humanity (extermination), as charged in Count 2, the Chamber finds that he cannot also be held criminally responsible for crimes against humanity (murder), as charged in Count 3 of the Indictment on the basis of the same act.

5.4 Count 5: Crime Against Humanity (murder)

424. Count 5 of the Indictment charges the Accused with crimes against humanity (murder), pursuant to Articles 3(a) and 6(1) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraph 15 and 16 of the Indictment.

425. The Chamber notes that the Accused is charged, pursuant to Count 2 of the Indictment for crimes against humanity (extermination), under Articles 3(b) and 6(1) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraphs 10-19 of the Indictment, which acts include the massacre of Tutsi refugees at Nyanza, as alleged in paragraphs 15 and 16. These allegations also support Count 5, crimes against humanity (murder).

426. For the reasons set forth in the legal findings pertaining to Count 3 above, the Chamber finds that the Accused cannot be held criminally responsible for crimes against humanity (murder), as charged in Count 5 of the Indictment.

5.5 Count 7: Crime Against Humanity (murder)

427. Count 7 of the Indictment charges the Accused with crimes against humanity (murder), pursuant to Articles 3(a) and 6(1) of the Statute, for the acts alleged in paragraph 18 of the Indictment.

428. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that on 28 April 1994, Emmanuel Kayitare together with other people were taken near the Amgar Garage, where they were detained. The Accused was present at this location and when Emmanual Kayitare tried to escape by running off, the Accused grabbed hold of him by his collar and struck him on his head with a machette, which resulted in his death.

429. The Chamber notes that Article 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal provides that a person who "planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime." The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused detained or alternatively aided and abetted in the detention of Tutsis and other people belonging to certain political parties and that he murdered Emmanual Kayitare when the said Kayitare attempted to escape.

430. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Emmanual Kayitare was a civilianbelonging to the Tutsi ethnic group.

431. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that in April 1994 there was a widespread and systematic attack on the Tutsi ethnic group, because of their ethnicity. The accused had knowledge of this attack and he intended the murder of Kayitare to be consistent with the pattern of this attack and to be a part of this attack.

432. The Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused is individually criminally responsible for crimes against humanity (murder), as charged in Count 7 of the Indictment.

5.6 Counts 4, 6, and 8 : Violation of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions (murder)

433. Counts 4, 6 and 8 of the Indictment charge the Accused with violations of Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, as incorporated in Article 4 of the Statute. The Prosecutor has chosen to restrict the wording of these counts to violations of Common Article 3 only, even though Article 4 of the Statute covers both Common Article 3 and also Additional Protocol II of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 1949. As indicated supra by the Chamber[118], Additional Protocol II merely supplements and reaffirms Common Article 3, without modifying the article's field of applicability. The only true difference between the Article and the Protocol is the higher threshold to be met for internal conflicts to be characterized as meeting the requirements of the Additional Protocol.

434. The Prosecutor, in her closing brief, outlined the elements of the offences and the burden of proof with which she was laden. In so doing, she developed not only the material requirements to be met for an offence to constitute a serious violation of Common Article 3, but also presented to the Chamber the material requirements to be met for Additional Protocol II to be applicable. It thus transpires from her argumentation that she intended to prove that the material requirements of both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II had to be met before any finding of guilt could be made with regard to counts 4, 6 and 8 of the Indictment. Moreover, were any doubt to remain as to whether the Prosecutor needs to demonstrate that Common Article 3 is applicable, or that both Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II are applicable, the Chamber recalls that in criminal proceedings, matters in doubt should be interpreted in favour of the Accused. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber considers the material requirements of Article 4 of the Statute to be indivisible, in other words, that Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II must be satisfied conjunctively, before an offence can be deemed to be covered by Article 4 of the Statute. Thus, it is the opinion of the Chamber that for a finding of guilt to be made for any one of counts

[118] See section 2.4 of Applicable Law

4, 6 and 8 of the Indictment, the Chamber must be satisfied that the material requirements of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II have to be met. Consequently, the Prosecutor must prove that at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment there existed an internal armed conflict in the territory of Rwanda, which, at the very least, satisfied the material requirements of Additional Protocol II, as these requirements subsume those of Common Article 3.

435. On the basis of evidence presented in this case by Professor Reyntjens, Mr. Nsanzuwera, Professor Mbonimpa and Captain Lemaire, the Chamber is satisfied that at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, namely, in April, May and June 1994, there existed an internal armed conflict between, on the one hand, the government forces and, on the other, the dissident armed forces, the RPF. The RPF were under the responsible command of General Kagame and exercised such control over part of their territory as to enable them to carry on sustained and concerted military operations. The RPF also stated to the International Committee of the Red Cross that it considered itself bound by the rules of international humanitarian law[119]. Moreover, the theater of combat in April 1994 included the town of Kigali, as the opposing forces fought to gain control of the capital.

[119] See Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on his Mission to Rwanda 11-12 May 1994, paragraph 20.

436. Evidence adduced in support of the paragraphs contained in the general allegations, and more specifically paragraphs 7 and 8, and also the allegations set out in paragraphs 14, 15, 16 and 18 of the Indictment, demonstrate that the victims of the offences were unarmed civilians, men, women and children who had been identified as the "targets" on the basis of their ethnicity. Those persons who had carried weapons were disarmed by the UNAMIR troops on entering the ETO compound. The Chamber does not consider that the bearing of these weapons prior to being disarmed deprived the victims of the protection afforded to them by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II. Indeed, the Chamber is not of the opinion that these "armed" civilians were taking a direct part in the hostilities, but rather finds that the bearing of these weapons was a desperate and futile attempt at survival against the thousands of armed assailants.

437. The Chamber is satisfied that the victims were persons taking no active part in the hostilities and were thus protected persons under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II.

438. The Accused was in a position of authority vis-à-vis the Interahamwe militia. Testimonies in this case have demonstrated that the Accused exerted control over the Interahamwe, that he distributed weapons to them during the events alleged in this Indictment, aiding and abetting in the commission of the crimes and directly participating in the massacres with the Interahamwe. The expert witness, Mr. Nsanzuwera, testified that the Interahamwe militia served two roles during April, May and June 1994, on the one hand, they supported the RAF war effort against the RPF, and on the other hand, they killed Tutsi and Hutu opponents.

439. Moreover, as testified by Mr. Nsanzuwera, there is merit in the submission of the Prosecutor that, considering the position of authority of the Accused over the Interahamwe, and the role that the Interahamwe served in supporting the RAF against the RPF, there is a nexus between the crimes committed and the armed conflict. In support thereof, the Prosecutor argues that the Interahamwe were the instrument of the military in extending the scope of the massacres.

440. Thus, the Chamber is also satisfied that the Accused, as second vice-president of the youth wing of the MRND, being known as the Interahamwe za MRND and being the youth wing of the political majority in the government in April 1994, falls within the category of persons who can be held individually responsible for serious violations of the provisions of Article 4 of the Statute.

441. The Prosecutor argues that the Interahamwe orchestrated massacres as part of their support to the RAF in the conflict against the RPF, and as the Accused was in a position of authority over the Interahamwe, that, ipso facto, the acts of the Accused also formed part of that support. Such a conclusion, without being supported by the necessary evidence, is, in the opinion of the Chamber, insufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused is individually criminally responsible for serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II. Consequently, the Chamber finds that the Prosecutor has not shown how the individual acts of the Accused, as alleged in the Indictment, during these massacres were committed in conjunction with the armed conflict.

442. Moreover, in the opinion of the Chamber, although the Genocide against the Tutsis and the conflict between the RAF and the RPF are undeniably linked, the Prosecutor cannot merely rely on a finding of Genocide and consider that, as such, serious violations of Common Article 3 and Additional Protocol II are thereby automatically established. Rather, the Prosecutor must discharge her burden by establishing that each material requirement of offences under Article 4 of the Statute are met.

443. The Chamber therefore finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that there existed a nexus between the culpable acts committed by the Accused and the armed conflict.

444. Consequently, the Chamber finds the Accused not guilty of Counts 4, 6, and 8 of the Indictment, being serious violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions (murder), as incorporated under Article 4 (a) of the Statute.

6. VERDICT

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, having considered all of the evidence and the arguments, THE CHAMBER unanimously finds as follows:

Count 1:	Guilty of Genocide
Count 2:	Guilty of Crime Against Humanity (Extermination)
Count 3:	Not Guilty of Crime Against Humanity (Murder)
Count 4:	Not Guilty of Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)
Count 5:	Not Guilty of Crime Against Humanity (Murder)
Count 6:	Not Guilty of Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)
Count 7:	Guilty of Crime Against Humanity (Murder)
Count 8:	Not Guilty of Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions (Murder)

7. SENTENCE

445. The Chamber will now summarize the legal texts relating to sentences and penalties and their enforcement, before going on to specify the applicable scale of sentences, on the one hand, and the general principles governing the determination of penalties, on the other.

A. Applicable texts

446. The Chamber will apply the statutory and regulatory provisions hereafter. Article 22 of the Statute on judgement, Articles 23 and 26 dealing respectively with penalties and enforcement of sentences, Rules 101, 102, 103 and 104 of the Rules which cover respectively sentencing procedure on penalties, status of the convicted person, place and supervision of imprisonment.

B. Scale of sentences applicable to the Accused found guilty of one of the crimes listed in Articles 2, 3 or 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal

447. The Tribunal may impose on an accused who pleads guilty or is convicted as such, penalties ranging from prison terms up to and including life imprisonment. The Statute of the Tribunal excludes other forms of punishment such as the death sentence, penal servitude or a fine.

448. Whereas in most national systems the scale of penalties is determined in accordance with the gravity of the offence, the Chamber notes that the Statute does not rank the various crimes falling under the jurisdiction of the Tribunal and, thereby, the sentence to be handed down. In theory, the sentences are the same for each of the three crimes, namely a maximum term of life imprisonment.

449. It should be noted, however, that in imposing the sentence, the Trial Chamber should take into account, in accordance with Article 23 (2) of the Statute, such factors as the gravity of the offence. In the opinion of the Chamber, it is difficult to rank genocide and crimes against humanity as one being the lesser of the other in terms of their respective gravity. The Chamber holds that both crimes against humanity, already punished by the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals, and genocide, a concept defined later, are crimes which are particularly shocking to the collective conscience.

450. Regarding the crime of genocide, in particular, the preamble to the Genocide Convention recognizes that at all periods of history, genocide has inflicted great losses on humanity and reiterates the need for international cooperation to liberate humanity from such an odious scourge. The crime of genocide is unique because of its element of dolus specialis, (special intent) which requires that the crime be committed with the intent 'to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such', as stipulated in Article 2 of the Statute; hence the Chamber is of the opinion that genocide constitutes the "crime of crimes", which must be taken into account when deciding the sentence.

451. There is no argument that, precisely on account of their extreme gravity, crimes against humanity and genocide must be punished appropriately. Article 27 of the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal empowered that Tribunal, pursuant to Article 6(c) of the said Charter, to sentence any accused found guilty of crimes against humanity to death or such other punishment as shall be determined by it to be just.

452. Rwanda, like all the States which have incorporated crimes against humanity or genocide in their domestic legislation, provides the most severe penalties for such crimes under its criminal legislation. To this end, the Rwandan Organic Law on the Organization of Prosecutions for Offences constituting Genocide or Crimes against Humanity, committed since 1 October 1990, [120], groups accused persons into four categories, according to their acts of criminal participation. Included in the first category are the masterminds of the crimes (planners, organizers), persons in positions of authority, and persons who have exhibited excessive cruelty and perpetrators of sexual violence. All such persons are punishable by the death penalty. The second category covers perpetrators, conspirators or accomplices in criminal acts, for whom the prescribed penalty is life imprisonment. Included in the third category are persons who, in addition to committing a substantive offence, are guilty of other serious assaults against the person. Such persons face a short-term imprisonment. The fourth category is that of persons who have committed offences against property.

453. Reference to the practice of sentencing in Rwanda and to the Organic law is for purposes of guidance. While referring as much as practicable to such practice of sentencing, the Chamber maintains its unfettered discretion to pass sentence on persons found guilty of crimes falling within its jurisdiction, taking into account the circumstances of the case and the individual circumstances of the accused persons.

C. General principles regarding the determination of sentences

454. In determining the sentence, the Chamber shall be mindful of the fact that this Tribunal was established by the Security Council pursuant to Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations within the context of measures the Council was empowered to take under Article 39 of the said Charter to ensure that violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda in 1994 were halted and effectively redressed. The objective was to prosecute and punish the perpetrators of the atrocities in Rwanda in such a way as to put an end to impunity and thereby to promote national reconciliation and the restoration of peace.

455. That said, it is clear that the penalties imposed on accused persons found guilty by the Tribunal must be directed, on the one hand, at retribution of the said accused, who must see their crimes punished, and over and above that, on other hand, at deterrence, namely to dissuade for ever, others who may be tempted in the future to perpetrate such atrocities by showing them that the international community shall not tolerate the serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.

456. The Chamber also recalls that, in the determination of sentences, it is required under Article 23(2) of the Statute and Rule 101(B) of the Rules to take into account a number of factors including the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the convicted person, the existence of any aggravating or mitigating circumstances, including the substantial co-operation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after his conviction. It is a matter, as it were, of individualizing the penalty.

457. Clearly, however, as far as the individualization of penalties is concerned, the judges of the Chamber cannot limit themselves to the factors mentioned in the Statute and the Rules. Here again, their unfettered discretion in assessing the facts and attendant circumstances should enable them to take into account any other factor that they deem pertinent.

458. Similarly, the factors referred to in the Statute and in the Rules cannot be interpreted as having to be applied cumulatively in the determination of the sentence.

D. Submissions of the Parties

Prosecutor's submissions

459. In her final brief and in her closing argument made in open court on 16 June 1999, the Prosecutor submitted that the crimes committed by Rutaganda, in particular the crime of genocide and crimes against humanity, are of extremely serious offences calling for appropriate punishment. She submitted that the Chamber should take into account the status of Rutaganda in the society, his individual role in the execution of the crimes, his motivation, his mental disposition and his will, the attendant circumstances of his crimes and his behaviour after the criminal acts.

460. The Prosecutor submitted that the following aggravating circumstances are such as to justify a more severe sentence in this matter:

(i) Rutaganda was known in society as the second vice-president of the Interahamwe at the national level. He also was a rich businessman;

(ii) His criminal participation extended to all levels. He acted as a principal authority at Amgar garage, ETO and Nyanza massacres. He incited to kill and he also killed with his own hands. He provided logistical support in distributing weapons;

(iii) He endorsed the genocidal plan of the interim government. At the same time, he seized the occasion for his personal gain;

(iv) He played a leading role in the genocide. He killed or ordered his victims to be killed in cold blood;

(v) He ordered the Interahamwe to kill the victims with various blunt and sharp weapons in complete disregard for the suffering of the individual victim.

The victims were placed in a world of total persecution which lasted for 100 days;

(vi) In his capacity as direct supervisor of the Interahamwe at Amgar garage, he failed to punish the perpetrators. In fact, he was one of the principal offenders.

461. Furthermore, the Prosecutor submits that there are no mitigating circumstances. The Accused did not cooperate with the Prosecutor. He has shown no remorse for his crimes.

462. With regard to the issue of multiple sentences which could be imposed on Rutaganda as envisaged by Rule 101(c) of the Rules, the Prosecutor asked for separate sentences for each of the counts on which Rutaganda was found guilty while specifying that the Accused should serve the more severe sentence. The Prosecutor, submitted that the Chamber should impose a sentence for each offence committed in order to fully recognize the seriousness of each crime, and the particular role of the convicted person in its commission.

463. In conclusion, the Prosecutor recommends life imprisonment for each count for which the accused is convicted.

Defence's submissions

464. During the final arguments hearing, the Defence submitted that Rutaganda is innocent and asked that he be acquitted of all the eight counts charged. The Accused himself expressed his sorrow to the Rwandan population especially those who live in his native land. He called on the Chamber to consider especially his health condition and though he did not feel he was guilty, he prayed that the Chamber afford him time to live with his children, should it find him guilty.

E. Personal circumstances of Georges Rutaganda

465. Rutaganda was born on 28 November 1958. His father was a prominent person in Rwanda. Rutaganda is married and has three children. He was a rich businessman. He was a member of MRND at the national and prefectural levels. He served as the second vice- president of the Interahamwe at the national level.

466. The Chamber has scrupulously examined all the submissions presented by the parties in determination of sentence; from which it derives the following:

F. Aggravating circumstances

(i) Gravity of the Offences:

467. The offences with which the accused Georges Rutaganda is charged are, indisputably, extremely serious, as the Trial Chamber already pointed out when it described genocide as the "crime of crimes".

(ii) The position of authority of Georges Rutaganda in the Interahamwe

468. Rutaganda was the second vice- president of the Interahamwe at the national level. The Chamber finds that the fact that a person in a high position abused his authority and committed crimes is to be viewed as an aggravating factor.

(iii) The role played by Rutaganda in the execution of the crimes

469. The Chamber finds that Rutaganda played an important leading role in the execution of the crimes. He distributed weapons to the Interahamwe for the purpose of killling Tutsis. He positioned the Interahamwe at Nyanza and incited and ordered the killing of Tutsis on several occasions. As a second vice president of the Interahamwe,. He killed Emmanuel Kayitare, alias Rujindiri, a Tutsi, by stricking him on the head with a machete.

G. Mitigating circumstances

(i) Assistance given by Georges Rutaganda to certain people

470. The Defence alleges that Georges Rutaganda, during the period of the commission of the crimes with which he is charged, helped people to evacuate to various destinations at various times and by various means. The Chamber accepts, as mitigating factors, the fact that Rutaganda had evacuated the families of witnesses DEE and DS and that he had used exceptional means to save witness DEE, the Tutsi wife of one of his friends and that he provided food and shelter to some refugees.

(ii) Rutaganda's health condition

471. Rutaganda requested that the Chamber consider his present health condition. The Chamber notes that Rutaganda is in poor health and has had to seek medical help continously.

472. Having reviewed all the circumstances of the case, the Chamber is of the opinion that the aggravating factors outweigh the mitigating factors, especially as Rutaganda occupied a high position in the Interahamwe at the time the crimes were committed. He knowingly and consciously participated in the commission of such crimes and never showed remorse for what he inflicted upon the victims.

I. INTRODUCTION

1. The Indictment against Zejnil Delali}, Zdravko Muci}, Hazim Deli} and Esad Land`o, confirmed on 21 March 1996, alleged serious violations of humanitarian law that occurred in 1992 when Bosnian Muslim and Bosnian Croat forces took control of villages within the Konjic municipality in central Bosnia and Herzegovina. The present appeal concerns events within the Konjic municipality, where persons were detained in a former Yugoslav People's Army ("JNA") facility: the Čelebići camp. The Trial Chamber found that detainees were killed, tortured, sexually assaulted, beaten and otherwise subjected to cruel and inhumane treatment by Muci}, Deli} and Land`o.[2] Muci} was found to have been the commander of the ^elebi}i camp, Deli} the deputy commander and Land`o a prison guard.

2. In various forms, Delali} was co-ordinator of Bosnian Muslim and Bosnian Croat forces in the Konjic area between approximately April and September 1992. He was found not guilty of twelve counts of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and violations of the laws or customs of war. The Trial Chamber concluded that Delali} did not have sufficient command and control over the Čelebići camp or the guards that worked there to entail his criminal responsibility for their actions.[3]

3. Muci} was found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and of violations of the laws or customs of war for crimes including murder, torture, inhuman treatment and unlawful confinement, principally on the basis of his superior responsibility as commander of the Čelebići camp, but also, in respect of certain counts, for his direct participation in the crimes.[4] Muci} was sentenced to seven years imprisonment.[5] Delić was found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and violations of the laws or customs of war for his direct participation in crimes including murder, torture, and inhuman treatment.[6] Delić was sentenced to twenty years imprisonment.[7] Landžo was found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and violations of the laws or customs of war, for crimes including murder, torture, and cruel treatment, and sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment.[8]

4. The procedural background of the appeal proceedings is found in Annex A, which also contains a complete list of the grounds of appeal. Certain of the grounds of appeal of the individual parties dealt with substantially the same subject matter, and certain grounds of appeal of Land`o were joined by Muci} and Deli}. For that reason, this judgement considers the various grounds of appeal grouped by subject matter, which was also the way the different grounds of appeal were dealt with during oral argument.

II. GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO ARTICLE 2 OF THE STATUTE

5. Deli}, Muci} and Landžo have raised two closely related issues in relation to the findings of the Trial Chamber based on Article 2 of the Statute. The first is the question of the legal test for determining the nature of the conflict, and the second, that of the criteria for establishing whether a person is "protected" under Geneva Convention IV. Delić has raised a third issue as to whether Bosnia and Herzegovina was a party to the Geneva Conventions at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment.

A. Whether the Trial Chamber Erred in Holding that the Armed Conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina at the Time Relevant to the Indictment was of an International Character

6. Deli},[9] Muci},[10] and Land`o[11] challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that the armed conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina was international at all times relevant to the Indictment. Relying upon the reasoning of the majority in the Tadi} and Aleksovski first instance Judgements, the appellants argue that the armed conflict was internal at all times. It is submitted that the Trial Chamber used an incorrect legal test to determine the nature of the conflict and that the test set out by the majority of the Tadi} Trial Chamber, the "effective control" test, based on Nicaragua,[12] is the appropriate test. In the appellants' opinion, applying this correct test, the facts as found by the Trial Chamber do not support a finding that the armed conflict was international. Consequently, the appellants seek a reversal of the verdict of guilty on the counts of the Indictment based upon Article 2 of the Statute.[13]

[9] Hazim Deli}'s Ground 8, as set out in the Appellant-Cross Appellee Hazim Deli}'s Designation of the Issues on Appeal, 17 May 2000, reads: Whether the Trial Chamber erred in holding that the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina was an international armed conflict at the times relevant to this indictment. Counsel for Deli} presented the arguments in relation to this ground of appeal on behalf of all appellants at the hearing.

[10] Zdravko Muci}'s Ground 5, as set out in Appellant Zdravko Muci}'s Final Designation of His Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000, reads: Whether the Trial Chamber erred in holding that the conflict as described in this case in Bosnia-Herzegovina was an International Armed Conflict at the times relevant to this indictment.

[11] Esad Land`o's Ground 5, as set out in the Land`o Brief, reads: The Trial Chamber erred in law and fact in finding that an international armed conflict existed with reference to the events alleged to have occurred at the ^elebi}i camp.

[12] Case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v U.S.) (Merits), 1986 ICJ Reports 14 ("Nicaragua").

[13] In addition, Deli} argues that the Prosecution included the allegation of international armed conflict in each count of the Indictment. Consequently in his view, all the counts should be dismissed, as this allegation has become an element of each offence charged. Moreover, it is argued that because the Prosecution relied on the allegation of an international conflict to invoke the Tribunal's jurisdiction, the Appeals Chamber should dismiss the entire indictment for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. Deli} Brief, paras 227-248.

7. The Prosecution submits that these grounds of appeal should be dismissed. It submits that the correct legal test for determining whether an armed conflict is international was set forth by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, which rejected the "effective control" test in relation to acts of armed forces or paramilitary units. Relying upon the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Prosecution contends that the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous decision.

8. As noted by the Prosecution, the issue of the correct legal test for determining whether an armed conflict is international was addressed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement. In the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber found that "in the interests of certainty and predictability, the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous decisions, but should be free to depart from them for cogent reasons in the interests of justice".[14] Elaborating on this principle, the Chamber held:

> Instances of situations where cogent reasons in the interests of justice require a departure from a previous decision include cases where the previous decision has been decided on the basis of a wrong legal principle or cases where a previous decision has been given per incuriam, that is a judicial decision that has been "wrongly decided, usually because the judge or judges were ill-informed about the applicable law."
>
> It is necessary to stress that the normal rule is that previous decisions are to be followed, and departure from them is the exception. The Appeals Chamber will only depart from a previous decision after the most careful consideration has been given to it, both as to the law, including the authorities cited, and the facts.
> What is followed in previous decisions is the legal principle (ratio decidendi), and the obligation to follow that principle only applies in similar cases, or substantially similar cases. This means less that the facts are similar or substantially similar, than that the question raised by the facts in the subsequent case is the same as the question decided by the legal principle in the previous decision. There is no obligation to follow previous decisions which may be distinguished for one reason or another from the case before the court.[15]

In light of this finding, the Aleksovski Appeals Chamber followed the legal test set out in the Tadić Appeal Judgement in relation to internationality.

9. Against this background, the Appeals Chamber will turn to the question of the applicable law for determining whether an armed conflict is international.

[14] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 107.
[15] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, paras 108-110 (footnote omitted).

1. What is the Applicable Law?

10. The Appeals Chamber now turns to a consideration of the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, and to the relevant submissions of the parties in this regard, in order to determine whether, applying the principle set forth in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, there are any cogent reasons in the interests of justice for departing from it.[16]

11. From the outset, the Appeals Chamber notes that the findings of the Trial Chamber majorities in the Tadi} and Aleksovski Judgements, upon which the appellants rely, were overturned on appeal.

12. In the Tadi} case, the Appeals Chamber was concerned with, inter alia, the legal criteria for establishing when, in an armed conflict which is prima facie internal, armed forces may be regarded as acting on behalf of a foreign power, thereby rendering the conflict international.

13. The Appeals Chamber saw the question of internationality as turning on the issue of whether the Bosnian Serb forces "could be considered as de iure or de facto organs of a foreign power, namely the FRY".[17] The important question was "what degree of authority or control must be wielded by a foreign State over armed forces fighting on its behalf in order to render international an armed conflict which is prima facie internal".[18] The Chamber considered, after a review of various cases including Nicaragua, that international law does not always require the same degree of control over armed groups or private individuals for the purpose of determining whether they can be regarded as a de facto organ of the State. The Appeals Chamber found that there were three different standards of control under which an entity could be considered de facto organ of the State, each differing according to the nature of the entity. Using this framework, the Appeals Chamber determined that the situation with which it was concerned fell into the second category it identified,[19] which was that of the acts of armed forces or militias or paramilitary units.

[16] Although the appellants' and the Prosecution's Briefs were filed prior to the issue of the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the appellants and the Prosecution were given an opportunity to present submissions on these issues at the hearing.

[17] Tadi} Appeal Judgement, para 87.

[18] Ibid, para 97 (emphasis in original).

[19] The other categories identified by the Appeals Chamber were (1) acts by a single private individual or a group that is not militarily organised, to which the applicable standard is that of "specific instructions" or public endorsement or approval ex post facto by the State, para 137; and (3) acts of individuals assimilated to State organs on account of their actual behaviour within the structure of a State, regardless of the existence of State instructions, paras 141-144.

14. The Appeals Chamber determined that the legal test which applies to this category was the "overall control" test:

> In order to attribute the acts of a military or paramilitary group to a State, it must be proved that the State wields overall control over the group, not only by equipping and financing the group, but also by co-ordinating or helping in the general planning of its military activity. [...] However, it is not necessary that, in addition, the State should also issue, either to the head or to members of the group, instructions for the commission of specific acts contrary to international law.[20]

15. Overall control was defined as consisting of more than "the mere provision of financial assistance or military equipment or training".[21] Further, the Appeals Chamber adopted a flexible definition of this test, which allows it to take into consideration the diversity of situations on the field in present-day conflicts:

> This requirement, however, does not go so far as to include the issuing of specific orders by the State, or its direction of each individual operation. Under international law it is by no means necessary that the controlling authorities should plan all the operations of the units dependent on them, choose their targets, or give specific instructions concerning the conduct of military operations and any alleged violations of international humanitarian law. The control required by international law may be deemed to exist when a State (or in the context of an armed conflict, the Party to the conflict) has a role in organising, coordinating or planning the military actions of the military group, in addition to financing, training and equipping or providing operational support to that group. Acts performed by the group or members thereof may be regarded as acts of de facto State organs regardless of any specific instruction by the controlling State concerning the commission of each of those acts.[22]

16. The Appeals Chamber in Tadi} considered Nicaragua in depth, and based on two grounds, held that the "effective control" test enunciated by the ICJ was not persuasive.

17. Firstly, the Appeals Chamber found that the Nicaragua "effective control" test did not seem to be consonant with the "very logic of the entire system of international law on State responsibility",[23] which is "not based on rigid and uniform criteria".[24] In the Appeals Chamber's view, "the whole body of international law on State responsibility is based on a realistic concept of accountability, which disregards legal formalities".[25] Thus, regardless of whether or not specific instructions were issued, the international responsibility of the State may be engaged.[26]

[24] Ibid, para 117.

[26] Ibid, para 123.

18. Secondly, the Appeals Chamber considered that the Nicaragua test is at variance with judicial and State practice. Relying on a number of cases from claims tribunals, national and international courts, and State practice, the Chamber found that, although the "effective control" test was upheld by the practice in relation to individuals or unorganised groups of individuals acting on behalf of States, it was not the case in respect of military or paramilitary groups.[27]

19. The Appeals Chamber found that the armed forces of the Republika Srpska were to be regarded as acting under the overall control of, and on behalf of, the FRY, sharing the same objectives and strategy, thereby rendering the armed conflict international.

20. The Appeals Chamber, after considering in depth the merits of the Nicaragua test, thus rejected the "effective control" test, in favour of the less strict "overall control" test. This may be indicative of a trend simply to rely on the international law on the use of force, jus ad bellum, when characterising the conflict. The situation in which a State, the FRY, resorted to the indirect use of force against another State, Bosnia and Herzegovina, by supporting one of the parties involved in the conflict, the Bosnian Serb forces, may indeed be also characterised as a proxy war of an international character. In this context, the "overall control" test is utilised to ascertain the foreign intervention, and consequently, to conclude that a conflict which was prima facie internal is internationalised.

21. The appellants argue that the findings of the Tadi} Appeal Judgement which rejected the "correct legal test" set out in Nicaragua are erroneous as the Tribunal is bound by the ICJ's precedent.[28] It is submitted that when the ICJ has determined an issue, the Tribunal should follow it, (1) because of the ICJ's position within the United Nations Charter, and (2) because of the value of precedent.[29] Further, even if the ICJ's decisions are not binding on the Tribunal, the appellants submits that it is "undesirable to have two courts (...) having conflicting decisions on the same issue".[30]

22. The Prosecution rebuts this argument with the following submissions: (1) The two courts have different jurisdictions, and in addition, the ICJ Statute does not provide for precedent. It would thus be odd that the decisions of the ICJ which are not strictly binding on [28] Deli} Reply, para 99; also adopted by Land'o.

[29] At the appeal hearing counsel for Deli} submitted that the Tribunal is bound by the ICJ's decisions because the ICJ is the "primary judicial organ of the organisation of the United Nations" (Appeal Transcript, p 375), and "essentially the Supreme Court of the United Nations" (ibid, p 376), whereas the Tribunal is "an organ of another principal organ, the Security Council" (ibid, p 375).

itself would be binding on the Tribunal which has a different jurisdiction.[31] (2) The Appeal Chamber in the Tadi} appeal made specific reference to Nicaragua and held it not to be persuasive.[32] (3) Judge Shahabuddeen in a dissenting opinion in an ICTR decision found that the differences between the Tribunal and the ICJ do not prohibit recourse to the relevant jurisprudence on relevant matters, and that the Tribunal can draw some persuasive value from the ICJ's decisions, without being bound by them.[33]

23. The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by the appellants' argument. The Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, addressing the argument that it should not follow the Nicaragua test in relation to the issue at hand as the two courts have different jurisdiction, held:

> What is at issue is not the distinction between two classes of responsibility. What is at issue is a preliminary question: that of the conditions on which under international law an individual may be held to act as a de facto organ of a State.[34]

24. The Appeals Chamber agrees that "so far as international law is concerned, the operation of the desiderata of consistency, stability, and predictability does not stop at the frontiers of the Tribunal. [...] The Appeals Chamber cannot behave as if the general state of the law in the international community whose interests it serves is none of its concern".[35] However, this Tribunal is an autonomous international judicial body, and although the ICJ is the "principal judicial organ"[36] within the United Nations system to which the Tribunal belongs, there is no hierarchical relationship between the two courts. Although the Appeals Chamber will necessarily take into consideration other decisions of international courts, it may, after careful consideration, come to a different conclusion.

25. An additional argument submitted by Land'o is that the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision accurately decided that the conflict was internal. The Appeals Chamber notes that this argument was previously raised by the appellants at trial. The Trial Chamber then concluded that it is "incorrect to contend that the Appeals Chamber has already settled the matter of the nature of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision the Chamber found that 'the conflicts in the former Yugoslavia have both internal and international aspects' and deliberately left the question of the nature of particular conflicts open for the Trial Chamber to determine".[37] The Appeals Chamber fully agrees with this conclusion.

26. Applying the principle enunciated in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, this Appeals Chamber is unable to conclude that the decision in the Tadi} was arrived at on the basis of the application of a wrong legal principle, or arrived at per incuriam. After careful consideration of the arguments put forward by the appellants, this Appeals Chamber is unable to find cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from the law as identified in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement.[38] The "overall control" test set forth in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement is thus the applicable criteria for determining the existence of an international armed conflict.

27. The Appeals Chamber will now examine the Trial Judgement in order to ascertain what test was applied.

2. Has the Trial Chamber Applied the "Overall Control" Test?

28. The Appeals Chamber first notes that the Tadi} Appeal Judgement which set forth the "overall control" test had not been issued at the time of the delivery of the Trial Judgement. The Appeals Chamber will thus consider whether the Trial Chamber, although not, from a formal viewpoint, having applied the "overall control" test as enunciated by the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, based its conclusions on a legal reasoning consistent with it.

29. The issue before the Trial Chamber was whether the armed forces of the Bosnian Serbs could be regarded as acting on behalf of the FRY, in order to determine whether after its withdrawal in May 1992[39] the conflict continued to be international or instead became internal. More specifically, along the lines of Tadi}, the relevant issue is whether the Trial Chamber came to the conclusion that the Bosnian Serb armed forces could be regarded as having been under the overall control of the FRY, going beyond the mere financing and equipping of such forces, and involving also participation in the planning and supervision of military operations after 19 May 1992.[40]

30. The Prosecution submits that the test applied by the Trial Chamber is consistent with the "overall control" test.[41] In the Prosecution's submission, the Trial Chamber adopted the "same approach" as subsequently articulated by the Appeals Chamber in Tadić and Aleksovski. Further, the Trial Judgement goes through the "exact same facts, almost as we found in the Tadić decision".[42] The Prosecution contends that the Appeals Chamber has already considered the same issues and facts in the Tadić appeal, and found that the same conflict was international after May 1992. In the Prosecution's opinion, the Trial Chamber's conclusion that "the government of the FRY was the [...] controlling force behind the VRS"[43] is consistent with Tadić.

3. The Nature of the Conflict Prior to 19 May 1992

31. The Trial Chamber first addressed the question of whether there was an international armed conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina in May 1992 and whether it continued throughout the rest of that year, i.e., at the time relevant to the charges alleged in the Indictment.[44]

32. The Trial Chamber found that a "significant numbers of [JNA] troops were on the ground when the [BH] government declared the State's independence on 6 March 1992".[45] Further, "there is substantial evidence that the JNA was openly involved in combat activities in Bosnia and Herzegovina from the beginning of March and into April and May of 1992."[46] The Trial Chamber therefore concluded that:

> [...] an international armed conflict existed in Bosnia and Herzegovina at the date of its recognition as an independent State on 6 April 1992. There is no evidence to indicate that the hostilities which occurred in the Konjic municipality at that time were part of a separate

[44] Trial Judgement, para 211. The Trial Chamber relied upon the ICRC Commentary (GC IV) to hold: "We are not here examining the Konjic municipality and the particular forces involved in the conflict in that area to determine whether it was international or internal. Rather, should the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina be international, the relevant norms of international humanitarian law apply throughout its territory until the general cessation of hostilities."
[45] Ibid, para 212.

armed conflict and, indeed, there is some evidence of the involvement of the JNA in the fighting there.[47]

33. The Trial Chamber's finding as to the nature of the conflict prior to 19 May 1992 is based on a finding of a direct participation of one State on the territory of another State. This constitutes a plain application of the holding of the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} that it "is indisputable that an armed conflict is international if it takes place between two or more States",[48] which reflects the traditional position of international law. The Appeals Chamber is in no doubt that there is sufficient evidence to justify the Trial Chamber's finding of fact that the conflict was international prior to 19 May 1992.

4. The Nature of the Conflict After 19 May 1992

34. The Trial Chamber then turned to the issue of the character of the conflict after the alleged withdrawal of the external forces it found to be involved prior to 19 May 1992.[49] Based upon, amongst other matters, an analysis of expert testimony and of Security Council resolutions, it found that after 19 May 1992, the aims and objectives of the conflict remained the same as during the conflict involving the FRY and the JNA prior to that date, i.e., to expand the territory which would form part of the Republic. The Trial Chamber found that "[t]he FRY, at the very least, despite the purported withdrawal of its forces, maintained its support of the Bosnian Serbs and their army and exerted substantial influence over their operations".[50]

35. The Trial Chamber concluded that "[d]espite the formal change in status, the command structure of the new Bosnian Serb army was left largely unaltered from that of the JNA, from which the Bosnian Serbs received their arms and equipment as well as through local SDS organisations".[51]

36. In discussing the nature of the conflict, the Trial Chamber did not rely on Nicaragua, noting that, although "this decision of the ICJ constitutes an important source of jurisprudence on various issues of international law", the ICJ is "a very different judicial body concerned with rather different circumstances from the case in hand".[52]

37. The Trial Chamber described its understanding of the factual situation upon which it was required to make a determination as being > [...] characterised by the breakdown of previous State boundaries and the creation of new ones. Consequently, the question which arises is one of continuity of control of particular forces. The date which is consistently raised as the turning point in this matter is that of 19 May 1992, when the JNA apparently withdrew from Bosnia and Herzegovina.[53]

38. It continued:

> The Trial Chamber must keep in mind that the forces constituting the VRS had a prior identity as an actual organ of the SFRY, as the JNA. When the FRY took control of this organ and subsequently severed the formal link between them, by creating the VJ and VRS, the presumption remains that these forces retained their link with it, unless otherwise demonstrated.[54]

39. Along the lines of Judge McDonald's Dissenting Opinion in the Tadi} case (which it cited), the Trial Chamber found that:

> [...] the withdrawal of JNA troops who were not of Bosnian citizenship, and the creation of the VRS and VJ, constituted a deliberate attempt to mask the continued involvement of the FRY in the conflict while its Government remained in fact the controlling force behind the Bosnian Serbs. From the level of strategy to that of personnel and logistics the operations of the JNA persisted in all but name. It would be wholly artificial to sever the period before 19 May 1992 from the period thereafter in considering the nature of the conflict and applying international humanitarian law.[55]

40. The appellants submit that the Trial Chamber did not rely on any legal test to classify the conflict, i.e., it failed to pronounce its own test to determine whether an intervening State has sufficient control over insurgents to render an internal conflict international.[56] On the other hand, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber classified the conflict on the basis of whether the Prosecution had proved that the FRY/VJ was the "controlling force behind the Bosnian Serbs".[57]

41. The Appeals Chamber disagrees with the appellants' submission that the Trial Chamber did not rely on any legal test to determine the issue. The Trial Chamber appears to have relied on a "continuity of control" test in considering the evidence before it, in order to determine whether the nature of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, which was international until a point in May 1992, had subsequently changed. The Trial Chamber thus relied on a "control" test, evidently less strict than the "effective control" test. The Trial Chamber did not focus on the issuance of specific instructions, which underlies the "effective control" test.[58] In assessing the evidence, however, the Trial Chamber clearly had regard to all the elements pointing to the influence and control retained over the VRS by the VJ, as required by the "overall control" test.

42. The method employed by the Trial Chamber was later considered as the correct approach in Aleksovski. The Aleksovski Appeals Chamber indeed interpreted the "overall control" test as follows:

> The "overall control" test calls for an assessment of all the elements of control taken as a whole, and a determination to be made on that basis as to whether there was the required degree of control. Bearing in mind that the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Judgement arrived at this test against the background of the "effective control" test set out by the decision of the ICJ in Nicaragua, and the "specific instructions" test used by the Trial Chamber in Tadi}, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to say that the standard established by the "overall control" test is not as rigorous as those tests. [59]

43. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber's assessment of the effect in reality of the formal withdrawal of the FRY army after 19 May 1992 was based on a careful examination of the evidence before it. That the Trial Chamber indeed relied on this approach is evidenced by the use of phrases such as "despite the attempt at camouflage by the authorities of the FRY",[60] or "despite the formal change in status"[61] in the discussion of the evidence before it.

44. An additional argument submitted by Land'o in support of his contention that the Trial Chamber decided the issue wrongly is based on the agreement concluded under the auspices of the ICRC on 22 May 1992. In Land'o's opinion, this agreement, which was based on common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, shows that the conflict was considered by the parties to it to be internal.[62] The Appeals Chamber fully concurs with the Trial Chamber's finding that the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision's reference to the agreement "merely demonstrates that some of the norms applicable to international armed conflicts were specifically brought into force by the parties to the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, some of whom may have wished it to be considered internal, and does not show that the conflict must therefore have been internal in nature".[63]

45. The appellants further argue that the Trial Chamber relied on a "presumption" that the FRY/VJ still exerted control over the VRS after 19 May 1992 to determine the nature of the conflict. The Trial Chamber thus used an "incorrect legal test" when it concluded that because of the former existing links between the FRY and the VRS, the FRY/VJ retained control over the VRS.[64] The Prosecution responds that it is unfounded to suggest that the Trial Chamber shifted to the Defence the burden of proving that the conflict did not remain international after the withdrawal of the JNA.

46. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that although the use of the term "presumption" by the Trial Chamber may not be appropriate, the approach it followed, i.e., assessing all of the relevant evidence before it, including that of the previous circumstances, is correct. This approach is clearly in keeping with the Appeals Chamber's holding in Tadi} that in determining the issue of the nature of the conflict, structures put in place by the parties should not be taken at face value. There it held:

> Undue emphasis upon the ostensible structures and overt declarations of the belligerents, as opposed to a nuanced analysis of the reality of their relationship, may tacitly suggest to groups who are in de facto control of military forces that responsibility for the acts of such forces can be evaded merely by resort to a superficial restructuring of such forces or by a facile declaration that the reconstituted forces are henceforth independent of their erstwhile sponsors.[65]

47. The Trial Chamber's finding is also consistent with the holding of the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} that "[w]here the controlling State in question is an adjacent State with territorial ambitions on the State where the conflict is taking place, and the controlling State is attempting to achieve its territorial enlargement through the armed forces which it controls, it may be easier to establish the threshold".[66] The "overall control" test could thus be fulfilled even if the armed forces acting on behalf of the "controlling State" had autonomous choices of means and tactics although participating in a common strategy along with the "controlling State".

[64] Deli} Brief, paras 208-213.
[66] Tadi} Appeal Judgement, para 140.

48. Although the Trial Chamber did not formally apply the "overall control" test set forth by the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Trial Chamber's legal reasoning is entirely consistent with the previous jurisprudence of the Tribunal. The Appeals Chamber will now turn to an additional argument of the parties concerning the Trial Chamber's factual findings.

49. Despite submissions in their briefs that suggested that the appellants wished the Appeals Chamber to review the factual findings of the Trial Chamber in addition to reviewing its legal conclusion,[67] the appellants submitted at the hearing that they "just ask the Court to apply the proper legal test to the facts that were found by the Trial Chamber".[68] The Appeals Chamber will thus not embark on a general assessment of the Trial Chamber's factual findings.

50. The Trial Chamber came to the conclusion, as in the Tadi} case, that the armed conflict taking place in Bosnia and Herzegovina after 19 May 1992 could be regarded as international because the FRY remained the controlling force behind the Bosnian Serbs armed forces after 19 May 1992. It is argued by the parties[69] that the facts relied upon in the present case are very similar to those found in the Tadi} case. As observed previously, however, a general review of the evidence before the Trial Chamber does not fall within the scope of this appeal. It suffices to say that this Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the facts as found by the Trial Chamber fulfil the legal conditions as set forth in the Tadi} case.

51. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Deli}'s Ground 8, Muci}'s Ground 5, and Land`o's Ground 5 must fail.

B. Whether the Bosnian Serbs Detained in the ^elebi}i Camp were Protected Persons Under Geneva Convention IV

[67] In the Deli} Brief at p 85 it is argued "while the FRY may have supported the Bosnian Serbs and even given general guidance, (it) lacked sufficient control over (them) to impute the actions of the Bosnian Serbs to the FRY." Deli} also submits at p 99 that the Appeals Chamber "should conduct a de novo review of the Trial Chamber's holding, giving due weight to the historical facts as found by the Trial Chamber and recited in its judgement but determining the legal test itself." At the same time, Deli} accepts that, at p 86, "many of the factual findings of the Trial Chamber are not controversial". Land`o submits that the evidence clearly shows that the conflict which resulted in the events at the ^elebi}i camp was not international, Land`o Brief pp 43-47.

nationals of Bosnia and Herzegovina for the purposes of the category of persons protected und Geneva Convention IV. They contend that the Trial Chamber's conclusions are inconsistent with international law and Bosnian law. The appellants request that the Appeals Chamber enter judgements of acquittal on all counts based on Article 2 of the Statute.

53. The Prosecution submits that the appellants' grounds of appeal have no merit and that the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous jurisprudence on the issue, as set out in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, and confirmed by the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement. It submits that it is now settled in that jurisprudence that in an international conflict victims may be considered as not being nationals of the party in whose hands they find themselves, even if, as a matter of national law, they were nationals of the same State as the persons by whom they are detained. Further, the Prosecution submits that the test applied by the Trial Chamber is consistent with the Tadi} Appeal Judgement.

54. As noted by the Prosecution, the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} has previously addressed the issue of the criteria for establishing whether a person is "protected" under Geneva Convention IV. In accordance with the principle set out in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, as enunciated in paragraph 8 of this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber will follow the law in relation to protected persons as identified in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, unless cogent reasons in the interests of justice exist to depart from it.

55. After considering whether cogent reasons exist to depart from the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber will turn to an analysis of the Trial Chamber's findings so as to determine whether it applied the correct legal principles to determine the nationality of the victims for the purpose of the application of the grave breaches provisions.

Conventions of 1949. Muci}'s Ground 4, as set out in Appellant Zdravko Muci}'s Final Designation of His Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000, reads: Whether the Trial Chamber erred at [sic] holding that Bosnian citizens of Serbian ethnicity should be treated as non-nationals of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and were therefore protected persons as defined in Article 4 of the Geneva Convention IV. Deli}'s Ground 4, as set out in the Appellant-Cross Appellee Hazim Deli}'s Designation of the Issues on Appeal, 17 May 2000, reads: Whether the Trial Chamber erred in holding that Bosnian citizens of Serbian ethnicity should be treated as non-nationals of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and were therefore protected persons as defined in Article 4 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War. Land`o's Ground 6, as set out in the Land`o Brief, reads: The Trial Chamber erred in law by finding that the victims of the alleged crimes were "protected persons" for the purpose of the Geneva Conventions.

1. What is the Applicable Law?

56. Article 2 of the Statute of the Tribunal provides that it has the power to prosecute persons who committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions "against persons or property protected under the provisions of the relevant Geneva Conventions".[71] The applicable provision to ascertain whether Bosnian Serbs detained in the ^elebi}i camp can be regarded as victims of grave breaches is Article 4(1) of Geneva Convention IV on the protection of civilians, which defines "protected persons" as "those in the hands of a Party to the conflict or Occupying Power of which they are not nationals." The Appeals Chamber in Tadi} found that:

> [...] the Convention intends to protect civilians (in enemy territory, occupied territory or the combat zone) who do not have the nationality of the belligerent in whose hands they find themselves, or who are stateless persons. In addition, as is apparent from the preparatory work, the Convention also intends to protect those civilians in occupied territory who, while having the nationality of the Party to the conflict in whose hands they find themselves, are refugees and thus no longer owe allegiance to this Party and no longer enjoy its diplomatic protection....[72]

57. The Appeals Chamber held that "already in 1949 the legal bond of nationality was not regarded as crucial and allowance was made for special cases".[73] Further, relying on a teleological approach, it continued:

> [...] Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, if interpreted in the light of its object and purpose, is directed to the protection of civilians to the maximum extent possible. It therefore does not make its applicability dependent on formal bonds and purely legal relations. [...] In granting its protection, Article 4 intends to look to the substance of relations, not to their legal characterisation as such.[74]

58. The Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski endorsed the Tadi} reasoning holding that "Article 4 may be given a wider construction so that a person may be accorded protected status, notwithstanding the fact that he is of the same nationality as his captors."[75]

59. The appellants submit that the Appeals Chamber decisions in Tadi} and Aleksovski wrongly interpreted Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, and that the Tadi} and Aleksovski Trial Chamber Judgements are correct. It is essentially submitted that in order for victims to gain "protected persons" status, Geneva Convention IV requires that the person in question be of a different nationality than the perpetrators of the alleged offence, based on the national law on citizenship of Bosnia and Herzegovina. This interpretation is based on a "strict" interpretatic of the Convention which is, in the appellants' view, mandated by the "traditional rules of treaty interpretation".

60. The Prosecution contends that the Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski already adopted the approach used in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement,[76] and that the appellants in this case have not demonstrated any "cogent reasons in the interests of justice" that could justify a departure by the Appeals Chamber from its previous decisions on the issue.

61. Before turning to these arguments, the Appeals Chamber will consider an additional argument submitted by the appellants which goes to the status of the Tadi} Appeal Judgement statement of the law and may be conveniently addressed as a preliminary matter.

62. The appellants submit that the Tadi} statements on the meaning of protected persons are dicta, as in their view the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} and Aleksovski cases derived the protected persons status of the victims from the finding that the perpetrators were acting on behalf of the FRY or Croatia.[77] The Prosecution on the other hand submits that the Appeals Chamber's statement in Tadi} was part of the ratio decidendi.[78]

63. While the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} appears to have reached a conclusion as to the status of the victims as protected persons based on the previous finding that the Bosnian Serbs acted as de facto organs of another State, the FRY,[79] it set forth a clear statement of the law as to the applicable criteria to determine the nationality of the victims for the purposes of the Geneva Conventions. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that this statement of the applicable law, which was endorsed by the Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski, falls within the scope of the Aleksovski statement in relation to the practice of following previous decisions of the Appeals Chamber.

64. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the main arguments relied upon by the appellants, namely that the Appeals Chamber's interpretation of the nationality requirement is wrong as it is (1) contrary to the "traditional rules of treaty interpretation"; and (2) inconsistent with the national laws of Bosnia and Herzegovina on citizenship.

[78] Prosecution Response to Supplementary Brief, pp 8-9.
[79] Tadi} Appeal Judgement, para 167.

65. The appellants submit that "the traditional rules of treaty interpretation" should be applied to interpret strictly the nationality requirement set out in Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.[80] The word "national" should therefore be interpreted according to its natural and ordinary meaning.[81] The appellants submit in addition that if the Geneva Conventions are now obsolete and need to be updated to take into consideration a "new reality", a diplomatic conference should be convened to revise them.[82]

66. The Prosecution on the other hand contends that the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969[83] provides that the ordinary meaning is the meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of their object and purpose.[84] It is submitted that the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} found that the legal bond of nationality was not regarded as crucial in 1949, i.e., that there was no intention at the time to determine that nationality was the sole criteria.[85] In addition, adopting the appellants' position would result in the removal of protections from the Geneva Conventions contrary to their very object and purpose.[86]

67. The argument of the appellants relates to the interpretative approach to be applied to the concept of nationality in Geneva Convention IV. The appellants and the Prosecution both rely on the Vienna Convention in support of their contentions. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the parties that it is appropriate to refer to the Vienna Convention as the applicable rules of interpretation, and to Article 31 in particular, which sets forth the general rule for the interpretation of treaties. The Appeals Chamber notes that it is generally accepted that these provisions reflect customary rules.[87] The relevant part of Article 31 reads as follows:

> A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.

Its statement on the customary status of Article 31 was endorsed in the Case concerning Maritime Delimitation and Territorial Questions between Qatar and Bahrain (Jurisdiction and Admissibility), Judgement of 15 February 1995, ICJ Reports (1995), p 18 at para 33.

68. The Vienna Convention in effect adopted a textual, contextual and a teleological approach of interpretation, allowing for an interpretation of the natural and ordinary meaning of the terms of a treaty in their context, while having regard to the object and purpose of the treaty.

69. In addition, Article 32 of the Vienna Convention, entitled "Supplementary means of interpretation", provides that:

> Recourse may be had to supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion, in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of article 31, or to determine the meaning when the interpretation according to article 31:
>
> (a) leaves the meaning ambiguous and obscure; or
> (b) leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable.

70. Where the interpretative rule set out in Article 31 does not provide a satisfactory conclusion recourse may be had to the travaux préparatoires as a subsidiary means of interpretation.

71. In finding that ethnicity may be taken into consideration when determining the nationality of the victims for the purposes of the application of Geneva Convention IV, the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} concluded:

> Under these conditions, the requirement of nationality is even less adequate to define protected persons. In such conflicts, not only the text and the drafting history of the Convention but also, and more importantly, the Convention's object and purpose suggest that allegiance to a Party to the conflict and, correspondingly, control by this Party over persons in a given territory, may be regarded as the crucial test.[88]

72. This reasoning was endorsed by the Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski:

> The Appeals Chamber considers that this extended application of Article 4 meets the object and purpose of Geneva Convention IV, and is particularly apposite in the context of present-day inter-ethnic conflicts.[89]

73. The Appeals Chamber finds that this interpretative approach is consistent with the rules of treaty interpretation set out in the Vienna Convention. Further, the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} only relied on the travaux préparatoires to reinforce its conclusion reached upon an examination of the overall context of the Geneva Conventions. The Appeals Chamber is thus unconvinced by the appellants' argument and finds that the interpretation of the nationality requirement of Article 4 in the Tadi} Appeals Judgement does not constitute a rewriting of Geneva Convention IV or a "re-creation" of the law.[90] The nationality requirement in Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV should therefore be ascertained within the context of the object and purpose of humanitarian law, which "is directed to the protection of civilians to the maximum extent possible".[91] This in turn must be done within the context of the changing nature of the armed conflicts since 1945, and in particular of the development of conflicts based on ethnic or religious grounds.

74. The other set of arguments submitted by the appellants relates to the national laws of Bosnia and Herzegovina on citizenship, and the applicable criteria to ascertain nationality. The appellants contend that the term "national" in Geneva Convention IV refers to nationality as defined by domestic law. It is argued that according to the applicable law of Bosnia and Herzegovina on citizenship at the time relevant to the Indictment, the Bosnian Serbs were of Bosnian nationality. In the appellants' submission, all former citizens of the former Socialist Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina (including those of Serbian ethnic origin), one of the constituent republics of the SFRY, became Bosnian nationals when the SFRY was dissolved and Bosnia and Herzegovina was recognised as an independent State in April 1992.[92] Further, FRY citizenship was limited to residents in its constituent parts, and the law of Bosnia and Herzegovina did not provide a possibility for its citizens of Serb ethnic background to opt for FRY citizenship.[93] Delali} submits that in addition, the Bosnian Serbs subsequently agreed to the Dayton Agreement, which provides that they are nationals of Bosnia and Herzegovina.[94]

75. The appellants' arguments go to the issue of whether domestic laws are relevant to determining the nationality of the victims for the purpose of applying the Geneva Conventions. As observed above, however, the nationality requirement of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV is to be interpreted within the framework of humanitarian law.

76. It is a settled principle of international law that the effect of domestic laws on the international plane is determined by international law. As noted by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Case of Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia, "[f]rom the standpoint of International Law and of the Court which is its organ, municipal laws ar merely facts which express the will and constitute the activities of States, in the same manner as do legal decisions or administrative measures".[95] In relation to the admissibility of a claim within the context of the exercise of diplomatic protection based on the nationality granted by a State, the ICJ held in Nottebohm:[96]

> But the issue which the Court must decide is not one which pertains to the legal system of Liechtenstein. It does not depend on the law or on the decision of Liechtenstein whether that State is entitled to exercise its protection, in the case under consideration. To exercise protection, to apply to the Court, is to place oneself on the plane of international law. It is international law which determines whether a State is entitled to exercise protection and to seize the Court.[97]

77. The ICJ went on to state that "[i]nternational practice provides many examples of acts performed by States in the exercise of their domestic jurisdiction which do not necessarily or automatically have international effect".[98] To paraphrase the ICJ in Nottebohm, the question at issue must thus be decided on the basis of international law; to do so is consistent with the nature of the question and with the nature of the Tribunal's own functions. Consequently, the nationality granted by a State on the basis of its domestic laws is not automatically binding on an international tribunal which is itself entrusted with the task of ascertaining the nationality of the victims for the purposes of the application of international humanitarian law. Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, when referring to the absence of national link between the victims and the persons in whose hands they find themselves, may therefore be considered as referring to a nationality link defined for the purposes of international humanitarian law, and not as referring to the domestic legislation as such. It thus falls squarely within the competence of this Appeals Chamber to ascertain the effect of the domestic laws of the former Yugoslavia within the international context in which this Tribunal operates.

78. Relying on the ICRC Commentary to Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, the appellants further argue that international law cannot interfere in a State's relations with its own nationals, except in cases of genocide and crimes against humanity.[99] In the appellants' view, in the situation of an internationalised armed conflict where the victims and the perpetrators are of the same nationality, the victims are only protected by their national laws.[100]

79. The purpose of Geneva Convention IV in providing for universal jurisdiction only in relation to the grave breaches provisions was to avoid interference by domestic courts of other States in situations which concern only the relationship between a State and its own nationals. The ICRC Commentary (GC IV), referred to by the appellants, thus stated that Geneva Convention IV is "faithful to a recognised principle of international law: it does not interfere in a State's relations with its own nationals".[101] The Commentary did not envisage the situation of an internationalised conflict where a foreign State supports one of the parties to the conflict, and where the victims are detained because of their ethnicity, and because they are regarded by their captors as operating on behalf of the enemy. In these circumstances, the formal national link with Bosnia and Herzegovina cannot be raised before an international tribunal to deny the victims the protection of humanitarian law. It may be added that the government of Bosnia and Herzegovina itself did not oppose the prosecution of Bosnian nationals for acts of violence against other Bosnians based upon the grave breaches regime.[102]

80. It is noteworthy that, although the appellants emphasised that the "nationality" referred to in Geneva Convention IV is to be understood as referring to the legal citizenship under domestic law, they accepted at the hearing that in the former Yugoslavia "nationality", in everyday conversation, refers to ethnicity.[103]

81. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Prosecution that depriving victims, who arguably are of the same nationality under domestic law as their captors, of the protection of the Geneva Conventions solely based on that national law would not be consistent with the object and purpose of the Conventions. Their very object could indeed be defeated if undue emphasis were placed on formal legal bonds, which could also be altered by governments to shield their nationals from prosecution based on the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions. A more purposive and realistic approach is particularly apposite in circumstances of the dissolution of Yugoslavia, and in the emerging State of Bosnia and Herzegovina where various parties were engaged in fighting, and the government was opposed to a partition based on ethnicity, which would have resulted in movements of population, and where, ultimately, th issue at stake was the final shape of the State and of the new emerging entities.

82. In Tadi}, the Appeals Chamber, relying on a teleological approach, concluded that formal nationality may not be regarded as determinative in this context, whereas ethnicity may reflect more appropriately the reality of the bonds:

> This legal approach, hinging on substantial relations more than on formal bonds, becomes all the more important in present-day international armed conflicts. While previously wars were primarily between well-established States, in modern inter-ethnic armed conflicts such as that in the former Yugoslavia, new States are often created during the conflict and ethnicity rather than nationality may become the grounds for allegiance. Or, put another way, ethnicity may become determinative of national allegiance.[104]

83. As found in previous Appeals Chamber jurisprudence, Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV is to be interpreted as intending to protect civilians who find themselves in the midst of an international, or internationalised, conflict to the maximum extent possible. The nationality requirement of Article 4 should therefore be ascertained upon a review of "the substance of relations"[105] and not based on the legal characterisation under domestic legislation. In today's ethnic conflicts, the victims may be "assimilated" to the external State involved in the conflict, even if they formally have the same nationality as their captors, for the purposes of the application of humanitarian law, and of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV specifically. The Appeals Chamber thus agrees with the Tadi} Appeal Judgement that "even if in the circumstances of the case the perpetrators and the victims were to be regarded as possessing the same nationality, Article 4 would still be applicable".[106]

84. Applying the principle enunciated in Aleksovski, the Appeals Chamber sees no cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from the Tadi} Appeal Judgement. The nationality of the victims for the purpose of the application of Geneva Convention IV should not be determined on the basis of formal national characterisations, but rather upon an analysis of the substantial relations, taking into consideration the different ethnicity of the victims and the perpetrators, and their bonds with the foreign intervening State.

85. It is therefore necessary to consider the findings of the Trial Chamber to ascertain whether it applied these principles correctly.

2. Did the Trial Chamber Apply the Correct Legal Principles?

86. As in the section relating to the nature of the conflict, the Appeals Chamber first notes that the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, which set forth the law applicable to the determination of protected person status, had not been issued at the time of the issue of the Trial Judgement. The Appeals Chamber will thus consider whether the Trial Chamber, although having not, from a formal viewpoint, applied the reasoning of the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement, based its conclusions on legal reasoning consistent with it.

87. The issue before the Trial Chamber was whether the Bosnian Serb victims in the hands of Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Croats could be regarded as protected persons, i.e., as having a different nationality from that of their captors.

88. The appellants argue that the Bosnian Serb victims detained in the ^elebi}i camp were clearly nationals of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and cannot be considered as FRY nationals. Thus, the victims could not be considered as "protected persons". The Prosecution on the other hand contends that the test applied by the Trial Chamber was consistent with the Tadi} Appeal Judgement.

89. It is first necessary to address a particular argument before turning to an examination of the Trial Chamber's findings. Delali} submits, contrary to the Prosecution's assertions, the Tadi} Appeal Judgement does not govern the protected persons issue in this case, because the facts of the two cases are dramatically different.[107] The Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski observed that the principle that the Appeals Chamber will follow its previous decisions "only applies in similar cases, or substantially similar cases. This means less that the facts are similar or substantially similar, than that the question raised by the facts in the subsequent case is the same as the question decided by the legal principle in the previous decision".[108]

90. In Tadi} and Aleksovski the perpetrators were regarded as acting on behalf of an external party, the FRY and Croatia respectively, and the Bosnian Muslim victims were considered as protected persons by virtue of the fact that they did not have the nationality of the party in whose hands they found themselves. By contrast, in this case, where the accused are Bosnian Muslim or Bosnian Croat, no finding was made that they were acting on behalf of a foreign State, whereas the Bosnian Serb victims could be regarded as having links with the party (the

[108] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 110.

Bosnian Serb armed forces) acting on behalf of a foreign State (the FRY). However, although the factual circumstances of these cases are different, the legal principle which is applicable to the facts is identical. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds the appellant's argument unconvincing.

91. The Trial Chamber found that the Bosnian Serb victims could be regarded "as having been in the hands of a party to the conflict of which they were not nationals, being Bosnian Serbs detained during an international armed conflict by a party to that conflict, the State of Bosnia and Herzegovina".[109] The Trial Chamber essentially relied on a broad and purposive approach to reach its conclusion, rejecting the proposition that a determination of the nationality of the victims should be based on the domestic laws on citizenship.

92. The Trial Chamber first emphasised the role played by international law in relation to nationality,[110] holding that "the International Tribunal may choose to refuse to recognise (or give effect to) a State's grant of its nationality to individuals for the purposes of applying international law".[111] It then nevertheless found that "[a]n analysis of the relevant laws on nationality in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992 does not, however, reveal a clear picture. At that time, as we have discussed, the State was struggling to achieve its independence and all the previous structures of the SFRY were dissolving. In addition, an international armed conflict was tearing Bosnia and Herzegovina apart and the very issue which was being fought over concerned the desire of certain groups within its population to separate themselves from that State and join with another".[112] The Trial Chamber also noted that "the Bosnian Serbs, in their purported constitution of the SRBH, proclaimed that citizens of the Serb Republic were citizens of Yugoslavia".[113]

93. The Trial Chamber also declined to rely upon the argument presented by the Prosecution's expert Professor Economides that there is an emerging doctrine in international law of the right to the nationality of one's own choosing. Finding that the principle of a right of option was not a settled rule of international law, the Trial Chamber held that this principle could not be, of itself, determinative in viewing the Bosnian Serbs to be non-nationals of Bosnia and Herzegovina.[114]

[112] Trial Judgement, para 251.
[113] Trial Judgement, para 253.

94. The Trial Chamber discussed the nationality link in the light of the Nottebohm case and concluded:

> Assuming that Bosnia and Herzegovina had granted its nationality to the Bosnian Serbs, Croats and Muslims in 1992, there may be an insufficient link between the Bosnian Serbs and that State for them to be considered Bosnian nationals by this Trial Chamber in the adjudication of the present case. The granting of nationality occurred within the context of the dissolution of a State and a consequent armed conflict. Furthermore, the Bosnian Serbs had clearly expressed their wish not to be nationals of Bosnia and Herzegovina by proclaiming a constitution rendering them part of Yugoslavia and engaging in this armed conflict in order to achieve that aim. Such finding would naturally be limited to the issue of the application of international humanitarian law and would be for no wider purpose. It would also be in the spirit of that law by rendering it as widely applicable as possible.[115]

95. In the light of its finding on the international character of the conflict, the Trial Chamber held that it is "possible to regard the Bosnian Serbs as acting on behalf of the FRY in its continuing armed conflict against the authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina".[116] The Bosnian Serb victims could thus be considered as having a different nationality from that of their captors.

96. That the Trial Chamber relied upon a broad and purposive, and ultimately realistic, approach[117] is indicated by the following references which concluded its reasoning:

> [T]his Trial Chamber wishes to emphasise the necessity of considering the requirements of article 4 of the Fourth Geneva Convention in a more flexible manner. The provisions of domestic legislation on citizenship in a situation of violent State succession cannot be determinative of the protected status of persons caught up in conflicts which ensue from such events. The Commentary to the Fourth Geneva Convention charges us not to forget that "the Conventions have been drawn up first and foremost to protect individuals, and not to serve State interests" and thus it is the view of this Trial Chamber that their protections should be applied to as broad a category of persons as possible. It would indeed be contrary to the intention of the Security Council, which was concerned with effectively addressing a situation that it had determined to be a threat to international peace and security, and with ending the suffering of all those caught up in the conflict, for the International Tribunal to deny the application of the Fourth Geneva Convention to any particular group of persons solely on the basis of their citizenship status under domestic law.[118]

97. The Appeals Chamber finds that the legal reasoning adopted by the Trial Chamber is consistent with the Tadić reasoning. The Trial Chamber rejected an approach based upon formal national bonds in favour of an approach which accords due emphasis to the object and purpose of the Geneva Conventions.[119] At the same time, the Trial Chamber took ir consideration the realities of the circumstances of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, holding that "(t)he law must be applied to the reality of the situation".[120] Although in some respects the legal reasoning of the Trial Chamber may appear to be broader than the reasoning adopted by the Appeals Chamber, this Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the conclusions reached fall within the scope of the Tadi} reasoning. As submitted by the Prosecution,[121] the Trial Chamber correctly sought to establish whether the victims could be regarded as belonging to the opposing side of the conflict.

98. The Appeals Chamber particularly agrees with the Trial Chamber's finding that the Bosnian Serb victims should be regarded as protected persons for the purposes of Geneva Convention IV because they "were arrested and detained mainly on the basis of their Serb identity" and "they were clearly regarded by the Bosnian authorities as belonging to the opposing party in an armed conflict and as posing a threat to the Bosnian State".[122]

99. The Trial Chamber's holding that its finding "would naturally be limited to the issue of the application of international humanitarian law and would be for no wider purpose"[123] also follows closely the Appeals Chamber's position that the legal test to ascertain the nationality of the victims is applicable within the limited context of humanitarian law, and for the specific purposes of the application of Geneva Convention IV in cases before the Tribunal. Land'o submitted in his brief that the Trial Chamber's finding suggests that a person can have one nationality for the purposes of national law, and another for purposes of international law, which, in his opinion, is contrary to international law. He also contended that the Trial Chamber's holding involuntarily deprives all Bosnian Serbs of their nationality. The argument that the Trial Chamber's findings have the consequence of regulating the nationality of the victims in the national sphere is unmeritorious. It should be made clear that the conclusions reached by international judges in the performance of their duties do not have the effect of regulating the nationality of these persons vis à vis the State within the national sphere. Nor do they purport to pronounce on the internal validity of the laws of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Prosecution that the Trial Chamber did not act unreasonably in not giving weight to the evidence led by the Defence concerning the nationality of the particular victims under domestic law.

100. The appellants submit arguments based upon the "effective link" test derived from the ICJ case Nottebohm.[124] In their view, the following indicia should be taken into consideration when assessing the nationality link of the victims with the FRY: place of birth, of education, of marriage, of vote, and habitual residence; the latter being, they submit, the most important criterion.

101. The Nottebohm case was concerned with ascertaining the effects of the national link for the purposes of the exercise of diplomatic protection, whereas in the instant case, the Appeals Chamber is faced with the task of determining whether the victims could be considered as having the nationality of a foreign State involved in the conflict, for the purposes of their protection under humanitarian law. It is thus irrelevant to demonstrate, as argued by the appellants, that the victims and their families had their habitual residence in Bosnia and Herzegovina, or that they exercised their activities there. Rather, the issue at hand, in a situation of internationalised armed conflict, is whether the victims can be regarded as not sharing the same nationality as their captors, for the purposes of the Geneva Conventions, even if arguably they were of the same nationality from a domestic legal point of view.

102. Although the Trial Chamber referred to the Nottebohm "effective link" test in the course of its legal reasoning, its conclusion as to the nationality of the victims for the purposes of the Geneva Conventions did not depend on that test. The Trial Chamber emphasised that "operating on the international plane, the International Tribunal may choose to refuse to recognise (or give effect to) a State's grant of its nationality to individuals for the purposes of applying international law".[125] Further, the Trial Chamber when assessing the nationality requirement clearly referred to the specific circumstances of the case and to the specific purposes of the application of humanitarian law.

103. Delali} further submitted that the Trial Chamber altered international law in relying upon the "secessionist activities" of the Bosnian Serbs to reach its conclusion, as the right to self-determination is not recognised in international law.[126]

104. It is irrelevant to determine whether the activities with which the Bosnian Serbs were associated were in conformity with the right to self-determination or not. As previously stated, the question at issue is not whether this activity was lawful or whether it is in compliance with the right to self-determination. Rather, the issue relevant to humanitarian law is whether the civilians detained in the ^elebi}i camp were protected persons in accordance with Geneva Convention IV.

105. Deli} also submits that the Trial Chamber's finding that the Bosnian Serb victims were not Bosnian nationals is at odds with its factual conclusions that Bosnian Serbs were Bosnian citizens for the purpose of determining the existence of an international armed conflict.[127] This argument has no merit. Contrary to the Appellant's contention, the findings of the Trial Chamber are not contradictory. In finding that the conflict which took place in Bosnia and Herzegovina was of an international character, the Trial Chamber merely concluded that a foreign State was involved and was supporting one of the parties in a conflict that was prima facie internal. This finding did not purport to make a determination as to the nationality of the party engaged in fighting with the support of the foreign State.

3. Conclusion

106. The Appeals Chamber finds that the legal reasoning applied by the Trial Chamber is consistent with the applicable legal principles identified in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement. For the purposes of the application of Article 2 of the Statute to the present case, the Bosnian Serb victims detained in the ^elebi}i camp must be regarded as having been in the hands of a party to the conflict, Bosnia and Herzegovina, of which they were not nationals. The appellants' grounds of appeal therefore fail.

C. Whether Bosnia and Herzegovina was a Party to the Geneva Conventions at the Time of the Events Alleged in the Indictment

107. Delić challenges the Trial Chamber's findings of guilt based on Article 2 of the Statute, which vests the Tribunal with the jurisdiction to prosecute grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Deli} contends that because Bosnia and Herzegovina did not "accede" to the Geneva Conventions until 31 December 1992, i.e., after the events alleged in the Indictment, his acts committed before that date cannot be prosecuted under the treaty regime of grave breaches.[128] Delić also argues that the Geneva Conventions do not constitute customary law. Therefore, in his opinion, the application of the Geneva Conventions to acts which occurred before the date of Bosnia and Herzegovina's "accession" to them would violate the principle of legality or nullem crimen sine lege.[129] All counts based on Article 2 of the Statute in the Indictment should, he argues, thus be dismissed.

108. The Prosecution contends that regardless of whether or not Bosnia and Herzegovina was bound by the Geneva Conventions qua treaty obligations at the relevant time, the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions reflected customary international law at all material times.[130] Further, Bosnia and Herzegovina was bound by the Geneva Conventions as a result of their instrument of succession deposited on 31 December 1992, which took effect on the date on which Bosnia and Herzegovina became independent, 6 March 1992.[131]

109. The Appeals Chamber first takes note of the "declaration of succession" deposited by Bosnia and Herzegovina on 31 December 1992 with the Swiss Federal Council in its capacity as depositary of the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

110. Bosnia and Herzegovina's declaration of succession may be regarded as a "notification of succession" which is now defined by the 1978 Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties as "any notification, however phrased or named, made by a successor State expressing its consent to be considered as bound by the treaty".[132] Thus, in the case of the replacement of a State by several others, "a newly independent State which makes a notification of succession [...] shall be considered a party to the treaty from the date of the succession of States or from the date of entry into force of the treaty, whichever is the later date.[133] The date of 6 March 1992 is generally accepted as the official date of Bosnia and Herzegovina's independence (when it became a sovereign State) and it may be considered that it became an official party to the Geneva Conventions from this date.[134] Indeed, the Swiss Federal Council subsequently notified the State parties to the Geneva Conventions that Bosnia and Herzegovina "became a party to the Conventions [...] at the date of its independence, i.e. on 6 March 1992".[135] In this regard, the argument put forward by the appellants appears to confuse the concepts of "accession" and "succession".

[128] Deli}'s Issue 3 as set out in the Appellant-Cross Appellee Hazim Deli}'s Designation of the Issues on Appeal, 17 May 2000, reads: Whether Deli} can be convicted of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 in that at the time of the acts alleged in the indictment the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina was not a party to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949.

111. Although Article 23(2) of the Convention also provides that pending notification of succession, the operation of the treaty in question shall be considered "suspended" between the new State and other parties to the treaty, the Appeals Chamber finds that in the case of this type of treaty, this provision is not applicable. This is because, for the following reasons, the Appeals Chamber confirms that the provisions applicable are binding on a State from creation. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that irrespective of any findings as to formal succession, Bosnia and Herzegovina would in any event have succeeded to the Geneva Conventions under customary law, as this type of convention entails automatic succession, i.e., without the need for any formal confirmation of adherence by the successor State. It may be now considered in international law that there is automatic State succession to multilateral humanitarian treaties in [132] 17 ILM 1488. The Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties was adopted on 22 August 1978 and entered into force on 6 November 1996. Bosnia and Herzegovina succeeded as a party to the Convention on 23 July 1993. Although the Convention was not in force at the time relevant to the issue at hand, the provisions of relevance to the issue before the Appeals Chamber codify rules of customary international law, as has been recognised by State. See, e.g., Declaration of Tanganyika, 1961, and the subsequent declarations made by new States since then (United Nations Legislative Series, ST/LEG/SER.B/14 p 177). The Appeals Chamber notes that the practice of international organisations (UN, ILO, ICRC) and States shows that there was a customary norm on succession de jure of States to general treaties, which applies automatically to human rights treaties.

[133] Article 23(1) of the Vienna Convention.

[134] Opinion 11, dated 16 July 1993, of the Arbitration Commission of the Peace Conference on Yugoslavia (Badinter Commission) concludes that following the official promulgation of the result of the referendum on independence on 6 March 1992, "6 March 1992 must be considered the date on which Bosnia and Herzegovina succeeded the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia".

the broad sense, i.e., treaties of universal character which express fundamental human rights.[136] It is noteworthy that Bosnia and Herzegovina itself recognised this principle before the ICJ.[137]

112. It is indisputable that the Geneva Conventions fall within this category of universal multilateral treaties which reflect rules accepted and recognised by the international community as a whole. The Geneva Conventions enjoy nearly universal participation.[138]

113. In light of the object and purpose of the Geneva Conventions, which is to guarantee the protection of certain fundamental values common to mankind in times of armed conflict, and of the customary nature of their provisions,[139] the Appeals Chamber is in no doubt that State succession has no impact on obligations arising out from these fundamental humanitarian conventions. In this regard, reference should be made to the Secretary-General's Report submitted at the time of the establishment of the Tribunal, which specifically lists the Geneva Conventions among the international humanitarian instruments which are "beyond any doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to specific conventions does not arise".[140] The Appeals Chamber finds further support for this position in the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision.[141]

114. For these reasons the Appeals Chamber finds that there was no gap in the protection afforded by the Geneva Conventions, as they, and the obligations arising therefrom, were in force for Bosnia and Herzegovina at the time of the acts alleged in the Indictment.

Further, Article 43 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties entitled "Obligations imposed by international law independently of a treaty" provides: "The invalidity, termination, or denunciation of a treaty, the withdrawal of a party from it, or the suspension of its operation [...] shall not in any way impair the duty of any State to fulfil any obligation embodied in the treaty to which it would be subject under international law independently of the treaty".

III. GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO ARTICLE 3 OF THE STATUTE

116. Delali},[142] Muci}[143] and Deli}[144] challenge the Trial Chamber's findings that (1) offences within common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 are encompassed within Article 3 of the Statute; (2) common Article 3 imposes individual criminal responsibility; and (3) that common Article 3 is applicable to international armed conflicts. The appellants argue that the Appeals Chamber should not follow its previous conclusions in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, which, it is submitted, was wrongly decided. That Decision determined that violations of common Article 3 were subjected to the Tribunal's jurisdiction under Article 3 of its Statute, and that, as a matter of customary law, common Article 3 was applicable to both internal and international conflicts and entailed individual criminal responsibility. The Prosecution submits that the appellants' grounds should be rejected because they are not consistent with the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, which the Appeals Chamber should follow. The Prosecution contends that the grounds raised by the appellants for reopening the Appeals Chamber's previous reasoning are neither founded nor sufficient.

117. As noted by the parties, the issues raised in this appeal were previously addressed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision. In accordance with the principle set out in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, as enunciated in paragraph 8 of this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber will follow its Tadi} jurisprudence on the issues, unless there exist cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from it.

[142] Delali}'s Grounds of Contention as set out in his Brief read: "Whether the Security Council intended to incorporate common article 3 into Article 3 of the Statute" and "Whether Common Article 3 is customary international law in respect of its application to natural persons". At the hearing, Delali}'s counsel presented the arguments in relation to these grounds on behalf of all other appellants.

[143] Muci}'s Ground 6 reads: Whether at the time of the acts alleged in the indictment customary international law provided for individual criminal responsibility for violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions (Appellant Zdravko Muci}'s Final Designation of his Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000, p 2). Muci} adopts the arguments of Delali}.

[144] Deli}'s Grounds read: "Issue Number Five: Whether, at the time of the acts alleged in the indictment, customary international law provided for individual criminal responsibility for violations of Common Article 3"; "Issue Number Six: Whether the Security Council vested the Tribunal with jurisdiction to impose individual criminal sanctions for violations of common Article 3"; "Issue Number Seven: Whether Common Article 3 constitutes customary international law in international armed conflicts to the extent that it imposes criminal sanctions on individuals who violate its terms" (Appellant-Cross Appellee Hazim Deli}'s Designation of the Issues on Appeal, 17 May 2000, pp 2-3).

118. The grounds presented by the appellants raise three different issues in relation to common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions: (1) whether common Article 3 falls within the scope of Article 3 of the Tribunal's Statute; (2) whether common Article 3 is applicable to international armed conflicts; (3) whether common Article 3 imposes individual criminal responsibility. After reviewing the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision in respect of each of these issues to determine whether there exist cogent reasons to depart from it, the Appeals Chamber will turn to an analysis of the Trial Judgement to ascertain whether it applied the correct legal principles in disposing of the issues before it.

119. As a preliminary issue, the Appeals Chamber will consider one of the appellants' submissions concerning the status of the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, which is relevant to the discussion of all three issues.

120. In their grounds of appeal, the appellants invite the Appeals Chamber to reverse the position it took in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision concerning the applicability of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions under Article 3 of the Statute, and thus to revisit the issues raised. Delali} inter alia submits that the Appeals Chamber did not conduct a rigorous analysis at the time (suggesting also that there is a difference in nature between interlocutory appeals and post-judgement appeals) and that many of the issues raised now were not briefed or considered in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision.[145] In the appellants' view, the Decision was rendered per incuriam.[146] Such a reason affecting a judgement was envisaged in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement as providing a basis for departing from an earlier decision.[147]

121. As to the contention that the arguments which the appellants make now were not before the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, the Prosecution submits that it is not the case that they were not considered in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision: the essence of most of the arguments now submitted by the appellants was addressed and decided by the Appeals Chamber in that Decision. In relation to the argument that the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision was not based on a rigorous analysis, the Prosecution submits that that Decision contains detailed reasoning and that issues decided in an interlocutory appeal should not be regarded as having any lesser status than a decision of the Appeals Chamber given after the Trial Chamber's judgement. Further, [145] Delali} Brief, p 6. Delali} does not point to any specific issue.

[146] Appeal Transcript p 320. "There is no indication that that issue was properly and fully briefed for that court [...]. It was really only decided in an interlocutory fashion to guide the Trial Chamber in Tadi} through the Tadi} trial" (Appeal Transcript pp 321-322).

[147] Aleksovki Appeal Judgement, para 108 (footnote omitted).

the Decision was not given per incuriam, as the Appeals Chamber focused specifically on this issue, the arguments were extensive and many authorities were referred to.[148] In the Prosecution's submission, there are therefore no reasons to depart from it.

122. This Appeals Chamber is of the view that there is no reason why interlocutory decisions of the Appeals Chamber should be considered, as a matter of principle, as having any lesser status than a final decision on appeal. The purpose of an appeal, whether on an interlocutory or on a final basis, is to determine the issues raised with finality.[149] There is therefore no basis in the interlocutory status of the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision to consider it as having been made per incuriam.

A. Whether Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions Falls Within the Scope of Article 3 of the Statute

1. What is the Applicable Law?

123. Article 3 of the Statute entitled "Violations of the Laws or Customs of War" reads:

> The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons violating the laws or customs of war. Such violations shall include, but not be limited to:
>
> (a) employment of poisonous weapons or other weapons calculated to cause unnecessary suffering;
>
> (b) wanton destruction of cities, towns or villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity;
>
> (c) attack, or bombardment, by whatever means, of undefended towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings;
>
> (d) seizure of, destruction or wilful damage done to institutions dedicated to religion, charity and education, the arts and science, historic monuments and works of art and science;
>
> (e) plunder of public or private property.

124. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions provides in relevant parts that:

> In the case of armed conflict not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, each Party to the conflict shall be bound to apply, as a minimum, the following provisions:

[149] It is noted that the Appeals Chamber in Aleksovski did not draw any distinction between the authoritative nature of its interlocutory and final decisions.

> (1) Persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without any adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria.
>
> To this end, the following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever with respect to the above-mentioned persons:
>
> > (a) Violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture;
> >
> > (b) Taking of hostages;
> >
> > (c) Outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment;
> >
> > (d) The passing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without previous judgement pronounced by a regularly constituted court, affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognised as indispensable by civilised peoples.
> (2) The wounded and the sick shall be collected and cared for.

125. In relation to the scope of Article 3 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision held that Article 3 "is a general clause covering all violations of humanitarian law not falling under Article 2 or covered by Articles 4 and 5".[150] It went on:

> Article 3 thus confers on the International Tribunal jurisdiction over any serious offence against international humanitarian law not covered by Articles 2, 4 or 5. Article 3 is a fundamental provision laying down that any "serious violation of international humanitarian law" must be prosecuted by the International Tribunal. In other words, Article 3 functions as a residual clause designed to ensure that no serious violation of international humanitarian law is taken away from the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. Article 3 aims to make such jurisdiction watertight and inescapable.[151]

126. The conclusion of the Appeals Chamber was based on a careful analysis of the Secretary-General's Report. The Appeals Chamber inter alia emphasised that the Secretary-General acknowledged that the Hague Regulations, annexed to the 1907 Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, which served as a basis for Article 3 of the Statute, "have a broader scope than the Geneva Conventions, in that they cover not only the protection of victims of armed violence (civilians) or of those who no longer take part in the hostilities (prisoners of war), but also the conduct of hostilities".[152] The Appeals Chamber noted that, although the Secretary-General's Report subsequently indicated "that the violations explicitly listed in Article 3 relate to Hague law not contained in the Geneva Conventions", [150] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 89.

[151] Ibid, para 91 (underlining in original).
[152] Ibid, para 87.

Article 3 contains the phrase "shall include but not be limited to".[153] The Appeals Chamber concluded: "Considering this list in the general context of the Secretary-General's discussion of the Hague Regulations and international humanitarian law, we conclude that this list may be construed to include other infringements of international humanitarian law."[154]

127. In support of its conclusion, the Appeals Chamber also relied on statements made by States in the Security Council at the time of the adoption of the Statute of the Tribunal, which "can be regarded as providing an authoritative interpretation of Article 3 to the effect that its scope is much broader than the enumerated violations of Hague law".[155] The Appeals Chamber also relied on a teleological approach in its analysis of the provisions of the Statute. Reference was also made to the context and purpose of the Statute as a whole, and in particular to the fact that the Tribunal was established to prosecute "serious violations of international humanitarian law".[156] It continued: "Thus, if correctly interpreted, Article 3 fully realises the primary purpose of the establishment of the International Tribunal, that is, not to leave unpunished any person guilty of any such serious violation, whatever the context within which it may have been committed".[157] The Appeals Chamber concluded that Article 3 is intended to incorporate violations of both Hague (conduct of war) and Geneva (protection of victims) law[158] provided that certain conditions, inter alia relating to the customary status of the rule, are met.[159]

128. The Appeals Chamber then went on to specify four requirements that must be met in order for a violation of international humanitarian law to be subject to Article 3 of the Statute.[160] The Appeals Chamber then considered the question of which such violations, when committed in internal conflicts, met these requirements. It discussed in depth the existence of customary international humanitarian rules applicable to internal conflicts, and found that State practice had developed since the 1930s, to the effect that customary rules exist applicable to non-international conflicts. These rules include common Article 3 but also go beyond it to include rules relating to the methods of warfare.[161]

129. The Appeals Chamber will now turn to the arguments of the appellants which discuss the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision conclusions in order to determine whether there exist cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from them.

130. In support of their submission that violations of common Article 3 are not within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the appellants argue that in adopting Article 3 of the Statute, the Security Council never intended to permit prosecutions under this Article for violations of common Article 3,[162] and, had the Security Council intended to include common Article 3 within the ambit of Article 3, it would have expressly included it in Article 2 of the Statute, which deals with the law related to the protection of victims. In their opinion, an analysis of Article 3 of the Statute shows that it is limited to Hague law. A related argument presented by the appellants is that Article 3 can only be expanded to include offences which are comparable and lesser offences than those already listed, and not to include offences of much greater magnitude and of a completely different character. In support of their argument, the appellants also rely on a comparison of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes, as Article 4 of the ICTR Statute explicitly includes common Article 3.[163] The appellants further argue that the Security Council viewed the conflict taking place in the former Yugoslavia as international, and accordingly provided for the prosecution of serious violations of humanitarian law in the context of an international conflict only.[164] The Prosecution submits that the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous conclusion in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision.

131. As to the appellants' argument based on the intention of the Security Council, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Secretary-General's Report and the statements made by State representatives in the Security Council at the time of the adoption of the Statute, as analysed in Tadi}, clearly support a conclusion that the list of offences listed in Article 3 was meant to cover violations of all of the laws or customs of war, understood broadly, in addition to those mentioned in the Article by way of example. Recourse to interpretative statements made by States at the time of the adoption of a resolution may be appropriately made by an international court when ascertaining the meaning of the text adopted, as they constitute an important part of the legislative history of the Statute.[165] These statements may shed light on some aspects of the drafting and adoption of the Statute as well as on its object and purpose, when no State contradicts that interpretation, as noted in Tadi}.[166] This is consistent with the accepted rules of treaty interpretation.[167]

132. The Appeals Chamber is similarly unconvinced by the appellants' submission that it is illogical to incorporate violations of common Article 3 which are "Geneva law" rules, within Article 3 which covers "Hague law" rules. The Appeals Chamber in Tadi} discussed the evolution of the meaning of the expression "war crimes". It found that war crimes have come to be understood as covering both Geneva and Hague law, and that violations of the laws or customs of war cover both types of rules. The traditional law of warfare concerning the protection of persons (both taking part and not taking part in hostilities) and property is now more correctly termed "international humanitarian law" and has a broader scope, including, for example, the Geneva Conventions.[168] The ICRC Commentary (GC IV) indeed stated that "the Geneva Conventions form part of what are generally called the laws and customs of war, violations of which are commonly called war crimes".[169] Further, Additional Protocol I contains rules of both Geneva and Hague origin.[170]

133. Recent confirmation that a strict separation between Hague and Geneva law in contemporary international humanitarian law based on the "type" of rules is no longer warranted may be found in Article 8 of the ICC Statute. This Article covers "War crimes" generally, namely grave breaches and "other serious violations of the laws and customs of war applicable in international armed conflict"; violations of common Article 3 in non-international armed conflicts; and "other serious violations of the laws and customs of war applicable in non-international armed conflict". The Appeals Chamber thus confirms the view expressed in the Tadi} Appeal Judgement that the expression "laws and customs of war" has evolved to encompass violations of Geneva law at the time the alleged offences were committed, and that consequently, Article 3 of the Statute may be interpreted as intending the incorporation of [167] Article 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties provides that the preparatory work of a treaty may be used as a supplementary means of interpretation to interpret the provisions of a treaty.

[168] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 87.

[169] ICRC Commentary (GC IV), p 583.

[170] The draft Statute of an International Criminal Court prepared by the ILC also followed this approach in its Article 20 entitled "Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court", which listed among the offences subject to the jurisdiction of the Court "serious violations of the laws and customs of war applicable in armed conflicts", including both Geneva and Hague law. ILC Report 1994, p 70. See also the ILC Draft Code against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted in 1996. The Commission stated in its Report that the expressions "war crimes", "violations of laws and customs of war" and "violations of the rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflicts" are used in the report interchangeably. ILC Report 1996, p 113. Further, Article 20 entitled "War crimes" included violations of Hague law, as well as Geneva law under a common heading.

Geneva law rules. It follows that the appellants' argument that violations of common Article 3 cannot be included in Article 3 as they are of a different fails.

134. Turning next to the appellants' argument that common Article 3 would more logically be incorporated in Article 2 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Geneva Conventions themselves make a distinction between the grave breaches and other violations of their provisions. The offences enumerated in common Article 3 may be considered as falling into the category of other serious violations of the Geneva Conventions, and are thus included within the general clause of Article 3. There is thus no apparent inconsistency in not including them in the scope of Article 2 of the Statute. This approach based on a distinction between the grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and other serious violations of the Conventions, has also later been followed in the ICC Statute.[171]

135. As will be discussed below, the appellants' argument that the Security Council viewed the conflict as international, even if correct, would not be determinative of the issue, as the prohibitions listed under common Article 3 are also applicable to international conflicts. It is, however, appropriate to note here that the Appeals Chamber does not share the view of the appellants that the Security Council and the Secretary-General determined that the conflict in the former Yugoslavia at the time of the creation of the Tribunal was international. In the Appeals Chamber's view, the Secretary-General's Report does not take a position as to whether the various conflicts within the former Yugoslavia were international in character for purposes of the applicable law as of a particular date. The Statute was worded neutrally. Article 1 of the Statute entitled "Competence of the International Tribunal" vests the Tribunal with the power to prosecute "serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991", making no reference to the nature of the conflict.[172] This supports the interpretation that the Security Council in adopting the Statute was of the view that the question of the nature of the conflict should be judicially determined by the Tribunal itself, the issue involving factual and legal questions.

136. The Appeals Chamber thus finds no cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from its previous jurisprudence concerning the question of whether common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions is included in the scope of Article 3 of the Statute.

[171] ICC Statute, Article 8.

[172] Article 8 of the Statute sets out, in relation to the temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the neutral date of 1 January 1991. Article 5 of the Statute, which, in relation to crimes against humanity, vests the Tribunal with the power to prosecute them in internal as well as international conflicts.

2. Did the Trial Chamber Follow the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision?

137. The Trial Chamber generally relied on the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision as it found "no reason to depart" from it.[173] That the Trial Chamber accepted that common Article 3 is incorporated in Article 3 of the Statute appears clearly from the following findings. The Trial Chamber referred to paragraphs 87 and 91 of the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision to describe the "division of labour between Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute".[174] The Trial Chamber went on to hold that "this Trial Chamber is in no doubt that the intention of the Security Council was to ensure that all serious violations of international humanitarian law, committed within the relevant geographical and temporal limits, were brought within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal."[175]

138. In respect of the customary status of common Article 3, the Trial Chamber found:

> While in 1949 the insertion of a provision concerning internal armed conflicts into the Geneva Conventions may have been innovative, there can be no question that the protections and prohibitions enunciated in that provision have come to form part of customary international law. As discussed at length by the Appeals Chamber, a corpus of law concerning the regulation of hostilities and protection of victims in internal armed conflicts is now widely recognised.[176]

139. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber correctly adopted the Appeals Chamber's statement of the law in disposing of this issue.

B. Whether Common Article 3 is Applicable to International Armed Conflicts

1. What is the Applicable Law?

140. In the course of its discussion of the existence of customary rules of international humanitarian law governing internal armed conflicts, the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision observed a tendency towards the blurring of the distinction between interstate and civil wars as far as human beings are concerned.[177] It then found that some treaty rules, and common Article 3 in particular, which constitutes a mandatory minimum code applicable to internal conflicts, had gradually become part of customary law. In support of its position that violations of common Article 3 are applicable regardless of the nature of the conflict, the Appeals Chamber referred to the ICJ holding in Nicaragua that the rules set out in common Article 3 reflect "elementary considerations of humanity" applicable under customary international law to any conflict.[178] The ICJ in Nicaragua discussed the customary status of common Article 3 to the Geneva Conventions and held:

> Article 3 which is common to all four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 defines certain rules to be applied in the armed conflicts of a non-international character. There is no doubt that, in the event of international armed conflicts, these rules also constitute a minimum yardstick, in addition to the more elaborate rules which are also to apply to international conflicts; and they are rules which, in the Court's opinion, reflect what the Court in 1949 called "elementary considerations of humanity" (Corfu Channel, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22; paragraph 215).[179]

Thus, relying on Nicaragua, the Appeals Chamber concluded:

> Therefore at least with respect to the minimum rules in common Article 3, the character of the conflict is irrelevant.[180]

141. The Appeals Chamber also considered that the procedural mechanism, provided for in common Article 3,[181] inviting parties to internal conflicts to agree to abide by the rest of the Conventions, "reflect an understanding that certain fundamental rules should apply regardless of the nature of the conflict."[182] The Appeals Chamber also found that General Assembly resolutions corroborated the existence of certain rules of war concerning the protection of civilians and property applicable in both internal and international armed conflicts.[183]

142. Referring to the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, which the Trial Chamber followed, Delali} argues that the Appeals Chamber failed to properly consider the status of common Article 3,

[177] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 97.

[178] Nicaragua, para 218.

[179] Nicaragua, para 218. The ICJ considers that the Geneva Conventions in general are customary international law. Paragraph 219 reads in relevant parts: "Because the minimum rules applicable to international and to non-international conflicts are identical, there is no need to address the question whether those actions must be looked at in the context of the rules which operate for one or for the other category of conflict". In the Corfu Channel case, the ICJ regarded the provisions of the Hague Convention as a special application of a much more general principle of universal applicability. Its Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, the ICJ reiterated the principle that certain minimum rules are applicable regardless of the nature of the conflict: "It is undoubtedly because a great many rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict are so fundamental to the respect of the human person and "elementary considerations of humanity" as the Court put it in its Judgement of 9 April 1949 in the Corfu Channel case (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22), that the Hague and Geneva Conventions have enjoyed a broad accession. Further these fundamental rules are to be observed by all States whether or not they have ratified the conventions that contain them, because they constitute intransgressible principles of international customary law". Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, Advisory Opinion of 8 July 1996, ICJ Reports (1996), para 79.

[180] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 102.

[181] Common Article 3 provides: "The Parties to the conflict should further endeavour to bring into force, by means of special agreements, all or part of the other provisions of the present Convention".

[182] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 103. In this context, the Appeals Chamber specifically referred to the 1967 conflict in Yemen.

and in particular failed to analyse state practice and opinio juris, in support of its conclusion that it was, as a matter of customary international law, applicable to international armed conflicts. Further, in his opinion, the findings of the ICJ on the customary status of common Article 3 and its applicability to both internal and international conflicts are dicta.[184] The Prosecution is of the view that, as stated by the ICJ in Nicaragua, it is because common Article 3 gives expression to elementary considerations of humanity, which are applicable irrespective of the nature of the conflict, that common Article 3 is applicable to international conflicts.[185]

143. It is indisputable that common Article 3, which sets forth a minimum core of mandatory rules, reflects the fundamental humanitarian principles which underlie international humanitarian law as a whole, and upon which the Geneva Conventions in their entirety are based. These principles, the object of which is the respect for the dignity of the human person, developed as a result of centuries of warfare and had already become customary law at the time of the adoption of the Geneva Conventions because they reflect the most universally recognised humanitarian principles.[186] These principles were codified in common Article 3 to constitute the minimum core applicable to internal conflicts, but are so fundamental that they are regarded as governing both internal and international conflicts.[187] In the words of the ICRC, the purpose of common Article 3 was to "ensur(e) respect for the few essential rules of humanity which all civilised nations consider as valid everywhere and under all circumstances and as being above and outside war itself".[188] These rules may thus be considered as the "quintessence" of the humanitarian rules found in the Geneva Conventions as a whole.

144. It is these very principles that the ICJ considered as giving expression to fundamental standards of humanity applicable in all circumstances.

145. That these standards were considered as reflecting the principles applicable to the Conventions in their entirety and as constituting substantially similar core norms applicable to both types of conflict is clearly supported by the ICRC Commentary (GC IV):

[184] Delali} also submits that the ICJ findings are not based on state practice and opinio juris; Delali} Brief, pp 32-34.

[185] Appeal Transcript, pp 350-51.

[186] The rules of common Article 3 setting out standards of basic humanitarian protection were originally intended to serve as a general statement of the object of the Geneva Conventions as a whole. The ICRC Commentary (GC IV) provides that the wording of common Article 3 is largely based on general ideas contained in various draft preambles which were eventually omitted, pp 26-34.

[187] This interpretation is supported by the Preamble of Additional Protocol II which provides that "in cases not covered by the law in force, the human person remains under the protection of the principles of humanity and

> This minimum requirement in the case of non-international conflict, is a fortiori applicable in international armed conflicts. It proclaims the guiding principle common to all four Geneva Conventions, and from it each of them derives the essential provision around which it is built.[189]

146. This is entirely consistent with the logic and spirit of the Geneva Conventions; it is a "logical application of its fundamental principle".[190] Specifically, in relation to the substantive rules set out in subparagraphs (1) (a)-(d) of common Article 3, the ICRC Commentary continues:

> The value of the provision is not limited to the field dealt with in Article 3. Representing, as it does, the minimum which must be applied in the least determinate of conflicts, its terms must a fortiori be respected in the case of international conflicts proper, when all the provisions of the Convention are applicable. For "the greater obligation includes the lesser", as one might say.[191]

147. Common Article 3 may thus be considered as the "minimum yardstick"[192] of rules of international humanitarian law of similar substance applicable to both internal and international conflicts. It should be noted that the rules applicable to international conflicts are not limited to the minimum rules set out in common Article 3, as international conflicts are governed by more detailed rules. The rules contained in common Article 3 are considered as applicable to international conflicts because they constitute the core of the rules applicable to such conflicts. There can be no doubt that the acts enumerated in inter alia subparagraphs (a), violence to life, and (c), outrages upon personal dignity, are heinous acts "which the world public opinion finds particularly revolting".[193] These acts are also prohibited in the grave breaches provisions of Geneva Convention IV, such as Article 147. Article 75 of Additional Protocol I, applicable to international conflicts, also provides a minimum of protection to any person unable to claim a particular status. Its paragraph 75(2) is directly inspired by the text of common Article 3.

148. This interpretation is further confirmed by a consideration of other branches of international law, and more particularly of human rights law.

149. Both human rights and humanitarian law focus on respect for human values and the dignity of the human person. Both bodies of law take as their starting point the concern for

human dignity, which forms the basis of a list of fundamental minimum standards of humanity. The ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols refers to their common ground in the following terms: "This irreducible core of human rights, also known as 'non-derogable rights' corresponds to the lowest level of protection which can be claimed by anyone at anytime [...]".[194] The universal and regional human rights instruments[195] and the Geneva Conventions share a common "core" of fundamental standards which are applicable at all times, in all circumstances and to all parties, and from which no derogation is permitted. The object of the fundamental standards appearing in both bodies of law is the protection of the human person from certain heinous acts considered as unacceptable by all civilised nations in all circumstances.[196]

150. It is both legally and morally untenable that the rules contained in common Article 3, which constitute mandatory minimum rules applicable to internal conflicts, in which rules are less developed than in respect of international conflicts, would not be applicable to conflicts of an international character. The rules of common Article 3 are encompassed and further developed in the body of rules applicable to international conflicts. It is logical that this minimum be applicable to international conflicts as the substance of these core rules is identical. In the Appeals Chamber's view, something which is prohibited in internal conflicts is necessarily outlawed in an international conflict where the scope of the rules is broader. The Appeals Chamber is thus not convinced by the arguments raised by the appellants and finds no cogent reasons to depart from its previous conclusions.

2. Did the Trial Chamber Follow the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision?

151. The Trial Chamber found:

> While common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions was formulated to apply to internal armed conflicts, it is also clear from the above discussion that its substantive prohibitions apply equally in situations of international armed conflicts. Similarly, and as stated by the Appeals Chamber, the crimes falling under Article 3 of the Statute of the International Tribunal may be committed in either kind of conflicts. The Trial Chamber's finding that the

152. The Trial Chamber therefore clearly followed the Appeals Chamber jurisprudence.

C. Whether Common Article 3 Imposes Individual Criminal Responsibility

1. What is the Applicable Law?

153. The Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, in analysing whether common Article 3 attracts individual criminal responsibility first noted that "common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions contains no explicit reference to criminal liability for violation of its provisions".[198] Referring however to the findings of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg[199] that a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provisions on punishment of breaches, provided certain conditions are fulfilled, it found:

> Applying the foregoing criteria to the violations at issue here, we have no doubt that they entail individual criminal responsibility, regardless of whether they are committed in internal or international conflicts. Principles and rules of humanitarian law reflect "elementary considerations of humanity" widely recognised as the mandatory minimum for conduct in armed conflict of any kind. No one can doubt the gravity of the acts at issue, nor the interest of the international community in their prohibition.[200]

154. In the Appeals Chamber's opinion, this conclusion was also supported by "many elements of international practice (which) show that States intend to criminalise serious breaches of customary rules and principles on internal conflicts".[201] Specific reference was made to prosecutions before Nigerian courts,[202] national military manuals,[203] national legislation (including the law of the former Yugoslavia adopted by Bosnia and Herzegovina after its independence),[204] and resolutions adopted unanimously by the Security Council.[205]

155. The Appeals Chamber found further support for its conclusion in the law of the former Yugoslavia as it stood at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment:

> Nationals of the former Yugoslavia as well as, at present, those of Bosnia-Herzegovina were therefore aware, or should have been aware, that they were amenable to the jurisdiction of their national criminal courts in cases of violation of international humanitarian law.[206]

156. Reliance was also placed by the Appeals Chamber on the agreement reached under the auspices of the ICRC on 22 May 1992, in order to conclude that the breaches of international law occurring within the context of the conflict, regarded as internal by the agreement, could be criminally sanctioned.[207]

157. The appellants contend that the evidence presented in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision does not establish that common Article 3 is customary international law that creates individual criminal responsibility because there is no showing of State practice and opinio juris.[208] Additionally, the appellants submit that at the time of the adoption of the Geneva Conventions in 1949, common Article 3 was excluded from the grave breaches system and thus did not fall within the scheme providing for individual criminal responsibility.[209] In their view, the position had not changed at the time of the adoption of Additional Protocol II in 1977. It is further argued that common Article 3 imposes duties on States only and is meant to be enforced by domestic legal systems.[210]

158. In addition, the appellants argue that solid evidence exists which demonstrates that common Article 3 is not a rule of customary law which imposes liability on natural persons.[211] Particular emphasis is placed on the ICTR Statute and the Secretary-General's Report which states that common Article 3 was criminalised for the first time in the ICTR Statute.[212]

159. The Prosecution argues that the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision previously disposed of the issue and should be followed. The Prosecution submits that, if violations of the international laws of war have traditionally been regarded as criminal under international law, there is no reason of principle why once those laws came to be extended to the context of internal armed [209] The appellants emphasise that violations of common Article 3 were thus not subjected to the universal jurisdiction provisions, Delalić Brief, p 28.

[210] Deli} Brief, p 80.
[211] The appellants rely on the ICRC practice; Nicaragua; the conclusions of the UN Expert Commission; the ILC draft codes; comments made in the Security Council; the ICC Statute. In relation to Nicaragua, Delali} submits that the finding that common Article 3 constitute customary international law is dicta and therefore not an authoritative holding. It is also argued that the ICC Statute constitutes evidence that common Article 3 does not reflect customary law: Delalić Brief, pp 32-40.
[212] The report stated that Article 4 "for the first time criminalizes common article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions". Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 5 of Security Council resolution 955 (1994), S/1995/134, 13 February 1995, para 12.

conflicts, their violation in that context should not have been criminal, at least in the absence of clear indications to the contrary.[213] It is further submitted that since 1949, customary law and international humanitarian law have developed to such an extent that today universal jurisdiction does not only exist in relation to the grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions but also in relation to other types of serious violations of international humanitarian law.[214] The Prosecution contends that this conclusion is not contrary to the principle of legality, which does not preclude development of criminal law, so long as those developments do not criminalise conduct which at the time it was committed could reasonably have been regarded as legitimate.[215]

160. Whereas, as a matter of strict treaty law, provision is made only for the prosecution of grave breaches committed within the context of an international conflict, the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} found that as a matter of customary law, breaches of international humanitarian law committed in internal conflicts, including violations of common Article 3, could also attract individual criminal responsibility.

161. Following the appellants' argument, two different regimes of criminal responsibility would exist based on the different legal characterisation of an armed conflict. As a consequence, the same horrendous conduct committed in an internal conflict could not be punished. The Appeals Chamber finds that the arguments put forward by the appellants do not withstand scrutiny.

162. As concluded by the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, the fact that common Article 3 does not contain an explicit reference to individual criminal liability does not necessarily bear the consequence that there is no possibility to sanction criminally a violation of this rule. The IMT indeed followed a similar approach, as recalled in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision when the Appeals Chamber found that a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provisions on punishment of breaches.[216] The Nuremberg Tribunal clearly established that individual acts prohibited by international law constitute criminal offences even though there was no provision regarding the jurisdiction to try violations: "Crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced".[217]

163. The appellants argue that the exclusion of common Article 3 from the Geneva Conventions grave breaches system, which provides for universal jurisdiction, has the necessary consequence that common Article 3 attracts no individual criminal responsibility. This is misconceived. In the Appeals Chamber's view, the appellants' argument fails to make a distinction between two separate issues, the issue of criminalisation on the one hand, and the issue of jurisdiction on the other. Criminalisation may be defined as the act of outlawing or making illegal certain behaviour.[218] Jurisdiction relates more to the judicial authority to prosecute those criminal acts. These two concepts do not necessarily always correspond. The Appeals Chamber is in no doubt that the acts enumerated in common Article 3 were intended to be criminalised in 1949, as they were clearly intended to be illegal within the international legal order. The language of common Article 3 clearly prohibits fundamental offences such as murder and torture. However, no jurisdictional or enforcement mechanism was provided for in the Geneva Conventions at the time.

164. This interpretation is supported by the provisions of the Geneva Conventions themselves, which impose on State parties the duty "to respect and ensure respect for the present Conventions in all circumstances".[219] Common Article 1 thus imposes upon State parties, upon ratification, an obligation to implement the provisions of the Geneva Conventions in their domestic legislation. This obligation clearly covers the Conventions in their entirety and this obligation thus includes common Article 3. The ICJ in the Nicaragua case found that common Article 1 also applies to internal conflicts.[220]

165. In addition, the third paragraph of Article 146 of Geneva Convention IV, after setting out the universal jurisdiction mechanism applicable to grave breaches, provides:

> Each High Contracting Party shall take measures necessary for the suppression of all acts contrary to the provisions of the present Convention other than the grave breaches defined in the following Article.

166. The ICRC Commentary (GC IV) stated in relation to this provision that "there is no doubt that what is primarily meant is the repression of breaches other than the grave breaches listed and only in the second place administrative measures to ensure respect for the provisions of the Convention".[221] It then concluded: 4291

> This shows that all breaches of the Convention should be repressed by national legislation. The Contracting Parties who have taken measures to repress the various grave breaches of the Convention and have fixed an appropriate penalty in each case should at least insert in their legislation a general clause providing for the punishment of other breaches. Furthermore, under the terms of this paragraph, the authorities of the Contracting Parties should give all those subordinate to them instructions in conformity with the Convention and should institute judicial or disciplinary punishment for breaches of the Convention.[222]

167. This, in the Appeals Chamber's view, clearly demonstrates that, as these provisions do not provide for exceptions, the Geneva Conventions envisaged that violations of common Article 3 could entail individual criminal responsibility under domestic law, which is accepted by the appellants. The absence of such legislation providing for the repression of such violations would, arguably, be inconsistent with the general obligation contained in common Article 1 of the Conventions.

168. As referred to by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, States have adopted domestic legislation providing for the prosecution of violations of common Article 3. Since 1995, several more States have adopted legislation criminalising violations of common Article 3,[223] thus further confirming the conclusion that States regard violations of common Article 3 as constituting crimes. Prosecutions based on common Article 3 under domestic legislation have also taken place.[224]

169. The Appeals Chamber is also not convinced by the appellants' submission that sanctions for violations of common Article 3 are intended to be enforced at the national level only. In this regard, the Appeals Chambers refers to its previous conclusion on the customary nature of common Article 3 and its incorporation in Article 3 of the Statute.

170. The argument that the ICTR Statute, which is concerned with an internal conflict, made violations of common Article 3 subject to prosecution at the international level, in the Appeals Chamber's opinion, reinforces this interpretation. The Secretary-General's statement that violations of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions were criminalised for the first time, meant that provisions for international jurisdiction over such violations were expressly made for the first time. This is so because the Security Council when it established the ICTR was nc creating new law but was inter alia codifying existing customary rules for the purposes of the jurisdiction of the ICTR. In the Appeals Chamber's view, in establishing this Tribunal, the Security Council simply created an international mechanism for the prosecution of crimes which were already the subject of individual criminal responsibility.

171. The Appeals Chamber is unable to find any reason of principle why, once the application of rules of international humanitarian law came to be extended (albeit in an attenuated form) to the context of internal armed conflicts, their violation in that context could not be criminally enforced at the international level. This is especially true in relation to prosecution conducted by an international tribunal created by the UN Security Council, in a situation where it specifically called for the prosecution of persons responsible for violations of humanitarian law in an armed conflict regarded as constituting a threat to international peace and security pursuant to Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

172. In light of the fact that the majority of the conflicts in the contemporary world are internal, to maintain a distinction between the two legal regimes and their criminal consequences in respect of similarly egregious acts because of the difference in nature of the conflicts would ignore the very purpose of the Geneva Conventions, which is to protect the dignity of the human person.[225]

173. The Appeals Chamber is similarly unconvinced by the appellants' argument that such an interpretation of common Article 3 violates the principle of legality. The scope of this principle was discussed in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, which held that the principle of nullem crimen sine lege does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime.[226] It is universally acknowledged that the acts enumerated in common Article 3 are wrongful and shock the conscience of civilised people, and thus are, in the language of Article 15(2) of the ICCPR, "criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations."

[225] The Appeals Chamber also notes that in human rights law the violation of rights which have reached the level of jus cogens, such as torture, may constitute international crimes.

[226] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 126.

174. The Appeals Chamber is unable to find any cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from the conclusions on this issue in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision. 4293

2. Did the Trial Chamber Apply the Correct Legal Principles?

175. The Appeals Chamber notes that the appellants raised before the Trial Chamber the same arguments now raised in this appeal. The Trial Chamber held:

> Once again, this is a matter which has been addressed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision and the Trial Chamber sees no reason to depart from its findings. In its Decision, the Appeals Chamber examines various national laws as well as practice, to illustrate that there are many instances of penal provisions for violations of the laws applicable in internal armed conflicts. From these sources, the Appeals Chamber extrapolates that there is nothing inherently contrary to the concept of individual criminal responsibility for violations of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and that, indeed, such responsibility does ensue.[227]

176. It then concluded:

> The fact that the Geneva Conventions themselves do not expressly mention that there shall be criminal liability for violations of common Article 3 clearly does not in itself preclude such liability. Furthermore, identification of the violation of certain provisions of the Conventions as constituting "grave breaches" and thus subject to mandatory universal jurisdiction, certainly cannot be interpreted as rendering all of the remaining provisions of the Conventions as without criminal sanction. While "grave breaches" must be prosecuted and punished by all States, "other" breaches of the Geneva Conventions may be so. Consequently, an international tribunal such as this must also be permitted to prosecute and punish such violations of the Conventions.[228]

177. In support of this conclusion, which fully accords with the position taken by the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber went on to refer to the ILC Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind and the ICC Statute.[229] The Trial Chamber was careful to emphasise that although "these instruments were all drawn up after the acts alleged in the Indictment, they serve to illustrate the widespread conviction that the provisions of common Article 3 are not incompatible with the attribution of individual criminal responsibility".[230]

178. In relation to the ICTR Statute and the Secretary-General's statement in his ICTR report that common Article 3 was criminalised for the first time, the Trial Chamber held: "the United Nations cannot 'criminalise' any of the provisions of international humanitarian law by the simple act of granting subject-matter jurisdiction to an international tribunal. The International Tribunal merely identifies and applies existing customary international law and, as stated above, this is not dependent upon an express recognition in the Statute of the content of that custom, although express reference may be made, as in the Statute of the ICTR".[231] This statement is fully consistent with the Appeals Chamber's finding that the lack of explicit reference to common Article 3 in the Tribunal's Statute does not warrant a conclusion that violations of common Article 3 may not attract individual criminal responsibility.

179. The Trial Chamber's holding in respect of the principle of legality is also consonant with the Appeals Chamber's position. The Trial Chamber made reference to Article 15 of the ICCPR,[232] and to the Criminal Code of the SFRY, adopted by Bosnia and Herzegovina,[233] before concluding:

> It is undeniable that acts such as murder, torture, rape and inhuman treatment are criminal according to "general principles of law" recognised by all legal systems. Hence the caveat contained in Article 15, paragraph 2, of the ICCPR should be taken into account when considering the application of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege in the present case. The purpose of this principle is to prevent the prosecution and punishment of an individual for acts which he reasonably believed to be lawful at the time of their commission. It strains credibility to contend that the accused would not recognise the criminal nature of the acts alleged in the Indictment. The fact that they could not foresee the creation of an International Tribunal which would be the forum for prosecution is of no consequence.[234]

180. The Appeals Chamber fully agrees with this statement and finds that the Trial Chamber applied the correct legal principles in disposing of the issues before it.

181. It follows that the appellants' grounds of appeal fail.

IV. GROUNDS OF APPEAL CONCERNING COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY

182. In the present appeal, Muci} and the Prosecution have filed grounds of appeal which relate to the principles of command responsibility. Article 7(3) of the Statute, "Individual criminal responsibility", provides that:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

A. The Ninth Ground of Appeal of Muci}

183. The ninth ground of Muci}'s appeal alleges both a legal and factual error on the part of the Trial Chamber in finding that Muci} had, at the time when the crimes concerned in this case were being committed, the de facto authority of a commander in the ^elebi}i camp.[235] Most of the arguments presented by Muci} are concerned with the Trial Chamber's factual findings.[236] The Prosecution argues that Muci}'s ground be denied.

184. The Appeals Chamber understands that the remedy desired by the appellant in this ground of appeal is an acquittal of those convictions based on his command responsibility.[237]

185. The Appeals Chamber will first consider the issue of whether a superior may be held liable for the acts of subordinates on the basis of de facto authority, before turning to the arguments relating to alleged errors of fact.

1. De Facto Authority as a Basis for a Finding of Superior Responsibility in International Law

186. In his brief, Muci} appeared to contest the issue of whether a de facto status is sufficient for the purpose of ascribing criminal responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute. It is submitted that de facto status must be equivalent to de jure status in order for a superior to be held responsible for the acts of subordinates.[238] He submits that a person in a position of de facto authority must be shown to wield the same kind of control over subordinates as de jure superiors.[239] In the appellant's view, the approach taken by the Trial Chamber that the absence of formal legal authority, in relation to civilian and military structures, does not preclude a [235] Muci}'s ground 9 reads: "Whether the Trial Chamber made the proper legal and factual determinations in convicting Mr Muci} of command responsibility pursuant to Article 7(3)", Appellant Zdravko Muci}'s Final Designation of his Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000, at p 2. This document serves to clarify the previous documents setting out Muci}'s grounds.

[236] While the appellant made some submissions in his Brief on matters of law, it is difficult to identify the precise errors that are alleged to have been committed by the Trial Chamber. Matters were not further clarified at the hearing. Counsel for the appellant however asked the Appeals Chamber to consider the issue of superior responsibility arising out of a de facto position of authority, Appeal Transcript, pp 253-254.

[237] Particulars of the Grounds of Appeal of the Appellant Zdravko Muci} dated the 2nd July 1999, 26 July 1999, Registry p 1800. Muci} submits that the convictions entered by the Trial Chamber pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute are "nullified" as a result of its reasoning.

finding of superior responsibility, "comes too close to the concept of strict responsibility".[240] Further, Muci} interprets Article 28 of the ICC Statute as limiting the application of the doctrine of command responsibility to "commanders or those effectively acting as commanders".[241] He submits that "the law relating to de jure/de facto command responsibility is far from certain" and that the Appeals Chamber should address the issue.[242]

4296

187. The Prosecution argues that Muci} has failed to adduce authorities to support his argument that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Muci} to be a de facto superior.[243] In its view, the finding of the de facto responsibility does not amount to a form of strict liability, and de facto authority does not have to possess certain features of de jure authority. It is submitted that Muci} has not identified any legal basis for alleging that the Trial Chamber has erred in holding that the doctrine of command responsibility applies to civilian superiors.

188. The Trial Chamber found:

> [...] a position of command is indeed a necessary precondition for the imposition of command responsibility. However, this statement must be qualified by the recognition that the existence of such a position cannot be determined by reference to formal status alone. Instead, the factor that determines liability for this type of criminal responsibility is the actual possession, or non-possession, of powers of control over the actions of subordinates. Accordingly, formal designation as a commander should not be considered to be a necessary prerequisite for command responsibility to attach, as such responsibility may be imposed by virtue of a person's de facto, as well as de jure, position as a commander.[244]

189. It is necessary to consider first the notion of command or superior authority within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute before examining the specific issue of de facto authority. Article 87(3) of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions provides:

> The High Contracting Parties and Parties to the conflict shall require any commander who is aware that subordinates or other persons under his control are going to commit or have committed a breach of the Conventions or of his Protocol, to initiate such steps as are necessary to prevent such violations of the Conventions or this Protocol, and, where appropriate, to initiate disciplinary or penal action against violators thereof.[245]

190. The Blaski} Judgement, referring to the Trial Judgement and to Additional Protocol I, construed control in terms of the material ability of a commander to punish:

191. In respect of the meaning of a commander or superior as laid down in Article 7(3) of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber held in Aleksovski:

> Article 7(3) provides the legal criteria for command responsibility, thus giving the word "commander" a juridical meaning, in that the provision becomes applicable only where a superior with the required mental element failed to exercise his powers to prevent subordinates from committing offences or to punish them afterwards. This necessarily implies that a superior must have such powers prior to his failure to exercise them. If the facts of a case meet the criteria for the authority of a superior as laid down in Article 7(3), the legal finding would be that an accused is a superior within the meaning of that provision.[247]

192. Under Article 7(3), a commander or superior is thus the one who possesses the power or authority in either a de jure or a de facto form to prevent a subordinate's crime or to punish the perpetrators of the crime after the crime is committed.

193. The power or authority to prevent or to punish does not solely arise from de jure authority conferred through official appointment. In many contemporary conflicts, there may be only de facto, self-proclaimed governments and therefore de facto armies and paramilitary groups subordinate thereto. Command structure, organised hastily, may well be in disorder and primitive. To enforce the law in these circumstances requires a determination of accountability not only of individual offenders but of their commanders or other superiors who were, based on evidence, in control of them without, however, a formal commission or appointment. A tribunal could find itself powerless to enforce humanitarian law against de facto superiors if it only accepted as proof of command authority a formal letter of authority, despite the fact that the superiors acted at the relevant time with all the powers that would attach to an officially appointed superior or commander.

194. In relation to Muci}'s responsibility, the Trial Chamber held:

> [...] whereas formal appointment is an important aspect of the exercise of command authority or superior authority, the actual exercise of authority in the absence of a formal appointment is sufficient for the purpose of incurring criminal responsibility. Accordingly, the factor critical to the exercise of command responsibility is the actual possession, or non-possession, of powers of control over the actions of the subordinates.[248]

[246] Blaški} Judgement, para 302.
[247] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 76.
[248] Trial Judgement, para 736.

195. The Trial Chamber, prior to making this statement in relation to the case of Muci}, had already considered the origin and meaning of de facto authority with reference to existing practice.[249] Based on an analysis of World War II jurisprudence, the Trial Chamber also concluded that the principle of superior responsibility reflected in Article 7(3) of the Statute encompasses political leaders and other civilian superiors in positions of authority.[250] The Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disagree with the Trial Chamber's analysis of this jurisprudence. The principle that military and other superiors may be held criminally responsible for the acts of their subordinates is well-established in conventional and customary law. The standard of control reflected in Article 87(3) of Additional Protocol I may be considered as customary in nature.[251] In relying upon the wording of Articles 86 and 87 of Additional Protocol I to conclude that "it is clear that the term 'superior' is sufficiently broad to encompass a position of authority based on the existence of de facto powers of control", the Trial Chamber properly considered the issue in finding the applicable law.[252]

196. "Command", a term which does not seem to present particular controversy in interpretation, normally means powers that attach to a military superior, whilst the term "control", which has a wider meaning, may encompass powers wielded by civilian leaders. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that the rule is controversial that civilian leaders may incur responsibility in relation to acts committed by their subordinates or other persons under their effective control.[253] Effective control has been accepted, including in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, as a standard for the purposes of determining superior responsibility. The Bla{ki} Trial Chamber for instance endorsed the finding of the Trial Judgement to this effect.[254] The showing of effective control is required in cases involving both de jure and de facto superiors. This standard has more recently been reaffirmed in the ICC Statute, Article 28 of which reads in relevant parts:

> In addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court;
> (a) A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by forces under his or her effective command and control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces,

> (b) With respect to superior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a), a superior shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates [...][255]

197. In determining questions of responsibility it is necessary to look to effective exercise of power or control and not to formal titles.[256] This would equally apply in the context of criminal responsibility. In general, the possession of de jure power in itself may not suffice for the finding of command responsibility if it does not manifest in effective control, although a court may presume that possession of such power prima facie results in effective control unless proof to the contrary is produced. The Appeals Chamber considers that the ability to exercise effective control is necessary for the establishment of de facto command or superior responsibility[257] and thus agrees with the Trial Chamber that the absence of formal appointment is not fatal to a finding of criminal responsibility, provided certain conditions are met. Muci}'s argument that de facto status must be equivalent to de jure status for the purposes of superior responsibility is misplaced. Although the degree of control wielded by a de jure or de facto superior may take different forms, a de facto superior must be found to wield substantially similar powers of control over subordinates to be held criminally responsible for their acts. The Appeals Chamber therefore agrees with the Trial Chamber's conclusion:

> While it is, therefore, the Trial Chamber's conclusion that a superior, whether military or civilian, may be held liable under the principle of superior responsibility on the basis of his de facto position of authority, the fundamental considerations underlying the imposition of such responsibility must be borne in mind. The doctrine of command responsibility is ultimately predicated upon the power of the superior to control the acts of his subordinates. A duty is placed upon the superior to exercise this power so as to prevent and repress the crimes committed by his subordinates, and a failure by him to do so in a diligent manner is sanctioned by the imposition of individual criminal responsibility in accordance with the doctrine. It follows that there is a threshold at which persons cease to possess the necessary powers of control over the actual perpetrators of offences and, accordingly, cannot properly be considered their "superiors" within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute. While the Trial Chamber must at all times be alive to the realities of any given situation and be prepared to pierce such veils of formalism that may shield those individuals carrying the greatest [255] Tadi} Appeal Judgement, para 223, which states that the text of the ICC Statute "may be taken to express the legal position i.e., opinio juris" of those States that adopted the Statute, at the time it was adopted. Muci}'s reliance on the ICC Statute in support of his arguments is thus not helpful in relation to the determination of the law as it stood at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment.

[256] In relation to State responsibility see ICJ, Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, ICJ Reports, 1971, p 16 at para 118.

[257] At the hearing, Muci} referred with approval to the Aleksovski Judgement's finding that "[A]nyone, including a civilian may be held responsible, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute, if it is proved that the individual had effective authority over the perpetrators of the crimes. This authority can be inferred from the accused's ability to give them orders and to punish them in the event of violations." Appeal Transcript, p 238, referring to para 70 of the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, quoting para 103 of the Aleksovski Judgement.

> responsibility for heinous acts, great care must be taken lest an injustice be committed in holding individuals responsible for the acts of others in situations where the link of control is absent or too remote.
> Accordingly, it is the Trial Chamber's view that, in order for the principle of superior responsibility to be applicable, it is necessary that the superior have effective control over the persons committing the underlying violations of international humanitarian law, in the sense of having the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of these offences. With the caveat that such authority can have a de facto as well as a de jure character, the Trial Chamber accordingly shares the view expressed by the International Law Commission that the doctrine of superior responsibility extends to civilian superiors only to the extent that they exercise a degree of control over their subordinates which is similar to that of military commanders.[258]

4300

198. As long as a superior has effective control over subordinates, to the extent that he can prevent them from committing crimes or punish them after they committed the crimes, he would be held responsible for the commission of the crimes if he failed to exercise such abilities of control.[259]

199. The remainder of Muci}'s ground of appeal concerns the sufficiency of the evidence regarding the existence of his de facto authority. This poses a question of fact, which the Appeals Chamber will now consider.

2. The Trial Chamber's Factual Findings

200. At the appeal hearing, Muci} argued that the Trial Chamber's reliance on the evidence cited in the Trial Judgement in support of the finding that he exercised superior authority was unreasonable. He made a number of arguments which were ultimately directed to his central contention that the evidence was insufficient to support a conclusion that he was a de facto commander for the entire period of time set forth in the Indictment.[260] His submissions particularly emphasised that he had no authority in the camp during the months of May, June, or July of 1992.[261]

[258] Trial Judgement, paras 377-378 (emphasis added; footnote omitted). In relation to the case of Delali}, the Trial Chamber further held that a de facto position of authority may be sufficient for a finding of criminal responsibility, "provided the exercise of de facto authority is accompanied by the trappings of the exercise of de jure authority. By this, the Trial Chamber means the perpetrator of the underlying offence must be the subordinate of the person of higher rank and under his direct or indirect control." Trial Judgement, para 646. The Appeals Chamber does not understand this as a reference to any need for a formal appointment.

[259] The Appeals Chamber thus agrees with the Prosecution that reliance on de facto control to establish superior responsibility does not amount to a form of strict liability.

[261] Appeal Transcript, pp 236-237. Counsel for the appellant referred to the testimony of a number of witnesses in support of his contention.

201. At the hearing, the Prosecution submitted that it was open to a reasonable Chamber to conclude from the evidence as a whole that Muci} was commander of the ^elebı}ı camp throughout the period referred to in the Indictment.[262] It was argued that Muci} has not shown that the Trial Chamber has been unreasonable in its evaluation of evidence, and that it is a reasonable inference of the Trial Chamber that Muci} wielded a degree of control and authority in the ^elebi}i camp, drawn from the fact that he had the ability to assist detainees.[263]

3. Discussion

202. In respect of a factual error alleged on appeal, the Tadi} Appeal Judgement provides the test that:

> It is only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not reasonably have been accepted by any reasonable person that the Appeals Chamber can substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber.[264]

203. In the appeal of Furund`ija, the Appeals Chamber declined to conduct an independent assessment of the evidence admitted at trial, as requested by the appellants, understood as a request for de novo review, and took the view that "[t]his Chamber does not operate as a second Trial Chamber."[265]

204. In paragraphs 737-767 of the Trial Judgement, a thorough analysis of evidence led the Trial Chamber to conclude that Muci} "had all the powers of a commander" in the camp.[266] The conclusion was also based on Muci}'s own admission that he had "necessary disciplinary powers".[267] Muci}, who disputes this conclusion on appeal, must persuade the Appeals Chamber that the conclusion is one which could not have reasonably been made by a reasonable tribunal of fact, so that a miscarriage of justice has occurred.[268]

205. The Appeals Chamber notes that Muci} argued at trial to the effect that, in the absence of any document formally appointing him to the position of commander or warden of the camp, it was not shown what authority he had over the camp personnel.[269] On appeal, he repeats this argument,[270] and reiterates some of his objections made at trial in respect of the Prosecut evidence which was accepted by the Trial Chamber as showing that he had de facto authority in the camp in the period alleged in the Indictment.[271]

206. Having concluded that "the actual exercise of authority in the absence of a formal appointment is sufficient for the purpose of incurring criminal responsibility" provided that the de facto superior exercises actual powers of control,[272] the Trial Chamber considered the argument of Muci} that he had no "formal authority".[273] It looked at the following factors to establish that Muci} had de facto authority: Muci}'s acknowledgement of his having authority over the ^elebi}i camp since 27 July 1992,[274] the submission in the defence closing brief that Muci} used his "limited" authority to prevent crimes and to order that the detainees not be mistreated and that the offenders tried to conceal offences from him,[275] the defence statement that when Muci} was at the camp, there was "far greater" discipline than when he was absent,[276] the evidence that co-defendant Deli} told the detainees that Muci} was commander,[277] the evidence that he arranged for the transfer of detainees,[278] his classifying of detainees for the purpose of continued detention or release,[279] his control of guards,[280] and the evidence that he had the authority to release prisoners.[281] At trial, the Trial Chamber accepted this body of evidence. The Appeals Chamber considers that it has not been shown that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting the evidence which led to the finding that Muci} was commander of the camp and as such exercised command responsibility.

207. Muci} argues that the Trial Chamber failed to explain on what date he became commander of the camp. The Trial Chamber found:

> The Defence is not disputing that there is a considerable body of evidence [...] that Zdravko Muci} was the acknowledged commander of the prison-camp. Instead, the Defence submits that the Prosecution has to provide evidence which proves beyond a reasonable doubt the dates during which Muci} is alleged to have exercised authority in the ^elebi}i prison-camp [...]. The Trial Chamber agrees that the Prosecution has the burden of proving that Muci} was the commander of the ^elebi}i prison-camp and that the standard of proof in this respect > is beyond reasonable doubt. However, the issue of the actual date on which Muci} became a commander is not a necessary element in the discharge of this burden of proof. Instead, the issue is whether he was, during the relevant period as set forth in the Indictment, the commander of the prison-camp.[282]

208. The Appeals Chamber can see no reason why the Trial Chamber's conclusion that it was unnecessary to make a finding as to the exact date of his appointment – as opposed to his status during the relevant period – was unreasonable.

209. Muci} claims that he had no authority of whatever nature during the months of May, June and July of 1992. The Indictment defined the relevant period in which Muci} was commander of the camp to be "from approximately May 1992 to November 1992". The offences of subordinates upon which the relevant charges against Muci} were based took place during that period. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Judgement considered the objection of Muci} to the evidence which was adduced to show that he was present in the camp in May 1992.[283] The objection was made through the presentation of defence evidence, which was rejected by the Trial Chamber as being inconclusive.[284] On this point, the Appeals Chamber observes that Muci} did not challenge the testimony of certain witnesses which was adduced to show that Muci} was not only present in the camp but in a position of authority in the months of May, June and July of 1992. Reference is made to the evidence given by Witness D, who was a member of the Military Investigative Commission in the camp and worked closely with Muci} in the classification of the detainees.[285] The Trial Chamber was "completely satisfied" with this evidence.[286] The witness testified that Muci} was present at the meeting of the Military Investigative Commission held in early June 1992 to discuss the classification and continued detention or release of the detainees.[287] It is also noteworthy that, in relation to a finding in the case of Deli}, it was found that the Military Investigative Commission only conducted interviews with detainees after informing Muci}, or Deli} when the former was absent, and that only Muci} and Deli} had access to the files of the Commission.[288] Further, Muci} conceded in his interview with the Prosecution that he went to the camp as early as 20 May 1992.[289] Moreover, Grozdana]e}ez, a former detainee at the camp, was interrogated by Muci} in late May or early June 1992.[290] The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the evidence relied upon by the Trial Chamber constitutes adequate support for its findings.

210. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that it was open to the Trial Chamber to find that from "before the end of May 1992" Muci} was exercising de facto authority over the camp and its personnel.[291]

211. In addition, Muci} submitted:[292]

> (i) The Trial Chamber failed to consider the causal implications of the acquittal of the co-defendant Delali} from whom the Prosecution alleged Muci} obtained his necessary authority; and
> (ii) The Trial Chamber gave wrongful and/or undue weight to the acts of benefice [sic] attributed to Muci} at, inter alia, paragraph 1247 of the Trial Judgement, to found command responsibility, instead of treating them as acts of compassion coupled with the strength of personal character which constitute some other species of authority.[293]

212. The first argument appears to be based on an assumption that Muci}'s authority rested in some formal way on that of Delali}. This argument has no merit. It is clear that the Trial Chamber found that, regardless of the way Muci} was appointed, he in fact exercised de facto authority, irrespective of Delali}'s role in relation to the camp.

213. The second point lacks merit in that the acts related to in paragraph 1247 of the Trial Judgement were considered by the Trial Chamber for the purpose of sentencing, rather than conviction; and that acts beneficial to detainees done by Muci} referred to by the Trial Chamber may reasonably be regarded as strengthening its view that Muci} was in a position of authority to effect "greater discipline" in the camp than when he was absent.[294] Although potentially compassionate in nature, these acts are nevertheless evidence of the powers which Muci} exercised and thus of his authority.

214. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this ground of appeal and upholds the finding of the Trial Chamber that Muci} was the de facto commander of the ^elebi}i camp during the relevant period indicated in the Indictment.

B. The Prosecution Grounds of Appeal

215. The Prosecution has filed three grounds of appeal relating to command responsibility.[295]

1. Mental Element – "Knew or had Reason to Know"

216. The Prosecution's first ground of appeal is that the Trial Chamber has erred in law by its interpretation of the standard of "knew or had reason to know" as laid down in Article 7(3) of the Statute.[296]

217. Delali} argues that the Trial Chamber's interpretation of "had reason to know" is obiter dicta and does not affect the finding concerning Delali} that he never had a superior-subordinate relationship with Deli}, Muci}, and Land`o.[297] He submits that the Trial Chamber did not determine the matter of the mental element of command responsibility in terms of customary law. The ground should therefore not be considered. He argues that if the Appeals Chamber proceeds to deal with this ground, Delali} will agree with the interpretation given by the Trial Chamber in this regard.[298]

218. Acknowledging Delali}'s submission, the Prosecution asks the Appeals Chamber to deal with the mental element as a matter of general significance to the Tribunal's jurisprudence.[299] The Trial Chamber, it contends, determined the matter in terms of the [295] Ground one: "The Trial Chamber erred in paragraphs 379-393 when it defined the mental element 'knew or had reasons to know' for the purposes of Superior Responsibility";

Ground two: "The Trial Chamber's finding that Zejnil Delali} did not exercise superior responsibility";
Ground five: "The Trial Chamber erred when it decided in paragraphs 776–810 that Hazim Deli} was not a 'superior' in the ^elebi}i Prison Camp for the purposes of ascribing criminal responsibility to him under Article 7(3) of the Statute".

customary law applicable at the time of the offences.[300] The Prosecution does not argue mental standard based on strict liability.[301] 4306

219. Delić agrees with the Prosecution's position that Articles 86 and 87 of Additional Protocol I reflect customary law as established through the post Second World War cases. A commander has a duty to be informed, but not every failure in this duty gives rise to command responsibility.[302]

220. The issues raised by this ground of appeal of the Prosecution include:

(i) whether in international law, the duty of a superior to control his subordinates includes a duty to be apprised of their action, i.e. a duty to know of their action and whether neglect of such duty will always result in criminal liability;

(ii) whether the standard of "had reason to know" means either the commander had information indicating that subordinates were about to commit or had committed offences or he did not have this information due to dereliction of his duty; and

(iii) whether international law acknowledges any distinction between military and civil leaders in relation to the duty to be informed.

221. The Appeals Chamber takes note of the fact that this ground of appeal is raised by the Prosecution for its general importance to the "jurisprudence of the Tribunal".[303] Considering that this ground concerns an important element of command responsibility, that the Prosecution alleges an error on the part of the Trial Chamber in respect of a finding as to the applicable law,[304] that the parties have made extensive submissions on it, and that it is indeed an issue of general importance to the proceedings before the Tribunal,[305] the Appeals Chamber will consider it by reference to Article 7(3) of the Statute and customary law at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment.[306]

(i) The Mental Element Articulated by the Statute

[306] Secretary-General's Report, para 34.

222. Article 7(3) of the Statute provides that a superior may incur criminal responsibility for criminal acts of subordinates "if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so" but fails to prevent such acts or punish those subordinates. 4307

223. The Trial Chamber held that a superior:

> [...] may possess the mens rea for command responsibility where: (1) he had actual knowledge, established through direct or circumstantial evidence, that his subordinates were committing or about to commit crimes referred to under Articles 2 through 5 of the Statute, or (2) where he had in his possession information of a nature, which at the least, would put him on notice of the risk of such offences by indicating the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether such crimes were committed or were about to be committed by his subordinates.[307]

224. The Prosecution position is essentially that the reference to "had reason to know" in Article 7(3) of the Statute, refers to two possible situations. First, a superior had information which put him on notice or which suggested to him that subordinates were about to commit or had committed crimes. Secondly, a superior lacked such information as a result of a serious dereliction of his duty to obtain the information within his reasonable access.[308] As acknowledged by the Prosecution, only the second situation is not encompassed by the Trial Chamber's findings.[309] Delali} argues to the effect that the Trial Chamber was correct in its statement of the law in this regard, and that the second situation envisaged by the Prosecution was in effect an argument based on strict liability.[310] Deli} agrees with the Prosecution's assessment of customary law that "the commander has an international duty to be informed", but argues that the Statute was designed by the UN Security Council in such a way that the jurisdiction of the Tribunal was limited to cases where the commander had actual knowledge or such knowledge that it gave him reason to know of subordinate offences, which was a rule inconsistent with customary law laid down in the military trials conducted after the Second World War.[311]

225. The literal meaning of Article 7(3) is not difficult to ascertain. A commander may be held criminally liable in respect of the acts of his subordinates in violation of Articles 2 to 5 of the Statute. Both the subordinates and the commander are individually responsible in relation to the impugned acts. The commander would be tried for failure to act in respect of the offences of his subordinates in the perpetration of which he did not directly participate.

[308] Prosecution Brief, para 2.7; Appeal Transcript p 121.
[309] Appeal Transcript, p 121.

226. Article 7(3) of the Statute is concerned with superior liability arising from failure to act in spite of knowledge. Neglect of a duty to acquire such knowledge, however, does not feature in the provision as a separate offence, and a superior is not therefore liable under the provision for such failures but only for failing to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish. The Appeals Chamber takes it that the Prosecution seeks a finding that "reason to know" exists on the part of a commander if the latter is seriously negligent in his duty to obtain the relevant information. The point here should not be that knowledge may be presumed if a person fails in his duty to obtain the relevant information of a crime, but that it may be presumed if he had the means to obtain the knowledge but deliberately refrained from doing so. The Prosecution's argument that a breach of the duty of a superior to remain constantly informed of his subordinates actions will necessarily result in criminal liability comes close to the imposition of criminal liability on a strict or negligence basis. It is however noted that although a commander's failure to remain apprised of his subordinates' action, or to set up a monitoring system may constitute a neglect of duty which results in liability within the military disciplinary framework, it will not necessarily result in criminal liability.

227. As the Tribunal is charged with the application of customary law,[312] the Appeals Chamber will briefly consider the case-law in relation to whether there is a duty in customary law to know of all subordinate activity, breach of which will give rise to criminal responsibility in the context of command or superior responsibility.

(ii) Duty to Know In Customary Law

228. In the Yamashita case, the United States Military Commission found that:

> Clearly, assignment to command military troops is accompanied by broad authority and heavy responsibility [...]. It is absurd, however, to consider a commander a murderer or rapist because one of his soldiers commits a murder or a rape. Nevertheless, where murder and rape and vicious, revengeful actions are widespread offences, and there is no effective attempt by a commander to discover and control the criminal acts, such a commander may be held responsible, even criminally liable, for the lawless acts of his troops, depending upon their nature and the circumstances surrounding them.[313]

The Military Commission concluded that proof of widespread offences, and secondly of the failure of the commander to act in spite of the offences, may give rise to liability. The second factor suggests that the commander needs to discover and control. But it is the first fact[illegible] is of primary importance, in that it gives the commander a reason or a basis to discover the scope of the offences. In the Yamashita case, the fact stood out that the atrocities took place between 9 October 1944 to 3 September 1945, during which General Yamashita was the commander-in-chief of the 14th Army Group including the Military Police.[314] This length of time begs the question as to how the commander and his staff could be ignorant of large-scale atrocities spreading over this long period. The statement of the commission implied that it had found that the circumstances demonstrated that he had enough notice of the atrocities to require him to proceed to investigate further and control the offences. The fact that widespread offences were committed over a long period of time should have put him on notice that crimes were being or had been committed by his subordinates.

229. On the same case, the United Nations War Crimes Commission commented:

> [...] the crimes which were shown to have been committed by Yamashita's troops were so widespread, both in space and in time, that they could be regarded as providing either prima facie evidence that the accused knew of their perpetration, or evidence that he must have failed to fulfil a duty to discover the standard of conduct of his troops.[315]

This last sentence deserves attention. However, having considered several cases decided by other military tribunals, it went on to qualify the above statement:

> Short of maintaining that a Commander has a duty to discover the state of discipline prevailing among his troops, Courts dealing with cases such as those at present under discussion may in suitable instances have regarded means of knowledge as being the same as knowledge itself.[316]

In summary, it pointedly stated that "the law on this point awaits further elucidation and consolidation".[317] Contrary to the Trial Chamber's conclusion, other cases discussed in the Judgement do not show a consistent trend in the decisions that emerged out of the military trials conducted after the Second World War.[318] The citation from the Judgement in the case of United States v Wilhelm List[319] ("Hostage case") indicates that List failed to acquire "supplementary reports to apprise him of all the pertinent facts".[320] The tribunal in the case found that if a commander of occupied territory "fails to require and obtain com[illegible] information" he is guilty of a dereliction of his duty.[321] List was found to be charged with notice of the relevant crimes because of reports which had been made to him.[322] Therefore, List had in his possession information that should have prompted him to investigate further the situation under his command. The Trial Chamber also quoted from the Pohl case.[323] The phrase quoted is also meant to state a different point than that suggested by the Trial Chamber. In that case, the accused Mummenthey pleaded ignorance of fact in respect of certain aspects of the running of his business which employed concentration camp prisoners.[324] Having refuted this plea by invoking evidence showing that the accused knew fully of those aspects, the tribunal stated:

> Mummenthey's assertions that he did not know what was happening in the labor camps and enterprises under his jurisdiction does not exonerate him. It was his duty to know.[325]

That statement, when read in the context of that part of the judgement, means that the accused was under a duty arising from his position as an SS officer and business manager in charge of a war-time enterprise to know what was happening in his business, including the conditions of the labour force who worked in that business. Any suggestion that the tribunal used that statement to express that the accused had a duty under international law to know would be obiter in light of the finding that he had knowledge. In the Roechling case, which was also referred to by the Trial Chamber, the court concluded that Roechling had a "duty to keep himself informed about the treatment of the deportees."[326] However, it also noted that "Roechling [...] had repeated opportunities during the inspection of his concerns to ascertain the fate meted out to his personnel, since he could not fail to notice the prisoner's uniform on those occasions".[327] This was information which would put him on notice. It is to be noted that the courts which referred to the existence of a "duty to know" at the same time found that the accused were put on notice of subordinates' acts.

230. Further, the Field Manual of the US Department of Army 1956 (No. 27-10, Law of Land Warfare) provides:

> The commander is...responsible, if he had actual knowledge, or should have had knowledge, through reports received by him or through other means, that troops or other persons subject > to his control are about to commit or have committed a war crime and he fails to use the means at his disposal to insure compliance with the law of war.[328]

The italicised clause is clear that the commander should be presumed to have had knowledge if he had reports or other means of communication; in other words, he had already information as contained in reports or through other means, which put him on notice. On the basis of this analysis, the Appeals Chamber must conclude, in the same way as did the United Nations War Crimes Commission,[329] that the then customary law did not impose in the criminal context a general duty to know upon commanders or superiors, breach of which would be sufficient to render him responsible for subordinates' crimes.

231. The anticipated elucidation and consolidation of the law on the question as to whether there was a duty under customary law for the commander to obtain the necessary information came with Additional Protocol I. Article 86(2) of the protocol provides:

> The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach.[330]

232. The phrase, "had reason to know", is not as clear in meaning as that of "had information enabling them to conclude", although it may be taken as effectively having a similar meaning. The latter standard is more explicit, and its rationale is plain: failure to conclude, or conduct additional inquiry, in spite of alarming information constitutes knowledge of subordinate offences. Failure to act when required to act with such knowledge is the basis for attributing liability in this category of case.

233. The phrase "had information", as used in Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I, presents little difficulty for interpretation. It means that, at the critical time, the commander had in his possession such information that should have put him on notice of the fact that an unlawful act was being, or about to be, committed by a subordinate. As observed by the Trial Chamber, the apparent discrepancy between the French version, which reads "des informations leur permettant de conclure" (literally: information enabling them to conclude), and the English version of Article 86(2) does not undermine this interpretation.[331] This is a reference to information, which, if at hand, would oblige the commander to obtain more information conduct further inquiry), and he therefore "had reason to know".

234. As noted by the Trial Chamber, the formulation of the principle of superior responsibility in the ILC Draft Code is very similar to that in Article 7(3) of the Statute.[332] Further, as the ILC comments on the draft articles drew from existing practice, they deserve close attention.[333] The ILC comments on the mens rea for command responsibility run as follows:

> Article 6 provides two criteria for determining whether a superior is to be held criminally responsible for the wrongful conduct of a subordinate. First, a superior must have known or had reason to know in the circumstances at the time that a subordinate was committing or was going to commit a crime. This criterion indicates that a superior may have the mens rea required to incur criminal responsibility in two different situations. In the first situation, a superior has actual knowledge that his subordinate is committing or is about to commit a crime...In the second situation, he has sufficient relevant information to enable him to conclude under the circumstances at the time that his subordinates are committing or are about to commit a crime.[334]

The ILC further explains that "[t]he phrase 'had reason to know' is taken from the statutes of the ad hoc tribunals and should be understood as having the same meaning as the phrase 'had information enabling them to conclude' which is used in the Additional Protocol I. The Commission decided to use the former phrase to ensure an objective rather than a subjective interpretation of this element of the first criterion."[335]

235. The consistency in the language used by Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I, and the ILC Report and the attendant commentary, is evidence of a consensus as to the standard of the mens rea of command responsibility. If "had reason to know" is interpreted to mean that a commander has a duty to inquire further, on the basis of information of a general nature he has in hand, there is no material difference between the standard of Article 86(2) of Additional

Protocol I and the standard of "should have known" as upheld by certain cases decided after the Second World War.[336] 4313

236. After surveying customary law and especially the drafting history of Article 86 of Additional Protocol I,[337] the Trial Chamber concluded that:

> An interpretation of the terms of this provision [Article 86 of Additional Protocol I] in accordance with their ordinary meaning thus leads to the conclusion, confirmed by the travaux préparatoires, that a superior can be held criminally responsible only if some specific information was in fact available to him which would provide notice of offences committed by his subordinates. This information need not be such that it by itself was sufficient to compel the conclusion of the existence of such crimes. It is sufficient that the superior was put on further inquiry by the information, or, in other words, that it indicated the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether offences were being committed or about to be committed by his subordinates. This standard, which must be considered to reflect the position of customary law at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment, is accordingly controlling for the construction of the mens rea standard established in Article 7(3). The Trial Chamber thus makes no finding as to the present content of customary law on this point.[338]

237. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber relied improperly upon reference to the object and purpose of Additional Protocol I.[339] The ordinary meaning of the language of Article 86(2) regarding the knowledge element of command responsibility is clear. Though adding little to the interpretation of the language of the provision, the context of the provision as provided by Additional Protocol I simply confirms an interpretation based on the natural meaning of its provisions. Article 87 requires parties to a conflict to impose certain duties on commanders, including the duty in Article 87(3) to "initiate disciplinary or penal action" against subordinates or other persons under their control who have committed a breach of the Geneva Conventions or of the Protocol. That duty is limited by the terms of Article 87(3) to circumstances where the commander "is aware" that his subordinates are going to commit or have committed such breaches. Article 87 therefore interprets Article 86(2) as far as the duties of the commander or superior are concerned, but the criminal offence based on command responsibility is defined in Article 86(2) only.

238. Contrary to the Prosecution's submission, the Trial Chamber did not hold that a superior needs to have information on subordinate offences in his actual possession for the purpose of ascribing criminal liability under the principle of command responsibility. A showing that the superior had some general information in his possession, which would put him on notice of possible unlawful acts by his subordinates would be sufficient to prove that he "had reason to know". The ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocol I) refers to "reports addressed to (the superior), [...] the tactical situation, the level of training and instruction of subordinate officers and their troops, and their character traits" as potentially constituting the information referred to in Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I.[340] As to the form of the information available to him, it may be written or oral, and does not need to have the form of specific reports submitted pursuant to a monitoring system. This information does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed. For instance, a military commander who has received information that some of the soldiers under his command have a violent or unstable character, or have been drinking prior to being sent on a mission, may be considered as having the required knowledge.

239. Finally, the relevant information only needs to have been provided or available to the superior, or in the Trial Chamber's words, "in the possession of". It is not required that he actually acquainted himself with the information. In the Appeals Chamber's view, an assessment of the mental element required by Article 7(3) of the Statute should be conducted in the specific circumstances of each case, taking into account the specific situation of the superior concerned at the time in question. Thus, as correctly held by the Trial Chamber,[341] as the element of knowledge has to be proved in this type of cases, command responsibility is not a form of strict liability. A superior may only be held liable for the acts of his subordinates if it is shown that he "knew or had reason to know" about them. The Appeals Chamber would not describe superior responsibility as a vicarious liability doctrine, insofar as vicarious liability may suggest a form of strict imputed liability.

(iii) Civilian Superiors

240. The Prosecution submits that civilian superiors are under the same duty to know as military commanders.[342] If, as found by the Appeals Chamber, there is no such "duty" to know in customary law as far as military commanders are concerned, this submission lacks the necessary premise. Civilian superiors undoubtedly bear responsibility for subordinate offences under certain conditions, but whether their responsibility contains identical elements to th military commanders is not clear in customary law. As the Trial Chamber made a factual determination that Delali} was not in a position of superior authority over the ^elebi}i camp in any capacity, there is no need for the Appeals Chamber to resolve this question.

(iv) Conclusion

241. For the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal is dismissed. The Appeals Chamber upholds the interpretation given by the Trial Chamber to the standard "had reason to know", that is, a superior will be criminally responsible through the principles of superior responsibility only if information was available to him which would have put him on notice of offences committed by subordinates.[343] This is consistent with the customary law standard of mens rea as existing at the time of the offences charged in the Indictment.

2. Whether Delali} Exercised Superior Responsibility

242. The Prosecution's second ground of appeal alleges an error of law in the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the nature of the superior-subordinate relationship which must be established to prove liability under Article 7(3) of the Statute. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber wrongly "held that the doctrine of superior responsibility requires the perpetrator to be part of a subordinate unit in a direct chain of command under the superior."[344] This legal error, it is said, led to the erroneous finding that Delali} did not exercise superior responsibility over the ^elebi}i camp and thus was not responsible for the offences of the camp staff.[345]

243. The Prosecution argues that, contrary to the finding of the Trial Chamber, the doctrine of command responsibility does not require the existence of a direct chain of command under the superior, and that other forms of de jure and de facto control, including forms of influence, may suffice for ascribing liability under the doctrine.[346] The criterion for superior responsibility is actual control, which entails the ability to prevent violations, rather than direct subordination.[347] Delali} was in a special position in that the facts found by the Trial Chamber established that he "act[ed] on behalf of the War Presidency, he act[ed] on behalf of the supreme command in Sarajevo, he act[ed] on behalf of the investigating commissio: respect to prisoners, he issued orders with respect to the functioning of the ^elebi}i prison".[348] It concludes that, as the Trial Chamber found him to have knowledge of the ill-treatment in the camp,[349] and yet failed to prevent or punish the violations,[350] the Appeals Chamber may substitute verdicts of guilty on those counts under which command responsibility was charged.[351]

244. The Prosecution submits that, if the Appeals Chamber applies the correct test to all of the facts found by the Trial Chamber, the only conclusion it could reach is that Delalić was a superior and was guilty of the crimes charged, which would permit it to reverse the verdict of acquittal.[352] If the Appeals Chamber finds that the facts found by the Trial Chamber do not permit it to reach that conclusion, it should remit the case to a newly constituted Trial Chamber to determine the relevant counts.[353]

245. In the alternative, the Prosecution requests leave to be granted to present additional evidence which had been "wrongly excluded by the Trial Chamber", being evidence that it sought to call in rebuttal.[354] The documentary evidence which had not been admitted was annexed to the Prosecution Brief. The submission in relation to admission of wrongfully excluded evidence as expressed in the Prosecution Brief initially suggested that this course was proposed as an alternative remedy which would fall for consideration only should the Appeals Chamber accept the argument that the Trial Chamber made an error of law in its statement of the nature of the superior-subordinate relationship.[355] However, it was also stated that the Prosecution alleges that the Trial Chamber's exclusion of the evidence constituted a distinct error of law, and in subsequent written and oral submissions it was made apparent that, although not expressed as a separate ground of appeal, the submissions as to erroneous exclusion of evidence constitute an independent basis for challenging the Trial Chamber's finding that

Cf para 3.84: "[...] the Prosecution now seeks an appellate remedy against these decisions of the Trial Chamber [not to admit the evidence]".

Delalić was not a superior.[356] As Delalić in fact answered this Prosecution argumen prejudice will result if the Appeals Chamber deals with this alternative submission as an independent allegation of error of law.

246. Delali} contends that in any event the evidence of the position of Delali} in relation to the ^elebi}i camp demonstrates that he had no superior authority there,[357] and that the Prosecution's theory of "influence responsibility" is not supported by customary law.[358] He argues that a revision of the judgement by the Appeals Chamber can only concern errors of law, and that, where there is a mix of factual and legal errors, the appropriate remedy is that a new trial be ordered.[359] Delali} submits that the Trial Chamber was correct in refusing the to allow the proposed Prosecution witnesses to testify as rebuttal witnesses and in rejecting the Prosecution motion to re-open the proceedings.[360]

247. The Prosecution's argument relating to the Trial Chamber's findings as to the nature of the superior-subordinate relationship is considered first before turning to the second argument relating to the exclusion of evidence which was sought to be admitted as rebuttal or fresh evidence.

(i) The Superior-Subordinate Relationship in the Doctrine of Command Responsibility

248. The Prosecution interprets the Trial Chamber to have held that, in cases involving command or superior responsibility, the perpetrator must be "part of a subordinate unit in a direct chain of command under the superior" for the superior to be held responsible.[361] The Prosecution submissions do not refer to any specific express statement of the Trial Chamber to this effect but appear to consider that this was the overall effect of the Trial Chamber's findings. The Prosecution first refers to, and apparently accepts, the finding of the Trial Chamber that:

If they applied the incorrect test and it's an error of law, then the Trial Chamber erred" and at p 171, where the Prosecution agreed that their submission was "[...] that there was an error of law, the documents which are attached to the submissions will demonstrate that it was an error of law which caused harm to the Prosecution's case, and therefore, you want a new trial."

> [...] in order for the principle of superior responsibility to be applicable, it is necessary that the superior have effective control over the persons committing the underlying violations of international humanitarian law, in the sense of having the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of these offences [...] such authority can have a de facto or de jure character.[362]

249. The Prosecution then refers to certain subsequent conclusions of the Trial Chamber which it apparently regards as supporting its interpretation that the Trial Chamber held that the doctrine of superior responsibility requires the perpetrator to be part of a subordinate unit in a direct chain of command under the superior. First, the Prosecution refers to the Trial Chamber's statement that, in the case of the exercise of de facto authority, it must be > [...] accompanied by the trappings of the exercise of de jure authority. By this, the Trial Chamber means that the perpetrator of the underlying offence must be the subordinate of the person of higher rank and under his direct or indirect control.[363]

The section of the judgement cited and relied upon in the Prosecution Brief, however, omits the italicised portion of the passage. This qualification expressly conveys the Trial Chamber's view that the relationship of subordination required by the doctrine of command responsibility may be direct or indirect.

250. The Trial Chamber also referred to the ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols), where it is stated that the superior-subordinate relationship should be seen "in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control".[364] Noting that Article 87 of Additional Protocol I establishes that the duty of a military commander to prevent violations of the Geneva Conventions extends not only to his subordinates but also to "other persons under his control", the Trial Chamber stated that:

> This type of superior-subordinate relationship is described in the Commentary to the Additional Protocols by reference to the concept of "indirect subordination", in contrast to the link of "direct subordination" which is said to relate the tactical commander to his troops.[365]

251. Two points are clear from the Trial Chamber's consideration of the issue. First, the Trial Chamber found that a de facto position of authority suffices for the purpose of ascribing command responsibility. Secondly, it found that the superior-subordinate relationship is based on the notion of control within a hierarchy and that this control can be exercised in a direct or indirect manner, with the result that the superior-subordinate relationship itself may be both direct and indirect. Neither these findings, nor anything else expressed within the Trial

Judgement, demonstrates that the Trial Chamber considered that, for the necessary superior-subordinate relationship to exist, the perpetrator must be in a direct chain of command under the superior.

252. Examining the actual findings of the Trial Chamber on the issue, it is therefore far from apparent that it found that the doctrine of superior responsibility requires the perpetrator to be part of a subordinate unit in a direct chain of command under the superior; nor is such a result a necessary implication of its findings. This seems to have been implicitly recognised by the Prosecution in its oral submissions on this ground of appeal at the hearing.[366] The Appeals Chamber regards the Trial Chamber as having recognised the possibility of both indirect as well as direct relationships subordination and agrees that this may be the case, with the proviso that effective control must always be established.

253. However, the argument of the Prosecution goes further than challenging the perceived requirement of direct subordination. The key focus of the Prosecution argument appears to be the Trial Chamber's rejection of the Prosecution theory that persons who can exert "substantial influence" over a perpetrator who is not necessarily a subordinate may, by virtue of that influence, be held responsible under the principles of command responsibility.[367] The Prosecution does not argue that anyone of influence may be held responsible in the context of superior responsibility, but that a superior encompasses someone who "may exercise a substantial degree of influence over the perpetrator or over the entity to which the perpetrator belongs."[368]

254. The Trial Chamber understood the Prosecution at trial to be seeking "to extend the concept of the exercise of superior authority to persons over whom the accused can exert substantial influence in a given situation, who are clearly not subordinates",[369] which is essentially the approach taken by the Prosecution on appeal. The Trial Chamber also rejected the idea, which it apparently regarded as being implicit in the Prosecution view, that a superior-subordinate relationship could exist in the absence of a subordinate:

[365] Trial Judgement, para 371.
[366] The Prosecution submitted that the Trial Chamber "appeared to focus on the necessity of a chain of command. It appeared to focus on the necessity of that there has to be a command structure..." and referred to "...the Trial Chamber's reliance on the need for a chain of command, and specifically some – what appears to be some direct link or direct chain of command ...", Appeal Transcript, pp 152 and 153.
[367] See Trial Judgement, para 648.

> The view of the Prosecution that a person may, in the absence of a subordinate unit through which authority is exercised, incur responsibility for the exercise of a superior authority seems to the Trial Chamber a novel proposition clearly at variance with the principle of command responsibility. The law does not know of a universal superior without a corresponding subordinate. The doctrine of command responsibility is clearly articulated and anchored on the relationship between superior and subordinate, and the responsibility of the commander for actions of members of his troops. It is a species of vicarious responsibility through which military discipline is regulated and ensured. This is why a subordinate unit of the superior or commander is a sine qua non for superior responsibility.[370]

The Trial Chamber thus unambiguously required that the perpetrator be subordinated to the superior. While it referred to hierarchy and chain of command, it was clear that it took a wide view of these concepts:

> The requirement of the existence of a "superior-subordinate relationship" which, in the words of the Commentary to Additional Protocol I, should be seen "in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control", is particularly problematic in situations such as that of the former Yugoslavia during the period relevant to the present case – situations where previously existing formal structures have broken down and where, during an interim period, the new, possibly improvised, control and command structures may be ambiguous and ill-defined. It is the Trial Chamber's conclusion ... that persons effectively in command of such more informal structures, with power to prevent and punish the crimes of persons who are in fact under their control, may under certain circumstances be held responsible for their failure to do so.[371]

The Trial Chamber's references to concepts of subordination, hierarchy and chains of command must be read in this context, which makes it apparent that they need not be established in the sense of formal organisational structures so long as the fundamental requirement of an effective power to control the subordinate, in the sense of preventing or punishing criminal conduct, is satisfied.

255. It is clear that the Trial Chamber drew a considerable measure of assistance from the ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols) on Article 86 of Additional Protocol I (which refers to the circumstances in which a superior will be responsible for breaches of the Conventions or the Protocol committed by his subordinate) in finding that actual control of the subordinate is a necessary requirement of the superior-subordinate relationship.[372] The Commentary on Article 86 of Additional Protocol I states that:

[372] Trial Judgement, paras 354, 371 and 647, referring to para 3544 of the ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols). Article 86(2) provides: "The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach."

> [...] we are concerned only with the superior who has a personal responsibility with regard to the perpetrator of the acts concerned because the latter, being his subordinate, is under his control. The direct link which must exist between the superior and the subordinate clearly follows from the duty to act laid down in paragraph 1 [of Article 86]. Furthermore only that superior is normally in the position of having information enabling him to conclude in the circumstances at the time that the subordinate has committed or is going to commit a breach. However it should not be concluded from this that the provision only concerns the commander under whose direct orders the subordinate is placed. The concept of the superior is broader and should be seen in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control.[373]

The point which the commentary emphasises is the concept of control, which results in a relationship of superior and subordinate.

256. The Appeals Chamber agrees that this supports the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the law on this point. The concept of effective control over a subordinate - in the sense of a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised - is the threshold to be reached in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship for the purpose of Article 7(3) of the Statute.[374]

257. In considering the Prosecution submissions relating to "substantial influence", it can be noted that they are not easily reconcilable with other Prosecution submissions in relation to command responsibility. The Prosecution expressly endorses the requirement that the superior have effective control over the perpetrator,[375] but then espouses, apparently as a matter of general application, a theory that in fact "substantial influence" alone may suffice, in that "where a person's powers of influence amount to a sufficient degree of authority or control in the circumstances to put that person in a position to take preventative action, a failure to do so may result in criminal liability."[376] This latter standard appears to envisage a lower threshold of control than an effective control threshold; indeed, it is unclear that in its natural sense the concept of "substantial influence" entails any necessary notion of control at all. Indeed, certain of the Prosecution submissions at the appeal hearing suggest that the substantial influence standard it proposes is not intended to pose any different standard than that of control in the sense of the ability to prevent or punish:

> But we would submit that if there is the substantial influence, which we concede is something which has got to be determined essentially on a case-by-case basis, if this superior does have [374] It has been elsewhere accepted in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal that, where there is no effective control, there is no superior responsibility: Aleksovski Trial Judgement, para 108 (HVO soldiers with arms forced their way into the prison without the guards being able to stop them) and para 111 (no finding was made on any existence of control by Aleksovski over the HVO soldiers).

> the material ability to prevent or punish, he or she should be within the confines of this doctrine of command responsibility as set forth in Article 7(3).[377]

The Appeals Chamber will consider whether substantial influence has ever been recognised as a foundation of superior responsibility in customary law.

258. The Prosecution relied at trial and on appeal on the Hostage case in support of its position that the perpetrators of the crimes for which the superior is to be held responsible need not be subordinates, and that substantial influence is a sufficient degree of control.[378] The Appeals Chamber concurs with the view of the Trial Chamber that the Hostage case is based on a distinction in international law between the duties of a commander for occupied territory and commanders in general. That case was concerned with a commander in occupied territory. The authority of such a commander is to a large extent territorial, and the duties applying in occupied territory are more onerous and far-reaching than those applying to commanders generally. Article 42 of the Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, annexed to the Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land 1907, provides:

> Territory is considered occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army.
> The occupation extends only to the territory where such authority has been established and can be exercised.

Article 43 provides:

> The authority of the legitimate power having in fact passed into the hands of the occupant, the latter shall take all the measures in his power to restore, and ensure, as far as possible, public order and safety, while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country.

This clearly does not apply to commanders in general. It was not then alleged, nor could it now be, that Delali} was a commander in occupied territory, and the Trial Chamber found expressly that he was not.[379]

259. The Prosecution emphasises however that it did not rely on the Hostage case alone.[380] At trial, and on appeal, the Prosecution relied on the judgement in the Muto case before the International Military Tribunal for the Far East.[381] The Appeals Chamber regards the Muto c. as providing limited assistance for the present purpose. Considering Muto's liability as Chief-of-Staff to General Yamashita, the Tokyo Tribunal found him to be in a position "to influence policy", and for this reason he was held responsible for atrocities by Japanese troops in the Philippines. It is difficult to ascertain from the judgement in that case whether his conviction on Count 55 for his failure to take adequate steps to ensure the observance of the laws of war reflected his participation in the making of that policy or was linked to his conviction on Count 54 which alleged that he "ordered, authorized and permitted" the commission of conventional war crimes.[382] It is possible that the conviction on Count 54 led to that on Count 55.

260. On the other hand, the Military Tribunal V in United States v Wilhelm von Leeb et al, states clearly that:

> In the absence of participation in criminal orders or their execution within a command, a Chief of Staff does not become criminally responsible for criminal acts occurring therein. He has no command authority over subordinate units. All he can do in such cases is call those matters to the attention of his commanding general. Command authority and responsibility for its exercise rest definitively upon his commander.[383]

This suggests that a Chief-of-Staff would be found guilty only if he were involved in the execution of criminal policies by writing them into orders that were subsequently signed and issued by the commanding officer. In that case, he could be directly liable for aiding and abetting or another form of participation in the offences that resulted from the orders drafted by him. The Appeals Chamber therefore confines itself to stating that the case-law relied on by the Prosecution was not uniform on this point. No force of precedent can be ascribed to a proposition that is interpreted differently by equally competent courts.

261. The Prosecution also relies on the Hirota and Roechling cases.[384] In the Hirota case, the Tokyo Tribunal found that Hirota, the Japanese Foreign Minister at the time of the atrocities committed by Japanese forces during the Rape of Nanking, "was derelict in his duty in not insisting before the Cabinet that immediate action be taken to put an end to the atrocities, failing any other action open to him to bring about the same result."[385] The Trial Chamber found this to be "language indicating powers of persuasion rather than formal authority to order action to be taken".[386]

262. In the Roechling case,[387] a number of civilian industrialists were found guilty in respect of the ill-treatment of deportees employed in forced labour, not on the basis that they ordered the treatment but because they "permitted it; and indeed supported it, and in addition, for not having done their utmost to put an end to the abuses".[388] The Trial Chamber referred specifically to the findings in relation to von Gemmingen-Hornberg, who was the president of the Directorate and works manager of the Roechling steel plants. The tribunal at first instance had found that "the high position which he occupied in the corporation, as well as the fact that he was Herman Roechling's son-in-law, gave him certainly sufficient authority to obtain an alleviation in the treatment of these workers", and that this constituted "cause under the circumstances" to find him guilty of inhuman treatment of the workers. The reference to "sufficient authority" was interpreted by the Trial Chamber as indicating "powers of persuasion rather than formal authority", partly because of the tribunal's reference to the fact that the accused was Roechling's son-in-law,[389] and it is upon this interpretation that the Prosecution appears to rely.[390]

263. The Appeals Chamber does not interpret the reference to "sufficient authority" as entailing an acceptance of powers of persuasion or influence alone as being a sufficient basis on which to found command responsibility. The Roechling judgement on appeal does not refer to the fact that the accused was Roechling's son-in-law, but it emphasises his senior position as president of the Directorate and his position as works manager, "that is, as the works representative in negotiations with the authorities specially competent to deal with matters relating to labor. His sphere of competence also included contact with the Gestapo in regard to the works police".[391] The judgements suggest that he was found to have powers of control over the conditions of the workers which, although not involving any formal ability to give orders to the works police, exceeded mere powers of persuasion or influence. Thus the Appeals Chamber considers the Trial Chamber's initial characterisation of the case as being "best construed as an example of the imposition of superior responsibility on the basis of de facto powers of control possessed by civilian industrial leaders" as being the more accurate one.[392]

264. The Appeals Chamber also considers that the Pohl case does not support the proposition of the Prosecution that the substantial influence alone of a superior may suffice for the purpose of command responsibility.[393] The person in question, Karl Mummenthey, an SS officer and a business manager, not only possessed "military power of command" but, more importantly in this case, "control" over the industries where mistreatment of concentration camp labourers occurred.[394] This is apparent even from the passage of the judgement cited by the Prosecution in its Appeal Brief:[395]

> Mummenthey was a definite integral and important figure in the whole concentration camp set-up, and, as an SS officer, wielded military power of command. If excesses occurred in the industries under his control he was in a position not only to know about them, but to do something.[396]

265. In the context of relevant jurisprudence on the question, it should also be noted that the Prosecution also relies on the fact that a Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, in Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana,[397] relied on these World War II authorities, and on the references to them in the judgement of the Trial Chamber in Čelebići, to find that powers of influence are sufficient to impose superior responsibility.[398] The ICTR Trial Chamber stated:

> [...] having examined the Hostage and High Command cases the Chamber in Čelebići concluded that they authoritatively asserted the principle that, "powers of influence not amounting to formal powers of command provide a sufficient basis for the imposition of command responsibility." This Trial Chamber concurs.[399]

No weight can be afforded to this statement of the ICTR Trial Chamber, as it is based o misstatement of what the Trial Chamber in Čelebići actually held. The quoted statement was not a conclusion of the Trial Chamber, nor its interpretation of the Hostage and High Command cases, but the ICTR Trial Chamber's interpretation of the decision of the Tokyo Tribunal in the Muto case.[400] The Trial Chamber in Čelebići ultimately regarded any "influence" principle which may have been established by Muto case as being outweighed by other authorities which suggested that a position of command in the sense of effective control was necessary.

266. The Appeals Chamber considers, therefore, that customary law has specified a standard of effective control, although it does not define precisely the means by which the control must be exercised. It is clear, however, that substantial influence as a means of control in any sense which falls short of the possession of effective control over subordinates, which requires the possession of material abilities to prevent subordinate offences or to punish subordinate offenders, lacks sufficient support in State practice and judicial decisions. Nothing relied on by the Prosecution indicates that there is sufficient evidence of State practice or judicial authority to support a theory that substantial influence as a means of exercising command responsibility has the standing of a rule of customary law, particularly a rule by which criminal liability would be imposed.

267. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber has applied the correct legal test in the case of Delali}. There is, therefore, no basis for any further application of that test to the Trial Chamber's findings, whether by the Appeals Chamber or by a reconstituted Trial Chamber.[401]

268. The Prosecution's argument dealt with here is limited to the submission that it was the Trial Chamber's alleged error of law in the legal test which led it to an erroneous conclusion that Delalić did not exercise superior authority. There was no independent allegation in the Prosecution Brief that the Trial Chamber made errors of fact in its factual findings which should be overturned by the Appeals Chamber, although certain submissions at the hearing of the appeal suggest that the Prosecution submits that, even under the standard of effective control (which was in fact applied by the Trial Chamber), the Trial Chamber should have found Delalić

[401] Prosecution Brief, para 3.33; Appeal Transcript pp 158 and 166.

to have exercised superior authority.[402] However, nothing raised by the Prosecution would support a finding by the Appeals Chamber that the Trial Chamber's findings, and its ultimate conclusion from those facts that Delalić did not exercise the requisite degree of control, was so unreasonable that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached them.[403]

(ii) Whether the Trial Chamber erred in excluding rebuttal or fresh evidence

269. As discussed above, the Prosecution submitted "in the alternative" that the Appeals Chamber should grant leave to the Prosecution to present "additional" evidence that was wrongly excluded by the Trial Chamber.[404] The nature of the "alternative" was described as follows:

> The issue is an issue of an error of law. The issue is whether or not the Trial Chamber applied the correct test for the admission of rebuttal or fresh evidence. If they applied the incorrect test and it's an error of law, then the Trial Chamber erred.[405]

270. As noted above, the Appeals Chamber deals with this argument as an independent allegation of an error of law on behalf of the Trial Chamber.

271. At the request of the Trial Chamber during the case of the last of the accused to present his defence, the Prosecution filed a notification of witnesses proposed to testify in rebuttal. It proposed to call four witnesses, one relating to the case against Landžo and the others relating to the case against Delalić, one of whom was a Prosecution investigator being called essentially to tender a number of documents "not previously available to the prosecution".[406] Oral submissions on the proposal were heard by the Trial Chamber on 24 July 1998,[407] and the Trial Chamber ruled that, with the exception of the witness relating to the case against Landžo, the proposed evidence was not rebuttal evidence, but fresh evidence, and that the Prosecution had not put forward anything which would support an application to admit fresh evidence.[408] This decision was reflected in a written Order which noted that "rebuttal evidence is limited to matters that arise directly and specifically out of defence evidence".[409]

272. The evidence which was not admitted by the Trial Chamber related to Delić, Mucić and Delalić, but the Prosecution submission that the exclusion constituted an error invalidating the decision is limited in application to the effect of this evidence on its case against Delalić. Its overall purpose was to show that Delali} had the requisite degree of control over the ^elebi}i camp. The three proposed witnesses, and the documents they sought to adduce, were as follows:

(i) Rajko Đorđic, Sr, to testify as to his release from the ^elebi}i camp pursuant to a release form signed by Delalić and dated 3 July 1992. It was proposed that the witness produce and authenticate the document. This was intended to rebut the evidence of defence witnesses that Delalić was authorised to sign release documents only in exceptional circumstances when the members of the Investigative Commission were not present in ^elebi}i.

(ii) Stephen Chambers, an investigator of the Office of the Prosecutor, to present "documentary evidence not previously available to the Prosecutor" which had been seized from the State Commission for the Search for the Missing in Sarajevo and from the home and work premises of an official of the State Commission for Gathering Facts on War Crimes in Konjić. This was said to rebut the testimony of witnesses that Delalić, as commander of Tactical Group 1, had no authority over the ^elebi}i camp.[410]

(iii) Professor Andrea Stegnar, a handwriting expert, to give expert testimony in relation to a number of the recently obtained documents alleged to bear the signature of the accused. This was not argued to have any independent rebuttal basis.[411]

[410] Notification, 4th and 5th unnumbered pages. It was put by the Prosecution on appeal that one item of documentary evidence would also more specifically rebut defence evidence as to the reliability of Prosecution Exhibit 214, a document signed by the President of the Konjic State Commission for the Exchange of War Prisoners which was described as "indicat[ing] that the overseeing and guarding of the prisoners had been taken over by the Tactical Group", as the new document in question was an authenticated copy of the document. See Prosecution Brief, para 3.81(2)(c) and fn 160.

[411] Notification, 6th unnumbered page. There were originally two categories of documents in relation to which the Prosecution sought Professor Stegnar's testimony. The Prosecution only appeals against the decision not to admit one of these categories (the new documents). Prosecution Brief, para 3.81(4) and fn 162.

273. The Trial Chamber characterised the nature of rebuttal evidence as "evidence to refute particular piece of evidence which has been adduced by the defence", with the result that it is "limited to matters that arise directly and specifically out of defence evidence."[412] This standard is essentially consistent with that used previously and subsequently by other Trial Chambers.[413] The Appeals Chamber agrees that this standard – that rebuttal evidence must relate to a significant issue arising directly out of defence evidence which could not reasonably have been anticipated – is correct. It is in this context that the Appeals Chamber understands the Trial Chamber's statement, made later in its Decision on Request to Reopen, that "evidence available to the Prosecution ab initio, the relevance of which does not arise ex improviso, and which remedies a defect in the case of the Prosecution, is generally not admissible."[414] Although the Appeals Chamber would not itself use that particular terminology, it sees, contrary to the Prosecution submission,[415] no error in that statement when read in context.

274. The Trial Chamber's particular reasons for rejecting the evidence as rebuttal evidence, as expressed in the oral hearing on 24 July, were, in relation to category (i), that the other evidence heard by the Trial Chamber was that Delalić had signed such documents only on behalf of the Investigating Commission and not in his own capacity. As the relevant release document also was acknowledged to state that Delalić was signing "for" the Commission,[416] the Trial Chamber queried how it could be considered to rebut what had already been put in evidence.[417] The Trial Chamber appeared to assess the document as having such low probative value in relation to the fundamental matter that the Prosecution was trying to prove – namely, Delalić's authority to release prisoners in his own capacity – that it could not be considered to rebut the defence evidence identified by the Prosecution. This assessment was reasonably op to the Trial Chamber.

275. In relation to category (ii), the Trial Chamber rejected the characterisation of the evidence as rebuttal evidence on the basis that it was better characterised as fresh evidence. While it may have been desirable for the Trial Chamber to state more specifically its view as to why the evidence did not refute a particular matters arising directly and specifically out of defence evidence, the Appeals Chamber agrees that it was open to regard the evidence as not being evidence in rebuttal. It is first noteworthy that the Prosecution, in applying to adduce the evidence, described it first as "fresh evidence, not previously available to the prosecution"[418] and gave only a fairly cursory description of how in its view the evidence rebutted defence evidence. It said that the evidence would rebut the evidence of witnesses "who all stated that Zejnil Delalić as Commander of Tactical Group 1 had no de facto authority, or any other authority whatsoever" over the ^elebi}i camp.[419] Thus the evidence was intended to establish that Delalić did in fact exercise such authority. As such, it went to a matter which was a fundamental part of the case the Prosecution was required to prove in relation to its counts under Article 7(3). Such evidence should be brought as part of the Prosecution case in chief and not in rebuttal. As the Trial Chamber correctly observed, where the evidence which "is itself evidence probative of the guilt of the accused, and where it is reasonably foreseeable by the Prosecution that some gap in the proof of guilt needs to be filled by the evidence called by it", it is inappropriate to admit it in rebuttal, and the Prosecution "cannot call additional evidence merely because its case has been met by certain evidence to contradict it." [420]

276. Where such evidence could not have been brought as part of the Prosecution case in chief because it was not in the hands of the Prosecution at the time, this does not render it admissible as rebuttal evidence. The fact that evidence is newly obtained, if that evidence does not meet the standard for admission of rebuttal evidence, will not render it admissible as rebuttal evidence. It merely puts it into the category of fresh evidence, to which a different basis of admissibility applies. This is essentially what the Trial Chamber found. There is therefore no merit in the Prosecution's submission that the evidence should have been admitted as "the reason for not adducing it during the Prosecution's case [was] not due to the failure to foresee the issues that may arise during the Defence case." [421] The issue as to whether the evidence should have been admitted as fresh evidence is considered below.

[420] Decision on Request to Reopen, para 23.

277. The admission of the testimony of the handwriting expert referred to in category (iii) essentially relied on the admission of the category (ii) evidence, so it need not be further considered.

278. Following the Trial Chamber's rejection of the evidence as rebuttal evidence, the Prosecution filed an alternative request to re-open the Prosecution case.[422] The Trial Chamber rejected this alternative orally,[423] issuing its written reasons on 19 August 1998.[424] The Prosecution filed applications under Rule 73 for leave to appeal the Order of 30 July and the Decision of 4 August, on 6 August and 17 August, respectively. A Bench of the Appeals Chamber denied leave to appeal in respect of both applications on the basis that it saw no issue that would cause such prejudice to the case of the Prosecution as could not be cured by the final disposal of the trial including post-judgement appeal, or which assumed general importance to the proceedings of the Tribunal or in international law generally, these being the two tests established by Rule 73(B) regarding the granting or withholding of leave to appeal.[425]

279. In its Decision on Request to Reopen the Trial Chamber, after considering the basis on which evidence could be admitted as rebuttal evidence, acknowledged the possibility that the Prosecution "may further be granted leave to re-open its case in order to present new evidence not previously available to it." It stated:

> Such fresh evidence is properly defined not merely as evidence that was not in fact in the possession of the Prosecution at the time of the conclusion of its case, but as evidence which by the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have been obtained by the Prosecution at that time. The burden of establishing that the evidence sought to be adduced is of this character rests squarely on the Prosecution.[426]

280. The Trial Chamber also identified the factors which it considered relevant to the exercise of its discretion to admit the fresh evidence. These were described as:

> (i) the "advanced stage of the trial"; i.e., the later in the trial that the application is made, the less likely the evidence will be admitted;

(ii) the delay likely to be caused by a re-opening of the Prosecution case, and the suitability of an adjournment in the overall context of the trial; and

(iii) the probative value of the evidence to be presented.[427]

281. Taking these considerations into account the Trial Chamber assessed both the evidence and the Prosecution's explanation for its late application to adduce it and concluded that the Prosecution had not discharged its burden of proving that the evidence could not have been found earlier with the exercise of reasonable diligence.[428] In addition, it found that the admission of the evidence would result in the undue protraction of the trial for up to three months, as the testimony of further witnesses to authenticate the relevant documents could be required as well as the evidence of any witnesses that the defence should be permitted to bring in response.[429] Finally, the Trial Chamber assessed the evidence to be of minimal probative value, consisting of "circumstantial evidence of doubtful validity", with the result that its exclusion would not cause the Prosecution injustice.[430] It concluded generally that "the justice of the case and the fair and expeditious conduct of the proceedings enjoins a rejection of the application."[431]

282. The Prosecution does not challenge the Trial Chamber's definition of fresh evidence as evidence which was not in the possession of the party at the time and which by the exercise of all reasonable diligence could not have been obtained by the relevant party at the conclusion of its case. Nor does it challenge the "general principle of admissibility" used by the Trial Chamber.[432]

283. The Appeals Chamber agrees that the primary consideration in determining an application for reopening a case to allow for the admission of fresh evidence is the question of whether, with reasonable diligence, the evidence could have been identified and presented in the case in chief of the party making the application. If it is shown that the evidence could not have been found with the exercise of reasonable diligence before the close of the case, the Trial Chamber should exercise its discretion as to whether to admit the evidence by reference to the probative value of the evidence and the fairness to the accused of admitting it late in the proceedings. These latter factors can be regarded as falling under the general discretion, reflected in Rule 89 (D) of the Rules, to exclude evidence where its probative value substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial. Although this second aspect of the question of admissibility was less clearly stated by the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber, for the reasons discussed below, considers that it applied the correct principles in this respect.

284. The Prosecution contends that although the Trial Chamber was correct in requiring proof of the exercise of reasonable diligence, it should have found that it had exercised such diligence.[433] The Trial Chamber took the view, having considered the reasons put forward by the Prosecution, that the Prosecution had not discharged its burden of demonstrating that even with reasonable diligence the proposed evidence could not have been previously obtained and presented as part of its case in chief. It implicitly expressed its opinion that the Prosecution had not pursued the relevant evidence vigorously until after the close of the Defence case.[434] The Prosecution submits that this finding was "factually incorrect" and represented "a misapprehension of the facts in relation to the efforts of the Prosecution to obtain this evidence", but does not more than reiterate the description of the efforts to obtain the evidence which it had already provided to the Trial Chamber.[435] It does not identify how, in its view, the Trial Chamber's conclusion on the facts were so unreasonable that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have reached it. It is not suggested that the Trial Chamber did not consider the Prosecution's explanation. No such suggestion could be made in light of the obvious demonstrations both in the hearing of the oral submissions on the issue[436] and the Decision on the Request to Reopen[437] that the Trial Chamber did consider the explanations the Prosecution was putting to it. In the Appeals Chamber's view, even making considerable allowances to the Prosecution in relation to the "complexities involved in obtaining the evidence",[438] it is apparent that there were failures to pursue diligently the investigations for which no adequate attempt to provide an explanation was made.

285. Two examples demonstrate this problem. A number of the documents which were sought to be admitted had been seized in June 1998 from the office and home of Jasminka Džumhur, a former official of the State Commission for Exchange in Konjić and the Army of Bosnia and Herzegovina 4th Corps Military Investigative Commission.[439] The material provided by the Prosecution in its Request to Reopen to explain its prior effort to obtain documents and information from Ms Džumhur includes the statement that:

> Between late 1996 and early 1997, the Prosecution contacted Jasminka Džumhur three times. She consistently refused to provide a statement, but on one occasion, briefly showed an investigator an untranslated document concerning the transfer of duties in Čelebići prison in November 1996, signed by Zdravko Mucić and Zejnil Delalić. She said she had other documents, but none of the documents were provided to the Prosecution.[440]

With this knowledge, obtained in November 1996, that Ms Džumhur held documents which they considered would be relevant to their case, the next step apparently taken by the Prosecution was four to five months later in mid-April 1997, when it made a formal request for assistance to the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina.[441] The Prosecution received a response on 23 July 1997, following a reminder in June 1997. On the material provided by the Prosecution, it was almost five months later that it took the next step of issuing a second request to the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which received a relatively rapid response in early January, by providing certain documents.[442] Given that the trial had opened in March 1997, it was open to the Trial Chamber to regard the lapse of these periods of time between the taking of active steps to pursue the documents during after the trial had actually commenced as an indication that reasonable diligence was not being exercised.

286. Secondly, in a case such as the present where the evidence is sought to be presented not only after the close of the case of the Prosecution but long after the close of the case of the relevant accused, it was necessary for the Prosecution to establish that the evidence could not have been obtained, even if after the close of its case, at an earlier stage in the trial. The application to have the new evidence admitted was made many months after the Prosecution gained actual knowledge of the location at which the relevant documents were likely to be held. The information provided by the Prosecution, in its "Alternative Request to Reopen the Prosecution's Case", indicated that the Prosecution gained possession of certain documents from the State Commission for the Search for the Missing on 27 March 1998, which indicated that the relevant documents were in the possession of Jasminka Džumhur. It was not until 5 May 1998 that the Prosecution took any further step in trying to obtain the documents, when it "informed the authorities that various requests concerning the contacting of officials and former officials of Konjić Municipality, including Jasminka Džumhur remained outstanding". An application for a search warrant was made to a Judge of the Tribunal on 10 June 1998, after [440] Request to Reopen, para 27.

Delalić's defence case had closed. Even making allowances for the complexities of such investigations, allowing a period of over five weeks to elapse between becoming aware of the location of the documents and taking any further active step to obtain them, in light of the advanced state of the defence case, cannot be considered to be the exercise of reasonable diligence. If the Prosecution was in fact taking steps to obtain the information at that time, it did not disclose them to the Trial Chamber and cannot now complain at the assessment that it did not exercise "reasonable diligence" in obtaining and presenting the evidence earlier. Given that the burden of proving that reasonable diligence was exercised in obtaining the evidence lies on the Prosecution, it was open to the Trial Chamber to decide on the information provided to it by the Prosecution that it has not discharged that burden.

287. The Prosecution further submits that the Trial Chamber erred in the exercise of its discretion in certain of the matters it took into account. As the Trial Chamber's finding that reasonable diligence had not been exercised was a sufficient basis on which to dispose of the application, it is not strictly necessary to determine this issue, but as the Trial Chamber expressed its views on this aspect of the application, the Appeals Chamber will consider it here. The Prosecution argues that relevant and probative evidence is only excluded when its admission is substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial, and cites the provisions of certain national systems in support of this. In relation to these provisions which the Prosecution has selectively drawn from only three national jurisdictions, it can be observed that even if they were to be accepted as a guide to the principles applicable to this issue in the Tribunal, two of them simply confer a discretion on the Trial Chamber exceptionally to admit new evidence. The provision cited from the Costa Rican Code of Criminal Procedure states that:

> Exceptionally, the court may order [...] that new evidence be introduced if, during the trial proceedings new facts or circumstances have arisen that need to be established.[443]

The provision relied on from the German Code provides for the admission of new evidence "if this is absolutely necessary".[444]

288. The Trial Chamber stated the principle as being that:

[442] Request to Reopen, para 29-31.
[443] Code of Criminal Procedure, Costa Rica, Article 355, unofficial Prosecution translation, Prosecution Brief, para 3.88.

> While it is axiomatic that all evidence must fulfil the requirements of admissibility, for the Trial Chamber to grant the Prosecution permission to reopen its case, the probative value of the proposed evidence must be such that it outweighs any prejudice caused to the accused. Great caution must be exercised by the Trial Chamber lest injustice be done to the accused, and it is therefore only in exceptional circumstances where the justice of the case so demands that the Trial Chamber will exercise its discretion to allow the Prosecution to adduce new evidence after the parties to a criminal trial have closed their case.[445]

The Prosecution argues that the statement of the Trial Chamber that "the probative value of the proposed evidence must be such that it outweighs any prejudice caused to the accused" incorrectly states the applicable principle, which is that stated in Rule 89(D), namely that the need to ensure a fair trial substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence.[446] The reference by the Trial Chamber to the potential "prejudice caused to the accused" was not, in the view of the Appeals Chamber, the appropriate one in the context. However it is apparent from a reading of the rest of the Decision on Request to Reopen that the Trial Chamber, in referring to prejudice to the accused was turning its mind to matters which may affect the fairness of the accused's trial. This is apparent both from the reference, in the passage cited above, to the need to avoid "injustice to the accused" and the concluding statement in the decision:

> In our view, the justice of the case and the fair and expeditious conduct of the proceedings enjoins a rejection of the application.[447]

289. The Prosecution also argues that the Trial Chamber erred in its assessment of the probative value of the evidence. It contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the evidence was inferential and equivocal.[448] The Prosecution relies on a statement by the Trial Chamber that the documents "cannot be probative".[449] Although this was perhaps unfortunate terminology, it is apparent from the Trial Chamber's decision that after considering the evidence it was of the view not that it could not be probative but that the documents "contain circumstantial evidence of doubtful validity".[450] This was an assessment not that the documents were incapable, as a matter of law, of having probative value, but that, having regard to their contents which did not disclose direct evidence of the matters in dispute but, at best, gave rise to "mere inferences",[451] the documents had a low probative value. This assessment, and more specifically the exercise of balancing the particular degree of probative value disclosed by the documents against the unfairness which would result if the evidence were admitted, is a matter for the Trial Chamber which will not be interfered with on appeal in the absence of convincing demonstration of error. No such demonstration has been made.

290. The Prosecution also specifically challenged the Trial Chamber's conclusion that the trial had reached such a stage that the evidence should not be admitted.[452] The stage in the trial at which the evidence is sought to be adduced and the potential delay that will be caused to the trial are matters highly relevant to the fairness to the accused of admission of fresh evidence. This consideration extends not only to Delalić as the accused against whom the evidence was sought to be admitted, but also the three co-accused whose trial would be equally delayed for reasons unrelated to themselves. The Appeals Chamber does not understand the Trial Chamber to have taken the stage of the trial into account in any sense other than its impact on the fairness of the trial of the accused, and, in the circumstances, the Appeals Chamber regards the Trial Chamber as having been fully justified in taking the very late stage of the trial into account. The Prosecution sought to have this evidence admitted not only after the close of its own case, but well after the close of the defence case of Delalić and only very shortly before the close of the case of the last accused. The Prosecution contends that "none of the accused objected to the potential presentation of the evidence of Mr Chambers."[453] This assertion is clearly incorrect. At the hearing of oral submissions on whether the evidence could be admitted as rebuttal or fresh evidence, counsel for Delalić stated:

> His Honour Karibi-Whyte has said what I was thinking and that is that we're in the second year of this trial, and, perhaps, the third or fourth year of investigations concerning these matters. And the Prosecution, despite what they say, despite what reasons they may offer, I think is a matter of law. It's unfair at this point to produce documents in June, 1998.[454]

The defence for Delalić also expressed its opposition to the presentation of the fresh evidence in its written response to the request to reopen.[455]

291. The Prosecution also argued that the Trial Chamber was wrong in its finding that the admission of the evidence would cause three months' delay:

[455] Response of the Defendant Delalić Opposing the Prosecution's Alternative Request to Open the Prosecution's Case, 31 July 1998, pp 1; 10, 11. At p 10 the response states: "the Trial Chamber should consider whether it is in the interests of justice to permit the Prosecution to adduce the evidence at this late stage and whether to allow it would breach the Defendant's right to a fair trial as set out in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute."

> The Prosecutor calculated that the three remaining proposed witnesses would take, on direct examination, less than four hours. It is respectfully submitted that the Trial Chamber's estimation that this would likely postpone the trial for three months is not borne out, given that there were only three witnesses and approximately 22 documents, some only supporting documents for the search warrant.[456]

This submission is disingenuous. The time which the Trial Chamber needed to take into account in determining the effect on the accused was not limited to the time which it may take to examine the three witnesses. The Trial Chamber found that, given the nature of the documents, it was likely that the testimony of further witnesses would be required to authenticate the relevant documents. It would also be necessary to allow for the defence to call appropriate witnesses in response.[457] Further, as noted by the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution had stated in its Request to Reopen, after acknowledging that the defence may need to call witnesses:

> In addition, the Prosecution would seek leave to call witnesses to rebut the testimony of those brought by the Defence.[458]

292. In light of these considerations, it was open to the Trial Chamber – which, having presided over the trial which had already taken over eighteen months, was well-placed to assess the time required taking into account practical considerations such as temporary witness unavailability – to conclude that the likely delay would be up to three months. In light of this finding, it is apparent that the Trial Chamber considered that the admission of the evidence would create a sufficiently adverse effect on the fairness of the trial of all of the accused, that it outweighed the limited probative value of the evidence. As a secondary matter, it is also apparent that the Trial Chamber was concerned to fulfil its obligation under Article 20 of the Statute to ensure the trial was expeditious.[459] In light of these considerations, the decision not to exercise its discretion to grant the application was open to the Trial Chamber.

293. For the above reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber committed any error in the exercise of its discretion. This aspect of this ground of appeal relating to the exclusion of evidence by the Trial Chamber is therefore also dismissed, and with it this ground of appeal in its entirety.

3. Deli}'s Acquittal under Article 7(3)

294. The Prosecution's fifth ground of appeal alleges that the Trial Chamber "erred when it decided ... that Hazim Deli} was not a 'superior' in the ^elebi}i Prison Camp for the purposes of ascribing criminal responsibility to him under Article 7(3) of the Statute."[460] The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber applied the wrong legal test when it held that "the perpetrator of the underlying offence must be the subordinate of the person of higher rank" and that "a subordinate unit of the superior or commander is a sine qua non for superior responsibility."[461] The Prosecution also submits, apparently in the alternative, that, even if the test formulated by the Trial Chamber for determining who is a superior for the purposes of Article 7(3) was correct, it misapplied the test in this case.[462] The Prosecution refers to the Trial Chamber's findings, including its finding that Deli} was the "deputy commander" of the camp,[463] to say that he should have been found to be a superior. Because, it is said, the Trial Chamber's findings also establish that he was aware of the offences of subordinates,[464] and that he failed to prevent or punish them, the Appeals Chamber should find Deli} guilty under Article 7(3) on counts 13, 14, 33, 34, 38, 39, 44, 45, 46 and 47.[465]

295. In support of this ground, the Prosecution reiterates its theory that command responsibility entails a superior-subordinate relationship in which the superior effectively controls the subordinate, in the sense that the superior possesses the material ability to prevent or punish the offences and that "[s]uch control can be manifest in powers of influence which permit the superior to intervene".[466] It also argues that the Trial Chamber erred in requiring Deli} to be part of the chain of command, as the correct test is whether he has sufficient control, influence, or authority to prevent or punish.[467] If, as the Trial Chamber found, de facto control is sufficient in this context, it should assess in each case whether an accused has de facto powers or control to prevent or punish.[468]

296. Deli} responds that among the elements required for finding a person liable under the doctrine of command responsibility are the requirement of "a hierarchy in which superiors are authorized to control their subordinates to a degree that the superior is responsible for the actions of his subordinates" and that the superior must be "vested with authority to control his subordinates."[469] In the military, the chain of command is a hierarchy of commanders, with deputy commanders being outside this chain of command.[470]

297. Turning to the Trial Chamber's findings on the question of Delić's liability under Article 7(3), it clearly found that Delić held the position of "deputy commander" of the ^elebi}i camp.[471] However, it also found that this was "not dispositive of Deli}'s status" as the real issue before the Trial Chamber was:

> [w]hether the accused had the power to issue orders to subordinates and to prevent or punish the criminal acts of his subordinates, thus placing him within the chain of command. In order to do so the Trial Chamber must look to the actual authority of Hazim Delić as evidenced by his acts in the Čelebići prison camp.[472]

298. The Chamber proceeded to consider evidence of the degree of actual authority wielded by Deli} in the camp, and concluded that:

> [...] this evidence is indicative of a degree of influence Hazim Deli} had in the ^elebi}i prison-camp on some occasions, in the criminal mistreatment of detainees. However, this influence could be attributable to the guards' fear of an intimidating and morally delinquent individual who was the instigator of and a participant in the mistreatment of detainees, and is not, on the facts before the Trial Chamber, of itself indicative of the superior authority of Deli} sufficient to attribute superior responsibility to him.[473]

Having examined more evidence, it further found:

> This evidence indicates that Hazim Deli} was tasked with assisting Zradvko Muci} by organising and arranging for the daily activities in the ^elebi}i prison-camp. However, it cannot be said to indicate that he had actual command authority in the sense that he could issue orders and punish and prevent the criminal acts of subordinates.[474]

299. The Trial Chamber therefore concluded that, despite Delić's position of deputy commander of the camp, he did not exercise actual authority in the sense of having powers to prevent or punish and therefore was not a superior or commander of the perpetrators of the relevant offences in the sense required by Article 7(3).

300. The Appeals Chamber has already rejected, in its discussion of the Prosecution's second ground of appeal, the Prosecution argument that "substantial influence" is a sufficient measure of "control" for the imposition of liability under Article 7(3). It need only therefore confirm that the Trial Chamber's finding that Delić had powers of influence was not of itself a sufficient basis on which to find him a superior if it was not established beyond reasonable doubt by the evidence that he actually had the ability to exercise effective control over the relevant perpetrators.

301. The remaining issue as to the applicable law raised by the Prosecution in relation to this ground which has not previously been considered is its contention that the Trial Chamber erred because it required Delić to be part of the chain of command and, more generally, it required the perpetrators of the underlying offences to be his "subordinates" before liability under Article 7(3) could be imposed.

302. It is beyond question that the Trial Chamber considered Article 7(3) to impose a requirement that there be a superior with a corresponding subordinate.[475] The Prosecution itself submits that one of the three requirements under Article 7(3) is that of a superior-subordinate relationship. There is therefore a certain difficulty in comprehending the Prosecution submission that the Trial Chamber erred in law in requiring the perpetrator of the underlying offence to be a subordinate of the person of higher rank.[476] The Trial Chamber clearly did understand the relationship of subordination to encompass indirect and informal relationships, as is apparent from its acceptance of the concepts of civilian superiors and de facto authority, to which the Appeals Chamber has referred in its discussion of the issue in relation to the Prosecution's second ground of appeal.

303. The Appeals Chamber understands the necessity to prove that the perpetrator was the "subordinate" of the accused, not to import a requirement of direct or formal subordination but to mean that the relevant accused is, by virtue of his or her position, senior in some sort of formal or informal hierarchy to the perpetrator. The ability to exercise effective control in the sense of a material power to prevent or punish, which the Appeals Chamber considers to be a minimum requirement for the recognition of the superior-subordinate relationship, will almost invariably not be satisfied unless such a relationship of subordination exists. However, it is possible to imagine scenarios in which one of two persons of equal status or rank – such as two soldiers or two civilian prison guards – could in fact exercise "effective control" over the other at least in the sense of a purely practical ability to prevent the conduct of the other by, for example, force of personality or physical strength. The Appeals Chamber does not consider the doctrine of command responsibility – which developed with an emphasis on persons who, by virtue of the position which they occupy, have authority over others – as having been intended to impose criminal liability on persons for the acts of other persons of completely equal status.[477]

[475] Trial Judgement, paras 646-647.

304. The Appeals Chamber acknowledges that the Trial Chamber's references to the absence of evidence that Delić "lay within" or was "part of" the chain of command[478] may, if taken in isolation, be open to the interpretation that the Trial Chamber believed Article 7(3) to require the accused to have a formal position in a formal hierarchy which directly links him to a subordinate who also holds a formal position within that hierarchy. Given that it has been accepted that the law relating to command responsibility recognises not only civilian superiors, who may not be in any such formal chain of command, and de facto authority, for which no formal appointment is required, the law does not allow for such an interpretation. However, when read in the context of the rest of the Trial Chamber's Judgement, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber was not in fact imposing the requirement of such a formalised position in a formal chain of command, as opposed to requiring that there be proof that Delić was a superior in the sense of having the material ability to prevent or punish the acts of persons subordinate to him. This is apparent from, for example, the Trial Chamber's references to the sufficiency of indirect control (where it amounts to effective control)[479] and its acceptance of de facto authority,[480] to which reference has already been made by the Appeals Chamber in the context of the Prosecution's second ground of appeal.

305. However, the Prosecution has also submitted that, "even on the Trial Chamber's test for the superior-subordinate relationship, Delić should have been convicted as the Trial Chamber misapplied this test to its own findings of fact".[481] The Prosecution, based on its understanding that the Trial Chamber required proof that Delić was exercising authority within a formal chain of command, contends that the facts found by the Trial Chamber establish this. As indicated above, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber essentially applied the correct test – whether Delić exercised effective control in having the material ability to prevent or punish crimes committed by subordinates – and did not require him to have a formalised position in a direct chain of command over the subordinates. However, the Appeals Chamber will consider the Trial Chamber findings which are relied on by the Prosecution to determine whether those findings must have compelled a conclusion that either standard was satisfied. As this aspect of the appeal involves an allegation that the Trial Chamber erred in its findings of fact, the Prosecution must establish that the conclusion reached by the Trial Chamber (that Delić did not exercise superior authority) was one which no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached.[482] In order to succeed on its submission that the Appeals Chamber should substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber – that is, that Delić did in fact exercise command responsibility and enter convictions accordingly – it is necessary for the Prosecution to establish that this finding is the only reasonable finding available on the evidence.[483] This standard was acknowledged by the Prosecution.[484]

[477] In any event, concepts of accessory criminal liability such as aiding and abetting will potentially apply to persons of moral or personal authority who, by failing to act in such scenarios, have the effect in the circumstances of encouraging the commission of offences. See Furundžija Trial Judgement at para 209; Aleksovski Judgement, para 62.

306. The Prosecution first relies on the Trial Chamber's finding that Delić was deputy commander of the camp.[485] The Appeals Chamber accepts the Trial Chamber's view that this title or position is not dispositive of the issue and that it is necessary to look to whether there was evidence of actual authority or control exercised by Delić. For the same reason, the fact that the detainees regarded him as the deputy commander, and as a person with influence over the guards,[486] is not conclusive evidence of his actual authority.

307. The Prosecution identifies four other findings of the Trial Chamber which it says demonstrate such actual control.[487] The Appeals Chamber considers them in turn.

308. The Trial Chamber referred to testimony of four witnesses to the effect that the guards feared Delić and that he occasionally criticised them severely.[488] This evidence appeared to be accepted by the Trial Chamber, but it was interpreted by the Trial Chamber as showing a "degree of influence" which could be "attributable to the guards' fear of an intimidating and morally delinquent individual" rather than as unambiguous evidence of superior authority.[488] The Appeals Chamber considers that this interpretation of this piece of evidence was open to the Trial Chamber, who, it must be remembered, heard the witnesses and the totality of the evidence itself. There was certainly nothing submitted by the Prosecution which would demonstrate that this conclusion was so unreasonable that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached it.

309. The Prosecution also referred to evidence that Delić had ordered the beating of detainees on certain occasions.[490] As the Prosecution itself acknowledges, the Trial Chamber did not find beyond reasonable doubt that Delić did in fact order guards to conduct the series of beatings which was the subject of the evidence referred to in paragraph 804 of the Trial Judgement. The Trial Chamber referred to the evidence of certain witnesses and concluded that the evidence "suggests that Mr Delić conducted a vindictive beating of the people from Bradina on one particular day and then told at least one other guard, Mr Landžo to continue this beating. However, it is not proven that the beatings that followed from that day or [sic] were 'ordered' by Mr Delić".[491] In relation to the second occasion referred to in paragraph 805 of the Judgement, the Trial Chamber only referred to the Prosecution allegation of Delić ordering a beating and stated:

> Witness F and Mirko Đorđić testified to this incident and indicated that Delić "ordered" or was "commanding" the guards in this collective beating.

The Trial Chamber did not state whether it accepted this evidence, and it made no finding as to whether Delić actually ordered the beating or not. Despite the Prosecution's apparent suggestion that it is enough that "the Trial Chamber made no finding that this evidence was unreliable",[492] this is not a sufficient basis for the Appeals Chamber to take it as a finding by the Trial Chamber that the ordering of the beating was proved beyond reasonable doubt. The Appeals Chamber therefore cannot identify from the matters referred to by the Prosecution any unambiguous findings that it was proven beyond reasonable doubt that Delić ordered guards to mistreat detainees.

310. The Prosecution also refers to the finding that Delić "was tasked with assisting Zdravko Mucić by organising and arranging for the daily activities in the camp."[493] A finding as to such a responsibility for organising and arranging activities in the camp, while potentially demonstrating that Delić had some seniority within the camp, actually provides no information at all as to whether he had authority or effective control over the guards within the camp who were the perpetrators of the offences for which it is sought to make Delić responsible. The Appeals Chamber therefore agrees with the Trial Chamber that it was open to regard this evidence as inconclusive.

311. Finally, the Prosecution refers to evidence given by Delić's co-accused Landžo that he "carried out all of [Delić's] orders out of fear and also because I believed I had to carry [sic] execute them".[494] While the Trial Chamber certainly considered this evidence, it did not accept it, as it found that Landžo was not a credible witness and that his evidence could not be relied on unless supported by other evidence.[495] It did not identify any other evidence which it regarded as constituting such support.

312. There were therefore a number of problems with the relevance of the findings or the quality of the underlying evidence relied on by the Prosecution. The weakness of such evidence as the foundation of any finding beyond reasonable doubt that Delić exercised superior authority was recognised by the Trial Chamber, which concluded that all this evidence was "indicative of a degree of influence Hazim Deli} had in the ^elebi}i prison-camp on some occasions, in the criminal mistreatment of detainees", but that it "is not, on the facts before this Trial Chamber, of itself indicative of the superior authority of Deli} sufficient to attribute superior responsibility to him".[496] The Appeals Chamber does not see anything in this conclusion which suggests it is unreasonable, and certainly not that it is so unreasonable that no reasonable tribunal of fact could reach it.

313. Although this conclusion effectively disposes of this ground of appeal, it is necessary to make an observation in relation to one final issue. The Prosecution submitted that, should it be accepted that the Trial Chamber should have found that Delić did in fact exercise superior authority over the guards in the camp, it would then be possible to reverse his acquittals on the basis of the findings in the Trial Judgement. In particular, it submits that it is established that Delić knew or had reason to know on the following basis:

> It cannot seriously be disputed that Delić knew of the crimes being committed in the camp generally. The Trial Chamber said that "The crimes committed in the Čelebići prison-camp were so frequent and notorious that there is no way that Mr Mucić could not have known or heard about them." There is also no way that Delić could not have known about them, given that he was himself convicted for directly participating in them, and was involved in the operation of the camp on a daily basis.[497]

It must first be observed that, contrary to this submission, there was no finding that Delić directly participated in all of the crimes for which he is sought to be made responsible. Secondly, it cannot be accepted that a finding by the Trial Chamber that a co-accused who was commander of the camp must have known of the crimes committed in the camp can be taken, by some kind of imputation, as a finding beyond reasonable doubt that Delić knew or had reason to know of the crimes for which the Prosecution seeks to have convictions entered. The Trial Judgement contains no findings as to Delić's state of knowledge in relation to many of the crimes for which the Prosecution seek a reversal of the acquittal. It is undisputed that command responsibility does not impose strict liability on a superior for the offences of subordinates. Thus, had the Appeals Chamber accepted that the only reasonable conclusion on the evidence was that Delić was a superior, the question of whether he knew or had reason to know of the relevant offences would have remained unresolved, and it would in theory have been necessary to remit the matter to a Trial Chamber for consideration.

314. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this ground of appeal.

V. UNLAWFUL CONFINEMENT OF CIVILIANS

A. Introduction

315. Count 48 of the Indictment charged Muci}, Deli} and Delali} with individual participation in, and superior responsibility for, the unlawful confinement of numerous civilians in the ^elebi}i camp. The offence of unlawful confinement of civilians is punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions. Count 48 provided:

> Between May and October 1992, Zejnil DELALIĆ, Zdravko MUCIĆ, and Hazim DELIĆ participated in the unlawful confinement of numerous civilians at Čelebići camp. Zejnil DELALIĆ, Zdravko MUCIĆ, and Hazim DELIĆ also knew or had reason to know that persons in positions of subordinate authority to them were about to commit those acts resulting in the unlawful confinement of civilians, or had already committed those acts, and failed either to take the necessary and reasonable steps to prevent those acts or to punish the perpetrators after the acts had been committed. By their acts and omissions, Zejnil DELALIĆ, Zdravko MUCIĆ, and Hazim DELIĆ are responsible for:
> Count 48. A Grave Breach punishable under Article 2(g) (unlawful confinement of civilians) of the Statute of the Tribunal.

316. The Trial Chamber found Muci} guilty of unlawful confinement of civilians as charged in count 48 under both Articles 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute. It found Delali} and Deli} not guilty under this count. The Prosecution appeals against these acquittals. The Prosecution contends in its third ground of appeal that:

> The Trial Chamber erred when it decided in paragraphs 1124-1144 that Zejnil Delalić was not guilty of the unlawful confinement of civilians as charged in count 48 of the Indictment.[498]

The Prosecution's sixth ground of appeal is that:

> The Trial Chamber erred when it decided in paragraphs 1125-1144 that Hazim Delić was not guilty of the unlawful confinement of civilians as charged in count 48 of the Indictment.[499]

317. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber applied the wrong legal principle to determine the responsibility of Delalić and Delić for the unlawful confinement of the civilians in the ^elebi}i camp. In the case of Delalić, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber also failed to apply correctly the law relating to aiding and abetting.

318. Mucić appeals against his conviction. He contends in his twelfth ground of appeal that:

[498] Prosecution Brief, p 68.
[499] Prosecution Brief, p 117.

> The Trial Chamber erred in fact and law in finding that the detainees, or any of them, within the ^elebići camp were unlawfully detained [...][500]

Mucić also challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that he had the requisite mens rea for the offence and that any acts or omissions by him were sufficient to constitute the actus reus for the offence.[501]

319. These grounds of appeal, although dealing with different matters, touch on a number of issues which are common to each ground. It is convenient to discuss two of these common legal issues before turning to the specific issues raised discretely by each ground of appeal:

(i) the legal standard for determining what constitutes the unlawful confinement of civilians; and
(ii) whether the Trial Chamber was correct in its conclusion that some of the civilians in the Čelebići camp were unlawfully detained.

(i) The unlawful confinement of civilians

320. The offence of unlawful confinement of a civilian, a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions which is recognised under Article 2(g) of the Statute of the Tribunal, is not further defined in the Statute. As found by the Trial Chamber, however, clear guidance can be found in the provisions of Geneva Convention IV. The Trial Chamber found that the confinement of civilians during armed conflict may be permissible in limited cases, but will be unlawful if the detaining party does not comply with the provisions of Article 42 of Geneva Convention IV, which states:

> The internment or placing in assigned residence of protected persons may be ordered only if the security of the Detaining Power makes it absolutely necessary.
> If any person, acting through the representatives of the Protecting Power, voluntarily demands internment, and if his situation renders this step necessary, he shall be interned by the Power in whose hands he may be.

Thus the involuntary confinement of a civilian where the security of the Detaining Power does not make this absolutely necessary will be unlawful. Further, an initially lawful internment clearly becomes unlawful if the detaining party does not respect the basic procedural rights of

In the document Appellant Zdravko Mucić's Final Designation of his Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000, this ground of appeal was omitted but it was confirmed by counsel at the appeal hearing that this omission was unintentional and that the ground of appeal was being maintained. the detained persons and does not establish an appropriate court or administrative board prescribed in Article 43 of Geneva Convention IV.[502] That article provides:

> Any protected person who has been interned or placed in assigned residence shall be entitled to have such action reconsidered as soon as possible by an appropriate court or administrative board designated by the Detaining Power for that purpose. If the internment or placing in assigned residence is maintained, the court or administrative board shall periodically, and at least twice yearly, give consideration to his or her case, with a view to the favourable amendment of the initial decision, if circumstances permit.
> Unless the protected persons concerned object, the Detaining Power shall, as rapidly as possible, give the Protecting Power the names of any protected persons who have been interned or subjected to assigned residence, or have been released from internment or assigned residence. The decisions of the courts or boards mentioned in the first paragraph of the present Article shall also, subject to the same conditions, be notified as rapidly as possible to the Protecting Power.

321. In its consideration of the law relating to the offence of unlawful confinement, the Trial Chamber also referred to Article 5 of Geneva Convention IV, which imposes certain restrictions on the protections which may be enjoyed by certain individuals under the Convention.[503] It provides, in relevant part:

> Where, in the territory of a Party to the conflict, the latter is satisfied that an individual protected person is definitely suspected of or engaged in activities hostile to the security of the State, such individual person shall not be entitled to claim such rights and privileges under the present Convention as would, if exercised in the favour of such individual person, be prejudicial to the security of such State.
> In each case, such persons shall nevertheless be treated with humanity, and, in case of trial, shall not be deprived of the rights of fair and regular trial prescribed by the present Convention. They shall also be granted the full rights and privileges of a protected person under the present Convention at the earliest date consistent with the security of the State or Occupying Power, as the case may be.[504]

This provision reinforces the principle behind Article 42, that restrictions on the rights of civilian protected persons, such as deprivation of their liberty by confinement, are permissible only where there are reasonable grounds to believe that the security of the State is at risk.

322. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber that the exceptional measure of confinement of a civilian will be lawful only in the conditions prescribed by Article 42, and where the provisions of Article 43 are complied with.[505] Thus the detention or confinemen civilians will be unlawful in the following two circumstances:

(i) when a civilian or civilians have been detained in contravention of Article 42 of Geneva Convention IV, ie they are detained without reasonable grounds to believe that the security of the Detaining Power makes it absolutely necessary; and

(ii) where the procedural safeguards required by Article 43 of Geneva Convention IV are not complied with in respect of detained civilians, even where their initial detention may have been justified.

(ii) Was the confinement of the Čelebići camp detainees unlawful?

323. As stated above, the Trial Chamber found that the persons detained in the Čelebići camp were civilian protected persons for the purposes of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.[506] The Trial Chamber accepted evidence that indicated that a number of the civilians in the camp were in possession of weapons at the time of their capture, but refrained from making any finding as to whether the detaining power could legitimately have formed the view that the detention of this category of persons was necessary for the security of that power.[507] However, the Trial Chamber also found that the confinement of a significant number of civilians in the camp could not be justified by any means. Even taking into account the measure of discretion which should be afforded to the detaining power in assessing what may be detrimental to its own security, several of the detained civilians could not reasonably have been considered to pose any sufficiently serious danger as to warrant their detention.[508] The Trial Chamber specifically accepted the evidence of a number of witnesses who had testified that they had not participated in any military activity or even been politically active, including a 42-year old mother of two children.[509] It concluded that at least this category of people were detained in the camp although there existed no serious and legitimate reason to conclude that they seriously [505] This does not preclude the existence of other circumstances which may render confinement of a civilian unlawful, but that question does not now arise for determination by the Appeals Chamber.

prejudiced the security of the detaining party, which indicated that the detention was a collec' measure aimed at a specific group of persons, based mainly on their ethnic background.[510]

324. Mucić argues in relation to his ground of appeal,[511] and Delić and Delalić argue in response to the Prosecution's ground of appeal, that the Prosecution failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the persons confined in the Čelebići camp were unlawfully detained. They reiterate their submission that the detainees were not in fact protected persons, a submission which the Appeals Chamber is rejecting in relation to the ground of appeal based on that argument.[512]

325. The Prosecution responds that the findings of the Trial Chamber that the victims were unlawfully detained must stand unless the accused show that those findings were unreasonable in the sense that no reasonable person could have reached them.[513]

326. Delali} contends that since "the Trial Chamber, in determining that they [the civilians] were protected persons, found that they were not loyal to [...] Bosnia and Herzegovina, then they are virtually ipso facto security risks to the Government in that they are supporting the rebel forces".[514] He explains the detention of persons who may not have borne arms on the basis that "if not engaged in actual fighting, then they are certainly in a position to provide food, clothing, shelter and information to those who are".[515]

327. In the Appeals Chamber's view, there is no necessary inconsistency between the Trial Chamber's finding that the Bosnian Serbs were regarded by the Bosnian authorities as belonging to the opposing party in an armed conflict[516] and the finding that some of them could not reasonably be regarded as presenting a threat to the detaining power's security. To hold the contrary would suggest that, whenever the armed forces of a State are engaged in armed conflict, the entire civilian population of that State is necessarily a threat to security and therefore may be detained. It is perfectly clear from the provisions of Geneva Convention IV referred to above that there is no such blanket power to detain the entire civilian population party to the conflict in such circumstances, but that there must be an assessment that each civilian taken into detention poses a particular risk to the security of the State. This is reflected in the ICRC Commentary to Article 42 of Geneva Convention IV:

> [...] the mere fact that a person is a subject of an enemy Power cannot be considered as threatening the security of the country where he is living; it is not therefore a valid reason for interning him or placing him in assigned residence.[517]

Thus the Appeals Chamber agrees with the conclusion reached by the Trial Chamber that "the mere fact that a person is a national of, or aligned with, an enemy party cannot be considered as threatening the security of the opposing party where he is living, and is not, therefore, a valid reason for interning him."[518]

328. It was contended by Deli} that detention in the present case was justified under international law because "[t]he government is clearly entitled to some reasonable time to determine which of the detainees is a danger to the State's security".[519] Although the Appeals Chamber accepts this proposition, it does not share the view apparently taken by Delić as to what is a "reasonable time" for this purpose. The reasonableness of this period is not a matter solely to be assessed by the detaining power. The Appeals Chamber recalls that Article 43 of Geneva Convention IV provides that the decision to take measures of detention against civilians must be "reconsidered as soon as possible by an appropriate court or administrative board."[520] Read in this light, the reasonable time which is to be afforded to a detaining power to ascertain whether detained civilians pose a security risk must be the minimum time necessary to make enquiries to determine whether a view that they pose a security risk has any objective foundation such that it would found a "definite suspicion" of the nature referred to in Article 5 of Geneva Convention IV. Although the Trial Chamber made no express finding upon this issue, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable finding upon the evidence is that the civilians detained in the Čelebići camp had been detained for longer than such a minimum time.

329. The Trial Chamber found that a Military Investigative Commission for the crimes allegedly committed by the persons confined in the Čelebići camp was established,[521] but that this Commission did not meet the requirements of Article 43 of Geneva Convention IV as it not have the necessary power to decide finally on the release of prisoners whose detention could not be considered as justified for any serious reason.[522] There is therefore nothing in the activities of the Commission which could justify the continued detention of detainees in respect of whom there was no reason to categorise as a security risk. Indeed, it appears to have recommended the release of several of the Čelebići camp detainees, albeit without result.[523] Delić submits that "the government had the right to continue the confinement until it determined that the State's security would not be harmed by release of the detainees."[524] This submission, which carries the implication that civilian detainees may be considered a risk to security which makes their detention absolutely necessary until proved otherwise, completely reverses the onus of justifying detention of civilians. It is upon the detaining power to establish that the particular civilian does pose such a risk to its security that he must be detained, and the obligation lies on it to release the civilian if there is inadequate foundation for such a view.

330. The Trial Chamber, as the trier of facts, is in the best position to assess and weigh the evidence before it, and the Appeals Chamber gives a margin of deference to a Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence and findings of facts.[525] Nothing put to the Appeals Chamber indicates that there is anything unreasonable in the relevant sense in the Trial Chamber's findings as to the unlawful nature of the confinement of a number of civilians in the Čelebići camp. As observed in the ICRC Commentary, the measure of confinement of civilians is an "exceptionally severe" measure, and it is for that reason that the threshold for its imposition is high – it must, on the express terms of Article 42, be "absolutely necessary".[526] It was open to the Trial Chamber to accept the evidence of a number of witnesses that they had not borne arms, nor been active in political or any other activity which would give rise to a legitimate concern that they posed a security risk. The Appeals Chamber is also not satisfied that the Trial Chamber erred in its conclusion that, even if it were to accept that the initial confinement of the individuals detained in the Čelebići prison-camp was lawful, the continuing confinement of these civilians was in violation of international humanitarian law, as the detainees were not granted the procedural rights required by article 43 of Geneva Convention IV.

B. The Prosecution appeals

331. As stated above, the Prosecution claims that the Trial Chamber erred in acquitting Delalić of both direct responsibility under Article 7(1) and superior responsibility under Article 7(3) for the offence of unlawful confinement.

332. The Prosecution requests the Appeals Chamber to reverse the Trial Chamber's acquittal of Delali} and Muci} on count 48, and substitute a verdict of guilty for this count. Delali} and Deli} respond that their acquittals on this count were correct in law and should not be disturbed.

1. Article 7(3) Liability

333. The Prosecution argues as part of the third ground of appeal that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that it was not proved that Delali} had superior authority in connection with the unlawful confinement of civilians, and relies for support on its arguments submitted in relation to its second ground of appeal, without more.[527] In relation to the sixth ground of appeal, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Deli} did not have superior responsibility for the unlawful confinement of civilians.[528]

334. The Trial Chamber found that:

> Zejnil Delali} and Hazim Deli} have respectively been found not to have exercised superior authority over the ^elebi}i prison-camp. For this reason, the Trial Chamber finds that these two accused cannot be held criminally liable as superiors, pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute, for the unlawful confinement of civilians in the ^elebi}i prison-camp.[529]

The resolution of this aspect of these grounds therefore rests upon the resolution of the Prosecution's second and fifth grounds of appeal, which challenged the Trial Chamber's finding that Delalić and Delić did not exercise superior authority under Article 7(3) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber has dismissed those grounds of appeal,[530] with the result that the Trial Chamber's determination that Delalić and Delić were not superiors for the purposes of Article 7(3) of the Statute remains. The present grounds of appeal therefore cannot succeed insofar as they relate to Delalić and Delić's liability for the unlawful confinement of civilians pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute.

[530] Supra, Chapter IV, Section B.

2. Article 7(1) Liability

335. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber erred in law in the principles it applied in considering when an accused can be held responsible under Article 7 (1) for unlawful confinement of civilians.[531] The Prosecution argues that, had the Trial Chamber applied the correct legal principles in regard to Article 7(1) to the facts it had found, Delali} and Deli} would have been liable under Article 7(1) for aiding and abetting in the commission of the unlawful confinement of civilians. It is submitted that the Trial Chamber's findings demonstrate that Delali} and Deli} knew that civilians were unlawfully confined in the camp and consciously participated in their continued detention, and that this is sufficient to found their personal liability for the offence.[532]

336. As discussed above, the Trial Chamber found that civilians are unlawfully confined where they are detained in contravention of Articles 42 and 43 of Geneva Convention IV. In relation to the nature of the individual participation in the unlawful confinement which will render an individual personally liable for the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians under Article 2(g) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber, having found that Delali} and Deli} did not exercise superior responsibility over the camp, held:

> Furthermore, on the basis of these findings, the Trial Chamber must conclude that the Prosecution has failed to demonstrate that Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić were in a position to affect the continued detention of civilians in the Čelebići prison-camp. In these circumstances, Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić cannot be deemed to have participated in this offence. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić are not guilty of the unlawful confinement of civilians, as charged in count 48 of the Indictment.[533]

337. On the basis of the italicised portion of the above passage, the Prosecution interprets the Trial Chamber as having applied a test which requires proof of the exercise of superior authority under Article 7(3) of the Statute before an individual could be held responsible under Article 7(1) of the Statute for the offence of unlawful confinement.[534] More generally, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that, as a matter of law, an accused cannot be criminally liable under Article 7(1) for the unlawful confinement of civilians unless that person was "in a position to affect the continued detention of civilians".[535] The Prosecution observes that individual criminal liability extends to any person who committed an offence in the te... of Article 7(1).[536]

[531] Prosecution Brief, para 7.7.

[535] Prosecution Brief, para 4.11.

338. In relation to the contention that the Trial Chamber found that an accused can be liable under Article 7(1) for the offence of unlawful confinement only if it is proved that he exercises superior authority under Article 7(3), there is some question as to whether the Trial Chamber in fact made such a legal finding. The Trial Chamber's statement that, "on the basis of" its findings that Delalić and Delić could not be held criminally liable under Article 7(3) of the Statute, it "must conclude" that there had been a failure to prove that they had been in a position to affect the continued detention of the civilians in the camp could be interpreted as suggesting that the Trial Chamber believed that, as a legal matter, there could be no liability for unlawful confinement under Article 7(1) without superior responsibility under Article 7(3) being established. Such a legal interpretation is clearly incorrect, as it entwines two types of liability, liability under Article 7(1) and liability under Article 7(3). As emphasised by the Secretary-General's Report,[537] the two liabilities are different in nature. Liability under Article 7(1) applies to direct perpetrators of crimes and to accomplices. Article 7(3) applies to persons exercising command or superior responsibility. As has already been acknowledged by the Appeals Chamber in another context, these principles are quite separate and neither is dependent in law upon the other. In the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber rejected a Trial Chamber statement, made in relation to the offence of outrages of personal dignity consisting of the use of detainees for forced labour and as human shields, that the accused "cannot be held responsible under Article 7(1) in circumstances where he does not have direct authority over the main perpetrators of the crimes".[538] There is no reason to believe that, in the context of the offence of unlawful confinement, there would be any special requirement that a position of superior authority be proved before liability under Article 7(1) could be recognised.

339. However, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that this is what the Trial Chamber in fact held. The reference to its findings on the issue of superior authority when concluding that, "[i]n these circumstances, Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić cannot be deemed to have participated in this offence" suggests that the Trial Chamber was referring not to its legal conclusion that the two accused were not superiors for the purposes of Article 7(3), but to the previous factual findings that it had made in that context, which were also relevant to the issue of their individual responsibility for the offence of unlawful confinement. Whether the Trial Chamber was unreasonable in relying on those findings to conclude that Delalić and Delić should be acquitted of the offence under Article 7(1) is a separate issue which is discussed below.

340. The Prosecution also challenges the Trial Chamber's apparent conclusion that, to be responsible for this offence under Article 7(1), the perpetrator must be "in a position to affect the continued detention" of the relevant civilians. Responsibility may be attributed if the accused falls within the terms of Article 7(1) of the Statute, which provides that:

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

341. It is submitted that an accused can be liable under Article 7(1) for committing the crime of unlawful confinement of civilians even if the accused was not the person who could determine which victim would be detained, and whether particular victims would be released.[539] The Prosecution proposes that, in order to establish criminal responsibility for committing the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians it is sufficient to prove (i) that civilians were unlawfully confined, (ii) knowledge that the civilians were being unlawfully confined and (iii) participation in the confinement of those persons.[540] The Prosecution submits that, in relation to guards in a prison, the third matter "will be satisfied by showing that the duties of the guard were in themselves in execution or administration of the illegal system."[541]

342. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that to establish that an individual has committed the offence of unlawful confinement, something more must be proved than mere knowing "participation" in a general system or operation pursuant to which civilians are confined. In the Appeals Chamber's view, the fact alone of a role in some capacity, however junior, in maintaining a prison in which civilians are unlawfully detained is an inadequate basis on which to find primary criminal responsibility of the nature which is denoted by a finding that someone has committed a crime. Such responsibility is more properly allocated to those who are responsible for the detention in a more direct or complete sense, such as those who actually place an accused in detention without reasonable grounds to believe that he constitutes a security risk; or who, having some powers over the place of detention, accepts a civilian into detention without knowing that such grounds exist; or who, having power or authority to release detainees, fails to do so despite knowledge that no reasonable grounds for their detention exist, or that any such reasons have ceased to exist. In the case of prison guards who are employed or conscripted to supervise detainees, and have no role in the determination of who is detained or released, the Prosecution submits that the presence alone of the camp guards was the "most immediate obstacle to each detainee's liberty"[542] and that the guard's presence in the camp in that capacity alone would therefore constitute commission by them of the crime of unlawful confinement. This, however, poses the question of what such a guard is expected to do under such circumstances. The implication from the Prosecution submissions is that such a guard must release the prisoners. The Appeals Chamber, however, does not accept that a guard's omission to take unauthorised steps to release prisoners will suffice to constitute the commission of the crime of unlawful confinement. The Appeals Chamber also finds it difficult to accept that such a guard must cease to supervise those detained in the camp to avoid such liability, particularly in light of the fact that among the detainees there may be persons who are lawfully confined because they genuinely do pose a threat to the security of the State.

343. It is not necessary for present purposes for the Appeals Chamber to attempt an exhaustive definition of the circumstances which will establish that the offence is committed, but it suffices to observe that such liability is reserved for persons responsible in a more direct or complete sense for the civilian's unlawful detention. Lesser degrees of directness of participation obviously remain relevant to liability as an accomplice or a participant in a joint criminal enterprise, which concepts are best understood by reference first to what will establish primary liability for an offence.

344. In relation to accomplice liability, the Prosecution contends that, "[i]n the case of the crime of unlawful confinement of civilians under Article 2(g) of the Statute, a person who, for instance, instigates or aids and abets may not ever be in a position to affect the continued detention of the civilians concerned."[543] The Prosecution also observes that many of the crimes within the Tribunal's jurisdiction may in practice be committed jointly by a number of persons if they have the requisite mens rea and that the crime of unlawful confinement is a clear example of this as "it was the various camp guards and administrators, acting jointly, w collectively ran the camp and kept the victims confined within it."[544]

345. Although it did not explicitly discuss as a discrete legal matter the exact principles by which individuals will be held individually criminally responsible for the unlawful confinement of civilians, the Trial Chamber did, earlier in its Judgement, discuss the general principles relating to criminal responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute. It cited the following statement from the Trial Chamber in the Tadi} Judgement which the Čelebići Trial Chamber considered to state accurately "the scope of individual criminal responsibility under Article 7(1)":[545]

> [...] the accused will be found criminally culpable for any conduct where it is determined that he knowingly participated in the commission of an offence that violates international humanitarian law and his participation directly and substantially affected the commission of that offence through supporting the actual commission before, during, or after the incident. He will also be responsible for all that naturally results from the commission of the act in question.

This statement, from its context in the Tadić Trial Judgement, although broadly expressed, appears to have been intended to refer to liability for aiding and abetting or all forms of accomplice liability rather than all forms of individual criminal responsibility under Article 7(1) including primary or direct responsibility.[546] In the case of primary or direct responsibility, where the accused himself commits the relevant act or omission, the qualification that his participation must "directly and substantially affect the commission of the offence" is an unnecessary one. The Trial Chamber, in referring to the ability to "affect the continued detention" of the civilians, appears to have been providing a criterion to enable the identification of the person who could have a "direct and substantial effect" on the commission of unlawful confinement of civilians in the sense of the Tadić statement.

346. It may have been clearer had the Trial Chamber set out expressly its understanding of the relevant principles in relation to the establishment of primary or direct responsibility for the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians, in relation to which the general principles of accomplice liability set out earlier in its Judgement would also be applied. However, the

The reference to "directly and substantially" is made only in relation to the latter category. See also the following paras 689-691 which appear to be concerned with aiding and abetting only.

Appeals Chamber does not consider that these submissions establish that the Trial Chamber erred in stating that an accused must be in a position to affect the continued detention of the civilians if this is understood, as the Appeals Chamber does, to mean that they must have participated in some significant way in the continued detention of the civilians, whether to a degree which would establish primary responsibility, or to a degree necessary to establish liability as an accomplice or pursuant to a common plan. The particular submissions the Prosecution makes in support of its contention that Delalić and Delić should have been convicted under Article 7(1) for the offence are now considered.

(a) Delali}

347. The Prosecution alleges that Delalić should have been found guilty for aiding and abetting the offence of unlawful confinement. Delali} argues that the Indictment did not charge him with aiding and abetting in Count 48 and that, even if it were to be accepted that he was so charged, the evidence did not show beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty as an aider and abettor.[547]

348. The Prosecution responds that Delali} was charged with aiding and abetting in Count 48 of the Indictment by the use of the word "participation".[548] Delali} contends however that "when the Prosecutor intends to charge aiding and abetting it is done so specifically",[549] and he advances some examples of other indictments before the Tribunal that charge aiding and abetting for the offence of unlawful confinement.[550] Delali} refers to Articles 18(4) and 21(4)(a) of the Statute which require that the indictment contain "a concise statement of the facts and the crime or crimes with which the accused is charged under the Statute" and that an accused must be informed of the nature and cause of the charge against him.[551]

349. The Appeals Chamber notes that the alleged offence of unlawful confinement is charged in count 48 of the Indictment[552] as follows:

> Count 48. A Grave Breach punishable under Article 2(g) (unlawful confinement of civilians) of the Statute of the Tribunal.

Article 7 (1) does not contain the wording used in the Indictment of "participating", but the Prosecution contends that it is evident that a person can participate in a crime through any of the types of conduct referred to in that provision.

350. The Appeals Chamber notes that the language used in Count 48 could (and should) have been expressed with greater precision. Although the accused are clearly charged under both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) of the Statute, no particular head of Article 7(1) is indicated. The Appeals Chamber has already referred to the difficulties which arise from the failure of the Prosecution to identify exactly the type of responsibility alleged against an accused, and has recommended that the Prosecution "indicate in relation to each individual count precisely and expressly the particular nature of the responsibility alleged".[553] However, it was also accepted in that case that the general reference to the terms of Article 7(1) was, in that context, an adequate basis on which to find that the accused had been charged with aiding and abetting.

351. In relation to use of the word "participate" to describe forms of responsibility, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Report of the Secretary-General mentions the word "participate" in the context of individual criminal responsibility:

> The Secretary-General believes that all persons who participate in the planning, preparation or execution of serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia contribute to the commission of the violation and are, therefore, individually responsible.[554]

It is clear that Article 7 (1) of the Statute encompasses various modes of participation, some more direct than other. The word "participation" here is a broad enough term to encompass all forms of responsibility which are included within Article 7(1) of the Statute. Although greater specificity in drafting indictments is desirable, failure to identify expressly the exact mode of participation is not necessarily fatal to an indictment if it nevertheless makes clear to the accused the "nature and cause of the charge against him".[555] There has been no suggestion that a complaint was made prior to the trial that Delalić did not know the case that he had to meet. It is too late to make the complaint now on appeal that the Indictment was inadequate to advise the accused that all such forms of responsibility were alleged. The use of the word "participate" is poor drafting, but it should have been understood here as including all forms of participation referred to in Article 7(1) given that superior responsibility was expressed to be an additional form of responsibility.

352. The Trial Chamber therefore correctly interpreted Count 48 of the Indictment and the supporting paragraph as charging the three accused generally with participation in the unlawful confinement of civilians pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute, as well as with responsibility as superiors pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute.[556] The Trial Chamber had earlier defined aiding and abetting as:

> [including] all acts of assistance that lend encouragement or support to the perpetration of an offence and which are accompanied by the requisite mens rea. Subject to the caveat that it be found to have contributed to, or have had an effect on, the commission of the crime, the relevant act of assistance may be removed both in time and place from the actual commission of the offence.[557]

The Prosecution does not challenge that definition. Subject to the observation that the acts of assistance, encouragement or support must have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime, the Appeals Chamber also accepts the statement as accurate.[558]

353. As noted above, in its conclusions in relation to the liability of Delalić and Delić under Article 7(1) for the offence of unlawful confinement, the Trial Chamber referred to its earlier findings made in the context of its consideration of their liability as superiors pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute. Although those findings were being made for the primary purpose of determining whether superior responsibility was being exercised, it is clear that they involved a broad consideration by the Trial Chamber of the nature of the involvement of the two accused in the affairs of the Čelebići camp. The Prosecution indeed contends that the findings made by the Trial Chamber provided an adequate basis on which to determine Delalić's liability for aiding and abetting.

354. The Trial Chamber considered the evidence in relation to the placing of civilians in detention at the camp, but it made no finding that Delali} participated in their arrest or in placing them in detention in the camp.[559] The Prosecution advances no argument that the Tr[illegible] Chamber erred in this respect.

355. However, the Prosecution argues that Delali} participated in the continued detention of civilians as an aider and abettor. The Trial Chamber found that there was "no evidence that the Čelebići prison-camp came under Delalić's authority by virtue of his appointment as co-ordinator".[560] The Trial Chamber found that the primary responsibility of Delalić in his position as co-ordinator was to provide logistical support for the various formations of the armed forces; that these consisted of, inter alia, supplies of material, equipment, food, communications equipment, railroad access, transportation of refugees and the linking up of electricity grids.[561] These findings as to the scope of Delalić's role obviously supported its later conclusion that he was not in a position to affect the continued detention of the civilians at the Čelebići camp.

356. The Prosecution, however, refers to two specific matters which it says constituted aiding and abetting by Delalić: his role in "publicly justifying and defending the purpose and legality of the camp",[562] and his "participation in the classification and releasing of prisoners".[563]

357. The Prosecution contends that the evidence before the Trial Chamber showed that Delali} was involved in the release of Doctor Gruba~ and Witness P in July 1992,[564] and that he signed orders on 24 and 28 August 1992[565] for the classification of detainees and their release. However, the Trial Chamber explicitly found that:

> As co-ordinator, Zejnil Delalić had no authority to release prisoners.[566]

The Trial Chamber found that the orders referred to by the Prosecution were not signed in Delalić's capacity as "co-ordinator", as all documents were signed "for" the Head of the Investigating Body of the War Presidency.[567] He had no independent authority to do so.[568]

It should be noted that, in the week prior to the hearing of the Appeal, the Prosecution filed a motion for the adjournment of the hearing of the appeal on the basis that it had recently received new documents from the archives of the Croatian government which related to the Čelebići camp: Prosecution Motion for Adjournment of Oral Argument of Argument of Appeal or Alternatively for Adjournment of Oral Argument of Certain Grounds of Appeal, 31 May 2000. The Prosecution believed at that

358. The Appeals Chamber considers that this conclusion has not been shown to be unreasonable that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached it. The Trial Chamber interpreted those orders explicitly as not constituting evidence that he exercised superior responsibility in relation to the camp.[569] The Trial Chamber appears to have interpreted the orders as being, although indicative of some degree of involvement in the continuing detention or release of detainees, inadequate to establish a degree of participation that would be sufficient to constitute a substantial effect on the continuing detention which would be adequate for the purposes of aiding and abetting. The Appeals Chamber considers that this interpretation of the significance of the orders was open to the Trial Chamber.

359. The Prosecution's submission that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to find that Delalić aided and abetted the commission of the offence of unlawful confinement by publicly justifying and defending the purpose of the camp must be rejected for similar reasons.[570] The Trial Chamber referred to the evidence that Delalić had contacts with the ICRC, and that he had been interviewed by journalists in relation to the camp.[571] Even if it could be accepted that this reference alone constituted a finding by the Trial Chamber that these contacts and interviews occurred, it was open to the Trial Chamber to find that any supportive effect that this had in relation to the detention of civilians in the camp was inadequate to be characterised as having a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.

360. The Prosecution has not referred to any other evidence before the Trial Chamber which would indicate that a finding of guilt for Delalić on this count was the only reasonable stage the there were "certain documents which appear to relate to the responsibilities of Zejnil Delalić as a commander in the region and his role in relation to the Čelebići prison camp during the relevant time period" and sought time to have the documents translated and properly assessed. A brief description of certain of these documents was annexed to the motion and indicated that there may be documents which related in some way to Delalić's relationship with the Čelebići camp. This motion for adjournment was refused on the basis that the material referred to in the motion did not adequately indicate that they were relevant to the allegations of errors of law in the relevant grounds of appeal, but the Appeals Chamber reserved the question of the use to which the material in the documents could be put to the hearing of the appeal. The Prosecution then made an oral motion at the hearing of the appeal that the appeal proceedings not be closed for a period of time after the hearing to enable the filing of written submissions in relation to the documents (see Appeal Transcript pp 79-82). This motion was supported by certain translated documents (Confidential Exhibits for Prosecution Oral Motion to File Supplementary Materials after the Conclusion of the Hearing of the Appeal, 5 June 2000), including a document which was described as being relevant to the capacity in which Delalić signed the orders for release referred to in the above text (Appeal Transcript pp 87-88). The Prosecution was given until the final day of the hearing of the appeal to determine whether it wished to bring an application for the use of the documents in some capacity but ultimately advised the Appeals Chamber that it would not do so (Appeal Transcript p 636). The Prosecution therefore closed its case without seeking to rely on those documents.

conclusion to be drawn, a matter which must be established before an acquittal would be overturned on appeal.[572] The Prosecution's third ground of appeal must therefore be dismissed in its entirety.

(b) Delić

361. The Prosecution submits that Delić should have been found guilty under Article 7(1), although its written or oral submissions again emphasise the concept of "participation" and do not clearly identify exactly what mode of participation it contends the Trial Chamber should have found had been established.

362. The Trial Chamber found no evidence which demonstrated beyond reasonable doubt that Delić had any role in the creation of the camp, in the arrest and placing in detention of the civilians. Delić argues that it has not been established that he exercised any role in the decision to detain or release prisoners.[573]

363. Although Delić belonged to the military police of the joint command of the TO and HVO,[574] which the Trial Chamber found had been involved in the creation of the camp, there was no finding by the Trial Chamber that Delić in his position had authority to detain or release civilians or even that as a practical matter he could affect who should be detained or released. The Prosecution does not refer to any evidence which would have established such a finding beyond reasonable doubt. The Trial Chamber did find that the evidence established that Delić was "tasked with assisting Zdravko Mucić by organising and arranging for the daily activities in the Čelebići prison-camp."[575]

364. Although the Prosecution appears to contend that the evidence established Delić's primary responsibility for commission of the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians, it does not refer to any evidence which establishes more than that he was aware of the unlawfulness of the detention of at least some of the detainees, and that he, as a guard and deputy commander of the camp, thereby participated in the detention of the civilians held there.[576] The Prosecution makes the general submission that:

[573] Delić Response, para 267.
[574] Ibid, para 797.
[575] Trial Judgement, para 809.
[576] Prosecution Brief, para 7.16.

> Clearly, any detainee who had attempted to leave the Čelebići camp would have been physically prevented from so doing, not by the person in command of the camp, but by one of the camp guards. The most immediate cause of each detainee's confinement, and the most immediate obstacle to each detainee's liberty, was thus the camp guards. Provided that he or she had the requisite mens rea, each camp guard who participated in the confinement of civilians in the camp, and prevented them from leaving it, will thus be criminally liable on the basis of Article 7(1) for the unlawful confinement of civilians, whether or not the particular guard, under the regime in force in the camp, had any responsibility for determining who would be detained and who would be released.[577]

Insofar as this may suggest that any prison guard who is aware that there are detainees within the camp who were detained without reasonable grounds to suspect that they were a security risk is, without more, responsible for the crime of unlawful confinement, the Appeals Chamber does not accept this submission. As already indicated above, the Appeals Chamber has concluded that a greater degree of involvement in the confinement of an individual is required to establish primary responsibility, and that, even in relation to aiding and abetting, it must be established that the accused's assistance to the principal must have a substantial effect on the commission of the crime. What will satisfy these requirements will depend on the circumstances of the particular case, but the Appeals Chamber would not accept that the circumstance alone of holding a position as a guard somewhere within a camp in which civilians are unlawfully detained suffices to render that guard responsible for the crime of unlawful confinement of civilians. The Prosecution has not referred to particular evidence which would place Delić's involvement in the confinement of the civilians at the Čelebići camp at a level higher than the holding of the offices of guard and deputy-commander.

365. It appears from certain other submissions of the Prosecution that, although is does not put its case in this way, it in fact considers that the doctrine of common criminal purpose or joint criminal enterprise is the most apposite form of responsibility to apply to Delić.[578] However it does not identify any findings of the Trial Chamber on the evidence which would establish the necessary elements of criminal liability through participation in a joint criminal enterprise.

366. Although it may be accepted that the only reasonable finding on the evidence, particularly in relation to the nature of some of the detainees at the camp, including elderly persons,[579] must have been that Delić was aware that, in respect of at least some of the detainees, there existed no reasonable grounds to believe that they constituted a security risk, this is not the only matter which must be established in relation to an allegation of participation in a common criminal design. The existence of a common concerted plan, design or purpose between the various participants in the enterprise (including the accused) must also be proved.[580] It is also necessary to establish a specific mens rea, being a shared intent to further the planned crime, an intent to further the common concerted system of ill-treatment, or an intention to participate in and further the joint criminal enterprise, depending on the circumstances of the case.[581] The Prosecution has not pointed to any evidence before the Trial Chamber which would have made the conclusion that these elements had been proved beyond reasonable doubt the only reasonable conclusion on the evidence.

367. As to Deli}'s relationship to the work of the Military Investigative Commission in charge of granting procedural guarantees to detainees, the Trial Chamber concluded that the role of Delić was to assist Mucić by organising and arranging for detainees to be brought to interrogations.[582] The Trial Chamber made no finding that Deli} had participated in the work of the Commission. It also made no finding that Delić himself had either responsibility for ensuring that the procedural review was conducted, or authority or power to release detainees, a power which should have been exercised when the appropriate reviews were not conducted.

368. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that it was open to the Trial Chamber to assess the evidence before it as not proving beyond reasonable doubt that Deli}'s acts and omissions constituted any adequate form of "participation" in the offence of unlawful confinement for the purpose of ascribing criminal responsibility under Article 7(1).

369. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has not established that the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Deli} was not guilty under Article 7 (1) for the offence of unlawful confinement was unreasonable.

C. Muci}'s Appeal

370. Mucić, in support of this ground of appeal, adopted "as a substantive appeal against conviction on Count 48" the closing submissions made on behalf of Delalić at trial and made

[580] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 227.
[581] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 228.
[582] Trial Judgement, para 807; the finding was made essentially on the evidence on Witness D (a member of the Commission) that the Commission would receive a list of detainees in the prison-camp from Mucić and that the Commission would write out a list of people to be "interviewed". Witness D testified that they would give the list of detainees to Mucić, and if he was not there to Delić, and that Delić (alone with Mucić) had access to Commission files.

only a limited number of his own submissions on this ground.[583] The Prosecution submits as these "incorporated" arguments were filed before the Trial Chamber's Judgement was rendered, they should not be considered.

371. The task of the Appeals Chamber, as defined by Article 25 of the Statute, is to hear appeals from the decisions of Trial Chambers on the grounds of an error on a question of law invalidating the decision or of an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice. An appellant must show how the Trial Chamber erred in law or in fact, and the Appeals Chamber expects their submissions to be directed to that end. The submissions "incorporated" by Muci} provide no assistance on the aspects of his ground of appeal which allege an error of fact. However, to the extent that the submissions are relevant to the questions of law raised by Mucić's ground of appeal, the Appeals Chamber has considered them in addition to the submissions made by counsel for Mucić at the hearing of the appeal.

372. Muci} challenges his conviction for the offence of illegal detention or unlawful confinement first with the argument that the detainees of the camp were lawfully confined because of suspicion of inciting armed rebellion against the State of Bosnia and Herzegovina.[584] The Appeals Chamber has already considered the submission that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that at least some of the detainees were unlawfully confined, and has rejected it.[585]

373. Muci} then submits that it was not proved that he had the requisite mens rea because:

> Given that it is not remotely suggested that the Appellant has, or had, any expert or other knowledge of International Law, it would be a counsel of impossible perfection to conclude that in 1992 he could have known, or did know, that there was a possibility that the confinement of persons at Čelebići could, or would be, construed as illegal under an interpretation of an admixture of the Geneva Conventions and Article 2(g) of the Statute of the Tribunal, a Statute not then in existence.[586]

374. The Prosecution notes that it is unclear whether Muci} contends that the knowledge of the law is an element of the crime or whether Muci} is raising a defence of error of law.[587] In either of those cases, the Prosecution argues that there is no general principle of criminal law that knowledge of the law is an element of the mens rea of a crime and that no defence of mistake of law is available under international humanitarian law. These submissions miss the real issue raised by Mucić's submission – that he could not have been expected to know that the detention of the Čelebići detainees would become illegal at some future time. Mucić's submission has no merit because it is clear from the provisions cited above from Geneva Convention IV that the detention of those persons was illegal at the very time of their detention.

375. Mucić also argued that it was not his function as "prison administrator" to know whether the detention of the victims was unlawful.[588] At the hearing of the appeal, counsel for Mucić placed greater emphasis on the argument that Mucić did not in fact have the requisite mens rea for a conviction under Article 7(1) of the Statute, and that the Trial Chamber relied upon evidence which established only that he "had reason to know" as a basis for a positive finding that he did in fact have the requisite knowledge that the detainees were unlawfully detained.[589] The Prosecution argues that, because Muci} knew of the types of people detained in the camp and the circumstances of their arrest, he had the mens rea for the commission of the offence.[590]

376. The Trial Chamber found that Mucić, by virtue of his position of command, was the individual with primary responsibility for, and had the ability to affect, the continued detention of civilians in the camp.[591] Muci} submits in this regard that the determination of the legality of the detention is not a function or duty of prison administrators but rather of those who authorize arrests and the placing of arrestees into detention.[592] The Appeals Chamber accepts that it is not open simply to conclude that, because of a position of superior authority somewhere in relation to a prison camp, an accused is also directly responsible under Article 7(1) for the offence of unlawful confinement committed anywhere in that camp. The particular circumstances entailing liability under Article 7 (1) have to be specifically established before liability could be imposed. This depends on the particular organisation of duties within a camp, and it is a matter to be determined on the evidence.

377. The Trial Chamber found that some detainees were possibly legally detained ab in[illegible] but found that some other detainees were not.[593] The Trial Chamber made no finding that Muci} ordered, instigated, planned or otherwise aided and abetted the process of the arrest and placement of civilians in detention in the camp. However, as observed above, there is a second means by which the offence of unlawful confinement can be committed. The detention of detainees without granting the procedural guarantees required by Article 43 of Geneva Convention IV also constitutes the offence of unlawful confinement, whether the civilians were originally lawfully detained or not. It was this aspect of the offence that the Trial Chamber was relying on when it held:

> Specifically, Zdravko Mucić, in this position, [ie of superior authority over the camp] had the authority to release detainees. By omitting to ensure that a proper enquiry was undertaken into the status of the detainees, and that those civilians who could not lawfully be detained were immediately released, Zdravko Mucić participated in the unlawful confinement of civilians in the ^elebi}i prison-camp.[594]

Thus the Trial Chamber appears to have found Mucić guilty on the basis of the denial of procedural guarantees under the second "category" of this offence, and the Appeals Chamber's consideration will be limited to his liability in that context. The Appeals Chamber first notes that, although Mucić contests whether it was his responsibility as camp commander to know whether the detainees were lawfully detained or not, he does not contest on appeal the Trial Chamber's finding that he had the authority to release prisoners. In any case, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber made reference to a variety of evidence in support of this finding.[595] The Appeals Chamber therefore proceeds on the basis that this finding was open to the Trial Chamber and that it is the relevant one.

378. As is evident from the earlier discussion of the law relating to unlawful confinement, the Appeals Chamber considers that a person in the position of Mucić commits the offence of [594] This finding of the Trial Chamber is not challenged by Muci}. Muci} Response, p 5.

[595] Trial Judgement, para 1145. The Trial Chamber found that from May until December 1992, individuals and groups were released from the ^elebi}i prison-camp at various times, some to continued detention at Musala, some for exchange, others under the auspices of the International Red Cross, which visited the camp on two occasions in the first half of August 1992 (Trial Judgement, para 157). It also found that there was evidence of the control by Mucić of the detainees who would leave or be transferred from the Čelebići prison-camp to another detention facility: (Trial Judgement, para 764; See also Trial Transcript, p 1331 and Exhibit 75, signed by Muci}, a release document in respect of the detention of Branko Gotovac. There is also Exhibit 84, signed by Mucić for Mirko Kuljanin and Exhibit 91, signed by Mr. Mucić, which is the release document for Milojka Antić. Mucić also signed Exhibit 158, a release document for Witness B, and Exhibit 159, which is the release document for Zoran Ninković. Witness F testified that Muci} released detainees, sick and elderly people, late June, early July and on 8 October 1992: Trial Transcript, p 1331).

unlawful confinement of civilians where he has the authority to release civilian detainees a... fails to exercise that power, where

(i) he has no reasonable grounds to believe that the detainees do not pose a real risk to the security of the state;[596] or

(ii) he knows that they have not been afforded the requisite procedural guarantees (or is reckless as to whether those guarantees have been afforded or not).[597]

379. Where a person who has authority to release detainees knows that persons in continued detention have a right to review of their detention[598] and that they have not been afforded that right, he has a duty to release them. Therefore, failure by a person with such authority to exercise the power to release detainees, whom he knows have not been afforded the procedural rights to which they are entitled, commits the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians, even if he is not responsible himself for the failure to have their procedural rights respected.

380. The Trial Chamber expressly found that the detainees were not afforded the necessary procedural guarantees. It also found that Mucić did in fact have the power to release detainees at the camp. The only remaining question raised by Muci}'s ground of appeal is therefore whether the Trial Chamber had found (although it did not refer to it explicitly) that Mucić had the relevant mens rea, i.e.,he knew that the detainees had a right to review of their detention but had not been afforded this review or was reckless as to whether they had been afforded it or not. It is not strictly necessary, in relation to an allegation that the offence of unlawful confinement has been committed through non-compliance with the obligation to afford procedural guarantees, to establish that there was also knowledge that the initial detention of the relevant detainees had been unlawful. This is because the obligation to afford procedural guarantees applies to all detainees whether initially lawfully detained or not. However, as is apparent from the discussion below, the Trial Chamber's findings also suggest that it had concluded that Mucić was also aware that no reasonable ground existed for the detention of at least some of the detainees.

381. The Trial Chamber concluded in relation to Mucić that "[b]y omitting to ensure that a proper enquiry was undertaken into the status of the detainees and that those civilians who could not lawfully be detained were immediately released, Zdravko Mucić participated in 4372 unlawful confinement of civilians in the ^elebi}i prison-camp."[599] It is implicit in this finding that Mucić knew that a review of the detainees' detention was required but had not been conducted.[600] There are a number of findings of the Trial Chamber on the evidence before it which support this conclusion.

[597] This relates to the second "category".
[598] It is unnecessary that he is aware of the legal source of this right.

382. Relevant to Mucić's knowledge of the unlawful nature of the confinement of certain of the detainees (both because of absence of review of detention and, in some cases, of the absence of grounds for the initial detention) is his knowledge of the work of the Military Investigative Commission. As noted above, the Trial Chamber found that a Military Investigative Commission was established by the Konjić Joint Command following a decision by the War Presidency of Konjić to investigate crimes allegedly committed by the detainees prior to their arrival at the ^elebi}i camp,[601] and that the Commission did not have the power to finally decide on the release of wrongfully detained prisoners.[602]

383. The Trial Chamber found that the Commission consisted of five members, one of which was Witness D. The Trial Chamber referred to Witness D's testimony that he worked closely with Mucić in the classification of the detainees in the Čelebići camp, and that Mucić had a complete list of the detainees which he brought out for members of the Commission.[603] It is apparent from the context of the Trial Chamber's reference that it accepted that evidence. Witness D also testified that Mucić was present early in June when members of the Commission met to discuss how they would go about their work of the classification of the detainees and consideration for their continued detention or release.[604] It is implicit in these findings as to Mucić's awareness of the work of the Commission, and even of its existence as an independent body with a review function over the camp, that Mucić must have known that such a review was legally required.

384. The Trial Chamber also found that the Commission had prepared a report in June 1992 detailing the "conditions in the prison-camp, including the mistreatment of detainees and the

[599] Trial Judgement, para 1145 (emphasis added).
[600] This conclusion is not affected by the fact that Mucić could not ultimately be held responsible for failure to ensure such a review, or that (given that it was the detention practices of Mucić as person having authority over the camp, which were to be the subject of review) this responsibility appears to have lain with authorities outside the camp such as the Military Investigative Commission or the entities who were ultimately responsible for the creation of the camp.
[601] Trial Judgement, para 1136.

continued incarceration of persons who were peaceful civilians", and the fact that they were unable to correct them. The Trial Chamber cited from the report, which stated, inter alia:

> Detainees were maltreated and physically abused by certain guards from the moment they were brought in until the time their statement was taken i.e. until their interview was conducted. Under such circumstances, Commission members were unable to learn from a large number of detainees all the facts relevant for each detainee and the area from which he had been brought in and where he had been captured. [...] Commission members also interviewed persons arrested outside the combat zone; the Commission did not ascertain the reason for these arrests, but these detainees were subjected to the same treatment [...] Persons who had been arrested under such circumstances stayed in detention even after it had been established that they had been detained for no reason and received the same treatment as persons captured in the combat zone [...] Because self-appointed judges have appeared, any further investigation is pointless until these problems are solved.[605]

385. It is obvious from this report, which the Trial Chamber accepted, that there were persons in the camp in respect of whom no reasons existed to justify their detention and that the Commission was not able to perform the necessary review of the detention of the Čelebići camp detainees. The Trial Chamber found that, after working for about one month at the prison-camp, the Commission was in fact disbanded at the instigation of its members as early as the end of June 1992.[606] Although the Trial Chamber made no finding that Mucić had read the Commission's report, in view of its findings that Mucić worked closely with the Commission, it is implicit in the findings taken as a whole that Mucić was aware of the matters that the Commission discussed in the report, including the fact that there were civilians there who had been detained without justification, and that the detainees generally had not had their detention properly reviewed. This knowledge can only have been reinforced by the presence in the camp, of which Mucić must have been aware, of detainees of a kind which would have appeared so unlikely to pose a security risk that it must have raised doubts as to whether any reasonable grounds had ever existed for their initial detention. This included elderly persons[607] and persons such as Grozdana Ćećez, a 42 year old mother of two children.[608]

386. The Appeals Chamber finds that it was open to the Trial Chamber, from its primary findings (which have not been shown to be unreasonable), to conclude that Muci}, by not using his authority to release detainees whom he knew had not had their detention reviewed and had therefore not received the necessary procedural guarantees, committed the offence of unlawful confinement of civilians and was therefore guilty of the offence pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.

VI. MULTIPLE CONVICTIONS BASED ON THE SAME ACTS

389. The Trial Chamber found Mucić, Delić, and Landžo guilty both of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and of violations of the laws or customs of war based on the same acts. The counts containing convictions under both Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute are as follows:

Muci}:	Counts 13 and 14; 33 and 34; 38 and 39; 44 and 45; 46 and 47.
Deli}:	Counts 1 and 2; 3 and 4; 11 and 12; 18 and 19; 21 and 22; 42 and 43; 46 and 47.
Land'o:	Counts 1 and 2; 5 and 6; 7 and 8; 11 and 12; 15 and 16; 24 and 25; 30 and 31; 36 and 37; 46 and 47.

390. Muci} and Deli} have appealed against the judgement of the Trial Chamber, stating in the Deli}/Muci} Supplementary Brief that these convictions violate the Blockburger standard, established by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1932. In Blockburger v United States, the Supreme Court held that "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offences or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[609]

391. Although Land'o was also convicted under both Articles 2 and 3 based on the same acts, he did not lodge an appeal on this issue.

392. The crux of the appellants' arguments is as follows:

> Setting aside the question of the applicability of Common Article 3 to international armed conflict and whether Common Article 3 imposes international individual criminal liability, to obtain a conviction under Common Article 3, the elements are identical with one exception. An element of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions is that the complainant was a person protected by one of the Conventions. Absent such proof, there can be no conviction under the Tribunal's jurisdiction to try allegations of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions.
> Thus, judgements of conviction for both grave breaches of the Geneva Convention and violations of the laws and customs of war would violate the Blockburger standard.[610]

The appellants concede that Articles 2 and 3 differ. Beyond that, however, they provide very little analysis of this issue, merely concluding that the Blockburger standard is violated. Their argument appears to hinge on the fact that the requisite proof of protected person status under the grave breaches charge is lacking.

[610] Appellants-Cross Appellees Hazim Deli}'s and Zdravko "Pavo" Muci}'s Motion for Leave to File Supplemental Brief and Supplemental Brief, 14 Feb 2000, p 13, (footnotes omitted).

393. In their 7 April 2000 Response to the Prosecutor's Supplementary Brief, the appellai restate that the Blockburger standard is the appropriate test for double jeopardy.[611] They further claim that under the reasoning of the Kupreskić Judgement and of Ball v United States, a 1985 U.S. Supreme Court case which applied the Blockburger test, multiple convictions based on the same acts are not allowed.[612]

394. In their respective designations of the issues on appeal, Muci} and Deli} reiterate the issue as follows:

> Whether the Trial Chamber erred in entering judgements of conviction and sentences for grave breaches for the Geneva Conventions and for violations of the Laws and Customs of War based on the same acts.[613]

The relief sought by the appellants is dismissal of one of the counts; they do not indicate which one.

395. According to the Prosecution, the Kupreskić Judgement represents an unwarranted departure from the prior practice of both the Tribunal and the ICTR.[614] In Kupreskić, the Trial Chamber held that the primary applicable test is whether each offence contains an element not required by the other.[615] An additional test, which ascertains whether the various provisions at issue protect different values, can be used in conjunction with and in support of the primary test.[616] The Trial Chamber in Kupreskić found that an individual cannot be convicted of both murder as a crime against humanity and murder as a war crime, because murder as a war crime does not require proof of elements that murder as a crime against humanity requires.[617]

396. The Prosecution maintains that the solution should be sought in the practice of the International Tribunals, rather than in particular national systems, although the latter contain useful terminology that can be employed in an analysis of the issues.[618] After discussing the terminology found in various national systems, the Prosecution examines in detail the practice of this Tribunal and the ICTR, and concludes that the "Tadić-Akayesu test is consistent with the weight of precedent in both Tribunals, and consistent with international standards of justice."[619]

397. In Tadić, the Prosecution states, the Trial Chamber rejected the challenge to the cumulative charges in the indictment and convicted the accused cumulatively of a number of crimes.[620] The Trial Chamber imposed concurrent sentences upon the accused.[621] The Prosecution appealed on various grounds, and the Tadi} Appeal Judgment resulted in the accused being convicted cumulatively under two or three articles of the Statute.[622] Under the Tadić test, according to the Prosecution, the "accused can be charged with and convicted of as many crimes as the facts of the case disclose"[623] if there is "ideal concurrence." Ideal concurrence describes the situation "where a single act of an accused contravenes more than one provision of the criminal law."[624]

398. Further, the Prosecution explains that the ICTR Trial Chamber in Akayesu[625] held that cumulative convictions are acceptable:

> 1. where the offences have different elements;
> 2. where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or
> 3. where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order to fully describe what the accused did.[626]

399. The Prosecution finally states that the Tadić and Akayesu tests can be reconciled if "the Akayesu test is considered as a test for distinguishing between cases of ideal concurrence and cases of apparent concurrence."[627]

The fact that multiple counts relate to the same conduct is considered relevant only at the post-conviction stage, in relation to sentencing. (Tadi} test). A. Discussion

1. Cumulative Charging

400. Cumulative charging is to be allowed in light of the fact that, prior to the presentation of all of the evidence, it is not possible to determine to a certainty which of the charges brought against an accused will be proven. The Trial Chamber is better poised, after the parties' presentation of the evidence, to evaluate which of the charges may be retained, based upon the sufficiency of the evidence. In addition, cumulative charging constitutes the usual practice of both this Tribunal and the ICTR.

2. Cumulative Convictions

401. Before examining the relevant provisions of the Statute of the International Tribunal, the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and of national jurisdictions may be considered for guidance on this issue.

402. During the proceedings in the present case, a bench of the Appeals Chamber had to decide whether the accused Delić's complaint, that he was being charged on multiple occasions throughout the indictment with two different crimes arising from one act or omission, justified the granting of leave to appeal.[628] The bench quoted the reasoning of the Trial Chamber in Tadić,[629] and stated that it did not consider that the reasoning in Tadić revealed an error, much less a grave one, justifying the granting of leave to appeal.[630]

403. Based upon the Prosecution's appeal from the Trial Chamber judgment in Tadić, the Appeals Chamber overturned the acquittal of Tadić on all relevant Article 2 counts and on four cumulatively charged counts relating to the killing of five victims from the village of Jaskici.[631] The Appeals Chamber did so even though all of the Article 2 counts related to conduct for which the accused had already been convicted under other provisions of the Statute, namely [629] The Trial Chamber in Tadić stated: "In any event, since this is a matter that will only be at all relevant insofar as it might affect penalty, it can best be dealt with if and when matters of penalty fall for consideration. What can, however, be said with certainty is that penalty cannot be made to depend upon whether offences arising from the same conduct are alleged cumulatively or in the alternative. What is to be punished by penalty is proven criminal conduct and that will not depend upon technicalities of pleading." Prosecutor v Dusko Tadić, Decision on the Defence Motion on the Form of the Indictment, Case No. IT-94-1-T, 14 Nov. 1995, p. 10.

Articles 3 and 5. As a result, Tadić was cumulatively convicted with respect to the same conduct, based on numerous different groups of counts.[632] The problem of multiple convictions was not addressed as such by the Chamber. The multiple convictions were however taken into account in the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement, where the Appeals Chamber imposed concurrent sentences on the accused.[633]

404. During the Aleksovski Appeal, the Appeals Chamber briefly addressed the issue of multiple convictions for the same acts, in connection with sentencing.[634] The Trial Chamber in that case had acquitted the accused on Counts 8 and 9 of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions but convicted him on Count 10 of a violation of the laws or customs of war.[635] The Appeals Chamber stated:

> The material acts of the Appellant underlying the charges are the same in respect of Counts 8 and 9, as in respect of Count 10, for which the Appellant has been convicted. Thus, even if the verdict of acquittal were to be reversed by a finding of guilt on these counts, it would not be appropriate to increase the Appellant's sentence. Moreover, any sentence imposed in respect of Counts 8 and 9 would have to run concurrently with the sentence on Count 10.[636]

405. This analysis of the Tribunal's jurisprudence reveals that multiple convictions based on the same acts have sometimes been upheld, with potential issues of unfairness to the accused being addressed at the sentencing phase. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTR has not made any pronouncements on the issue of multiple convictions as yet.

406. National approaches vary with respect to cumulative convictions. Some countries allow such convictions, letting the record reflect fully each violation that occurred, and preferring to address any allegations of unfairness in the manner of sentencing. Other countries reserve such convictions for acts resulting in the most severe of crimes, whereas still others require different statutory elements before cumulative criminal convictions may be imposed. A few examples will demonstrate these different approaches.

407. Under German law, for example, the judgment of the court details every crime that has been perpetrated as a result of a single act. In cases of ideal concurrence:

> the perpetrator receives only one sentence, but because he is convicted of all crimes committed by him, or of the multiple commissions of a crime, the judgement documents which crimes have been fulfilled or how often the perpetrator has fulfilled a crime.[637]

408. In Zambia, on the other hand, multiple convictions based on the same act can only be imposed for capital crimes. Under the Zambian Penal Code:

> [a] person cannot be punished twice either under the provisions of this Code or under the provisions of any other law for the same act or omission, except in the case where the act or omission is such that by means thereof he causes the death of another person, in which case he may be convicted of the offence of which he is guilty by reason of causing such death, notwithstanding that he has already been convicted of some other offence constituted by the act or omission.[638]

409. In the United States, by contrast, the Blockburger ruling establishes that multiple convictions can be imposed under different statutory provisions if each statutory provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not.[639] This test has been more recently affirmed in the Rutledge case decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1996.[640]

410. Another approach, that of a United States military tribunal established at the end of World War II to prosecute persons charged with crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, is also instructive. According to the Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, the United States Military Tribunal established pursuant to Allied Control Council Law No. 10 was of the opinion that:

> war crimes may also constitute crimes against humanity; the same offences may amount to both types of crime. If war crimes are shown to have been committed in a widespread, systematic manner, on political, racial or religious grounds, they may also amount to crimes against humanity.[641]

[641] Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, U.N. War Crimes Commission VI, p 79 (London: 1948).

411. The Law Reports note that it seemed as if the tribunal "was willing to agree that [illegible] taken in pursuance of the Nacht und Nebel Plan constituted crimes against humanity as well as war crimes."[642] In the Trial of Josef Altstötter and Others (The Justice Trial), the tribunal found numerous defendants guilty of war crimes as well as crimes against humanity based on exactly the same acts,[643] thus appearing to uphold the possibility of cumulative convictions, at least when war crimes and crimes against humanity are involved.

412. Having considered the different approaches expressed on this issue both within this Tribunal and other jurisdictions, this Appeals Chamber holds that reasons of fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions, lead to the conclusion that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.

413. Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.

414. In this case, defendants Mucić and Delić have been convicted of numerous crimes under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute, which crimes arise out of the same acts. The chart below summarises their convictions.

Article 2 (Grave Breaches of Geneva Convention No. IV	Article 3 (Violations of the Laws or Customs of War—Common Article 3)
1. wilful killings	1. murders
2. wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health	2. cruel treatment
3. torture	3. torture

It is therefore possible for the same act to be a war crime and a crime against humanity."). However, the Report does not indicate whether convictions based on the same acts are possible under provisions for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Land'o was cumulatively convicted under Articles 2 and 3, as to categories 1, 2, and 3 above (see chart). Although he did not file an appeal on this issue, the Appeals Chamber finds that reasons of fairness and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions, merit the application of the same principles to his convictions as well.

415. Under Article 2 of the Statute,

> The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons committing or ordering to be committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, namely the following acts against persons or property protected under the provisions of the relevant Geneva Convention:
> a. wilful killing;

416. The appellants have been convicted under Geneva Convention IV. Article 147 of this Convention proscribes grave breaches such as wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, if committed against persons or property protected by the Convention. The Convention defines "protected persons" as those who "at a given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a Party to the conflict or Occupying Power of which they are not nationals."[644] The ICRC Commentary (GC IV) explains that the term "in the hands of"

> is not merely a question of being in enemy hands directly, as a prisoner is. The mere fact of being in the territory of a Party to the conflict or in occupied territory implies that one is in the power or hands' of the Occupying Power.... In other words, the expression in the hands of'

> need not necessarily be understood in the physical sense; it simply means that the person is in territory which is under the control of the Power in question.[645]

417. The definition of "protected person" under Geneva Convention IV is further limited by the fact that "persons protected by the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12, 1949, or by the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea of August 12, 1949, or by the Geneva Convention relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949, shall not be considered as protected persons within the meaning of the present Convention."[646]

418. However, it should be noted that this Tribunal's jurisprudence has held that "protected persons" may encompass victims possessing the same nationality as the perpetrators of crimes, if, for example, these perpetrators are acting on behalf of a State which does not extend these victims diplomatic protection or to which the victims do not owe allegiance.[647]

419. Under Article 3 of the Statute, "The International Tribunal shall have the power to prosecute persons violating the laws or customs of war."[648] The origins of the convictions at issue—murder, cruel treatment, and torture—lie in common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which states in the pertinent part:

> In the case of armed conflict not of an international character occurring in the territory of one of the High Contracting Parties, each Party to the conflict shall be bound to apply, as a minimum, the following provisions:

[645] ICRC Commentary (GC IV), p. 47 (emphasis provided). At page 46, the ICRC Commentary lists further limitations to the granting of protected person status. On the territory of belligerent States, protection is accorded under Article 4 to "all persons of foreign nationality and to persons without any nationality," but the following are excluded:
(1) Nationals of a State which is not bound by the Convention;
(2) Nationals of a neutral or co-belligerent State, so long as the State in question has normal diplomatic representation in the State in whose territory they are;
(3) Persons covered by the definition given above [...] who enjoy protection under one of the other three Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949.
In occupied territories, protection is accorded to "all persons who are not of the nationality of the occupying State," but the following are excluded:
(1) Nationals of a State which is not party to the Convention;
(2) Nationals of a co-belligerent State, so long as the State in question has normal diplomatic representation in the occupying State;
(3) Persons covered by the definition given above [...] who enjoy protection under one of the three other Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949.

[648] Article 3, Statute.

> (1) Persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without any adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria.
>
> To this end, the following acts are and shall remain prohibited at any time and in any place whatsoever with respect to the above-mentioned persons:
>
> (a) violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture;
> (b) taking of hostages;
> (c) outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment; F...g.[649]

420. Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions is intended to provide minimum guarantees of protection to persons who are in the middle of an armed conflict but are not taking any active part in the hostilities. Its coverage extends to any individual not taking part in hostilities and is therefore broader than that envisioned by Geneva Convention IV incorporated into Article 2 of the Statute, under which "protected person" status is accorded only in specially defined and limited circumstances, such as the presence of the individual in territory which is under the control of the Power in question, and the exclusion of wounded and sick members of the armed forces from protected person status; while protected person status under Article 2 therefore involves not taking an active part in hostilities, it also comprises further requirements. As a result, Article 2 of the Statute is more specific than common Article 3. This conclusion is further confirmed by the fact that the Appeals Chamber has also stated that Article 3 of the Statute functions as a "residual clause designed to ensure that no serious violation of international humanitarian law is taken away from the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal."[650] Finally, common Article 3 is present in all four Geneva Conventions, and as a rule of customary international law, its substantive provisions are applicable to internal and international conflicts alike.[651]

421. Applying the provisions of the test articulated above, the first issue is whether each applicable provision contains a materially distinct legal element not present in the other, bearing

[650] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 91.

[651] See Nicaragua, para 218 ("Article 3 which is common to all four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 defines certain rules to be applied in the armed conflicts of a non-international character. There is no doubt that, in the event of international armed conflicts, these rules also constitute a minimum yardstick, in addition to the more elaborate rules which are also to apply to international conflicts; and they are rules which, in the Court's opinion, reflect what the Court in 1949 called elementary considerations of humanity").

in mind that an element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact required by the other.[652]

422. The first pair of double convictions concerned are "wilful killing" under Article 2 and "murder" under Article 3. Wilful killing as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions (Article 2) consists of the following elements:

a. death of the victim as the result of the action(s) of the accused,
b. who intended to cause death or serious bodily injury which, as it is reasonable to assume, he had to understand was likely to lead to death,[653]
c. and which he committed against a protected person.

423. Murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war (Article 3) consists of the following elements:

a. death of the victim as a result of an act of the accused
b. committed with the intention to cause death[654]
c. and against a person taking no active part in the hostilities.

The definition of wilful killing under Article 2 contains a materially distinct element not present in the definition of murder under Article 3: the requirement that the victim be a protected person. This requirement necessitates proof of a fact not required by the elements of murder, because the definition of a protected person includes, yet goes beyond what is meant by an individual taking no active part in the hostilities. However, the definition of murder under Article 3 does not contain an element requiring proof of a fact not required by the elements of wilful killing under Article 2. Therefore, the first prong of the test is not satisfied, and it is necessary to apply the second prong. Because wilful killing under Article 2 contains an additional element and therefore more specifically applies to the situation at hand, the Article 2 conviction must be upheld, and the Article 3 conviction dismissed.

[652] It should also be borne in mind that Article 2 applies to international conflicts, while Article 3 applies to both internal and international conflicts. However, this potentially distinguishing element does not come into play here, because the conflict at issue has been characterised as international as well. See discussion above, at para 50, on this point. In addition, both Articles 2 and 3 require a nexus between the crimes alleged and the armed conflict.

[653] Blaskić Judgement, para 153.

[654] Jelisić Judgement, para 35; Blaskić Judgement, para 181.

424. The second pair of double convictions at issue are "wilfully causing great sufferi serious injury to body or health" under Article 2, and "cruel treatment" under Article 3. The former is defined as a. an intentional act or omission consisting of causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, including mental health,[655]

b. committed against a protected person.

Cruel treatment as a violation of the laws or customs of war is a. an intentional act or omission [...] which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity,[656]

b. committed against a person taking no active part in the hostilities.

The offence of wilfully causing great suffering under Article 2 contains an element not present in the offence of cruel treatment under Article 3: the protected person status of the victim. Because protected persons necessarily constitute individuals who are not taking an active part in the hostilities, the definition of cruel treatment does not contain a materially distinct element—that is, it does not require proof of a fact that is not required by its counterpart. As a result, the first prong of the test is not satisfied, and it thus becomes necessary to apply the second prong of the test. Because wilfully causing great suffering under Article 2 contains an additional element and more specifically applies to the situation at hand, that conviction must be upheld, and the Article 3 conviction must be dismissed.

425. The third pair of double convictions at issue are torture under Article 2 and torture under Article 3. Because the term itself is identical under both provisions, the sole distinguishing element stems from the protected person requirement under Article 2. As a result, torture under Article 2 contains an element requiring proof of a fact not required by torture under Article 3, but the reverse is not the case, and so the first prong of the test is not satisfied. Again, it becomes necessary to apply the second prong of the test. Because torture under Article 2 contains an additional element that is required for a conviction to be entered, that conviction must be upheld, and the Article 3 conviction must be dismissed.

[656] Jelisi} Judgement, para 41; Trial Judgement, para 552; Blaskić Judgement, para 186.

426. The final pair of double convictions at issue are "inhuman treatment" under Artic[1] and "cruel treatment" under Article 3. Cruel treatment is defined above.[657] Inhuman treatment is

a. an intentional act or omission, that is an act which, judged objectively, is deliberate and not accidental, which causes serious mental harm or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity,[658]

b. committed against a protected person.

Again, the sole distinguishing element stems from the protected person requirement under Article 2. By contrast, cruel treatment under Article 3 does not require proof of a fact not required by its counterpart. Hence the first prong of the test is not satisfied, and applying the second prong, the Article 3 conviction must be dismissed.

B. Conclusion

427. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that, of the double convictions entered by the Trial Chamber, only the Article 2 convictions must be upheld, and the Article 3 convictions must be dismissed.

C. Impact on Sentencing

428. If, on application of the first prong of the above test, a decision is reached to cumulatively convict for the same conduct, a Trial Chamber must consider the impact that this will have on sentencing. In the past, before both this Tribunal and the ICTR, convictions for multiple offences have resulted in the imposition of distinct terms of imprisonment, ordered to run concurrently.[661]

429. It is within a Trial Chamber's discretion to impose sentences which are either global, concurrent or consecutive, or a mixture of concurrent and consecutive.[662] In terms of the final sentence imposed, however, the governing criteria is that it should reflect the totality of the culpable conduct (the 'totality' principle),[663] or generally, that it should reflect the gravity of the offences and the culpability of the offender so that it is both just and appropriate.

[661] Such sentences have been confirmed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement and the Furund'ija Appeal Judgement.

[662] See also Rule 101(C) of the Rules: "The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently."

[663] "The effect of the totality principle is to require a sentencer who has passed a series of sentences, each properly calculated in relation to the offence for which it is imposed and each properly made consecutive in accordance with the principles governing consecutive sentences, to review the aggregate sentence and consider whether the aggregate is 'just and appropriate.' (footnote omitted) D.A. Thomas, Principles of Sentencing (Heinemann: London, 1980), p 56; See also R v Bocskei (1970) 54 Cr. App. R. 519, at 521: "[...] when consecutive sentences are imposed the final duty of the sentencer is to make sure that the totality of the consecutive sentences is not excessive." Section 28(2)(b) Criminal Justice Act 1991 preserves this principle. It applies in all cases where consecutive sentences are imposed, e.g., R v Reeves, 2 Cr. App. R (S) 35, CA; R v Jones, [1996] 1 Ar. App.R (S) 153; In Canada see e.g., R v M (CA), [1996] 1 SCR 500: "the global sentence imposed should reflect the overall

430. Therefore, the overarching goal in sentencing must be to ensure that the final aggregate sentence reflects the totality of the criminal conduct and overall culpability of the offender. This can be achieved through either the imposition of one sentence in respect of all offences, or several sentences ordered to run concurrently, consecutively or both. The decision as to how this should be achieved lies within the discretion of the Trial Chamber.

431. Of the double convictions imposed on the accused in this case, only the Article 2 convictions have been upheld; the Article 3 convictions have been dismissed. The Appeals Chamber acknowledges that if the Trial Chamber had not imposed double convictions, a different outcome in terms of the length and manner of sentencing, might have resulted. Because this is a matter that lies within the discretion of the Trial Chamber, this Chamber remits the issue of sentencing to a Trial Chamber to be designated by the President of the Tribunal.

VII. DELIĆ GROUNDS OF APPEAL ALLEGING ERRORS OF FACT

A. Introduction

433. Delić has filed two grounds of appeal in relation to each of the convictions which he has challenged. The first is that the evidence was not what was described as legally sufficient to sustain the convictions; the second is that the evidence was not what was described as factually sufficient to sustain the convictions.

434. The issue as to whether there is a legal basis to sustain a conviction usually arises at the close of the Prosecution case at trial, a situation now covered by Rule 98*bis*(B),[664] following the earlier practice of seeking a judgement of acquittal upon the basis that, in relation to one or more charges, there is no case to answer. The test applied is whether there is evidence (if accepted) upon which a reasonable tribunal of fact could be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused on the particular charge in question.[665] In the present case, the Trial Chamber ruled that there was a case to answer,[666] and there was no appeal from that decision. The test to be applied in relation to the issue as to whether the evidence is factually sufficient to sustain a conviction is whether the conclusion of guilt beyond reasonable doubt is one which no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached.[667]

435. If an appellant is not able to establish that the Trial Chamber's conclusion of guilt beyond reasonable doubt was one which no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached, it follows that there must have been evidence upon which such a tribunal could have been satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of that guilt. Under those circumstances, the latter test of legal sufficiency is therefore redundant, and the appeal must be dismissed. Similarly, if an appellant is able to establish that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached a conclusion of guilt upon the evidence before it, the appeal against conviction must be allowed and a judgement of acquittal entered. In such a situation it is unnecessary for an appellate court to determine whether there was evidence (if accepted) upon which such a tribunal could reached such a conclusion.

[664] Rule 98*bis*(B) provides: "The Trial Chamber shall order the entry of judgement of acquittal on motion of an accused or proprio motu if it finds that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction on that or those charges".

[665] The jurisprudence of the Tribunal in relation to Rule 98*bis*(B) and the earlier practice was recently reviewed in Prosecutor v Kunarac, Case No IT-96-23-T, Decision on Motion for Acquittal, 3 July 2000, at paras 2-10.

436. The Appeals Chamber intends, therefore, to consider only the issue as to whether the evidence was factually sufficient to sustain the conviction, in the sense already stated.

437. Delić also argues in relation to a number of these grounds that the Prosecution has failed to show (1) that the victim was a protected person under the Geneva Conventions and (2) that common Article 3 provides for individual international criminal liability as a matter of customary international law.[668] These two matters, which raise questions of whether the Trial Chamber committed an error of law, have been addressed by the Appeals Chamber elsewhere in this Judgement. The present consideration is limited to whether the Trial Chamber committed any error of fact.

B. Issues 9 and 10: Convictions under Counts 1 and 2

438. Counts 1 and 2 related to killing of one Šćepo Gotovac ("Gotovac") in the Čelebići prison camp late in June 1992. The appellants Delić and Landžo were alleged, with others, to have beaten Gotovac for an extended period of time and to have nailed an SDA badge to his forehead. Gotovac is said to have died soon after from the resulting injuries. Count 1 charged the two accused with a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions (wilful killing); Count 2 charged them with a violation of the laws or customs of war (murder).

439. The Trial Chamber found that Delić and Landžo approached Gotovac, who sat near to the door inside hangar 6, and that Delić accused him of having killed two Muslims in 1942. He also referred to some old enmity between their families, and he told Gotovac that he should not hope to remain alive. When Gotovac denied these allegations, Delić started to beat him. Gotovac was taken outside the hangar, and the sound of blows and his moaning could be heard inside the hangar. After some time, he was dragged into the hangar.[669] All of these findings were clearly open to the Trial Chamber on the evidence.

440. The Trial Chamber also found that Gotovac was again taken out of the hangar a few hours later, and that both Delić and Landžo again administered a severe beating. A metal badge was pinned to his head, and Landžo threatened the rest of the detainees in the hangar that he would kill anyone who dared to remove it. As a consequence of this second beating, the Trial Chamber found, Gotovac died in the hangar some time later.[670]

[668] Delić Brief, para 303.

441. The limitation of the finding that Gotovac's death resulted from the second of those beatings is vital to the resolution of these grounds of appeal, the issue being whether a reasonable tribunal of fact could have concluded that Delić participated in the second beating. It was very properly conceded by the Prosecution that there was no finding by the Trial Chamber that there was any causal connection between Gotovac's death and the first beating, and that the evidence was not such as to establish such a connection as the only reasonable conclusion available.[671]

442. No witness gave evidence of having actually seen Delić involved in this second beating, but the Trial Chamber effectively concluded that he was involved, its finding being based on circumstantial evidence. The Trial Chamber stated that, in view of what the witnesses had seen and heard inside the hangar, it could reasonably be said that they were in a position to know what was happening outside.[672] The Trial Chamber went on to say that, when everything which had been seen and heard inside the hangar was considered together, there was no room for doubt that Delić and Landžo "participated" in the beating which resulted in the death of the victim.[673]

443. The only circumstance upon which the Trial Chamber explicitly relied which specifically identified Delić was the threat which he made before the earlier beating that Gotovac should not hope to remain alive, and his involvement in that earlier beating. Those findings which were clearly open to the Trial Chamber on the evidence. The remaining circumstances upon which the Trial Chamber explicitly relied were that Gotovac was brought back into the hangar in a poor condition, he was taken out again later the same day, the sounds of blows and the moans and cries of Gotovac could be heard, he was carried back into the hangar after a short time with the metal badge stuck on his forehead, Landžo's threat that anyone who removed the badge would be similarly treated, and the discovery the next morning that Gotovac had died.[674] None of these additional circumstances were disputed in Delić's appeal.

444. There was also evidence from Landžo that he had been asked by Delić (and by Muc[illegible] to kill Gotovac, but this evidence was rejected by the Trial Chamber on the basis that Landžo was an unreliable witness.[675] The evidence which Landžo gave was that others were involved with him in the second beating, but he did not suggest that Delić was ever present at the second beating.[676]

445. A number of detainees called by the Prosecution gave evidence of the circumstances surrounding the beatings of Šćepo Gotovac, and this evidence must be examined briefly to see whether it provides any basis for a finding that Delić had participated in the second beating.

446. Branko Gotovac (no relation) gave evidence of having seen Šćepo Gotovac taken outside the hangar and beaten "several times".[677] However, when the witness was asked to give details of what he saw, he was able to describe no more than what (by reference to all the other evidence) could only have been the first beating.[678] During cross-examination,[679] he said that he saw Šćepo Gotovac –

> [...] when two of them brought him in. He was like dead [...] and soon thereafter he was dead.

This may have been a reference to the second beating, but this was never made clear. Nor was the witness asked to identify the "two of them" were who brought Šćepo Gotovac in.

447. Witness F gave evidence that he did not know who called Gotovac out on the second occasion, and he was not asked who brought him back.[680] He did not suggest that Delić was present on this second occasion, and he was not asked whether he was. Stevan Gligorević described Gotovac being beaten twice, but he was able to identify only Landžo as having called him out on both occasions. He also made no reference to any participation by Delić in the beatings.[681] Witness N said that Delić had beaten Gotovac "several times" inside the hangar, but he then goes on to describe the events surrounding what (by reference to all the other evidence) could only have been what has been called the second beating outside the hangar, and he identified only Landžo as having been involved in those circumstances.[682] When asked who else was in the area who could have seen Gotovac being taken out and beaten, he did suggest that Delić had been there.[683]

448. Dragan Kuljanin gave evidence of Gotovac being called out several times by the guards, but he said that he did not know the names of the guards who did so.[684] He did not see the beating himself.[685] He made no reference to any participation by Delić in the second beating. Mirko Đorđić said that it was Landžo who called Gotovac out of the hangar on the second occasion, and that it was Landžo who ordered some prisoners to carry Gotovac out.[686] He did not suggest that Delić had participated in the second beating.

449. Branko Sudar gave evidence in relation to both beatings. He firmly identified Delić as having participated in the first of them.[687] He said that it was Landžo who took Gotovac out for the second beating.[688] In cross-examination, he repeated the evidence which he had given, apparently in relation to the first beating without nominating the occasion as such,[689] but the Prosecution asked no questions which may have led to a change in the only reasonable conclusion from his evidence, that he was in fact still speaking of the first occasion only. Risto Vukalo described both beatings. Of the second beating, he identified only Landžo as being involved – as having called Gotovac out and as having ordered two of the detainees to bring him back inside the hangar.[690] Witness R described the threat made by Delić as having occurred on a quite separate occasion from any beating. In relation to the one beating which he saw, which (by reference to all the other evidence) could only have been the second, Witness R identified only Landžo as having been involved.[691]

450. None of the detainees so far discussed supported the Prosecution case that Delić participated in the second beating which caused the death of Gotovac. There were three other detainees upon whose evidence some reliance was placed in the appeal.

451. Witness B gave evidence of the threat made by Delić to Gotovac, that he should not hope to leave alive.[692] He referred to the first beating as having occurred the same evening, without identifying who was involved in it.[693] He said that he thought that the second beat occurred the next evening, and said:

> He was called out again outside, at night fall. I remember Zenga, Esad Landžo. He came in. He came into the hangar. I think that Delić was near the door, outside. He didn't want to go out. He was – and then two other prisoners were ordered to help him get up and push him out, outside the door. This was right next to me in the hangar. They started beating him and by the number of blows, the movements and everything we could hear, there must have been a large group of people, several people.[694]

The "he" who did not want to go out was clearly Gotovac. Witness B was not asked to identify who "they" were who started beating Gotovac. He later described the threat by Landžo concerning the badge on Gotovac's forehead.[695]

452. The Prosecution argued that the sentence "I think that Delić was near the door, outside" should be interpreted as expressing doubt not as to whether Delić was there at the time of the second beating, but only as to where he was standing.[696] Such an argument would have greater force if Witness B had elsewhere in his evidence identified Delić as having been present, but he did not do so. The presence of Delić during the second beating was a vital piece of evidence linking him to that beating. It is the obligation of the Prosecution to ensure that its vital evidence is clear and unambiguous. An accused person should not be convicted upon the basis of a verbal ambiguity in that vital evidence. This sentence of Witness B's evidence, read literally, expresses some doubt as to whether Delić was present, not merely as to where he was standing. Where a Prosecution witness whose evidence is vital is able to clarify any ambiguity in that evidence, and where the Prosecution does not seek to have the witness do so, the inference is available that it did not do so because the evidence would not have assisted the Prosecution case. That is not to say that such an inference ought always to be drawn against the Prosecution, but its mere availability tends to render unsafe any resolution of the ambiguity in favour of the Prosecution.

453. Rajko Draganić described Delić and Landžo as beating Gotovac on the first occasion.[697] In relation to what may have been either the first or the second beating (the evidence is ambiguous), he said:[698]

> [...] and that Delić said, Zenga [Landžo], I do not know exactly, he said two people should come and carry him inside.

It is clear from this evidence that the witness was unable to say which of the two accused had requested the assistance upon whichever occasion it was. Insofar as this uncertainty may suggest that Delić was present at the second beating, and that the only uncertainty related to which of the accused had requested assistance, the same ambiguity exists as in relation to the last witness. It is perhaps significant that, when the Trial Chamber identified the details of the circumstantial case upon which it relied to find beyond reasonable doubt that Delić participated in the second beating, it did not include any direct evidence that Delić was present in the area when the second beating took place.[699]

454. Mirko Babić gave evidence that Delić had come to the door of the hangar with Landžo, that he had threatened Gotovac that he would be killed and that Delić was one of three men who had taken Gotovac out of the hangar for the first beating.[700] He then said that, an hour or so later, Delić again came to the door of the hangar, with Landžo, that Gotovac was "told the same thing as the first time", and that Delić had put a knife "next" to Gotovac when they took him out and beat him again.[701] In cross-examination, Babić asserted that he had been an eyewitness to these events.[702] This was the only evidence in the case which unambiguously involved Delić in the events leading to and following the second beating. If accepted, it would lead to the inevitable conclusion that Delić had participated in that beating – either as one of those who inflicted the beating personally, or as an accessory aiding and abetting it.

455. On appeal, Delić pointed out that, in relation to charges of torture and cruel treatment of Mirko Babić by Landžo and himself,[703] the Trial Chamber did not consider the unsupported evidence of Babić of the mistreatment which he alleged that he had received to be "wholly reliable".[704] Delić argued, therefore, that the evidence which Babić gave in support of the counts presently under consideration was "also insufficient to support a factual finding that [he] participated in the fatal beating" alleged in those counts, particularly as no one else gave evidence of having seen him there.[705] The Prosecution responded that a finding that Babić's evidence in relation to another incident was not "wholly reliable" does not amount to a conclusion that Babić was a completely unreliable witness who could not be believed in any circumstances.[706]

456. In the circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the "fine distinction" which the Prosecution sought to draw between not being satisfied beyond reasonable doubt as to the reliability of a witness's evidence and a finding that the witness was lying.[707] The nature of the evidence which Babić gave in support of the torture and cruel treatment charges was of such a nature that, if true, it established those charges beyond reasonable doubt. It was not just the absence of supporting evidence which led to the acquittal on those charges. There was a wealth of evidence which demonstrated that Babić was lying in relation to them, including evidence that the injuries which he alleged had resulted from the mistreatment (which included having his leg doused in petrol and set alight) had occurred sometime prior to his detention at the Čelebići prison camp.[708]

457. But this debate concerning the evidence of Babić does not need to be resolved in this appeal, as it is apparent from the judgement itself that the Trial Chamber did not rely upon it. As already stated, the Trial Chamber did not include in the circumstantial case upon which it relied in finding beyond reasonable doubt that Delić participated in the second beating any direct evidence that Delić was present in the area when the second beating took place. If the evidence of Babić that Delić was present had been accepted, it was of such a vital nature that it would inevitably have been included in the statement of the circumstances relied on. Its absence from that statement demonstrates that the Trial Chamber did not accept that evidence, and that it did not interpret the evidence of either Witness B or Rajko Dragonić as demonstrating that Delić was present on the occasion of the second beating.

458. A circumstantial case consists of evidence of a number of different circumstances which, taken in combination, point to the guilt of the accused person because they would usually exist in combination only because the accused did what is alleged against him – here that he participated in the second beating of Gotovac. Such a conclusion must be established beyond reasonable doubt. It is not sufficient that it is a reasonable conclusion available from that evidence. It must be the only reasonable conclusion available. If there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from that evidence, and which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, he must be acquitted.

459. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that, without some acceptable evidence that Delić was present at the time of the second beating, no reasonable tribunal of fact could be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Delić participated in the second beating from the circumstances identified by the Trial Chamber in this case. The enmity between Delić and Gotovac, his threat to Gotovac that he would be killed, and his participation in the earlier (and separate) beating do not, even in combination, eliminate the reasonable possibility that he was not there at the time. Such a possibility arises from the absence of any acceptable evidence from any of the many witnesses who were present that Delić was also present. No finding that he participated in the second beating was therefore available.

460. The conviction of Delić on Counts 1 and 2 must accordingly be quashed, and a judgement of acquittal entered on both counts.

C. Issues 11 and 12: Convictions Under Counts 3 and 4

461. Delić was convicted under Counts 3 and 4 of the Indictment for a grave breach of the Geneva Convention (wilful killing) and with a violation of the laws or customs of war (murder) in respect of the death of Željko Milošević ("Milošević"). It was alleged that Delić selected Milošević from Tunnel 9 where he was detained and brought him outside where Delić and others severely beat him, and that, by the following morning, Milošević had died from his injuries.

462. The Trial Chamber found that Delić had inflicted numerous beatings on Milošević while he was detained in the camp. Prior to his death, journalists had visited the camp and Milošević had been taken out by Delić to make "confessions" in front of them, which Milošević refused to do. After that incident, Delić called Milošević out of the tunnel at night, and then beat him severely for a period of at least an hour, such that his screaming and moaning could be heard by the detainees inside the tunnel. The dead body of Milošević was seen outside the tunnel the next morning. The Trial Chamber found that the beating inflicted on this occasion caused the death of Milošević.[709]

[709] Trial Judgement, paras 832 and 833.

463. In challenging his conviction under these counts, Delić contends that only [illegible] witnesses, Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić, testified to direct knowledge of Delić's involvement in the beating to death of Milošević, that their testimony is incredible as their versions of the incident are inconsistent and that their testimony as to events leading up to the death of Milošević conflicts with the testimony of other Prosecution witnesses.[710]

464. The Prosecution argues that the fact that the witnesses did not see the beating which occasioned the victim's death is not of itself a basis for concluding that there was an error of fact. It is contended that the Trial Chamber found that the witnesses were able to confirm that Delić administered the fatal beating and that none of the inconsistencies referred to by Delić establish that this finding was unreasonable.[711]

465. Regarding its findings as to the events leading up to the death of Milošević, the Trial Chamber relied upon the testimony of two witnesses, Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić. The Trial Chamber described Novica Đorđić as having testified that he was situated only a very short distance from the door of Tunnel 9, from where he was in a position to see and hear what was going on outside the door when it was open. He conceded that he did not see the final beating as the door of Tunnel 9 was closed, but that he heard Delić calling Milošević out of the tunnel, a discussion, beatings and finally a shot. Milošević did not return to Tunnel 9 that night.[712]

466. The Trial Chamber held that the testimony of Novica Đorđić was supported by that of Milenko Kuljanin. It described Milenko Kuljanin as testifying that Delić called Milošević and personally took him out of Tunnel 9. He then heard the victim screaming, moaning and crying out for over an hour, indicating the severity of the beating inflicted upon him.

467. The Trial Chamber stated that the following morning the motionless body of Milošević was observed by a number of Prosecution witnesses, including Novica Đorđić, Milenko Kuljanin and Witness J, lying "near the place where [the prisoners] were taken to urinate".[713] The Trial Chamber found that, although there were "some variations between the testimony provided by the witnesses to these events, the fundamental features of this testimony, a[illegible] relates to Željko Milošević's last evening of life, are consistent and credible".[714]

468. Delić submits that the inconsistencies between the testimony of Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić were "so great that they are unreliable and they cannot be used to establish the facts and reach a judgement".[715] As indicated above, the Trial Chamber did accept that there were some variations in the witnesses' testimony but did not identify specifically what these were. The Appeals Chamber will consider whether the matters referred to by Delić were in fact inconsistencies in the evidence and then consider whether any effect they may have had on the evidence on these counts referred to the Trial Chamber when taken as a whole was such as to make it unreasonable to find that the "fundamental features" of the testimony were sufficiently consistent and credible to justify a finding of guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

469. The first inconsistency identified by Delić relates to the manner in which Milošević was removed from Tunnel 9. Milenko Kuljanin testified that Delić called Milošević and personally took him out of Tunnel 9 but that, according to Novica Đorđić, Milošević left the tunnel upon the call of Delić's voice; he made no mention of Delić taking Milošević out personally.

470. Milenko Kuljanin testified that prior to Milošević's death, journalists had visited the prison-camp and Milošević was taken out of Tunnel 9 by Delić and asked to make "confessions" in front of these journalists, which he refused to do.[716] Milenko Kuljanin's evidence as to what followed was that:

> Delić returned [Milošević and another detainee Rajko Đorđić] to tunnel number nine, from which they had come, and when the journalists had left, he entered the tunnel again and said that they would remember him well. Zeljko [Milošević], however, remained for another couple of days in the tunnel. Delić then came and told him to get ready around 1 pm. Then Deli} came and called Milošević. I cannot say exactly when he came. It was night. It was perhaps midnight or 2 o'clock am. It was pitch dark. He took Zeljko out personally. He called him to come out and took him out. After they had gone out, we heard Zeljko screaming and moaning and crying out. In the morning when they took us out to go to the toilet, Zeljko Milošević was behind the door lying there dead.[717]

Novica Đorđić testified that:

> And indeed, as Hazim had said, that night -- I don't know what time it was -- his voice could be heard outside building Number 9 and he called out Zjelko Milošević. Zjelko went out. The door was closed behind him. We heard talk, but this time it was a bit further away from > the entrance, so we couldn't understand as well as the previous days when it was just outside the door, but we heard the discussion, later beatings and finally a bullet.[718]

471. There is a difference in the accounts: Novica Đorđić testified only that Delić's voice could be heard outside the tunnel and that he "called out" Milošević, who "went out", and Kuljanin stating that Delić "took him [Milošević] out personally." It is not possible to understand this as a loose way of saying that he called Milošević out personally in light of his further evidence: "He called him to come out and took him out. After they had gone out [...]". There is thus a difference in the evidence as to whether Delić came into the tunnel or simply called Milošević from outside. It is apparent that the Trial Chamber found only that Delić had called Milošević out, relying on the fact that the two witnesses had recognised his voice, and did not rely on Milenko Kuljanin's evidence relating to Delić having also personally taken him out. The only relevance of the inconsistency would therefore be as to Kuljanin's credit, which the Appeals Chamber will consider in the context of the other inconsistencies alleged by Delić.

472. The second inconsistency referred to is that, following the sound of beating and screaming, to which the witnesses testified, Novica Đorđić heard a "bullet".[719] Milenko Kuljanin did not testify to hearing any shot. Again, the Trial Chamber, having found Milošević died from the beating inflicted upon him (to which both witnesses testified), did not rely on the evidence as to the sound of a shot and the only relevance of the matter could be to the credibility of the witnesses.

473. Delić submits that the evidence of Kuljanin and Delić as to the location of Milošević's body on the day following the beating was inconsistent with that of Witness J. Kuljanin gave evidence that:

> In the morning when they took us out to go to the toilet, Zeljko Milošević was behind the door lying there dead.[720]

And then, in response to questioning:

> Q. You say that in the morning, going to the toilet outside you saw the body outside of the tunnel entrance. Did you see the body, both going to the toilet and coming back from the toilet?
>
> A. Yes, it was there on our way and when we were coming back to the tunnel, both times.[721]

Novica Đorđić testified that:

> In the morning – I think it was very early – we were taken out in groups of five or six to the toilet or rather the hole, and when I went out right next to the hole on the northern side of the hole was Zjelko Milošević's corpse covered with some kind of rag or tee-shirt over his forehead with a large blood stain.[722]

474. Delić points out that the Trial Chamber erred when saying that Milenko Kuljanin saw the dead body "near the place where they were taken to urinate"[723] as the witness testified that he saw the body behind or outside the door of Tunnel 9. Although the Trial Chamber's description of Milenko Kuljanin's testimony appears on its face to be slightly inaccurate, as he testified that he saw the body lying behind the door of Tunnel 9,[724] this inaccuracy, and the alleged inconsistency between the witnesses' testimony as to the location at which the body was found are more apparent than real, when the evidence is taken in context. It appears from the evidence that the hole where the prisoners were taken to urinate was in fairly close proximity to Tunnel 9 and that the area outside the tunnel entrance or door was close enough to where the prisoners were taken to urinate that witnesses referring to the locations by the different descriptions could reasonably be referring to essentially the same place. When asked to describe where the hole was and where the body of Milošević had been found, Novica Đorđić responded that:

> The hole was just here, somewhere in the middle of Tunnel Number 9. You pass this small concrete wall and it was just here. The body was right next to the hole.[725]

And in cross-examination, when asked again about the location of the body, the following interchange took place:

> Q. Point again where you saw the corpse?
>
> A. (Indicating) Here next to a hole that was dug in as a toilet. He was right next to it in the middle here.
>
> Q. So all of that occurred behind Tunnel 9?
>
> A. Somewhere behind the entrance, yes.[726]

This witness therefore considered that the relevant location could be described as both "next to the hole" and "behind the entrance" to Tunnel 9.

475. This understanding appears to have been shared by Witness J, who described the location at which he saw Milošević's body as being:

> [...] close to this local [sic] which we used to relieve ourselves, we were taken out there. When we were taken there to urinate, we all saw him lying there next to the hole, lying dead and all of us could see him, all the detainees could see him.[727]

When asked again where he had seen Milošević's body, he later elaborated, making indications on a plan of the camp, that it was behind Tunnel 9:

> This was the pit where we went to the toilet and his body was lying next to it. This is also behind number 9. If this is number 9, it would be up here, around this area. I know that it was not far.[728]

The Appeals Chamber therefore regards the evidence as to the location of Milošević's body on the morning following his beating as fully supporting the Trial Chamber's finding.

476. Delić also argues that the testimony of Witness J that the body of Milošević was all yellow is inconsistent with that of the two other witnesses who said that his head was covered with some kind of garment stained with blood.[729] The Appeals Chamber considers that there is no necessary inconsistency between these accounts, as it is quite plausible that the skin on those parts of Milošević's body which were visible, was yellow perhaps from ill health, but that he also had a head injury which was indicated by the fact that his head was fully or partly covered with a blood stained cloth.

477. Delić alleges that there is an inconsistency in the evidence as to when the incident occurred, as Novica Đorđić and Milenko Kuljanin "did not agree on the date that the alleged events occurred".[730] Although Milenko Kuljanin was not able to recall precisely the time of the killing in terms of dates in time,[731] he was able to situate it by reference to other events. His evidence, that it followed shortly after the visit of the journalists,[732] is in no way contradicted by Novica Đorđić and Witness J, who did not give specific evidence as to the date on which the fatal beating occurred.

So I cannot say exactly. Possibly, it was the end of June or July, but his killing took place after Šlavko Susić's incident".
[732] Trial Transcript, p 5481.

478. Delić contends further that Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić's testimony relating to the death of another detainee, Slavko Šusić, which is similar to that given in relation to the death of Milošević, was rejected by the Trial Chamber. In relation to the evidence of Novica Đorđić, it is not apparent from the Trial Judgement that the Trial Chamber rejected his evidence. It referred to his evidence that he had seen Delić and Landžo take Slavko Šusić out of Tunnel 9, that he had seen Šusić pushed back in a long time later, and that he had died shortly afterwards. The Trial Chamber appeared to accept, rather than to reject it.[733] The fact that the Trial Chamber did not find that Delić and Landžo were responsible for the death of Šusić was not because it disbelieved the witnesses, but because none of them gave sufficient evidence to establish that by the beating Delić and Landžo were responsible for his death. The Trial Chamber did accept that the evidence established that Delić and Landžo had severely beaten Šusić, and on that basis entered convictions for wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health and cruel treatment.[734]

479. Milenko Kuljanin's testimony in regard to the killing of Slavko Šusić was that, from his position in the Tunnel, he had been able to see Šusić being mistreated in various ways outside the tunnel door, which was open. This was not accepted by the Trial Chamber, on the basis that it "was not convinced that from this location he would have been able to have a clear sight of the mistreatment meted out to Slavko Šusić".[735] It also observed that not all of his evidence was consistent with other witnesses' testimony, but not because of any inherent problem with his credibility which would affect his evidence in relation to all other matters on which he gave evidence.[736] The Appeals Chamber is of the view that it was open to the Trial Chamber, having examined Milenko Kuljanin's testimony in the context of the whole of the evidence in relation to the counts relating to Milošević, to accept that evidence even though it did not rely on his evidence in relation to other matters for reasons specific to those matters.

480. The Trial Chamber also relied upon evidence as to beatings to which Delić had subjected Milošević during his detention at the camp which, in combination with evidence as to certain statements made by Delić shortly before the fatal beating of Milošević, demonstrated Delić's intention at least to inflict serious bodily injury upon him. Upon the evidence presented by numerous Prosecution witnesses,[737] the Trial Chamber found that Milošević was subj by Delić and sometimes Landžo to a series of beatings and other abuses prior to the fatal incident. All were either inside Tunnel 9 or outside its entrance and could in general be seen as well as heard by the prisoners in the tunnel.[738]

[733] Trial Judgement, para 863.
[734] Trial Judgement para 866.

481. Delić argues that there is an inconsistency in the evidence in relation to these beatings as the Prosecution witness Assa'ad Harraz, one of the journalists who came that day to the camp, denied that detainees were beaten in the presence of the journalists as Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić testified. The Trial Chamber did not refer to the testimony of Assa'ad Harraz in the Judgement in reaching its findings on this issue, but there is no indication that the Trial Chamber did not weigh all the evidence that was presented to it. A Trial Chamber is not required to articulate in its judgement every step of its reasoning in reaching particular findings. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that it was open to the Trial Chamber, which saw the witnesses give their testimony, to prefer the evidence of Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić insofar as any inconsistency arose with the testimony of Assa'ad Harraz.

482. More specifically, there was compelling evidence before the Trial Chamber that Delić had made specific threats to Milošević warning him that he would be coming for him on the evening on which he was killed. The Trial Chamber referred[739] to the testimony of Milenko Kuljanin that:

[737] Among the number of Prosecution witnesses relied upon by the Trial Chamber were Miro Golubović, Novica Đorđić, Milenko Kuljanin, Witness P, Risto Vukalo and Witness J. Trial Judgement para 830.

[738] Trial Judgement, para 830. Novica Đorđić testified in relation to the occasion on which Milošević was taken out in front of the journalists that "Zjelko Milošević was taken out in front of Tunnel Number 9. That means just in front of the door of Tunnel 9, so you can hear very well and see what's happening outside, if we were allowed to look. [...] In his case I remember a piece of cable was used, electrical cable which was about 2 cms thick and it had a steel wire inside this cable, and every time he was taken out, he was beaten very severely, and later led back in." Trial Transcript, pp 4173-4174. He stated at 4174-4175 that it was Delić who would call Milošević out. He confirmed at 4176 that the door to the tunnel was mostly open.

[740] Trial Transcript, p 5481.

He reiterated later in his evidence that Delić "...had actually forewarned him [Milošević] what was to come and told him to be ready at one, and that was what happened".[741] 4407

483. Although not specifically referred to by the Trial Chamber, Novica Đorđić also gave evidence of Delić's specific threats to Milošević:

> [...] the day before this night [of Milošević's death], Hazim Delić told him that that night at 1.00 am he would "go to the toilet". I beg your pardon for using the word "to piss".

It is reasonable to assume that the Trial Chamber was taking this evidence into account when making its findings as to the threats made by Delić to the victim which demonstrated an intent to cause at least very serious bodily injury to him.[743]

484. As to the inconsistencies in the evidence of the witnesses which Delić has alleged, the only two which the Appeals Chamber can regard as demonstrating genuine differences related to whether Delić called Milošević out of the tunnel or whether he also personally came in to take him out, and to whether there was a final gunshot. These must be considered in light of the significance of the matters on which the witnesses gave consistent evidence:

- During Milošević's detention in the prison-camp, he was singled out by Delić for frequent interrogation and was repeatedly beaten or otherwise mistreated by him, including outside the doors of Tunnel 9.
- Shortly prior to his death, Milošević was taken out of Tunnel 9 by Delić and, with another detainee, was asked to make confessions to visiting journalists which he refused to do. On this occasion too he was beaten.
- Some time after this incident, Delić threatened Milošević and told him specifically that he would come for him at one o'clock at night.
- At a time late at night, Delić came to Tunnel 9 and called out Milošević, spoke to him outside the door of Tunnel 9 and then the sounds of beating and the screams, cries and moans of Milošević could be heard for over an hour.
- The dead body of the victim was seen the following morning near the hole where the prisoners were taken to urinate, behind Tunnel 9.

[741] Trial Transcript, p 5483.
[742] Trial Transcript, pp 4177 and 4179.
[743] Trial Judgement, para 833.

In the face of this body of evidence, the Appeals Chamber does not believe it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to regard these inconsistencies as being of inadequate significance to undermine the fundamental features of the evidence.

485. As is clear from the above discussion, the other matters raised by Delić as undermining the credibility of the witnesses are not, in the view of the Appeals Chamber, of such a character as would require a reasonable Trial Chamber to reject their evidence. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that on the evidence before the Trial Chamber it was open to accept what it described as the "fundamental features" of the testimony.

486. Having made the findings set out above, it was reasonable to find that Delić had subjected Milošević to a prolonged and serious beating, that this beating had caused his death, and that it was inflicted with an intention to kill or at least to cause serious bodily injury. It was therefore not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to regard the totality of the evidence, when taken as a whole, as establishing beyond reasonable doubt Delić's guilt.

487. Delić's grounds of appeal relating to Counts 3 and 4 must accordingly be dismissed.

D. Issues 13 and 14: Convictions Under Counts 18 and 19

488. In Counts 18 and 19, Delić was found guilty of torture for the rape of Grozdana Ćećez (for the purposes of this section, "the victim").[744] It was found that the victim was taken to the Čelebići camp on 27 May 1992 and on her arrival was brought to a room in which Delić was waiting. She was interrogated by Delić, during the course of which he slapped her. She was then taken to another room with three men including Delić. Delić subsequently raped her.[745] It was found that these rapes constituted the offence of torture.[746]

489. Delić's principal argument centres on the victim's testimony, submitting that it was so weak and contradicted, that the Trial Chamber's conclusions were clearly wrong.[747] In particular, he refers to elements of her testimony which illustrate her unreliability because: (1) she failed to identify Delić properly;[748] (2) her own evidence was weak and contradictory when

[744] Specifically, Delić was found guilty of torture as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention IV (Article 2(b) of the Statute) and as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War (Article 3 of the Statute): Trial Judgement para 943.

given in relation to certain issues;[749] (3) her evidence contradicted evidence given by [illegible] witnesses, in particular Milojka Antić;[750] and (4) she was unable to recall certain events, illustrating what he describes as her "selective memory".[752]

490. As to the reliability of the testimony presented in relation to these counts, the Trial Chamber in general found:

> the testimony of Ms. Ćećez, and the supporting testimony of Witness D and Dr. Grubač, credible and compelling, and thus concludes that Ms. Ćećez was raped by Delić, and others, in the ^elebići prison-camp.[753]

491. The argument made under these grounds attacks the credibility and reliability of the main witness on whom the Trial Chamber relied to convict. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber was in the best position to hear, assess and weigh this testimony. It was accordingly for the Trial Chamber to consider whether the witness was reliable and her evidence credible. In such circumstances, the Appeals Chamber must always give a margin of deference to a Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence and findings of fact.[754] It is for Delić in these circumstances to demonstrate that this evidence could not reasonably have been accepted by any reasonable person, that the Trial Chamber's evaluation was wholly erroneous and that therefore the Appeals Chamber should substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber.[755]

492. Delić does not dispute the fact that the Rules do not require corroboration of a victim's testimony.[756] However, although the Trial Chamber also relied on additional testimony to support the principal account, the only direct evidence (and that disputed) in relation to the rapes carried out by Delić was that of the victim. Delić states that this testimony was not worthy of belief, due primarily to inconsistencies in the evidence which he claims illustrate its unreliability.

493. As to these alleged inconsistencies, Delić firstly alleges that the victim's identification of him as the person who raped him was suspect, as she could not identify him in a photograph array and was not asked to identify him directly in court.[757] The Trial Chamber found "Upon her arrival at the prison-camp she was taken [...] to a room where a man with a crutch was waiting, whom she subsequently identified as Delić".[758] The Appeals Chamber notes that the victim, having identified Delić at the start of her testimony as "the man with a crutch", confirmed this identification throughout her testimony,[759] while also referring to him by name.[760] The Appeals Chamber sees no reason to question the evaluation of this identification by the Trial Chamber.

494. Delić specifically points to the fact that the victim failed to identify Delić from a photograph array. The Appeals Chamber notes that when questioned as to her inability to identify Delić from the photographs, the victim replied: "I am not sure. All those pictures were of bald-ish men. So I didn't dare say which one. Maybe the man has changed. After all, I haven't seen him for five years. So I was not sure".[761]

495. The Appeals Chamber determines that it has no reason to find that the Trial Chamber erred in its findings as to the victim's identification of Delić. The Appeals Chamber notes that the victim identified Delić by name on several occasions throughout her testimony and continued to refer to him as such throughout.[762] In addition, although not a necessary requirement, the Appeals Chamber notes that there were corroborating accounts before the Trial Chamber of the fact that Delić was identified as using a crutch.[763] The simple fact that the [759] In testimony, she stated: "When I entered that room, it was a very small room. I saw a man with a crutch. There was a crutch next to him. His leg was bandaged". Trial Transcript p 491. She continued to refer to him as the "the man with the crutch", (e.g., Trial Transcript p 492, when asked who slapped her) and "[t]he one with the crutch" (e.g., Trial Transcript p 494, when asked who raped her). She then stated: "At that time I still did not know who he was but later I found out. Soon after that I found out who and what he was Hazim Delić" (Trial Transcript p 494).

[760] In particular, when asked again to confirm the identification, Grozdana Ćećez stated that although she did not know who Delić was when he raped her, she "learned shortly [after]. [ ] The women from Bradina had come, and somebody from the entrance was looking for Hazim Delić and he appeared, so I realised that he was the man. He was carrying a crutch and he was limping, so I knew straight away who he was". She further testified that she "saw him quite frequently", that he was there all the time and that she heard his name frequently (Trial Transcript pp 513-514, 517).

[763] Corroboration is not required either in general (see for example: Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 62: "the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not require, as a matter of law, any corroboration"); Tadić, Appeal Judgement, para 65, or in particular, in relation to testimony by victims of sexual assault. In any event, the testimony of other witnesses, although not expressly referred to by the Trial Chamber, did refer to the identifying feature that Deli} used a crutch. For example, Dr Grubač (Trial Transcript pp 5998-5999), whose testimony was relied upon by the Trial Chamber to convict on these counts, finding it also to be credible and compelling (Trial Judgement, para 939). He testified that: "A day after my arrival to Čelebići I met Hazim Delić.[...]. Knowing him I thought I could address him and I did, and I told him, 'here I am' [...]. At that time victim failed to identify him in a photograph array (or rather, as it appears to the Ap- Chamber, was too cautious to try to identify him), several years after the incident took place, does not suffice to illustrate fault on behalf of the Trial Chamber's overall appreciation of the evidence and treatment of identification.[764]

496. Delić also refers to certain inconsistencies in the victim's testimony, which he states illustrate that it was unreliable.[765] The Appeals Chamber notes that as an introduction to its consideration of the factual and legal findings, the Trial Chamber specifically discussed the nature of the evidence before it.[766] It found that often the testimony of witnesses who appear before it, consists of a "recounting of horrific acts"[767] and that often "recollection and articulation of such traumatic events is likely to invoke strong psychological and emotional reactions [...]. This may impair the ability of such witnesses to express themselves clearly or present a full account of their experiences in a judicial context".[768] In addition, it recognised the time which had lapsed since the events in question took place and the "difficulties in recollecting precise details several years after the fact, and the near impossibility of being able to recount them in exactly the same detail and manner on every occasion [...]."[769] The Trial Chamber further noted that inconsistency is a relevant factor "in judging weight but need not be, of [itself], a basis to find the whole of a witness' testimony unreliable".[770]

497. Accordingly, it acknowledged, as it was entitled to do, that the fact that a witness may forget or mix up small details is often as a result of trauma suffered and does not necessarily impugn his or her evidence given in relation to the central facts relating to the crime. With regard to these counts, the Trial Chamber, after seeing the victim, hearing her testimony (and he was carrying a crutch under his armpit. He said his leg had been injured; he was limping a little bit and using this crutch". See also the testimony of Mirko Dordič (Trial Transcript p 4718) and Dr Jusufbegović (Trial Transcript p 11963).

[764] See Furundžija Appeal Judgement, paras 103-107, where the Appeals Chamber agreed with the Trial Chamber finding that the identification of the accused by the victim in that case was satisfactory, because despite minor and reasonable inconsistencies in her identification, there was "in any event [...] other evidence of the Appellant's identity on the basis of which it would be reasonable for the Trial Chamber to be satisfied with the identification of the Appellant" (para 107).

[765] In particular, he refers to: her failure to recollect when she made corrections to a statement made to investigating magistrates in Yugoslavia; her failure to recall being interviewed on television; the fact that her testimony contradicted that of another witness, Milojka Antić, when she stated that she had given her contraceptive pills and that of her physician who stated that he did not recommend for her contraceptive pills.

that of the other witnesses) and observing her under cross-examination chose to accep[illegible] testimony as reliable. Clearly it did so bearing in mind its overall evaluation of the nature of the testimony being heard. Although the Trial Chamber made no reference in its findings to the alleged inconsistencies in the victim's testimony, which had been pointed out by Delić, it may nevertheless be assumed that it regarded them as immaterial to determining the primary question of Delić's perpetration of the rapes.[771] The Appeals Chamber can see no reason to find that in doing so it erred.

498. The Trial Chamber is not obliged in its Judgement to recount and justify its findings in relation to every submission made during trial. It was within its discretion to evaluate the inconsistencies highlighted and to consider whether the witness, when the testimony is taken as a whole, was reliable and whether the evidence was credible. Small inconsistencies cannot suffice to render the whole testimony unreliable. Delić has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in disregarding the alleged inconsistencies in its overall evaluation of the evidence as being compelling and credible, and in accepting the totality of the evidence as being sufficient to enter a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt on these grounds.[772]

499. Accordingly, these grounds of appeal must fail.

E. Issues 15 and 16: Convictions under Counts 21 and 22

500. Counts 21 and 22 related to repeated incidents of forcible sexual intercourse and rape of Witness A (Ms Antić)[773] over six weeks by Delić. Count 21 charged Delić with a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions (torture) under Article 2 of the Statute. Count 22 charged him with a violation of the laws or customs of war, based on common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions (torture), under Article 3 of the Statute.

501. Based upon the testimony of Ms Antić, the Trial Chamber identified and discussed in the Judgement three occasions when Ms Antić was raped by Delić. The first time was on the night of her arrival in the Čelebići camp, in Building B, when Delić interrogated her and threatened to shoot her or transfer her to another camp if she did not comply with his orders.[774] The second time occurred in Building A, after Deli} had ordered Ms Antić to wash herself in [773] The witness referred to as Witness A in the Indictment did not seek protective measures at trial and was subsequently referred to as Ms Milojka Antić in the Judgement; See para 945, Trial Judgement.

Building B. On that occasion Delić was found to have penetrated her both anally vaginally.[775] The third rape occurred in Building A during the day.[776] The Trial Chamber noted that on the three occasions Delić was in uniform and armed and threatened her.[777] The Trial Chamber also observed that the victim was constantly crying and had to be treated with tranquilizers, and concluded that "there can be no question that these rapes caused severe mental and physical pain and suffering to Ms Antić".[778] The Trial Chamber found that the rape and severe emotional and psychological suffering of Ms Antić was corroborated by the testimony of Ms Ćećez and Dr Gruba~.[779] It also concluded that the purpose of the first rape was to obtain some information and that the rapes were perpetrated by Delić with a discriminatory intent.[780] The Trial Chamber accordingly found Delić guilty of torture under Counts 21 and 22 of the Indictment.[781]

502. Deli} contends that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on the testimony of the victim only, which was not consistent and not credible. He further argues that the Trial Chamber wrongly relied on a "presumption of reliability" in favour of the rape victim who gave testimony in court, thus shifting the burden of proof to the defence to rebut that presumption. He submits that Rule 96(i) of the Rules merely removes a presumption of unreliability of victims of sexual offence but does not create a legal presumption that victims are reliable witnesses, which would be contrary to Article 21(2) of the Statute. Deli} submits that acquittals should be substituted on these counts or that a new trial should be ordered.[782]

503. The Prosecution submits that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact may be sufficient to establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt. Contrary to Deli}'s contention, the Trial Chamber's reference to a presumption of reliability in relation to victims of sexual assault does not imply that the accused is presumed guilty. In the Prosecution's submission, Deli}'s arguments as to unreliability do not demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's findings were unreasonable.[783]

504. The arguments put forward by Deli} are primarily concerned with the standard used by the Trial Chamber to assess the testimony of the victim of the sexual assaults perpetrated by him. The relevant paragraph of the Judgement reads:

> The Trial Chamber notes that sub-Rule 96(i) of the Rules, provides that no corroboration of the victim's testimony shall be required. It agrees with the view of the Trial Chamber in the Tadi} Judgement, quoted in the Akayesu Judgement, that this sub-Rule:
> > accords to the testimony of a victim of sexual assault the same presumption of reliability as the testimony of other crimes, something long been denied to victims of sexual assault by the common law.[784]

505. The Trial Chamber in this paragraph was expressing its agreement with the holding of another Trial Chamber that victims of sexual assault should be considered as reliable as victims of other crimes. The use of the term "presumption of reliability" was inappropriate as there is no such presumption. However, the Appeal Chamber interprets that holding as simply affirming that the purpose of Rule 96(i) is to set forth clearly that, contrary to the position taken in some domestic jurisdictions, the testimony of victims of sexual assault is not, as a general rule, less reliable than the testimony of any other witness. The appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof to the Defence is thus misconceived, as the Trial Chamber did not rely on any "presumption of reliability" to assess the evidence before it. In the paragraph following the one just quoted the Trial Chamber assessed the evidence of Ms Anti} as follows:

> Despite the contentions of the Defence, the Trial Chamber accepts Ms. Anti}'s testimony, and finds, on this basis, and the supporting evidence of Ms.]e}ez, Witness P and Dr. Petko Gruba~, that she was subjected to three rapes by Hazim Deli}. The Trial Chamber finds Ms. Anti}'s testimony as a whole compelling and truthful, particularly in light of her detailed recollection of the circumstances of each rape and her demeanour in the court room in general and, particularly, under cross-examination. The alleged inconsistencies between her evidence at trial and prior statements are immaterial and were sufficiently explained by Ms. Anti}. She consistently stated under cross-examination that, when she made those prior statements, she was experiencing the shock of reliving the rapes that she had "kept inside for so many years". Further, the probative value of these prior statements is considerably less than that of direct sworn testimony which has been subjected to cross-examination.[785]

506. As already stated, there is no legal requirement that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact be corroborated before it can be accepted as evidence.[786] What matters is the reliability and credibility accorded to the testimony. Contrary to Deli}'s assertion, the Trial Chamber did not presume that the testimony of Ms Anti} was reliable and credible as it discussed it carefully, and identified particular reasons why it considered her credible. Clearly, the testimony of Ms Anti} was ascertained on its individual merit, and treated as the testir of any other witness, and the Trial Chamber was careful to discuss the inconsistencies between prior and live testimony.[787] Moreover, as held above and also in this Judgment, the hearing, assessing and weighing of the evidence presented at trial is primarily vested with the Trial Chamber, which is best placed to ascertain whether a witness is reliable in the circumstances of the case.[788]

507. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the appellant has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of the evidence, and reached a conclusion that no reasonable tribunal could have reached. Accordingly, these grounds of appeal must fail.

F. Issues 17 and 18: Convictions Under Counts 46 and 47

508. The final convictions against which Delić appeals on the grounds of error of fact are Counts 46 and 47 of the Indictment, which contained the following charges:

> Count 46. A Grave Breach punishable under Article 2(c) (wilfully causing great suffering) of the Statute of the Tribunal; and
>
> Count 47. A Violation of the Laws or Customs of War punishable under Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Article 3(1)(a) (cruel treatment) of the Geneva Conventions.[789]

These charges are based on paragraph 35 of the Indictment, which alleges that:

> [b]etween May and October 1992, the detainees at ^elebi}i camp were subjected to an atmosphere of terror created by the killing and abuse of other detainees and to inhumane living conditions by being deprived of adequate food, water, medical care, as well as sleeping and toilet facilities. These conditions caused the detainees to suffer severe psychological and physical trauma...

The Indictment charged Delić under Article 7(1) of the Statute with having directly participated in creating these conditions, and with responsibility as a superior under Article 7(3).

509. The Trial Chamber found that because Delić could not be held responsible as a superior under Article 7(3), he could not be held responsible for the inhumane conditions which prevailed in the camp generally. However, it found that:

> [...] by virtue of his direct participation in those specific acts of violence with which he is charge[d] in the Indictment and which the Trial Chamber has found proven above, Hazim Delić was a direct participant in the creation and maintenance of an atmosphere of terror in the Čelebići prison camp.[790]

It therefore found Delić guilty of Counts 46 and 47 under Article 7(1).

510. The Trial Chamber had found Delić guilty of specific acts of violence under Counts 3 and 4 (killing of Željko Milošević), 11 and 12 (wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to and cruel treatment of Slavko Šušic), 18 and 19 (torture and rape of Ms Ćećez), 21 and 22 (torture and rape of Ms Antić), and 42 and 43 (inhumane acts involving use of electrical device).[791] Although the Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Delić guilty of Counts 1 and 2 (killing of Šćepo Gotovac), it notes that in overturning the finding that Delić was responsible for the death of Gotovac it did not disturb the Trial Chamber's finding that Delić had participated in the first beating of the victim.

511. The Appeals Chamber observes that in imposing these convictions, the Trial Chamber made a number of findings of specific acts of violence inflicted by Delić, based on the testimony of witnesses who testified as to Delić's direct participation in promoting the atmosphere of terror created by the killings, abuse and inhumane living conditions at the Čelebići camp.

512. The Trial Chamber found that it was proved beyond reasonable doubt that Delić had raped Ms Antić on three occasions in threatening and coercive circumstances.[792] In her testimony, Milojka Antić described in great detail the three occasions on which she had been raped by Delić.[793] As noted above in relation to the grounds of appeal relating to Delić's convictions for the rape of Ms Antić under Counts 21 and 22, the Trial Chamber accepted Ms Antić's testimony as being overall "compelling and truthful"[794] and the Appeals Chamber has accepted that the Trial Chamber acted reasonably in arriving at that conclusion. The Trial Chamber also found that Delić raped Ms Ćećez.[795] Again, the Appeals Chamber has considered this finding in relation to Delić's appeal against his conviction under Counts 18 and 19 of the Indictment and has found that the Trial Chamber considered the testimony of Ms Ćećez, after a discussion of the nature of such evidence, and was not unreasonable in accepting her evid[illegible] and convicting him under those counts.

513. The Trial Chamber found that Delić had participated in the beating of a group of detainees and had ordered at least one guard to do the same.[796] In relation to that incident, a number of witnesses testified that, following the burning of the village of Bradina, Delić ordered as a vindictive measure that all detainees from Bradina be beaten. Evidence as to this and other collective beatings was given by Witness R,[797] Witness F,[798] Witness M,[799] Mirko Đorđić[800] and Hristo Vukalo.[801] This evidence was adduced largely for the purpose of indicating Delić's superior authority, but was not accepted by the Trial Chamber as proving that status. However, it was accepted by the Trial Chamber as being "indicative of a degree of influence Hazim Delić had in the Čelebići prison-camp on some occasions, in the criminal mistreatment of detainees".[802]

514. Delić was also convicted of inhuman treatment and cruel treatment under Counts 42 and 43 of the Indictment for the use of a device emitting electrical current on Milenko Kuljanin and Novica Đorđić.[803] The Trial Chamber found that:

> [...] Hazim Delić deliberately used an electric shock device on numerous prisoners in the Čelebići prison-camp during the months of July and August 1992. The use of this device by Delić caused pain, burns, convulsions, twitching and scaring [sic]. Moreover, it frightened the victims and reduced them to begging for mercy from Delić, a man who derived sadistic pleasure from the suffering and humiliation that he caused.[804]

This finding was based on the testimony of at least six witnesses, explicitly identified in the Trial Judgement.[805] Delić's conviction under these counts was not the subject of appeal.

515. The Appeals Chamber has also reviewed the Trial Chamber's findings in relation to Delić's participation in the incidents relating to Šćepo Gotovac. Although the Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber's finding that Delić was responsible for the death of Šćepo Gotovac and therefore his conviction under Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment can stand, it has accepted that the Trial Chamber's finding that Delić was involved in at least one violent beating of Gotovac was clearly open on the evidence.

516. In relation to Counts 11 and 12 which charged the wilful killing and murder of Slavko Šušić, the Trial Chamber found that despite there being a "strong suspicion" that Šušić died as a result of the severe beating and mistreatment inflicted upon him by Delić and Landžo, it was not absolutely clear who inflicted the fatal injuries. As a result the Trial Chamber found Delić and Landžo not guilty of wilful killing and murder but did convict them both of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to and cruel treatment on the basis that it was "clear that Delić and Landžo were, at the very least, the perpetrators of heinous acts which caused great physical suffering to the victim".[806] In reaching that finding the Trial Chamber referred to the evidence of four witnesses who had witnessed Delić personally beating Šušić.[807]

517. Although the Trial Chamber did not rely on Delić's involvement in the creation of the prevailing inhumane living conditions at the camp, it did refer in its findings under this count to the testimony of certain witnesses as to Delić's direct participation in creating those conditions. The Trial Chamber described as "compelling" the evidence of Witness R that access to water became increasingly restricted until it reached a stage where "under threat of heavy beatings and even death, not a drop of water could be brought in without the knowledge and permission of the deputy commander Hazim Delic".[808] With regard to the provision of medical care, the Trial Chamber referred specifically to the testimony of Witness R who stated that "when confronted with a request for medical care by a detainee, Hazim Delić would respond "sit down, you have to die anyway, whether you are given medical assistance or not".[809] The Trial Chamber also referred specifically to the testimony of Mirko Dordić as to Delić's participation in creating severely restricted access to toilet facilities:

> Hazim Delic would force us to go to urinate in a group of 30-40 people. We had to run there. Upon his command he would say: 'Take it out. Stop.' This was very short, the time we had.

Other evidence given by Witness R in relation to specific persons supports this account: Trial Transcript at pp 7706-7 as did the evidence of other witnesses, see e.g., Nedeljko Draganić who testified that he was injured and that "whenever [he] would ask to go [to the infirmary] so that they could clean the wound, very often Delić would not allow [him] to go". > We just ran out and had to run back, so that there were people who just didn't have enough time to finish.[810]

The Trial Chamber referred to the testimony of four other witnesses which confirmed this account.[811]

518. The above evidence, consisting of testimony stating that Delić perpetrated acts of rape and cruelty in the Čelebići camp, led the Trial Chamber to the conclusion that Hazim Delić was very much involved in the abuse and ill-treatment of the detainees at the camp. In particular, the Trial Chamber observed that testimony of the witnesses suggested that on many occasions, he was a direct participant and primary actor in acts of inherent cruelty.

519. However, Delić presents three specific arguments in support of his claim that the convictions under Counts 46 and 47 were not based on factually sufficient evidence. In particular, Delić submits that the Trial Chamber ignored the testimony of Dr Bellas, a forensic pathologist, according to whom there would have been evidence of widespread infectious diseases, deaths or injuries due to heat stroke, or evidence of more injuries, greater severity of injuries and more complications, if the Prosecution's witnesses were truthful.[812] Delić also submits that an Egyptian journalist, Mr Harraz, visited the camp and saw no signs of mistreatment or cruel treatment of the prisoners.[813] Finally, Delić submits that the Trial Chamber should have considered the defence of necessity, which "generally allows a person to break the law—so long as it does not involve the intentional killing of an innocent—so long as the benefit of violating the law is greater than the danger the law is designed to prevent".[814]

520. These arguments could be rejected by reference alone to the fact that they misconceive the basis upon which the Trial Chamber found Delić guilty under Counts 46 and 47 of the Indictment. These arguments focus on the evidence relating to the general conditions in which the detainees were kept. However, as noted above, the Trial Chamber did not find that Delić was responsible generally for the living conditions within the camp. Delić was found guilty under Counts 46 and 47 for having been "a direct participant in the creation and maintenance of an atmosphere of terror in the Čelebići prison-camp" by virtue of each of the specific acts of violence with which he had been charged in the Indictment and which the Trial Chamber had found to be proved.[815] As already observed, it was clearly open to the Trial Chamber to r those findings on the basis of the evidence before it. The Appeals Chamber will nevertheless consider the specific objections raised by each of the arguments.

521. An examination of the testimony of Dr Bellas reveals that, contrary to Delić's submissions, it is not inconsistent with the witnesses' testimony detailed above. When asked whether, given the conditions in the Čelebići camp, he would have expected to see numerous cases of heat stroke, Dr Bellas replied: "Well, if not numerous, I could expect to have some people with real, real problems about the environmental temperature".[816] This indicates that numerous cases of heat stroke need not have resulted. With regard to infectious diseases, Dr Bellas admitted that he was not stating that one would expect to a reasonable medical probability that there would be a cholera epidemic in the camp.[817] He stated that diarrhoea was also an infectious disease, and that some prisoners did in fact suffer from it.[818] He agreed that there are many open wounds that do not develop gangrene,[819] and that some infections remain localized, without spreading to other parts of the body.[820] In addition, he maintained that portions of the transcript indicating that persons lost consciousness and died as a result of beatings were not inconsistent with his medical opinion.[821] He also indicated that rib fractures "can heal spontaneously with time".[822]

522. It is also apparent from the testimony of Dr Bellas that it was difficult for him to be statistically precise about injuries and illnesses, because he was relying on transcripts, not on medical examinations of the victims following these incidents, and a more precise evaluation of each incident depended on crucial factors unknown to him – namely, the degree of force used, the positioning of instruments of force, and the individual resistance of a person. As a result, the Appeals Chamber concludes that it is completely open to a reasonable tribunal of fact to find that this evidence in no way undermines the strength of the evidence concerning Delić's acts of abuse and cruelty.

523. In evaluating Mr Harraz's testimony as to its capacity to undermine the testimony of the witnesses discussed above, it should be noted at the outset that Mr Harraz stated that he believed the visit took forty-five minutes to an hour, and that when he talked to a few of the prisoners, officials from the camp were also present.[823] He was not allowed to visit the area reserved for "hard cases".[824] In the large ward, he only "quickly scanned the faces of the prisoners".[825] The combination of these factors make it unlikely that Mr Harraz would have been able to perceive evidence of abuse. In addition, the following exchange contained in the transcript is significant:

> Mr Moran (In cross examination): So if someone were to come and say that people were beaten for an hour in front of you and your cameraman, those people would either be mistaken or they would be lying, would they not?
> Mr Harraz: I do not know, perhaps they are talking about what happened in front of other reporters. I can only say what happened before me in that place and I think even if any torture, beating or humiliations happened, I do not think that would happen before cameras.[826]

524. Mr Harraz also admitted that while the general impression he received was that the camp was not a place where acts of torture were carried out, "of course, the persons in charge of the camp knew that [they] were coming on the next day to visit the camp".[827] These statements reveal that Mr Harraz himself acknowledged that acts of abuse could have been carried out in the camp. Therefore, a reasonable tribunal of fact could not conclude that Mr Harraz's testimony disproves the testimony of the witnesses concerning Delić's acts of violence and mistreatment.

525. Finally, the defence of necessity, also raised by Delić in relation to his convictions under Counts 46 and 47, is simply inapposite. Such a defence could not be used to justify the acts of cruel treatment upon which the Trial Chamber founded these convictions. The Trial Chamber disposed of this argument, correctly, on the basis that the legal standards regulating the treatment of the detainees were "absolute, not relative.[828] They delineate a minimum standard of treatment, from which no derogation can be permitted". Further, as previously observed by the Appeals Chamber, even assuming the existence of a defence of necessity under international law, it is simply not possible to raise such a defence in relation to an allegation of ac[illegible] mistreatment of detainees for which no justification could exist.[829]

526. Having considered the evidence provided by the above witnesses, the Appeals Chamber can arrive at only one conclusion: the evidence was factually sufficient to support Delić's convictions under Counts 46 and 47 of the Indictment. The evidence overwhelmingly indicates that Delić wilfully caused great suffering to the prisoners (Count 46) and treated them cruelly (Count 47). No reasonable tribunal of fact would conclude merely on the basis of Dr Bellas' and Mr Harraz's testimony that Delić did not commit these acts. As a result, this Chamber cannot hold that the conclusion of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt is one that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached.

527. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber therefore rejects these grounds of appeal and upholds the convictions against Hazim Delić under Counts 46 and 47.

VIII. THE PROSECUTION INTERVIEWS WITH MUCIĆ

528. Mucić has appealed against (1) a decision by the Trial Chamber admitting into evidence interviews conducted with him following his arrest and (2) a decision by the Trial Chamber refusing to issue a subpoena to an interpreter.[830] Although these decisions were confirmed in the Trial Judgement,[831] the original interlocutory decisions were issued by the Trial Chamber on 2 September 1997 ("the Exclusion Decision")[832] and 8 July 1997 ("the Subpoena Decision")[833] respectively. The Appeals Chamber notes that although Mucić has separated his submissions in relation to each decision, in fact both relate to the same issue, that is whether or not Mucić voluntarily waived the right to have counsel present during certain of his interviews. Mucić's ultimate submission is that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that this waiver was voluntary and as a result, evidence of all of the interviews should have been excluded from the trial proceedings.

(i) Background

529. On 8 May 1997, Mucić filed a motion seeking to exclude from evidence interviews conducted with him following his arrest.[834] Between 2 June and 11 June 1997, the Trial Chamber heard testimony from the Prosecution witnesses through whom these interviews would be admitted. On 2 June 1997, Mucić filed an ex parte motion seeking an order compelling an interpreter present throughout the interviews to give evidence. On 12 June 1997, the Trial Chamber heard oral arguments from the parties on the motion to exclude evidence

---

[830] Although Mucić filed his Notice of Appeal on 27 November 1998, on 26 July 1999 he filed the Particulars of the Grounds of Appeal of the Appellant Zdravko Mucić Dated The 2nd July 1999. In this document, he separated this issue into two grounds of appeal, labelled ground 5 (concerning the admission into evidence of Mucić's interviews held from 19 – 21 March 1996) and ground 6 (concerning the refusal of the Trial Chamber to issue a subpoena to an interpreter). By Order dated 31 March 2000 (Order on Motion of Appellants Hazim Delić and Zdravko Mucić for leave to file supplementary brief and on Motion of Prosecution for leave to file supplementary brief), Mucić was ordered inter alia to file a document identifying his amended grounds of appeal. On 31 May 2000 this document was filed (Appellant Zdravko Mucić's Final Designation of his Grounds of Appeal) and in doing so he renumbered and re-organised the issues, filing this issue as one ground of appeal (concerning the admission into evidence of the prosecution interviews). The Appeals Chamber will however consider the two separate issues raised by this ground of appeal, noting that in any event they are clearly related.

following which it made an oral ruling on the same day. On 8 July 1997, the Trial Chamber issued the Subpoena Decision and on 2 September 1997 it issued the Exclusion Decision.

530. In the Exclusion Decision, the Trial Chamber found that statements made by Mucić to the Austrian Police Force on 18 March 1996 ("the First Interviews") should be excluded from evidence as having been obtained in breach of his right to counsel under Article 18 of the Statute and Rule 42 of the Rules. It reached this decision on the basis that Mucić was denied the right to counsel during the First Interviews because the Austrian procedural rules did not recognise the right of a suspect to have counsel present during questioning. However, statements made to Prosecution investigators on 19, 20 and 21 March 1996 ("the Second Interviews") were ruled admissible, on the basis that Mucić was clearly informed of his right under the Rules to have counsel present and he voluntarily waived it.[835]

531. Mucić points out that it is clear that the Trial Chamber relied upon the Second Interviews in the course of its Judgement and consequent conviction of him. However, he submits that as the interviews as a whole[836] amounted "to a course of interviewing conduct which was irrevocably tainted, at least in the mind or consciousness of [Mucić...]; all of the interviews should have been thereby excluded."[837] He submits that the overall objective in considering what is said in interviews is that the Trial Chamber should be fair and that the decision by the Trial Chamber breaches this objective.[838]

(ii) Discussion

532. The Appeals Chamber notes that Mucić does not dispute the overall factual findings of the Trial Chamber with regard to the conduct of both the First Interviews and the Second Interviews.[839] However, as a matter of law, he alleges for several reasons that the Trial Chamber erred in the exercise of its discretion in admitting the Second Interviews, having excluded the First Interviews. The Appeals Chamber recalls that for such a ground of appeal to succeed, although an appellant must discharge an initial burden of raising arguments in support of an alleged error of law with the Appeals Chamber, the Appeals Chamber may proceed to examine whether or not the alleged error is such that it invalidates the Trial Chamber's decision.[840]

533. As to the Trial Chamber's decision, the Appeals Chamber notes that a Trial Chamber exercises considerable discretion in deciding on issues of admissibility of evidence. As a result, a Trial Chamber should be afforded a certain degree of deference in making decisions based on the circumstances of the case before it. To this extent the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Prosecution submissions on this point during the hearing on appeal.[841] Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber recalls that it also has the authority to intervene to exclude evidence, in circumstances where it finds that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in admitting it. Indeed the Appeals Chamber has intervened in the past to do so.[842] In these decisions, the Appeals Chamber confirmed that a pre-requisite for admission of evidence must be compliance by the moving party with any relevant safeguards and procedural protections and that it must be shown that the relevant evidence is reliable. If evidence is admitted and an appellant can subsequently show that prejudice has been caused by a failure by the Trial Chamber to properly apply such protections, then it may be found that the Trial Chamber has erred and exceeded its discretion. This is when Rule 89(D) and Rule 95 of the Rules may come into play and in these circumstances a ground of appeal may succeed.

534. In its oral ruling on the Exclusion Decision, the Trial Chamber found that the Second Interviews were "reliable and admissible [...]. The weight to be attached and the probative value will be determined by considering all the other circumstances in these proceedings."[843] Mucić submits that "it is plain that the Trial Chamber relied upon the second interview in the course of [its] judgement."[844] This cannot be disputed. The Trial Chamber, in convicting Mucić under Article 7(3) of the Statute[845] found:

[841] Appeal Transcript, pp 475–476. The Prosecution submits that "[...] in making [...] determination of this final matter, the Trial Chamber is required to weigh all the facts in evidence before it, and in some cases involving issues of this kind, it may be required to receive evidence and hear witnesses, and so in accordance with general principles, it would be necessary to afford a considerable margin of deference to the finding of the Trial Chamber, and it would only be where the decision of the Trial Chamber could be shown to be an abuse of discretion that there would be justification in the Appeals Chamber intervening on appeal."

> In his interview with the Prosecution, Mucić admitted he had authority over the camp, at least from 27 July 1992. However, in the same interview he admitted that he went to the prison-camp daily from 20 May 1992 onwards.[846]

535. In addition, it noted that:

> Mucić admitted in his interview with the Prosecution that he was aware that crimes were being committed in the prison-camp at Čelebići in June and July 1992 and that he had personally witnessed detainees being abused during this period.[847]

536. Mucić's argument is that the Trial Chamber erred in the admission of the Second Interviews into evidence. However, as a result of this decision and in its findings in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber relied inter alia on this evidence to convict. Accordingly, it is logical to conclude that Mucić's argument must include an allegation that the Trial Chamber also erred in subsequently relying in part on the Second Interviews in this conviction.

537. Mucić's arguments may be summarised as follows. He submits that contrary to the Trial Chamber's findings, the First Interviews and the Second Interviews should have been considered as one continuing event.[848] If they had been, he submits that the Trial Chamber would have found that the Second Interviews should be excluded. As noted above, the First Interviews were excluded because the Trial Chamber found them to be in breach of Mucić's right to counsel during questioning, guaranteed by Article 18 of the Statute[849] and Rule 42 of the Rules.[850] Mucić submits that as he was informed that he had no right to counsel during the First Further, he could remove guards, as evidenced by his removal of Esad Land'o in October 1992." (Footnotes referring to Trial Exhibit 101-1 – (record of interview with Prosecution) omitted).

[848] Mucić Brief, Section 2, pp 1, 7-8.

[849] Article 18(3) of the Statute provides: "If questioned, the suspect shall be entitled to be assisted by counsel of his own choice, including the right to have legal assistance assigned to him without payment by him in any such case if he does not have sufficient means to pay for it, as well as to necessary translation into and from a language he speaks and understands."

[850] Rule 42(A)(i) of the Rules provides that a suspect shall have "the right to be assisted by counsel of the suspect's choice or to be assigned legal assistance without payment if the suspect does not have sufficient means to pay for it." Rule 42(B) provides that "[q]uestioning of a suspect shall not proceed without the presence of counsel unless the suspect has voluntarily waived the right to counsel. In case of waiver, if the suspect subsequently expresses a desire to have counsel, questioning shall thereupon cease, and shall only resume when the suspect has obtained or has been assigned counsel."

Interviews, it was not unreasonable to expect that he would believe this prohibition to cont[illegible] to apply in the Second Interviews, despite the fact that he had been informed to the contrary. Such expectation arose from the fact that the interviews were conducted very close together. He was in a foreign country and should not have been expected to perform "the necessary intellectual gymnastics to give informed consent" to the Second Interviews, when he had been informed he was not entitled to be represented by counsel in the First Interviews.[851] He submits that although he may have stated that he did not want counsel present in the Second Interviews, this waiver was neither informed nor voluntary. He argues that in considering whether or not he voluntarily waived the right to counsel in the Second Interviews, the Trial Chamber should have applied a subjective test and found that in the circumstances, his consent was not voluntary.

538. Several issues arise. Initially, the Appeals Chamber notes that Mucić relies considerably on precedent drawn from the United Kingdom. The Appeals Chamber recalls that reference to principles applied in national jurisdictions can be of assistance to both Trial Chambers and the Appeals Chamber in interpreting provisions of the Statute and the Rules.[852] However, Rule 89(A) of the Rules expressly provides that the Chambers "shall not be bound by national rules of evidence." What is of primary importance is that a Trial Chamber "apply rules of evidence which will best favour a fair determination of the matter before it and are consonant with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law."[853] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that implicit in this principle was "the application of national rules of evidence by the Trial Chamber."[854] On the contrary, the Appeals Chamber confirms that rules of evidence as expressly provided in the Rules should be primarily applied, with the assistance of national principles only if necessary for guidance in the interpretation of these Rules.

539. The particular precedent relied upon by Mucić concerns generally the exclusion of evidence of interviews obtained by oppression, in circumstances likely to render them unreliable or which would render it unfair to the accused to admit it. In particular he refers to Section 76(2) and Section 78(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 ("PACE") applicable in the United Kingdom.[855] Although the principles drawn therefrom may arguably be of some assistance, the Appeals Chamber turns primarily to Rule 89(D) and Rule 95 of the Rules, which expressly apply to this issue.

[853] Rule 89(B) of the Rules. Although strictly speaking this relates to "cases not otherwise provided for" in Section 3 of the Rules (the title being "Rules of Evidence") nevertheless, the general principle is important. See Prosecutor v Kordić and Čerkez, Decision on Appeal Regarding the Admission into Evidence of Seven Affidavits and One Formal Statement, Case No IT-95-14/2-AR73.6, 18 Sept 2000, para 22. See also Prosecution Brief, paras 12.11 and 16.11.

> Rule 89(D)
>
> A Chamber may exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial.
>
> Rule 95
> No evidence shall be admissible if obtained by methods which cast substantial doubt on its reliability or if its admission is antiethical to, and would seriously damage, the integrity of the proceedings.

540. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber correctly referred to these Rules in its consideration of the interviews. It found that:

> where the probative value of [...] evidence is substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial, it ought to be excluded – Sub-rule 89(D). Also to be excluded by Rule 95, is evidence obtained by means contrary to internationally protected human rights.[856]

It further found that Rule 95 of the Rules in particular enables "the exclusion of evidence antiethical to and damaging, and thereby protecting the integrity of the proceedings."[857] The Appeals Chamber can see no reason why the Trial Chamber should be required to look elsewhere for the applicable legal principles.

541. During the hearing on appeal, the Appeals Chamber questioned the parties as to whether or not it would have been appropriate for the Trial Chamber to hold a voir dire to resolve this issue. It was stated that "the very issue of whether or not something is voluntary is the prime example of where a voir dire is often taken"[858] so that for example in this case, Mucić could

[855] Section 76(2) PACE provides: "If, in any proceedings where the prosecution proposes to give in evidence a confession made by an accused person, it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained – (a) by oppression of the person who made it; or (b) in consequence of anything said or done which was likely, in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid." Section 78(1) PACE provides: "In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it."

[856] Exclusion Decision, para 35.

have been provided with the opportunity to "explain what was affecting his mind."[859] Appeals Chamber notes that although there is no express provision in the Rules for such procedure, it is generally available in, inter alia, common law jurisdictions. It allows for arguments and evidence to be brought before the court solely on a defined issue and would provide an accused with the opportunity to give evidence on a limited basis, prohibiting questions beyond the issues raised. It would ensure in general that arguments and evidence led be confined to the issue in dispute and not extend to discussion of the facts of the case itself.[860]

542. The Appeals Chamber notes that during proceedings at first instance, the possibility of resolving this issue by way of voir dire was in fact raised.[861] In Mucić's motion to exclude the First Interviews and Second Interviews from evidence[862] he submitted that "the appropriate way of dealing with [this issue of admissibility] is that there should be a hearing by way of voire [sic] dire (or 'trial-within-a-trial')".[863] However, he did not submit specifically that in doing so, he wished to have the opportunity to give evidence personally. On the contrary, he submitted generally that this procedure would allow both parties to "call evidence and have witnesses examined, cross-examined and re-examined in the normal way."[864] At that point, he submitted that it would "be apparent that further oral argument [...would] then be appropriate."[865]

543. As stated, this procedure is not expressly provided for in the Rules. However, this does not mean that it would be unsuitable for a Trial Chamber to utilise it if in a particular case it thought it appropriate. In this case, relevant evidence on the issue could be obtained through the testimony of the investigators, including the Prosecution investigators, the interpreter (see below) and Mucić. The Appeals Chamber notes that three witnesses gave evidence on behalf of the Prosecution regarding the circumstances leading up to the Second Interviews, including two of the Prosecution investigators who questioned Mucić during the Second Interviews.[866] The Appeals Chamber has been directed to no record of any occasion when Mucić suggested that he himself wished to give evidence. Indeed during the hearing on appeal, his counsel submitted that in the circumstances of proceedings before the Tribunal such a procedure in general is inappropriate as both the finders of fact and law are the same tribunal.[867]

544. Nevertheless, although the Appeals Chamber does not agree with the latter assertion and notes that this procedure could in theory have been employed by the Trial Chamber to resolve the matter, the Appeals Chamber makes no finding that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to do so. Nor does it find that Mucić should have specifically requested that he be permitted to give evidence on this limited basis.[868] It does however point out that in any event, evidence in relation to the issue in dispute was heard by the Trial Chamber in the course of the Trial and relied upon by it in both decisions.

545. As stated above, Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber should have considered the First Interviews and the Second Interviews as one continuing event and that because Mucić must have done so, the reasons for excluding the First Interviews applied to the Second Interviews. He submits that the interviews as a whole amounted to a course of interviewing conduct which was irrevocably tainted, at least in his mind, and that therefore both sets of interviews should have been excluded. During the hearing on appeal Mucić supplements his arguments by stressing that the issue should have been approached, taking "as the base point complete fairness."[869]

546. On the contrary, the Prosecution submits that the First Interviews do not affect the Second Interviews because before the Austrian authorities the accused had no "right" to have counsel present. The Trial Chamber recognised this and ruled that the First Interviews should be excluded. However, Mucić did have a right to have counsel present in the Second Interviews as they were conducted for the purposes of proceedings before the Tribunal. The Prosecution submits that he was clearly informed of this right and that it is clear that he voluntarily waived it.[870] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber did not abuse its discretion in the Exclusion Decision.

547. The Trial Chamber found:

> It is clear on the evidence before the Trial Chamber that there were two interviews of the suspect. [...] T here i s evidence that the Austrian Police conducted their investigation and gave the caution and rights of the suspect under Austrian law. The interview with the Prosecution was conducted in accordance with the Rules. There is no doubt [...] that > different teams conducted each interview. [...] The contiguity of time and the environment around which they took place should not obscure the fact that there were two independent and separate interviews of the suspect. The interview by the Prosecution cannot be regarded as a continuation of the interview of the Austrian Police. The interview of the Austrian Police was directed towards the extradition of the Accused. That of the Prosecution towards establishing substantive offences within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. The purposes are distinct and different.[871]

548. The Appeals Chamber can find no error in these findings and finds that the contention that Mucić could subjectively have regarded the First Interviews and the Second Interviews as one continuous event cannot be borne out. The Trial Chamber found that the First Interviews were conducted by the Austrian police over one day, specifically in relation to extradition proceedings. The Second Interviews were conducted by different investigators, in the absence of the Austrian police officers, over the next three days, for a different purpose and at different times. At the start of the Second Interviews Mucić was informed that it was being conducted by investigators from the Office of the Prosecutor of the Tribunal. It is clear to the Appeals Chamber that as found by the Trial Chamber, the interviews were at all times conducted separately and distinctly. Accordingly there can be no reason to find that Mucić could have been led to believe that they were one continuing interview. The Appeals Chamber can find no error in the Trial Chamber's analysis.

549. Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting any argument that his cultural background and the fact that he was under arrest in a foreign country should be considered in determining if he voluntarily waived the right to remain silent.[872] He submits that the Trial Chamber should have applied a subjective test in considering the admissibility of the Second Interviews and that it erred in solely applying an objective test in interpreting the Rules.[873] "The fact that somebody is being interviewed in a language other than his, probably in a jurisdiction or a place [of] which he has no cultural or personal knowledge, and the fact that he is being interviewed about matters which have arisen from an extraordinary and extra-national set of circumstances [...] is very germane."[874] He submits further that this impacted on his decision making and because the First Interviews were excluded, the logical consequence should be that he would have considered the same rules to apply in the Second Interviews.[875] He also submits that although Rule 42 of the Rules may have been read to him, it is not the words that mat[illegible] a legal context but the full implication of the effect of the words.[876]

550. The Trial Chamber found:

> [...] the cultural argument difficult to accept as a basis for considering the interpretation of the application of the human rights provisions. The suspect had the facility of interpretation of the rights involved in a language which he understands. Hence, whether he was familiar with some other systems will not concern the new rights interpreted to him. If we were to accept the cultural argument, it would be tantamount to every person interpreting the rights read to him subject to his personal or contemporary cultural environment. The provision should be objectively construed.[877]

551. The Appeals Chamber again finds that Mucić has failed to satisfy the Appeals Chamber that the Trial Chamber erred in this reasoning. Rule 42 of the Rules provides that a suspect must be informed prior to questioning of various rights, including the right to be assisted during questioning by counsel of the suspect's choice.[878] It further provides that questioning must not continue in the absence of counsel unless a suspect has voluntarily waived the right to have counsel present.[879] This right is neither ambiguous nor difficult to understand. As long as a suspect is clearly informed of it in a language he or she understands, the Prosecution fulfils its obligations. Contrary to Mucić's submissions,[880] an investigator is not obliged to go further.

552. In this regard, the Trial Chamber expressly found that there is no duty incumbent on an investigator to explain in greater depth the implications of Rule 42, "the duty is only to interpret to the suspect the rules in a language he or she understands."[881] As pointed out by the Prosecution, "[p]rovided that the suspect's rights are explained in a language that the suspect understands, it shouldn't matter in what country the suspect is at the time, particularly in the case of an international tribunal which may interview suspects in many different countries and which has a legal system that's different to that in any particular national jurisdiction."[882]

553. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the interpretation by the Trial Chamber that the Rule should be construed objectively. However, it also notes that even if it were to consider the admissibility of the Second Interviews on the basis of a "subjective standard of informed consent" (which it has found is not the appropriate test), nevertheless, a submission that Mucić suffered from cultural and linguistic problems resulting in involuntary waiver has foundation. Mucić did not dispute that he had been living in Austria for several years prior to his arrest. This was conceded on his behalf before the Trial Chamber, together with the fact that as a result he "was no doubt familiar with the street-wise ways of that country."[883] In addition, he was provided with the assistance of an interpreter throughout the course of the interviews, while also speaking with a lawyer on one occasion (see below). In these circumstances, there can be no basis for an argument that based on a subjective test, he may have had difficulty in understanding the fact that he had a right to counsel in the Second Interviews.

554. The Appeals Chamber finds that it has no reason to doubt that Mucić was fully aware of the fact that although he did not have a right to counsel in the First Interviews, he did have such a right in the Second Interviews. Accordingly, it finds no error in the Trial Chamber's findings that there is clear evidence that Mucić expressed a wish to be interviewed without counsel. The Appeals Chamber finds most persuasive the fact that the record shows that Mucić was informed on numerous occasions that he had a right to have counsel present while being interviewed and on each occasion declined. The Trial Chamber found that there was evidence that "several times during the interview, the suspect was asked whether he was prepared to carry on without counsel, and on each occasion he unequivocally answered in the affirmative.[884] Even when counsel [...] assigned to him appeared to assist him, the Accused indicated he did not need his assistance, and he left."[885] As submitted by the Prosecution, Mucić "manifested all the indicia of understanding and of voluntarily waiving his rights."[886] Mucić has failed to establish that the evidence illustrates that he could have been confused regarding his right to have counsel present and the Appeals Chamber can find no error in the same conclusion reached by the Trial Chamber.

555. Finally, as to Mucić's argument that fairness should be the base point in considering the admissibility of the interviews, the Appeals Chamber does not dispute such a contention. However, it also finds no reason to hold that the Trial Chamber failed to apply this principle. It is not disputed that a Trial Chamber should not admit relevant evidence if in doing so the accused's right to a fair trial is violated. If admission of evidence is outweighed by the need to have a fair trial, then Rule 89(D) and Rule 95 of the Rules provide a mechanism for exclusion. As seen above, these provisions were specifically applied by the Trial Chamber in its consideration of both the First Interviews and the Second Interviews. In particular, the Trial Chamber pointed out that "[t]here is no doubt statements obtained from suspects which are not voluntary, or which seem to be voluntary but are obtained by oppressive conduct, cannot pass the test under Rule 95."[887] However it also found for the reasons set out above, that there was no reason to conclude in this case that the Second Interviews fell within the provisions of either Rule violating Mucić's right to a fair trial such that they should have been excluded. The Appeals Chamber can find no error in the Trial Chamber's decision.

(iii) Rejection of the request to issue a subpoena

556. Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber erred in refusing to issue a subpoena to the interpreter, Alexandra Pal. It was recorded that at 15:10 on 19 May 1996, Mucić expressed a desire to have counsel present during the Second Interviews. At 15:30 on the same day, the Second Interviews began and it was recorded that contrary to his previously expressed wish, he was in fact happy to be interviewed un-represented. In reading Mucić his rights at the start of the Second Interviews, the Prosecution investigators asked, inter alia: "do you agree to answer our questions without the presence of an attorney, in accordance with our previous conversation?"[888] Mucić submits that this remark refers to a previous conversation which he alleges must have taken place during the twenty minute gap immediately before the Second Interviews began, during which an unrecorded exchange took place between the Prosecution investigators and Mucić while the investigators were setting up their equipment. It is alleged that because Mucić changed his mind during this short period of time, "something was said and/or done to persuade him to" do so.[889] It is submitted that the interpreter present in this interval could have testified as to the contents of any such conversation and consequently the reason for Mucić's sudden change of mind and decision finally to proceed without counsel.[890]

It is ultimately alleged that whatever was said resulted in Mucić involuntarily waiving the [redacted] to counsel.[891]

(iv) Discussion

557. These arguments were brought before the Trial Chamber in an ex parte motion,[892] and on 8 July 1997 it decided that it would not issue this subpoena. It determined that:

> [...] [t]he Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Defence has established that there is indeed an omission in the record of proceedings of the interview of Mucić. The Defence has alleged an unrecorded interrogation and founded its allegation on suppositions of what might have been said or done therein. This is clearly not a satisfactory ground on which to base the application. There is no undisputed evidence of the "previous conversation" alleged to have taken place.[893]

558. The Appeals Chamber agrees. As pointed out by the Trial Chamber, an application to issue a subpoena may be granted under Rule 54 of the Rules if an applicant shows "that the order is necessary for the purposes of investigation. Alternatively, it must be shown that it is necessary for the preparation or conduct of the trial."[894] The Trial Chamber found that it was "not persuaded by the contention [...] that the only way to fill the [alleged] gap [...] is through testimony of the interpreter."[895] It found that based on the evidence before it, it could not be satisfied that "an order is necessary for investigation into the evidence of whether there was a previous conversation and the context of such a conversation."[896] In fact, the Appeals Chamber notes that as also found by the Trial Chamber, Mucić had "founded [his] allegation on supposition of what might have been said or done therein",[897] and simply speculated as to what may have occurred.[898] The Appeals Chamber agrees that there could be no error in a finding that such speculation cannot discharge the burden under Rule 54 of the Rules to persuade a Trial Chamber to issue a subpoena.

559. However, the Appeals Chamber also notes that this allegation was in any event not left unchallenged. Although as noted above, it appears that Mucić did not request that he should be provided with the chance to testify before the Trial Chamber on this sole issue in the conte... a voir dire and in fact he could not be required to have done so, nevertheless, he was provided with the opportunity to challenge the Prosecution investigators present at the time as to whether or not this alleged conversation took place. During their testimony the allegation was denied and it was stated that any conversation with Mucić was simply to inform him in general terms of his rights during interview.[899] The Trial Chamber was entitled to assess this evidence and find that it was reliable and credible.[900] The Appeals Chamber cannot accept a general allegation by Mucić that simply because they work for the Prosecution, "the investigators who gave evidence...would have a motive to conceal what had caused this sudden change of mind."[901]

560. However, it is clear to the Appeals Chamber that the allegation that Mucić was improperly persuaded by the Prosecution investigators to refuse the assistance of counsel, is primarily rebutted by the fact that throughout the Second Interviews it is recorded that he repeatedly asserted that he was happy to be interviewed un-represented.[902] Ultimately, this satisfied the Trial Chamber that his consent was voluntary and refuted any allegation or speculation to the contrary. The Trial Chamber found in the Exclusion Decision:

> There is no doubt the Accused understood that he had a right to counsel during the interview. It was obvious also that he was aware of his right to waive the exercise of the right to Counsel. It appears to us obvious that the suspect voluntarily waived the exercise of the right to counsel. The Defence has not established to the satisfaction of the Trial Chamber that the discussion of the unrecorded portion of the interview was responsible for the exercise by the suspect of his right to waive the exercise of his right to counsel. It would be dangerous to act on the several ingenious speculations of Defence Counsel as to what could have transpired.[903]

At trial his counsel submitted that "something did happen in those twenty minutes, something which Mr Aribat has concealed [...] and that the only possible and proper inference to draw [...] is that something did take place, and it was oppressive, and it was designed to get him to agree not to have a lawyer." [900] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 64; Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 63.

[901] Mucić Brief, Section 2, pp 14-15. The Appeals Chamber notes that such a finding would mean that all Prosecution employees must be viewed as being prima facie unreliable, simply by virtue of their job.

[902] This wish is also illustrated by the fact (referred to in paragraph 554 above) that although he was provided with the assistance of counsel, Mucić still preferred to continue un-represented.

[903] Exclusion Decision, para 63.

561. The Appeals Chamber agrees and finds that Mucić has failed to put forward any re. as to why the Trial Chamber erred in making this finding. Save for the so-called "ingenious speculations", he has failed to establish how the evidence of the interpreter could refute these findings and was necessary for the investigation or conduct of the trial, such that the Trial Chamber would be justified in issuing a subpoena under Rule 54 of the Rules.

562. Mucić also challenges the finding of the Trial Chamber that in principle an interpreter should not be called to give evidence as it could compromise his or her integrity or independence.[904] This independence is guaranteed by the requirement under Rule 76 of the Rules for an interpreter to solemnly declare to act independently and impartially.[905] The Appeals Chamber notes that in the Trial Judgement the Subpoena Decision was summarised as finding that:

> (1) the interpreter cannot be relied upon to testify on the evanescent words of the interpretation in the proceedings between the parties; and (2) it is an important consideration in the administration of justice to insulate the interpreter from constant apprehension of the possibility of being personally involved in the arena of conflict, on either side, in respect of matters arising from the discharge of their duties.[906]

Although the findings are summarised as being two-fold, the Appeals Chamber concludes that in fact the Trial Chamber's primary reason for refusing to issue the subpoena rested on its determination discussed above. That is, that save for a vague speculative assertion, Mucić had failed to put forward any reason as to why further investigation into the alleged previous conversation "was necessary to the proceedings," justifying the issuance of a subpoena to the interpreter.[907] It did however proceed to examine the circumstances in which an interpreter could in theory be called to give evidence. In doing so, it stated that although it was not the case that an interpreter could never be called to give evidence,

> [...] this would depend on one of the following factors. First, there should be a legal duty on [... the interpreter] to make a record of the interpretation between the parties; secondly, in the interest of justice, there should be no other way of obtaining the evidence sought other than through the testimony of the interpreter; or thirdly, the determination of the issue should depend entirely on the evidence to be given by the interpreter.[908]

563. The Appeals Chamber sees no reasons to dispute this finding. As pointed out by the Trial Chamber:

[904] Mucić Brief, Section 2, p 13.
[905] Rule 76 of the Rules provides in full: "Before performing any duties, an interpreter or a translator shall solemnly declare to do so faithfully, independently, impartially and with full respect for the duty of confidentiality."

> [i]t would not only be undesirable but also invidious to compel an interpreter into the arena of conflict on behalf of either party to the proceedings, for the determination of an issue arising from such proceedings. It should not be encouraged where other ways exist for the determination of the issue.[909]

Although these findings may have contributed to the Trial Chamber's ultimate decision, they were secondary considerations. In view of the aforementioned primary reason for refusing to issue the subpoena, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is not necessary to discuss in detail Mucić's further submissions on this issue.

564. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber can see no reason to find that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in admitting into evidence the Second Interviews and in refusing to issue a subpoena to the interpreter. Further, it can find no error in the Trial Chamber subsequently relying inter alia on the Second Interviews to convict Muci}. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the overall finding by the Trial Chamber that the evidence illustrates that Mucić was fully informed of his right to have counsel present in the Second Interviews and that he voluntarily waived it. The Trial Chamber did not err in refusing to issue a subpoena to the interpreter and in admitting the Second Interviews. This ground of appeal is therefore dismissed.

IX. DIMINISHED MENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

A. Background

565. Landžo was found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions by reason of his wilful killing of three detainees in the Čelebići prison camp – Šćepo Gotovac,[910] Simo Jovanović,[911] and Boško Samouković[912] – and of violations of the laws or customs of war by reason of their murders.[913] The Trial Chamber made findings that the death of each of these three detainees resulted from severe or brutal beatings.[914] The beating of Gotovac by Landžo himself was accompanied by the act of pinning a metal badge to the victim's head, and it was so merciless that the victim was unable to walk, and he died a few hours later as a result of his injuries.[915] Landžo was found guilty as an accessory to the "prolonged and vicious" beating of Jovanović which caused his death, an accessory who had knowingly facilitated the beating inflicted by others.[916] The beating of Samouković by Landžo himself was carried out with a wooden plank about a metre long and five or six centimetres thick, and it lasted for about twenty minutes until Samouković fell down.[917] The beating caused broken ribs and the death of the victim shortly thereafter.[918] It was described by the Trial Chamber as merciless as well as brutal.[919]

566. Landžo was also found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions by reason of his torture of Momir Kuljanin,[920] Spasoje Miljević,[921] and Mirko Đorđić,[922] and of violations of the laws and customs of war by reason of that torture.[923] The Trial Chamber made findings that Landžo had forced Kuljanin to hold a heated knife in his hand, causing a serious burn to his palm, and that he then cut the victim's hand with the knife twice, for the purposes of punishing and intimidating him.[924] Landžo put a gas mask on the head of Miljević (apparently to prevent his cries being heard by others), tightening the screws to such an extent that the victim felt suffocated, and then he repeatedly heated a knife and burnt the victim's hands, left leg and thighs. He next kicked and hit Miljević, and then he forced him to eat grass, as well as filling his mouth with clover and forcing him to drink water.[925] The Trial Chamber said that it was appalled by the cruel nature of Landžo's conduct.[926] Landžo forced open Đorđić's mouth and inserted a pair of heated pincers, burning the victim's mouth, lips and tongue.[927] He also forced Đorđić on a number of occasions to do push-ups, usually ten at a time but sometimes as many as fifty,[928] as well as subjecting him to more general mistreatment.[929]

567. Landžo was found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions as well by reason of great suffering or serious injury to body or health caused to Slavko Šušić[930] and

Nedeljko Draganić,[931] and of violations of the laws or customs of war by reason of their treatment.[932] The Trial Chamber found that Landžo had taken part in the serious mistreatment of Šušić over a continuous period during the course of one day,[933] and that he had perpetrated "heinous acts which caused great physical suffering" to Šušić,[934] but it did not make clear precisely which acts of those alleged that it had accepted. Some of the evidence given in relation to the treatment of Šušić was criticised by the Trial Chamber, but it did not criticise evidence that Landžo pulled out Šušić's tongue with some kind of implement and that he beat him.[935] Landžo had been charged in relation to the death of Šušić, but the Trial Chamber was not satisfied that his death had resulted from the beatings and mistreatment of Landžo. These verdicts were entered in lieu of convictions upon the charges laid in the Indictment alleging wilful killing and murder, upon the basis that these lesser offences were included within those charged.[936] The Trial Chamber also found that on one occasion Landžo, with others, tied Draganić's hands to a beam in the ceiling of a hangar, and that the victim was hit with wooden planks and rifle butts. Thereafter, Draganić was beaten by Landžo almost every day, usually with a baseball bat, and he was forced, with other detainees, to drink urine. On another occasion, Landžo poured gasoline on Draganić's trousers when the victim was in a seated position, and he set the trousers alight. Draganić's legs were badly burnt.[937]

568. Finally, Landžo was also found guilty of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions by reason of great suffering or serious injury to body or health caused to other detainees in the Čelebići prison camp,[938] and of violations of the laws or customs of war by reason of their cruel treatment.[939] These counts were expressed in general terms, alleging that the detainees at the Čelebići prison camp had been subjected to an atmosphere of terror created by the killing and abuse of a number of them.[940] In finding Landžo guilty of these charges, the Trial Chamber relied upon the findings which it had made against him in relation to the specific counts.[941] The Trial Chamber found that the other detainees had continuously witnessed the most severe physical abuse being inflicted on defenceless victims, and that they had been obliged to observe helplessly the horrific injuries and suffering caused by the mistreatment.[942] By their exposu these conditions, the Trial Chamber found, the detainees were compelled to live with the ever-present fear of being killed or subjected to physical abuse themselves.[943] Their sense of physical insecurity and fear was aggravated by threats made by the guards (including Landžo).[944] The Trial Chamber found that, through the frequent cruel and violent deeds which were committed, aggravated by the random nature of those acts and the threats made by guards, the detainees had been subjected to an immense psychological pressure which could accurately be characterised as "an atmosphere of terror".[945]

569. Landžo admitted having committed some of the acts which formed the basis of his convictions; he was unable to recall some others, and some acts he denied. These findings by the Trial Chamber leading to Landžo's convictions were not challenged by him on appeal.

570. The findings were repeated in substance when the Trial Chamber considered Landžo's sentence. It went on to describe the charges upon which he was convicted as being "clearly of the most serious nature".[946] Reference was made to the "savagery" of Landžo's killing of Gotovac, and the "sustained and ferocious" nature of his fatal attack upon Samouković.[947] In addition to the specific acts referred to in these findings, the Trial Chamber noted that Landžo also contributed substantially towards the atmosphere of terror prevailing in the Čelebići camp through his brutal treatment of the detainees. The beatings and other forms of mistreatment, the Trial Chamber said, were inflicted "in a manner exhibiting some imaginative cruelty as well as substantial ferocity".[948] Many of the victims of, and witnesses to, his conduct bore permanent physical and psychological scars of Landžo's cruelty.[949] The Trial Chamber commented that Landžo's apparent preference for inflicting burns upon detainees exhibited sadistic tendencies and clearly required premeditation,[950] and that he took some perverse pleasure in the infliction of great pain and humiliation.[951]

571. Landžo was sentenced to imprisonment for various periods, to be s[illegible] concurrently.[952] His effective sentence is imprisonment for fifteen years.

B. The Issues on Appeal

572. Landžo's principal defence to the charges was what has been described as the "special defence of diminished mental responsibility". Both Landžo and the Trial Chamber appear to have assumed the existence of such a defence in international law by reason of Rule 67(A)(ii)(b), an issue to which the Appeals Chamber will return.

C. The Trial Chamber's Refusal to Define Diminished Mental Responsibility

573. Landžo filed two grounds of appeal directed to the issue of diminished mental responsibility. The first was in these terms:[953]

> The Trial Chamber Erred in Law, Violated the Rules of Natural Justice, and the Principle of Certainty in Criminal Law, and Denied Appellant a Fair Trial, When It Refused to Define the Special Defence of Diminished Mental Responsibility Which the Appellant Specifically Raised.

574. During the trial, Landžo moved before the Trial Chamber for rulings as to the definition of this "special defence", where the onus lay and the burden (or standard) of proof involved.[954] He argued that "diminished capacity"[955] was a "prolific defence relied upon in many jurisdictions", and that it was "best known as having been derived from the Homicide Act of 1957 from England".[956] Then, having referred to a number of decisions in England concerning the Homicide Act, Landžo submitted that the English definition of diminished responsibility, its burden of proof and its standard of proof should be adopted by the Trial Chamber when considering the evidence proffered by him.[957] In his summary, he submitted:

> The special defence of diminished capacity as envisioned by the framers of the Statute and Rules of this Tribunal should be as follows: where a person kills or is a party to a killing of another, he shall not be convicted of murder if he was suffering from such abnormality of mind (whether arising from a condition of arrested or retarded development of mind or any > inherent causes or induced by disease or injury) as substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts and omission in doing or being a party to the killing.[958]

575. The Trial Chamber, noting that the "special defence" was, by reason of Rule 67(A)(ii), "a plea offered by the Defence", ruled (in accordance with Landžo's submission) that a defendant offering such a plea carried the burden of proving it on the balance of probabilities,[959] but it reserved its decision as to the appropriate definition of that defence.[960]

576. This refusal by the Trial Chamber is said by Landžo to have violated the principles of certainty in the criminal law,[961] and of nullum crimen sine lege,[962] or ex post facto law (as it was described by counsel for Landžo).[963] These objections are misconceived. The law to be applied must be that which existed at the time the acts upon which the charges are based took place. However, the subsequent identification or interpretation of that law by the Tribunal, whenever that takes place, does not alter the law so as to offend either of those principles.[964]

577. Landžo also submitted that the refusal by the Trial Chamber to define the "special defence" in advance of evidence being given in relation to it denied him a fair trial.[965] It is, however, no part of a Trial Chamber's obligation to define such issues in advance. Its obligation is to rule upon issues at the appropriate time, after all of the relevant material has been placed before it and after hearing the arguments put forward by the parties. It may well be considered to be appropriate or convenient in the particular case to give a ruling of this type upon an assumed or agreed basis, but whether it is appropriate or convenient to do so in any case is a matter for the Trial Chamber in that case to determine in the exercise of its discretion. There is no basis for suggesting that the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion in the present case miscarried in its refusal to give in advance a definition of the "special defence".

578. Nor has any prejudice been demonstrated, as a result of that refusal, to show that Landžo's trial was unfair. First, the Trial Chamber substantially adopted the submission made by him as to the definition of the "special defence". After quoting Section 2(1) of the Homicide Act of 1957 of England and Wales the Trial Chamber said:

> Thus, the accused must be suffering from an abnormality of mind which has substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts or omissions. The abnormality of mind must have arisen from a condition of arrested or retarded development of the mind, or inherent causes induced by disease or injury.

And, later (after referring to an English authority):[966]

> It is, however, an essential requirement of the defence of diminished responsibility that the accused's abnormality of mind should substantially impair his ability to control his actions.[967]

Secondly, Landžo was not denied the opportunity of producing any evidence or making any submissions in relation to the "special defence". His counsel told the Appeals Chamber that, in effect, she had produced everything she had.[968] Thirdly, as will be seen when Ground 8 is considered, the "special defence" failed not through lack of evidence but because the Trial Chamber did not accept as true Landžo's evidence as to the facts upon which the psychiatric opinions were expressed.

579. This ground of appeal 7 is rejected.

D. Does Diminished Responsibility Constitute a Defence?

580. As stated earlier, both Landžo and the Trial Chamber appear to have assumed the existence of such a defence in international law by reason of Rule 67(A)(ii).[969] That sub-Rule is in the following terms:

> As early as reasonably practicable and in any event prior to the commencement of the trial:
>
> [...] the defence shall notify the Prosecutor of its intent to offer:
>
> (a) the defence of alibi; [...];
> (b) any special defence, including that of diminished or lack of mental responsibility; in which case the notification shall specify the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the special defence.

[968] Counsel for Landžo said: "We have a saying back home that, when you are not given the parameters like that, you throw everything against the wall and see what sticks" (Appeal Transcript, p 589); and: "But they didn't give us any guidance. They didn't tell us which law to use at that point. So I had to just throw everything out there [...]" (Appeal Transcript, p 600).
[969] The Trial Chamber referred to "the special defence provided for in sub-Rule 67(A)(ii)(b)" in the Trial Judgement, para 1163. Landžo also referred to the special defence as having been provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, in the Landžo Brief, p 85, and Appeal Transcript, p 590.

The Rule is not happily phrased.

581. It is a common misuse of the word to describe an alibi as a "defence". If a defendant raises an alibi, he is merely denying that he was in a position to commit the crime with which he is charged. That is not a defence in its true sense at all. By raising that issue, the defendant does no more than require the Prosecution to eliminate the reasonable possibility that the alibi is true.

582. On the other hand, if the defendant raises the issue of lack of mental capacity, he is challenging the presumption of sanity by a plea of insanity. That is a defence in the true sense, in that the defendant bears the onus of establishing it – that, more probably than not, at the time of the offence he was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of his act or, if he did know it, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong.[970] Such a plea, if successful, is a complete defence to a charge and it leads to an acquittal. It is submitted by Landžo that Rule 67(A)(ii) has also made diminished mental responsibility a complete defence to any charge (or has perhaps recognised it as such),[971] an argument which the Trial Chamber had accepted.[972]

583. Notwithstanding a claim by Landžo to the contrary,[973] there is no reference to any defence of diminished mental responsibility in the Tribunal's Statute. The description of diminished mental responsibility as a "special defence" in Rule 67(A)(ii) is insufficient to constitute it as such. The rule-making powers of the judges are defined by Article 15 of the Tribunal's Statute, which gives power to the judges to adopt only –

> [...] rules of procedure and evidence for the conduct of the pre-trial phase of the proceedings, trials and appeals, the admission of evidence, the protection of victims and witnesses and other appropriate matters.[974]

The Appeals Chamber has held that this power does not permit rules to be adopted which constitute new offences, but only rules of procedure and evidence for the conduct of matters falling within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.[975] It follows that there is, therefore, no power to adopt rules which constitute new defences. If there is a "special defence" of diminished responsibility known to international law, it must be found in the usual sources of international law – in this case, in the absence of reference to such a defence in established customary conventional law, in the general principles of law recognised by all nations.[976]

584. Landžo has submitted that such a "special defence" based upon the English model, with modifications, should be available in international law because it is "generally accepted as providing a fair and balanced defence",[977] it has been recognised in the domestic laws of many countries[978] and by the statute of the International Criminal Court adopted in 1998 ("ICC Statute").[979] An examination of the domestic laws referred to by the parties and of the ICC Statute does not support that submission.

585. The English Homicide Act 1957 provides that a person who kills or who is a party to the killing of another shall not be convicted of murder if he establishes that he was suffering from such an abnormality of mind (as defined) as substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts or omissions in doing so or being a party to the killing.[980] The section provides that, instead, he is liable to be convicted of manslaughter.[981] It is thus a partial defence, not a complete defence, to a charge of murder.

586. The partial defence of diminished responsibility originated in Scotland in the 19th century. It was developed there by the courts as a means of avoiding murder convictions for those offenders who were otherwise liable for murder but who did not satisfy the restrictive test for the defence of insanity, but whose mental state was nevertheless impaired.[982] The subsequent English statute, enacted in 1957, provided the model for largely identical legislation in some common law countries.[983] In most (if not all) such countries, the legislation, by reducing the crime from murder to manslaughter, permitted the sentencing judge to impose a sentence other than the relevant mandatory sentence for murder, which was either death or penal servitude for life. The partial defence is in effect, then, a matter which primarily provides for mitigation of sentence by reason of the diminished mental responsibility of the defendant. A recent review of the partial defence of diminished responsibility in Australia concluded that, notwithstanding the abolition of mandatory sentences for murder, the partial defence should be maintained in order to assist in the sentencing process.[984]

The Bahamas: Homicide Act 1957, section 2(1). Landžo argued (Landžo Brief, pp 105-106) that it exists also in the United States. He relied upon Section 4.02 of the Model Penal Code (1962) which makes admissible, in relation to the defendant's state of mind where it is an element of the offence, evidence that the defendant suffered from a mental disease or defect. However, that does not constitute diminished responsibility as a defence to the offence, it simply denies one of the elements of that offence.

587. The ICC Statute provides that a defendant shall not be criminally responsible if, at the relevant time, he or she –

> [...] suffers from a mental disease or defect that destroys that person's capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness or nature of his or her conduct, or capacity to control his or her conduct to conform to the requirements of law.[985]

This is not the same as any partial defence of diminished mental responsibility, as it requires the destruction of (and not merely the impairment to) the defendant's capacity, and it leads to an acquittal. It is akin to the defence of insanity. There is no express provision in the ICC Statute which is concerned with the consequences of an impairment to such a capacity.

588. On the other hand, in many other countries where the defendant's total mental incapacity to control his actions or to understand that they are wrong constitutes a complete defence, his diminished mental responsibility does not constitute either a partial or a complete defence, but it is relevant in mitigation of sentence.[986]

589. The Prosecution has submitted that both the Tribunal's full name[987] and the terms of its Statute[988] oblige it to deal with the persons "responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law"[989] according to the degree of their responsibility, so that there would be a complete defence arising out of the defendant's mental state only where he could not be held legally responsible at all for his actions.[990] The defendant's mental state would otherwise be relevant in mitigation of sentence, in accordance with Article 24.2 of the Tribunal's Statute, as one of "the individual circumstances" of the convicted person.[991]

590. The Appeals Chamber recognises that the rationale for the partial defence provided for the offence of murder by the English Homicide Act 1957 is inapplicable to proceedings before the Tribunal. There are no mandatory sentences. Nor is there any appropriate lesser offence available under the Tribunal's Statute for which the sentence would be lower and which could be substituted for any of the offences it has to try.[992] The Appeals Chamber accepts that the relevant general principle of law upon which, in effect, both the common law and the civil law systems have acted is that the defendant's diminished mental responsibility is relevant to the sentence to be imposed and is not a defence leading to an acquittal in the true sense. This is the appropriate general legal principle representing the international law to be applied in the Tribunal. Rule 67(A)(ii)(b) must therefore be interpreted as referring to diminished mental responsibility where it is to be raised by the defendant as a matter in mitigation of sentence. As a defendant bears the onus of establishing matters in mitigation of sentence, where he relies upon diminished mental responsibility in mitigation, he must establish that condition on the balance of probabilities – that more probably than not such a condition existed at the relevant time.

E. The Trial Chamber's Rejection of Diminished Mental Responsibility

591. The second ground of appeal filed by Landžo relating to diminished mental responsibility was in these terms:

> The Trial Chamber erred in law and made findings of fact inconsistent with the great weight of the evidence when it rejected clear evidence of diminished mental responsibility.[993]

[990] Prosecution Response, para 12.16.

[991] Ibid, para 12.21, relying upon Prosecutor v Erdemović, Case IT-96-22-T, Sentencing Judgement, 29 Nov 1996, ("First Erdemović Sentencing Judgement") p 20. Article 24.2 provides: "In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person".

[992] There is a discussion of these complexities in an article upon which both Landžo and the Prosecution relied in relation to different issues, "The Emerging Mental Incapacity Defense in International Criminal Law: Some Initial Questions of Implementation", Peter Krug, 94 the American Journal of International Law (2000) 317, at 331-333.

[993] Landžo Brief, Ground of Appeal 8.

This ground of appeal remains relevant, because Landžo also relied upon diminished m responsibility in mitigation of sentence.

592. Five psychiatrists gave evidence in relation to Landžo's mental condition. Four of them concluded that he suffered from a personality disorder (albeit described in different terms) and, in essence, that there was a substantial impairment of his mental responsibility for his actions in the Čelebići prison camp.[994] Their view was that his capacity to exercise his own free will when given orders was diminished.[995] Only one psychiatrist (who was called by the Prosecution) rejected the existence of a relevant personality disorder.[996] It was accordingly submitted by Landžo that the Trial Chamber's rejection of the evidence of the four psychiatrists in favour of the one dissentient called by the Prosecution (who had spent less time with the accused than had the others) was an arbitrary and capricious exercise of its discretion and an unreasonable one.[997]

593. This submission misconceives what the Trial Chamber concluded. It rejected the views of the four psychiatrists not because it preferred the views of the one psychiatrist called by the Prosecution, but because it did not accept the truth of the factual history given by Landžo upon which the four psychiatrists had based their opinions.[998] Specifically, it accepted the evidence that Landžo had admitted to one of the psychiatrists that he never had any difficulty inflicting pain and suffering on the prisoners and that he had enjoyed doing so.[999] The Trial Chamber rejected Landžo's evidence that he had committed the criminal acts with which he was charged on the direction of his co-accused Delić.[1000] The Trial Chamber was not persuaded that those [994] Although the Trial Chamber purported (at para 1169) to follow the common law authorities relating to the partial defence of diminished mental responsibility, it nevertheless permitted the psychiatrists, contrary to authority, to express their own opinions as to whether there was a substantial diminution of Landžo's mental responsibility. The issue as to whether the impairment of the defendant's mental responsibility for his act was substantial has been held to involve questions of degree, and thus that it is essentially one for the tribunal of fact: Regina v Byrne [1960] 2 QB 396 at 403-404. As that is not merely a medical issue of whether there was an impairment but also whether that impairment can "properly" be called substantial, whether the diminution of a person's mental responsibility for an act is not a matter within the expertise of the medical profession; it involves a value judgement by the tribunal of fact representing the community, not a finding of medical fact or opinion: Regina v Byrne (at 404); Walton v The Queen [1978] AC 788 at 793; Regina v Ryan (1995) 90 A Crim R 191 at 196. However, no objection was taken to the psychiatrists expressing their opinions upon the issue.

[995] Their evidence is summarised in the Landžo Brief, pp 109-132.

criminal acts by Landžo were not the product of his own free will.[1001] Although the Trial Chamber accepted the evidence of the psychiatrists that Landžo suffered from a personality disorder, it considered that the evidence relating to his inability to control his physical acts on account of an abnormality of mind was not at all satisfactory, and it concluded that, despite his personality disorder, Landžo was quite capable of controlling his actions.[1002]

594. All of these findings were clearly open to the Trial Chamber upon the evidence before it. An expert opinion is relevant only if the facts upon which it is based are true. It was nevertheless argued by Landžo that, as the psychiatrists have given evidence that they were trained to detect malingering by a patient, they were able to identify by the psychological testing they performed whether or not the patient was telling the truth,[1003] and that the contrary findings of the Trial Chamber were therefore unreasonable. This argument is rejected. It is for the Trial Chamber, and not for the medical experts, to determine whether the factual basis for an expert opinion is truthful. That determination is made in the light of all the evidence given. Notwithstanding their expertise, medical experts do not have the advantage of that evidence.

595. It has not been demonstrated that the rejection of the "special defence" of diminished mental responsibility was a conclusion which no reasonable tribunal of fact could have been reached. Ground of Appeal 8 is therefore rejected. Although it rejected the "special defence", the Trial Chamber did take into account Landžo's "personality traits" revealed by the psychiatrists when imposing sentence.[1004]

X. SELECTIVE PROSECUTION

596. Landžo alleges that he was the subject of a selective prosecution policy conducted by the Prosecution.[1005] He defines a selective prosecution as one "in which the criteria for selecting persons for prosecution are based, not on considerations of apparent criminal responsibility alone, but on extraneous policy reasons, such as ethnicity, gender, or administrative convenience."[1006] Specifically, he alleges that he, a young Muslim camp guard, was selected for prosecution, while indictments "against all other Defendants without military rank", who were all "non-Muslims of Serbian ethnicity", were withdrawn by the Prosecution on the ground of changed prosecutorial strategies.[1007]

597. The factual background to this contention is that the Prosecutor decided in 1998 to seek the withdrawal of the indictments against fourteen accused who at that stage had neither been arrested nor surrendered to the Tribunal. This application was granted by Judges of the Tribunal in early May 1998. At that stage, the trial in the present proceedings had been underway for a period of over twelve months. The Prosecutor's decision and the grant of leave to withdraw the indictment was announced in a Press Release, which explained the motivation for the decision in the following terms:

> Over recent months there has been a steady increase in the number of accused who have either been arrested or who have surrendered voluntarily to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. [...].
>
> The arrest and surrender process has been unavoidably piecemeal and sporadic and it appears that this is likely to continue. One result of this situation is that accused, who have been jointly indicted, must be tried separately, thereby committing the Tribunal to a much larger than anticipated number of trials.
>
> In light of that situation, I have re-evaluated all outstanding indictments vis-à-vis the overall investigative and prosecutorial strategies of my Office. Consistent with those strategies, which involve maintaining an investigative focus on persons holding higher levels of responsibility, or on those who have been personally responsible for the [sic] exceptionally brutal or otherwise extremely serious offences, I decided that it was appropriate to withdraw [1005] This ground of appeal states: "The Prosecutor's practice of selective prosecution violated Article 21 of the Statute of the ICTY, the rules of natural justice and of international law." Land'o Brief, p 13.

[1006] Landžo Brief, p 13.

[1007] Landžo Brief, p 15. The Prosecutor stated this change of strategy in an ICTY press release dated 8 May 1998, CC/PIU/314-E ("Press Release"). The Press Release is quoted in part in the Land'o Brief, p 16. The full statement was admitted into evidence by the Order on Motion of Appellant, Esad Landžo, to Admit Evidence on Appeal, and for Taking of Judicial Notice, 31 May 2000, pp 5-6. The Press Release refers to fourteen accused named in the "Omarska" and "Keraterm" indictments (Prosecutor v Sikirica, IT-95-4 and Prosecutor v Meaki}, IT-95-8). Press Release, pp 1-2.

> the charges against a number of accused in what have become known as the Omarska and Keraterm indictments, which were confirmed in February 1995 and July 1995 respectively.[1008]

Although counsel for Landžo submitted that the Prosecution sought and obtained the withdrawal of indictments against sixteen accused, "some of whom were already in custody" of the Tribunal at the relevant time,[1009] this was not the case. Although three people[1010] were released from the custody of the Tribunal on 19 December 1997 pursuant to a decision granting the Prosecutor's request to withdraw their indictment,[1011] the withdrawal of those indictments was based on the quite different consideration of insufficiency of evidence. Landžo does not appear to have intended to refer to the withdrawal of any indictments other than those referred to in the Press Release, and the submissions proceeded upon that basis.

598. Landžo accordingly submitted, first at trial and now on appeal, that, because the indictment against him was not also withdrawn, he was singled out for prosecution for an impermissible motive and that this selective prosecution contravened his right to a fair trial as guaranteed by Article 21 of the Statute. Citing a decision of the United States of America's Supreme Court, Yick Wo v Hopkins,[1012] and Article 21(3) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Landžo submits that the guarantee of a fair trial under Article 21(1) of the Statute incorporates the principle of equality and that prohibition of selective prosecution is a general principle of customary international criminal law.[1013]

599. The Trial Chamber, in its sentencing considerations, referred to Landžo's argument that, because he was an ordinary soldier rather than a person of authority, he should not be subject to the Tribunal's jurisdiction, and then stated:

> [The Trial Chamber] does, however, note that the statement issued in May this year (1998) by the Tribunal Prosecutor concerning the withdrawal of charges against several indicted persons, quoted by the Defence, indicates that an exception to the new policy of maintaining the investigation and indictment only of persons in positions of some military or political authority, is made for those responsible for exceptionally brutal or otherwise extremely serious offences. From the facts established and the findings of guilt made in the present case, the conduct of Esad Landžo would appear to fall within this exception.[1014]

600. The Prosecution argues that the Prosecutor has a broad discretion in deciding which cases should be investigated and which persons should be indicted.[1015] In exercising this discretion, the Prosecutor may have regard to a wide range of criteria. It is impossible, it is said, to prosecute all persons placed in the same position and, because of this, the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal is made concurrent with the jurisdiction of national courts by Article 9 of the Statute.[1016]

601. Article 16 of the Statute entrusts the responsibility for the conduct of investigation and prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1 January 1991 to the Prosecutor. Once a decision has been made to prosecute, subject to the requirement that the Prosecutor be satisfied that a prima facie case exists, Article 18 and 19 of the Statute require that an indictment be prepared and transmitted to a Judge of a Trial Chamber for review and confirmation if satisfied that a prima facie case has been established by the Prosecutor. Once an indictment is confirmed, the Prosecutor can withdraw it prior to the initial appearance of the accused only with the leave of the Judge who confirmed it, and after the initial appearance only with the leave of the Trial Chamber.[1017]

602. In the present context, indeed in many criminal justice systems, the entity responsible for prosecutions has finite financial and human resources and cannot realistically be expected to prosecute every offender which may fall within the strict terms of its jurisdiction. It must of necessity make decisions as to the nature of the crimes and the offenders to be prosecuted. It is beyond question that the Prosecutor has a broad discretion in relation to the initiation of investigations and in the preparation of indictments. This is acknowledged in Article 18(1) of the Statute, which provides:

> The Prosecutor shall initiate investigations ex-officio or on the basis of information obtained from any source, particularly from Governments, United Nations organs, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. The Prosecutor shall assess the information received or obtained and decide whether there is sufficient basis to proceed.

[1015] Prosecution Response, p 111.

[1016] Article 9(1) of the Statute reads: "The International Tribunal and national courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction to prosecute persons for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1 January 1991."

[1017] Rule 51(A).

It is also clear that a discretion of this nature is not unlimited. A number of limitations on discretion entrusted to the Prosecutor are evident in the Tribunal's Statute and Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

603. The Prosecutor is required by Article 16(2) of the Statute to "act independently as a separate organ of the International Tribunal", and is prevented from seeking or receiving instructions from any government or any other source. Prosecutorial discretion must therefore be exercised entirely independently, within the limitations imposed by the Tribunal's Statute and Rules. Rule 37(A) provides that the Prosecutor "shall perform all the functions provided by the Statute in accordance with the Rules and such Regulations, consistent with the Statute and the Rules, as may be framed by the Prosecutor."

604. The discretion of the Prosecutor at all times is circumscribed in a more general way by the nature of her position as an official vested with specific duties imposed by the Statute of the Tribunal. The Prosecutor is committed to discharge those duties with full respect of the law. In this regard, the Secretary-General's Report stressed that the Tribunal, which encompasses all of its organs, including the Office of the Prosecutor, must abide by the recognised principles of human rights.[1018]

605. One such principle is explicitly referred to in Article 21(1) of the Statute, which provides:

> All persons shall be equal before the International Tribunal.

This provision reflects the corresponding guarantee of equality before the law found in many international instruments, including the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights,[1019] the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,[1020] the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions,[1021] and the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.[1022] All [1018] Secretary-General's Report, para 106.

[1019] Article 7 provides: "All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination."

[1020] Article 14 provides: "[a]ll persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals [...]." Article 26 provides explicitly that "All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status."

[1021] Article 75 (fundamental guarantees) provides in para 1: "Insofar as they are affected by a situation referred to in Article 1 of this Protocol, persons who are in the power of a Party to the conflict and who do not benefit from more favourable treatment under the Conventions or under this Protocol shall be treated humanely in all circumstances and shall enjoy, as a minimum, the protection provided by this Article without any adverse these instruments provide for a right to equality before the law, which is central to the principle of the due process of law. The provisions reflect a firmly established principle of international law of equality before the law, which encompasses the requirement that there should be no discrimination in the enforcement or application of the law. Thus Article 21 and the principle it embodies prohibits discrimination in the application of the law based on impermissible motives such as, inter alia, race, colour, religion, opinion, national or ethnic origin. The Prosecutor, in exercising her discretion under the Statute in the investigation and indictment of accused before the Tribunal, is subject to the principle of equality before the law and to this requirement of non-discrimination.

606. This reflects principles which apply to prosecutorial discretion in certain national systems. In the United Kingdom, the limits on prosecutorial discretion arise from the more general principle, applying to the exercise of administrative discretion generally, that the discretion is to be exercised in good faith for the purpose for which it was conferred and not for some ulterior, extraneous or improper purpose.[1023] In the United States, where the guarantee of equal protection under the law is a constitutional one, the court may intervene where the accused demonstrates that the administration of a criminal law is "directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons [...] with a mind so unequal and oppressive" that the prosecutorial system amounts to "a practical denial" of the equal protection of the law.[1024]

607. The burden of the proof rests on Landžo, as an appellant alleging that the Prosecutor has improperly exercised prosecutorial discretion, to demonstrate that the discretion was improperly exercised in relation to him. Landžo must therefore demonstrate that the decision to prosecute him or to continue his prosecution was based on impermissible motives, such as race or religion, and that the Prosecution failed to prosecute similarly situated defendants.

distinction based upon race, colour, sex, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national or social origin, wealth, birth or other status, or on any other similar criteria."

[1022] Article 21(3) provides "[t]he application and interpretation of law pursuant to this article must be consistent with internationally recognised human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in article 7, paragraph 3, age, race, colour, language, religion or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status."

[1023] R v Inland Revenue Commissioners, ex parte Mead and Cook, [1993] 1 All ER 772. It has also been accepted in Australia that there may be a principle pursuant to which proof of a selective prosecution may give rise to some relief, including, for example, the exclusion of evidence: Hutton v Kneipp [1995] QCA 203.

[1024] Yick Wo v Hopkins 118 US 356, 373 (1886); United States v Armstrong 517 US 456, 464-465 (1996).

609. Landžo submits that a test drawn from United States case-law, and in particular the case United States of America v Armstrong,[1026] provides the required threshold for selective prosecution claims. Pursuant to this test, the complainant must prove first that he was singled out for prosecution for an improper motive, and secondly, that the Prosecutor elected not to prosecute other similarly situated defendants. There is therefore no significant difference between the applicable standards identified by Landžo and by the Prosecution.

610. As observed by the Prosecution, the test relied on by Landžo in United States of America v Armstrong, puts a heavy burden on an appellant.[1027] To satisfy this test, Landžo must demonstrate clear evidence of the intent of the Prosecutor to discriminate on improper motives, and that other similarly situated persons were not prosecuted. Other jurisdictions which recognise an ability for judicial review of a prosecutorial discretion also indicate that the threshhold is a very high one.[1028]

611. It is unnecessary to select between such domestic standards, as it is not appropriate for the Appeals Chamber simply to rely on the jurisprudence of any one jurisdiction in determining the applicable legal principles. The provisions of the Statute referred to above and the relevant principles of international law provide adequate guidance in the present case. The breadth of the discretion of the Prosecutor, and the fact of her statutory independence, imply a presumption that the prosecutorial functions under the Statute are exercised regularly. This presumption may be rebutted by an appellant who can bring evidence to establish that the discretion has in fact not been exercised in accordance with the Statute; here, for example, in contravention of the principle of equality before the law in Article 21. This would require evidence from which a clear inference can be drawn that the Prosecutor was motivated in that case by a factor inconsistent with that principle. Because the principle is one of equality of persons before the law, it involves a comparison with the legal treatment of other persons who must be similarly situated for such a comparison to be a meaningful one. This essentially reflects the two-pronged test advocated by Landžo and by the Prosecution of (i) establishing an unlawful or improper (including discriminatory) motive for the prosecution and (ii) establishing that other similarly situated persons were not prosecuted.

612. Landžo argues that he was the only Bosnian Muslim accused without military rank or command responsibility held by the Tribunal, and he contends that he was singled out for prosecution "simply because he was the only person the Prosecutor's office could find to 'represent' the Bosnian Muslims". He was, it is said, prosecuted to give an appearance of "evenhandedness" to the Prosecutor's policy.[1029] Landžo alleges that the Prosecutor's decision to seek the withdrawal of indictments against the accused identified in the Press Release, without seeking the discontinuation of the proceedings against Landžo, was evidence of a discriminatory purpose. Landžo rejects the justification given by the Prosecutor in the Press Release of a revaluation of indictments according to changed strategies "in light of the decision to except the one Muslim defendant without military rank or command responsibility from the otherwise complete dismissal of charges against Defendants having that status."[1030]

613. The Prosecution argues that a change of prosecutorial tactics, in view of the need to reassign available resources of the Prosecution, cannot be considered as being significative of discriminatory intent. Furthermore, the evidence of discriminatory intent must be coupled with the evidence that the Prosecutor's policy had a discriminatory effect, so that other similarly situated individuals of other ethnic or religious backgrounds were not prosecuted. The Prosecution observes that those against whom charges were withdrawn had not yet been arrested or surrendered to the Tribunal, whereas Land'o was in custody and his case already mid-trial.[1031] The Prosecution adds that even if it was to be considered that the continuation of Landžo's trial resulted in him being singled out, it was in any event for the commission of exceptionally brutal or otherwise serious offences.[1032]

614. The crimes of which Landžo was convicted are described both in the Trial Judgement and in the present judgement at paragraphs 565-570. The Appeals Chamber considers that, in light of the unquestionably violent and extreme nature of these crimes, it is quite clear that the decision to continue the trial against Landžo was consistent with the stated policy of the Prosecutor to "focus on persons holding higher levels of responsibility, or on those who have been personally responsible for the exceptionally brutal or otherwise extremely serious offences."[1033] A decision, made in the context of a need to concentrate prosecutorial resources, to identify a person for prosecution on the basis that they are believed to have committed exceptionally brutal offences can in no way be described as a discriminatory or otherwise impermissible motive.

615. Given the failure of Landžo to adduce any evidence to establish that the Prosecution had a discriminatory or otherwise unlawful or improper motive in indicting or continuing to prosecute him, it is not strictly necessary to have reference to the additional question of whether there were other similarly situated persons who were not prosecuted or against whom prosecutions were discontinued. However, the facts in relation to this question support the conclusion already drawn that Landžo was not the subject of a discriminatory selective prosecution.

616. All of the fourteen accused against whom charges were withdrawn pursuant to the Prosecutor's change of policy, unlike Landžo, had not been arrested and were not in the custody of the Tribunal. None of the fourteen persons identified in the Press Release as the subject of the withdrawn indictments had been arrested or surrendered to the Tribunal so were not in the Tribunal's custody.

617. At the time at which the decision was taken to withdraw the indictments on the basis of changed prosecutorial strategy, the trial of Landžo and his co-accused had been underway for over twelve months. None of the persons in respect of whom the indictments were withdrawn were facing trial at the time. These practical considerations alone, which demonstrate an important difference in the situation of Landžo and the persons against whom indictments were withdrawn, also provide the rational justification for the Prosecutor's decisions at the time. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Prosecutor explicitly stated that accused against whom charges were withdrawn could still be tried at a later stage by the Tribunal or by national courts by virtue of the principle of concurrent jurisdiction.[1034] Had Landžo been released with the leave of the Trial Chamber, he would have been subject to trial upon the same or similar charges in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

[1033] Press Release, p 1 (emphasis added).
[1034] Press Release.

618. Finally, even if in the hypothetical case that those against whom the indictments were withdrawn were identically situated to Landžo, the Appeals Chamber cannot accept that the appropriate remedy would be to reverse the convictions of Landžo for the serious offences with which he had been found guilty. Such a remedy would be an entirely disproportionate response to such a procedural breach. As noted by the Trial Chamber, it cannot be accepted that "unless all potential indictees who are similarly situated are brought to justice, there should be no justice done in relation to a person who has been indicted and brought to trial".[1035]

619. This ground of appeal is therefore dismissed.

[1035] Trial Judgement, para 180.

XI. JUDGE KARIBI-WHYTE

620. Landžo filed a ground of appeal based on an allegation that the Presiding Judge at trial, Judge Karibi-Whyte, "was asleep during substantial portions of the trial".[1036] This ground of appeal was subsequently adopted by Mucić and Delić,[1037] but it was agreed that counsel for Landžo carried the burden of argument on this ground.[1038] The grounds of appeal are stated as follows:

> Landžo Ground 4
>
> The Participation, As Presiding Judge Of The Trial Chamber, Of A Judge Who Was Asleep During Substantial Portions Of The Trial, Denied Appellants The Right To the Full And Competent Judicial Decision Of Questions of Law, Fact, And Evidence, and Improperly Denied Appellants A Fair Trial, And The Appearance Of A Fair Trial.[1039]
>
> Mucić Ground 3, Delić Issue 20
> Whether Mucić and Delić were deprived of a fair trial due to the fact that the Presiding Judge at the Trial Chamber slept during substantial portions of the trial.[1040]

621. Landžo tendered a variety of material in relation to the issue of whether Judge Karibi-Whyte was asleep during the trial, including the audio-visual recordings taken by courtroom cameras during the proceedings, newspaper reports, and affidavits of persons who observed part of the proceedings.

622. The audio-visual records already formed part of the trial record, and thus were not admitted into evidence as such.[1041] However, the Appeals Chamber granted leave for tapes to be made, containing copies of those portions of the audio-visual recordings produced by the courtroom cameras generally focussed on the judges' bench nominated by Landžo and by the Prosecution ("Extracts Tapes"), for use by the Appeals Chamber as a convenient method of viewing the material relevant to this ground of appeal.[1042] The Appeals Chamber declined to admit the other material tendered by Landžo on the grounds that it was not admissible, or that it was not relevant, or that it had no probative value in relation to the issues raised by the ground of appeal, or that it was repetitive as it would not advance Landžo's case beyond what was already shown in the Extracts Tapes.[1043]

623. Landžo also made an extremely late application for the Extracts Tapes to be viewed by an expert to see whether he could give an opinion as to –

> [...] Judge Karibi-Whyte's ability or inability to perform his duties as Presiding Judge in the manner necessary to afford Appellants and the other accused a fair trial.[1044]

The application was opposed by the Prosecution upon the bases that it was untimely, that a grant of the relief sought would cause delay, that the proposed expert witness testimony would be of uncertain value and that the Prosecution would not have the opportunity to call its own expert witness without delaying the hearing of the appeal.[1045] The application was refused by the Appeals Chamber upon the grounds that, even assuming Landžo's expert could give his opinion without delay, the absence of any reasonable opportunity for the Prosecution to respond with its own expert's evidence without further delaying the hearing of the appeal would be prejudicial to the Prosecution in the exercise of its prosecutorial role which it performs on behalf of the international community. The Appeals Chamber noted also that any further delay in the hearing would be contrary to the interests of justice, that Landžo, who could in the exercise of due diligence have sought relief at an earlier time, could not at that late stage complain of unfairness, and that, as the medical expert would not have access to any medical records relating to Judge Karibi-Whyte or the opportunity to medically examine him, the weight to be afforded to his evidence would not be such as to justify the prejudice to the Prosecution and the other appellants which would be caused by delaying the hearing of the appeal.[1046]

A. The Allegations as to the Presiding Judge's Conduct

624. Based upon what was said to be demonstrated by the Extracts Tapes, a number of allegations as to the conduct of Judge Karibi-Whyte during the trial were made in the Supplementary Brief filed on behalf of Landžo in relation to this ground of appeal. These allegations included the following:

> These portions [of the Extracts Tapes] clearly and unambiguously paint a disturbing picture of a Judge prone to fall asleep during all phases of the trial, at almost any time when he was not speaking, examining a document, or otherwise being actively engaged.[1047]
>
> This is a question of a Judge sleeping deeply, as if in his own bed, at all hours of the day, and regardless of the nature of the events unfolding around him.[1048]
>
> [...] the particulars [i.e. the portions of the audio-visual record in the Extracts Tapes] paint such a clear and unambiguous pattern of continuous sleep, it is not only a reasonable inference, but an almost irresistible one, that the Judge's sleeping in the courtroom continued while the relevant cameras were not trained on him [...].[1049]
>
> [...] the clear evidence provided by the relevant cameras of Judge Karibi-Whyte being deeply asleep [...].[1050]
>
> It was frequently necessary for members of the Registrar's office, and another member of the Trial Chamber, Judge Jan, to awaken the Presiding Judge.[1051]

B. Applicable Legal Principles

625. No precedent in the international context was cited in relation to the specific issue raised by this ground of appeal, and none has been discovered by the Appeals Chamber's own research. Guidance as to the legal principles relevant to an allegation that a trial judge was not always fully conscious of the trial proceedings may therefore be sought from the jurisprudence and experience of national legal systems. The national jurisprudence considered by the Appeals Chamber discloses that proof that a judge slept through, or was otherwise not completely attentive to, part of proceedings is a matter which, if it causes actual prejudice to a party, may affect the fairness of the proceedings to a such degree as to give rise to a right to a new trial or other adequate remedy.[1052] The parties essentially agreed that these are the principles which apply to the issue before the Appeals Chamber.[1053]

626. The jurisprudence of national jurisdictions indicates that it must be proved by clear evidence that the judge was actually asleep or otherwise not fully conscious of the proceedings, rather than that he or she merely gave the appearance of being asleep.[1054] Landžo accepted that it was necessary to prove by evidence the allegation upon which this ground of appeal is based.[1055]

C. Was the Allegation Proved?

627. The Extracts Tapes were viewed by the Appeals Chamber prior to the hearing of the appeal. Even accepting that the cameras nominated by Landžo were not always focussed on the judges' bench, and thus that there is not a complete record of Judge Karibi-Whyte's conduct throughout the trial, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the descriptions quoted above are both highly coloured and gravely exaggerated. The descriptions given in the particulars in Exhibit B to Landžo's Supplementary Brief, which identify what is to be seen in each portion of the Extracts Tapes upon which reliance is placed, are similarly coloured and exaggerated, and they appear to have been given with a reckless indifference as to the truth.

628. The appellants have manifestly failed to establish the allegation in the ground of appeal, that Judge Karibi-Whyte "was asleep during substantial portions of the trial". The Extracts Tapes do, however, demonstrate a recurring pattern of behaviour where Judge Karibi-Whyte appears not to have been fully conscious of the proceedings for short periods at a time. Such periods were usually of five to ten seconds only, but this pattern is repeated over extended periods of ten to fifteen minutes on a number of occasions. On very few occasions, this loss of attention lasted up to thirty seconds. On one occasion only, during the course of an excessively lengthy examination of a medical witness by counsel for Landžo, the judge appeared to be asleep for approximately thirty minutes. On a different occasion, Judge Jan leant over to touch Judge Karibi-Whyte when his head had dropped. Judge Karibi-Whyte can also be heard to be breathing very noisily at times, but such times include occasions where he is obviously very fully conscious of the proceedings.

629. Such behaviour revealed by the Extracts Tapes warrants an examination as to whether, notwithstanding their failure to establish the factual basis of these grounds of appeal, the appellants nevertheless have a valid cause for complaint as to the fairness of the trial. It must be said, firmly, that Judge Karibi-Whyte's conduct cannot be accepted as appropriate conduct for a judge. Even if, as may well be the position, he had no control over his loss of attention, litigants are in general entitled to the full attention of the judges who have to decide their case. The charges being tried in this case were extremely serious, and the consequences of conviction for the accused were equally serious. If a judge suffers from some condition which prevents him or her from giving full attention during the trial, then it is the duty of that judge to seek medical assistance and, if that does not help, to withdraw from the case.

D. Absence of Identifiable Prejudice

630. Such conclusions do not, however, automatically lead to the quashing of the judgement which was given in this case. As stated earlier, the national jurisprudence indicates that, before a remedy will be granted on the basis that a judge has been asleep or otherwise inattentive, it must be proved that some identifiable prejudice was caused thereby to the complaining party.[1056] In some continental systems where the sleeping or inattention of a judge may form the basis for a ground of appeal or revision of a judgement – for example, because the court was thereby not properly constituted[1057] – no separate reference is made to the necessity to demonstrate prejudice before such a ground would succeed. However, in order to establish a violation in those cases, a party must prove that the judge in question was unable to perceive [1057] See, in Germany, the Strafprozeßordnung, which provides by Article 338 (1) that an absolute ground for revision of a judgement is that the trial court was not constituted as provided. Article 338 (1) may be violated where a judge or lay assessor is asleep or otherwise "absent".

"essential" or "crucial" events in the hearing.[1058] If such a standard of judicial inattention has been proved, some actual prejudice must necessarily have been incurred, or at least the proceedings must necessarily have been defective in a material way. The complaining party must prove the relevant prejudice by clear evidence.[1059] Indeed, it has been held that to grant a new trial on the basis of the inattention of a juror without clear proof of any prejudice caused thereby constitutes "a clear abuse of discretion".[1060]

631. The prejudice which must be proved may be manifested where the judge fails in some identifiable way to assess the evidence properly or expresses an incorrect understanding of the evidence which was given or the submissions which were put.[1061] Elsewhere, it has been held that what must be proved is that the judge is completely inattentive to such a substantial or significant part of the proceedings that there has been a "significant defect" in the proceedings.[1062] The failure of counsel to object or to call attention to a judge's sleeping or inattention during the proceedings is relevant to the question as to whether prejudice has been established. Failure of counsel to object will usually indicate that counsel formed the view at the time that the matters to which the judge was inattentive were not of such significance to his case that the proceedings could not continue without attention being called thereto.[1063]

632. The necessity that an appellant establish that some prejudice has actually been caused by a judge's inattention before a remedy will be granted is simply a matter of common sense. It is clear that there are a number of legitimate reasons why a judge's attention may briefly be drawn away from the court proceedings before him or her, including taking a note of the evidence or of a particular submission or looking up the transcript to check evidence previously given. It has been recognised in national jurisprudence that instances of inattention of that nature do not cause prejudice or undermine the fairness of the trial, but are an integral part of a judge's task in assessing the case before him or her.[1064]

633. Moreover, where a judge of this Tribunal misses any evidence, there is not only a transcript to be read but also a video-tape to be viewed if the demeanour of the witness needs to be checked, and there are the observations of the other two judges to assist. Indeed, for these reasons it has been recognised in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Tribunal that the short absence of a judge from trial proceedings need not necessarily prevent the continuation of the proceedings in the presence of the remaining two judges. Rule 15*bis*(A) states:

> If (i) a Judge is, for illness or other urgent personal reasons, or for reasons of authorised Tribunal business unable to continue sitting in a part-heard case for a period which is likely to be of short duration, and (ii) the remaining Judges of the Trial Chamber are satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so, those remaining Judges of the Chamber may order that the hearing of the case continue in the absence of that Judge for a period of not more than three days.

Although this rule was not in force at the time of the Čelebići trial proceedings,[1065] the fact of its adoption is a clear demonstration that the judges of the Tribunal meeting in plenary considered it to be consistent with the principles of a fair trial and with the Statute of the Tribunal to permit proceedings to be conducted in the temporary absence of one judge.

634. Again, the necessity of establishing some prejudice in order to be entitled to any remedy in relation to this ground of appeal is accepted by Landžo.[1066] However, no specific prejudice has been established by him. The only matter to which reference needs to be made is the fact that Judge Karibi-Whyte slept through thirty minutes of the evidence in chief of one of Landžo's medical witnesses – a psychiatrist who gave evidence upon the issue of diminished mental responsibility. If the Trial Chamber's rejection of the psychiatric evidence given on behalf of Landžo had depended upon a preference for the views of the psychiatrist called by the Prosecution over the views of the four psychiatrists called by Landžo, this fact could possibly have demonstrated a substantial prejudice to his case. However, as stated earlier, this was not the basis upon which the Trial Chamber rejected their views. The Trial Chamber rejected their views because it did not accept the truth of the factual history given by Landžo upon which the four psychiatrists had based their opinions.[1067] events of the proceedings. Such an impression can even be made by actions to which the judge is legally obliged [sic]".

[1065] It was adopted at the Twenty-first Plenary Session, 15-17 Nov 1999, (Revision 17 of the Rules) and entered into force on 7 Dec 1999. The words "or for reasons of authorised Tribunal business" were inserted by Revision 19 of the Rules, with effect from 19 Jan 2001.

635. Landžo nevertheless relied by way of analogy upon certain domestic cases which, he contended, established that prejudice is inherent in a party's counsel sleeping during trial.[1068] However, it is apparent from a reading of these cases that the view that a counsel's sleeping during trial is inherently prejudicial has been taken by only one appeals court, other courts having found it necessary to look at the record and the evidence to establish whether the client's interests were in fact "at stake" at the relevant times and therefore prejudiced by the counsel's inattention.[1069] Further, the fact of a counsel sleeping or being seriously inattentive to his or her client's case – and thereby providing ineffective assistance – during a trial differs from the issue of judicial inattention, in that defence counsel, who alone truly knows the interests of his or her client, is necessarily obliged to safeguard those interests at every moment during the trial, in order to avoid prejudice which cannot be remedied.

636. Landžo argued that he has proved "necessary and irreversible prejudice" because, as it was Judge Karibi-Whyte's duty to play a full part in the decision of all questions of fact, law and evidence, he had been "deprived of the right to have Judge Karibi-Whyte bring his independent judgment to bear on the conferences in which all three Judges participated [...]".[1070] Landžo and the other appellants were, however, unable to point to any evidence which supports this allegation or which indicates that Judge Karibi-Whyte did not in fact participate in all relevant deliberations during and after the trial. It was in fact acknowledged during oral submissions that the appellants did not know and could not now establish what participation Judge Karibi-Whyte would have had in deliberations with the other judges in relation to the proceedings.[1071] From the conclusions drawn by the Appeals Chamber on the basis of its review of the Extracts Tapes, it rejects the submission that the content of the tapes gives rise to "an almost irresistible inference that the Judge missed much of the evidence and argument".[1072]

637. Reliance was also placed by Landžo on the principle that there must be the appearance of a fair trial,[1073] with the implication that even proof of an appearance that a judge was sleeping during proceedings is an adequate foundation for relief without proof of prejudice. An English case, R v Weston-Super-Mare Justices, ex parte Taylor, was cited in support of this contention.[1074] There, the Queen's Bench Divisional Court set aside a defendant's conviction on the basis that the chairperson of a bench of magistrates had appeared to be asleep for part of the trial. The defendant's solicitor, believing that the chairperson had been asleep, suggested to her through the clerk of the court that she retire and leave the remaining two magistrates to determine the case. The Divisional Court, having referred to evidence before it as to the magistrate's conduct, found that she had not in fact been asleep. However, it held that the magistrate should have withdrawn in response to the request because it was clear that the defendant's solicitor had formed a genuine view that she had been asleep, and that "the administration of justice required not only that justice was in fact done, but also that justice was seen to be done".[1075]

638. The conclusion in that case turned on the views formed, albeit genuinely, by a single observer, even though they were contradicted by the evidence of other observers which was ultimately preferred by the review court in its finding.[1076] The Appeals Chamber does not accept that this was the correct approach. In relation generally to the right to a fair trial under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the European Court of Human Rights has held that, despite

> [...] the importance of appearances in the administration of justice, [...] the standpoint of the persons concerned is not in itself decisive. The misgivings of the individuals before the courts, for instance with regard to the fairness of the proceedings, must in addition be capable of being held to be objectively justified [...].[1077]

639. Further, the proposition on which ex parte Taylor turned – that the perceived appearance of sleep means that justice is not being seen to be done, and therefore affects the fairness of the trial – is inconsistent both with other English jurisprudence on the issue of judicial inattention and with the other domestic jurisprudence referred to in paragraphs 625 and 626 above.[1078]

[1076] In other cases in which counsel for a party gave evidence that they had formed the opinion that the trial judge was sleeping, this was dealt with by the review court as being one part of the relevant evidence on the issue, rather than as proof that, because one observer had formed the opinion that the judge was sleeping, justice was not being seen to be done. See, e.g., R v Langham and Langham [1972] Crim LR 457 (Court of Appeal, Criminal Division); Stathooles v Mount Isa Mines Ltd [1997] 2 Qd R 106, at 110 (Queensland Court of Appeal).

E. Obligation to Raise the Issue at Trial

640. It was submitted by the Prosecution that the principle of "waiver" prevents the appellants from raising the subject matter of this ground of appeal. It contends that the appellants, not having raised the allegations that the Presiding Judge was sleeping during the trial, are now precluded from advancing them for the first time on appeal.[1079] The Appeals Chamber accepts that, as a general principle, a party should not be permitted to refrain from making an objection to a matter which was apparent during the course of the trial and to raise it only in the event of an adverse finding against that party. This principle, established in many national jurisdictions, has been recognised in previous decisions of the Appeals Chamber.[1080]

641. In cases where it is alleged that a trial judge was sleeping or otherwise inattentive during proceedings, the jurisprudence in national systems demonstrates that there is another significant, and more important, reason for the requirement that the complaining party must raise the issue during the proceedings at the time of the judge's sleeping or inattention. The matter must be raised with the court at the time the problem is perceived in order to enable the problem to be remedied, first by ensuring that the judge's attention is restored to the relevant testimony or submissions, and secondly by having the relevant testimony or submissions repeated. Even if this is not possible, it enables the court or a subsequent review court to identify what portion of the proceedings have not received the attention of the trial judge in order to determine whether any significance should be attached to such inattention.[1081] Thus the requirement that the issue deplore but was not a sufficient ground for saying that justice was not seen to be done". See also R v George, 12 June 1984, Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), where it is said that the appearance of sleep "[...] proves no basis for an appeal unless it can be shown that the learned judge may have been asleep or at any rate that his conduct during the trial had a bearing on the outcome of the trial".

The party cannot remain silent on the matter only to return on appeal to seek a trial de novo, as the Defence seeks to do in this case". See also Prosecutor v Aleksovski, IT-95-14/1-AR73, Decision on Prosecutor's Appeal on Admissibility of Evidence, 16 Feb 1999, par 20: "[...] no such complaint was made to the Trial Chamber [...] and it should not be permitted to be made for the first time on appeal".

must have been raised during the proceedings is not simply an application of a formal doctrine of waiver, but a matter indispensable to the grant of fair and appropriate relief.

642. No attempt was made to raise the issue formally before the Trial Chamber. Counsel for Landžo sought to explain her failure to do so by saying that she had approached "this sensitive issue in the most diplomatic way possible", by raising it with the Registrar and the then President of the Tribunal (Judge Cassese) rather than in court.[1082] She went on to say:

> Judge Karibi-White along with the other two Judges was the fact finder in the trial. He would be determining the guilt and/or innocence, and he would be determining the amount of sentence to be imposed. Direct confrontation with the fact finder at this point in the trial would not have benefited my client. Approaching the Registry and the President of the Tribunal regarding these issues was the direction that I considered most prudent at this juncture in the trial.

643. In another affidavit, counsel for Landžo said that, between August and November 1997, she had "informally" discussed the problem with the Trial Chamber's Senior Legal Officer, who had responded that "the matter was being addressed by the Tribunal".[1083] In August 1997, she had prepared a "Motion for Mistrial" and her "Resignation under Protest", "because of the sleeping of the Judge and the total disrespect by the Presiding Judge for all those attempting to perform their duties during the trial".[1084] She says that she met with the Registrar, who persuaded her not to resign and who arranged a meeting with President Cassese. President Cassese had assured her that he "would attend to the matter". She had thereafter continued to discuss the "continuing problem" with the Senior Legal Officer of the Trial Chamber.[1085]

644. To have made a complaint to the Trial Chamber itself, it is said, would have been "inappropriate and futile", because it "would necessarily have alienated one of the three triers of fact, causing potentially irreparable harm to Landžo's case".[1086] In pursuing the alternative course, it is said, she "acted in the highest traditions of the Bar".[1087]

645. The Appeals Chamber does not agree. Such an approach fails to recognise that raising the issue before the Trial Chamber is indispensable to the grant of fair and appropriate relief. Moreover, it clearly could be anticipated that, by taking her complaint to the President, it would necessarily be made known to Judge Karibi-Whyte. The issue was, indeed, made known to him.[1088] The "highest traditions of the Bar" require counsel to be considerably more robust on behalf of their client in such circumstances as these than counsel for Landžo was in this case. Co-counsel for Landžo on the appeal referred – for a somewhat different purpose – to his need in the present case to make his submissions on this and other grounds of appeal "in a somewhat more direct manner to the court – respectful, but direct", which he proceeded to do in a robust, but entirely appropriate, manner.[1089] Any counsel of experience will have had the embarrassing duty at some stage of his or her career of saying something unpleasant to a judge.[1090] Counsel for Landžo herself did not flinch from making very serious (although completely baseless) allegations of impropriety against the Appeals Chamber concerning the compilation of the Extracts Tapes in a filing prior to the hearing of the appeal.[1091]

646. In interlocutory proceedings, the Appeals Chamber held that the discussion between counsel for Landžo and both President Cassese and the Senior Legal Officer of the Trial Chamber fell within the scope of an adjudicative privilege or judicial immunity from compulsion to testify and that, as the evidence could be given by counsel herself, it was inappropriate to request either of them to waive that immunity and give evidence.[1092] It was also held that the discussions counsel for Landžo had with the Registrar were the subject of a qualified privilege, so that the Registrar's evidence could not be compelled if the evidence could be given by counsel herself.[1093] The assertions by counsel for Landžo in her affidavits were therefore uncontradicted. The Prosecution said that it had no knowledge of the facts asserted, and that it was willing to proceed on the basis that they are correct.[1094] It did not seek to cross-

All this was disclosed to Landžo: Letter dated 3 Sept 1997, annexed to Motion to Obtain Evidence.

examine her upon them. Her evidence was admitted into evidence by the Appeals Chamber "without prejudice to the weight it would ultimately be afforded".[1095]

647. The Appeals Chamber does not place any particular weight upon the assertions of counsel as to what the Senior Legal Officer of the Trial Chamber said to her. It accepts that she complained to him about the judge's conduct (including his sleeping), but no more. There are no contemporaneous records to support the version which she now gives. The Appeals Chamber has not been impressed by her standards of accuracy in other documents filed with the Tribunal. The assertions she made in the particulars as to what is to be seen in each portion of the Extract Tapes upon which reliance is placed,[1096] when compared with what is in fact seen on the tapes themselves, are so coloured and exaggerated in nature and inaccurate in content that the Appeals Chamber does not accept that her assertions concerning the Senior Legal Officer are true.

648. When the documents prepared by counsel for Landžo for the purposes of her approach to the Registrar and President Cassese are examined,[1097] as well as the other relevant documents to which reference has been made, it is clear that the primary concern motivating counsel for Landžo was the manner in which she had been treated by Judge Karibi-Whyte, and that his sleeping was only of secondary concern. Allegations are made that Judge Karibi-Whyte made personal attacks on counsel, that he did not respect them and that he was spiteful; even in the secondary complaint that he had slept during the proceedings, reference is made to his "lack of judicial temperament, self restraint and common decency".[1098]

649. Such conduct towards counsel alleged against Judge Karibi-Whyte has not been made the subject of any ground of appeal, and it is not relevant to any issue which the Appeals Chamber must decide. The allegations are referred to only for the purpose of demonstrating that they were the primary source of counsel's complaints to the Registrar and to President Cassese, and that the allegations that the judge slept through the proceedings were only secondary. There is no suggestion that any complaints concerning the judge's alleged sleeping were made following November 1997, notwithstanding that, according to the particulars supplied by Landžo,[1099] his sleeping continued throughout the trial (the last entry being 12 October 1998). For the reasons already given, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the explanation by counsel for Landžo for her failure to raise the issue before the Trial Chamber itself.

F. Conclusion

650. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the use now of the secondary complaint concerning the judge's inattention during the trial to found Landžo's fourth ground of appeal is opportunistic. The absence of any actual prejudice caused by the judge's inattention requires that this ground of appeal and the corresponding grounds of appeal by Mucić and Delić be dismissed.

XII. JUDGE ODIO BENITO AND VICE-PRESIDENCY OF COSTA RICA

651. Three of the appellants – Delić, Mucić and Landžo – filed grounds of appeal based upon the facts that, whilst still a judge of the Tribunal and engaged in hearing this case, Judge Odio Benito was elected as a Vice-President of Costa Rica and took an oath of office as such. The grounds were in the following terms:

> Delić Issue 1
> Whether the Trial Chamber was properly constituted after 8 May 1998 in that Judge Elizabeth Odio Benito was no longer qualified to serve as a judge of the Tribunal in that she did not meet the qualifications in Article 13(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal.[1100] singled out for unfair treatment. This reference to the judge falling asleep is referred to only briefly and as a secondary concern.

The Participation at Trial as a Member of the Trial Chamber of a Judge Ineligible to Sit as a Judge of the Tribunal Violated Articles 13 and 21 of the Statute of the ICTY, the Rules of Natural Justice and International Law and Rendered the Trial a Nullity.[1102]

These grounds raise two distinct issues:

(1) Was Judge Odio Benito no longer qualified as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of those facts?

(2) Should Judge Odio Benito have disqualified herself as a judge by reason of those facts because she was no longer independent?

A. Background

652. Judge Odio Benito was elected as a judge of the Tribunal in September 1993, and she was installed as such on 17 November 1993 for a term of four years.[1103] In the elections held on 20 May 1997, neither she nor the other two judges hearing this case were re-elected. On 27 August 1997, the UN Security Council passed a resolution endorsing a recommendation by the Secretary-General that these three judges, "once replaced as members of the Tribunal, finish the Čelebići case which they have begun before expiry of their terms of office [...]".[1104]

653. On 1 February 1998, and during the course of the trial in this case, Judge Odio Benito was elected as the Second Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica, and she took an oath of office as such on 8 May 1998. On 25 May 1998, the four accused jointly filed a "Motion on Judicial Independence", addressed to Judge Karibi-White, the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber. The four accused submitted that Judge Odio Benito should cease to take any further part in the trial, upon the grounds that, by having taken that oath of office and thereby become a member of the executive branch of the Government of Costa Rica:

(1) she had ceased to meet (a) the qualifications for a judge of the Tribunal, and (b) the criteria required for an independent judge in international law, and

(2) she had acquired an association which may affect her impartiality.[1105]

Pursuant to Rule 15(B) of the Tribunal's Rules, Judge Karibi-White conferred with Judge Odio Benito and then referred the Motion to the Bureau for its determination.[1106]

[1102] Landžo Brief, p 2.
[1103] Statute of the Tribunal, Article 13.4.

654. On 4 September 1998, the Bureau determined that Judge Odio Benito was not disqualified from sitting in the trial on the grounds referred to in Rule 15(A).[1107] Although the Bureau acknowledged that its competence conferred by the Rules did not extend to those aspects of the Motion on Judicial Independence which went beyond the scope of Rule 15(A),[1108] it did consider, and it rejected, the claim that Judge Odio Benito had ceased to possess the qualifications required for appointment to the highest judicial offices of her country (and therefore to be a judge of the Tribunal).[1109] There was no challenge at the time to either of these determinations.[1110]

B. Was Judge Odio Benito No Longer Qualified as a Judge of the Tribunal?

655. The qualifications for judges of the Tribunal are stated in Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute:

> Article 13
>
> Qualifications and election of judges
>
> The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law.[1111]

This provision is not stated in terms of qualification for election as judges, but rather in terms of continuous application ("The judges shall be [...]"). If, for example, a judge of the Tribunal were to be found guilty of some offence committed during his or her term of office which [1105] Motion on Judicial Independence, 25 May 1998, p 1.

[1106] Decision of the Bureau on Motion for Judicial Independence, 4 Sept 1998 ("Bureau Decision"), p 4. The four accused, apparently in ignorance of that referral, subsequently filed a request for a hearing of their joint motion or, alternatively, a request that the Presiding Judge refer the matter to the Bureau. This application was disposed of informally (Trial Transcript, pp 14930-14933).
[1107] Bureau Decision, p 11. Rule 15(A) provides: "A judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the judge has a personal interest or concerning which the judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality".
[1109] Ibid, p 6.
[1110] It was suggested during the hearing of the appeal that this was because the Bureau Decision of Sept 1998 "was not rendered until after the trial had been concluded" (Appeal Transcript, p 724). That is not so. The final submissions concluded on 15 October 1998 (Trial Transcript, p 16372), and Judgement in the trial was delivered on 16 November 1998.
[1111] This was the form of Article 13(1) of the Statute at the relevant time. It has since been amended by Security Council Resolution 1329, 30 Nov 2000, so that the opening sentence commences: "The permanent and ad litem judges shall be persons of high moral character [...]".

demonstrated a lack of high moral character or integrity, it could hardly be suggested that such a judge remained qualified within the terms of Article 13 simply because he or she was qualified at the time of election. The Appeals Chamber accepts that a judge must remain qualified within the meaning of Article 13 throughout his or her term of office.

656. The appellants have directed their arguments to the requirement of Article 13 that the judges of the Tribunal "possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices". Judge Odio Benito was elected as a judge of the Tribunal on the nomination of her country, the Republic of Costa Rica. The highest judicial office in that country is that of a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice of Costa Rica.[1112] The appellants argue that, by reason of her assumption of office as Vice-President of Costa Rica, Judge Odio Benito was constitutionally rendered disqualified for election as such a magistrate and therefore lost her qualifications as a judge of the Tribunal.

657. On the other hand, the Prosecution, in addition to disputing the appellants' interpretation of Article 13,[1113] argues that, by reason of the Security Council's resolution permitting Judge Odio Benito (and the other two members of the Trial Chamber) to finish this case notwithstanding that they had been replaced as members of the Tribunal, the provisions of Article 13 no longer applied to them.[1114]

658. For reasons which will be given later in this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber does not accept either of these arguments, but it believes that it is important to state first its interpretation of Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute.

659. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, any interpretation of Article 13 must take into account the restriction imposed by Article 12 of the Statute, that no two judges may be nationals of the same State. The Statute envisages that judges from a wide variety of legal systems would be elected to the Tribunal, and that the qualifications for appointment to the highest judicial offices in those systems would similarly be widely varied. The intention of Article 13 must therefore be to ensure, so far as possible, that the essential qualifications do not differ from judge to judge. Those essential qualifications are character (encompassing impartiality and integrity), legal qualifications (as required for appointment to the highest judicial office) and experience (in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law). Article 13 was not intended to include every local qualification for the highest judicial office such as nationality by birth or religion, or disqualification for such high judicial office such as age. Nor was Article 13 intended to include constitutional disqualifications peculiar to any particular country for reasons unrelated to those essential qualifications.

[1112] Constitution of the Republic of Costa Rica ("Constitution"), Article 156. The Constitution was adopted in 1949. The parties (the Prosecution and Landžo, representing all three convicted appellants) have agreed upon an accurate English language translation of the Constitution (which is written in the Spanish language) as it was in force between 17 Nov 1997 (the date upon which Judge Odio Benito's original term expired) and 16 Nov 1998 (the date upon which the Judgement was delivered): Agreement Between the Prosecution and Appellant, Esad Landžo, Regarding the Constitution of Costa Rica, 28 Jul 2000, para 7. Article 156 provides: "The Supreme Court of Justice is the highest court of the judicial branch [...]".

660. This is certainly the way the Security Council has interpreted Article 13 to date. Article 13(2) provides that, before the judges of the Tribunal are elected by the UN General Assembly, the Security Council must submit for consideration by the General Assembly a list of candidates reducing those nominated by the States to a lesser number which takes into due account the need for adequate representation of the principal legal systems of the world. It may safely be assumed that the Security Council would not include within that reduced list any candidate who did not satisfy the requirements of Article 13. Indeed there are concrete examples where the Security Council has interpreted Article 13 in the way set forth by this Chamber.

661. When Judge Odio Benito was included in the list of candidates for election in 1993, she was still (according to her curriculum vitae which accompanied her nomination)[1115] the Minister of Justice of the Republic of Costa Rica – which, if the appellants's argument were to be accepted, would have constitutionally rendered her disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice and as a judge of this Tribunal.[1116] Judge Sir Ninian Stephen was already seventy years of age when elected as a judge of the Tribunal in 1993,[1117] and thus was to be seventy four years of age at the conclusion of his term. The highest compulsory retirement age for any high judicial office in his country (Australia) is seventy-two – being for the Supreme Court of New South Wales. In neither of these cases was the judge thought by the Security Council not to be qualified as a judge of the Tribunal for a four year term.

662. It was accepted by the appellants that Judge Odio Benito at all times remained qualified as a judge of the Tribunal in relation to her character, legal qualifications and experience. The Appeals Chamber is accordingly satisfied that Judge Odio Benito did not lose her qualifications as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of her assumption of office as Vice-President of Costa Rica.

663. In any event, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the argument of the appellants that her assumption of office as a Vice-President of Costa Rica rendered Judge Odio Benito constitutionally disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice under the Constitution of that country. It expresses this opinion as a matter of interpretation of the Constitution of Costa Rica, consistently with the jurisprudence of that country as identified by expert evidence during the appeal.

664. The Constitution states:

> The government of the Republic [...] is exercised by three distinct and independent branches: legislative, executive and judicial.[1118]

665. The Constitution has separate sections dealing with the legislative power,[1119] the executive power[1120] and the judicial power.[1121] It makes separate provisions as to the qualifications and disqualifications for election to a position within each of these three branches (or powers):

(1) Those qualified for election as deputies to the Legislative Assembly must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth (or naturalised with ten years' residence after naturalisation), and twenty one years of age.[1122] Those disqualified as candidates for election as deputies include anyone occupying within six months prior to the date of the election the positions of President of the Republic, or a cabinet minister or a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice, or relatives of the existing President to the second degree of consanguinity or affinity inclusive.[1123]

[1118] Constitution, Article 9.
[1119] Ibid, Title IX.
[1120] Ibid, Title X.
[1121] Ibid, Title XI.
[1122] Ibid, Article 108.
[1123] Ibid, Article 109.

(2) Those qualified for election as the President or a Vice-President must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth, laymen and over thirty years of age.[1124] Those disqualified for election as President or Vice-President include anyone occupying within twelve months prior to the date for election the positions of President, or a Vice-President, or magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice or a cabinet minister, or certain relatives of the existing President by consanguinity or affinity.[1125]

(3) Those qualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth (or naturalised with ten years' residence after naturalisation), laymen, over thirty five years of age and legally qualified as defined.[1126] The only persons disqualified for election as a magistrate are persons who are related by consanguinity or affinity to the third degree inclusive to a member of the Supreme Court of Justice.[1127]

666. It is significant that, whilst persons holding positions in both the administrative and the judicial supreme powers at the time of the election (or within six months prior thereto) are expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as a deputy to the Legislative Assembly, and persons holding positions in the judicial supreme power at the time of the election (or within twelve months prior thereto) are expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as the President or a Vice-President, no person holding positions with either the executive or the administrative supreme powers at the time of the election is expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as a magistrate. In particular, a Vice-President at the time of the election is not expressly disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court.

667. In support of their argument, however, the appellants rely upon Article 161 which provides:

> The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers.

[1125] Ibid, Article 132.
[1126] Ibid, Article 159. The Article defines the legal qualification as: "Holder of a lawyer's degree issued or legally recognised in Costa Rica, and must have engaged in the profession for at least ten years, except in the case of judicial [officials] with not less than five years of judicial experience". (The Spanish translator retained by the Tribunal's Conference and Languages Section prefers the word "officers" to "officials").
[1127] Ibid, Article 160.

The expression "supreme powers" is not defined in the Constitution, but it may be accepted that the reference is to the three "distinct and independent branches" which exercise the government of the Republic through the "powers" already identified.

668. Article 161 is one of similar but not identical provisions which relate to each of the three supreme powers:

> [Legislative power]
>
> Article 111 After taking the oath of office no deputy may accept a position or employment with the other powers of the State or the autonomous institutions, under penalty of losing his credentials, except as a cabinet minister. In the latter event, he will be reinstated in the Assembly when the position terminates. [...]
>
> Article 112 The legislative function is also incompatible with the holding of any other elective public office. [...]
>
> [Executive power]
>
> Article 143 The position of minister is incompatible with the exercise of any other public [charge, elective] or otherwise, except where special laws confer functions upon them. [...].[1128]
>
> The vice-presidents of the Republic may hold the position of minister.
>
> [Judicial power]
> Article 161 The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers.

The object of these provisions appears clearly to be to prevent the one person holding more than one of these positions at the one time. If a Vice-President at the time of the election of magistrates, who is otherwise qualified in accordance with Article 159 but not disqualified by Article 160, wishes to stand for that election, he or she is permitted to do so, but must, if elected as a magistrate, resign as Vice-President. Such an interpretation of the Constitution itself is consistent with the jurisprudence revealed in the expert opinion of Mr Alejandro Batalla,[1129] although it would appear to be inconsistent with his final conclusion.

[1128] The Spanish translator retained by the Tribunal's Conference and Languages Section prefers the phrase "post, publicly elected" to "charge, elective".

[1129] A Professor of Administrative Law in the Master and Doctoral Program of the Institute of Education and Research of Universidad Autónoma de Centro América.

669. Citing as authority a decision of the Costa Rican Constitutional Court,[1130] Mr B says:

> [...] the intention of the Constitutional Assembly was to provide the Magistrates with a special level of independence from the other branches to prevent any mixing of their political activity with the justice in order to guarantee impartiality.[1131]
>
> The Constitutional Court argues that holding both positions simultaneously might subordinate the Magistrate psychologically to a certain ideology that can affect and reduce his criteria in such a way.
>
> The body of laws of Costa Rica stipulates, in general terms, the incompatibility of the positions of magistrate and judge[1132] with those positions elected by popular vote such as the position of Vice-President, and the justification lies on the demand of the independence of the judge. In other of its precedents, the Constitutional Court has stated that:
>
> "The position of Judge or Magistrate is incompatible with any other position elected by popular vote or political designation. What is intended is to keep the officials administering justice away from the passions inherent to the political activity which, due to its nature, is very polemical. In this way, this prevents the possibility of establishing a link of psychological subordination of the judge, offering said circumstance, the temptation of adjusting his behaviour to a certain ideology or way of thinking detached from his self, since the freedom of opinion of the judge may be reduced by the influence of an ideological tendency. The system of incompatibilities and the system of prohibitions are guarantees that tend to prevent the creation of links – either of public or private nature – that may lead to the union of two simultaneous qualities in one person; that is, that the status of the Judge may be joined by another quality that may place him, in a submission relationship of any kind. It is possible to prevent the judge from performing any paid job in order to prevent him from establishing links that may restrict his independence".[1133]

670. Mr Batalla then concludes:

> In conclusion, the position of Magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice has an express restriction on a Constitutional level to be elected if he holds another position in any other Supreme Power of Costa Rica.[1134]

If Mr Batalla's ultimate conclusion be correct, the Constitution would have expressed the disqualifications upon candidates for election as a magistrate in substantially different terms. Article 160 would have disqualified as candidates for such election those persons holding positions in both the executive and the administrative supreme powers, in the same way as Articles 109 and 132 have disqualified magistrates as candidates for election, respectively, as deputy of the Legislative Assembly and as President or Vice-President. Significantly Constitution has not done so. [1135]

671. Article 161 does not therefore disqualify a Vice-President as a candidate for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Costa Rica. It merely requires that such a Vice-President resign that position if elected as a magistrate and before assuming office as such.

672. The Prosecution's argument which the Appeals Chamber has not accepted was that the requirements of Article 13(1) of the Statute apply by their terms only to "the judges" of the Tribunal, which means the judges referred to in Article 12 who are elected pursuant to Article 13(2) or appointed pursuant to Article 13(3).[1136] The Prosecution contended that, when the term of office of Judge Odio Benito expired on 17 November 1997, she ceased to be one of "the judges" of the Tribunal, and that the Security Council Resolution 1126 which enabled the judges of the Čelebići Trial Chamber to finish hearing the case did not affect this.[1137] The terms of Resolution 1126, which authorised the three judges "once replaced as members of the Tribunal, to finish the Čelebići case which had begun before the expiry of their terms of office", was interpreted by the Prosecution as emphasising that the judges' terms of office had expired and that they had been replaced. Although the judges continued to exercise the functions of a judge, it was said, they no longer held the office of judges of the Tribunal.[1138] The source of Judge Odio Benito's authority after 17 November 1997 was not the Statute, but Resolution 1126. The resolution was said to prevail over the Statute in the event of inconsistency, as the Statute itself derives from a Security Council resolution and can be expressly or impliedly amended by a subsequent resolution.[1139]

673. However, if the submission that Judge Odio Benito was no longer a "judge" within the meaning of Article 13(1) after the expiry of her initial term of office be correct, it would follow that she was also not a "judge" for the purposes of other articles of the Statute. In that case, since Article 12 provides that the Trial Chambers consist of three "judges", the Trial Chamber would not have been validly composed. Moreover, since it is the "Trial Chambers" which are [1135] An expert opinion by Francisco Villalobos Brenes (a member of the Bar of Costa Rica and Adjunct Professor in the Faculty of Law of the University of Costa Rica) was also tendered. None of the interpretative resources relied upon by Mr Brenes suggest a contrary interpretation of Article 161. Indeed, he expressly concludes (at para 5C) that Article 161 is one of various rules which specifically prohibit the possibility of a person exercising the judicial function at the same time as holding a post in the Executive or Legislative Branches (the emphasis has been added).

[1138] Ibid, paras 10-12.

to pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties,[1140] it would follow that the Judgement in this case was not delivered by the body authorised by the Statute to do so. The Appeals Chamber does not accept that this was the intention of the Security Council in adopting Resolution 1126. The Prosecution indeed denied that its interpretation of the resolution has the result that the Trial Chamber was not properly constituted,[1141] and it submitted at the oral hearing that the three judges continued to be judges of the Tribunal with limited functions but that Resolution 1126 nevertheless had the effect that the requirements of Article 13(1) did not apply to them.[1142] This submission is entirely without merit.

674. The words from Resolution 1126 relied upon by the Prosecution must be read in the context of the circumstances in which the resolution was passed. The then President of the Tribunal had written to the Secretary-General seeking from him "an extension of the three judges sitting in the Čelebići case", and had requested him to submit his letter to the members of the Security Council "for their consideration and approval of the extension of tenure of the three aforementioned judges for 12 months as from 17 November 1997".[1143] The Secretary-General had submitted the letter as requested, describing it in his letters to the Presidents of the Security Council and the General Assembly as requesting "an extension of the terms of office of the non-elected judges of the International Tribunal in order to allow them to dispose of ongoing cases".[1144] His letters continued:

> [...] in the absence of an explicit statutory provision providing for the extension of the term of office of Tribunal judges to complete ongoing cases, an approval of the Security Council, as the parent organ, and of the General Assembly, as the electing organ, would be desirable to preclude any question about the legality of such an extension.

Resolution 1126, having noted this correspondence, endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General in the terms already partly quoted.[1145]

675. A reading of Resolution 1126 in this context necessarily indicates that its effect was to extend the terms of the judges for the particular purpose of concluding the Čelebići trial. The terms of office of the judges as extended, although limited in their defined purpose, otherwise left subject to the relevant provisions of the Statute. Any implied effect on the Statute was not to render Article 13(1) and those other provisions which refer to "judges" of the Tribunal inapplicable to the three judges, as argued by the Prosecution. It was limited to making a narrowly qualified exception to the four year term of office referred to in Article 13(4). The resolution indicates no intention to amend, modify or suspend any other provisions of the Statute, including Article 13(1), in any way.

676. The challenge to Judge Odio Benito's qualifications under Article 13 accordingly fails.

C. Should Judge Odio Benito Have Disqualified Herself as a Judge of the Tribunal?

677. The second issue raised by the appellants based upon the election of Judge Odio Benito as a Vice-President of Costa Rica and her assumption of that office was whether she was thereby disqualified as a judge of the Tribunal because she no longer possessed the necessary judicial independence required by international law.[1146] The appellants relied upon additional material and arguments in relation to this issue.

678. Appointment as Minister of Environment and Energy: After she took the oath of office as Second Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito was also appointed as Minister of Environment and Energy in the Government of Costa Rica.[1147]

679. Membership of Board of Mediators: A decree issued by the President of Costa Rica on 15 June 1998, dealing with a "Process of National Consensus", provided for a Board of Mediators to be composed of, inter alia, the two Vice-Presidents of the Republic. The functions and powers of that Board were to "judge, mediate and propose alternative solutions in those cases where the members of the Consensus Forum [another of the bodies in the Process of National Consensus] have such disagreements that they are unable to reach decisions by consensus".[1148]

680. Exercise of Executive Functions: Reliance was placed upon two media reports, the accuracy of which was not disputed,[1149] to claim that Judge Odio Benito exercised executive functions in Costa Rica whilst still a judge of the Tribunal:

(i) Meeting in April 1998

The first report, dated 28 April 1998, referred to a meeting of the President-elect of Costa Rica and "a group of former Costa Rican legal representatives and high officials" which had been held in order "to evaluate the process of a united national effort before the change in power the following week". The report focused on the release by the group of a communiqué which expressed "profound consternation" at the recent assassination of the Auxiliary Bishop of Guatemala.[1150] The report observed that "Vice-Presidents-elect, Astrid Fischel and Elizabeth Odio, who will assume office this coming May 8", also participated in the meeting.

(ii) Letter of protest

The second report, dated 1 June 1998, stated that an environmental and humanitarian organisation, Foro Emaus, had written to "the vice president of Costa Rica [...] who is furthermore the head of the Department of Environment and Energy" to protest at the deficient labour conditions in which women worked in banana packing plants.[1151]

681. Separation of Powers: The appellants assert that Judge Odio Benito exercised an executive function merely by holding the position of Second Vice-President as required by the Constitution of Costa Rica.[1152] They rely upon the doctrine of separation of powers, which is said to prevent a judge of the Tribunal from holding an executive position in a domestic government.[1153] The appellants rely upon the status of Costa Rica as a non-permanent member of the Security Council for a two year period from 1 January 1997 to submit that Costa Rica had "direct political and administrative control over the affairs of this Tribunal",[1154] and that Judge

[1149] The Prosecution denied, however, that the events reported constituted the exercise by Judge Odio Benito of executive functions: Agreement on Evidence, p 2; Prosecution Response, para 13.45.

[1152] Appeal Transcript, p 721.
[1153] Ibid, p 654. The submissions made by the appellants in relation to Judge Odio Benito and her position as Vice-President did not always make a clear distinction between the first and second of these issues. This particular submission was described as being relevant to her qualification under Article 13 (the first issue), but the Appeals Chamber regards it as logically more relevant to her disqualification under Rule 15(A) (the second issue), and it has considered the submission upon that basis.
[1154] Appeal Transcript, p 672.

Odio Benito, as a Vice-President of Costa Rica, had the power to give instructions to Costa Rica's representative on the Security Council, placing her "in an executive capacity vis-a-vis this very Tribunal".[1155]

682. Impartiality: The requirement of a judge's impartiality is stated in Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute, which has already been quoted. That requirement is reflected in Rule 15(A), which is in these terms:

> A Judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the Judge has a personal interest or concerning which the Judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality. The Judge shall in any such circumstance withdraw, and the President shall assign another Judge to the case.

This Rule has been interpreted by the Tribunal as encompassing circumstances establishing both actual bias and an appearance or a reasonable apprehension of bias.[1156] No suggestion of actual bias has been made in the present case; the suggestion made is that the contemporaneous holding by Judge Odio Benito of the offices of a judge of the Tribunal and of Vice-President and government minister of Costa Rica carried the appearance of a lack of impartiality.[1157]

683. The relevant question to be determined by the Appeals Chamber is whether the reaction of the hypothetical fair-minded observer (with sufficient knowledge of the circumstances to make a reasonable judgement) would be that Judge Odio Benito might not bring an impartial and unprejudiced mind to the issues arising in the case.[1158] The apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one.[1159] Such circumstances within the knowledge of the fair-minded observer would include the traditions of integrity and impartiality which a judge undertakes to uphold.[1160] A judge of the Tribunal makes a solemn declaration that he or she will perform the duties and exercise the powers of such an office "honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously".[1161]

684. The fair-minded observer would also know of the circumstances surrounding Judge Odio Benito's election as Vice-President of Costa Rica. Prior to accepting a nomination as Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito wrote to the then President of the Tribunal (Judge Cassese) undertaking that, if elected, she would not assume any Vice-Presidential functions until the completion of her duties as a member of the Trial Chamber hearing the Čelebići case ("the Undertaking"). President Cassese submitted that letter to the judges in a Plenary meeting, who unanimously determined, upon the basis of the Undertaking, that her proposed action would not be incompatible with her judicial duties. When she was elected as Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito informed the then President of the Tribunal (Judge McDonald), who submitted the matter again to the judges in a Plenary meeting, where approval was given for her to take the oath of office. The Undertaking given by Judge Odio Benito to the Tribunal was supported by the President of Costa Rica, who wrote to President McDonald to confirm that Judge Odio Benito would continue to discharge her functions as a judge of the Tribunal until the completion of the Čelebići case[1162] and that she would not assume any functions in the government of Costa Rica before 17 November 1998.[1163] These facts were set out by the Bureau in its decision of 4 September 1998,[1164] and their substance has not been contested by the appellants.[1165]

D. Conclusion

685. The Appeals Chamber does not accept that Judge Odio Benito exercised any executive functions in Costa Rica during the time she was also a judge of the Tribunal. Taking the matters upon which reliance was placed by the appellants by reference to the categories already referred to:

686. Appointment as Minister of Environment and Energy: At the same time as Judge Odio Benito was appointed as Minister of Environment and Energy, a substitute minister was appointed to be in charge of that ministry during her absence.[1166] No evidence was produced by the appellants that Judge Odio Benito had exercised any of the powers or functions as such minister during the relevant period.

[1165] Appeal Transcript, p 653. The Prosecution relied on the Bureau Decision and the facts found therein: Prosecution Response, para 13.45. The Appeals Chamber has not dealt with this matter as an appeal from the decision of the Bureau. The question whether a judge should have been disqualified from hearing a case is relevant to the fairness of the trial: Prosecutor v Furundžija, IT-95-17/1, Decision on Post-Trial Application by Anto Furundžija to the Bureau of the Tribunal for the Disqualification of Presiding Judge Mumba, Motion to Vacate Conviction and Sentence, and Motion for a New Trial, 11 Mar 1999, p 2; and it is therefore a valid ground of appeal from a conviction. The Furundžija Appeal Judgement proceeded upon the basis that this was a valid ground.

[1166] Agreement on Evidence, para 1.

687. Membership of Board of Mediators: No evidence was produced by the appellants to suggest that Judge Odio Benito had exercised any of the powers or functions of the Board of Mediators, nor even that the Board as an entity had been called upon to exercise its powers in the relevant period. Given the absence of any such evidence, it must be assumed that the Undertaking of Judge Odio Benito and the formal assurances of the President of Costa Rica, that she would not be assuming any functions of the government of Costa Rica (including those of Vice-President), were adhered to and that her membership of the Board of Mediators remained only a formal one during the relevant period.

688. Exercise of executive functions:

(i) Meeting in April 1998

This meeting took place before Judge Odio-Benito had assumed the office of Vice-President, and before she had any executive functions to perform. There is no suggestion that anyone else at the meeting was in a position to perform any such functions either. The "former" Costa Rican legal representatives and high officials could not have been there in any executive capacity. The purpose of the meeting – to evaluate "the process of a united national effort before the change in power the following week" – necessarily excluded any suggestion that the participants could have exercised any executive functions of government at that time. The only action which appears to have been taken by the group was the release of the communiqué, a gesture of the sort which is frequently made by public figures in the circumstances referred to. Judge Odio Benito was a prominent legal figure in Costa Rica – if for no other reason because she was a former Minister of Justice – and her participation in such a communiqué was perfectly natural. It was not an executive function.

(ii) Letter of protest

No evidence was produced by the appellants to suggest that Judge Odio Benito responded in any way to the letter or even that she had personally received it.[1167]

689. Separation of powers: It is beyond question that the principles of judicial independence and impartiality are of a fundamental nature which underpin international as well as national law. They are represented not only in numerous international and regional [1167] Counsel for Landžo appeared to acknowledge the weaknesses in this material when he stated "I don't place much weight on those [two newspaper reports]": Appeal Transcript, p 673.

instruments – including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights[1168] and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[1169] – but also in the Statute of the Tribunal itself, which requires by Article 12 that the Chambers be composed of independent judges and by Article 13 that the judges be impartial. The fundamental importance of the independence of the judiciary has been emphasised in the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chamber.[1170] This jurisprudence has also recognised that the principle of judicial independence in domestic and international systems generally demands that those persons or bodies exercising judicial powers do not also exercise powers of the executive or legislative branches of those systems.[1171]

690. The application of the principle of separation of powers to the factual situation underlying this ground of appeal is nevertheless misconceived. The doctrine applies principally to ensure the separate and independent exercise of the different powers within the same sphere or political system. The purpose of requiring a separation of judicial from other powers is to avoid any conflict of interest. Where the relevant powers arise in separate systems or on different planes – such as the national and the international – the potential for there to be any convergence in the subject matter of the powers, and therefore for a conflict of interest to arise, is greatly reduced.

691. The only basis upon which it is suggested that such a convergence has occurred in the present case relates to Costa Rica's membership of the Security Council at the relevant time. The assumptions necessarily involved in the proposition that, because of that fact, Judge Odio Benito was in an executive capacity vis-à-vis the Tribunal itself are, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, so remote as to be fanciful. Those assumptions are:

(a) that the Security Council would exercise its administrative functions in relation to the Tribunal in order to affect the judicial decisions of the Tribunal, contrary to the Statute which the Security Council itself had adopted by which the judges were required to be both independent and impartial;

(b) that Costa Rica, as one of the fifteen members of the Security Council,[1172] would be capable of influencing the Security Council in the exercise of such functions – notwithstanding the veto power of the five permanent memb relation to non-procedural matters[1173] – to such a degree that it would exercise direct political or administrative control over the affairs of this Tribunal; and

(c) that a Vice-President of Costa Rica has the power to instruct that country's representative in the Security Council how to exercise such control over the affairs of this Tribunal, and that Judge Odio Benito would exercise that power, notwithstanding the undertaking which she gave to the Tribunal and the confirmation by the President of Costa Rica, that she would not assume any functions as Vice-President until after her term of office as a judge of the Tribunal had concluded.

It should be noted that no suggestion has been made that the Republic of Costa Rica had any direct interest in the outcome of the present case.

692. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the fair-minded observer would in all those circumstances consider that Judge Odio Benito had placed herself in a position of conflict of interest with her position as a judge of this Tribunal, and that she might therefore not bring an impartial and unprejudiced mind to the issues arising in the Čelebići case. It follows that no reasonable apprehension of bias has been established, and that there was no basis upon which Judge Odio Benito should have disqualified herself pursuant to Rule 15(A). The challenge to her independence accordingly also fails.

693. Delić Issue 1, Mucić Ground 1 and Landžo Ground 2 are therefore dismissed.

[1173] Ibid, Article 27(3).

XIII. JUDGE ODIO BENITO AND THE VICTIMS OF TORTURE FU[illegible]

694. Delić, Mucić and Landžo also filed grounds of appeal asserting that, because Judge Odio Benito was, while a judge of the Tribunal and engaged in hearing this case, a member of the Board of Trustees of the United Nations Voluntary Fund for Victims of Torture ("Victims of Torture Fund"), she was automatically disqualified from sitting as a judge in this case. The grounds were in the following terms:

> Whether Judge Elizabeth Odio Benito was disqualified in that she had an undisclosed affiliation which could have cast doubt on her impartiality and which might affect her impartiality.[1174]
>
> Mucić Ground 2
>
> Whether Judge Odio-Benito was disqualified as a member of the Trial Chamber by reason of her membership on the Board of Trustees of the United Nations Voluntary Fund for the Relief of Victims of Torture.[1175]
>
> The Participation as a Member of the Trial Chamber of a Judge Who Had an Actual or Apparent Conflict of Interest Affecting the Judge's Impartiality as a Member of the Trial Chamber Violated the Rules of Natural Justice and International Law, and, as a Matter of Law, Absent Disclosure by the Judge, and Informed Consent by the Defence, Automatically Disqualified the Judge From Sitting as a Member of the Trial Chamber.[1176]

695. The Victims of Torture Fund was established in 1981 by a resolution of the United Nations General Assembly to extend the mandate of an already existing fund, the United Nations Trust Fund for Chile, and it redesignated the fund by its present name. The mandate of the Victims of Torture Fund, as set out in that resolution, was:

> [...] receiving voluntary contributions for distribution, through established channels of assistance, as humanitarian, legal and financial aid to individuals whose human rights have been severely violated as a result of torture and to relatives of such victims, priority being given to aid to victims of violations by States in which the human rights situation has been the subject of resolutions or decisions adopted by either the Assembly, the Economic and Social Council or the Commission on Human Rights.[1177]

The resolution also determined that the Victims of Torture Fund would be administered in accordance with Financial Regulations of the United Nations by the Secretary-General, with the advice of a Board of Trustees "composed of a chairman and four members with wide experi• in the field of human rights, acting in their personal capacity [...]." It was agreed between the parties that Judge Odio Benito was a member of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund throughout the Čelebići trial.[1178]

696. The appellants contend that Judge Odio Benito's membership of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias. The appellants argue that, by virtue of her membership of the Board, Judge Odio Benito had undertaken an obligation to further the goals of the Victims of Torture Fund. Since the Indictment in the Čelebići trial included allegations of torture, there was, it is said, a strong appearance of bias against those accused who were the subject of those allegations. (Landžo's earlier submission, that it was likely that Judge Odio Benito was actually biased against him as a person charged with torture,[1179] was abandoned during the oral submissions.)[1180] The appellants argued that Judge Odio Benito should therefore have disqualified herself pursuant to Rule 15(A) of the Rules or made a full disclosure of the association to the accused and their counsel and obtained their informed consent to proceed.[1181]

697. The relevant question to be determined by the Appeals Chamber is thus the same as that already stated in the previous Chapter: whether the reaction of the hypothetical fair-minded observer (with sufficient knowledge of the circumstances to make a reasonable judgement) would be that Judge Odio Benito might not bring an impartial and unprejudiced mind to the issues arising in the case. The apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one. Such circumstances within the knowledge of the fair-minded observer would include the traditions of integrity and impartiality which a judge undertakes to uphold in the solemn declaration made when assuming office, that he or she will perform the duties and exercise the powers of such an office "honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously".[1182]

698. The Appeals Chamber agrees that, by accepting a position on the Board of Trustees, Judge Odio Benito undertook in her personal capacity to further the mandate of the Victims of Torture Fund. However, given that the objects of the fund as expressed in its mandate are solely focussed on fundraising to enable material assistance to the victims of torture – i.e. the receipt and redistribution of donations for humanitarian, legal and financial aid to victims of torture and their relatives – the Appeals Chamber does not accept that a commitment by Judge Odio Benito to the objects and the activities of the Fund could reasonably be regarded as in any way inconsistent with the fair and impartial adjudication of charges of torture in her different capacity as a judge of the Tribunal.

699. As noted in the Furundžija Appeal Judgement, personal convictions and opinions of judges are not in themselves a basis for inferring a lack of impartiality.[1183] In relation to the particular subject of torture, it is difficult to accept that any judge eligible for appointment to the Tribunal – and thus a person of "high moral character, impartiality and integrity", as required by Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute – would not be opposed to acts of torture. A reasonable and informed observer, knowing that torture is a crime under international and national laws, would not expect judges to be morally neutral about torture. Rather, such an observer would expect judges to hold the view that persons responsible for torture should be prosecuted.

700. It was nevertheless submitted that Judge Odio Benito, by reason of her membership of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund, "[...] had a clear identification with the victims of the alleged offences, and therefore, by an inescapable process of logic, against the alleged perpetrators of those offences".[1184] But, while an objective observer may reasonably infer from such membership that Judge Odio Benito sympathises with victims of torture, it is far from "inescapable logic" that she would therefore be biased against persons alleged to be perpetrators of torture. A person opposed to torture may be expected to hold the view that those responsible for committing that offence should be punished, but this is fundamentally different to bias against any person accused of torture. This is particularly so in the case of judges who, as discussed above, are presumed to be impartial,[1185] and are professionally equipped, by virtue of their training and experience, for the task of fairly determining the issues before them by applying their minds to the evidence in the particular case.[1186]

701. The appellants submitted that, even though the activities of the Victims of Torture Fund are praiseworthy, they are nevertheless incompatible with judicial office because "[j]udges ... have an obligation to set themselves apart from the political fray and the activism on behalf of causes".[1187] Such a submission is wholly inapposite to the present case. The purposes of the Victims of Torture Fund are not even remotely political, and Judge Odio Benito's membership of its Board of Trustees, with its overseeing role in the receipt and redistribution of donations for victims of torture, cannot be characterised as activism on behalf of a cause in any natural sense of the term.

702. It is clear that the Statute of the Tribunal, by requiring that the "experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including humanitarian law and human rights law" be taken into account in composing the Chambers,[1188] anticipated that a number of the judges of the Tribunal would have been members of human rights bodies or would have worked in the human rights field. As Judge Odio Benito's membership of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund was included on her curriculum vitae submitted by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly prior to the election of judges of the Tribunal in 1993 and 1997,[1189] it was no doubt considered to be relevant to her experience in the field of human rights law and therefore to the judicial qualification requirements. As noted in the Furundžija Appeal Judgement, it would be an odd result if the fulfilment of the qualification requirements of Article 13 were to operate as a disqualifying factor on the basis that it gives rise to an inference of bias.[1190] Counsel for Landžo was obliged to argue that such membership was both a qualification and a disqualification at the same time and that, given the prevalence of allegations of torture in cases to be tried by the Tribunal, Judge Odio Benito should accordingly have spent four years as a judge of the Tribunal doing absolutely nothing.[1191]

703. The appellants placed heavy reliance in their submissions upon the decision of the United Kingdom House of Lords decision in the Pinochet case, in which it was determined that a member of the House of Lords (Lord Hoffman) was disqualified from hearing an earlier case because he was a director and chairperson of a charitable organisation which was controlled by

Amnesty International, an intervenor in the case.[1192] It was submitted that the facts of the cases were "almost exactly the same",[1193] and that the result in both cases should be the same.[1194] The Appeals Chamber observes that a single decision from a national court does not (contrary to what was suggested by certain of the appellants' submissions) constitute any kind of definitive code for matters arising in the unique context of this international Tribunal. That said, the Pinochet Decision is nevertheless of some assistance in applying the law in the present case, because the legal principles it discussed in relation to judicial disqualification are substantially similar to the principles which the Furundžija Appeal Judgement has held to govern the issue of disqualification for bias in this Tribunal.[1195]

704. An examination of the reasoning of the members of the House of Lords in the Pinochet Decision, however, makes it quite apparent that it does not support the conclusions the appellants seek to draw from it. Contrary to the submissions of the appellants, it was critical to the actual result in that decision that Amnesty International was, as an intervenor in the earlier proceedings, a party to the litigation. The significance of the status of Amnesty International as a party to the proceedings lies in the fact that the House of Lords held that the circumstances in which a judge should be disqualified because of an appearance of bias encompass two categories of case. The first is that, where a judge is party to a litigation or has a relevant interest in its outcome, he is automatically disqualified from hearing the case. The second category is that a judge who is not party to the litigation, but whose conduct or behaviour in some other way gives rise to a reasonable suspicion that he is not impartial, is obliged to disqualify himself.[1196]

705. Lord Browne-Wilkinson, who gave the principal reasons for judgement and with whose reasons the other members of the House of Lords agreed,[1197] found that Lord Hoffman's circumstances fell within the first category of automatic disqualification. His Lordship held that automatic disqualification extended to any judge "who is involved, whether personally or as a director of a company, in promoting the same causes in the same organisation as is a party to the suit", and he found that Lord Hoffman "was disqualified as a matter of law automatically by reason of his directorship of AICL, a company controlled by a party, AI [Amnesty International]".[1198] Lord Browne-Wilkinson then reiterated the exceptional nature of the case, stating:

> The critical elements are (1) that AI was a party to the appeal; (2) that AI was joined in order to argue for a particular result; (3) [and that] the judge was a director of a charity closely allied to AI and sharing, in this respect, AI's objects. Only in cases where a judge is taking an active role as trustee or director of a charity which is closely allied to and acting with a party to the litigation should a judge normally be concerned either to recuse himself or disclose the position to the parties.[1199]

In the present case, the Victims of Torture Fund was not a party to the Čelebići proceedings in any capacity. There was no evidence put forward by the appellants nor any indication of any kind that the Fund was allied to or acting with any party to the proceedings. Landžo submitted that, because both the Fund and the Tribunal are organs of the United Nations, the Fund has a common cause with the Office of the Prosecutor of the Tribunal.[1200] That submission is simply untenable. Even if it is accepted that, in the broadest sense of the concept, the Prosecutor and the Victims of Torture Fund have a common cause, that cause is simply one of opposition to the crime of torture. That is not a disqualifying common interest.

706. The second category of disqualification referred to by Lord Browne-Wilkinson, which substantially reflects the concept of reasonable apprehension of bias as expressed by the Appeals Chamber in relation to the Tribunal, is the only category relevant to the facts of the present case. Because of the conclusion that Lord Hoffman had been automatically disqualified by the application of the first category, Lord Browne-Wilkinson found it unnecessary to consider the question raised by the second category, namely whether the circumstances gave rise to a real danger or suspicion of bias.[1201] The decision is therefore of limited assistance in the present case.

707. The Appeals Chamber has already emphasised that, as there is a high threshold to reach in order to rebut the presumption of impartiality and before a judge is disqualified, the reasonable apprehension of bias must be "firmly established".[1202] The reason for this threshold is that, just as any real appearance of bias of the part of a judge undermines confidence in the administration of justice, it would be as much of a potential threat to the interests of the impartial and fair administration of justice if judges were to disqualify themselves on the basis of unfounded and unsupported allegations of apparent bias. As has been observed in a decision cited by the Appeals Chamber in the Furundžija Appeal Judgement:

> It needs to be said loudly and clearly that the ground of disqualification is a reasonable apprehension that the judicial officer will not decide the case impartially or without prejudice, rather than that he will decide the case adversely to one party [....]. Although it is important that justice must be seen to be done, it is equally important that judicial officers discharge their duty to sit and do not, by acceding too readily to suggestions of apparent bias, encourage parties to believe that, by seeking the disqualification of a judge, they will have their case tried by someone thought to be more likely to decide the case in their favour.[1203]

708. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that a reasonable and informed observer would consider that Judge Odio Benito's membership of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund would render her unable to consider and determine with an impartial and unbiased mind the matters, including charges of torture, which were before her in the Čelebići trial. There was therefore no basis upon which Judge Odio Benito should have disqualified herself, nor (taking the second limb of the appellants' argument) any requirement that she make a formal disclosure of her membership of the Board and obtain consent to proceed from the parties to the Čelebići case. Although the issue of disclosure is therefore not strictly relevant, the Appeals Chamber does note that Judge Odio Benito's membership of the Board of Trustees of the Victims of Torture Fund was a matter of public knowledge,[1204] published in three successive Year Books of the Tribunal,[1205] and in documents of the United Nations General Assembly.[1206]

XIV. GROUNDS OF APPEAL RELATING TO SENTENCING

A. Introduction

710. The Appeals Chamber has decided to quash certain of the convictions entered against Landžo, Mucić and Delić where there was more than one conviction imposed on the basis of the same facts. As noted above, it is therefore necessary to consider whether, in relation to those convictions quashed on the basis of cumulative convictions considerations, the sentences imposed upon them in relation to the remaining convictions should be adjusted.

711. Because the Appeals Chamber has had no submissions from the parties on these issues and, because there may be matters of important principle involved, it will be necessary for such consideration to be given after the parties have had the opportunity to make relevant submissions. As the Appeals Chamber cannot be reconstituted in its present composition, and as, in any event, a new matter of such significance should be determined by a Chamber from which an appeal is possible, the Appeals Chamber proposes to remit these issues for determination by a Trial Chamber.

712. As it will be an issue as to whether any adjustment should be made to the sentences because of the matters referred to above, and not a complete rehearing on the issue of sentence, it is appropriate that the Appeals Chamber consider and resolve the issues raised in the parties' grounds of appeal relating to sentence insofar as they allege the commission of errors in the exercise of discretion or other errors of law by the Trial Chamber in imposing those sentences, so that the new Trial Chamber will then be in a position to consider what, if any, adjustment should be made to what the Appeals Chamber considers would otherwise have been appropriate sentences.

713. In addition, the Appeals Chamber has determined that the conviction of Delić on Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment must be quashed on the basis that it was not open to the Trial Chamber to have convicted him on those counts. It would be convenient, when the matter is remitted, for the new Trial Chamber also to consider what adjustments should be made to the sentence of Delić in relation to the reversal of his conviction on those counts.

714. Before turning to consider the issues raised in the parties' particular grou[illegible] appeal relating to sentence, as referred to above, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to first address several general considerations.

715. The Prosecution submits that the Appeals Chamber should determine "basic sentencing principles which should be applied by the Trial Chambers."[1207] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Prosecution made similar submissions in the case of Furundžija before the Appeals Chamber, arguing that such principles would assist in order to achieve consistency and even-handedness in sentencing before the Trial Chamber.[1208] The Appeals Chamber in that case decided that, since only certain matters relating to sentencing were at issue, it was inappropriate to set down a definitive list of sentencing guidelines for future reference.[1209]

716. The benefits of such a definitive list are in any event questionable. Both the Statute (Article 24) and the Rules (Rule 101) contain general guidelines for a Trial Chamber to take into account in sentencing. These amount to an obligation on the Trial Chamber to take into account aggravating and mitigating circumstances (including substantial co-operation with the Prosecution), the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the convicted person and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia.[1210] Other than these general principles, no detailed guidelines setting out, for example, what particular factors may be taken into account in mitigation or aggravation of sentence are provided in either the Statute or the Rules.[1211]

717. Trial Chambers exercise a considerable amount of discretion (although it is not unlimited) in determining an appropriate sentencing. This is largely because of the over-riding obligation to individualise a penalty to fit the individual circumstances of the accused and the gravity of the crime. To achieve this goal, Trial Chambers are obliged to consider [1209] Furundžija Appeal Judgement, para 238.

[1210] It is also obliged to take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 10(3) of the Statute (Rule 101(B)(iv).

[1211] This was also the case with the implementing legislation for the post-World War II trials (including the International Military Tribunals held at Nuremberg and Tokyo). Article 27 of the Nuremberg Charter provided simply that "the Tribunal shall have the right to impose upon a Defendant on conviction, death or such other both aggravating and mitigating circumstances relating to an individual accused. The m' circumstances taken into account by the Trial Chambers to date are evident if one considers the sentencing judgements which have been rendered.[1212] As a result, the sentences imposed have varied, from the imposition of the maximum sentence of imprisonment for the remainder of life,[1213] to imprisonment for varying fixed terms (the lowest after appeal being five years[1214]). Although certain of these cases are now under appeal, the underlying principle is that the sentence imposed largely depended on the individual facts of the case and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.[1215]

718. The Appeals Chamber accordingly concludes that it is inappropriate for it to attempt to list exhaustively the factors that it finds should be taken into account by a Trial Chamber in determining sentence.

719. It is noted that, in their submissions, each party urges the Appeals Chamber to compare their case with others which have already been the subject of final determination, punishment as shall be deemed by it to be just" (Emphasis added). A similar provision is found in Article 16 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East.

[1213] No sentences of imprisonment for the remainder of life have been imposed by this Tribunal. However, they have been by the ICTR. See Kambanda Appeal Judgement; Prosecutor v Rutaganda, Judgement and Sentence, Case No ICTR-96-3-T, 6 Dec 1999; Prosecutor v Musema, Judgement and Sentence, Case No ICTR-96-13-T, 27 Jan 2000; Prosecutor v Kayishema, Sentence, Case No ICTR-95-1-T, 21 May 2000; and Prosecutor v Akayesu, Sentence, Case No ICTR-96-4-T, 2 Oct 1998.

[1214] In the case of Dra'en Erdemović. The sentence of 2 ½ years originally imposed by the Trial Chamber on Zlatko Aleksovski was revised by the Appeals Chamber to seven years. Other fixed terms include Goran Jelisić, who received 40 years, Tihomir Blaškić, who received 45 years, Anto Furund'ija, who received ten years (maximum sentence), Duško Tadić, who received 20 years (maximum sentence) and Omar Serushago, who received 15 years.

[1215] Blaškić Judgement, para 765: "The factors taken into account in the various Judgements of the two International Tribunals to assess the sentence must be interpreted in the light of the type of offence committed and the personal circumstances of the accused. This explains why it is appropriate to identify the specific material circumstances directly related to the offence in order to evaluate the gravity thereof and also the specific personal circumstances in order to adapt the sentence imposed to the accused's character and potential for rehabilitation. Notwithstanding this, in determining the sentence, the weight attributed to each type of circumstance, depends on the objective sought by international justice." Prosecutor v Akayesu, Sentence, Case No ICTR-96-4-T, 2 Oct 1998, para 20: "It is a matter, as it were, of individualising the penalty." Prosecutor v Rutaganda, Judgement and Sentence, Case No ICTR-96-3-T, 6 Dec 1999, para 457; Furund'ija Appeal Judgement, para 249: "In deciding to impose different sentences for the same type of crime, a Trial Chamber may consider such factors as the circumstances in which the offence was committed and its seriousness."; Prosecutor v Musema, Case No ICTR-96-13-T, 27 Jan 2000, para 987.

in an effort to persuade the Appeals Chamber to either increase or decrease the sentence.[1216] Although this will be considered further in the context of the individual submissions, the Appeals Chamber notes that as a general principle such comparison is often of limited assistance. While it does not disagree with a contention that it is to be expected that two accused convicted of similar crimes in similar circumstances should not in practice receive very different sentences, often the differences are more significant than the similarities, and the mitigating and aggravating factors dictate different results. They are therefore not reliable as the sole basis for sentencing an individual.

720. This question has already been considered twice by the Appeals Chamber, and it was concluded in the first such decision that, as the facts of the two cases in question were materially different, assistance from the first rendered was limited.[1217] In the case of Anto Furund'ija, the Prosecution submitted that "every sentence imposed by a Trial Chamber must be individualised as there are a great many factors to which the Trial Chamber may have regard in exercising its discretion in each case."[1218] The Appeals Chamber endorses the finding in that case:

> The sentencing provisions in the Statute and the Rules provide Trial Chambers with the discretion to take into account the circumstances of each crime in assessing the sentence to be given. A previous decision on sentence may indeed provide guidance if it relates to the same offence and was committed in substantially similar circumstances; otherwise a Trial Chamber is limited only by the provisions of the Statute and the Rules.[1219]

721. Therefore, while the Appeals Chamber does not discount the assistance that may be drawn from previous decisions rendered, it also concludes that this may be limited. On the other hand, it reiterates that, in determination of sentence, "due regard must be given to the relevant provisions in the Statute and the Rules which govern sentencing, as well as the relevant jurisprudence of this Tribunal and the ICTR, and of course to the circumstances of each case."[1220]

[1216] For example, the Prosecution refers to the case of Zlatko Aleksovski (Appeal Transcript, pp 734 and 735); Mucić refers to Duško Tadić (Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief, paras 41-48); and Land'o and Delić both refer to Dra'en Erdemović (Land'o Brief, p 141 and Appeal Transcript, p 752 and Delić Brief, para 361) and Duško Tadić (Land'o Brief, pp 141–143 and Appeal Transcript, pp 752-754, Delić Brief, para 361 and Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief, paras 36-40).

722. Finally, the Appeals Chamber notes that each party has made some submissio[illegible] to the standard of review in an appeal against sentence under Article 25 of the Statute.[1221] Certain parties in particular appear to be requesting that the Appeals Chamber revisit the findings of the Trial Chamber, carrying out a de novo review of the sentence and factors taken into account by the Trial Chamber, without necessarily pointing to any abuse of discretion. Land'o requests that the Appeals Chamber essentially reconsider the evidence and mitigating circumstances submitted on his behalf before the Trial Chamber, including that provided orally by several defence witnesses. In doing so, he asks the Appeals Chamber to carry out a de novo review of his sentence on appeal.[1222] Although neither Delić nor Mucić make detailed submissions in relation to the standard of review to be applied in an appeal against sentence,[1223] it appears to the Appeals Chamber that they are also essentially requesting a similar de novo review of the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber, despite the fact that they also point to several factors and arguments which they believe were wrongly decided by the Trial Chamber or to which they submit insufficient weight was attached.[1224]

723. The Prosecution submits that, in accordance with the Appeals Chamber decisions in the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement[1225] and the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement,[1226] the test that should be applied is the "discernible error test." That is, before the Appeals Chamber may intervene, "there must be a discernible error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion in sentencing."[1227] Once this discernible error has been identified, the [1221] Article 25 of the Statute provides: "1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds: (a) An error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or (b) An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice. 2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers."

[1222] Land'o Brief, p149, Appeal Transctipt, pp 756-7: "Mr Land'o requests this Trial Chamber now just to reconsider the evidence that we submitted in sentencing, reconsider the fragile mental condition of Mr Land'o before the outbreak of the aggression, his lack of ability to exercise his own free will, and also in light of Tadić, to revisit all of the evidence presented."

[1223] In the Delić Brief (paras 249-265) and Delić Reply (paras 3-12), Delić makes submissions on the standard of review on appeal in general. However, he does not clarify his submissions in relation to the standard of review to be applied on sentence. Mucić makes no submissions on the standard of review to be applied on appeal against either conviction or sentence, nor does he reply to the Prosecution submissions in this regard (Prosecution Response, paras 2.1-2.23). However, given the nature of his arguments (to be discussed infra), it also appears that he is requesting that the Appeals Chamber carry out a de novo review of sentence.

[1224] For example, Mucić submits that "taking all matters raised [...] the sentence of 7 years imposed upon him should be reduced to one that more properly and justly reflects any findings that remain unsubstantiated following the determination of his appeal against conviction, and the merits of his appeal against sentence." Mucić Brief, Appeal Against Sentence, pp. 7-8.

Prosecution submits that "the Appeals Chamber can revise the Trial Chamber's sen and substitute a new sentence."[1228]

724. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that "[t]he appeal process of the International Tribunal is not designed for the purpose of allowing parties to remedy their own failings or oversights during trial or sentencing."[1229] Appeal proceedings are rather of a "corrective nature" and, contrary to Land'o's submissions, they do not amount to a trial de novo.[1230] Therefore, to the extent that the parties simply resubmit arguments presented at trial without pointing to a particular error, this misconceives the purpose of appellate review on sentence.

725. The test to be applied in relation to the issue as to whether a sentence should be revised is that most recently confirmed in the Furund'ija Appeal Judgement.[1231] Accordingly, as a general rule, the Appeals Chamber will not substitute its sentence for that of a Trial Chamber unless "it believes that the Trial Chamber has committed an error in exercising its discretion, or has failed to follow applicable law."[1232] The Appeals Chamber will only intervene if it finds that the error was "discernible".[1233] As long as a Trial Chamber does not venture outside its "discretionary framework" in imposing sentence,[1234] the Appeals Chamber will not intervene. It therefore falls on each appellant, including the Prosecution in its appeal against Mucić's sentence, to demonstrate how the Trial Chamber ventured outside its discretionary framework in imposing the sentence it did.

Although the Prosecution did make further submissions in the Prosecution Brief (paras 5.5-5.6) and in the Prosecution Response (paras 2.1-2.23), these are subsumed by the submissions made during the oral hearing on appeal, following the two decisions of the Appeals Chamber (referred to above).

B. Prosecution's Appeal Against Mucić's Sentence

726. The Prosecution's fourth ground of appeal is that the Trial Chamber erred when it sentenced Zdravko Mucić to seven years' imprisonment, as this sentence was "manifestly inadequate".[1235]

727. Mucić was found by the Trial Chamber to have been directly responsible under Article 7(1) for the crimes of cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health by virtue of the inhumane conditions in the camp, and of unlawful confinement of civilians (Counts 46, 47 and 48). He was also found guilty as a superior under Article 7(3) of the Statute, in relation to the following counts:[1236]

> Counts 13 and 14: the wilful killing and murder of nine people – Zeljko Ćećez, Petko Gligorević, Gojko Miljanić, Miroslav Vujičić and Pero Mrkajić, Sćepo Gotovac, Zeljko Milošević, Simo Jovanović and Boško Samouković – and cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to Slavko Šušic;
>
> Counts 33 and 34: the torture of six people – Milovan Kuljanin, Momir Kuljanin, Grozdana Ćećez, Milojka Antić, Spasoje Miljević and Mirko Đorđić;
>
> Counts 38 and 39: the cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to three people – Dragan Kuljanin, Vukašin Mrkajić and Nedeljko Draganić – and the inhuman treatment and cruel treatment of Mirko Kuljanin; and

> Counts 46 and 47: the cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health by virtue of the inhumane conditions in the camp

[1235] Prosecution Brief, para 5.4.

[1236] The Appeals Chamber has found that one of the two convictions which were entered cumulatively in respect of charges arising from the same facts should be vacated. However, for the purposes of determining whether the Trial Chamber erred as alleged by the Prosecution in relation to the determination of Mucić's sentence, the Appeals Chamber must proceed on the basis of the convictions which the Trial Chamber had entered. The effect of the quashing of particular grounds on the basis of cumulative convictions considerations is discussed further below.

(this finding being in addition to the finding of guilty on these counts pursu... Article 7(1) of the Statute.)

728. The Trial Chamber sentenced Mucić to seven years imprisonment in respect of each count for which he was found guilty, and ordered that those sentences be served concurrently.[1237] As a result, the overall sentence imposed was a period of not more than seven years.

729. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber's approach in sentencing Mucić "involved errors of basic principle, and that the sentence it imposed on Mucić was so low that it fell outside the proper limits of the Trial Chamber's discretion".[1238] The errors alleged by the Prosecution were identified separately in relation to those convictions based solely on Article 7(3), the conviction based on Article 7(1) alone, and the convictions based on both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) liability. The primary argument relates to the Trial Chamber's alleged failure to take into account the gravity of the crimes for which Mucić was convicted. It is also alleged that the Trial Chamber should have taken into account crimes not specifically alleged in the indictment in sentencing Mucić.[1239] Finally, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber erred in determining that all of the sentences imposed on Mucić should be served concurrently.[1240] Mucić argued in relation to his own ground of appeal against sentence that his sentence was too high and did not take into account certain matters in mitigation, including the absence of his direct participation in acts of violence.[1241]

1. Failure to take into account the gravity of the offences

730. Article 24(2) of the Statute of the Tribunal provides:

> In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

[1237] Trial Judgement, para 1286.
[1238] Prosecution Brief, para 5.6.
[1239] Prosecution Brief, paras 5.34-5.43.
[1240] Prosecution Brief, paras 5.54-5.75.
[1241] Mucić Brief, Appeal Against Sentence, pp 1-2. This submission in respect of the absence of findings as to his direct participation is effectively incorporated in the Appeals Chambers' consideration of the Prosecution ground of appeal but in relation to other matters in mitigation is considered further below in relation to Mucić's ground of appeal.

731. The Trial Chamber found, in its general considerations before addressing the [illegible] relevant to each individual accused, that "[b]y far the most important consideration, which may be regarded as the litmus test for the appropriate sentence, is the gravity of the offence".[1242] In the subsequent Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber expressly endorsed this statement of the Čelebići Trial Chamber, and also expressed its agreement with the following statement of the Trial Chamber in the Kupreškić proceedings:

> The sentence to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.[1243]

The Appeals Chamber reiterates this endorsement of those statements and confirms its acceptance of the principle that the gravity of the offence is the primary consideration in imposing sentence. It is therefore necessary to consider whether the Trial Chamber in fact gave due weight to the gravity of the offences for which Mucić was convicted in the sentence it imposed.

(a) Convictions under Article 7(3) alone

732. The Prosecution first submitted that there are two aspects to an assessment of the gravity of offences committed under Article 7(3) of the Statute:

> (1) the gravity of the underlying crime committed by the convicted person's subordinate; and
> (2) the gravity of the convicted person's own conduct in failing to prevent or punish the underlying crimes.[1244]

The Appeals Chamber agrees that these two matters must be taken into account. As a practical matter, the seriousness of a superior's conduct in failing to prevent or punish crimes must be measured to some degree by the nature of the crimes to which this failure relates. A failure to prevent or punish murder or torture committed by a subordinate must be regarded as being of greater gravity than a failure to prevent or punish an act of plun[illegible] for example.[1245]

[1242] Trial Judgement, para 1225.

[1244] Prosecution Brief, para 5.13.

733. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber failed to make the gravity of Mucić's offences the starting point in its determination of his sentence. It suggests first that this is demonstrated by the point at which the Trial Chamber referred to "gravity" in its discussion of the factors relevant to sentencing Mucić. It notes that, after referring to the crimes of which Mucić was found guilty, the Trial Chamber referred to a "wide range of matters relevant to sentencing" and then "almost as an afterthought" stated that it "had 'also' considered the gravity of the offences".[1246] The fact that as a matter of form the Trial Chamber's referred last to its consideration of the gravity of the offences is of no significance of itself, and it certainly does not demonstrate independently that the Trial Chamber did not in fact give appropriate consideration to that matter. It is necessary, in order to determine that question, to focus on matters relating to the substance of the Trial Chamber's Judgement.

734. In relation to those offences for which Mucić was convicted under Article 7(3) of the Statute, the Prosecution alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in law by proceeding on the basis that Article 7(3) liability is less serious than that under Article 7(1). The Prosecution stated in its written submissions:

> [...] it is evident that the Trial Chamber's sentence was premised on a view that the conduct of a superior convicted under Article 7(3) is inherently less grave than the conduct of the individual subordinates who committed the relevant offences.[1247]

It supports this interpretation of the Trial Chamber's judgement with a comparison between the sentences received by Mucić and Delić in respect of counts 13 and 14.

735. It would be incorrect to state that, as a matter of law, responsibility for criminal conduct as a superior is less grave than responsibility as the subordinate perpetrator. However, in the Appeals Chamber's view, and contrary to the Prosecution's submission,

---

[1245] Mucić contends that the Prosecution's approach indicates that it mischaracterises the offences of a superior as being the "same crime" as that of the subordinate upon which the superior's offence is based: Mucić Response, para 10. The Prosecution Brief does contain some references which could be understood in this way: e.g., para 5.24. The Appeals Chamber's conclusion, however, is not based on any such reasoning but simply recognises the inevitable relationship between the gravity of the superior's failure to prevent or punish criminal conduct and the criminal conduct to which that failure relates.

[1246] Prosecution Brief, para 5.11.

nothing in the Trial Chamber's judgement indicates that it believed that responsibility for criminal conduct as a superior is inherently less grave than responsibility as the subordinate perpetrator. It appears from the Trial Chamber's Judgement that it considered that, in the circumstances established by the evidence, the conduct of Mucić in respect of the relevant counts was of a lesser gravity and therefore deserved a lesser sentence than that imposed on the subordinates. The Trial Chamber referred to these circumstances in noting that, in relation to the counts for which Mucić had been guilty under Article 7(3) alone, he was not found to have actively participated in the conduct underlying the offences.[1248]

736. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, proof of active participation by a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates adds to the gravity of the superior's failure to prevent or punish those acts and may therefore aggravate the sentence.[1249] The Trial Chamber explicitly acknowledged in its observations as to general sentencing principles that active abuse of a position of authority, which would presumably include participation in the crimes of subordinates, can aggravate liability arising from superior authority:

> The conduct of the accused in the exercise of his superior authority could be seen as an aggravating circumstance or in mitigation of his guilt. There is no doubt that abuse of positions of authority or trust will be regarded as aggravating.[1250]

737. It must also be recognised, however, that absence of such active participation is not a mitigating circumstance. Failure to prevent or punish subordinate crimes is the relevant culpable conduct and lack of active participation in the crimes does not reduce that culpability.

738. In assessing the degree of Mucić's responsibility, the Trial Chamber evidently concluded that there was no reason for aggravation of Mucić's sentence on the basis of abuse of authority, apparently because of its finding that Mucić had not actively participated in the underlying offences.[1251] However, the Trial Chamber had also made findings that Mucić was camp commander, with overall authority over the officers, guards and detainees in the camp; that he was responsible for conditions in the camp; that he made "no effort to prevent or punish those who mistreated the prisoners or even to investigate sr[illegible] incidents of mistreatment including the death of detainees"; and that he was regularly absent from the camp for days "in obvious neglect of his duty as commander and the fate of the vulnerable detainees".[1252] Importantly, the Trial Chamber found that Mucić's failures to prevent or punish the unlawful conduct in the camp were ongoing:

> In apparent encouragement, he tolerated these conditions over the entire period he was commander of the prison camp.[1253]

739. The Prosecution submits that a superior's failure over an extended period of time to prevent or punish crimes committed on an ongoing basis may be regarded as encouraging the commission of crimes, as the first failures to prevent or punish encourage the commission of subsequent crimes, and that such a failure should therefore be regarded as more serious than a single failure to prevent an isolated crime by a subordinate.[1254] The Appeals Chamber agrees that such an ongoing failure to exercise the duties to prevent or punish, with its implicit effect of encouraging subordinates to believe that they can commit further crimes with impunity, must be regarded as being of significantly greater gravity than isolated incidents of such a failure. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that, from the facts found by the Trial Chamber, Mucić's consistent failure to act in relation to the conditions and unlawful conduct within the camp must have had such an encouraging effect.

740. Although the Trial Chamber referred to the fact that Mucić's toleration of the unlawful conditions within the camp constituted apparent encouragement, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the Trial Chamber took this factor adequately into account in its consideration of Mucić's sentence. This is suggested by the Trial Chamber's comments, made in relation to factors going to the mitigation of sentence, that:

> The scenario thus described would suggest the recognition of individual failing as an aspect of human frailty, rather than one of individual malice. The criminal liability of Mr. Mucić has arisen entirely from his failure to exercise his superior authority for the beneficial purpose of the detainees in the Čelebići prison-camp.[1255]

This description of Mucić's position – which suggests a purely "negative" liability by omission on Mucić's part - indicates no acknowledgement of the more influential effect of encouraging or promoting crimes and an atmosphere of lawlessness within the camp c[illegible] by Mucić's ongoing failure to exercise his duties of supervision. The Trial Chamber later stated that:

> In this particular case, the reason for staying away from the prison-camp at nights without making provision for discipline during these periods, which was to save himself from the excesses of the guards, is rather an aggravating factor.[1256]

This does not satisfy the Appeals Chamber that the degree of encouragement and reinforcement of the criminal conduct of his subordinates that arose from Mucić's ongoing failure to supervise was correctly taken into account. The statement quoted indicates rather that his efforts to save himself from further knowledge of the crimes, as a self-interested attempt at avoiding unpleasantness, was a matter independent of the fact that these absences also had the effect of reinforcing the atmosphere of lawlessness in the camp. It was certainly appropriate to characterise Mucić's absences from the camp in the way the Trial Chamber did, but this did not absolve the Trial Chamber of the need also to consider the serious effect of encouragement of the commission of crimes that was caused by Mucić's failure of supervision.

741. As noted above, a consideration of the gravity of offences committed under Article 7(3) of the Statute involves, in addition to a consideration of the gravity of the conduct of the superior, a consideration of the seriousness of the underlying crimes. The fact that the Trial Chamber did not take adequate account of the gravity of Mucić's offences, and specifically of the underlying crimes, is also demonstrated by the fact that the sentences imposed in respect of each count were identical: seven years for each count. The Trial Chamber imposed individual sentences in relation to each count rather than a single global sentence, as appears to have been contemplated by the Rules at that time.[1257] The process of determining the individual sentences for those counts requires a consideration of the particular offence in respect of which that count was charged and the evidence of the circumstances in which that offence was committed to enable a determination of the gravity of the offence. The imposition of exactly the same penalty for each count, whether in respect of the failure to prevent or punish the murders of nine people (counts 13 and 14) or the failure to prevent or punish the cruel treatment of four people (counts 38 and 39), and the order that they be served concurrently, demonstrates that the Trial Chamber made no attempt to distinguish between the gravity of each of the offences. It effectively simply imposed a global sentence of seven years to cover every offence, which was a manifestly erroneous assessment of the totality of Mucić's conduct. An alternative implication is that the Trial Chamber considered that the criminal conduct of Mucić was effectively the same under each count – a failure to prevent or punish. However, as the Appeals Chamber has made clear, such an approach fails to take account of the essential consideration that the gravity of the failure to prevent or punish is in part dependent on the gravity of the underlying subordinate crimes.

[1257] Rule 87 (C) provided at the relevant time "If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more of the charges contained in the indictment, it shall at the same time determine the penalty to be imposed in respect of each finding of guilt." It has since been amended (Revision 19, effective from 19 Jan 2001) to read "If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more charges contained in the indictment, it shall impose a sentence in respect of each finding of guilt and indicate whether such sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently, unless it decides to exercise its power to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused."

742. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber did not take adequate account of the gravity of Mucić's offences under Article 7(3) in determining his sentence, and has therefore failed to have regard to a consideration it must have regard to, in imposing his sentence.

(b) Convictions on the basis of both direct and superior responsibility (Counts 46 and 47)

743. In relation to the offences for which Mucić was convicted pursuant to both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) – wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health (Count 46) and cruel treatment, in respect of the inhumane conditions in the camp (Count 47) – the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber also failed to take into account the gravity of the crimes for the additional reason that his liability as a direct participant as well as a superior should have been taken into account as an aggravating factor.[1258]

744. The Trial Chamber found that:

> By omitting to provide the detainees with adequate food, water, health care and toilet [facilities] Zdravko Mucić participated in the maintenance of the inhumane conditions that prevailed in the Čelebići prison-camp. Accordingly, he is directly liable for these conditions, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute. Furthermore, in his position of superior authority Zdravko Mucić knew, or had reason to know, how the detainees, by the violent acts of his subordinates, were subjected to an atmosphere of terror, but failed to prevent these acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof. Accordingly, the Trial

[1258] Prosecution Brief paras 5.45-5.46.

> Chamber finds that Zdravko Mucić is responsible pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute for the atmosphere of terror prevailing in the Čelebići prison-camp.[1259]

The Trial Chamber entered convictions against counts 46 and 47, each count encompassing both the Article 7(1) liability and the Article 7(3) liability. In sentencing, the Trial Chamber referred to the fact of Mucić's dual liability under each of counts 46 and 47,[1260] but did not refer to this matter in its consideration of the relevant aggravating factors in relation to Mucić's sentence.

745. Where criminal responsibility for an offence is alleged under one count pursuant to both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3), and where the Trial Chamber finds that both direct responsibility and responsibility as a superior are proved, even though only one conviction is entered, the Trial Chamber must take into account the fact that both types of responsibility were proved in its consideration of sentence. This may most appropriately be considered in terms of imposing punishment on the accused for two separate offences encompassed in the one count. Alternatively, it may be considered in terms of the direct participation aggravating the Article 7(3) responsibility (as discussed above) or the accused's seniority or position of authority aggravating his direct responsibility under Article 7(1).[1261] The Aleksovski Appeal Judgement has recognised both such matters as being factors which should result in an increased or aggravated sentence. The accused in that case, also a prison commander, had been found guilty of certain crimes on the basis of Article 7(1) of the Statute, for others on the basis of Article 7(3), and for others under both Articles. In relation to those offences of which he was convicted for his direct participation, the Appeals Chamber observed that the accused's "superior responsibility as a warden seriously aggravated [his] offences."[1262] It proceeded to state:

> The Appellant did more than merely tolerate the crimes as a commander; with his direct participation he provided additional encouragement to his subordinates to commit similar

---

[1260] Trial Judgement, paras 1237 and 1240.

[1261] This observation applies only if the two types of responsibility are not independently charged under different counts, with separate sentences imposed on each. A different situation may arise of two separate counts against an accused, one alleging Article 7(1) responsibility for direct or accessory participation in a particular criminal incident, and another alleging Article 7(3) responsibility for failure to prevent or punish subordinates for their role in the same incident. If convictions and sentences are entered on both counts, it would not be open to aggravate the sentence on the Article 7(3) charge on the basis of the additional direct participation, nor the sentence on the Article 7(1) charge on the basis of the accused's position of authority, as to do so would impermissibly duplicate the penalty imposed on the basis of the same conduct.

[1262] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 183.

> acts. The combination of these factors should, therefore, have resulted in a longer sentence and should certainly not have provided grounds for mitigation.[1263]

746. Here, the Trial Chamber found Mucić guilty under each of counts 46 and 47 both for his direct responsibility for the inhuman conditions prevailing in the camp, and also for his superior responsibility for the atmosphere of terror created in the camp by the guards over whom he held authority. Although the absence of any specific reference in the Trial Judgement to the dual responsibility of Mucić for the offences encompassed by counts 46 and 47 is not determinative of the question as to whether the Trial Chamber actually took it into account in sentencing Mucić, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that, in determining a sentence of seven years for this count, it did so. Although the Trial Chamber clearly considered the severity of the conditions which Mucić directly participated in creating, and the violence and humiliation meted out to detainees by the guards,[1264] it is not apparent that the Trial Chamber fully recognised in its sentence that this conduct encompassed two types of criminal responsibility which were both individually of considerable gravity. The length of the sentence imposed strongly suggests that it did not do so.

(c) Gravity of the offence of unlawful confinement (Count 48).

747. Mucić was convicted of unlawful confinement of civilians (Count 48) pursuant to Article 7(1) alone, and was sentenced to seven years imprisonment on that count. The Prosecution submits that "the Trial Chamber gave virtually no consideration to the appropriate sentence in relation to this count".[1265] It points to the Trial Chamber's statement, made after its discussion of various aggravating and mitigating factors in relation to Mucić, that:

> The criminal liability of Mr Mucić has arisen entirely from his failure to exercise his superior authority for the beneficial purpose of the detainees in the Čelebići prison-camp.[1266]

The Prosecution says that this demonstrates that the Trial Chamber failed to take account, in sentencing Mucić, of his own conduct which directly resulted in the unlawful confinement of civilians.[1267]

[1263] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 183.
[1264] Trial Judgement, para 1242.
[1265] Prosecution Brief, para 5.48.
[1266] Trial Judgement, para 1248.

748. The Trial Chamber's statement that Mucić's criminal liability arose "entirely from his failure to exercise his superior authority for the beneficial purpose of the detainees", understood to refer to "superior authority" in the sense of responsibility pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute (the most natural understanding of the phrase in this context), is clearly wrong. It fails to take into account the Trial Chamber's findings that Mucić's liability in relation to Count 48 was founded solely on his direct responsibility under Article 7(1), and that he was responsible for cruel treatment and wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health under counts 46 and 47 on the basis of Article 7(1), in addition to as a superior under Article 7(3). It is possible that the Trial Chamber was simply intending to refer to the fact that Mucić's criminal liability arose entirely from his conduct in his role as camp commander, or as counsel for Mucić contends, his "authority" in a general sense.[1268] That would not misstate the position, since Mucić's direct liability for unlawful confinement arose from his failures to exercise his power as camp commander to release detainees he was aware were unlawfully detained, and his Article 7(1) responsibility for the inhumane conditions in the camp arose from his failure as camp commander to provide adequate facilities for the detainees. Given the Trial Chamber's acknowledgement earlier in the section on the sentencing of Mucić that he was not found guilty of actively participating in the offences, "with the exception of counts 46 and 47 (inhumane conditions) and count 48 (unlawful confinement of civilians)", the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the reasoning in the Trial Judgement demonstrates that the Trial Chamber gave no consideration to the appropriate sentence on this count.

749. The Prosecution contends more generally, however, that, in light of the seriousness of the offence of unlawful confinement, a sentence of seven years was manifestly inadequate. It first argues in support of this submission that:

> [...] it is evident that all of the other crimes which were inflicted on the victims during their detention in the camp would not have occurred if they had not been unlawfully confined there. In imposing sentence in respect of Count 48, the fact that victims of the unlawful detention became the victims of other crimes while detained is a matter to be taken into account.[1269]

[1267] Prosecution Brief, para 5.50.
[1268] Mucić Response, para 14.
[1269] Prosecution Brief, para 5.50.

750. This submission overlooks the fact that those crimes against the detainees in Čelebići camp which the Prosecution determined could be proved beyond reasonable doubt had been independently charged in the Indictment. Mucić was charged with superior responsibility and, in the case of inhuman conditions under Counts 46 and 47, personal responsibility for many of those crimes. In this situation, there would be a danger of impermissibly penalising the accused more than once for the same conduct if the sentence in respect of the unlawful confinement count was to be aggravated by reference to the fact that these other crimes had been committed upon the detainees. In the circumstances of this case, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that there was any error in not taking the fact that crimes were committed on the detainees to be a matter in aggravation of sentence.

751. The Prosecution also supported its submission in relation to Count 48 by reference to the penalties for the offences of unlawful detention, unlawful confinement or false imprisonment in certain national jurisdictions. The domestic legal provisions identified provide sentencing ranges from three months to life with hard labour (depending on the presence of various aggravating circumstances such as torture or torture resulting in death) in Belgium,[1270] up to twenty years for a single victim or up to thirty in the case of multiple victims in France,[1271] and from five to twenty years in Rwanda, with the death penalty if the detained victim is tortured to death.[1272] The Prosecution also acknowledges, however, that other national systems do not impose such severe penalties, with ranges covering from one to twelve years.[1273]

752. Mucić submits that references to such sentencing ranges in the absence of examples of specific sentences given in relation to "virtually identical facts with the offender having virtually identical circumstances and mitigation [...] the value of such examples, although of some academic interest, is in practice very limited".[1274] The Appeals Chamber agrees that reference to these national provisions in the abstract is of very limited value.

753. The Prosecution's reference to the most severe penalties applicable to unlawful detention combined with aggravating factors such as torture or the death of the victim again overlooks the fact that, in this case, those crimes have been independently charged and therefore not an appropriate reference point in seeking guidance on what may be a suitable range of sentences for the offence of unlawful confinement alone. Secondly, the provisions referred to by the Prosecution demonstrate in any event a very wide sentencing range within which the seven year sentence actually imposed on Mucić in respect of this offence (if otherwise appropriate) easily falls.

754. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the sentence imposed on Mucić in respect of Count 48 falls outside of the sentencing range which is open to the Trial Chamber in the exercise of its discretion or that any other error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion has been demonstrated in relation to this particular count.

(d) Conclusion in relation to the gravity of the offences

755. For the reasons identified above, the Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber did not have sufficient regard to the gravity of the offences committed by Mucić in exercising its sentencing discretion, and that as a result the seven year sentence imposed on him did not adequately reflect the totality of his criminal conduct. The Appeals Chamber's conclusion is reinforced by reference to the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement. It is appropriate to explain why this is so.

756. Public confidence in the integrity of the administration of criminal justice (whether international or domestic) is a matter of abiding importance to the survival of the institutions which are responsible for that administration. One of the fundamental elements in any rational and fair system of criminal justice is consistency in punishment. This is an important reflection of the notion of equal justice. The experience of many domestic jurisdictions over the years has been that such public confidence may be eroded if these institutions give an appearance of injustice by permitting substantial inconsistencies in the punishment of different offenders, where the circumstances of the different offences and of the offenders being punished are sufficiently similar that the punishments imposed would, in justice, be expected to be also generally similar.

[1274] Mucić Response, para 15.

757. This is not to suggest that a Trial Chamber is bound to impose the same sentence in the one case as that imposed in another case simply because the circumstances between the two cases are similar. As the number of sentences imposed by the Tribunal increase, there will eventually appear a range or pattern of sentences imposed in relation to persons where their circumstances and the circumstances of their offences are generally similar. When such a range or pattern has appeared, a Trial Chamber would be obliged to consider that range or pattern of sentences, without being bound by it, in order only to ensure that the sentence it imposes does not produce an unjustified disparity which may erode public confidence in the integrity of the Tribunal's administration of criminal justice.

758. At the present time, there does not exist such a range or pattern of sentences imposed by the Tribunal. The offences which the Tribunal tries are of such a nature that there is little assistance to be gained from sentencing patterns in relation to often fundamentally different offences in domestic jurisdictions, beyond that which the Tribunal gains from the courts of the former Yugoslavia in accordance with Article 24 of the Tribunal's Statute. At the present time, therefore, in order to avoid any unjustified disparity, it is possible for the Tribunal to have regard only to those sentences which have been imposed by it in generally similar circumstances as to both the offences and the offenders. It nevertheless must do so with considerable caution. As the Appeals Chamber discusses further below[1275] comparisons with sentences imposed in other cases will be of little assistance unless the circumstances of the cases are substantially similar. However, in cases involving similar factual circumstances and similar convictions, particularly where the sentences imposed in those other cases have been the subject of consideration in the Appeals Chamber, there should be no substantial disparity in sentence unless justified by the circumstances of particular accused.

759. Aleksovski, a commander of a prison in which detainees were mistreated, was convicted for one count of outrages against personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute,[1276] encompassing liability under both Articles 7(1) and 7(3) for a number of crimes of violence, for aiding and abetting the creation of an atmosphere of psychological terror and for not preventing the use of detainees as human shields and for trench digging. He was not convicted of the more serious crimes of murder and torture, or the additional distinct crime of unlawful detention of civilians, as Mucić was. The Trial Chamber's sentence of two and half years imprisonment[1277] was revised on appeal on the basis that it was "manifestly inadequate".[1278] The Appeals Chamber imposed a "revised sentence" of seven years, which took into account the "element of double jeopardy" in the process in that Aleksovski had been required to appear for sentence twice for the same conduct, "suffering the consequent anxiety and distress" after having been released.[1279] According to the Appeals Chamber, if it were not for these considerations, "the [revised]sentence would have been considerably longer". If Aleksovski would, but for the double jeopardy factor, have been sentenced to considerably more than seven years imprisonment, there is a serious disparity in Mucić also being sentenced to only seven years imprisonment in respect of more numerous crimes committed in similar circumstances, including crimes of undoubtedly greater gravity than those for which Aleksovski was convicted.

2. Failure to have regard to crimes not alleged in the Indictment

760. In relation to the crimes of which Mucić was convicted under Article 7(3) of the Statute, the Prosecution submits that, although those counts specified certain crimes against certain identified victims, "the wording of those paragraphs made clear that these lists of crimes and victims were non-exhaustive".[1280] It contends that, in sentencing Mucić on these counts, the Trial Chamber "erred in failing to have regard to the fact that those crimes specifically alleged in the relevant paragraphs of the Indictment for which Mucić was found responsible did not represent the totality of the relevant criminal acts committed against the detainees in the Čelebići prison-camp".[1281]

761. The counts referred to by the Prosecution charged crimes against specific individuals but introduced these charges with the phraseology of "including". For example, the introductory paragraph to Counts 33 and 34 commences with the words:

> With respect to the murders committed in the Čelebići camp, including: [...]

[1277] Prosecutor v Aleksovski, Case No IT- 95-14/1-T, Judgement, 25 June 1999, para 244.

[1279] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 190.
[1280] Prosecution Brief, para 5.34.
[1281] Prosecution Brief, para 5.43.

The Trial Chamber acknowledged that this language was intended to encompass "refere to unspecified criminal acts alleged to have occurred in the Čelebići prison-camp".[1282] It continued:

> In consideration of the rights enshrined in Article 21 of the Statute, and in fairness to the accused, the Trial Chamber does not regard the unspecified acts referred to in the above-mentioned counts as constituting any part of the charges against the accused. Accordingly, in its findings in relation to those counts, the Trial Chamber will limit itself to a consideration of those criminal acts specifically enumerated in the Indictment.[1283]

762. The Prosecution submits generally that, when a superior is charged with responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute with unspecified criminal acts, "there is nothing to prevent the Trial Chamber from having regard to those acts, if proved at trial, when sentencing the superior".[1284] It refers to the statement of the Trial Chamber quoted above as a demonstration that the Trial Chamber must have had no reference to these unspecified acts in sentencing Mucić, even though "it was made clear in the Trial Chamber's Judgement that criminal acts apart from those individual acts specified in the Indictment were indeed committed in the camp during the relevant period".[1285] The Prosecution then refers to certain passages from the Trial Judgement which demonstrate the Trial Chamber's recognition that the crimes specified in the Indictment did not represent the totality of the criminal acts to which the detainees were subjected in the Čelebići camp.[1286] The Prosecution does not, however, identify any passages which contain any findings that Mucić specifically was responsible for such unspecified acts. The Appeals Chamber cannot find any indication from the Trial Judgement that the Trial Chamber had found beyond reasonable doubt that Mucić had committed any criminal acts additional to those specifically identified in the Indictment.

763. Mucić submits that the Prosecution's argument is in effect an appeal against acquittal under the mantle of an appeal against sentence because, if the Trial Chamber had not found the relevant matters proved beyond reasonable doubt against Mucić, there was no basis on which it could take those matters into account in sentencing.[1287] The Appeals Chamber agrees that only those matters which are proved beyond reasonable doubt against an accused may be the subject of an accused's sentence or taken into account in aggrave of that sentence. As was made clear during the hearing of oral submissions on appeal,[1288] the issue is primarily one of whether the Prosecution actually sought findings in relation to the other acts referred to in the Indictment. The Trial Chamber could not be expected to make findings in respect of matters which had not been specifically put before it, whether in the Indictment or during the trial. Another issue is whether the accused, in view of the very general wording used in the Indictment, had been sufficiently put on notice during the proceedings that such additional offences were alleged and of the nature of those offences so that he could meet the allegations in his own defence case.[1289]

764. As to the first issue, the Prosecution in its submissions on appeal was not able to direct the Appeals Chamber to any record of the Prosecution having sought, at trial, findings by the Trial Chamber in relation to other offences by Mucić not specifically alleged in the Indictment. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in its final written submission before the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution submitted that

> [...] the specific incidents referred to in the Indictment are not exhaustive but rather illustrative [...]. Thus for the purposes of superior responsibility, the Judges may consider other incidents not specifically described in the indictment but proved at trial.[1290]

No such "other incidents" were specified. The Prosecution also failed to identify any such acts during its closing oral arguments, submitting generally only that the Trial Chamber should convict the accused for violations of law proved beyond reasonable doubt.[1291] There is no indication that the Prosecution directed the Trial Chamber at any point during the proceedings towards any other specific criminal incidents upon which it sought findings as to Mucić's responsibility.

765. The Appeals Chamber considers that, in such circumstances, there was no error made by the Trial Chamber in failing to make findings in relation to matters not specifically alleged in the Indictment. Given the generality with which those other incidents alleged in the Indictment, the Indictment itself did not impose an obligation on the Trial Chamber to make findings on those incidents. It was incumbent upon the Prosecution, if it did in fact seek findings as to those matters, to identify them clearly to the Trial Chamber and to request it to make findings upon them. For this reason, this argument of the Prosecution is not accepted.

766. Given this conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider whether the requirement, referred to above, that the accused was sufficiently on notice of the other criminal incidents which were alleged had been satisfied by the Prosecution. In any case, no material was put before the Appeals Chamber by the Prosecution to enable it to be satisfied that this requirement had been met.

3. The determination that all sentences should be served concurrently

767. The Prosecution finally submitted in relation to this ground of appeal that the Trial Chamber erred in ordering the Mucić's sentences all be served concurrently.[1292] The Trial Chamber stated, in relation to whether the sentences imposed should be served concurrently or consecutively, that:

> During the pre-trial stage of these proceedings, the Trial Chamber issued a decision on the motion by the Defence for Zejnil Delalić challenging the form of the Indictment. The decision considered, inter alia, the issue of whether it is permitted to charge an accused under several legal qualifications for the same act, that is, the issue of whether cumulative charging is permitted. The Trial Chamber agreed with a previous decision issued in the case of Prosecutor v Duško Tadić, and thus declined to evaluate this argument on the basis that the matter is only relevant to penalty considerations if the accused is ultimately found guilty of the charges in question. Accordingly, this challenge to the Indictment was denied. It is in this context that the Trial Chamber here orders that each of the sentences is to be served concurrently. The sentence imposed shall not be consecutive.[1293]

768. The Prosecution submits that this reasoning could not justify the Trial Chamber's conclusion that all of the sentences imposed on Mucić should be served concurrently.[1294] It identifies two matters in support of this argument. The first is that many of the sentences imposed on Mucić related to crimes arising from different conduct, rather than from the same act as is suggested by the statement of the Trial Chamber quoted above. Seco[illegible] submits that:

[1292] Prosecution Brief, para 5.55-5.56.
[1293] Trial Judgement, para 1286 (Footnote omitted).
[1294] Prosecution Brief, para 5.56.

> Even where two different crimes of which an accused has been convicted arise out of the same conduct, this should be reflected in sentencing, but this does not mean that the sentences imposed in respect of the different crimes arising out of the same conduct must always necessarily be made completely concurrent.[1295]

The Prosecution contends that "conduct which simultaneously constitutes more than one crime is more serious than conduct which constitutes one of those crimes only, and this is a matter which can appropriately be reflected in sentencing".[1296]

769. The Appeals Chamber has already found that, in relation to the crimes for which Mucić was convicted under both Articles 2 and 3 in relation to the same conduct, the charges under Article 3 must be dismissed. This requires that the sentencing consequences be considered by a reconstituted Trial Chamber, which will no doubt consider whether the remarks of the original Trial Chamber indicate that there should be no adjustment downwards in the sentences imposed. For that reason, it is unnecessary to consider further the submission insofar as it relates to convictions for the same conduct. It suffices for the Appeals Chamber to reiterate that the governing criterion of sentencing is that it must accurately recognise the gravity of the offences and must reflect the totality of the accused's criminal conduct.[1297] The fact that an accused's conduct may legitimately be legally characterised as constituting different crimes would not overcome the fundamental principle that he should not be punished more than once in respect of the same conduct. In the case of two legally distinct crimes arising from the same incident, care would have to be taken that the sentence does not doubly punish in respect of the same act which is relied on as satisfying the elements common to the two crimes, but only that conduct which is relied on only to satisfy the distinct elements of the relevant crimes.

770. In relation to those offences for which Mucić was convicted which relate to different conduct, the Prosecution submits that, where an accused has committed multiple crimes, the Trial Chamber must take into account "the higher degree of wrongdoing and the fact that a number of different protected values have been harmed".[1298] It summarises its positi[illegible] saying that "a person who is convicted of many crimes should generally receive a higher sentence than a person committing only one of those crimes".[1299]

771. Rule 101(C) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence provided at the time relevant to the Trial proceedings in this case that:

> The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

The choice as to concurrent or consecutive sentencing is therefore a matter within the Trial Chamber's discretion. Rule 101(C) has now been removed from the Rules but the discretion of the Trial Chamber in relation to concurrent or consecutive sentencing is preserved in the amended Rule 87(C), which provides that the Trial Chamber will indicate whether separate sentences imposed in respect of multiple convictions shall be served consecutively or concurrently.[1300] However, it is clear that this discretion must be exercised by reference to the fundamental consideration, referred to above, that the sentence to be served by an accused must reflect the totality of the accused's criminal conduct. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber agrees with the Prosecution submission that a person who is convicted of many crimes should generally receive a higher sentence than a person convicted of only one of those crimes.

772. The Appeals Chamber has already found that the Trial Chamber erred in not adequately taking into account the gravity of certain of the offences for which Mucić was convicted, and that a sentence of seven years did not adequately reflect the totality of Mucić's criminal conduct. It is possible that, had the Trial Chamber taken adequate account of the gravity of the crimes in determining the individual sentences for those crimes, the choice of a concurrent rather than consecutive sentence would have been entirely appropriate. However, in light of the Appeals Chamber's general conclusion that the overall sentence did not adequately reflect the totality of Mucić's criminal conduct, it is unnecessary to determine whether the choice of concurrent rather than consecutive sentences was an additional cause of the Trial Chamber's error. The Appeals Cham view as to what would have been a more appropriate sentence is expressed below.[1301]

C. Mucić's Appeal Against Sentence

773. Mucić submits generally that the sentence of seven years was too long "in all the circumstances of the case."[1302] Mucić's primary argument is that the Trial Chamber erred in its consideration of both aggravating and mitigating factors, in that it failed to give due weight to the "strong [...] arguably unique, mitigating features" of his case,[1303] while taking into account certain aggravating matters which it should not. He also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its dismissal of the Wilhelm Von Leeb case as an appropriate precedent in its determination of sentence and that it erred in the weight which it found should be accorded to the element of deterrence. While it is evident from the above that the Appeals Chamber consider that Mucić's sentence of seven years was in fact inadequate, it is appropriate to address these arguments since they contend specific legal errors made by the Trial Chamber.

1. Consideration of aggravating and mitigating factors

(a) Mitigating Factors

774. Mucić specifically alleges that his sentence did not properly reflect the mitigating effect of the Trial Chamber's finding that there was no evidence that Mucić had directly and actively participated in any acts, and that on the contrary he had prevented acts of violence.[1304] The first matter has been considered above when addressing the Prosecution arguments as to the Trial Chamber's consideration of the gravity of the offences. As to the second argument, Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber failed to take adequate account of the fact that he took steps to alleviate suffering and prevent acts of violence.[1305]

775. Mucić was convicted inter alia, under Article 7(3) of the Statute and hence as a commander. If a commander in charge of, as in this case, a prison-camp or detention facility, takes steps to alleviate the suffering of those detained, depending on the degree or level of this action, it may be that the seriousness of the overall offences can be mitigated. This would, however, depend on the circumstances of the case and the degree of assistance given. As seen above, a decision as to the weight to be accorded to such acts in mitigation of sentence lies within the discretion of the Trial Chamber. In the absence of a finding that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in imposing a sentence outside its discretionary framework as provided by the Statute and Rules, this argument must fail.[1306]

776. The Appeals Chamber has already noted that the Trial Chamber expressly considered Mucić's submissions regarding "evidence of witnesses for the Prosecution who testified in glowing terms about the attitude of [...] Mucić towards the detainees".[1307] Further, it considered that there was "[...] a lot to be said for the evidence in mitigation, as there is for the aggravating circumstances".[1308] Although it does not appear to be disputed that Mucić may have carried out several benevolent acts during his command at the Čelebići camp,[1309] the Appeals Chamber considers that, in the circumstances of this case, it was within the Trial Chamber's discretion to conclude that these acts could not constitute significant mitigation.[1310] This is particularly so because of the fact that he was a commander who was in a position to take steps to control and prevent all acts of violence but who rather frequently absented himself "in obvious neglect of his duty as commander and the fate of the vulnerable detainees".[1311] As recently observed by Trial Chamber I, such acts "are all the less decisive when one notes that criminals frequently show compassion for some of their victims even when perpetrating the most heinous of crimes".[1312]

[1310] It is the case that war crimes tribunals have taken into account efforts by an accused to reduce the suffering of the victims. However, the efforts taken in those cases and considered in mitigation, were considerably more substantial and noticeable than in the instant case and therefore were found to merit credit. See for example, the findings with regard to: Waldermar Von Radetzkty in United States v Ohlendorf et al. 4 T.W.C. 1, 558 (1948) at 578; Ernst Dehner in United States v Wilhelm List et al., ("Hostage Trial"), 11 T.W.C. 757, (1948) at pp 1299-1300; Flick and Steinbrinck in United States v Friedrich Flick et al., 9 L.R.T.W.C. 1 (1949), at pp 29-30; and Albert Speer in 22 Trial of the Major War Criminals Before the Int'l Mil. Tribunal 524 (1946), at p 579; Von Neurath in 22 Trial of the Major War Criminals Before the Int'l Mil. Tribunal 524 (1946), at p 582. However, note also the finding regarding Karl Mummenthey, in the Pohl case, 5 T.W.C, p 1054: "It is not an unusual phenomenon in life to find an isolated good deed emerging from an evil man."
[1312] Blaškić Judgement, para 781.

777. As a matter of law, a Trial Chamber is obliged to take account of mitig circumstances in imposing sentence.[1313] However, the weight to be attached is a matter within its discretion. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber clearly considered the mitigating factors presented on Mucić's behalf.[1314] The Trial Chamber was entitled to attach limited weight to such mitigation, and the Appeals Chamber accordingly finds that Mucić has failed to demonstrate any error by the Trial Chamber in this regard.

(b) Aggravating Factors

778. Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber erred in making the findings it did in relation to his conduct during the trial, including the references it made to allegations of fabrication of evidence and threats to a witness. He submits that this conduct could only be taken into account following a finding of guilt, and that such allegations could rather have been dealt with separately by the Trial Chamber under, for example, Rule 77 of the Rules.[1315] He submits that the Trial Chamber erred in considering his general attitude during the trial and the fact that he did not give oral evidence. He submits that the reference by the Trial Chamber to the latter, in its consideration of sentence, was "tantamount to a reversal of the burden of proof."[1316]

779. With regard to these specific allegations, the Trial Chamber found:

> The conduct of Mr. Mucić before the Trial Chamber during the course of the trial raises separately the issue of aggravation. The Trial Chamber has watched and observed the behaviour and demeanour of Mr. Mucić throughout the trial. The accused has consistently demonstrated a defiant attitude and a lack of respect for the judicial process and for the participants in the trial, almost verging on lack of awareness of the gravity of the offences for which he is charged and the solemnity of the judicial process. The Presiding Judge, has, on occasions, had to issue stern warnings reminding him that he was standing trial for grave offences. The Prosecution has also presented evidence of an exchange of notes between Zejnil Delalić and Zdravko Mucić conspiring about the fabrication of evidence to be given at the trial. There have also been allegations that Mr. Mucić participated in the threatening of a witness in the courtroom. Such efforts to influence and/or intimidate witnesses are particularly relevant aggravating conduct, [1313] Article 24 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules. Rule 101 (B) provides inter alia: "In determining sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account...(ii) any mitigating circumstances including the substantial co-operation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction."

[1316] Mucić Brief, Appeal Against Sentence, p 6.

> which the Trial Chamber is entitled to take into account in the determination of the appropriate sentence.[1317]

It also found:

> The general attitude of Mr. Mucić during the trial proceedings in and outside the courtroom would seem to be a repetition of his casual and perfunctory attitude to his duties in the Čelebići prison-camp. He made concerted and sustained efforts where he could to intimidate witnesses and to suborn favourable evidence from them. His demeanour throughout the proceedings suggests that he appears to have regarded this trial as a farce and an expensive joke. Zdravko Mucić has declined to give any oral evidence, notwithstanding the dominant position he played in the facts giving rise to the prosecution of the accused persons.[1318]

780. It has already been stated that the Statute and the Rules do not define exhaustively the factors which may be taken into account by a Trial Chamber in mitigation or aggravation of sentence, and Trial Chambers are therefore endowed with a considerable degree of discretion in deciding on the factors which may be taken into account. Nevertheless, it must be queried whether the Trial Chamber erred in taking these particular factors into account. A Trial Chamber's decision may be disturbed on appeal if an appellant shows that the Trial Chamber either took into account what it ought not to have, or failed to take into account what it ought to have taken into account, in the weighing process involved in this exercise of the discretion.

781. It is alleged that the Trial Chamber erred in taking into account in aggravation of sentence the fact that Mucić failed to give oral testimony. In accordance with the position in many national jurisdictions, an accused before the Tribunal is not obliged to give oral testimony during the trial on his or her own behalf. Rule 85(C) of the Rules provides

> If the accused so desires, the accused may appear as a witness in his or her own defence.[1319]

Article 21(4)(g) of the Statute provides further guidance and provides that an accused shall be entitled to the right "not to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt".[1320] This, however, does not explicitly identify the consequences of failure to testify at all, unlike the corresponding provision in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Article 67(1)(g) of the Rome Statute expressly provides that an accused has the to refuse to testify, in which case no inference adverse to him or her may be drawn.[1321] The question remains whether failure to testify before the Tribunal can be held against an accused in either consideration of the merits of a case, or, as here, in aggravation of sentence.

782. Between national jurisdictions, there is no consensus as to an absolute right for an accused to remain silent at trial at no risk of adverse inferences being drawn, and in fact certain jurisdictions have taken steps to limit such right.[1322] This limitation has been considered by the European Court of Human Rights, which has found in principle that the fair hearing requirement in Article 6 of the European Convention[1323] implies that an accused has the right to remain silent and not contribute to incriminating himself or herself.[1324] However, it has also recognised that this right is not absolute, and that the drawing of an adverse inference from an accused's silence regulated by law is not contrary to Article 6 as long as there are other safeguards in place.[1325] In its view, therefore, particular caution is required before a domestic court can invoke an accused's silence against him or her.

[1321] Article 67(1)(g) of the ICC Statute provides that that an accused shall have the right: "[n]ot to be compelled to testify or to confess guilt and to remain silent, without such silence being a consideration in the determination of guilt of innocence."

[1322] For example, in the United Kingdom, although an accused still has the right to refuse to give evidence at trial, Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 35 now provides that unless an accused shows good cause for the refusal to answer questions, a Judge may direct a jury that it can draw such inferences as appear proper from the failure or refusal to answer questions (s 38(3) provides that a conviction may not rest solely on such an inference). This was interpreted in R v Cowan [1996] 1 Cr App R 1 as not removing the right to remain silent. Lord Taylor C J held that such inferences can only be drawn if the jury is satisfied that the Prosecution has proved its case, and that the jury is told that, a) the burden of proof rests on the Prosecution throughout, b) the defendant has a right to remain silent and that an inference alone cannot prove guilt. See also Article 4 Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, R v Murray, [1993] 97 Cr App R 151. The right to remain silent with no adverse inferences drawn is still preserved in, for example, the United States. The self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment, incorporated through the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause, provides that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." This has been interpreted to mean that a defendant is also not obliged to appear as a witness. See Griffen v California, 380 US 609, where it was held that comment on the failure to give evidence was impermissible as it was "a penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional privilege" as it "cuts down on the privilege by making its assertion costly." In Australia, s*ee Woon v The Queen* (1964) 109 CLR 529, Petty and Maiden v R, (1991) 173 CLR 95.

[1324] Funke v France, Eur Ct H R, Judgement of 25 Feb 1993, A.256-A, para 44.

[1325] John Murray v The United Kingdom, Judgement of 8 Feb 1996, Reports 1996-I, Vol 1, paras 44-58. The decision was confirmed in the recent case of Condron v The United Kingdom, Eur Ct H R, Judgement of 2 May 2000, Application no 35718/97. In its reasoning the Court took into account safeguards designed to respect the rights of the defence, for example the warning that adverse inferences could be drawn, that it could only be drawn if a failure to express oneself might as a matter of common sense lead to the conclusion that the accused had been guilty and if there existed other very strong evidence against the accused.

783. Neither the Statute nor the Rules of this Tribunal expressly provide that an infer can be drawn from the failure of an accused to give evidence. At the same time, neither do they state that silence should not "be a consideration in the determination of guilt or innocence".[1326] Should it have been intended that such adverse consequences could result, the Appeals Chamber concludes that an express provision and warning would have been required under the Statute, setting out the appropriate safeguards. Therefore, it finds that an absolute prohibition against consideration of silence in the determination of guilt or innocence is guaranteed within the Statute and the Rules, reflecting what is now expressly stated in the Rome Statute. Similarly, this absolute prohibition must extend to an inference being drawn in the determination of sentence. Accordingly, it is the case that the Trial Chamber would have committed an error should it be shown that it relied on Mucić's failure to give oral testimony as an aggravating factor in determining his sentence.[1327]

784. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber's remark was no more than an indication by the Trial Chamber that, as Mucić did not plead guilty or co-operate with the Prosecution, there was no mitigating factor of the kind referred to in Rule 101(B)(ii) of the Rules.[1328]

785. It is difficult to accept such an explanation of the Trial Chamber's remark. It was made by the Trial Chamber when describing Mucić's conduct during the trial in its discussion of aggravating and mitigating factors. The Trial Chamber found that his general attitude during the proceedings reflected "his casual and perfunctory attitude to his duties in the Čelebići prison-camp", and it described his whole demeanour as suggesting that he regarded the trial as "a farce and an expensive joke".[1329] The Trial Chamber's reference to his failure to give evidence in that context indicates that it regarded the failure in an adverse light. Although it is not clear that the Trial Chamber treated Mucić's failure to testify as an aggravating circumstance, the Trial Chamber's remark leaves open the real possibility that it did so, and the Appeals Chamber accordingly finds that the Trial Chamber erred.

[1326] Article 67(1)(g) of the ICC Statute.

[1327] See Carolina v Pearce 395 US 711, where it was found that due process is violated where the sentencing court punishes' a convicted person for his exercise of a procedural right in the criminal justice process. However a defendant must be able to show that by reference to the sentencing record, the judge in fact sentenced vindictively seeking to punish for the exercise of a procedural right.

[1328] Rule 101(B)(ii) provides that a Trial Chamber shall take into account "any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction."

[1329] Trial Judgement, para 1251.

786. With regard to Mucić's conduct during the trial in terms of his attitude demeanour, the Appeals Chamber can find no error in the fact that the Trial Chamber considered these as aggravating factors. As pointed out in the Trial Judgement, "[t]he nature of the relevant information required by the Statute is unambiguously provided in sub-Rule 85(A)(vi) [of the Rules]. It is 'any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence if the accused is found guilty on one or more of the charges in the indictment'".[1330]

787. Reference to the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and ICTR, [1331] and to guidelines and practice of national jurisdictions,[1332] illustrates that it is established practice that trial courts exercise a broad discretion in the factors they may consider on sentence. This indicates that all information relevant to an accused's character may be considered. As accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States, "modern concepts individualising punishment have made it all the more necessary that a sentencing judge not be denied an opportunity to obtain pertinent information by a requirement of rigid adherence to restrictive rules of evidence properly applicable to the trial".[1333] Therefore there is a relevant distinction in the role of a fact-finder at trial and a sentencing judge, who is not restrained by the same rules.

[1332] See e.g.: In the former Yugoslavia, Article 41(1) of the SFRY Penal Code 1990. In the United Kingdom, the Magistrates Association Sentencing Guidelines issued in 1993 guide the Magistrates in setting out aggravating and mitigating factors in relation to specific offences. As in the United Kingdom, sentencing in the United States is assisted by Pre-Sentence Reports prepared by probation officers, who enjoy wide discretion in the information to include and present before the court. In Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241, (1949) it was noted that "the modern probation report draws on information concerning every aspect of a defendant's life." (p 250). It upheld what is described as "real offence" sentencing or, sentencing that goes beyond the elements of the offence and considers the gravity of the accused's conduct. It found that courts do not violate due process by considering unrelated criminal conduct, even if it did not result in a criminal conviction. See also United States v Grayson, 438 U.S. 41, where it was found that in a system of discretionary sentencing, it is proper and even necessary to consider the defendant's whole person and personality, as manifested by his conduct at trial and his testimony under oath. See also 18 UCSA, para 3553(1) which provides that the court should consider "the nature and circumstances of the offence and the history and characteristics of the defendant" and para 3661: "No limitation shall be placed on the information concerning the background, character, and conduct of a person convicted of an offence which a court of the United States may receive and consider for the purpose of imposing an appropriate sentence". In Canada, s 726.1 of the Canadian Criminal Code provides: In determining the sentence, a court shall consider any relevant information placed before it, including any representations or submissions made by or on behalf of the prosecutor or the offender. Rather, it is essential that the sentencing judge is in "possession of the fullest inform[illegible] possible concerning the defendant's life and characteristics".[1334]

788. The Trial Chambers of the Tribunal and the ICTR have consistently taken evidence as to character into account in imposing sentence. The Appeals Chamber notes that factors such as conduct during trial proceedings, ascertained primarily through the Trial Judges' perception of an accused, have also been considered in both mitigation and aggravation of sentence.[1335] The Appeals Chamber finds no error on the part of the Trial Chamber in doing so in this case. This behaviour is relevant to a Trial Chamber's determination of, for example, remorse for the acts committed or, on the contrary, total lack of compassion.[1336]

789. With regard to the reference by the Trial Chamber to the allegation that Mucić may have threatened witnesses as an aggravating factor, the Appeals Chamber again concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err. The Prosecution notes that evidence of both witness intimidation and the passing of notes were submitted to the Trial Chamber on sentencing and that this evidence was not refuted by the defence for Mucić.[1337]

790. The Appeals Chamber is not the forum for raising matters such as this for the first time.[1338] Should Mucić have been concerned that these matters should not be taken into account on sentence, then the appropriate forum to raise the concern was before the Trial Chamber.[1339] The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the fact that the Trial Chamber did consider these matters. Although it is possible (without finding as such) that these matters could have been dealt with under Rule 77 of the Rules as separate and independent

[1335] For example, in the Blaškić Judgement, para 780: "...the Trial Chamber must take note of the exemplary behaviour of the accused throughout the trial, whatever the judgement as to his statements as a witness." In Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana, Sentence, Case No ICTR-95-1-T, 21 May 1999, para 17, the Trial Chamber noted: "The Prosecution cited one aggravating factor, Ruzindana's behaviour after the criminal act, and notably the fact that Ruzindana smiled or laughed as survivors testified during trial."

[1336] In the Second Erdemović Sentencing Judgement, para 16, the Trial Chamber considered remorse and compassion as mitigating factors.

[1337] Prosecution Response, para 20.26.

[1338] In his Brief, Mucić submits that "Fags to the "exchange of notes" it was never proved that the notes alleged to have been written by the Appellant were in fact written by him. An attempt by the OTP to have a handwriting sample taken from the appellant was rejected upon the basis that he could not be forced to assist in the collation of evidence against himself. See the decision...Jan 19th 1998). Thus, the exchange of notes remains an allegation only and cannot be a matter that the Trial Chamber should have taken into consideration in assessing sentence." Mucić Brief, Appeal Against Sentence, p 4.

[1339] As noted above, "[t]he appeal process of the International Tribunal is not designed for the purpose of allowing parties to remedy their own failings or oversights during trial or sentencing." Prosecutor v Erdemović, Judgement, Case No IT-96-22-A, 7 Oct 1997, para 15. See also, Furund'ija Appeal Judgement, para 174.

offences, as pointed out by the Trial Chamber, these factors were equally pertinent to assessment of Mucić's character and of his attitude towards the offences. Accordingly, it was not inappropriate for the Trial Chamber to consider this behaviour as an aggravating factor and in its overall evaluation of the accused's character.[1340]

791. Finally, Mucić submits that there were "stated inconsistencies in the judgement," which raised confusion as to the basis for sentencing. These, he submits "should be resolved in ... Fhisğ favour."[1341] As pointed out by the Prosecution, Mucić in fact referred to only one alleged inconsistency in his brief, regarding the testimony of a Prosecution witness.[1342] Mucić essentially questions how the Trial Chamber could find that Mucić had "made no effort to prevent or punish those who mistreated the prisoners, or even to investigate specific incidents of mistreatment including the death of detainees",[1343] when at the same time it noted the positive testimony given by this witness. In his view this was contradictory. During the hearing on appeal, Mucić also submitted that the Trial Chamber failed to take into account properly the testimony of several other witnesses who had testified in similar terms.[1344] Although he does not allege that this raised inconsistencies, the Appeals Chamber considers these submissions in the same context.

792. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber amply considered this so-called positive testimony in the Trial Judgement. In doing so, it referred to the submissions by Mucić regarding the "evidence of witnesses for the Prosecution who testified in glowing terms about the attitude of Mr. Mucić towards the detainees".[1345] It concluded that it "had made very sober reflection on the submissions of the parties. There is a lot to be said for the evidence in mitigation, as there is for the aggravating circumstances".[1346]

793. The Appeals Chamber again states that "[t]he task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left to the Judges sitting in a Trial Chamber".[1347]

[1340] Trial Judgement, para 1217, noting the reference to the federal courts of the United States where "obstruction of justice is regarded as an aggravating circumstance, providing for the enhancement of sentence. The Trial Chamber must weigh and evaluate the evidence presented before it and unless shown that its conclusion was wholly unreasonable, such that no reasonable trier of fact could have arrived at the same conclusion, the Appeals Chamber will not intervene. The Appeals Chamber concludes that Mucić has failed to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in its assessment of this evidence by according it insubstantial weight. The Trial Chamber properly took the relevant testimony into account when considering mitigating factors. The decision as to what weight should be attached to this evidence was within its discretion. It was not obliged to accept this testimony as refuting its overall findings as to Mucić's culpability.[1348]

794. Mucić has failed to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion in weighing the mitigating factors in his case.

2. Comparison to the case of Wilhelm Von Leeb

795. Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber erred in dismissing, on the facts, the precedent set by the case of Wilhelm Von Leeb,[1349] when it should rather have had regard to the "relevant doctrinal principles" which can be drawn from that case.[1350] The Prosecution submits that this case was not a precedent binding on the Tribunal and constituted persuasive authority only, which the Trial Chamber was entitled to distinguish, if appropriate, as not being relevant.[1351]

796. The basis of Mucić's argument is that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to have regard to "relevant doctrinal principles." However, he fails to identify what these so-called principles are. He submits that he "does not presume to suggest that senior professional judges of an International Tribunal require to have basic principles of sentencing doctrine put before them as if they did not well apprehend them as a matter of their professional expertise and long experience."[1352] In the absence of any explanation as to what he perceives these "relevant doctrinal principles" to be, and how and why they should have been applied by the Trial Chamber to his case, Mucić fails to satisfy the burden on him to demonstrate how the Trial Chamber erred.

797. The Appeals Chamber itself finds no error in the Trial Chamber's findings rega[illegible] this case. The Trial Chamber found that "[t]he only parallel with the instant case is that both Field Marshall von Leeb and Mr. Mucić exercised and enjoyed command authority and superior responsibility over subordinates in respect of whose wrongful acts they were and are criminally responsible".[1353] This being the only similarity (and a very general one in itself), it found that the facts of the two cases were by no means comparable and that "[t]he sentence of three years imprisonment [...] would not constitute an appropriate precedent on the facts of this case".[1354]

798. Although a Trial Chamber is entitled to refer for guidance in sentencing to precedents from the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and the ICTR, together with precedents from other jurisdictions, given the individual circumstances of each case and the varied factors which should be taken into account (as discussed above), such comparisons are frequently of little assistance. Mucić has provided no basis for establishing otherwise, and he has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in its interpretation of this case.[1355] Although arguing that principles which can be drawn from the case of Wilhelm von Leeb should have been applied in his own and that, if they had been, it would be established that the Trial Chamber had erred, he has failed to identify or elaborate as to how this is the case. The Appeals Chamber finds no reason to conclude that the Trial Chamber's conclusions were incorrect.

3. Weight to be given to the element of deterrence

799. Mucić submits that the Trial Chamber placed too much emphasis on the deterrent element in sentencing him. It is said that the Trial Chamber should have relied more on the rehabilitative element, which in his case would mean that he required no further incarceration than that which he has already served.[1356] He submits that "deterrence in sentencing in reality has little or no value in this case",[1357] and that the "lack of impact of deterrence cannot be more self-evident than to look at the situation in Kosovo".[1358] The Prosecution agrees with the Trial Chamber's finding that "[d]eterrence is probably the most important factor in the assessment of appropriate sentences for violations of international humanitarian law".[1359] It submits that future deterrence is both suppressive and educative, and that both aspects would be defeated if sentences were lower than those imposed in national jurisdictions for similar conduct.[1360] Similarly, this would defeat the aim of contributing to the peace and security in the former Yugoslavia.[1361]

800. The element of deterrence plays an important role in the functioning of the Tribunal. The Appeals Chamber has already determined that:

> [i]n adopting resolution 827, the Security Council established the International Tribunal with the stated purpose of bringing to justice persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia, thereby deterring future violations and contributing to the re-establishment of peace and security in the region.[1362]

801. Therefore one of the purposes of the Tribunal, in "bringing to justice" individuals responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, is to deter future violations. With regard to the impact of deterrence on punishment, the Appeals Chamber has already accepted "the general importance of deterrence as a consideration in sentencing for international crimes".[1363] However, in accepting this importance, it did so with a proviso, concurring with its previous finding in the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement, wherein it was found that:

> Fiğn determining the sentence to be imposed on the Appellant, the Trial Chamber took into account, as one of the relevant factors, the principle of deterrence. The Appeals Chamber accepts that this is a consideration that may legitimately be considered in sentencing, a proposition not disputed by the Appellant. Equally, the Appeals Chamber accepts that this factor must not be accorded undue prominence in the overall assessment of the sentences to be imposed on persons convicted by the International Tribunal.[1364]

802. In the case of Tadić, the Appeals Chamber was considering a ground of appeal in which the appellant Tadić argued that the Trial Chamber had erred in relying on the general statement made by the Trial Chamber in Čelebići, that "Fdğeterrence is probably the most important factor in the assessment of appropriate sentences for violations of international humanitarian law".[1365] The Appeals Chamber in that case concluded: "In the circumstances of the present case, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the Trial Chamber gave undue weight to deterrence as a factor in the determination of the appropriate sentence to be imposed on the Appellant."[1366]

803. Equally, in this case, although the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that this overall determination made by the Trial Chamber (that deterrence is the most important factor to consider in sentencing cases of this nature) was in fact in error because the importance of deterrence is subject to the above proviso, it is nevertheless not satisfied that the Trial Chamber erred by giving undue prominence to deterrence in this case. Although the Trial Chamber did not refer specifically to deterrence when considering the factors it took into account in sentencing Mucić, having referred to deterrence in general terms earlier, it may be assumed that it was taken into account to some extent. However, without more than a simple assertion of error put forward by Mucić, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that the Trial Chamber gave this factor undue weight in sentencing him.

804. Mucić also submits that the Trial Chamber should have placed more reliance on the rehabilitative element in sentencing. In his case he submits that this would have meant that he required no further incarceration than that which he had already served.[1367] Other than making this blunt assertion, Mucić fails to explain how this could be so.

805. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber referred to rehabilitation in a general way and found:

> The factor of rehabilitation considers the circumstances of reintegrating the guilty accused into society. This is usually the case when younger, or less educated, members of society are found guilty of offences. It therefore becomes necessary to re-integrate them into society so that they can become useful members of it and enable them to lead normal and productive lives upon their release from imprisonment. The age of the accused, his > circumstances, his ability to be rehabilitated and availability of facilities in the confinement facility can, and should, be relevant considerations in this regard.[1368]

806. The cases which come before the Tribunal differ in many respects from those which ordinarily come before national jurisdictions, primarily because of the serious nature of the crimes being prosecuted, that is "serious violations of international humanitarian law".[1369] Although both national jurisdictions and certain international and regional human rights instruments provide that rehabilitation should be one of the primary concerns for a court in sentencing,[1370] this cannot play a predominant role in the decision-making process of a Trial Chamber of the Tribunal.[1371] On the contrary, the Appeals Chamber[1372] (and Trial Chambers of both the Tribunal[1373] and the ICTR[1374]) have consistently pointed out that two of the main purposes of sentencing for these crimes are deterrence and retribution. Accordingly, although rehabilitation (in accordance with international human rights standards) should be considered as a relevant factor, it is not one which should be given undue weight. Given the findings which were made as to Mucić's culpability, the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the fact that the Trial Chamber does not specifically refer to rehabilitation in sentencing Mucić nor in its general statement cited above.

D. Delić's Appeal Against Sentence

808. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in sentencing Delić, the Trial Chamber observed that "[t]he touchstone of sentencing is the gravity of the offence for which an accused has been found guilty, which includes considering the impact of the crime upon the victim". It referred to Delić's actions as, inter alia, "brutal and merciless", or "deplorable." It noted his "cruel" and "cold" premeditation and the "depravity" of his actions.[1377] It described the severe impact his behavior had on the victims,[1378] and his contribution to the atmosphere of [1375] Trial Judgement, para 810: "...the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has failed to establish beyond reasonable doubt, that Hazim Delić lay within the chain of command in the Čelebići prison-camp, with the power to issue orders to subordinates or to prevent or punish criminal acts of subordinates. Accordingly, he cannot be found to have been a "superior" for the purposes of ascribing criminal responsibility to him under Article 7(3) of the Statute."

[1376] As noted above, these convictions will be quashed by the Appeals Chamber and a judgement of acquittal entered on both counts.

[1377] Trial Judgement, paras 1261–1268.

[1378] For example, the Trial Judgement refers to the testimony of Grozdana Ćećez describing the effect of the rape she suffered: "...he trampled on my pride and I will never be able to be the woman that I was." (Trial Judgement, para 1262).

terror that prevailed in the Čelebići camp due to both his acts and threats to detainees.[1379] It found that:

> [a]n examination of the [...] crimes and their underlying motivations, where relevant, demonstrates that they cannot be characterised as anything other than some of the most serious offences that a perpetrator can commit during wartime. The manner in which these crimes were committed are indicative of a sadistic individual who, at times, displayed a total disregard for the sanctity of human life and dignity.[1380]

809. Delić was convicted of fourteen offences and for each received a sentence of imprisonment, the maximum term being twenty years for wilful killing and murder under counts 1, 2, 3 and 4. Each sentence was ordered to be served concurrently.[1381] Delić submits that the Trial Chamber erred in violating the principle of nulla poena sine lege and failing to properly consider the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia.

1. Violation of the Principle Nulla Poena Sine Lege and failure to properly consider the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia

810. The first issue raises the question of whether or not a Trial Chamber is bound by the law of the former Yugoslavia in matters of sentencing and whether, in considering the practice of these courts, this Trial Chamber gave them due weight. Delić simply submits that, by application of the principles of legality and nulla poena sine lege,[1382] he could not be sentenced to a term greater than fifteen years. He submits that this was the maximum term which could be imposed in the former Yugoslavia, other than a term of twenty years which could be imposed in substitution for the death penalty.[1383] "To increase the

[1382] These principles are reflected in Article 15 of the ICCPR which provides:
1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time when the criminal offence was committed. If, subsequent to the commission of the offence, provision is made by law for the imposition of a lighter penalty, the offender shall benefit thereby.
2. Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by the community of nations.
See also Article 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights.
[1383] The relevant provisions in the former Yugoslavia are contained in Chapter XVI of the SFRY Penal Code entitled "Crimes Against Peace and International Law." Article 142 prescribes in relation to certain crimes that they "shall be punished by no less than five years strict imprisonment or by the death penalty." In terms of imprisonment in general, Article 38 of the SFRY Penal Code provides that a punishment of imprisonment may not be longer than fifteen years, although the court may impose a sentence of twenty years in substitution for acts eligible for the death penalty, or if provided by statute for criminal acts committed with intent for which punishment for an offence after it has been committed is a [...] basic violation of human rights."[1384]

811. Delić acknowledges that the Tribunal has stated that it is not bound by this law on punishment, but submits that nevertheless, until the sentence passed in his case, "the Trial Chambers ha[d] scrupulously avoided assessing penalties greater than that imposed under SFRY law for offences committed before the establishment of the Tribunal ...".[1385]

812. The Prosecution summarises its submissions by relying on the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement and its finding that the Tribunal is not bound by the maximum sentences which could be imposed under the law of the former Yugoslavia.[1386]

813. Article 24(1) of the Statute provides that, in determining sentence, "Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia".[1387] The question of whether or not this "recourse" should be of a binding nature has been consistently and uniformly interpreted by the Tribunal. It is now settled practice that, although a Trial Chamber should "have recourse to"[1388] and should "take into account"[1389] this general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia, this "does not oblige the Trial Chambers to conform to that practice; it only obliges the Trial Chambers to take account of that practice".[1390]

814. The Trial Chamber correctly followed this precedent and in doing so carried out a detailed analysis of the relevant provisions in the SFRY Penal Code, while also hearing testimony from an expert witness for the defence.[1391] It recognised the importance of the principle as being one of the "solid pillars on which the principle of legality stands",[1392] and found that the view that a higher penalty than that available under the SFRY would violate the principle of legality and nulla poena sine lege was "erroneous and overly restrictive".[1393] It concluded that "[t]here is no jurisprudential or juridical basis for the assertion that the International Tribunal is bound by decisions of the courts of the former Yugoslavia".[1394] The Appeals Chamber finds no error in this approach.

815. Nevertheless, Delić submits that Trial Chambers have avoided imposing greater penalties than those imposed under SFRY law for offences committed before the establishment of the Tribunal, until it imposed the sentence on him.[1395] Although the Tribunal has the authority to impose a life sentence for offences committed after its establishment, he submits that those committed before its establishment (as in his case) are subject to the maximum under the law in the former Yugoslavia.[1396]

816. The Appeals Chamber disagrees. Trial Chambers are not bound by the practice of courts in the former Yugoslavia in reaching their determination of the appropriate sentence for a convicted person. This principle applies to offences committed both before and after the Tribunal's establishment. The Appeals Chamber can therefore see no reason why it should constitute a retrospective increase in sentence to impose a sentence greater than what may have been the maximum sentence available under domestic law in the former Yugoslavia at the time the offences were committed.

817. All of this is, however, subject to the proviso that any sentence imposed must always be, as stated by the Trial Chamber, "founded on the existence of applicable law".[1397] "[T]he governing consideration for the operation of the nullem crimen sine lege principle is the existence of a punishment with respect to the offence."[1398] There can be no doubt that the maximum sentence permissible under the Rules ("imprisonment for [...] the remainder of a convicted person's life"[1399]) for crimes prosecuted before the Tribunal, and any sentence up to this, does not violate the principle of nulla poena sine lege.[1400] There can be no doubt that the accused must have been aware of the fact that the crimes for which they were indicted are the most serious violations of international humanitarian law, punishable by the most severe penalties.[1401]

818. The Appeals Chamber finds that Delić has failed to show any error on the part of the Trial Chamber in concluding that it was not bound by the practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia and, further, that there was no violation of the principle of nulla poena sine lege.

2. The sentence imposed was excessive

819. Delić asserts that the sentence imposed was excessive compared to the practice of the courts in the former Yugoslavia, which regularly gave sentences near the minimum prescribed by law. In addition, it was disproportionate in comparison to those imposed in the cases of Tadić and Erdemović.[1402]

820. As confirmed above, the Tribunal is not bound by the practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia, but it may simply turn to them for guidance. Therefore, even if it had been shown by Delić (which it has not) that sentences were regularly imposed by the courts in the former Yugoslavia which were close to the minimum, the Trial Chamber would not have been bound to follow that practice. Delić has failed to point to any error committed by the Trial Chamber.

821. With regard to assistance from previous cases decided by the Tribunal, although a Trial Chamber may draw guidance from such jurisprudence in imposing sentence, the Appeals Chamber reiterates, in agreement with the Prosecution, that "every sentence imposed by a Trial Chamber must be individualised [...] and there are many factors to which the Trial Chamber may appropriately have regard in exercising its discretion in each individual case".[1403] The guidance which may be drawn from previously decided cases, in terms of the final sentence imposed, is accordingly very limited.

[1400] The European Court of Human Rights has held that as long as the punishment is accessible and foreseeable, then the principle cannot be breached: SW v The United Kingdom and CR v The United Kingdom, Judgement of 22 November 1995, Series A, Vol 335-B, paras 34-36 and 43.

[1401] For example, it is noteworthy that the judgements rendered at Nuremberg and Tokyo and the other successor tribunals provide clear authority for custodial sentences up to and including life imprisonment (Nineteen defendants were convicted before the Nuremberg Tribunal, out of which seven received sentences of imprisonment ranging from ten years to life imprisonment). Similarly, sentences in national jurisdictions of up to life imprisonment for crimes of the nature being prosecuted before the Tribunal are clearly recognised as being available.

[1402] Delić Brief, paras 359-361.

822. Delić compares his case initially to that of Erdemović, and he submits that the accused there was a person responsible for over 700 execution-style killings but nevertheless only received a sentence of five years.[1404] Other than making this statement, he does not develop his argument. Nevertheless, for the reasons set out below with regard to Land'o, and considering the findings of the Trial Chamber in this case, the Appeals Chamber finds that the case of Erdemović is clearly distinguishable and no useful comparison can be made to Delić's case.

823. With regard to Tadić, Delić submits that he was convicted of eleven counts of crimes against humanity. "Even considering all aggravating circumstances for all of the counts of inhuman treatment and crue[l] treatment for which Tadić was convicted the most of sentences were placed at six and seven years."[1405]

824. Delić clearly errs in this comparison. The penalties imposed on Tadić, as finally confirmed by the Appeals Chamber,[1406] ranged from six years imprisonment to twenty years imprisonment (including those for wilful killing and murder). The sentences imposed on Delić ranged from seven years imprisonment to twenty years imprisonment (also for wilful killing and murder). Both accused were sentenced in relation to the gravity of their crimes and their individual circumstances. Even if one were to attempt to compare these cases as suggested by Delić, the range of sentences clearly falls within that which the Appeals Chamber has already confirmed is permissible.

825. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in sentencing Delić, the Trial Chamber referred to the brutality and premeditated fashion in which he committed the crimes for which he was convicted. It referred in particular to the tendency of Delić to threaten his victims before, during and after the crimes,[1407] and the pleasure he derived from the use of an electric shock device on the detainees.[1408] The Appeals Chamber does not accept that the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber in this case were disproportionate to the severity of the crimes committed, even when taking into account the mitigating factors.[1409] The sentence imposed was within the Trial Chamber's discretionary framework, and Delić has failed to advance any adequate reason to persuade the Appeals Chamber to the contrary.

E. Esad Land'o

826. The Appeals Chamber has already set out in detail the Trial Chamber's findings with regard to Land'o and his conviction for eighteen offences.[1410] The Appeals Chamber simply notes here the fact that the Trial Chamber found that his crimes were characterised by "substantial pain, suffering and injury" which he inflicted on each of his victims.[1411] The offences were described inter alia as having been committed with "savagery",[1412] and being "sustained and ferocious".[1413] It was further noted that he displayed "particularly sadistic tendencies [...] clearly requir[ing] premeditation".[1414]

827. In mitigation, Land'o put forward several circumstances,[1415] some of which the Trial Chamber considered could be taken into account in his favour when deciding on the appropriate sentence. These included his youth, "immature and fragile personality" and the harsh environment of the armed conflict as a whole.[1416] Nevertheless, he received several individual sentences of imprisonment, the maximum of which was fifteen years. As with his co-defendants, it was ordered that each sentence should be served concurrently.

[1407] See, e.g., in relation to the rape of Milojka Antić: "Delić threatened her and told her that, if she did not do whatever he asked, she would be sent to another prison-camp or shot .... [he] threatened her while raping her. The following day he compounded her fear and suffering by stating "...[w]hy are you crying? This will not be your last time."' (Trial Judgement, para 1263).

[1414] Trial Judgement, para 1274 (with regard to Land'o's "apparent preference for inflicting serious burns upon detainees in the prison-camp.").

[1415] These factors included: his youth; mental state; expressions of remorse; voluntary surrender; the fact that he was only an ordinary soldier and therefore should not be subject to the Tribunal's jurisdiction; his attempts to co-operate with the Prosecution. (Trial Judgement para 1277).

[1416] Trial Judgement, para 1283.

828. Land'o has appealed his sentence as being manifestly excessive when compared to the other sentences imposed by the Tribunal, while also alleging that the Trial Chamber failed to properly take account of the mitigating factors put forward at trial.

1. Comparison with other sentences imposed by the Tribunal

829. Land'o submits that comparison to previous sentences imposed by the Tribunal (in particular the cases of Tadić and Erdemović)[1417] illustrate that his sentence was unjust and manifestly excessive.[1418] He portrays himself as "a young boy sucked up in the invasion of his home",[1419] and a "mere boy with no military experience".[1420]

830. He submits that, although he had certain mitigating factors in his favour, Dra'en Erdemović was an officer with rank, responsible for over 700 execution-style killings.[1421] Similarly, Duško Tadić, whose case had many aggravating factors, was convicted of eleven counts of crimes against humanity.[1422] For those charges of cruel and inhumane treatment, the maximum sentence Tadić received was ten years (though most were between six and seven years). Land'o submits that he cannot be compared to Tadić. "The class of accusations and the class of aggravating circumstances are in no way comparable."[1423]

831. In the case of Serushago before the Appeals Chamber for the ICTR, the appellant attempted to rely on the case of Erdemović, and urged the Appeals Chamber to consider the disparity in the sentences imposed.[1424] The Appeals Chamber held that the cases were distinguishable, as "[t]he facts of the two cases are materially different [...]. There was no

[1417] In his written filings, Land'o also compared his case to that of Zlatko Aleksovski, whose sentence was at the time under appeal by the Prosecution (Land'o Brief, p 143). Since then, Aleksovski's sentence has been increased by the Appeals Chamber (Aleksovski Appeal Judgement). When comparing his case to others during the Hearing on Appeal, Land'o made no further reference to this case and in these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber assumes that the submissions in relation thereto are not pursued.

He was sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment on 5 February 1999 (Prosecutor v Serushago, Case No ICTR-98-39-S, 5 Feb 1999). Dra'en Erdemović pleaded guilty to one count of a violation of the laws or customs of war and was sentenced to five years imprisonment (Second Erdemović Sentencing Judgement).

evidence that Erdemović had a similar profile".[1425] Similarly, there is no evidence before the Appeals Chamber that Land'o had a similar profile such that any useful comparison may be made.

832. Land'o overlooks the findings of both the Appeals Chamber and the Trial Chamber in its final sentencing judgement in the case of Erdemović, both of which expressly highlight the clear distinguishing factor in that case. That is, the fact that the Appeals Chamber, and then the Trial Chamber, accepted the fact that Erdemović had been subjected to duress and committed the offences in question under real threat of death.[1426] The Trial Chamber found that "[t]he evidence reveals the extremity of the situation faced by the accused. The Trial Chamber finds that there was a real risk that the accused would have been killed had he disobeyed the order. He voiced his feelings, but realised that he had no choice in the matter: he had to kill or be killed".[1427]

833. This case is by no means comparable. The Trial Chamber found that Land'o's actions were premeditated, savage and brutal, and that he derived enjoyment from the infliction of pain on detainees. The case is further distinguishable by the fact that one can note the particular findings by the Trial Chamber in that case, when it referred to firstly the fact that Erdemović displayed "reluctance to participate and [secondly] his reaction to having to perform this gruesome task [...]. It is clear that he took no perverse pleasure from what he did".[1428] On the contrary, the Trial Chamber found with regard to Land'o that, even if it were accepted that he was "on occasion, ordered to kill or mistreat prisoners [...] the evidence does not indicate that he performed these tasks with reluctance [...] the nature of his acts strongly indicates that he took some perverse pleasure in the infliction of great pain and humiliation".[1429] His case is marked by many aggravating factors, limiting the weight which the Trial Chamber found could be attached to the mitigating factors presented.[1430]

[1427] Second Erdemović Sentencing Judgement, para 16.

Although Article 7(4) of the Statute provides that the fact an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a superior may be considered in mitigation of punishment, this is only "if the International Tribunal determines that justice so requires". The Trial Chamber therefore retains discretion to reject this as mitigation.
[1430] It can also be reiterated, that as was pointed out in the Trial Judgement, although Land'o may not have been highly placed in terms of rank, in terms of the new Prosecution policy at the time, it involved focusing on those

834. Similarly, with regard to any comparison to the case of Tadić, the Appeals Chamber can find no basis to conclude that the Trial Chamber erred. As noted above, the total sentence imposed on Tadić was finally confirmed by the Appeals Chamber at twenty years.[1431] Although this sentence was again decided on the basis of the particular facts and circumstances before that Trial Chamber, it may nevertheless be noted that both Trial Chamber sentencing judgements are marked by findings that the acts committed were brutal, wanton, sadistic and cruel.[1432] As already noted, Landžo's case is marked by similar findings and, although the Appeals Chamber does not directly compare these cases, it serves to point this out in light of Landžo's submissions. The Appeals Chamber accordingly finds that the sentence imposed was clearly within the Trial Chamber's discretionary framework.

2. Insufficient weight given to mitigating factors

835. Land'o effectively reiterates the submissions he made at trial with regard to mitigation, and submits that the Trial Chamber attached insufficient weight to the factors presented. He refers in particular to: his family background; good character; voluntary surrender; admission of guilt; the fact that he acted under superior orders; his mental condition; and attempts to co-operate with the Prosecution. Finally, he requests that the Appeals Chamber reconsider all of the evidence submitted in sentencing, in particular that provided by several defence witnesses before the Trial Chamber.[1433]

836. The Prosecution submits that "[t]here is no indication that the Trial Chamber did not consider all of the evidence and arguments placed before it by Land'o at the sentencing hearing."[1434] In any event, it submits that the purpose of appellate proceedings is not to reconsider all of the evidence, and that Land'o has failed to establish any legal principle that the Trial Chamber misapplied in sentencing.[1435]

837. The Appeals Chamber agrees. The purpose of appellate proceedings is not for the Appeals Chamber to reconsider the evidence and factors submitted before the Trial Chamber. In this case, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did consider the mitigating factors presented by Land'o in determining the appropriate sentence. Further, the Trial Judgement shows amply that the Trial Chamber, having considered these factors and as it was entitled to do, both accepted some and rejected others. It falls on an appellant to convince the Appeals Chamber that the Trial Chamber erred in the exercise of its discretion, and that it failed to take account of or failed to give adequate weight to these factors.[1436] Landžo has failed to discharge this burden.

838. It is clear to the Appeals Chamber that the heinous nature of the crimes committed by Landžo was of overriding concern in the Trial Chamber's decision-making process on sentence. This has already been noted in greater detail above, and the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err.[1437]

839. Land'o specifically raised the issue of diminished responsibility and its impact on his sentence during the hearing on appeal. The Appeals Chamber rejected the argument that a finding of diminished responsibility constitutes a full defence.[1438] However, it has accepted that it may be a matter appropriately considered in mitigation of sentence.[1439] Land'o submits that the Trial Chamber did not "recognise that [his] responsibility was diminished with respect to the sentence. Merely stating that they took into account his mental traits does not recognise diminished mental responsibility even in application to mitigation of punishment".[1440] On the contrary, he submits that the Trial Chamber should have clearly stated that the sentence was reduced by a certain number of years, due to a finding of a state of diminished responsibility.[1441]

[1436] Serushago Sentencing Appeal Judgement, para 22.

[1437] Similarly, in other cases, Trial Chambers have expressly acknowledged matters submitted by a convicted person in mitigation but found that due to the serious nature of the crimes committed and the fact that often many accused share particular personal factors, their weight is either limited or non-existent in determining sentence. Blaškić Judgement, para 782. [1440] Appeal Transcript, pp 754-755.

[1441] Appeal Transcript, pp 755-756.

840. The Trial Chamber found:

> [...] there are certain features of Mr. Land'o's case that must be taken into account in his favour when deciding upon the measure of sentence to be imposed upon him [...] [including the following] While the special defence of diminished responsibility [...] has been rejected by the Trial Chamber above, the Trial Chamber may nonetheless take note of the evidence presented by the numerous mental health experts, which collectively reveals a picture of Mr. Land'o's personality traits that contributes to our consideration of appropriate sentence.[1442]

841. As has been seen above, although the Trial Chamber accepted evidence that Land'o suffered from a personality disorder, it considered that, despite this, he was able to control his actions, therefore rejecting any "defence" of diminished responsibility. However, it is clear from the above that the Trial Chamber nevertheless did take into account Land'o's "personality traits". In doing so, and in considering specifically those mitigating factors to which the Trial Chamber wished to attach weight, it expressly found that the evidence of "numerous" mental health experts had been taken into account and contributed to the consideration of an appropriate sentence. The Appeals Chamber can see no error nor ambiguity in such a finding. It is not incumbent on a Trial Chamber, as suggested by Land'o, to specifically indicate the reduction in years which it makes in relation to each mitigating factor put forward. On the contrary, it is for the Trial Chamber to make an overall assessment of the circumstances of the case and impose an appropriate sentence, taking into account all of the relevant factors. The Appeals Chamber accordingly finds that there has been no error demonstrated.

842. Weighed against the many aggravating factors noted above and in full in the Trial Judgement, the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the sentence imposed on Landžo by the Trial Chamber.

F. Significance of Respective Roles in the Broader Context of the Conflict – Ground of Appeal Submitted by Land'o, Delić and Mucić

843. Mucić, Delić and Land'o have each submitted that, in light of the decision in the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement, the sentences imposed on each of them respectively were excessive. In the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber found:

[1442] Trial Judgement, para 1283.

> In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber's decision, when considered against the background of the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, fails to adequately consider the need for sentences to reflect the relative significance of the role of the Appellant in the broader context of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia.
>
> Although the criminal conduct underlying the charges of which the Appellant now stands convicted was incontestably heinous, his level in the command structure, when compared to that of his superiors, i.e. commanders, or the very architects of the strategy of ethnic cleansing, was low.
> In the circumstances of the case, the Appeals Chamber considers that a sentence of more than 20 years' imprisonment for any count of the Indictment on which the Appellant stands convicted is excessive and cannot stand.[1443]

844. Each appellant argues that, like Duško Tadić, their place in the hierarchy and overall command structure was low and that the sentence imposed on each of them failed to reflect this. Mucić submits that the decision articulated an additional sentencing factor to be considered, in that a Trial Chamber must now determine an individual's significance in the broader context of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia.[1444] Although the Trial Chamber found that Mucić was a commander of the Čelebići camp, it did not categorise his role in the broader context of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. Mucić submits that this role was insignificant[1445] and that this works as a mitigating factor in determining sentence.[1446]

845. Similarly, Delić submits that his sentence should be reduced substantially as a result of this decision. He portrays the Čelebići camp as a relatively small prison, holding relatively few prisoners.[1447] He submits that the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement held that those who organised large-scale atrocities should be punished more harshly than those who, while guilty of some offences, are minor players in a much larger game controlled by others.[1448] The Trial Chamber failed to consider his position in the overall situation and his total lack of policy-making authority and lack of command authority. If they had, he submits that his twenty-year sentence would be reduced substantially.[1449] Finally, Land'o submits that the Trial Chamber failed to consider the significance of his role in the broader context, and that "[t]here is no one who was a more minor player in the conflict in Yugoslavia than Esad Land'o was".[1450]

846. The Prosecution disputes these interpretations, and submits that determination of sentence should reflect the inherent gravity of an accused's conduct. This should not be made by comparison with other persons known or unknown to the Trial Chamber or by reference to the fact that there may have been others who committed many more or graver crimes during the conflict.[1451]

847. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the appellants' interpretation of the Tadić Sentencing Appeal Judgement is incorrect. That judgement did not purport to require that, in every case before it, an accused's level in the overall hierarchy in the conflict in the former Yugoslavia should be compared with those at the highest level, such that if the accused's place was by comparison low, a low sentence should automatically be imposed. Establishing a gradation does not entail a low sentence for all those in a low level of the overall command structure. On the contrary, a sentence must always reflect the inherent level of gravity of a crime which "requires consideration of the particular circumstances of the cases, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime."[1452] In certain circumstances, the gravity of the crime may be so great that even following consideration of any mitigating factors, and despite the fact that the accused was not senior in the so-called overall command structure, a very severe penalty is nevertheless justified.

848. This interpretation was recently applied by the Appeals Chamber in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement:

> While, therefore, this Appellant may have had a secondary role, compared with the alleged roles of others against whom charges have been brought, he was nonetheless the commander of the prison and as such the authority who could have prevented the crimes in the prison and certainly should not have involved himself in them. An appropriate sentence should reflect these factors. There are no other mitigating circumstances in this case.[1453]

[1452] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 182, citing Kupreškić Judgement, para 852.
[1453] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 184.

849. Therefore, while the Appeals Chamber has determined that it is important to establish a gradation in sentencing, this does not detract from the finding that it is as essential that a sentence take into account all the circumstances of an individual case.

850. In this case, noting the circumstances of each appellant (with the exception already referred to of Mucić), the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion. Although it is not contended that the appellants held a senior role in terms of the command structure in the conflict as a whole, nonetheless the inherent gravity of their respective conduct (which have been considered in greater depth above) was noted repeatedly by the Trial Chamber.[1454] The Appeals Chamber accordingly finds that the sentences imposed on Delić and Landžo were not outside the discretionary framework available to the Trial Chamber.

G. Conclusion

851. For the reasons identified above, the Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber did not have sufficient regard to the gravity of the offences committed by Mucić in exercising its sentencing discretion, and as a result it imposed a sentence which did not adequately reflect the totality of Mucić's criminal conduct. The fourth Prosecution ground of appeal is therefore allowed to that extent. The Prosecution submits that:

> [...] where the Appeals Chamber upholds an appeal against sentence on the grounds that the sentence imposed was manifestly excessive or manifestly inadequate, it is unnecessary for the case to be remitted to a Trial Chamber for further sentencing proceedings.[1455]

The Prosecution says that it is appropriate for the Appeals Chamber to substitute its own sentence for that of the Trial Chamber. It is clear from the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement that, in the case of a successful appeal against sentence on such a ground, it is open to the Appeals Chamber to consider and substitute its own sentence without remitting the matter to the Trial Chamber.[1456] As noted above, however, in the present proceedings, the matter is to be referred back to a reconstituted Trial Chamber for reconsideration of sentence in light of the fact that certain convictions are to be quashed. That Trial Chamber must consider the appropriate sentence for Mucić on the basis of the reduced counts remaining against him and by reference to the Appeals Chamber's conclusion in relation to this ground of appeal that the original sentence did not adequately take into account the gravity of the crimes.

852. It will assist the Trial Chamber to which these sentencing matters are remitted if the Appeals Chamber indicates the revised sentence that it would have considered appropriate for Mucić, had there not been the intervening factor that certain of his convictions are to be quashed. This indication is made on the basis of the sentence which would have been appropriate in relation to the crimes for which Mucić was convicted by the original Trial Chamber.

853. Taking into account the various considerations relating to the gravity of Mucić's offences and the aggravating circumstances already referred to, as well as the mitigating circumstances referred to by the Trial Chamber and the "double jeopardy" element involved in subjecting Mucić to a revised sentence,[1457] the Appeals Chamber would have imposed on Mucić a heavier sentence of a total of around ten years imprisonment.

854. The Trial Chamber to which the sentencing issues are remitted may have reference to this indication in its own determination, which must be made in relation to the reduced number of counts following the quashing of those counts on the basis of cumulative convictions considerations.[1458] The new Trial Chamber should also consider the effect (if any) upon that indication of the original Trial Chamber's error in referring to the failure of Muci} to give evidence. That Trial Chamber will have the discretion under Rule 87(C) as to whether it will impose individual sentences in relation to each count for which a conviction is entered, in which case it has a further discretion as to whether to order that [1458] Because the convictions on the Article 2 counts based on the same conduct as the quashed Article 3 counts remain, the adjustment required in relation to the quashing of convictions may not necessarily be a substantial one. It is for the Trial Chamber to which the sentencing matters are remitted to consider the totality of Mucić's criminal conduct in light of the convictions now entered against him.

those sentences be served concurrently or consecutively, or to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the accused's criminal conduct.[1459]

[1459] After the amendment of Rule 87(C) (Revision 19, effective from 19 Jan 2001) the Trial Chamber "shall impose a sentence in respect of each finding of guilt and indicate whether such sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently, unless it decides to exercise its power to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused."

XV. DISPOSITION

For the foregoing reasons:

1. In relation to Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment, the Appeals Chamber ALLOWS the ninth and tenth grounds of appeal filed by Hazim Delić,[1460] it QUASHES the verdict of the Trial Chamber accordingly, and it enters a verdict that Hazim Delić is NOT GUILTY upon those counts.

2. In relation to the grounds of appeal relating to cumulative convictions, the Appeals Chamber ALLOWS the twenty-first ground of appeal filed by Hazim Delić[1461] and the seventh ground of appeal filed by Zdravko Mucić; it DISMISSES Counts 14, 34, 39, 45 and 47 against Zdravko Mucić; it DISMISSES Counts 4, 12, 19, 22, 43 and 47 against Hazim Delić, and it DISMISSES Counts 2, 6, 8, 12, 16, 25, 31, 37, and 47 against Esad Landžo. It REMITS to a Trial Chamber to be nominated by the President of the Tribunal ("Reconstituted Trial Chamber") the issue of what adjustment, if any, should be made to the original sentences imposed on Hazim Delić, Zdravko Mucić, and Esad Landžo to take account of the dismissal of these counts.

3. In relation to the eleventh ground of appeal filed by Zdravko Mucić, the Appeals Chamber FINDS that the Trial Chamber erred in making adverse reference when imposing sentence to the fact that he had not given oral evidence in the trial, and it DIRECTS the Reconstituted Trial Chamber to consider the effect, if any, of that error on the sentence to be imposed on Mucić.

4. The Appeals Chamber ALLOWS the fourth ground of appeal filed by the Prosecution alleging that the sentence of seven years imposed on Zdravko Mucić was inadequate, and it REMITS the matter of the imposition of an appropriate revised sentence for Zdravko Mucić to the Reconstituted Trial Chamber, with the indication that, had it not been necessary to take into account a possible adjustment in sentence because of the dismissal of the counts referred to in paragraph 2 above, it would have imposed a sentence of around ten years.

5. The Appeals Chamber DISMISSES each of the remaining grounds of appeal filed by each of the appellants.

XVI. SEPARATE AND DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE DAVID HUNT AND JUDGE MOHAMED BENNOUNA

A. Introduction

1. We append a separate and dissenting opinion in relation to the issue of cumulative convictions not only because we are unable to agree with some of the reasoning and part of the outcome in the majority opinion, but also because, in relation to those conclusions in the majority opinion with which we do agree, we believe it to be desirable to give a fuller explanation for those conclusions.

2. First, we intend to explain more thoroughly why we believe that the various approaches in the previous jurisprudence on this issue within the Tribunal, and the individual approaches of national systems, do not provide of themselves a satisfactory solution for this Tribunal. Secondly, we give our reasons as to why cumulative convictions in relation to the same conduct, as well as cumulative penalties in sentencing, are impermissible.

3. There are two matters of substance in relation to which we take a different view to that taken by the majority. The first relates to the application of the test to determine whether two crimes are legally distinct. The second relates to the way in which, when a choice must be made as to which of two or more possible cumulative convictions should be retained, that choice must be made.

B. Background

4. The ground of appeal of Mucić and Delić alleges that they were impermissibly convicted and sentenced under both Article 2 and Article 3 of the Statute in respect of the same acts.[1] The ground was described in the following terms:

[1] Appellants-Cross Appellee's Hazim Delić's and Zdravko "Pavo" Mucić's Motion for Leave to File Supplemental Brief and Supplemental Brief, 17 Feb 2000 ("Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief"). This was treated as an application for leave to add an additional ground of appeal, which was granted by the Appeals Chamber's Order on Motion of Appellants Hazim Delić and Zdravko Mucić for Leave to File Supplementary

> Whether the Trial Chamber erred in entering judgements of conviction and sentences for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and for violations of the Laws and Customs of War based on the same acts.[2]

5. Mucić and Delić's submissions in support of this ground of appeal are essentially based on the discussion in the Kupreškić Judgement of the principles governing cumulative convictions.[3] The appellants interpret the Kupreškić Judgement as adopting the standard enunciated in the US Supreme Court decision in Blockburger v United States, i.e. that "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offences or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact that the other does not".[4] The appellants contend that, applying that test to their convictions under Article 2 and those under Article 3 (which rely on common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions), that standard is violated:

> Setting aside the question of the applicability of Common Article 3 to international armed conflict and whether Common Article 3 imposes individual criminal liability, to obtain a conviction under Common Article 3, the elements are identical with one exception. An element of the grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions is that the complainant was a person protected by one of the Conventions [...]. Thus, judgements of conviction for both grave breaches of the Geneva Convention and violations of the laws and customs of war would violate the Blockburger standard.[5]

The relief sought is that, in the cases of duplicative convictions, one of the charges should be dismissed, without specifying which one.

6. The Prosecution responded to this ground of appeal with an extensive analysis of the jurisprudence of the Tribunal and of certain national jurisdictions relating to cumulative charging and cumulative convictions. The Prosecution's key contentions are, first, that the existing practice of this Tribunal and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda permits cumulative convictions under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute, and that the reasoning expressed in the Kupreškić Judgement is inconsistent with that practice. That Judgement's reference to the principles on concurrence of offences in national jurisdictions does not, it is said, support a departure from this practice, as the variations between the jurisdictions on this issue are so extensive that no general principles of international law can be drawn from them. The Prosecution does, however, appear to rely on concepts drawn from continental legal systems in arriving at the principles which it regards as applicable.

Brief, 31 Mar 2000. Although Landžo was also convicted under Article 2 and Article 3 of the Statute in respect of the same acts, he did not formally join in this ground of appeal. However, Landžo's convictions under both Article 2 and Article 3 were referred to in the Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief, para 14 (c).

7. The Prosecution interprets the jurisprudence of the two Tribunals as disclosing four different tests on the issue. The Prosecution submits that the applicable principles may be arrived at by reconciling two of the tests – the first drawn from the result in the Tadić Appeal Judgement and the second from the reasoning in the Akayesu Judgement.[6] The question of cumulative convictions was not discussed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Appeal Judgement, and it had not been raised as an issue on appeal. The Prosecution rather seeks to rely on the fact that, as a result of the Appeals Chamber's substitution of a guilty verdict for a not guilty verdict on certain counts, Tadić received multiple convictions under separate Articles of the Statute in respect of the same conduct. The test relied upon from the Akayesu Judgement is that cumulative convictions are acceptable where:

(i) the offences have different elements;
(ii) the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or
(iii) it is necessary to record a conviction for more than one offence to fully describe what the accused did.[7]

8. The principles ultimately proposed by the Prosecution are that, in cases of "ideal concurrence", where a single act contravenes more than one provision, the accused can be charged with and convicted of multiple crimes. Their foundation on the same conduct is relevant only to sentencing. To determine whether crimes are in fact in a relationship of ideal concurrence, the test posited in the Akayesu judgement is to be used.

9. The question of cumulative charging had in fact been raised earlier in the Čelebići trial proceedings, in preliminary motions filed by Delalić and by Delić. The Trial Chamber dismissed the motion filed by Delalić on the basis that accumulation of offences is a matter which goes only to penalty and that it is not to be considered at the charging stage.[8] The Trial Chamber followed a decision of the Trial Chamber in Tadić, where it was held:

[6] Akayesu Judgement, paras 461-470.
[7] Akayesu Judgement, para 468.

> In any event, since this is a matter that will only be at all relevant insofar as it might affect penalty, it can best be dealt with if and when matters of penalty fall for consideration. What can, however, be said with certainty is that penalty cannot be made to depend upon whether offences arising from the same conduct are alleged cumulatively or in the alternative. What is to be punished by penalty is proven criminal conduct and that will not depend upon the technicalities of pleading.[9]

10. This conclusion was followed by the Trial Chamber in its decision on the Delić motion.[10] Leave to appeal was refused in respect of the decisions on both the Delić and Delalić motions.[11] Other Trial Chambers have reached different conclusions on the issue, both that cumulative charging is permitted only in certain limited circumstances and that cumulative charging is permitted without limitation, the issue only being relevant to the imposition of penalty.[12]

C. Analysis

11. In essence, the only issue to be determined by the Appeals Chamber arising from these grounds of appeal is whether an accused can be convicted of both an Article 2 and an Article 3 violation for the same conduct. However, the determination of this issue raises matters of legal principle which will have consequences in relation to convictions arising under other provisions of the Statute. Although these consequences are difficult to predict, we have attempted to take them into account in identifying the applicable legal principles.

1. Cumulative Charging

12. As a preliminary point, we agree with the majority that the cumulative charging should generally be permitted. As a practical matter, it is not reasonable to expect the Prosecution to select between charges until all of the evidence has been presented. It is not possible to know with precision, prior to that time, which offences among those charged the evidence will prove, particularly in relation to the proof of differing jurisdictional pre-requisites – such as, for example, the requirement that an international armed conflict be proved for Article 2 offences but not for those falling under Article 3. Further, as has been observed at the Trial Chamber level, the offences in the Statute do not refer to specific categories of well-defined acts, but to broad groups of offences, the elements of which are not always clearly defined and which may remain to be clarified in the Tribunal's jurisprudence.[13] The fundamental consideration raised by this issue is that it is necessary to avoid any prejudice being caused to an accused by being penalised more than once in relation to the same conduct. In general, there is no prejudice to an accused in permitting cumulative charging and in determining the issues arising from accumulation of offences after all of the evidence has been presented.[14]

2. Cumulative Convictions

13. We are not convinced that the prior practice of this Tribunal and of the ICTR, as interpreted by the Prosecution, provides the solution to the problem of cumulative convictions. We understand the majority opinion to state the same conclusion, but we wish to provide our reasons for that conclusion.

14. The Appeals Chamber has not yet had to pronounce on the issue of accumulation of convictions, and it is disingenuous for the Prosecution to put forward the result in the Tadić Appeal – where what appear to be cumulative convictions were imposed, but where the issue was neither raised by the parties nor expressly considered by the Appeals Chamber – as authority for continuing this practice. The refusal of benches of the Appeals Chamber to

[14] See Prosecutor v Naletilić and Martinović, Decision on Defendant Vinko Martinović's Objection to the Indictment, Case No IT-98-34-PT, 15 Feb 2000, para 12. We acknowledge that there may be specific examples of obviously duplicative cumulative charging, where there is no reason in the particular circumstances that the grant leave to appeal from determinations that an accused can be charged with two different crimes arising from the same conduct,[15] raised a different question from the one now in issue.

15. The jurisprudence of the Trial Chambers is far from uniform with respect to this issue. The Prosecution's use of the Tribunal jurisprudence and of certain domestic law concepts in arriving at what are described as the "relevant principles"[16] appears to be a selective exercise directed by a policy of entering the maximum possible convictions against an accused, rather than an analysis of any legal principle which actually dictates that result. Most decisions on the issue – with the exception of the Kupreškić, Akayesu and Kayishema and Ruzindana judgements[17] – have not been accompanied by reasoned consideration. The numerous Trial Chamber decisions on challenges to the form of the indictment generally concern the permissibility of cumulative charging, not cumulative convictions.

16. The one thing which is genuinely common to the cases which have dealt with the issue of cumulative convictions is the view that they are not permissible unless each of the relevant offences has a unique legal element. Since the function of this test is to determine whether two or more charged crimes are in fact legally distinct offences, this requirement, in its focus on the legal definition of the crimes, is a logical and appropriate one.

17. We are not convinced that the use of some kind of different values or different interests test, in conjunction with or in addition to a "different elements" test, can be said to be either a general principle of international criminal law or common to the major legal systems of the world. Various decisions of this Tribunal and the ICTR refer to the consideration that different criminal provisions may protect different societal interests or values as being an additional matter which may justify cumulative convictions. However, the consideration of societal interests or protected values is both the rationale for, and

Prosecution needs to see how the evidence turns out before selecting the most relevant charge. In those circumstances, it may be oppressive to allow cumulative charging.

inherent in, different acts being labelled different crimes, and it will therefore generally be given effect by the application of the "different elements" test.

18. We have considered the Prosecution submissions that Articles 2 and 3 protect different interests – that Article 2 governs specific types of conduct in order to protect individual members of specific protected groups and that Article 3, as a residual clause, ensures "full observance of all requirements of international humanitarian law" – and that for that reason otherwise identical crimes (such as murder or torture) should lead to convictions under both Articles 2 and 3.[18] However, we do not believe that the interests identified by the Prosecution are so genuinely different that they justify cumulative convictions for otherwise identical criminal conduct. It is not apparent from customary or conventional international humanitarian law that the bodies of law underlying these provisions protect different interests, and the simple fact that they are represented in different Articles of the Statute does not assist the Prosecution's contention. The values protected by Articles 2 and 3 are, at their base, essentially the same – the protection of individuals and certain groups from violations of international humanitarian law in the context of armed conflict.[19]

19. To rely on the practice of certain courts and tribunals that have cumulatively convicted persons accused of having committed crimes during World War II is unsatisfactory in our view. The issue was not directly in issue in the cases referred to by the Prosecution, and the IMT at Nuremberg and the various military courts sitting at Nuremberg no doubt had particular reasons for convicting accused of both war crimes and crimes against humanity which are not relevant at this time.[20]

20. Further, to have resort to national jurisdictions is also highly problematic in light of the lack of a uniform approach to this issue, which is complex even in well developed national jurisdictions, requiring solutions peculiar to a specific national system. No clear,

[18] Prosecution Response to Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief, paras 4.85 and 4.88.

[19] The Prosecution describes the fact that Article 2 is directed at the protection of specific protected groups ("protected persons" under the Geneva Conventions) as being a distinguishing factor from Article 3: Prosecution Response to Delić/Mucić Supplementary Brief, para 4.85. However, this may also be said in respect of Article 3. Where offences under common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions are charged under Article 3, they are also directed at the protection of a specifically defined group of persons – "Persons taking no active part in the hostilities" – See common Article 3(1). There may be, depending on the circumstances, a substantial overlap between the two groups.

[20] Kupreškić Judgement, paras 675 and 676.

useful, common principle can be gleaned from the major legal systems of the world. It is in any case doubtful, given the unique nature of the international crimes over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction, whether any national jurisdiction has had to face a problem similar in scope to the one at hand.

21. Nor is a solution to the issue to be found in the general nature of international humanitarian law, which is not primarily concerned with criminal proceedings against individuals. An argument that, because the various branches of international humanitarian law protect different societal interests, it therefore permits cumulative convictions is untenable. General international humanitarian law did not develop by reference to application of its various branches to criminal proceedings against individuals, and it does not purport to provide a solution to this substantive criminal law problem. The Statute itself also does not expressly or implicitly resolve the problem.

22. The majority has held that "reasons of fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions" lead to the conclusion that cumulative convictions should not be permitted.[21] We agree that fairness to the accused dictates that cumulative convictions for offences which are not genuinely distinct should not be permitted in respect of the same conduct. It is appropriate to identify what these "reasons of fairness to the accused" are.

23. Prejudice to the rights of the accused – or the very real risk of such prejudice – lies in allowing cumulative convictions. The Prosecution suggests that cumulative convictions "do not cause any substantive injustice to the accused" as long as the fact that such convictions are based on the same conduct is taken into account in sentencing.[22] This does not take into account the punishment and social stigmatisation inherent in being convicted of a crime. Furthermore, the number of crimes for which a person is convicted may have some impact on the sentence ultimately to be served when national laws as to, for example, early release of various kinds are applied. The risk may therefore be that, under the law of the State enforcing the sentence, the eligibility of a convicted person for early release will depend not only on the sentence passed but also on the number and/or nature of convictions. This may prejudice the convicted person notwithstanding that, under the Statute, the Rules and the various enforcement treaties, the President has the final say in determining whether a convicted person should be released early. By the time national laws trigger early release proceedings, and a State request for early release reaches the President, the prejudice may already have been incurred. Finally, cumulative convictions may also expose the convicted person to the risk of increased sentences and/or to the application of 'habitual offender' laws in case of subsequent convictions in another jurisdiction.

(a) Application of the "different elements" test to determine whether crimes charged are genuinely legally distinct

24. As to the 'test' to be applied in order to avoid cumulative convictions, we agree with the majority that an accused may only be convicted of more than one offence in respect of the same conduct where each offence has a unique element that the other offence or offences do not. We agree with the majority's conclusion that the pairs of offences for which Mucić, Delić and Landžo were convicted under Articles 2 and 3 were impermissibly cumulative. However, we disagree with the majority in relation to the way in which the 'test' should be applied.

25. The particular nature of offences within the Tribunal's jurisdiction – which have elements with no real equivalents of most crimes in domestic jurisdictions – gives rise to an issue as to which of the elements should be taken into account for this purpose. The majority has elected to include in that consideration the legal prerequisites relating to the circumstances of the relevant offences, or the chapeaux to the Articles, as well as the elements of the crimes which go to the actus reus and mens rea of the offences.

26. As we emphasised above,[23] the fundamental consideration arising from charges relating to the same conduct is that an accused should not be penalised more than once for the same conduct. The purpose of applying this test is therefore to determine whether the conduct of the accused genuinely encompasses more than one crime. For that reason, we believe that it is not meaningful to consider for this purpose legal prerequisites or contextual elements which do not have a bearing on the accused's conduct, and that the focus of the test should therefore be on the substantive elements which relate to an accused's conduct, including his mental state. The elements relating to the international nature of the conflict and protected person status in relation to Article 2, or considerations which may arise under Article 3 such as the limitation of offences charged under common Article 3 to "persons taking no active part in hostilities" – are in practice not relevant to the conduct and state of mind of the accused. Although matters such as protected person status or the internationality of the armed conflict provide the context in which the offence takes place, it is, we believe, artificial to suggest that the precise nature of the conflict or the technical status of the victim (i.e. classification as a protected person as opposed to a person taking no active part in hostilities) has any bearing on the accused's conduct. Such technicalities are certainly not matters which would have been of any importance to the victim. We therefore consider that, although these matters must clearly be proved before an accused could be convicted under the relevant Articles, they are irrelevant to a test to be applied solely for the purpose of determining whether the criminal conduct of an accused in any given case can fairly be characterised as constituting more than one crime.

27. The fundamental function of the criminal law is to punish the accused for his criminal conduct, and only for his criminal conduct. We believe that taking into account such abstract elements creates the danger that the accused will also be convicted – with, as discussed, the penalty inherent in that conviction alone – in respect of additional crimes which have a distinct existence only as a purely legal and abstract matter, effectively through the historical accidents of the way in which international humanitarian law has developed in streams having distinct contextual requirements.[24] The fact that the Articles of the Statute encompass different, although frequently overlapping, crimes is a result mainly of the history of international humanitarian law rather than any indication that they are intended to describe genuinely distinct bodies of criminal law in contemporary international humanitarian law.

28. We again emphasise that, although we do not regard the contextual elements or chapeaux as being of assistance for this purpose, this does not undermine their undoubted

[24] For example, the two conditions set out in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 for the application of the "grave breaches" regime (i.e., the international character of the conflict and protected persons status) relate to what was called the procedural aspect of this crime, in order to allow its prosecution in national jurisdictions. In other importance for other purposes. They obviously remain matters to be proven in every case before any conviction can be entered. They are also matters which may become relevant at the second stage of selecting between cumulatively charged crimes, which we discuss below.

29. In the circumstances of this case, where only convictions under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute are raised for consideration, the majority has determined that the relevant pairs of crimes do not each contain a unique element, because the requirement under common Article 3 in the Article 3 charges is not materially distinct from the unique "protected person" requirement of Article 2 crimes, as the latter requirement "includes, yet goes beyond what is meant by an individual taking no active part in the hostilities".[25] However, in relation to crimes charged under other combinations of Articles of the Statute, such as Articles 2 and 5 or Articles 3 and 5, taking into account the different contextual elements or legal prerequisites will have the result that crimes such as torture, rape, and murder/wilful killing will necessarily and in every case be considered to be distinct crimes when charged under the different Articles, and therefore two convictions will have to be entered for what is in reality the same offence.

30. An abstract but potentially common example may serve to explain our concerns more adequately. The rape of a "protected person" in a prison camp, in the context of both an international armed conflict and a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population, could be charged by the Prosecution as rape as a grave breach under Article 2 of the Statute; rape as prohibited by common Article 3 under Article 3 of the Statute, and rape as a crime against humanity under Article 5 of the Statute. The application of the test as posed by the majority, in addition to a comparison of the elements relating to the actus reus and mens rea of the offence of rape, must take into account the following elements:

Article 2:
(i) the requirement that the victim be a protected person;
(ii) there must be an international armed conflict;[26]
(iii) the act must have a close nexus with the armed conflict.[27]

words, they were designed as a safeguard against any attempt by national jurisdictions to interfere in an internal conflict, or what would be considered as an issue falling within a State's sovereignty.

[25] See above, para 423.

[26] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, paras 78 and 84.

Article 3 (common article 3):
(i) the victim must be a person taking no active part in hostilities;
(ii) there must be an armed conflict;[28]
(iii) the act must have a close nexus with the internal or international armed conflict.[29]

Article 5:
(i) there must be an armed conflict;[30]
(ii) there must be a widespread or systematic attack on the civilian population;[31]
(iii) the act must form part of the widespread or systematic attack.[32]

31. Taking the majority's analysis of the relationship between crimes charged only under Article 2 and Article 3 (common Article 3), there would be no reciprocal unique elements, and convictions could not be entered under both. A conviction would be entered under Article 2. However, in a case where rape is charged under Article 2 and Article 5, Article 2 has the unique requirements that there be an international armed conflict and that there be a nexus between the offence and that conflict, and Article 5 has the unique requirements that there be a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and that the offence forms part of that widespread or systematic attack. Applying the majority's test, convictions would therefore necessarily and in every case be entered on both counts. In a case where rape is charged under Articles 3 and 5, Article 3 has the unique requirement that the offence must have a nexus with the armed conflict, and Article 5 has the unique elements that there be a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and that the offence forms part of that widespread or systematic attack. Again, convictions would necessarily and in every case be entered on both counts. Where rape is charged under all three articles, the situation becomes more complex. Although it is not entirely clear, we assume that the offence under Article 3, despite having a unique element in relation to Article 5, would be rejected as a distinct offence as it has no unique element in relation to

---

[27] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 70 states that the "required relationship" of the crimes (under Articles 2 and 3) to the conflict is that they were "closely related to the hostilities".
[28] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 94.
[29] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 70.
[30] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para 142 (note that there is no nexus with the crimes and the conflict; the proof of the armed conflict is required only as a "basis of jurisdiction": paras 141 and 142; Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 251).
[31] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 248.

Article 2. Even if on that basis no conviction were entered under Article 3, convictions under both Article 2 and Article 5 would necessarily and in every case remain.

32. As a result, a single act of rape could give rise to convictions for two separate crimes under Articles 2 and 5 or Articles 3 and 5. This result is dictated solely on the basis of abstract legal concepts relating to the context of the offence which would have been of little or no practical significance to the accused or the victim.

33. Under the "different elements" test as we believe it should be applied, only those elements relating to the conduct and mental state of the accused would be taken into account. In relation to rape under Articles 2 and 3, these elements would be only the actus reus and the mens rea of the offence of rape, which are the same in both cases, with the result that the offences cannot be considered to be genuinely legally distinct. In relation to rape under Article 5 of the Statute, the relevant elements would be the actus reus and mens rea of rape, the latter including the additional requirement that the perpetrator have knowledge that the rape occurs in the context of an attack against a civilian population.[33] Rape under Article 5 would therefore have a unique element not found in the definition of rape under Articles 2 and 3. However, this is not reciprocated, as there is no unique element of rape under Article 2 or 3, and a conviction could therefore be entered under only one of the counts. We believe that this is the more appropriate outcome. It is, we believe, highly artificial to characterise one act of rape committed by a single accused against one victim as constituting two distinct crimes. The most rational and fair outcome is to impose one conviction which receives a sentence which recognises the grave seriousness of that crime.

34. Our final difficulty with the majority view that the legal pre-requisite or contextual elements must be taken into account for the application of the "different elements" test is that it is likely to cause practical problems in determining which legal pre-requisites or contextual elements will be taken into account, particularly in relation to Article 3. In the Tadić Jurisdiction Decision it was held that Article 3 of the Statute is:

[32] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para 248 ("the acts of the accused must comprise part of a pattern of widespread or systematic crimes directed against a civilian population").

[33] Kupreškić Judgement, para 556; Prosecutor v Tadić, Case No IT-94-1-T, Judgement, 7 May 1997, para 659.

> [...] a general clause covering all violations of humanitarian law not falling under Article 2 or covered by Articles 4 or 5, more specifically: (i) violations of the Hague law on international conflicts; (ii) infringements of provisions of the Geneva Conventions other than those classified as 'grave breaches' by those Conventions; (iii) violations of common Article 3 and other customary rules on internal conflicts; (iv) violations of agreements binding upon the parties to the conflict, considered qua treaty law, i.e. agreements which have not turned into customary international law [...].[34]

Because Article 3 has been interpreted to be a residual clause, encompassing all of the various types of violations of the laws or customs of war not encompassed by other provisions of the Statute, it is not clear in advance what legal prerequisites or contextual elements may arise in relation to the various crimes that Article encompasses.

35. To take, as one example, the category of "violations of agreements binding on the parties on the conflict, considered qua treaty law":[35] would the existence of the agreement itself, as a legal prerequisite to jurisdiction over the crimes, be considered an element of the offence? If so, this may be considered to be a unique element that Article 2 offences do not have, with the result that torture outlawed under Article 2 and torture outlawed under a treaty between the parties and prosecuted under Article 3 could be considered to be two distinct crimes justifying two separate convictions. On the other hand, the requirement of the existence of the agreement may be considered not to be an element of the offence for this purpose, but the problem does not end there. The agreement may have limitations on its application, for example a regional or geographical limitation, or the limitation that it applies only to offences committed by combatants in the official armed forces of the State. Such matters are contextual elements or legal pre-requisites in the same way as the "protected persons" or "international armed conflict" requirements. It is unclear from the majority opinion whether it is intended that these would be taken into account but, as there is no basis in principle to distinguish them, presumably they must be. As a result, Article 3 offences with the same substantive elements as Article 2 offences (such as torture) will be considered in some circumstances, but not others, to be distinct crimes and therefore may be charged and convicted separately under Article 2 and Article 3. We do not accept that such an arbitrary result, entirely removed from the reality of the circumstances in which the offence was committed, is appropriate in the context of international criminal law.

(b) Selecting between possible cumulative convictions

36. As noted by the majority, where the "different elements" test is not met – the relevant elements of the offences are materially identical or one offence does not have a unique element – the relevant Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. The majority held that this choice must be made:

> [...] on the basis of the principle that that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional element, then a conviction should be entered under only that provision.[36]

The majority indicates that, in the case of charges under both Article 2 and 3 of the Statute, the offences charged under Article 2 must be selected as being the more specific on the basis of the protected person requirement, without reference to any other of the elements of the relevant offences which relate to the conduct and state of mind of the accused.

37. We agree with the majority's conclusion that, when a choice must be made between cumulatively charged offences, that choice should be made by reference to specificity, but only in the sense that the crime which more specifically describes what the accused actually did in the circumstances of the particular case should be selected. This cannot be done by a rigidly imposed choice of the charges laid under one of the Articles of the Statute with no reference to the substantive elements of the offences or to the evidence as to the actual circumstances under which they were committed. In our view, the choice should involve a consideration of the totality of the circumstances of the particular case and of the evidence given in relation to the crimes charged, in order to describe most accurately the offence that the accused committed and to arrive at the closest fit between the conduct and the provision violated. This would involve a consideration of all of the elements of the offences to determine whether one of the offences better or more specifically describes what the accused did.

38. It will often be a substantive element relating to the accused's conduct or state of mind which provides the basis on which a meaningful choice can be made as to the better description of the accused's conduct. For example, the deliberate infliction of pain or suffering, with the intention to do this for the purpose of obtaining information, or punishing, intimidating or discriminating against the victim, constitutes the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury and the offence of torture. It is the unique additional element relating to the purpose of the perpetrator which makes torture the more specific offence but, under the majority's approach, that element would not be taken into account. Where consideration of the substantive elements of the offences does not provide a basis to determine that one offence more clearly describes what the accused did (such as in the case of torture charged under Articles 2 and 3), it would then be possible to have recourse to the legal pre-requisites, or the chapeaux, to ascertain whether they provide a distinguishing factor which makes the offence under one Article a more specific or appropriate description of what the accused did.

39. An assessment of the appropriateness of criminal charges, or (taking the majority's standard of specificity) of the most specific offence to encompass a piece of conduct, must always depend at least to some degree on the actual circumstances of the case as established by the evidence. A rigidly imposed preference for the crime charged under a particular Article of the Statute will obviously be less time consuming and more convenient. However, the rigidly imposed choice of Article 2 charges, made in isolation from the relevant conduct to be criminalised in the particular case, will not necessarily always produce the result which must be the ultimate function of criminal proceedings: to recognise and penalise with the most appropriate conviction the proven criminal conduct of an accused.

40. It would appear to follow, from the majority's conclusion that Article 2 convictions must always be upheld as against Article 3 convictions, that in future cases dealing with other combinations of charges – for example Article 2 and Article 5, or Article 3 and Article 5 – the charges under a particular one of those Articles must always be selected. This suggests the development of some sort of gradation of specificity among the Articles of the Statute.

41. We do not regard it as possible to derive from the Statute a hierarchy or gradation of specificity or seriousness amongst the various offences which would assist in any kind of rigidly imposed determination of the question of which possible cumulative convictions should be retained. Nor is it desirable to do so. As observed by the majority of the Appeals Chamber in the Judgement in Sentencing Appeals in Prosecutor v Tadić:

> After full consideration, the Appeals Chamber takes the view that there is in law no distinction between the seriousness of a crime against humanity and that of a war crime. The Appeals Chamber finds no basis for such a distinction in the Statute or Rule of the International Tribunal construed in accordance with customary international law; the authorized penalties are also the same, the level in any particular case being fixed by reference to the circumstances of the case.[37]

Although this observation relates to the determination of seriousness of crimes, the Appeals Chamber's emphasis on taking into account "the circumstances of the case" rather than any perceived distinctions in the Statute is an important caution.

42. A more specific problem with the method of choice provided by the majority and the way it is applied in this case – that specificity can be measured by the presence of an "additional element" in one of the offences[38] – is that it does not cover the full range of circumstances in which this choice must be made. Often, neither of the crimes determined by the application of the different elements test not to be legally distinct will have an "additional" element. All of the elements of each crime may simply be assessed not to be materially different. Indeed, on a proper analysis, neither of the offences in the pairs of offences which arise in this case have an "additional element". The same offences under Article 2 and Article 3 (common article 3) – torture for example – have, on the approach taken by the majority, the same number of elements, with neither having an additional one. The Article 2 offence, in addition to the substantive elements of torture, has the contextual elements that:

(i) there is an international armed conflict
(ii) there is a nexus between the crime and the conflict
(iii) the victim be a protected person.

43. The same offence charged under Article 3 (common article 3), in addition to the substantive elements, has the contextual requirements that:

(i) there is an armed conflict, internal or international

[38] See above, para 413.

(ii) there is a nexus between the crime and the conflict
(iii) the victim is a person taking no active part in hostilities.

44. The conclusion that these offences are not legally distinct is based on the assessment that the elements are not materially distinct – ie that the Article 3 elements in (i) and (ii) are simply broader versions of those elements in the Article 2 offence. We therefore cannot agree with the majority's analysis that the Article 2 offences have an "additional element" (the protected person status of the victim) and should be automatically selected on that basis, as the Article 3 offence has a corresponding element relating to the status of the victim (taking no active part in hostilities).[39] The protected person status may in the circumstances be a more appropriate or specific definition of the victim, but it is not an "additional" element in comparison with the Article 3 offence.

45. The problems which we have attempted to identify in the majority's determination that it is possible to make a rigidly imposed determination in every case of the most specific crime demonstrate, we believe, that the perceived virtue of such an approach – certainty or predictability – is in fact illusory. In practice, it is likely to be an inflexible approach with the potential to produce outcomes which are, in the circumstances of any given case, arbitrary and artificial.

D. Application of these principles to the present case

46. The way in which we would apply the principles we have referred to above to the facts of the present case is obviously now a hypothetical matter. However, we consider that it may assist in an understanding of what we consider to be the applicable principles, and of our differences from the majority, to set out how we would have applied the principles to the present case.

47. Mucić and Delić were convicted of the following crimes: (a) wilful killing under Article 2 and murder under Article 3;[40] (b) wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2 and cruel treatment under Article 3;[41] (c) torture under Article 2 and torture under Article 3;[42] and (d) inhuman treatment under Article 2 and cruel treatment under Article 3.[43] Landžo was cumulatively convicted of the offences in the categories (a),[44] (b)[45] and (c).[46] We agree that, although Landžo did not formally join in this ground of appeal, it is appropriate to apply these legal principles to his convictions also.

1. Whether the crimes charged are legally distinct crimes

(a) Wilful killings and murder

48. The substantive elements of the offence of wilful killing have been defined as requiring an act or omission of the accused which causes the death of the victim, and that the accused intended to kill or to inflict serious bodily injury in the knowledge that such injury would be likely to lead to death while being reckless as to whether it would cause death.[47] Murder has been defined, in the context of a crime against humanity (which for present purposes makes no material difference), as consisting of the death of the victim because of an act or omission of the accused committed with the intention to cause death or to cause grievous bodily harm in the knowledge that such bodily harm would be likely to cause death.[48] The Trial Chamber in the Bla{kić proceedings and the Čelebići Trial Chamber have expressed the view that the two crimes are not materially different (the Bla{kić Judgement defining them as having identical elements).[49] We are of the same view; accordingly, the different elements requirement is not satisfied with respect to this category of convictions.

(b) Wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health and cruel treatment

49. The offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2 has been defined as an intentional act or omission which causes great

It is therefore unclear whether the Jelisić Judgement's omission from the definition of the mens rea of intention to cause serious injury knowing that it is likely to lead to death and reckless as to whether death ensues was intentional, but we regard the Akayesu standard as the applicable one.
[49] Trial Judgement, para 422; Bla{kić Judgement, para 181.

suffering or serious injury to body or health, including mental health.[50] Cruel treatment is an intentional act or omission which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity.[51] Even if the element of a serious attack on human dignity is additional to the elements of the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, this is not reciprocated as the latter offence has no unique element.

(c) Torture

50. It is clear that this is an identical crime whether charged under Article 2 or 3.

(d) Inhuman treatment and cruel treatment

51. Inhuman treatment has been defined as an intentional act or omission which causes serious mental harm or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity.[52] As noted above, cruel treatment has also been defined in substantially the same terms as an intentional act or omission which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity. The two crimes have essentially the same elements, with the possible qualification that the actus reus of inhuman treatment may be defined more broadly than cruel treatment, so that cruel treatment would be encompassed within inhuman treatment. The requirement that each offence have a unique element is therefore not satisfied.

2. The determination of which of the duplicative convictions should be retained

52. We therefore agree with the majority that, in the cases of the convictions under Articles 2 and 3, the elements of the relevant offences are materially identical or one offence does not have a unique element. Convictions cannot be entered for both, and it is necessary to decide which convictions should be retained. In doing so, as stated above, we consider that, through an examination of the circumstances of the case and of the evidence given in relation to the crimes charged, the aim is to determine which of the crimes describes most accurately what the accused did.

(a) Wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health / cruel treatment

53. The only combination of charges in which we consider that there is a material difference in one of the elements (albeit not reciprocated) is the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2 and that of cruel treatment under Article 3. The additional element is that cruel treatment may be not only an act or omission which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury but it may also be characterised as constituting a serious attack on human dignity. The slightly different focus of the other offence is on the great suffering or serious physical injury caused by the relevant acts. In relation to these convictions entered against Delić and Landžo under Counts 11 and 12, the original charges had been wilful killing and murder, but the Trial Chamber had found that, although Delić had been involved in the beating of the victim, it could not be certain that these beatings were a direct cause of the victim's death. The Trial Chamber found that convictions could be entered instead for the offences of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health and of cruel treatment, which were "lesser offences" of the same nature as the more grave crimes originally charged.[53] The same reasoning necessarily applied in relation to the responsibility of Mucić for these acts as a superior, which was charged under Counts 13 and 14.[54] Having reference then to the nature of the charging, which focussed on the physical consequences to the accused, and to the evidence of the physical injuries which resulted from the beatings, the crime of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury under Article 2 more accurately describes what Delić and Landžo did and for which Mucić was responsible. That is also the conclusion reached by the majority.

54. The offences charged against Delić, Mucić and Landžo in Counts 46 (wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health) and 47 (cruel treatment) related to the inhumane living conditions in the camp, including the "atmosphere of terror" and the poor living conditions. In relation to these counts, the Trial Chamber found that the detainees in the camp "were exposed to conditions in which they lived in constant anguish and fear of being subjected to physical abuse" and were "subjected to an immense psychological pressure which may be accurately characterised as 'an atmosphere of terror'".[55] The Trial Chamber also found that the detainees were deprived of adequate food, sleeping facilities, toilet facilities, water and medical facilities, the latter two because of a deliberate policy.[56] These findings, reinforced by specific findings of Delić's humiliating and cruel taunting of prisoners,[57] suggest that it was a key part of this offence that it was intended to degrade and attack the dignity of the victims. Mucić, as a commander, was found to have been aware of these circumstances. For that reason, it is appropriate to select a conviction for cruel treatment under Article 3 against each accused under these counts. The inflexible majority approach produces the contrary conclusion, that the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, being the Article 2 offence, should be upheld.

55. Mucić was also convicted of the same offences of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health and of cruel treatment in relation to Counts 38 and 39, which related to his responsibility as a superior for acts of severe mistreatment of certain detainees. The mistreatment found by the Trial Chamber included acts which "necessarily entails, at a minimum, a serious affront to human dignity",[58] which suggests an emphasis on cruel treatment. However, the Trial Chamber also found in relation to another victim that the intentional placing of a burning fuse cord against the bare skin in the genital area of an accused caused "such serious suffering and injury" that it constituted both of the offences charged.[59] Thus, under the one count, there are different acts which because of their different emphases could be differently characterised. However, taken as a whole, the conduct encompassed by these counts appears to be violent mistreatment of such an unusually cruel nature that the offence of cruel treatment under Article 3, which emphasises both conduct which causes serious injury and conduct which constitutes a serious attack on human dignity, best describes the criminal conduct for which Mucić was found responsible under these counts. The inflexible majority approach produces the contrary conclusion, that the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, being the Article 2 offence, should be upheld.

56. Landžo was also convicted of this combination of crimes under Counts 36 and 37 for beating a detainee on several occasions, setting fire to his trousers and burning his legs, and forcing him to drink urine. The Trial Chamber found that this caused serious mental and physical suffering to the victim. It is also obvious from the evidence that the particularly cruel and humiliating nature of the abuse inflicted by Landžo was intended to undermine the victim's dignity. Using the same reasoning as above, the offence of cruel treatment, which emphasises both conduct which causes serious injury and conduct which constitutes a serious attack on human dignity under Article 3, best describes Landžo's criminal conduct for which he was convicted under these counts. The inflexible majority approach produces the contrary conclusion, that the offence of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, being the Article 2 offence, should be upheld.

(b) Inhuman treatment / cruel treatment

57. The offence of inhuman treatment has been described as an umbrella provision which encompasses various conduct which contravenes the fundamental principle of humane treatment.[60] As cruel treatment under Article 3 is one of the varieties of conduct embraced by inhuman treatment, it may be regarded as more specific and therefore to some degree a more specific and accurate description of what the accused did, and may for that reason be preferred in selecting between Counts 44 and 45 against Mucić and Counts 42 and 43 against Delić. The inflexible majority approach produces the contrary conclusion, that the offence of inhuman treatment, being the Article 2 offence, should be upheld.

(c) Murder / wilful killing and torture / torture

58. In relation to the materially identical crimes of murder and wilful killing, and in the case of torture convicted under both Articles 2 and 3, reference to the substantive elements of the particular crimes does not provide a solution and it is necessary to look to any features of Articles 2 and 3 generally which may assist in determining the conviction to be retained. In the circumstances of this case, it is open to regard Article 2 as being more specific to the crimes committed by the appellants, in light of the international nature armed conflict, and the fact that in relation to these crimes and circumstances, Article 3 (based on common Article 3) functions in a residual capacity.[61] We would therefore regard a conviction for the offences under Article 2 to best describe the appellants' offences. That is also the conclusion reached by the majority.

E. Disposition

59. We therefore dissent from the conclusion that, of the offences charged cumulatively in respect of the same conduct, the convictions for all of the offences charged under Article 2 of the Statute should be confirmed and those for all of the offences charged under Article 3 should be dismissed. It is, in our view, unsatisfactory simply to "dismiss" the charges under one or other of the two Articles. There must be a finding on the indictment that the accused is either guilty or not guilty of the charge. An unqualified statement that the charge is "dismissed" may be misunderstood. In our view, where an accused is not found guilty of a particular charge for the sole reason that to find otherwise would produce a cumulative conviction, the disposition should be in terms such as "Not guilty on the basis that a conviction on this charge would be impermissibly cumulative".

60. For the reasons set out above, the convictions on the Article 3 charges should be retained in relation to certain of the counts. Thus, we dissent from the majority judgement in relation to the following charges, for which we would have entered the following disposition:

Mucić: Count 38: wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention IV in respect of Dragan Kuljanin, Vukašin Mrkajić and Nedeljko Draganić and inhuman treatment as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention IV in respect of Mirko Kuljanin: NOT GUILTY ON THE BASIS THAT A CONVICTION ON THIS CHARGE WOULD BE IMPERMISSIBLY CUMULATIVE Count 39: cruel treatment as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War in respect of Dragan Kuljanin, Vukašin Mrkajić, Nedeljko Draganić, and Mirko Kuljanin: CONVICTION CONFIRMED.

Count 44: inhuman treatment as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention NOT GUILTY ON THE BASIS THAT A CONVICTION ON THIS CHARGE WOULD BE IMPERMISSIBLY CUMULATIVE

Count 46: wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention IV: NOT GUILTY ON THE BASIS THAT A CONVICTION ON THIS CHARGE WOULD BE IMPERMISSIBLY CUMULATIVE
Count 47: cruel treatment as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War: CONVICTION CONFIRMED.

Delić: Count 42: inhuman treatment as a Grave Breach of Geneva Convention IV NOT GUILTY ON THE BASIS THAT A CONVICTION ON THIS CHARGE WOULD BE IMPERMISSIBLY CUMULATIVE
Count 43: cruel treatment as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War CONVICTION CONFIRMED.

Count 47: cruel treatment as a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War: CONVICTION CONFIRMED.

F. Sentencing Consequences

61. The majority noted that the Trial Chamber, in sentencing, referred to its earlier interlocutory decision in which it had held that the matter of accumulation of offences was relevant only to penalty considerations, and held:

> It is in this context that the Trial Chamber here orders that each of the sentences is to be served concurrently.[62]

The Trial Chamber had earlier also specifically referred to the principle of avoiding imposition of double punishment for the same conduct in the context of convictions in respect of both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) responsibility.[63] However, it was not apparent that this principle was applied in respect of the convictions which had been entered cumulatively under Articles 2 and 3 and which have been considered above. It appears from the statement of the Trial Chamber quoted above that it regarded this issue as being resolved merely by imposing the sentences concurrently, rather than consecutively, instead of a consideration of the effective length of the sentence actually to be served. However, it is not apparent that the imposition of concurrent sentences will in fact necessarily ensure that an accused is not punished more than once for the same conduct. The use of concurrent, rather than cumulative sentencing does not relieve a Trial Chamber of the obligation to impose the effective, appropriate sentence to be served in respect of the totality of the criminal conduct. Merely fixing a sentence for each count and making them concurrent rather than consecutive does not make it clear that the Trial Chamber has given consideration to the possibility of duplicative penalty when fixing individual sentences.

62 We therefore agree that it is necessary to have the matter of sentencing in respect of the remaining offences remitted to a Trial Chamber to be designated by the President.

Land'o was granted leave to file a response to the Prosecutor's Supplementary Brief, which had been filed with Land'o's Response.[31] On 10 April 2000 Deli} and Muci} filed a joint response and identified two additional grounds of appeal.[32] Upon the request of the Prosecution, the Appeals Chamber granted an extension of time to file the Response until 25 April 2000 and accordingly extended the filing date of the Reply.[33] The Prosecution filed its response to the Supplementary Brief on 25 April 2000 ("Prosecution Response to Supplementary Brief").[34]

3. Grounds of Appeal

9. As there is no right, under the Statute, to appeal from an acquittal, Delali}'s submissions which are made essentially as a response to the Prosecution's appeal against acquittal (Prosecution's grounds 1-3) will be referred to as grounds of contention, which will only be considered should the Prosecution succeed in its appeal with regard to Delali}.[37]

10. Delali} raised these grounds of contention: [38]

1. Whether the Security Council intended to incorporate common Article 3 into Article 3 of the Statute;

2. Whether common Article 3 is customary international law in respect of its application to natural person;

3. The Trial Chamber committed errors of both law and fact in its determination that the ^elebi}i detainees were persons protected by the Geneva Conventions of 1949.

11. Deli} raised the following grounds of appeal:[39]

Issue Number 21 (Additional Issue Number Two):

Whether the Trial Chamber erred in entering judgements of conviction and sentences for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and for violations of the Laws and [sic] Customs of War based on the same acts.

12. Land`o raised the following grounds of appeal.[40]

1. The Prosecutor's practice of selective prosecution violated Article 21 of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the rules of natural justice and international law.

2. The participation at trial as a member of the Trial Chamber of a Judge ineligible to sit as a Judge of the Tribunal violated Articles 13 and 21 of the Statute of the ICTY, the rules of natural justice and international law and rendered the trial a nullity.

3. The participation as a member of the Trial Chamber of a Judge who had an actual or apparent conflict of interest affecting the Judge's impartiality as a member of the Trial Chamber violated the rules of natural justice and international law, and, as a matter of law, absent disclosure by the Judge, and informed consent by the Defence, automatically disqualified the Judge from sitting as a member of the Trial Chamber.

4. The participation as the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber of a Judge who was asleep during substantial portions of the trial, denied appellant [Land`o] the right to the full and competent judicial decision of questions of law, fact, and evidence, and improperly denied Appellant [Land`o] a fair trial, and the appearance of a fair trial.

5. The Trial Chamber erred in law and fact in finding that an international armed conflict existed with reference to the events alleged to have occurred at the ^elebi}i camp.

6. The Trial Chamber erred in law in finding that the victims of the alleged crimes were 'protected persons' for the purpose of the Geneva Conventions.

7. The Trial Chamber erred in law, violated the rules of natural justice, and the principle of certainty in criminal law, and denied the appellant [Land`o] a fair trial, when it refused to define the special defence of diminished mental responsibility which the appellant specifically raised.

8. The Trial Chamber erred in law and made findings of fact inconsistent with the great weight of the evidence when it rejected clear evidence of diminished mental responsibility.

9. The sentence imposed on appellant [Land`o] was unjust and manifestly excessive when compared to the other sentences imposed by this Tribunal and in light of the mitigating factors offered by Appellant [Land`o].

13. Muci} raised the following grounds of appeal:[41]

1. Whether Judge Odio-Benito was disqualified as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of her election as Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica.

2. Whether Judge Odio-Benito was disqualified as a member of the Trial Chamber by reason of her membership on the Board of Trustees of the United Nations Voluntary Fund for the Relief of Victims of Torture.

3. Whether Muci} and Deli} were deprived of a fair trial due to the fact that the presiding judge of the Trial Chamber slept during substantial portions of the trial.

4. Whether the Trial Chamber erred in holding that Bosnian citizens of Serbian ethnicity should be treated as non-nationals of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and were therefore protected persons as defined in Article 4 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War.

5. Whether the Trial Chamber erred in holding that the conflict as described in this case in Bosnian-Herzegovina was an International Armed Conflict at the times relevant to this indictment.

[41] Appellant-Zdravko Muci}'s (aka Pavo) Brief on Appeal against Conviction and Sentence, filed 2 July 1999. Two additional grounds were submitted in Appellants-Cross Appellees Zravko Muci} and Hazim Deli}'s Response to the Prosecutor's Supplementary Brief and Additional Issues on Appeal, 10 April 2000. On 31 May 2000 Muci} submitted his final designation of his grounds of appeal, (Appellant Zdravko Muci}'s Final Designation of his grounds of appeal, 31 May 2000) in which Muci}'s grounds, including the two additional grounds, were consolidated and renumbered. The new numbering is used here. However, in the final designation of his grounds of appeal, the ground relating to unlawful confinement (12) was unintentionally left out, but was argued during the oral hearing, Appeal Transcript, p 468-474.

6. Whether at the time of the acts alleged in the Indictment, customary international law provided for individual criminal responsibility for violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

7. Whether the Trial Chamber erred in entering judgements of conviction and sentences for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and for violations of the Laws and [sic] Customs of War based on the same acts.

8. Whether the OTP interviews of Mr. Muci} were properly admitted in evidence in the Trial Chamber.

9. Whether the Trial Chamber made the proper legal and factual determinations in convicting Mr. Muci} of command responsibility pursuant to Article 7(3).

10. Whether or not the Trial Chamber was unduly influenced as to their determinations by the acts or omissions of the then lead counsel as set out in the Judgement.

11. Whether the Trial Chamber gave Muci} an appropriate sentence.

12. Whether the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in finding that the detainees were unlawfully detained.

During the hearing on appeal, counsel for Muci} acknowledged that the ground numbered 10 above was not in fact relied on as an independent ground of appeal. Referring to certain criticisms of Muci}'s trial counsel contained in paragraph 75 of the Trial Judgement. Counsel stated:

> If there is any good reason or any merit in this Trial Chamber having so set out those criticisms, they are criticisms of his counsel, they are not criticisms of the appellant, and we would simply ask that when this judgment is read or reread, that this learned Appellate Tribunal ignores them completely.[42]

The Presiding Judge clarified this to the Prosecution in stating:

> I think, as Mr Morrison very frankly said, the only point of raising it is to make sure we take no notice [...] of what was said in the Judgement.[43]

The Appeals Chamber has therefore proceeded on this basis and the ground numbered 10 is not considered in this Judgement as an independent ground of appeal.

14. The Prosecution raised six grounds of appeal:[44]

1. The Trial Chamber erred in paragraphs 379-393 when it defined the mental element 'knew or had reasons to know' for the purposes of Superior Responsibility.

2. The Trial Chamber's finding that Zejnil Delali} did not exercise superior responsibility.

[44] Prosecution Brief, para 2.1, p 19, para 4.1, para 5.4, para 6.1, and para 7.2.

3. The Trial Chamber erred when it decided in paragraphs 1124–1144 that Zejnil Delali} was not guilty of unlawful confinement of civilians as charged in count 48 of the Indictment.

4. The Trial Chamber erred when it sentenced Zdravko Muci} to seven years imprisonment.

5. The Trial Chamber erred when it decided in paragraphs 776–810 that Hazim Deli} was not a 'superior' in the ^elebi}i Prison Camp for the purposes of ascribing criminal responsibility to him under Article 7(3) of the Statute.

6. The Trial Chamber's finding that Hazim Deli} was not guilty as charged in Count 48.

4. Hearing

15. The Appeals Chamber heard oral argument from 5 to 8 June 2000.

5. Status Conferences

16. On 8 February 2000, Delali} filed a motion for clarification with regard to his participation in the status conference which is required to be held pursuant to Rule 65*bis* (B) of the Rules[45] as he was not in custody.[46] On 14 February 2000, the Appeals Chamber ruled that Delali} may but was not required to, attend the Status Conference, whereas his counsel was ordered to be present.[47]

17. Status conferences were held in accordance with Rule 65*bis* of the Rules on 23 February 2000, 12 May 2000 and 6 October 2000.

B. Issues Relating to the Composition of the Appeals Chamber

1. Assignment of Judges

18 On 21 December 1998, in order to deal with motions by Landžo for an extension of time limits,[48] a bench of three Judges, Judge Wang, Judge Shahabuddeen, and Judge Nieto-Navia, was assigned.[49] The assignment was vacated by an order on 9 February 1999.[50]

19. On 20 January 1999, Judge Shahabuddeen, Judge Wang, Judge Nieto-Navia, Judge Hunt and Judge Bennouna were assigned to sit on the appeal.[51] Judge Shahabuddeen withdrew himself from hearing the Appeal on 28 January 1999, and Judge Rodrigues was assigned to replace him.[52] On 19 May 1999 Judge Riad was assigned to replace Judge Rodrigues[53] and on 9 March 2000 Judge Pocar was assigned to replace Judge Wang.[54]

20. On 1 February 1999, in a confidential motion to the President of the Tribunal, Land'o requested the President to assign as Presiding Judge the acting President, Judge McDonald, Judge May "or another Judge from a major Common Law jurisdiction" with a background in a common law jurisdiction.[55] The President and the Vice-President withdrew from the matter pursuant to sub-Rule 15(A) of the Rules and on 12 February 1999 a decision was issued by Judge May who dismissed the motion on the basis that it is improper for Counsel to address the composition of any bench of the Tribunal.[56]

21. On 12 October 1999, Judge Hunt was appointed pre-appeal Judge and was entrusted to determine all pre-appeal motions of a procedural nature under Rule 73 as it applies to the Appeals Chamber as well as the power to refer any such motions to the Chamber. In addition, the pre-appeal Judge was mandated to conduct status conferences in order to determine the procedures to be followed in the hearing.[57]

2. Disqualification

22. On 30 July 1999, a joint motion was filed by Muci}, Deli} and Land'o requesting disqualification of certain judges, pursuant to Rule 15 of the Rules in connection with issues arising out of the appellant's grounds of appeal relating to the status of Judge Odio Benito during the trial. The motion requested that all Judges who either participated in the Plenary session which found that Judge Odio Benito's nomination as Vice-President of Costa Rica was not incompatible with her service as a Judge or who took part in the Plenary Session which approved her taking the oath of office as Vice-President of Costa Rica while remaining a Judge, be disqualified from sitting on the Appeals Chamber in the present case or alternatively rec themselves.[58]

23. On 15 September 1999, the Presiding Judge issued a decision referring the matter to the Bureau for consideration pursuant to Rule 15(B) of the Rules.[59] On 17 September 1999 the Appeals Chamber denied the motion as incompetent, holding that the subject matter of the motion was not a matter for the consideration of the Appeals Chamber as it was instead to be regarded as an application to the Presiding Judge pursuant to Rule 15(B), who had referred the matter to the Bureau.[60]

24. On 25 October 1999, the Bureau - comprised of Judge McDonald, Judge Shahabuddeen, Judge Cassese, Judge Jorda and Judge May - decided that the Judges in question, Judge Riad, Judge Nieto-Navia and Judge Wang, were not disqualified from serving on the Appeals Chamber pursuant to the standard in Rule 15(A) of the Rules.[61] The Bureau held that a distinction must be drawn between the requirements for a person to serve as a Judge of the Tribunal and the issues relating to the grounds of disqualification of a Judge from sitting in a particular case. To serve as a Judge of the Tribunal a person elected by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 13(2) of the Statute must both possess the requirements set out in Article 13(1) and not exercise any political or administrative functions or engage in any other occupation of a professional nature. If there is a doubt or dispute as to whether a Judge meets the requirements, the President may seek to resolve the matter in conference with the Judges at a Plenary Session, in which the Judges exercise their administrative functions. Such consultation was sought twice with regard to Judge Odio Benito at the Fourteenth Plenary in October 1997 and at the Seventeenth Plenary in March 1998. On both occasions the Plenary endorsed the respective Presidents decisions that there was no incompatibility between Judge Odio Benito's status as Vice-President of Costa Rica and those of a Judge, as Judge Odio Benito would not assume the Presidential functions until her tenure terminated as a Judge of the Tribunal.

25. The decisions of the Plenary was not made with reference to any specific question as to whether Judge Odio Benito was disqualified pursuant to Rule 15 of the Rules. Further, it was

The Bureau and not the Plenary Session decided on the question of disqualification pursuant to Rule 15 and none of the three above-mentioned judges participated.[62]

C. Issues Relating to Defence Counsel

26. On 12 January 1999, the Defence for Delali} filed a motion pursuant to Article 13(A) of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel[63] requesting the President to instruct the Registrar to assign Mr O'Sullivan as co-counsel, under the same terms and conditions with regard to remuneration as co-counsel was assigned during the trial.[64] The President denied the motion as counsel had failed to demonstrate exceptional circumstances for assignment of co-counsel as required by the Directive.[65]

27. On 1 February 1999, Land'o requested the removal of Mr Ackerman, the lead counsel for his co-accused Delali}, alleging a conflict of interest as Mr Ackerman had previously been assigned lead counsel for Land'o between April 1997 and March 1998.[66] By a decision of the Appeals Chamber on 6 May 1999, the motion for the removal of Mr Ackerman was dismissed.[67] The Appeals Chamber held that the material before it did not disclose any conflict of interest and that the retention of Mr Ackerman as lead counsel for Delali} did not obstruct the proper conduct of the proceedings within the meaning of sub-Rule 46(A) of the Rules.

28. On 17 June 1999, Mr Moran moved to be immediately relieved as co-counsel for Deli} on the basis that he would be unable to provide effective assistance without risking his employment.[68] The Appeals Chamber considered that it was not ordinarily appropriate for a Chamber to consider a motion for withdrawal of the assigned counsel where such motion had not been presented to and rejected by the Registrar and that decision subsequently reviewed and upheld by the President. However, under the particular circumstances in the present case, the Appeals Chamber found it appropriate to consider the motion on its merits. Further, the Appeals Chamber found that there were no grounds for withdrawal as to permit Mr Moran withdraw on the basis of his personal interests would be contrary to counsel's obligations under the Code of Professional Conduct for Defence Counsel Appearing before the International Tribunal,[69] and to the interests of his client and of justice. [70]

1. Provisional Release

29. Muci} filed a motion seeking provisional and temporary release for the purpose of attending the funeral of his uncle in Konjic, Bosnia and Herzegovina on 18 February 1999.[71] A majority of the Appeals Chamber considered that it had jurisdiction to deal with the motion pursuant to Rules 65 and 107 of the Rules. However, that majority was not satisfied that the conditions for provisional release had been met and denied the motion.[72]

30. Deli} requested provisional release on 31 May 1999 for the purpose of attending the funeral of his mother, in Konjic, Bosnia and Herzegovina on, the following day, 1 June 1999.[73] On 31 May 1999 a majority of the Appeals Chamber found that it had jurisdiction to consider the request and further considered that the funeral of a close relative might constitute an exceptional circumstance within the meaning of Rule 65. However, the Chamber was not satisfied that the conditions for provisional release under Rule 65 had been met, namely that Deli} would appear for appeal proceedings and that he would not have posed a danger to any victim, witness or other person. A majority of the Appeals Chamber denied the motion.[74]

31. On 1 June 1999, Deli} filed an emergency motion reiterating his request for provisional release in order to participate in the funeral of his mother.[75] Finding that no new material facts

had been presented to warrant departure from the original decision the Appeals Chamb rejected the motion.[76]

32. On 17 December 1999, Mucić sought provisional release in order to return to Konjic, Bosnia and Herzegovina for one week to take care of his elderly father and to ensure that proper medical care and attention was provided to him.[77] The Prosecution objected to the release.[78] A majority of the Appeals Chamber denied the motion. The Appeals Chamber considered the crimes of which Muci} had been found guilty, his conduct during the trial and the fact that Muci} if released, would have needed to be transported to Bosnia and Herzegovina by a commercial airliner. The Chamber was not satisfied that Muci} would have appeared for appeal proceedings and that he would not have posed a danger to any victim, witness or other person.[79]

2. Severance

33. On 10 February 1999, Delalić filed a motion to sever his appeal from that of the others and a conditional motion to dismiss his cross appeal if severance was granted ("Motion to Sever").[80] Delalić argued that as he had been acquitted by the Trial Chamber and hence his situation was different from that of Mucić, Delić, and Landžo, a judgement pronouncing on the Prosecution's grounds of appeal should be issued as soon as possible. Delalić filed additional submissions on the Motion to Sever.[81] On 26 March 1999, the Appeals Chamber reserved its decision until after the briefs of the parties defining the grounds of appeal or cross-appeal had been filed.[82]

34. On 4 June 1999, Delalić requested the Appeals Chamber to review the Motion to Sever.[83] On 15 June 1999, the Appeal Chamber responded that it continued to reserve its decision until after the briefs defining the grounds of appeal had been filed.[84]

35. Delalić also filed submissions on 28 July 1999, arguing that there were no grounds based in law or in fact for disturbing the Trial Chamber's decision of acquittal and therefore requested that his appeal be expedited and severed from the other defendants.[85]

35. On 29 July 1999, the Appeals Chamber denied the Motion to Sever as the issue of command responsibility had been raised in the Prosecution's Appeal Brief in relation to both Delalić and Mucić. The Appeals Chamber wished to reserve its judgement on the issue of command responsibility until the hearing of the appeals and therefore severance would not expedite judgement.[86]

D. Issues Relating to Evidence

1. Motions to "Preserve and Provide" Evidence

36. On 4 February 1999, Land'o moved to preserve and provide the daily video records which were made of the Trial Chamber proceedings by the Tribunal and which were in possession of the Registrar of the Tribunal.[87] These daily records would be used to support Landzo's Fourth Ground of Appeal. In its submissions in response, the Prosecution argued inter alia, that this motion should be dismissed in limine, as Land'o had not raised the issue at trial, and therefore such an objection should not be considered by the Appeals Chamber in the absence of compelling reasons.[88] In reply, Land'o argued that the issue was raised at trial, albeit not through a motion, and that even if it had not been, it raised an issue of "such a fundamental nature that the Tribunal should take cognisance of it in the interests of justice."[89] On 22 April 1999, the Appeals Chamber ruled that first-hand and detailed evidence citing specific instances in affidavit form is necessary before access to the record for the purposes of corroborating these assertions could be granted. As no such evidence had been provided by Land'o, the motion was denied.[90]

37. On 12 May 1999, Land'o filed a second motion seeking to preserve and provide evidence, offering evidence in the form of affidavits in order to demonstrate that the requested access to the videotapes of the Trial Chamber proceedings were likely to materially ass Land'o in his appeal.[91] On 15 June 1999, the Appeals Chamber ordered, under conditions specified in the decision and consistent with orders for protective measures made by the Trial Chamber during the trial, that Land'o's counsel and co-counsel be given access to the videotapes of the Trial Chamber proceedings conducted in open session and produced in Courtrooms I and III ("Order on Second Motion").[92]

38. On 7 September 1999, Land'o moved to vary the Order on Second Motion[93] so as to permit his Counsel's legal assistant to also view video-recordings of portions of the Trial Chamber proceedings that were conducted in closed session. As the Prosecution did not oppose the motion[94] and sufficient guarantees for the maintenance of confidentiality existed, the Appeals Chamber granted the motion.[95] On 10 September 1999, Land'o filed another motion to vary in part the Order on Second Motion to enable copies to be made of portions of the Trial Chamber proceedings to prepare and present further evidence, and that the Appeals Chamber take judicial notice of certain facts.[96] On 20 September Land'o filed a motion for expedited consideration of the motion of 10 September 1999.[97] In the motions, Land'o sought permission to produce tapes containing portions of the trial and a compilation videotape of extracts for the purposes of oral argument. The Appeals Chamber ruled i) that the motion was premature until Land'o had filed particulars identifying the portions of the videotapes upon which he intended to rely; and ii) that the videotapes were not additional evidence pursuant to Rule 115, but rather were part of the trial record and as such could be called for pursuant to Rule 109(D) of the Rules by the Appeals Chamber.[98]

39. On 27 September 1999, Land'o filed a motion seeking to obtain and adduce further evidence relating to the issue of whether he should be held to have waived his right to assert the Fourth Ground of Appeal by reason of failure to raise the issue during trial.[99] The requested evidence consisted of testimony and written records of the President of the Tribunal, the Registrar and the Senior Legal Officer of the Trial Chamber. Considering that general principles of law recognise an adjudicative privilege or judicial immunity from compulsion to testify in relation to judicial deliberations and related matters, the Appeals Chamber dismissed the motion.[100] The Appeals Chamber also ruled that if counsel for Land'o were to appear as witness in the Fourth Ground of Appeal, pursuant to Article 16 of the Code of Professional Conduct for Defence Counsel appearing before the International Tribunal, counsel would not be allowed to act as an advocate for Land'o on that ground.[101]

40. Land'o sought clarification of the order[102] and on 16 December 1999, the Pre-appeal Judge clarified that Counsel for Land'o was permitted to act for Land'o in the appeal for all grounds other than the Fourth Ground of Appeal.[103]

41. On 25 January 2000, the Pre-appeal Judge ordered the Registry to make the necessary arrangements in order for the Defence for Land'o to view the extracts of the videotapes.[104]

42. On 10 May 2000, pursuant to a Prosecution motion for clarification, which observed that counsel for Land'o had continued to sign documents in relation to the Fourth Ground of Appeal, the Appeals Chamber reiterated its order that Counsel for Land'o remove herself from pleadings, both oral and written, with respect to the Land'o Fourth Ground of Appeal.[105]

Judge Bennouna submitted a Declaration to the Order, opining that Land'o's motion was premature and that the Appeals Chamber should have deferred a decision until it has had the benefit of reading the Appellant and Respondent Briefs in relation to this ground of appeal.

[101] Article 16 of the Code of Professional Conduct reads, "Counsel must not act as advocate in a trial in which the Counsel is likely to be a necessary witness except where the testimony relates to an uncontested issue or where substantial hardship would be caused to the Client if that counsel does not so act".

[105] Decision on Prosecution Motion for Further Clarification of Order of 7 Dec 1999, 10 May 2000.

43. On 31 May 2000, the Appeals Chamber issued an order[106] that admitted into evidence certain material in relation to Land'o's Fourth Ground of Appeal inter alia;

(i) certain evidence of Counsel for Land'o insofar as it related to matters other than a description of the conduct of the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber;

(ii) stated that in view of evidence already admitted, the Appeals Chamber would not hear oral evidence from Counsel for Land'o;

(iii) admitted into evidence certain correspondence between the Tribunal's President and Land'o's counsel concerning Land'o's Fourth Ground of Appeal; and

(iv) admitted into evidence certain motions drafted by Counsel of Land'o which had not been filed, but which were relevant to the Fourth Ground of Appeal. In the same order, the Appeals Chamber rejected the admission of certain press reports regarding the physical state of the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber as they reflected the subjective commentary of their authors and were therefore of no probative value to the appeal

2. Production of Documents

44. On 20 July 1999, Delali} filed a motion for the production of documents relating to efforts to obtain copies of proposed prosecution evidence excluded by the Trial Chamber.[107] In response, the Prosecution argued that there is no right on appeal to underlying documents in relation to facts accepted and relied upon by the Trial Chamber and that Delali}'s request was contrary to the principle of finality.[108] Persuaded that the Prosecution's analysis of the character of the evidence to this point was correct, Delali} moved to withdraw his motion for production.[109]

3. Admission of Evidence and Related Issues

45. On 14 February 2000, the Appeals Chamber admitted into evidence at the motion of Land'o the expert opinion of Mr Francisco Villalobos Brenes, interpreting certain articles of the Constitution of Costa Rica in relation to Land'o's Second Ground of Appeal.[110] The Appea' Chamber did not consider that Rule 115 of the Rules was applicable, as Land'o's Second Ground of Appeal related to the ineligibility of one of the members of the Trial Chamber to serve as a Judge of the International Tribunal and not to the issues already litigated at trial, but admitted the evidence pursuant to sub-Rule 89(C) of the Rules.

46. With respect to the same issue, the Appeals Chamber admitted at the motion of the Prosecution into evidence the expert opinion of Mr Alejandro Batalla who was described as an expert in the law of Costa Rica.[111]

47. In its 31 May 2000 Order on Admission of Evidence on Appeal and on Taking of Judicial Notice, the Appeals Chamber made various rulings with respect to the Second Ground of Appeal. The Appeals Chamber i) admitted into evidence the agreed facts set out in an agreement on evidence entered into between the Prosecution and Land'o relating to the Second Ground of Appeal;[112] ii) rejected the admission of English press reports because they had no probative value; iii) allowed the filing of an English translation of certain Spanish press reports submitted by Land'o so that the Appeals Chamber would be in a position to consider their admissibility; and iv) admitted into evidence Security Council Resolution 1126 and related correspondence concerning the terms of office of the members of the Trial Chamber hearing this case.[113]

48. On 28 July 2000, the Prosecution and Land'o filed a verified translation of the Constitution of Costa Rica.[114]

49. On 1 June 2000, the Appeals Chamber dismissed a motion by the Prosecution, filed confidentially, to adjourn oral argument on the appeal pending the translation and assessment of documents newly received from the Croatian Government that pertain to the ^elebi}i prison.[115]

50. On 8 June 2000, during the oral hearing the Prosecution made an oral motion to perm[illegible] the proceedings to remain open in order for it to retain the possibility of submitting an application for the admission of additional evidence: being documents just released to the Prosecutor by the Croatian Government.[116] The Prosecution was requested to submit a detailed list of the documents to be admitted during the oral hearing.[117] Counsel for Muci} also made an oral motion requesting the possibility to admit additional evidence at a later date.[118] Subsequently, the Prosecution decided not to proceed with an application to admit additional evidence, while Counsel for Muci} requested time to go through all the material disclosed by the Prosecution before making a final determination.[119] On 30 June 2000, Muci} sent a letter stating that no motion to admit additional evidence would be submitted.[120]

51. Following the hearing on 3 August 2000, Counsel for Deli} filed a "letter-brief", which included relevant cases which had been decided after the appeal had been submitted. Land`o joined in the letter brief.[121] The Prosecution responded on 10 August 2000.[122]

52. On 30 January 2001, Deli} filed a document seeking leave to file a second supplementary brief which discussed an article from the International Review of the Red Cross. He submitted that the analysis of certain issues in the article supported his arguments in relation to his fourth and eighth grounds of appeal.[123] The Appeals Chamber, noting that the date of delivery of this Judgement had been advised to the parties in a Scheduling Order issued on 24 Jan 2001, refused leave to Deli} to file the brief as it was clear that the submissions in the brief added nothing to the submissions which had already been made.

ANNEX 91

The Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("International Tribunal" or "Tribunal") is seised of two appeals in relation to the written Judgement rendered by Trial Chamber I bis ("Trial Chamber") on 25 June 1999 in the case of Prosecutor v. Zlatko Aleksovski, Case No.: IT-95-14/1-T ("Aleksovski Judgement" or "Judgement").[1]

Having considered the written and oral submissions of both parties, the Appeals Chamber

HEREBY RENDERS ITS WRITTEN JUDGEMENT.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Procedural Background

1. The indictment charged the accused, Zlatko Aleksovski, with three counts of crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. Count 8 of the indictment charged the accused with a grave breach as recognised by Articles 2(b) (inhuman treatment), 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute of the International Tribunal ("Statute"). Count 9 of the indictment charged the accused with a grave breach as recognised by Articles 2(c) (willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health), 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute. Count 10 of the indictment charged the accused with a violation of the laws or customs of war (outrages upon personal dignity) as recognised by Articles 3, 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute.

2. At his initial appearance before Trial Chamber I[2] on 29 April 1997, the accused pleaded not guilty to all counts. The Trial Chamber rendered its oral judgement on 7 May 1999, finding the accused guilty on Count 10 and not guilty on Counts 8 and 9. The Trial Chamber rendered its written judgement on 25 June 1999.

3. Both Zlatko Aleksovski ("Appellant" or "Defence") and the Prosecutor ("Prosecution" or "Cross-Appellant") now appeal against separate aspects of the Aleksovski Judgement ("Appeal against Judgement" and "Cross-Appeal", respectively).[3] Combined, these appeals are referred to as "the Appeals".

4. The Appeals Chamber heard oral argument on the Appeals on 9 February 2000. On the same day, the Appeals Chamber denied all of the Appellant's grounds of appeal, reserved its judgement on two of the Prosecution's grounds of appeal and allowed the Prosecution's appeal against sentence.[4] The Appellant was detained on remand pending the Appeals Chamber's written judgement.[5]

[3] In the present proceedings, Zlatko Aleksovski is both appellant and cross-respondent. Conversely, the Prosecutor is respondent and cross-appellant. In the interest of clarity, however, the designations "Defence" or "Appellant" and "Prosecution" or "Cross-Appellant", respectively will be employed throughout this Judgement.

5. A notice of appeal against the Aleksovski Judgement was filed on behalf of Zlatko Aleksovski on 17 May 1999.

6. Following an order for the variation of the time-limits for the filing of their respective briefs,[6] the Appellant filed his brief against the Aleksovski Judgement ("Appellant's Brief") on 24 September 1999.[7] The Prosecution responded to the Appellant's Brief ("Prosecution's Response") on 25 October 1999.[8] The Appellant filed his reply to the Prosecution's Response ("Appellant's Reply") on 10 November 1999.[9]

7. Following an order for the filing of additional submissions by both parties,[10] the Appellant filed his additional submissions on the doctrine of stare decisis and the defence of necessity ("Appellant's Additional Submissions") on 11 January 2000.[11] The Prosecution's additional submissions ("Prosecution's Additional Submissions") were filed on the same day.[12] The Appeals Chamber granted the Prosecution's request to file a reply to the

(b) Grounds of Appeal

8. The Appellant's grounds of appeal have not been listed explicitly in the Appellant's Brief. At the oral hearing on 9 February 2000, the Appeals Chamber asked the Appellant to indicate whether the Appeals Chamber had correctly interpreted the grounds of appeal.[15] The Appellant's grounds of appeal as so interpreted are as follows:

(i) Ground 1: The Trial Chamber failed to establish that the accused had a discriminatory intent, which it is submitted, is necessary to convict him for the offences under Article 3 of the Statute.[16]

(ii) Ground 2: The conduct found proven against the Appellant, in particular the violence against the detainees, was not sufficiently grave as to warrant a conviction under Article 3, and the Appellant's conduct may have been justified by necessity, which the Trial Chamber failed to consider.[17]

(iii) Ground 3: The Trial Chamber erred in relying on witness testimony that was inherently unreliable and did not meet the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt.[18]

(iv) Ground 4: The Trial Chamber erred in its finding that the Appellant was in a position of superior responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute.[19]

2. The Cross-Appeal

9. The Prosecution filed a notice of appeal against the Aleksovski Judgement on 19 May 1999, and its brief against the Judgement ("Cross-Appellant's Brief") on 24 September 1999.[20] The Appellant responded to the Cross-Appellant's Brief ("Appellant's Response") on 25 October 1999.[21] The Cross-Appellant filed its reply to the Appellant's Response ("Cross-Appellant's Reply") on 10 November 1999.[22]

10. The Prosecution's grounds of appeal are set out in the Cross-Appellant's Brief. The grounds of appeal are as follows:

(i) Ground 1: The Trial Chamber erred in deciding that Article 2 of the Statute was inapplicable because it had not been established that the Bosnian Muslims held at Kaonik prison between January 1993 and the end of May 1993 were protected persons within the meaning of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.[23]

(ii) Ground 2: The Trial Chamber erred in holding that the Defendant did not incur responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute for the mistreatment suffered by the detainees while outside Kaonik prison.[24]

(iii) Ground 3: The Trial Chamber erred when it sentenced Aleksovski to two and a half years' imprisonment.[25]

3. Relief Requested

(a) The Appeal against Judgement

11. The Appellant seeks the following relief in relation to his various grounds of appeal referred to above:

(iv) The reversal of the finding of guilt under Count 10 for failure to establish the responsibility of Zlatko Aleksovski as a commander.

(b) The Cross-Appeal

12. The Prosecution seeks the following relief in relation to its various grounds of appeal referred to above:

(i) The reversal of the finding of not guilty with respect to Count 8 and Count 9 and the substitution thereof with findings of guilt.[26]

(ii) The reversal of the finding in relation to Count 10 that the Appellant is not guilty of the mistreatment of prisoners outside Kaonik prison (other than their use as trench-diggers and human shields), and the substitution thereof with a finding of guilt. Further, should the Cross-Appellant's first ground of appeal succeed, the reversal of the findings with respect to this element of Counts 8 and 9, and the substitution thereof with findings of guilt on this element of each of the said counts.[27]

(iii) The revision of the sentence imposed to a sentence of not less than seven years.[28]

II. FIRST GROUND OF APPEAL BY THE APPELLANT: LACK OF REQUISITE MENS REA

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. Appellant's Brief

13. The Appellant submits[29] that, as Article 3 of the Statute only deals with extremely grave crimes, the perpetrator of Article 3 offences is "evidently expected to manifest ... discriminatory conduct".[30] The Appellant construed the Trial Chamber's judgement as having accepted that a discriminatory intent is required under Article 3 of the Statute but says that the Trial Chamber failed to identify facts indicating the existence of this discriminatory intent.[31] The Appellant further contends generally that the perpetrator's motivation is a critical element of criminal liability under Article 3 and that a perpetrator must be "motivated by a contempt toward other person's dignity in racial, religious, social, sexual or other discriminatory sense".[32] The Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber, despite the Prosecutor's failure to prove the element of discriminatory intent, found that the Appellant's criminal liability was proved.[33] The Trial Chamber acted inconsistently in finding that certain of the Appellant's actions were not motivated by discrimination, but finding him guilty under Article 3, which implies the existence of discriminatory intent.[34]

14. The apparent confusion in these submissions was resolved during the oral hearing where the Appellant accepted the summary proposed by the Presiding Judge that this ground constituted an argument "that the Trial Chamber failed to establish that the accused had a discriminatory intent which you say is necessary to convict him for the offences under Article 3 of the Statute."[35]

2. Prosecution's Response

15. The Prosecution interpreted the Appellant's Brief as contending that the Trial Chamber made an error of fact, in which case he would need to establish that the Trial Chamber's findings on mens rea are unreasonable.[36] Although the Appellant expresses agreement with the Trial Chamber's findings on the elements of Article 3 of the Statute, the elements of mens rea cited in his Brief do not correspond with these findings.[37] The Appellant also seems to allege an error of law in that the Trial Chamber did not require proof of discriminatory intent on the Appellant's part.[38] The Trial Chamber's reference to discrimination does not mean it considered discrimination a requirement: it is merely evidence relevant to a determination of whether mens rea is established.[39] This evidence was mainly relied on in determining sentence.[40] Under international law, proof of discriminatory intent is not required for outrages upon personal dignity.[41] The Furund`ija Judgement[42] at no point suggests that the relevant mental element requires proof of discriminatory intent.[43] The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber correctly held that the mens rea element of outrages upon personal dignity does not require proof of discriminatory intent.[44]

[38] Ibid., para. 2.6.
[39] Ibid., paras. 2.11 and 2.18.
[40] Ibid., para. 2.12.
[41] The Prosecution observes that the Appellant cited no authority to support the contrary assertion (ibid., para. 2.14). The text of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions does not pronounce on the mental element of Article 3(1)(c). Discriminatory intent can be evidence of inhuman treatment, but is not essential (ibid., para. 2.18). A requirement of discriminatory intent is not supported in the text of common Article 3 nor that of Additional Protocol I, Article 75(2)(b) and Protocol II, Article 4(2)(e) (ibid., para. 2.19), nor in customary international law. In Article 4(e) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("ICTR") and Article 8 (2)(c) (ii) of the Statute of the International Criminal Court ("ICC Statute"), there is no suggestion that discriminatory intent is required (ibid., paras. 2.20-2.22).

[43] Prosecution's Response, para. 2.23.
[44] Ibid., para. 2.24.

3. Appellant's Reply

16. The Appellant responds that the Prosecution has misinterpreted its arguments, perhaps due to their different legal backgrounds.[45] The Appellant contends that discriminatory intent is a necessary motive (which is not the same as mens rea), and that there was no proof that the Appellant had a discriminatory attitude. Under civil law, it is not sufficient to establish the elements of an alleged crime by proof merely that the perpetrator wishes to commit the crime, but one must establish that he is willing to accept the consequences of the actus reus. Such an approach is, the Appellant contends, found in Article 30 of the ICC Statute.[46]

B. Discussion

17. The Appeals Chamber does not accept the assertion of the Appellant that the Trial Chamber found that a discriminatory intent is a necessary element of crimes under Article 3 of the Statute. The Trial Chamber's references to an intention to discriminate, upon which the Appellant relies,[47] were made in the context of whether poor standards of detention were the result of conduct for which the Appellant could be held culpable or were the result of circumstances beyond the Appellant's control.

18. The Appeals Chamber understands the main passage relied on by the Appellant,[48] read in context, to mean that, in determining whether the mens rea of the offence of outrages against personal dignity under Article 3 is present, it is relevant to consider whether poor conditions of detention have been proved to be a result of the deliberate intention, negligence, failure to act or intentional discrimination of the person responsible for detention. The Trial Chamber was not saying that a discriminatory intent is an essential element of the crime of outrages against personal dignity or of Article 3 offences more generally. The Trial Chamber explicitly set out earlier in its judgement "the elements of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity within Article 3 of the Statute".[49] The Trial Chamber concluded that the mens rea of the offence is the "intent to humiliate or ridicule the victim" and did not refer to discrimination.[50] There is therefore no basis for the contention that the Trial Chamber found that a discriminatory intent was a necessary element of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity.

[47] Aleksovski Judgement, paras. 214, 215 and 218.

19. Counsel for the Appellant made the more general submission that an essential element of offences under Article 3 of the Statute is that the perpetrator is "motivated by a contempt towards other persons' dignity in racial, religious, social, sexual or other discriminatory sense".[51] However, he provided no authority to support this specific formulation or the existence generally of an international law requirement of discriminatory intent or "motive" for war crimes. The only apparent legal basis put forward for the submission is that, because of the extreme gravity of the crimes which fall within Article 3 of the Statute, not every assault on physical integrity and personal dignity is criminal and only proof of a discriminatory intent in committing those acts will establish that the acts are of adequate gravity.[52]

20. The Appellant's argument is unfounded. There is nothing in the undoubtedly grave nature of the crimes falling within Article 3 of the Statute, nor in the Statute generally, which leads to a conclusion that those offences are punishable only if they are committed with discriminatory intent. The general requirements which must be met for prosecution of offences under Article 3 have already been clearly identified by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision,[53] and they do not include a requirement of proof of a discriminatory intent or motivation. The Appeals Chamber recognised there that the relevant violation of international humanitarian law must be "serious" in the sense that it "must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim".[54] This in no way imports a requirement that the violation must be committed with discriminatory intent.

21. International instruments provide no basis for asserting a requirement of a discriminatory intent for violations of the laws or customs of war as referred to by Article 3 of the Statute. The crimes punishable pursuant to Article 3 include all violations of international humanitarian law other than those designated as "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions falling under Article 2 of the Statute or crimes falling under Articles 4 or 5 of the Statute.[55] There is nothing in the provisions of the major instruments encompassed by Article 3 of the Statute,[56] such as the 1907 Hague Convention IV and annexed Regulations[57] and the Geneva Conventions of 1949,[58] to suggest that violations must be accompanied by a discriminatory intent.

22. The specific offence of outrages upon personal dignity is found in common Article 3(1)(c) to the Geneva Conventions, Article 75(2)(b) of Additional Protocol I[59] and Article 4(2)(e) of Additional Protocol II.[60] Article 3(1)(c)[61] prohibits "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment". Nothing in the language or the purpose of this provision, or any of the Additional Protocols' provisions, indicates that the offence of an outrage upon personal dignity is committed only if a discriminatory intent is proved. The acts prohibited by subsection (1) of common Article 3 are prefaced by the words:

> Persons taking no active part in the hostilities, including members of armed forces who have laid down their arms and those placed hors de combat by sickness, wounds, detention, or any other cause, shall in all circumstances be treated humanely, without any adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria.

[61] The provision on which the conviction in the present case was founded – Aleksovski Judgement, para. 228.

The reference in common Article 3 (1)(c) to "without any adverse distinction founded on race, colour, religion or faith, sex, birth or wealth, or any other similar criteria" does not qualify the overriding requirement of humane treatment of all persons taking no active part in hostilities, and in particular does not restrict the acts prohibited by that article to acts committed with a discriminatory motivation. This interpretation of the article is confirmed by the International Committee of the Red Cross commentaries to the Geneva Conventions. In relation to common Article 3, the Commentary to Geneva Convention IV[62] notes the wide terms of Article 3 and makes it clear that the reference to "without adverse distinction" was intended not to limit Article 3 to treatment motivated by discrimination but to remove any possible basis for an argument that inhumane treatment of a particular class of persons may be justified:

> All the persons referred to in (1) without distinction are entitled to humane treatment. Criteria which might be employed as a basis for discrimination against one class of persons or another are enumerated in the provision, and their validity denied.[63]

The ICRC Commentary to Geneva Convention I regarding common Article 3 observes that the formula "without any adverse distinction founded on..." is cumbersome, but that "in view of past atrocities the authors felt it desirable to enter into detail in order to leave no possible loophole".[64]

23. There was also no basis for the Trial Chamber to conclude that customary international law imposes a requirement that violations of the laws or customs of war that may be prosecuted under Article 3 of the Statute require proof of a discriminatory intent. It has been recognised by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Judgement that, at customary law, crimes against humanity do not require proof of a discriminatory intent.[65] Such an intent must be proved only for those crimes for which it is an express requirement, that is the various types of persecution falling under Article 5(h) of the Statute.[66] There is no evidence of State practice which would indicate the development in customary international law of such a restriction on the requisite mens rea of violations of the laws or customs of war, nor of the specific offence of outrages upon personal dignity; certainly the Appellant did not adduce any. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, it is the specific discriminatory intent required for the international crimes of persecution and genocide which distinguishes them from other violations of the laws or customs of war.

24. More recent instruments which define the offence of outrages upon personal dignity, including Additional Protocols I and II (Articles 75(2)(b) and 4(2)(e), respectively) and the Statute of the ICTR (Article 4(e)) do not refer to discriminatory intent. Such a reference might have been expected if there had been a contemporary view that customary law had developed to impose such a requirement.

25. Finally, there is no suggestion in any Tribunal jurisprudence that offences under Article 3 of its Statute require proof of a discriminatory intent. Where this offence has been considered previously, it was the broader concept of human dignity that was emphasised. In the Furundžija Judgement, where Trial Chamber II was required to consider the nature of the offence of rape as an outrage against personal dignity, it held:

> The general principle of respect for human dignity is the basic underpinning and indeed the very raison d'être of international humanitarian law and human rights law; indeed in modern times it has become of such importance as to permeate the whole body of international law. This principle is intended to shield human beings from outrages upon their personal dignity, whether such outrages are carried out by unlawfully attacking the body or humiliating and debasing the honour, the self-respect or the mental well-being of a person.[67]

That judgement makes no reference to a need to prove any discriminatory intent in establishing the offence of outrages upon personal dignity. It speaks of human dignity as being the important value protected by the offence, but does not find that this imposes a requirement of a specific state of mind, discriminatory or otherwise.

26. As noted by the Trial Chamber and emphasised in the ICRC commentaries to the Geneva Conventions, the prohibition of outrages upon personal dignity is a category of the broader proscription of inhuman treatment in common Article 3.[68] The offence of inhuman treatment, punishable under Article 2(b) of the Statute as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions, was described in the Čelebići Judgement as constituting:

> ...an intentional act or omission, that is an act which, judged objectively, is deliberate and not accidental, which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity.[69]

That judgement also does not refer to discriminatory intention or motive.

27. In relation to the Trial Chamber's factual findings regarding mens rea in the present case, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber found that the Appellant deliberately participated in or accepted the acts which gave rise to his liability under Articles 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute for outrages upon personal dignity and was therefore guilty of these offences.[70] The Appeals Chamber should not, however, be understood as accepting the Trial Chamber's reasoning in relation to the mental element of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity, which is not always entirely clear, but is not the subject of this Appeal. In particular, the Appeals Chamber does not interpret the observation in the ICRC Commentary on the Additional Protocols, that the term "outrages upon personal dignity" refers to acts "aimed at humiliating and ridiculing" the victim,[71] as necessarily supporting a requirement of a specific intent on the part of a perpetrator to humiliate, ridicule or degrade the victims. The statement seems simply to describe the conduct which the provision seeks to prevent. The Trial Chamber's indication that the mens rea of the offence is the "intent to humiliate or ridicule" the victim[72] may therefore impose a requirement that the Prosecution was not obliged to prove and the Appeals Chamber does not, by rejecting this ground of appeal, endorse that particular conclusion.

C. Conclusion

28. For the above reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is not an element of offences under Article 3 of the Statute, nor of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity, that the perpetrator had a discriminatory intent or motive. It was accordingly unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to find that the Appellant had a discriminatory intent in concluding that he was guilty of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity.[73] This ground of appeal fails.

There is no specific reference in the ICRC Commentaries to the Geneva Conventions to the mental element required in relation to the offence of outrages upon personal dignity.

III. SECOND GROUND OF APPEAL OF THE APPELLANT: THE SERIOUSNESS OF THE VIOLATION AND THE DEFENCE OF NECESSITY

29. The Appellant's second ground of appeal appears in effect to consist of two grounds of appeal, namely, that the conduct proved, in particular the violence against the detainees, was not sufficiently grave as to warrant a conviction under Article 3 of the Statute, and, that the Appellant's conduct may have been justified by necessity.[74] The Appeals Chamber will deal with each of these in turn.

A. Seriousness

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) Appellant's Brief

30. The Appellant submits that "outrages upon personal dignity" as defined in Article 3 of the Statute only refers to particularly horrible acts.[75] He contends that the Trial Chamber itself raised the question as to whether the different forms of violence had been so grave as [73] This does not mean that evidence that an accused who had responsibility for detention conditions discriminated between detainees in the conditions and facilities provided would be irrelevant. If, because of deliberate discrimination between detainees, poor conditions of detention affect only one group or class of detainees, while other detainees enjoy adequate detention conditions, this is evidence which could contribute to a finding that the mens rea of the offence of outrages upon personal dignity is satisfied.

[74] T. 3.
[75] Appellant's Brief, para. 3.

to constitute offences recognised by the Statute of the Tribunal.[76] In his view, the intensity of the violence against prisoners at the Kaonik prison was not sufficient to establish criminal liability and no evidence was offered in support.[77]

(b) Prosecution's Response

31. The Prosecution submits that, to the extent that the Appellant claims that the Trial Chamber made a factual error in its assessment of the evidence of the requisite degree of suffering, his appeal should be dismissed for failure to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's factual conclusions were unreasonable.[78] Furthermore, the explicit findings of the Trial Chamber refute the Appellant's claim that the Aleksovski Judgement failed to indicate the requisite degree of intensity.[79] These explicit findings are numerous.

32. The Appellant did not reply on this issue.

(c) Oral submissions of the Appellant

33. During the oral hearing of 9 February 2000, the Bench put three questions to the Appellant. The first question, to which the Appellant responded in the affirmative, was whether the conduct for which the accused was convicted was not a serious violation of international humanitarian law as provided in Article 1 of the Statute.[80] The second question was whether this is a point that can be raised at this stage of the proceedings, seeing that it is essentially a point relating to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the Appellant responded that "[w]e are not challenging the jurisdiction of the Tribunal".[81] It was the Appellant's position that, assuming that the conviction was correct, the conduct was indeed serious enough to constitute violations of international humanitarian law.[82]

[81] T. 5.
[82] T. 5-6.

34. When the Bench put the third question to the Appellant regarding the various acts of which he was convicted, he responded that such conduct was indeed a violation of humanitarian law, but his position was that this conduct had not been proven.[83] The Appellant also stated that:

> We never claimed, nor gave any indication that such conduct, speaking in abstract terms, can be permissible and acceptable, on the contrary.[84]

2. Discussion

35. The Appellant's oral submission, set out above, seems to amount to an abandonment, perhaps only in part, of this ground of appeal. Further, in his written submission, the Appellant gave no reasons as to why these crimes were not serious – it was simply submitted that they were not. The Appeals Chamber will nevertheless consider whether the conduct on which the Trial Chamber convicted the Appellant was serious enough to constitute a violation of Article 3 of the Statute.

36. The Trial Chamber found beyond reasonable doubt that the Appellant was guilty of a number of acts falling under Article 3 of the Statute. These are as follows:

(a) Under Article 7(1) of the Statute, for aiding and abetting the physical and mental mistreatment of several detainees during body searches on 15 and 16 April 1993 in the Kaonik prison. The mistreatment included insults, searches accompanied by threats, sometimes of killing, thefts and assaults carried out in his presence.[85]

(b) Under Article 7(1) of the Statute, for ordering or instigating and aiding and abetting violence on Witnesses L and M. These witnesses were beaten regularly during their detention (sometimes four to six times a day, day and night), after the Appellant initially led the guards who beat them to their cell. The frequent beatings occasionally took place in the presence of the Appellant or otherwise near his office. In one instance, the Appellant ordered guards to continue beating them when they stopped. Witness M was at one point beaten with a "truncheon",[86] and in another instance, he fainted as a result of the beatings. In the words of the Trial Chamber, these witnesses were subjected to "recurring brutality".[87]

(c) Under Article 7(1) of the Statute, for aiding and abetting the mistreatment of detainees during their interrogation after the escape of a detainee.[88] One of the detainees, Witness H, the brother of the fugitive, was interrogated in the Appellant's office before he was taken back to his cell where he was beaten by three guards. Following the beating, the Appellant, escorted by the same three guards, came to Witness H's cell, asked the witness the same questions concerning the circumstances of his brother's escape, and left the cell when the witness failed to answer them. The three guards resumed the beating once the Appellant left the cell.[89] Another detainee, Witness E, was beaten with a truncheon; on another occasion, his nose was broken when a guard punched him while the Appellant nodded as a sign to continue the beating.[90] The Trial Chamber saw this as an isolated, but nevertheless "serious" incident.[91]

(d) Under Article 7(1) of the Statute, for aiding and abetting psychological abuse, such as nocturnal visits by soldiers demanding money and beating detainees, and the nocturnal playing of songs and screams of people being beaten over a loudspeaker.[92] The Trial Chamber found that this "clearly constituted serious psychological abuse of the detainees".[93]

(e) Under Article 7(1) of the Statute, for aiding and abetting the use of detainees as human shields in the villages of Skradno and Strane and for trench-digging in dangerous conditions.[94] In the case of the latter, the Appellant did not order his guards to deny entrance to HVO soldiers coming to get detainees for trench-digging purposes and he sometimes participated in the selection of detainees.[95]

(f) Under Article 7(3) of the Statute, as prison warden, for the crimes committed by guards inside the Kaonik prison.[96]

37. The Trial Chamber, in making the above findings, considered the context in which the psychological and physical violence occurred. The Trial Chamber held that it:

> ... categorically rejects the idea that the existence of such situations [the precariousness of the detainees' situation and the existence of an armed conflict] justifies recourse to force as described by the former Kaonik prison detainees. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber considers that the commission of violent offences against vulnerable, helpless persons or those placed in a situation of inferiority constitutes an aggravating circumstance which, in this case, excludes the excuse which might derive from a situation of conflict which had itself led to unrest.[97]

The Trial Chamber also held that:

> In sum, the violence inflicted on the Muslim detainees of Kaonik prison appears to be a reprehensible infringement of international human rights which would be absolutely unacceptable in times of peace. The Trial Chamber considers that the existence of an armed conflict does not render it tolerable and that it constitutes a grave violation of the principles of international humanitarian law arising from the Geneva Conventions.[98]

The Appeals Chamber, having considered the various acts for which the Appellant was convicted, can find no reason whatsoever to doubt the seriousness of these crimes. Under any circumstances, the outrages upon personal dignity that the victims in this instance suffered would be serious. The victims were not merely inconvenienced or made uncomfortable – what they had to endure, under the prevailing circumstances, were physical and psychological abuse and outrages that any human being would have experienced as such.

3. Conclusion

38. This ground of appeal fails.

B. Defence of necessity

1. Submissions of the Parties

(a) Appellant's Brief

39. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber noted that inside the Kaonik prison not a single prisoner suffered any injury as a result of the armed conflict and that only a guard who protected the facility was injured, whilst outside Kaonik, many people suffered serious physical injury and even lost their lives due to the armed hostilities.[99] However, the Trial Chamber's failure to comment on the contradiction in form, degree and intensity of violence is a misapplication of law.[100]

40. The Appellant submits that the criminal law concept of extreme necessity had to be applied to the facts.[101] This concept excludes the perpetrator's unlawful actions since such actions are motivated by the intent to avoid a worse violation.[102]

(b) Prosecution's Response

41. The Prosecution submits that it should not be required to respond to paragraph 8 of the Appellant's Brief because of its incomprehensibility.[103] Had it been intended as a separate ground of appeal, it should be rejected for failing to indicate, in accordance with Article 25 of the Statute, the alleged errors of law or fact the Appellant wishes to invoke.[104] On the presumption that the Appellant wants to rely on extreme necessity, or duress,[105] the argument should be rejected since the Appellant does not identify where in the trial record or pre-trial proceedings this defence was raised, nor does it identify why the Trial Chamber was in error by rejecting it.[106] The Appellant is not entitled to raise such defences for the first time on Appeal.[107] The Trial Chamber also took account of the difficult circumstances of armed conflict in its assessment of the poor prison conditions and in determining sentence.[108]

42. The Prosecution further submits that the injuries and loss of life that occurred outside the prison are irrelevant to the Appellant's liability for the crimes with which he was charged.[109] The Trial Chamber found the prevailing conditions of armed conflict constituted "aggravating circumstances", and rejected the Appellant's arguments for a comparison between the violence inflicted on the detainees at the Kaonik prison with the casualties arising from the ongoing armed conflict.[110]

(c) Appellant's Reply

43. The Appellant submits that the concept of extreme necessity (exceptio casu necessitatis) is familiar to civil law.[111] In civil law procedure, the court is authorised to apply the concept on its own in accordance with the principle iura novit curia.[112] The parties only have to prove the facts and their legal claims or opinions do not bind the court.[113] In this regard, the applicable facts proved by the Defence are that: (a) an armed conflict existed outside Kaonik prison in the Busova~a municipality; (b) there was a large number of civilian casualties in that armed conflict; (c) not one of the prisoners in Kaonik was wounded or killed apart from the prison guards; and (d) the Appellant did not participate in the decision-making regarding the imprisonment of Bosnian Muslims, as he was forced into a situation with no proper options.[114] These factual findings could be interpreted under the legal principle exceptio casu necessitatis.[115]

44. The Appellant further submits that extreme necessity is not the same as duress, since the former has a broader meaning and could be used to exclude the guilt, illegality or punishment of the perpetrator.[116] A provision similar to extreme necessity is found in Article 31(d) of the ICC Statute.[117] This concept, although absent from the Statute of the Tribunal, should be applied as a general principle of law from a national system, as provided for in Article 21(c) of the ICC Statute.[118]

(d) Appellant's Additional Submissions

45. The Appeals Chamber ordered the parties to file additional submissions on:

> (2) how the defence of "necessity" referred to in the Appeal of Zlatko Aleksovski was raised before the Trial Chamber and what evidence presented to the Trial Chamber relates to it.[119]

Only those arguments not raised in the Appellant's Brief and the Appellant's Reply will be mentioned here.

46. In the Appellant's Additional Submissions, it is pointed out that the Appellant did not emphasise this ground for excluding criminal responsibility at trial.[120] The reason is that this accords with the legal practice and rules of domestic legislation that is based on civil law where a court is bound only by the established facts of the case and is authorised and obliged to apply legal qualifications in line with the applicable law, in accordance with the Roman law maxims da mihi facta, dabo tibi ius and iura novit curia.[121]

47. At trial, the Appellant attempted to establish that by the time the Appellant became warden of Kaonik, he was faced with the fait accompli of interned civilians and a raging armed conflict in the region.[122] The Appellant attempted to protect the civilians from the greater harm outside the Kaonik facility by detaining them, proof of which was that none of the interned persons were killed or wounded.[123] On the basis of these facts, the Appellant submits that the defence of extreme necessity should have been applied.[124]

(e) Prosecution's Additional and Further Additional Submissions

48. The Prosecution made further submissions on the defence of necessity in the Prosecution's Additional Submissions and the Prosecution's Further Additional Submissions.

49. Apart from the submissions already made on this point, the Prosecution asserts that an electronic search of the transcripts of the proceedings before the Trial Chamber using the expression "extreme necessity" has yielded no result.[125] The final trial brief of the Appellant also makes no mention of the expression.[126] On the assumption that the Appellant actually refers to duress,[127] the search of the transcripts and final trial brief using "duress" has also yielded no results.[128] The Appellant never expressly raised the defence of "extreme necessity" or "duress" at trial.[129]

50. In response to the Appellant's factual assertions relating to the defence of necessity, the Prosecution's position is that: (a) the Appellant did not raise the defence at trial; (b) the facts as alleged by the Appellant on this issue were not accepted; (c) the same general facts were considered by the Trial Chamber in relation to the liability of the Appellant; (d) the evidence relied on was relevant to the Defence position at trial that the Appellant was not responsible for the unlawful detention of civilians; and (e) the Appellant's allegations refer to a basis of liability for which he was not found guilty.[130] In response to the Appellant's legal assertions, the Prosecution's position is: (a) the proposition that there is no obligation on an accused to raise a defence upon which it is relying, and that the obligation is upon the Trial Chamber to apply any possible defence, is not consistent with the practice of the Tribunal, is not directly applicable to the Tribunal and is not binding on the Tribunal; (b) even accepting the existence of this proposition in civil law systems, it is not uniformly accepted that the defence has no obligation to raise a defence available to him.[131] The Prosecution submits that the appeal should be dismissed because the facts relied upon do not raise the defence of necessity, and further, the facts invoked by the Appellant are related to allegations which are not before the Appeals Chamber.[132] Should the Prosecution's submission be accepted, consideration of the iura novit curia principle is moot.[133]

2. Discussion

51. The Appeals Chamber considers that, in general, accused before this Tribunal have to raise all possible defences, where necessary in the alternative, during the trial, and where so required under the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal ("Rules"), before trial.[134] It follows that accused, generally, cannot raise a defence for the first time on appeal.[135] This general obligation to raise all possible defences during trial stems from the Rules – in particular Rules 65*ter* and 67 - as well as the obligation upon accused to plead to the charges against them.[136] It is also important that the Prosecution should be allowed the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses testifying in support of any defence put forward and to call rebuttal witnesses, if necessary. The Appeals Chamber may also have some difficulty in properly assessing a Trial Chamber's judgement where the Defence failed to raise a defence expressly, despite evidence having been led that may support such a defence. However, all of this is not to say that the right of accused to be presumed innocent is in any way impaired or that the Prosecution does not bear the burden of proving its cases. In this Appeal, the Appeals Chamber will nevertheless consider the defence of necessity, as pleaded.

52. Assuming for the moment that necessity constitutes a valid defence and that the Appellant is entitled to raise it, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that this ground of appeal is entirely misplaced. The reasons for this conclusion are as follows.

53. During the oral submissions, the Appellant, in answer to a question from the Bench, indicated that the defence of necessity is raised only in relation to the Appellant's treatment of the detainees, not the fact of detention.[137] Having regard to the Trial Chamber's Judgement, the Appellant was neither convicted for having detained anyone[138] nor for having been the warden of the Kaonik prison. He was convicted of the mistreatment detainees suffered directly or indirectly at his hands or the hands of others over whom he had superior responsibility.

54. What the Appellant is in effect submitting is that the mistreatment the detainees suffered – not the fact of detention, with which he was not charged – should have been interpreted by the Trial Chamber as somehow having been justified by the assertion that they would have suffered even more had they not been treated the way they were while in detention. The Appellant does not and cannot argue, in the present case, that he was faced with only two options, namely, mistreating the detainees or freeing them. The Appellant, faced with the actual choice of mistreating the detainees or not, was convicted for choosing the former. This was intimated from the Bench when during the oral hearings on 9 February 2000, the counsel for the Appellant was asked:

> ...you said the accused chose a lesser evil, presumably as against the greater evil, but wouldn't it be open to him to have chosen no evil at all? Wouldn't that have been an option to him?[139]

55. In light of the misplaced basis of this aspect of the Appellant's appeal, the Appeals Chamber considers it unnecessary to dwell on whether necessity constitutes a defence under international law, whether it is the same as the defence of duress or whether the principle iura novit curia should be applied in this case.

3. Conclusion

56. This ground of appeal fails.

IV. THIRD GROUND OF APPEAL OF THE APPELLANT: FAILURE TO CORRECTLY APPLY THE STANDARD OF PROOF BEYOND REASONABLE DOUBT

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. Appellant's Brief

57. The Appellant submits that the Prosecutor has not proved beyond reasonable doubt the actus reus element of outrages upon personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute, and that, despite the absence of evidence in this regard, the Trial Chamber incorrectly convicted the Appellant on Count 10.[140] In particular, the Trial Chamber relied exclusively on the highly subjective testimony of witnesses, in the absence of objective medical documentation or a scientifically objective expert appraisal, to establish an objective element of the alleged crime, namely, that serious bodily harm or mental suffering occurred.[141] For example, the Trial Chamber rejected the testimony of Hamdo Dautovi}, despite the fact that this witness referred to the repeated occurrence of serious violence during the entire period of his stay at [140] Appellant's Brief, para. 5.

[141] Ibid., paras. 6 and 9.

the Kaonik prison.[142] The Trial Chamber was therefore aware of the unreliability and subjectivity of such testimony but did not consider this when evaluating the testimony of other witnesses.[143] This disadvantaged the Appellant and violated the standard of proof "beyond reasonable doubt".[144]

2. Prosecution's Response

58. The Prosecution submits that the Appellant raised the issue of reliance on mere witness testimony in the absence of medical or other scientifically objective evidence at trial, but that the argument was rejected in the Judgement where it was held that "the cumulative testimony was consistent enough and the number of witnesses sufficient, to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that acts of violence were committed".[145] The Appellant gives no reason why this finding is legally flawed and should therefore be dismissed.[146]

59. In addition, during the trial the Appellant admitted that many of the facts alleged by the Prosecution and confirmed by the witnesses had indeed taken place (for example, forced trench digging in dangerous circumstances during which some prisoners were killed; mistreatment by HVO soldiers outside the prison).[147] In relation to these admissions, the Appellant either disputed the legal characterisation of those facts or disputed that the Appellant played any culpable role in their commission.[148] In light of these admissions, the Appellant's arguments are misplaced, at least with respect to the events whose veracity was not disputed.[149]

60. In relation to facts not admitted, the Trial Chamber's factual and legal findings on events and facts are unassailable.[150] Unless the Rules or general international law provides otherwise, Trial Chambers are free to admit various types of evidence to determine whether or not a particular fact has been established beyond reasonable doubt.[151] Even a single credible witness may suffice: law does not require corroboration.[152]

61. With reference to the suggestion that the Trial Chamber should have discarded the testimony of witnesses other than Hamdo Dautovi} because of their unreliability and subjectivity, the Prosecution submits that it is the task of the trial Judges to determine whether one or all witnesses are reliable, whether their testimony is credible and whether further corroboration of a particular fact is required.[153] The findings indicate that the Trial Chamber correctly discharged its duties relating to the weighing of evidence.[154]

B. Discussion

62. Neither the Statute nor the Rules oblige a Trial Chamber to require medical reports or other scientific evidence as proof of a material fact. Similarly, the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not require, as a matter of law, any corroboration. The only Rule directly relevant to the issue at hand is Rule 89. In particular, sub-Rule 89(C) states that a Chamber "may admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value", and sub-Rule 89(D) states that a Chamber "may exclude evidence if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial".

63. Trial Chambers are best placed to hear, assess and weigh the evidence, including witness testimonies, presented at trial. Whether a Trial Chamber will rely on single witness testimony as proof of a material fact, will depend on various factors that have to be assessed in the circumstances of each case.[155] In a similar vein, it is for a Trial Chamber to consider whether a witness is reliable and whether evidence presented is credible. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, has to give a margin of deference to the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence presented at trial. The Appeals Chamber may overturn the Trial Chamber's finding of fact only where the evidence relied on could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal[156] or where the evaluation of the evidence is wholly erroneous.

64. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Appellant has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of the evidence. In the present case, the Trial Chamber's reliance on witness testimonies without medical reports or other scientific evidence as proof of the suffering experienced by witnesses, has not been shown to be either wrong as a matter of law, or unreasonable. Similarly, despite not having been presented with any specific reasons why the Trial Chamber should have rejected the testimony of more witnesses, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber did not err in the exercise of its discretion when it evaluated the testimony of the various witnesses. The Trial Chamber accepted such testimony as sufficient and credible, as it was entitled to do. The Trial Chamber, therefore, applied the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, in relation to this ground of appeal, correctly.

C. Conclusion

65. This ground of appeal fails.

[156] Ibid.

V. FOURTH GROUND OF APPEAL OF THE APPELLANT: THE TRIAL CHAMBER ERRED IN ITS APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 7(3) OF THE STATUTE TO THE FACTS IN THIS CASE

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. Appellant's Brief

66. Ground 4 of the Appellant's appeal alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in the application of Article 7(3) of the Statute. The Appellant accepts the interpretation of the Trial Chamber in respect of the constituent elements of criminal liability under Article 7(3).[157] But he does not accept the finding of the Trial Chamber that he had "factual authority over the guards".[158] In his view, for the application of Article 7(3), the existence [157] Appellant's Brief, para. 22. The three elements identified by the Trial Chamber in paragraph 69 of the Judgement correspond to the findings of the ^elebi}i Judgement.

[158] Appellant's Brief, paras. 15-16.

of authority to effectively control by giving binding orders and to sanction in cases of disobedience, must be established.[159] In respect of the prison guards, who were HVO military police, the Appellant submits that he did not have such authority, as his role was purely administrative and representative.[160] Further, he submits that he was a civilian prison warden, having no authority analogous to that of a military superior over the guards in the prison,[161] and that he only had power to inform the superiors of the guards of unlawful treatment, as a general duty for civilians under the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia Law on Criminal Procedure, but had no power to punish.[162] He asserts that, since he showed at the trial by exhibits that he reported various incidents involving the guards to the Military Police Command and the President of the Travnik Military Tribunal, he could not be held responsible for the incidents.[163]

2. Prosecution's Response

67. The Prosecution responds that the Appellant has failed to identify a legal error, as he is challenging the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship and arguing that de facto authority is not sufficient.[164] It submits that both matters were argued and adjudicated at trial, and that the Trial Chamber applied the law correctly to the evidence before it.

3. Appellant's Reply

68. The Appellant replies that he indeed challenges the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship, which is the first of three principles for command responsibility under Article 7(3). [165] He repeats that he was not formally appointed as prison warden by the authority that controlled the guards, i.e. the Ministry of Defence, but by the Ministry of Justice, and that he could not have de jure or de facto command over the guards. [166]

[159] Ibid., para. 16.

B. Discussion

69. Article 7(3) provides that:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

70. In its Judgement, the Trial Chamber found that "the evidence did not establish beyond any reasonable doubt that the accused himself was a member of the military police".[167] However, in its view, "anyone, including a civilian, may be held responsible pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute if it is proved that the individual had effective authority over the perpetrators of the crimes. This authority can be inferred from the accused's ability to give them orders and to punish them in the event of violations".[168] It went on to find that the Appellant had effective authority over the guards, as shown by his issuing orders to them and the availability to him of the means to report to superiors the situation in the prison, including incidents of mistreatment of prisoners.[169] The Trial Chamber found, however, that the Appellant failed to report to the superior authority the offences committed by the guards and HVO soldiers within the prison, and that he even joined in certain incidents of assault.[170]

71. The Appeals Chamber, on the basis of the submissions of the parties and the findings of the Trial Chamber, reaches the following conclusions regarding this ground of appeal.

[167] Judgement, para. 103.
[168] Ibid.
[169] Ibid., paras. 104 and 117.
[170] Ibid., para. 117.

72. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Appellant has agreed with the Trial Chamber in respect of the constituent elements of liability under Article 7(3).[171] Three elements have been identified by the Trial Chamber: 1) the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship; 2) the fact that the superior "knew or had reason to know that a crime was about to be committed or had been committed"; and 3) his obligation to take all the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish the perpetrators.[172]

73. The Appellant claims to appeal against the way in which the Trial Chamber applied the law to his case, but this ground of appeal in essence questions the inferences drawn from facts found by the Trial Chamber regarding his authority within the Kaonik prison. The Appeals Chamber therefore considers this ground to be factual in nature.

74. The Appellant disputes two facts found by the Trial Chamber. The first fact is that he had authority over the prison guards who were HVO military police, as demonstrated by his powers to issue orders to them, his generally elevated status within the Kaonik prison, and his right to report to the Military Police command and the Travnik Military Tribunal within whose jurisdiction the prison was placed. The second fact is that he failed to report the offences by his subordinates to either of the superior authorities. Both facts were found to be proved by the Trial Chamber after examining evidence and arguments specific to them. Like the Trial Chamber, the Appellant also construes the authority of a superior to mean that he has the power to order and to enforce his orders in certain ways.[173] The Appeals Chamber therefore takes the view that, unless there is good reason to believe that the Trial Chamber has drawn unreasonable inferences from the evidence, it is not open to the Appeals Chamber to disturb the factual conclusions of the Trial Chamber.[174] In this appeal, the Appellant has failed to convince this Chamber that unreasonable conclusions were drawn by the Trial Chamber in respect of the two facts.

[171] The Trial Chamber referred expressly to the Appellant's acceptance of the elements at first instance: ibid., para. 71.
[172] Ibid., para. 69.

75. The legal aspect of this ground of appeal consists of a single issue as to whether the Appellant was a commander of the guards, who were military police, for the purposes of Article 7(3) of the Statute.

76. Article 7(3) provides the legal criteria for command responsibility, thus giving the word "commander" a juridical meaning, in that the provision becomes applicable only where a superior with the required mental element failed to exercise his powers to prevent subordinates from committing offences or to punish them afterwards. This necessarily implies that a superior must have such powers prior to his failure to exercise them. If the facts of a case meet the criteria for the authority of a superior as laid down in Article 7(3), the legal finding would be that an accused is a superior within the meaning of that provision. In the instant appeal, the Appellant contends that, because he was appointed by the Ministry of Justice rather than the Ministry of Defence, he did not have such powers over the guards as a civilian prison warden,[175] whereas the Trial Chamber finds that he was the superior to the guards by reason of his powers over them.[176] The Appeals Chamber takes the view that it does not matter whether he was a civilian or military superior,[177] if it can be proved that, within the Kaonik prison, he had the powers to prevent or to punish in terms of Article 7(3). The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber has indeed found this to be proven, thus its finding that the Appellant was a superior within the meaning of Article 7(3).[178]

C. Conclusion

77. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the fourth ground of appeal of the Appellant must fail for lack of merit, for the following reasons: a) the facts disputed by the Appellant have all been argued and adjudicated at the trial, with no good cause having been shown on appeal to justify a re-examination of the factual findings of the Trial Chamber; and b) the Appellant does not challenge the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the elements of command responsibility, the application of which by the Trial Chamber has not been shown to be unreasonable.

VI. FIRST GROUND OF CROSS-APPEAL BY THE PROSECUTION: INTERNATIONALITY AND "PROTECTED PERSONS"

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. Cross-Appellant's Brief

78. The Prosecution argues that the majority of the Trial Chamber[179] applied the wrong legal test to determine whether, for the purposes of Article 2 of the Statute, the armed conflict in the present case was international in nature.[180] With regard to the question whether the acts of the HVO could be imputed to the Government of Croatia, the correct test under international law is the "overall control" test, as set forth in the Tadić Judgement; that Judgement does not require evidence of specific orders or directions in respect of individual operations.[181] The Prosecution further contends that the factual findings of the Trial Chamber below satisfy the requirements of the "overall control" test,[182] and therefore, that the only reasonable conclusion is that the armed forces of the Bosnian Croats, the HVO, were acting under the overall control of Croatia.[183]

79. The Prosecution also contends that the majority of the Trial Chamber erred in applying a strict nationality requirement to determine whether the victims were protected persons within the meaning of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.[184] In its view, if the Appeals Chamber finds that the Bosnian Croat captors acted as de facto organs of Croatia, it follows that the Bosnian Muslim detainees had a different nationality from the detaining

In this regard the majority of the Trial Chamber failed to consider six documents showing the presence of HV in BH and their support for the HVO (ibid., para. 2.47).
[183] Ibid., para. 2.50.
[184] Ibid., paras. 2.56 and 2.58.

power.[185] The Prosecution notes that in the Tadi} Judgement it was held that the primary purpose of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV is to ensure the safeguards afforded by the Convention to those civilians who do not enjoy the diplomatic protection, and correlatively are not subject to the allegiance and control of the State in whose hands they find themselves.[186] The Prosecution further notes that both the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, and the Trial Chamber in ^elebi}i held that ethnicity, rather than nationality, may be a more appropriate gauge of national allegiance in the context of modern armed conflicts.[187]

80. The Prosecution argues, therefore, that both requirements for the application of Article 2 of the Statute are met, and further that the criminal liability of the Appellant under Counts 8 and 9 (grave breaches) can be established on the basis of the record below, since these charges arise out of the same factual allegations as Count 10, on which the Appellant was convicted.[188]

2. Appellant's Response

81. The Appellant requests that the Appeals Chamber reject this ground of appeal.[189] The Appellant contends that in the present case, the evidence showed without any doubt that the Appellant and the alleged victims were citizens of B H.[190] The ^elebi}i Judgement is inapplicable because in the present case the Bosnian Croats did not secede, like the Bosnian Serbs, but rather, they voluntarily joined the Bosnian Muslims in forming BH and actively supported the creation and preservation of that entity.[191] The Appellant argues that the attitude of the Prosecution towards Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, that the Article should not be interpreted on formal bonds and purely legal relations, is inapplicable. Article 4 of the Geneva Conventions must therefore be strictly applied, in accordance with the principle of legality or nullem crimen sine lege.[192]

[190] Ibid., p. 5.
[192] Ibid., pp. 5, 6 and 13.

82. With regard to the argument that the conflict was international in nature, the Appellant contends that there are four reasons why this should be rejected, namely: (a) any Croatian intervention took place in 1992 and was against the Serbian forces, not in the first half of 1993 against Bosnian Muslims;[193] (b) Croatia did not control the Bosnian Croat military forces in Central Bosnia;[194] (c) Croatia did not intervene militarily in Central Bosnia where the alleged violations took place and did not control the HVO military forces;[195] and (d) the conflict must be deemed internal to avoid unequal application of Article 2 as between Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims.[196] The Appellant further argues that the International Court of Justice's ("ICJ") decision in the Nicaragua case[197] can be distinguished from the present case,[198] and that it set forth a stricter test for imputing acts to a State in relation to civil, not criminal liability, than that of the "overall control" test.[199] He further argues that, as these are criminal proceedings, the applicable test should be even more stringent.[200] In his view, if there was intervention by Croatia during the critical period (although, he argues, there is no evidence to support this), it was justified and should not be held to internationalise the conflict.[201] He asserts that there was no state of war between Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina,[202] that under Article 4(2) of Geneva Convention IV, Croatia and BH were co-belligerents, that they had normal diplomatic relations, and that, therefore, the victims were not protected persons.[203]

83. The Appellant also contends that the Trial Chamber did not err in omitting to apply the "overall control" test established in the Tadi} Judgement, as the Tadi} Judgement dealt with completely different factual and legal circumstances and was delivered after the Trial Chamber rendered judgement in this case.[204]

3. Cross-Appellant's Reply

84. The Prosecution argues in reply that the Tadi} Judgement establishes a precedent which should not be departed from unless the Appeals Chamber concludes that it was clearly erroneous.[205] The Appellant's arguments regarding a lack of evidence of Croatia's intervention and justifications for it are refuted.[206] The Prosecution furthermore argues that the Appeals Chamber's findings in Tadi} as to protected person status should be followed. The Prosecution contends that such an approach would not be inconsistent with principles of international criminal law, such as the principle of nullum crimen sine lege.[207]

4. Prosecution's Additional Submissions

85. The Appeals Chamber ordered the parties to file additional submissions on "[...] the doctrine of stare decisis, its applicability, if at all, to proceedings before the International Tribunal and in particular to this case [...]".[208]

86. The Prosecution submits that the doctrine, as such, exists in common law systems and is not a general principle of law.[209] The Prosecution argues that the term "precedent" is preferable to "stare decisis".[210] The use of precedents is common to courts in both common and civil law systems.[211] The Prosecution refers to its Cross-Appellant's Reply where its submissions are set out on the applicability of the Tadi} Judgement as to (a) the proper test to determine the existence of an international armed conflict and (b) the interpretation of the nationality requirement for civilians under Geneva Convention IV to be considered protected persons.[212]

[212] Ibid., paras. 5-7.

5. Appellant's Additional Submissions

87. In the Appellant's Additional Submissions on the doctrine of stare decisis, he asserts that the application of the doctrine relates to the issue of the sources of law, rather than differences between civil and common law systems.[213] He submits that only international humanitarian law which is beyond any doubt part of customary law can be applied by the International Tribunal, and points to the Report of the Secretary-General, which makes no mention of precedent as a source of law.[214] The Appellant asserts that the judgements of the ICJ are only valid for the case under consideration, and that its Statute does not refer to precedents as a source of law.[215] Reference is also made to Article 21 of the ICC Statute, which prioritises the legal sources to which recourse may be had, and according to which the ICC may only apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its previous decisions as a last resort.[216] The ICC Statute further explicitly prohibits the use of analogy in defining a crime.[217] The Appellant asserts that precedent represents an individual legal norm that resolves a particular case and is valid only for that case.[218] He notes that, while in some common law systems judgements are used as sources of law, in that the legal principle applied in a particular case is deemed compulsory for all future cases thereby becoming a general legal norm, neither the courts of the former Yugoslavia nor its successor States apply a system of precedents, as it runs counter to the principle of legality.[219]

88. The Appellant contends that, in a functional sense, judicial practice may only be applied as something akin to a legal source where the facts are identical or very similar.[220] The Appellant submits that, while the doctrine of stare decisis should not be excluded, it should only be applied on a restrictive basis, and that, as a prerequisite to applying a precedent, the similarity of the facts of the case must be established.[221] The Appellant asserts that the armed conflict between Serbian and Muslim ethnic groups in Bosnia and

Herzegovina was basically different from that between the Croatian and Muslim ethnic groups.[222] All the other armed conflicts from 1992 to 1994 in Bosnia and Herzegovina were not identical or even similar by their general or internal features.[223] Since the facts of the present case are basically different from that of Tadi}, the Appellant asserts that the doctrine of stare decisis is not applicable in the present case.[224]

B. Discussion

89. The arguments advanced by the parties in this appeal raise directly the question whether decisions of the Appeals Chamber are binding on itself, and also indirectly, whether its decisions are binding on Trial Chambers and whether decisions of Trial Chambers are binding on each other.

90. The Prosecution contends that some of the arguments advanced by the Appellant can only be upheld if the Chamber does not follow its previous decisions, since those arguments are, in the Prosecution's submission, plainly inconsistent with those decisions.

91. The Appeals Chamber will now consider these questions.

1. Whether the Appeals Chamber is bound to follow its previous decisions

92. Traditionally common law jurisdictions have recognised the principle of stare decisis, or binding precedent, by which courts are bound by their previous decisions. However, in 1966, the House of Lords (the United Kingdom's highest court) decided that, while it would continue to treat previous decisions as "normally binding," it would "depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so."[225] The trend which emerges from an examination of common law jurisdictions is that their highest courts will normally consider themselves bound by their previous decisions, but reserve the right to depart from them in certain circumstances. The House of Lords puts the matter this way:

[225] The practice statement was read by Lord Gardiner LC, on behalf of himself and the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, before judgements were delivered on 26 July 1966. See Cross and Harris, Precedent in English Law (1991), p.104, n. 27.

> Nothing could be more undesirable, in fact, than to permit litigants, after a decision has been given by this House with all appearance of finality, to return to this House in the hope that a differently constituted committee might be persuaded to take the view which its predecessors rejected ... [D]oubtful issues have to be resolved and the law knows no better way of resolving them than by the considered majority opinion of the ultimate tribunal. It requires much more than doubts as to the correctness of such opinion to justify departing from it.[226]

The High Court of Australia (Australia's highest court) has similarly observed:

> No justice is entitled to ignore the decisions and reasoning of his predecessors, and to arrive at his own judgment as though the pages of the law reports were blank, or as though the authority of a decision did not survive beyond the rising of the court. A justice, unlike a legislator, cannot introduce a programme of reform which sets at nought decisions formerly made and principles formerly established. It is only after the most careful and respectful consideration of the earlier decision, and after giving due weight to all the circumstances, that a justice may give effect to his own opinions in preference to an earlier decision of the court.[227]

The United States Supreme Court (the highest court of the United States of America) has said:

> The obligation to follow precedent begins with necessity, and a contrary necessity marks its outer limit ... [W]e recognise that no judicial system could do society's work if it eyed each issue afresh in every case that raised it. Indeed the very concept of the rule of law underlying our own Constitution requires such continuity over time that a respect for precedent is, by definition, indispensable. At the other extreme, a different necessity would make itself felt if a prior judicial ruling should come to be seen so clearly as error that its enforcement was for that very reason doomed.[228]

In the same way that other common-law legal systems have limited the strict application of the doctrine of stare decisis, the United States Supreme Court does not view it as an "inexorable command."[229] Indeed, the Court recently delineated the following circumstances in which it would depart from a precedent:

(i) where a rule of law has proved unworkable in practice;

(ii) where related principles of law have so far developed as to have left the old rule "no more than a remnant of abandoned doctrine"; and

(iii) where facts, or the perception thereof, have changed so as "to have robbed the old rule of significant justification or application."[230]

93. Although, in general, civil law jurisdictions do not recognise the principle of stare decisis or binding precedent, as a matter of practice, their highest courts will generally follow their previous decisions. For example, one commentator has said of the French legal system:

> Despite the absence of a formal doctrine of stare decisis, there is a strong tendency on the part of the French courts, like those of other countries, to follow precedents, especially those of the higher courts ... The Cour de Cassation can, of course, always overrule its own prior decisions. But it is equally certain that it will not do so without weighty reasons ... The attitude of the lower courts toward decisions of the Cour de Cassation is in substance quite similar to that of lower courts in common law jurisdictions towards decisions of superior courts.[231]

94. Similarly, in the Italian legal system, "even though the decisions of the [Supreme Court of Cassation] are not 'binding' in theory, few judges would knowingly adopt a different interpretation ... [T]he fact is that courts do not act very differently toward reported decisions... in Italy than they do in the United States."[232]

95. While the doctrine of precedent does not operate formally in the European Court of Human Rights system, "as a matter of general practice and practical necessity, the Commission regards the Court's binding judgments as the final authority on the interpretation of the Convention."[233] In the Cossey Case,[234] the Court noted that, although not strictly bound, it would normally follow its previous decisions and would only depart from them if there were "cogent reasons" for doing so:

> It is true that ... the Court is not bound by its previous judgments ... However, it usually follows and applies its own precedents, such a course being in the interests of legal certainty and the orderly development of the Convention case-law. Nevertheless, this would not prevent the Court from departing from an earlier decision if it was > persuaded that there were cogent reasons for doing so. Such a departure might, for example, be warranted in order to ensure that the interpretation of the Convention reflects societal changes and remains in line with present-day conditions.[235]

96. Despite the non-operation of the principle of stare decisis in relation to the International Court of Justice, its previous decisions are accorded considerable weight. This may be due to their perceived status as authoritative expressions of the law. As Judge Zori~i} stated in his Dissenting Opinion in the Peace Treaties case, while "it is quite true that no international court is bound by precedents ... there is something which this Court is bound to take into account, namely the principles of international law. If a precedent is firmly based on such a principle, the Court cannot decide an analogous case in a contrary sense, so long as the principle retains its value."[236] This is confirmed by Judge Mohamed Shahabuddeen, who offers the view that "there is an acceptable sense in which, subject to a power to depart, decisions of the Court may be regarded as authoritative."[237]

97. The Appeals Chamber recognises that the principles which underpin the general trend in both the common law and civil law systems, whereby the highest courts, whether as a matter of doctrine or of practice, will normally follow their previous decisions and will only depart from them in exceptional circumstances, are the need for consistency, certainty and predictability. This trend is also apparent in international tribunals. Judge Shahabuddeen observes:

> The desiderata of consistency, stability and predictability, which underlie a responsible legal system, suggest that the Court would not exercise its power to depart from a previous decision except with circumspection... The Court accordingly pursues a judicial policy of not unnecessarily impairing the authority of its decisions.[238]

The Appeals Chamber also acknowledges that that need is particularly great in the administration of criminal law, where the liberty of the individual is implicated.

98. References to the law and practice in various countries and in international institutions are not necessarily determinative of the question as to the applicable law in this matter. Ultimately, that question must be answered by an examination of the Tribunal's Statute and Rules, and a construction of them which gives due weight to the principles of interpretation (good faith, textuality, contextuality, and teleology) set out in the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.[239]

99. There is no provision in the Statute of the Tribunal that deals expressly with the question of the binding force of decisions of the Appeals Chamber. The absence of such a provision, however, does not mean that the Statute is of no assistance in this matter. Article 25 of the Statute provides as follows:

> 1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:
>
> (a) an error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or
>
> (b) an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.
>
> 2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers.

100. The importance of the right of appeal is emphasised in the Report of the Secretary-General as follows:

> The Secretary General is of the view that the right of appeal should be provided for under the Statute. Such a right is a fundamental element of individual civil and political rights and has, inter alia, been incorporated in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. For this reason, the Secretary-General has proposed that there should be an Appeals Chamber.[240]

The significance of this right is highlighted by the fact that there was no such right in the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials.[241]

101. The fundamental purpose of the Tribunal is the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law.[242] The Appeals Chamber considers that this purpose is best served by an approach which, while recognising the need for certainty, stability and predictability in criminal law, also recognises that there may be instances in which the strict, absolute application of that principle may lead to injustice.

102. The principle of the continuity of judicial decisions must be balanced by a residual principle that ensures that justice is done in all cases. Judge Tanaka in his Separate Opinion in the Barcelona Traction (Preliminary Objections) case[243] addressed the need for this balance between certainty and justice:

> I am well aware that some consideration should be given to the existence of precedents in regard to a case which the Court is called upon to decide. Respect for precedents and maintenance of the continuity of jurisprudence are without the slightest doubt highly desirable from the viewpoint of the certainty of law which is equally required in international law and in municipal law. The same kind of cases must be decided in the same way and possibly by the same reasoning. This limitation is inherent in the judicial activities as distinct from purely academic activities.
> On the other hand, the requirement of the consistency of jurisprudence is never absolute. It cannot be maintained at the sacrifice of the requirements of justice and reason. The Court should not hesitate to overrule the precedents and should not be too preoccupied with the authority of its past decisions. The formal authority of the Court's decision must not be maintained to the detriment of its substantive authority. Therefore, it is quite inevitable that, from the point of view of the conclusion or reasoning, the minority in one case should become the majority in another case of the same kind within a comparatively short space of time.[244]

103. Rosenne also speaks of the relative character of the requirement of consistency of jurisprudence:

> Corresponding to this is the care evinced by the Court not formally to overrule earlier decisions, but rather, where necessary, to try to explain away, usually on the ground of some factual particularity, an earlier decision which it feels unable to follow. The attitudes adopted in 1961 and 1964 in the Temple of Preah Vihear and the Barcelona Traction cases towards the 1959 decision in the Aerial Incident case are illustrative of this process, and of the relative character of the requirement of consistency of jurisprudence (which is probably the guiding element in this aspect of the Court's work).[245]

104. The right of appeal is a component of the fair trial requirement[246] set out in Article 14 of the ICCPR, and Article 21(4) of the Statute. The right to a fair trial is, of course, a requirement of customary international law.[247]

105. An aspect of the fair trial requirement is the right of an accused to have like cases treated alike, so that in general, the same cases will be treated in the same way and decided as Judge Tanaka said, "possibly by the same reasoning."[248]

106. The right to a fair trial requires and ensures the correction of errors made at trial. At the hearing of an appeal, the principle of fairness is the ultimate corrective of errors of law and fact, but it is also a continuing requirement in any appeal in which a previous decision of an appellate body is being considered.

107. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, concludes that a proper construction of the Statute, taking due account of its text and purpose, yields the conclusion that in the interests of certainty and predictability, the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous decisions, but should be free to depart from them for cogent reasons in the interests of justice.

108. Instances of situations where cogent reasons in the interests of justice require a departure from a previous decision include cases where the previous decision has been decided on the basis of a wrong legal principle or cases where a previous decision has been given per incuriam, that is a judicial decision that has been "wrongly decided, usually because the judge or judges were ill-informed about the applicable law."[249]

109. It is necessary to stress that the normal rule is that previous decisions are to be followed, and departure from them is the exception. The Appeals Chamber will only depart from a previous decision after the most careful consideration has been given to it, both as to the law, including the authorities cited, and the facts.

110. What is followed in previous decisions is the legal principle (ratio decidendi), and the obligation to follow that principle only applies in similar cases, or substantially similar cases. This means less that the facts are similar or substantially similar, than that the question raised by the facts in the subsequent case is the same as the question decided by the legal principle in the previous decision. There is no obligation to follow previous decisions which may be distinguished for one reason or another from the case before the court.

111. Where, in a case before it, the Appeals Chamber is faced with previous decisions that are conflicting, it is obliged to determine which decision it will follow, or whether to depart from both decisions for cogent reasons in the interests of justice.

2. Whether the Decisions of the Appeals Chamber are Binding on Trial Chambers

112. Generally, in common law jurisdictions, decisions of a higher court are binding on lower courts. In civil law jurisdictions there is no doctrine of binding precedent. However, as a matter of practice, lower courts tend to follow decisions of higher courts. As one commentator has stated:

> ... it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the doctrine of stare decisis in the Common Law and the practice of Continental courts generally lead to the same results... In fact, when a judge can find in one or more decisions of a supreme court a rule which seems to him relevant for the decision in the case before him, he will follow those decisions and the rules they contain as much in Germany as in England or France.[250]

113. The Appeals Chamber considers that a proper construction of the Statute requires that the ratio decidendi of its decisions is binding on Trial Chambers for the following reasons:

(i) the Statute establishes a hierarchical structure in which the Appeals Chamber is given the function of settling definitively certain questions of law and fact arising from decisions of the Trial Chambers. Under Article 25, the Appeals Chamber hears an appeal on the ground of an error on a question of law invalidating a Trial Chamber's decision or on the ground of an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice, and its decisions are final;

(ii) the fundamental mandate of the Tribunal to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law cannot be achieved if the accused and the Prosecution do not have the assurance of certainty and predictability in the application of the applicable law; and

(iii) the right of appeal is, as the Chamber has stated before,[251] a component of the fair trial requirement, which is itself a rule of customary international law and gives rise to the right of the accused to have like cases treated alike. This will not be achieved if each Trial Chamber is free to disregard decisions of law made by the Appeals Chamber, and to decide the law as it sees fit. In such a system, it would be possible to have four statements of the law from the Tribunal on a single legal issue - one from the Appeals Chamber and one from each of the three Trial Chambers, as though the Security Council had established not a single, but four, tribunals. This would be inconsistent with the intention of the Security Council, which, from a plain reading of the Statute and the Report of the Secretary-General, envisaged a tribunal comprising three trial chambers and one appeals chamber, applying a single, unified, coherent and rational corpus of law. The need for coherence is particularly acute in the context in which the Tribunal operates, where the norms of international humanitarian law and international criminal law are developing, and where, therefore, the need for those appearing before the Tribunal, the accused and the Prosecution, to be certain of the regime in which cases are tried is even more pronounced.

3. Whether the Decisions of the Trial Chambers are Binding on Each Other

114. The Appeals Chamber considers that decisions of Trial Chambers, which are bodies with coordinate jurisdiction, have no binding force on each other, although a Trial Chamber is free to follow the decision of another Trial Chamber if it finds that decision persuasive.

[251] See para. 104, supra.

115. The Appeals Chamber will now turn to consider the question raised by the Prosecution's first ground of appeal.

4. The Ground of Appeal

116. The Prosecution's first ground of appeal is that the Trial Chamber erred in deciding that Article 2 of the Statute was inapplicable because it had not been established that the Bosnian Muslims held at the Kaonik prison compound between January and the end of May 1993 were protected persons within the meaning of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.[252]

117. This ground of appeal raises two substantial issues, both relating to the criteria for the applicability of Article 2 of the Statute. The first issue is the test for determining the internationality of an armed conflict and the second is the test for determining the status of the victims as protected persons under Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV.

118. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber applied the wrong criteria for determining these issues, and that, had the correct tests been applied, the accused would have been convicted. Consequently, it seeks a reversal of the verdict of acquittal on Counts 8 and 9 of the Indictment.

119. The Appeals Chamber will address (a) the criteria for determining the international character of the armed conflict, (b) the criteria for determining whether the Bosnian Muslim victims were protected persons under Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, and (c) the question of the reversal of the acquittal on Counts 8 and 9.

(a) The Criteria for Determining the International Character of the Armed Conflict

120. It is the contention of the Prosecution that the correct criterion for determining the nature of an armed conflict is the "overall control" test, enunciated by this Chamber in the Tadić Judgement. The Prosecution argues that, had that test been applied, the Trial Chamber would have concluded that the acts of the HVO, were attributable to Croatia. Instead, the Trial Chamber "incorrectly decided that the Prosecution needed to demonstrate that Croatia had given a specific mandate or specific instructions to the Bosnian Croats with respect to the conflict in the La{va Valley area."[253] Specifically, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber "did not adopt an appropriate framework when it set out to examine whether certain Bosnian Croat individuals and organisations, who, while not being official agents of the Croatian Government, received from the latter 'some power or assignment to perform acts on its behalf such that they become de facto agents'".[254] This test, the Prosecution says, is in effect, a "special instructions" test, as distinct from the "overall control" test.

121. The examination of this ground of appeal as argued by the Prosecution requires that the following issues be considered:

(i) What is the applicable law on this issue?

(ii) If the "overall control" test is the applicable law, did the Trial Chamber fail to apply it?

(i) What is the applicable law on this issue?

122. The Prosecution contends that the applicable criterion for determining the internationality of the conflict is the "overall control" test, as set out by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Judgement. The following paragraph from the Tadi} Judgement is cited by the Prosecution in support of that contention:

> As the Appeals Chamber has already pointed out, international law does not require that the particular acts in question should be the subject of specific instructions or directives by a foreign State to certain armed forces in order for these armed forces to be held to be acting as de facto organs of that State. It follows that in the circumstances of the case it was not necessary to show that those specific operations carried out by the Bosnian Serb forces which were the object of the trial (the attacks on Kozarac and more generally within op{tina Prijedor) had been specifically ordered or planned by the Yugoslav Army. It is sufficient to show that this Army exercised overall control over the Bosnian Serb Forces. This showing has been made by the Prosecution before the Trial Chamber. Such control manifested itself not only in financial, logistical and other assistance and support, but also, and more importantly, in terms of participation in the general direction, coordination and supervision of the activities and operations of the [252] Cross-Appellant's Brief, para. 2.4.

[253] Ibid., para. 2.17.
[254] Ibid., para. 2.18.

> VRS. This sort of control is sufficient for the purposes of the legal criteria required by international law.[255]

The Prosecution submits that the Appeals Chamber should not depart from its previous decision in Tadi} unless it decides that decision was clearly erroneous and cannot stand.[256]

123. The Defence, on the other hand, makes a general case against the application by the Tribunal of the doctrine of stare decisis, but concludes that, if it is to be applied, it "can be only exceptionally applied in the procedure before ICC [sic] and only after all priority legal sources have failed to direct to the decision with respect to the specific factual and legal question."[257] In particular, the Defence stresses that if the doctrine of stare decisis is to be applied by the Tribunal, it can only be applied in circumstances where the factual situations are the same or substantially similar.[258] The Defence contends that in the instant case, since "the armed conflict between Serbian and Muslim ethnicities in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina was basically different from the armed conflict between the Croatian and Muslim ethnicities",[259] the principle is inapplicable here. The Defence further argues that the doctrine of stare decisis or binding precedent is inconsistent with the principle of legality, or nullem crimen sine lege.[260]

124. The Appeals Chamber will now address the arguments advanced by the Defence.

125. The argument that the principle of stare decisis is only to be applied in circumstances where the facts are the same, is unmeritorious. As explained earlier in this Judgement,[261] what is followed in relation to a previous decision is the legal principle that it establishes, and the obligation to follow it only arises where, on the facts, the question settled by that principle is the same as the question that is raised by the facts of the subsequent case. Thus, it is irrelevant that the Tadi} Judgement dealt with an armed conflict between the Serbian and Muslim groups in Bosnia and Herzegovina, while the present case dealt with an armed conflict between the Croatian and Muslim groups. What is important is whether, in the subsequent case, the legal principle enunciated in the Tadi} Judgement as to

"overall control" may be applied in relation to the conflict between the Bosnian Croats and the Bosnian Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In the Tadi} Judgement, that legal principle was derived from a factual situation in which there was a question of the level of control by a State (the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)) or entity (the Yugoslav Peoples's Army, "JNA") over a military group (the Army of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina/Republika Srpska, "VRS") that was involved in an armed conflict that was prima facie internal. The same question arises from the facts of the instant case, that is, the level of control by a State or entity (Croatia or the Army of the Republic of Croatia, "HV") over a military group (the HVO) that was engaged in an armed conflict that was prima facie internal. It is, therefore, perfectly proper in the instant case to recall and rely upon the legal principle enunciated in the Tadi} Judgement.

126. The Defence argument on the principle of legality or nullum crimen sine lege, is based on a misunderstanding of that principle. The Appeals Chamber understands the Defence to be saying that reliance cannot be placed on a previous decision as a statement of the law, since that decision would necessarily have been made after the commission of the crimes, and for that reason would not meet the requirements of the principle of legality. There is nothing in that principle that prohibits the interpretation of the law through decisions of a court and the reliance on those decisions in subsequent cases in appropriate circumstances. The principle of legality is reflected in Article 15 of the ICCPR.[262] What this principle requires is that a person may only be found guilty of a crime in respect of acts which constituted a violation of the law at the time of their commission. In the instant case, the acts in respect of which the accused was indicted, all constituted crimes under international law at the time of their commission. Inhuman treatment and wilfully causing grave suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2 of the Statute were violations of the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions, and outrages against personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute constituted a violation of the laws or customs of war, at the time of the commission of the crimes.

127. There is, therefore, no breach of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege. That principle does not prevent a court, either at the national or international level, from determining an issue through a process of interpretation and clarification as to the elements of a particular crime; nor does it prevent a court from relying on previous decisions which reflect an interpretation as to the meaning to be ascribed to particular ingredients of a crime.

128. The Appeals Chamber now turns to a consideration of the Tadi} Judgement in order to determine whether it should be followed, applying the principle set out in paragraph 107, supra, that a previous decision of the Chamber should be followed unless there are cogent reasons in the interests of justice for departing from it.

[262] Article 15 of the ICCPR states in relevant part: "No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed."

129. The Tadi} Judgement was concerned, inter alia, with the legal criteria for determining the circumstances in which the acts of a military group could be attributed to a State, such that the group could be treated as a de facto organ of that State, thereby internationalising a prima facie internal armed conflict in which it is involved.

130. The Trial Chamber in Tadi} applied the "effective control" test enunciated by the ICJ Nicaragua, and interpreted it as requiring evidence of specific instructions.[263] The Appeals Chamber in Tadi} advanced two grounds on which the "effective control" test was not persuasive and should not be followed.

131. Broadly, the first basis identified by the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} for not following the effective control test in the Nicaragua case in the case of "individuals making up an organised and hierarchically structured group, such as a military unit or, in case of war or civil strife, armed bands of irregulars or rebels,"[264] is that, "normally a member of the group does not act on his own but conforms to the standards prevailing in the group and is subject to the authority of the head of the group."[265]

132. Consequently, in the view of the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, once it is established that the group is under the "overall control" of a State, the responsibility of the State is engaged for the group's activities, irrespective of whether specific instructions were given by the State to members of the group.

133. The second ground on which the Tadi} Appeals Chamber found the Nicaragua test unpersuasive is that it was at variance with judicial and state practice. The Tadi} Judgement cites a number of cases from claims tribunals, national, regional and international courts, in which acts of groups were attributed to particular countries without any inquiry being made as to whether specific instructions had been issued by that country to members of the group.[266]

134. Applying the principle enunciated in paragraph 107 of this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber will follow its decision in the Tadi} Judgement, since, after careful analysis, it is unable to find any cogent reason to depart from it. Certainly the Appeals Chamber is unable to say that it was arrived at on the basis of the application of a wrong legal principle or arrived at per incuriam. The "overall control" test, set out in the Tadi} Judgement is the applicable law.

135. The Appellant argues that the Tadi} Judgement should not be relied on by this Chamber because it had not yet been delivered when the Aleksovski Judgement was rendered.[267] This argument is based on a misconception. The Appeals Chamber wishes to clarify that when it interprets Article 2 of the Statute, it is merely identifying what the proper interpretation of that provision has always been, even though not previously expressed that way.

136. The Appeals Chamber will now proceed to an examination of the Aleksovski Judgement, in order to ascertain what test was applied.

(ii) If the "overall control" test is the applicable law, did the Trial Chamber fail to apply it?

137. In the Aleksovski case, the question was whether the HVO forces, while not being official agents of the Croatian government, could be said to be acting as de facto agents of the Croatian State. In seeking to answer this question, the Majority Opinion made the following reference to the decision of the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision:

> The Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Interlocutory Decision did not specify the requisite degree of intervention by a foreign State in the territory of another State to internationalise an armed conflict. However, it did provide some guidance on the matter by indicating that the clashes between the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Bosnian Serb forces should be considered as internal, unless a "direct involvement" of the JNA could be proved, in which case the conflict should be considered to be an international one.[268]

Further indication of the majority's reasoning is garnered from the following paragraph:

[267] Appellant's Response, paras. 5 and 10. The Tadi} Judgement was delivered on 15 July 1999, approximately three weeks after the Judgement in Aleksovski had been issued, on 25 June 1999.

> A State can act in international law directly through governmental authorities and officials, or indirectly through individuals or organisations who, while not being official agents of the government, receive from it some power or assignment to perform acts on its behalf such that they become de facto agents.[269]

138. The phrase "receive from it some power or assignment to perform acts on its behalf such that they become de facto agents," does, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, indicate that the position of the majority was that some kind of instruction was required in order for the requisite relationship between the Bosnian Croats and the Croatian State to be established. This is what the Prosecution refers to as the "specific instructions" test.

139. The Majority Opinion then referred to the ICJ decision in Nicaragua in this way:

> According to the International Court of Justice ("the ICJ"), where the relationship of a rebel force to a foreign State is one of such dependence on the one side and control on the other that it would be appropriate to equate the rebel force, for legal purposes, with an organ of that State, or as acting on behalf of that State, then in such a case the conflict can be seen to be an international one, even if it is prima facie internal and there is no direct involvement of the armed forces of the State.[270]

It made further reference to the reliance placed by the majority Judgement of Judge Stephen and Judge Vohrah in the Tadi} case (first instance), "on the high standard expounded by the ICJ in the Nicaragua case in the sense that the international responsibility of a State can arise only if control is exercised ("directed and enforced") with respect to specific military or paramilitary operations."[271]

140. In dealing with the relationship between the HV and HVO forces, the majority commented on a particular aspect of the evidence of the expert witness:

> The expert witness presented an order from the HVO (not the HV) – this distinction is very important – to their soldiers to remove the HV insignias (November – December 1992) because of potential problems to Croatia. While there is a document dated May 1993 which allowed the transfer/promotion of soldiers from the HVO to the HV, this does not in itself prove the dependency of the HVO on the HV.[272]

[270] Majority Opinion, para. 11 (footnotes omitted).
[271] Ibid., para. 12 (footnotes omitted).
[272] Ibid., para. 23 (footnotes omitted).

141. The Appeals Chamber makes two observations about this paragraph. First, the fact that the Majority Opinion goes out of its way to mention that the order came from the HVO, and not the HV, and that the distinction was very important, highlights the weight the Trial Chamber attached to an order or instruction of the controlling State as a prerequisite for the attribution of acts of members of a military group to a State. Secondly, to the extent that the Majority Opinion uses dependency as a criterion, it is not consistent with the decision in the Tadi} Judgement.

142. Significantly, the Majority Opinion concludes by finding that "the Prosecution failed to discharge its burden of proving that, during the time-period and in the place of the indictment, the HVO was in fact acting under the overall control of the HV in carrying out the armed conflict against Bosnia and Herzegovina."[273]

143. The Appeals Chamber finds that, notwithstanding the express reference to "overall control", the Aleksovski Judgement did not in fact apply the test of overall control. Instead, the passages cited show that the majority gave prominence to the need for specific instructions or orders as a prerequisite for attributing the acts of the HVO to the State of Croatia, a showing that is not required under the test of overall control.

144. The test set forth in the Tadi} Judgement of "overall control" and what is required to meet it constitutes a different standard from the "specific instructions" test employed by the majority in Aleksovski, or the reference to "direct involvement" in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision.

145. The "overall control" test calls for an assessment of all the elements of control taken as a whole, and a determination to be made on that basis as to whether there was the required degree of control. Bearing in mind that the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Judgement arrived at this test against the background of the "effective control" test set out by the decision of the ICJ in Nicaragua,[274] and the "specific instructions" test used by the Trial Chamber in Tadi}, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to say that the standard established by the "overall control" test is not as rigorous as those tests.

[273] Ibid., para. 27 (footnotes omitted).
[274] See in this regard, the reference to the "higher standard" of Nicaragua in the Majority Opinion, para. 12.

146. To the extent that it provides for greater protection of civilian victims of armed conflicts, this different and less rigorous standard is wholly consistent with the fundamental purpose of Geneva Convention IV, which is to ensure "protection of civilians to the maximum extent possible."[275]

(b) The Criteria for Determining Whether the Bosnian Muslim Victims were Protected Persons under Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV

147. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the status of protected persons was not established because the Bosnian Muslim victims were of the same nationality, that of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as their captors. [276]

148. Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, applicable here, defines protected persons as:

> those who, at a given moment and in any manner whatsoever, find themselves, in case of a conflict or occupation, in the hands of a Party to the Conflict or Occupying Power of which they are not nationals.

149. Essentially, the Defence contends that the conflict was an internal one, between the Bosnian Croats and the Bosnian Muslims, who were both of Bosnian and Herzegovinian nationality, and, therefore, that the Bosnian Muslim victims were of the same nationality as their captors.

150. The Prosecution submits that, if it is established that the conflict was international by reason of Croatia's participation, it follows that the Bosnian Muslim victims were in the hands of a party to the conflict, Croatia, of which they were not nationals and that, therefore, Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV is applicable.

151. The Appeals Chamber agrees with this submission. However, the Appeals Chamber also confirms the finding in the Tadi} Judgement that, in certain circumstances, Article 4 may be given a wider construction so that a person may be accorded protected status, notwithstanding the fact that he is of the same nationality as his captors.

[275] Tadi} Judgement, para. 168.
[276] Cross-Appellant's Brief, para. 2.56.

152. In the Tadi} Judgement, the Appeals Chamber, after considering the nationality criterion in Article 4, concluded that "not only the text and the drafting history of the Convention but also, and more importantly, the Convention's object and purpose suggest that allegiance to a Party to the conflict and, correspondingly, control by this Party over persons in a given territory, may be regarded as the crucial test."[277] This formulation relies on a teleological approach to the interpretation of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV, and correctly identifies as the object of that Convention, "the protection of civilians to the maximum extent possible."[278] In the words of the Tadić Judgement, the primary purpose of Article 4:

> is to ensure the safeguards afforded by the Convention to those civilians who do not enjoy the diplomatic protection, and correlatively are not subject to the allegiance and control, of the State in whose hands they may find themselves. In granting its protection, Article 4 intends to look to the substance of relations, not to their legal characterisation as such.[279]

The Appeals Chamber considers that this extended application of Article 4 meets the object and purpose of Geneva Convention IV, and is particularly apposite in the context of present-day inter-ethnic conflicts.

(c) The Prosecution's application to reverse the acquittal on Counts 8 and 9

153. Although the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber applied the wrong test for determining the applicability of Article 2, for the following reasons, it declines to reverse the verdict of acquittal on Counts 8 and 9:

(i) in relation to this ground of appeal, the substantive issues for determination are questions of law rather than fact, and the Chamber considers it important for the development of the Tribunal's jurisprudence that those issues be resolved, and it has made that determination in relation to the criteria for assessing the international character of an armed conflict and the status of a victim as a protected person;

(ii) the Chamber's conclusions as to those criteria necessarily mean that the Trial

[277] Tadić Judgement, para. 166.
[278] Ibid., para. 168.

Chamber applied the wrong tests and therefore, that its findings of fact were made on an erroneous basis;

(iii) the Chamber does not favour remitting the case to the Trial Chamber for re-examination, nor will it make its own determination of the facts, as neither course would serve a useful purpose. The material acts of the Appellant underlying the charges are the same in respect of Counts 8 and 9, as in respect of Count 10, for which the Appellant has been convicted. Thus, even if the verdict of acquittal were to be reversed by a finding of guilt on these counts, it would not be appropriate to increase the Appellant's sentence. Moreover, any sentence imposed in respect of Counts 8 and 9 would have to run concurrently with the sentence on Count 10.

C. Conclusion

154. This ground of appeal succeeds to the extent that the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber applied the wrong test for determining the nature of the armed conflict and the status of protected persons within the meaning of Article 2 of the Statute. However, the Appeals Chamber declines to reverse the acquittals on Counts 8 and 9.

VII. SECOND GROUND OF CROSS-APPEAL BY THE PROSECUTION: RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE MISTREATMENT OF PRISONERS OUTSIDE THE PRISON

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. Cross-Appellant's Brief

155. The Prosecution complains that the Trial Chamber failed to deal with part of its case in support of Count 10 (outrages on personal dignity amounting to a violation of the laws or customs of war). The count was based upon the assertion in the indictment that Bosnian Muslim civilians, who were detained in the Kaonik prison under the command of the Appellant, were subjected to physical and psychological harm, forced labour (digging trenches) and working in hazardous circumstances (being used as human shields).[280]

156. The Prosecution case was that (a) the outrages on personal dignity constituted by physical and psychological harm ("mistreatment") took place not only inside the compound but also outside it, where the prisoners worked under the control of HVO soldiers, and (b) those outrages on personal dignity constituted by forced labour and the use of the prisoners as human shields took place only outside the compound.

157. The Trial Chamber found that the Appellant was responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute for the mistreatment of prisoners within the compound.[281] It also found that he was individually responsible pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute for the forced labour and the use of the prisoners as human shields outside the prison, in that he aided and abetted in the acts of the HVO soldiers there.[282] The basis upon which he was found to have aided and abetted in those acts was that he was aware of the use to which the prisoners were being put by the HVO soldiers, he was present sometimes when the prisoners were selected for that purpose and practically always when the prisoners returned to make sure that they were all there, and (having responsibility for the welfare of the prisoners) he failed to take measures open to him to stop them from going out to work in dangerous circumstances.[283] On the other hand, the Trial Chamber found that it had not been proved that the Appellant "participated directly" in the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers outside the prison, saying that it had not been claimed by the Prosecution, so that he was not individually responsible for that mistreatment.[284]

[280] Indictment, para. 31.
[281] Judgement, para. 228.
[282] Ibid., para. 229.

158. The Prosecution says that, although it did not produce evidence that the Appellant had personally inflicted the mistreatment upon the prisoners outside the prison, it had pleaded an individual responsibility pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute which included an allegation that the Appellant had aided and abetted in unlawful treatment of the Bosnian Muslim detainees, in terms which included their treatment outside the prison.[285] The Prosecution says that the Trial Chamber had acknowledged that this was the Prosecution case in its Judgement.[286]

159. Finally, the Prosecution says that the factual findings made by the Trial Chamber in relation to the Appellant's responsibility for aiding and abetting the forced labour and the use of the prisoners as human shields outside the prison,[287] together with other factual findings that the Appellant was aware of the mistreatment of those prisoners outside the prison,[288] must inevitably have led to a finding that the Appellant was individually

[285] Indictment, para. 37, which was in the following terms: "... individually, and in concert with others, planned, instigated, ordered or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of the unlawful treatment of Bosnian Muslim detainees in the Lašva Valley area of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina and, or in the alternative, knew, or had reason to know, that subordinates were about to do the same, or had done so, and failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof."
[286] Cross-Appellant's Brief, para. 3.14. Reliance is placed upon para. 40 of the Judgement, which stated: "The allegations of inhuman treatment ... are based not only on the detention conditions in Kaonik compound ... but also on the treatment meted out to the detainees at trench-digging locations (forced labour, mistreatment, inadequate food) and the fact that they were used as human shields. In support of her charge of wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2(c) of the Statute, the Prosecutor relies not only on mistreatment inside the Kaonik compound but also on suffering and injury to body or health resulting from mistreatment or hazardous circumstances in which prisoners were forced to dig trenches. In respect of outrages against personal dignity as recognised by Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, the Prosecutor invokes unlawful detention ... forced trench-digging, use of detainees as human shields and, more generally, refers to the elements of breaches under Article 2 of the Statute. The facts submitted by the Prosecutor in support of the three charges therefore relate to events taking place both inside and outside the Kaonik compound."
[287] Judgement, para. 128.
[288] See para. 168, infra.

responsible for that mistreatment in that he aided and abetted the acts of the HVO soldiers there.[289]

2. Appellant's Response

160. The Appellant did not contest the argument of the Prosecution that, in the indictment, it had alleged his individual responsibility by aiding and abetting the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers outside the prison. He asserted, however, that it had not been proved that he had any connection with, or the possibility to control, the HVO soldiers (as their military commander or otherwise) or that he knew that they were going to mistreat the prisoners.[290] He also sought to argue that it had not been proved that the prisoners had been used as human shields, only that there had merely been an attempt to do so.[291] However, the finding by the Trial Chamber that the prisoners had been used as human shields was not challenged by him in his appeal.

3. Cross-Appellant's Reply

161. The Prosecution interpreted the Appellant's Response as asserting that, in the case of aiding and abetting, the mens rea of the accessory has to be the same as that of the principal.[292] The Appellant, however, has asserted no more than that the accessory must have known all the essential ingredients of the crime to be committed.[293] The Prosecution also denied that it was necessary for it to establish the Appellant had any connection with, or form of control over, the HVO soldiers who mistreated the prisoners when demonstrating his individual responsibility under Article 7(1) for their acts.

B. Discussion

162. The liability of a person charged with aiding and abetting another person in the commission of a crime was extensively considered by Trial Chamber II in the Furundžija Judgement.[294] It stated the following conclusions:[295]

(i) It must be shown that the aider and abettor carried out acts which consisted of practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect upon the commission by the principal of the crime for which the aider and abettor is sought to be made responsible.

(ii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor knew (in the sense of was aware) that his own acts assisted in the commission of that crime by the principal.

The Trial Chamber had earlier stated the conclusion that it is not necessary to show that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea of the principal, but it must be shown that the aider and abettor was aware of the relevant mens rea on the part of the principal.[296] It is clear that what must be shown is that the aider and abettor was aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal.

163. Subsequently, in the Tadić Judgement, the Appeals Chamber briefly considered the liability of one person for the acts of another person where the first person has been charged with aiding and abetting that other person in the commission of a crime.[297] This was in the context of contrasting that liability with the liability of a person charged with acting pursuant to a common purpose or design with another person to commit a crime, and for that reason that judgement does not purport to be a complete statement of the liability of the person charged with aiding and abetting. It made the following points in relation to the aider and abettor:[298]

(i) The aider and abettor is always an accessory to the crime committed by the other person, the principal.

[294] Furund'ija Judgement, paras. 190-249.
[295] Ibid., para. 249.
[296] Ibid., para. 245.

(ii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor carried out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the specific crime committed by the principal, and that this support has a substantial effect upon the commission of the crime.

(iii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor knew that his own acts assisted the commission of that specific crime by the principal.

(iv) It is not necessary to show the existence of a common concerted plan between the principal and the accessory.

164. The Trial Chamber in the present case relied upon the Furundžija Judgement, amongst other decisions at first instance within the Tribunal (the Tadi} Judgement of the Appeals Chamber was given after the Trial Chamber had given its judgement).[299] The Trial Chamber expressed itself in various ways, but identified what it saw to be the two essential elements which had to be established in order to demonstrate liability for the acts of others, in these terms:

> The accused must have participated in the commission of the offence and "all acts of assistance by words or acts that lend encouragement or support" constitute sufficient participation to entail responsibility according to Article 7(1) whenever the participation had [a] "substantial effect" on the commission of the crime. It is unnecessary to prove that a cause-effect relationship existed between participation and the commission of the crime. The act of participation need merely have significantly facilitated the perpetration of the crime. The accused must also have participated in the illegal act in full knowledge of what he was doing. This intent was defined by Trial Chamber II as "awareness of the act of participation coupled with a conscious decision to participate". If both elements are proved, the accused will be held responsible for all the natural consequences of the unlawful act.[300]

The absence of any reference to an awareness by the aider and abettor of the essential elements of the crime committed by the principal (including his relevant mens rea) detracts from that passage as a reasonably accurate statement of the law, but that flaw did not disadvantage the Appellant in the circumstances of this case, where the relevant state of mind on the part of the HVO soldiers was obvious from the nature of the injuries seen by him.

which it seeks to make the aider and abettor responsible. Considerable evidence was given by prisoners of mistreatment when digging trenches. Witness B gave evidence that, when he was digging trenches at Kula, he was beaten by HVO soldiers. A particular soldier threatened him with a rifle and scratched a bayonet across his neck and nose, leaving a visible mark. After digging all night, Witness B and the other detainees were taken back to the Kaonik prison where he and two other prisoners were taken for a medical examination because of the extent of the injuries they had received.[301] Witness B described his injuries as including knife wounds, a "broken up" nose, and two broken ribs.[302] Witness H gave evidence, unchallenged in cross-examination, that he had been hit by a soldier with a rifle butt while out digging trenches.[303] Witness L gave evidence, also unchallenged in cross-examination, that he saw prisoners being beaten by HVO soldiers when they were digging trenches in Strane,[304] and that he was beaten when digging trenches in Carica by a member of the HVO who also came to the Kaonik prison afterwards to mistreat him and other prisoners.[305]

166. Witness M gave evidence that he had been taken out for trench digging in Strane when he was already injured from being beaten in the camp. While out trench-digging, a soldier whipped him with a rope, hit and kicked him; he was then beaten and kicked by other HVO soldiers. He was unable to open his mouth because it was so swollen from being whipped with the rope.[306] At some point after being taken out for trench-digging, Witness M asked to see a doctor and was taken by the Appellant to a local clinic with two other detainees who had been beaten. The Appellant was present when he saw the doctor and, when Witness M told the doctor that he was suffering pains from the digging, the Appellant said: "Tell the truth. Tell her that there was a dance down there." Witness M then told the doctor that he had been beaten. Some days later, Witness M was taken out again for trench digging in Polom.[307] This account was not contradicted in cross-examination, and the fact that the Appellant accompanied Witness M for the visit to the doctor was expressly confirmed.[308]

167. The Defence at the trial did not dispute that some of the prisoners were mistreated by the HVO soldiers while digging trenches.[309] The Prosecution submitted that, because the evidence already described was uncontradicted, the Trial Chamber had "by inference" accepted it as correct.[310] The Appeals Chamber, however, is not satisfied that such an inference should be drawn. The Trial Chamber apparently held the view that the Prosecution case did not include a charge that the Appellant was liable as having aided and abetted the HVO soldiers in mistreating the prisoners outside the compound.[311] On that view, it did not need to make any findings in relation to that evidence. It would not therefore be safe to infer that the Trial Chamber formed any particular view of that evidence beyond what was said expressly in relation to it. The Appeals Chamber now turns to what the Trial Chamber said.

168. The Trial Chamber made the following finding when considering the state of the Appellant's knowledge that the prisoners were being used unlawfully by the HVO soldiers to dig trenches:

> All this went to show that the accused knew not only that detainees were being sent off to dig trenches, but also that this practice was unlawful. Further, the detainees were very often used for this purpose and the accused, as he was usually present when the prisoners returned, could not have been unaware of the extremely difficult conditions and the repeated abuse prisoners were subjected to at the trench site the marks of which were clearly visible on them. [312]

And again:

> The evidence relating to ... the state in which some of the detainees returned from digging trenches, goes to establish that the accused was perfectly aware of the traumas suffered by the detainees.[313]

[312] Judgement, para. 128.
[313] Ibid, para. 224.

The Trial Chamber did not find, and the evidence does not appear to suggest, that the Appellant was aware of any psychological harm caused to the prisoners as a result solely of being mistreated when outside the prison.

169. Necessarily implicit in the findings which were made is the conclusion that the Appellant was aware that the prisoners were being mistreated by the HVO soldiers on a recurring basis over a period of time (without specifying the precise nature of that mistreatment), yet with that awareness he continued to participate in sending the prisoners out to work under those soldiers and (having responsibility for the welfare of the prisoners) he failed to take measures open to him to stop them from going out to work in such conditions.[314] The Prosecution says that, if that was regarded by the Trial Chamber as sufficient to find the Appellant liable for aiding and abetting in the forced labour and the use of prisoners as human shields outside the prison,[315] he should inevitably have been found liable also for aiding and abetting in the mistreatment of the prisoners whilst engaged in that forced labour.[316]

170. The Trial Chamber appears to have rejected such a finding upon two bases. First, in the context of discussing individual (not superior) responsibility, it said:

> He cannot be held responsible under Article 7(1) in circumstances where he does not have direct authority over the main perpetrators of the crimes.[317]

The original French version of the Judgement also refers to Article 7(1) of the Statute. The context precludes any explanation that this was a typographical error for Article 7(3) of the Statute. The statement is clearly wrong. Secondly, after finding that the Appellant was responsible under Article 7(1) for having aided and abetted in the use of prisoners as human shields and for trench digging, the Trial Chamber said:

> It was not proved, however, that the accused participated directly in the mistreatment meted out to the prisoners there. Nor was such mistreatment claimed by the Prosecutor. The accused cannot therefore incur responsibility under Article 7(1) for the mistreatment suffered by the detainees outside the Kaonik compound.[318]

[314] See Judgement, paras. 125 and 128-129. Also see para. 157, supra.
[315] Judgement, para. 229.
[316] Cross-Appellant's Brief, para. 3.16; T. 45-49.
[317] Judgement, para. 129.
[318] Ibid, para. 130.

There is some latent ambiguity in that statement. As previously stated, the Prosecution did not seek to make out a case of individual responsibility based upon the direct or personal participation by the Appellant in the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers. But Article 7(1) deals not only with individual responsibility by way of direct or personal participation in the criminal act but also with individual participation by way of aiding and abetting in the criminal acts of others.

171. The Trial Chamber appears to have thought that the Prosecution had restricted its case against the Appellant as having aided and abetted in the crimes committed by the HVO soldiers to using the prisoners as human shields and for trench digging only. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Prosecution did charge the Appellant with individual responsibility by way of aiding and abetting for the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers, and that the Trial Chamber was in error if the second passage quoted in the last paragraph was intended to assert that no such claim had been made.[319] The passage of the Judgement upon which the Prosecution relies as demonstrating an acknowledgement by the Trial Chamber that such a claim had been made,[320] if read carefully, does appear to do so although this may well not have been the intention. Whatever may have been intended, it is clear that the Trial Chamber should have proceeded to make findings in relation to the individual responsibility of the Appellant for aiding and abetting the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers.

C. Conclusion

172. The Appeals Chamber accepts that the only finding which could reasonably have been made by the Trial Chamber, in the light of its other findings, is that the Appellant was individually responsible for the mistreatment by the HVO soldiers outside the prison by way of having aided and abetted in it. Any finding to the contrary would have been unreasonable in those circumstances. The Appeals Chamber accordingly makes that finding.

[319] The practice by the Prosecution of merely quoting the provisions of Article 7(1) in the indictment is likely to cause ambiguity, and it is preferable that the Prosecution indicate in relation to each individual count precisely and expressly the particular nature of the responsibility alleged: "Decision on Preliminary

173. That finding does not alter the verdict of guilty entered by the Trial Chamber or Count 10, but the additional finding is, strictly, a matter to be taken into account when, as already announced, the Appeals Chamber comes to impose a revised sentence upon Count 10. In view of the limited finding possible, however, the Appeals Chamber does not believe that the additional finding of itself warrants any heavier sentence than would have been imposed without it.

VIII. THIRD GROUND OF CROSS-APPEAL BY THE PROSECUTION: ERROR IN SENTENCING

A. Background

174. The Appellant is aged 40, is married and has two young children. He is a university graduate and worked in the Zenica prison service before the conflict. Between January and May 1993, which was the relevant period in this case, he was commander of Kaonik prison.

175. The Trial Chamber found the Appellant responsible for the following crimes, committed while he was commander of the Kaonik prison:

> (i) The mistreatment of the detainees
>
> (a) aiding and abetting mistreatment of detainees during the body searches on 15 and 16 April 1993 by his being present during such mistreatment (which included insults, threats, thefts and assaults) and not objecting to it;[321]
>
> (b) ordering, instigating and aiding and abetting violence on Witnesses L and M, who were beaten regularly during their detention (sometimes four to six times a day), occasionally in the presence of Zlatko Aleksovski or otherwise near his office, both day and night; ordering the guards to continue beating them when they stopped; as a result of the beatings Witness M fainted and afterwards had traces of blood in his urine and at the time of trial he was still suffering from back and chest pains;[322]

[321] Judgement, paras. 87, and 185-186.
[322] Ibid., paras. 88 and 196.

(c) aiding and abetting the mistreatment of detainees during their interrogation after the escape of a detainee;[323]

(d) aiding and abetting psychological terror, such as the playing of screams over the loudspeaker at night;[324]

(e) aiding and abetting the use of detainees as human shields and trench digging, in that

(i) he took part in designating detainees for trench digging and made sure that they returned;

(ii) he did not prevent HVO soldiers coming to get detainees and participated in picking out detainees;

(iii) he was present when detainees were taken to serve as human shields and thus manifested his approval of the practice.[325]

176. In its conclusions the Trial Chamber held that the violence inflicted upon detainees constituted an outrage upon personal dignity, in particular degrading or humiliating treatment within common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions as a violation of the laws or customs of war for which the Appellant was responsible under Articles 7(1) and 7(3) of the Statute.[326] The Trial Chamber also held that the use of detainees as human shields and for trench digging constituted an outrage upon personal dignity for which the appellant must be held guilty under Article 7(1).[327] The Trial Chamber said of these offences that "the violence inflicted on the Muslim detainees of Kaonik prison appears to be a reprehensible infringement of international human rights which would be absolutely unacceptable in times of peace", and that "the commission of violent offences against vulnerable, helpless persons or those placed in a situation of inferiority constitutes an aggravating circumstance [...]".[328]

177. The Trial Chamber also found that the Appellant, as the commander of the prison, was responsible as a superior under Article 7(3) for the acts of violence committed by the guards inside the prison[329] since he knew that such crimes were committed but took no steps to prevent them.[330]

178. In determining sentence, the Trial Chamber took into consideration that the accused had not demonstrated the "repeated malice" alleged by the Prosecution and noted that many of the events took place during the peak of the relevant conflict.[331] The Trial Chamber also took into consideration the fact that the accused had no previous convictions, that his direct participation in the commission of acts of violence was relatively limited and that he had a secondary role in the totality of crimes alleged in the common indictment.[332] His guilt rested in his knowing participation in, or acceptance of, violence contrary to international humanitarian law committed in a broader frame.[333] On the other hand, he made efforts to improve conditions in the compound and to secure medical services for detainees.[334] The Trial Chamber referred to Articles 41(1) and 142 of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("SFRY") Penal Code, but took the view that the more important factor to bear in mind was "the gravity of the criminal acts of which the accused had been found guilty and in the context of his individual circumstances".[335] The Trial Chamber said that it was strongly of the view that in order to implement the Tribunal's mandate it is crucial to establish a gradation of sentences, depending on the magnitude of crimes committed and the extent of the liability of the accused.[336] The Trial Chamber sentenced the Appellant to two and a half years of imprisonment. That sentence was pronounced on 7 May 1999 and given that the accused was entitled to credit for a longer period of time than that of the sentence imposed, the Trial Chamber ordered his immediate release.[337] The accused by that date had spent two years, ten months and twenty-nine days in custody.

B. Submissions of the Parties

179. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in imposing the sentence which it did on the Appellant.[338] The Prosecution advances several grounds for this submission which may be summarised as follows:

(a) The sentence of two and a half years' imprisonment was 'manifestly disproportionate' to the crimes committed and, accordingly, outside the limits of a fairly exercised discretion.[339]

(b) Such a sentence defeats one of the main purposes of the Tribunal, namely to deter future violations of international humanitarian law. Such a purpose is defeated if the sentence imposed is lower than those typically imposed by national courts for simila conduct.[340]

(c) The Trial Chamber did not have sufficient regard to the gravity of the Appellant's conduct: his crimes were not trivial and would be regarded as serious in most legal systems.[341]

(d) The Trial Chamber should have considered the Appellant's superior responsibility as an aggravating circumstance and should have considered his conduct at least as grave as that of the individual perpetrators.[342]

(e) The Trial Chamber erred in treating factors as mitigating which could, in fact, be regarded as aggravating.[343]

The Prosecutor further submits that in these circumstances the Appeals Chamber should revise the sentence and impose a sentence of no less than seven years' imprisonment.[344]

180. In response the Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber should have acquitted him altogether.[345]

C. Oral Hearing

181. On 9 February 2000, after hearing the oral submissions of the parties, the Appeals Chamber dismissed the Appellant's appeal against conviction and allowed the Prosecution

[341] Ibid., paras. 4.20-4.37.
[342] Ibid., paras. 4.39-4.41.
[343] According to the Prosecution, the following factors could not reasonably have been regarded by the Trial Chamber as justifying a significant reduction in the sentence that would otherwise be warranted by the inherent gravity of the Appellant's conduct: (1) that the crimes were committed during two distinct periods and that they occurred at the peak of the conflict (ibid., para. 4.48); (2) the good character of the accused (ibid., para. 4.49); (3) the motive of the accused in taking up his post (ibid., para. 4.50); (4) the accused's knowledge of the broader frame (ibid., para. 4.51); (5) his efforts to improve conditions (ibid., para. 4.52); and (6) his family life (ibid., para. 4.54).

appeal against sentence.[346] Following this decision, the Appellant was remanded in custody.[347] The Appeals Chamber gives its reasons and its revised sentence below.

D. Discussion

182. The nub of the Prosecutor's appeal is to be found in the third ground as summarised above, namely the weight to be given to the gravity of the Appellant's conduct. Consideration of the gravity of the conduct of the accused is normally the starting point for consideration of an appropriate sentence. The practice of the International Tribunal provides no exception. The Statute provides that in imposing sentence the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence.[348] This has been followed by Trial Chambers. Thus, in the ^elebi}i Judgement, the Trial Chamber said that "[t]he most important consideration, which may be regarded as the litmus test for the appropriate sentence, is the gravity of the offence".[349] In the Kupreški} Judgement, the Trial Chamber stated that "[t]he sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime".[350] The Appeals Chamber endorses these statements.

183. The Appeals Chamber accepts the Prosecution argument in this connection and holds that the Trial Chamber erred in not having sufficient regard to the gravity of the conduct of the Appellant. His offences were not trivial. As warden of a prison he took part in violence against the inmates. The Trial Chamber recognised the seriousness of these offences but stated that his participation was relatively limited. In fact, his superior responsibility as a warden seriously aggravated the Appellant's offences. Instead of preventing it, he involved himself in violence against those whom he should have been protecting, and allowed them to be subjected to psychological terror. He also failed to punish those responsible. Most seriously, the Appellant, by participating in the selection of detainees to be used as human shields and for trench digging, as he must have known, was putting at risk the lives of those entrusted to his custody. Thus, the instant case is one of a prison warden who personally participated in physical violence against detainees when, by virtue of his rank, he should have taken steps to prevent or punish it. The Appellant did more than merely tolerate the crimes as a commander; with his direct participation he provided additional encouragement to his subordinates to commit similar acts. The combination of these factors should, therefore, have resulted in a longer sentence and should certainly not have provided grounds for mitigation.

184. The Trial Chamber was right to emphasise the need to establish a gradation of sentencing. For instance, the Appeals Chamber in a recent decision said that, while the conduct of the accused in that case was "incontestably heinous, his level in the command structure, when compared to that of his superiors, i.e. commanders, or the very architects of the strategy of ethnic cleansing, was low".[351] While, therefore, this Appellant may have had a secondary role, compared with the alleged roles of others against whom charges have been brought, he was nonetheless the commander of the prison and as such the authority who could have prevented crimes in the prison and certainly should not have involved himself in them. An appropriate sentence should reflect these factors. There are no other mitigating circumstances in this case.

185. The Prosecution submits that a manifestly disproportionate sentence defeats a purpose of sentencing for international crimes, namely to deter others from committing similar crimes. While the Appeals Chamber accepts the general importance of deterrence as a consideration in sentencing for international crimes, it concurs with the statement in Prosecutor v. Tadić that "this factor must not be accorded undue prominence in the overall assessment of the sentences to be imposed on persons convicted by the International Tribunal".[352] An equally important factor is retribution. This is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge but as duly expressing the outrage of the international community at these crimes. This factor has been widely recognised by Trial Chambers of this International Tribunal as well as Trial Chambers of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda.[353] Accordingly, a sentence of the International Tribunal should make plain the condemnation of the international community of the behaviour in question[354] and show "that the international community was not ready to tolerate serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights".[355]

186. The Appeals Chamber is thus satisfied that the Trial Chamber was in error in sentencing the Appellant to two and a half years' imprisonment. The question then arises whether the Appeals Chamber should review the sentence. Appellate review of sentencing is available in the major legal systems but it is usually exercised sparingly. For example, in the United Kingdom the Attorney-General will appeal against a sentence if it appears "unduly lenient".[356] The Court of Appeal has stated that a sentence is unduly lenient where it falls outside the range of sentences which the judge, applying his mind to all the relevant factors, could reasonably consider appropriate.[357] Similarly the New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal in Australia has stated that "an appellate court will only interfere if it is demonstrated that the sentencing judge fell into material error of fact or law. Such error may appear in the reasons given by the sentencing judge, or the sentence itself may be manifestly excessive or inadequate, and thus disclose error".[358] In civil legal systems such as Germany and Italy the relevant Criminal Codes set out what factors a judge must take into consideration in imposing a sentence.[359] The appellate courts may interfere with the discretion of the lower court if its considerations went outside these factors or if it breached a prescribed minimum or maximum limit on sentence.

[359] Italian Criminal Code, Art. 133; German Criminal Code (StGB) s. 46.

187. The Appeals Chamber has followed this general practice. Thus in Prosecutor v. Tadić, the Appeals Chamber held that it should not intervene in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion with regard to sentence unless there is a "discernible error".[360] In applying that test to the instant case the Appeals Chamber finds that there was a discernible error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion in imposing sentence. That error consisted of giving insufficient weight to the gravity of the conduct of the Appellant and failing to treat his position as commander as an aggravating feature in relation to his responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute. The sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber was manifestly inadequate.

188. In this connection the Appeals Chamber also points out that Article 142 of the SFRY Criminal Code imposed a minimum term of imprisonment of not less than five years for "crimes against humanity and international law" such as "killing, torture, inhumane treatment of the civilian population, causing great suffering or serious injury to body and health ... use of measures of intimidation and terror and the unlawful taking to concentration camps and other unlawful confinement".[361]

189. The Appeals Chamber has now upheld the Prosecution's second ground of appeal and found that the Appellant aided and abetted the mistreatment by HVO soldiers of detainees outside the prison compound. This additional finding makes no difference to a revised sentence, as the Appeals Chamber has already held that the additional finding does not of itself warrant any heavier sentence than would have been imposed without it.[362]

[360] "Judgement in Sentencing Appeals", Prosecutor v. Tadi}, Case No.: IT-94-1-A and IT-94-1-A*bis*, 26 Jan. 2000, para. 22.

[361] In 1985 Zdravko Kostić was found guilty by the District Court of Sabac of war crimes against the civilian population, proscribed under Art. 142 of the SFRY Criminal Code, for his participation in beating up a civilian and molesting the victim's family. He was sentenced to five years imprisonment with his youth as the single mitigating factor, a sentence upheld by the Supreme Court of Serbia on appeal: District Court of Sabac, K-32/85, 2 Oct. 1985. The Appeals Chamber also notes the case of Willy Zühlke, a German prison warden who was convicted by the Netherlands Special Court of the beating of Jewish and other prisoners as a war crime and crimes against humanity in 1948. The Court took account of the fact that the accused had allowed himself to be carried along with "the criminal stream of German terrorism" rather than acting with intent on his own initiative and also found that the ill-treatment was not of a very serious nature. Willy Zühlke was sentenced to seven years of imprisonment. Judgement of the Bijzonder Gerechtshof Amsterdam, 3 Aug. 1948 (referred to in Judgement of Bijzondere Raad van Cassatie, 6 Dec. 1948, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie, 1949 No. 85): English translation in UN War Crimes Commission, Law Reports of Trials of War Criminal, Vol. XIV, p.139.

[362] See para. 173, supra.

190. In imposing a revised sentence the Appeals Chamber bears in mind the element of double jeopardy in this process in that the Appellant has had to appear for sentence twice for the same conduct, suffering the consequent anxiety and distress,[363] and also that he has been detained a second time after a period of release of nine months. Had it not been for these factors the sentence would have been considerably longer.

E. Conclusion

191. For these reasons the Appeals Chamber has decided to impose on Zlatko Aleksovski a sentence of seven years' imprisonment. Zlatko Aleksovski is entitled to credit for the time he has spent in detention, which amounts to three years and 12 days.

[363] In common law this double exposure to sentencing is referred to as "double jeopardy" which is applicable to all the different stages of the criminal justice process: prosecution, conviction and punishment: Pearce v. R., (1998) 156 ALR 684. See also Att-Gen.'s Ref. (No. 15 of 1991) (R. v. King), CA 13 CR. App R (S) 622, [1992] Crim L R 454; *Att-Gen. Ref. X. DECLARATION OF JUDGE DAVID HUNT

1. I agree with the disposition of these appeals as stated in the Judgement of the Appeals Chamber, and I am content to join in the reasons given therein for all but one of the issues determined during the course of the appeals. The exception is the issue of judicial precedent within the Tribunal. So important is that issue, which is being determined for the first time in the Appeals Chamber, that I prefer to state my own reasons for the conclusion which has been expressed in the Judgement. I should emphasise that the differences between us lie in emphasis rather than in substance.

2. Previous judicial decisions do not, in general, play an important part in international law. They rate no higher than the teaching of highly qualified publicists, as subsidiary means for determining what the international law is upon any issue.[1] Not even the International Court of Justice regards itself as bound by its previous decisions.

3. This Tribunal is unique even in the sphere of international law.[2] This is so in many ways. It is the only international court which has its own appellate structure,[3] so that issues arise not only in relation to the attitude which the Appeals Chamber should take towards its own previous decisions but also in relation to the attitude which the Trial Chambers should take towards the decisions of the Appeals Chamber and of the other Trial Chambers. Only the first of those issues arise for determination in the present appeal.

[1]Statute of the International Court of Justice, Article 38.1(d). Article 38 is generally regarded as a complete statement of the sources of international law. See also Prosecutor v Kupreškić, Case No.: IT-95-16-T, Judgement, 14 Jan. 2000, para 540.

[2]I equate the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda with this Tribunal for this purpose.

[3]The Rwanda Tribunal has its own appellate structure, but the members of this Tribunal's Appeals Chamber are members also of the Rwanda Tribunal's Appeals Chamber.

4. Another way in which the Tribunal is unique in the sphere of international law is that it is presently the only international criminal court, and, as such, it is necessarily subject to many of the same concerns that arise in relation to the criminal courts in domestic jurisdictions. There has always been recognised a special need for certainty in the criminal law. There is, however, a tension existing between that special need and another special need in the criminal law, the need for flexibility where adherence to a previous decision will create injustice. Both of these special needs apply equally to international criminal law as well.

5. A third matter of importance to consider in relation to the Tribunal is that, unlike in domestic systems, there is no legislative body readily able to fine-tune its Statute when a decision of the Appeals Chamber is subsequently seen to have produced an injustice. It is quite unrealistic to expect the Security Council of the United Nations to perform that task.

6. Finally, the Tribunal's Statute is not a self-contained code of the nature adopted in the civil law systems, and (as in the common law systems) it requires constant interpretation for its continuing application.

7. In all these circumstances, how then is the Appeals Chamber to respond to the tension between the special needs of certainty and flexibility? In my respectful view, the answer to that question is not to be found in the practices of other international courts (which are necessarily not criminal courts) or in the doctrine of judicial precedent in the domestic courts where the situation in which those courts operate is quite different to that in which this Tribunal operates.

8. The need for certainty in the criminal law means that the Appeals Chamber should never disregard a previous decision simply because the members of the Appeals Chamber at that particular time do not personally agree with it. The Appeals Chamber should depart from its previous decisions only with caution. It is unwise to attempt an exhaustive tabulation of specific instances when it would be appropriate to do so. The appropriate test, in my view, is that a departure from a previous decision is justified only when the interests of justice require it. Some examples may be given which illustrate the application of that test. It would be appropriate to reconsider a previous decision where that decision has led to an injustice, or would lead to an injustice if its principle is applied in a subsequent case, or where a subsequent decision of the International Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights or a senior appellate court within a domestic jurisdiction has demonstrated an error of reasoning in the previous decision, or where, in the light of subsequent events, the previous decision can be seen to have been plainly wrong, or where the previous decision was given per incuriam.

9. I therefore agree with the Judgement where it says that the normal rule is that the Appeals Chamber follows its previous decisions and that a departure from them is the exception. The reference to a previous decision means the ratio decidendi of that decision, the precise principle upon which the decision depended. The ratio decidendi cannot be distinguished merely because the facts to which it is to be applied are different.

10. Although it is not necessary for the purposes of this appeal (and thus is not part of the ratio decidendi of the Judgement), I agree with the Judgement, largely for the reasons given, that a Trial Chamber is bound by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber directly in point, although it should be permitted at the same time to express a reasoned disagreement with that decision for the later consideration of the Appeals Chamber itself.

11. I also agree with the Judgement that a Trial Chamber is not bound by the decision of another Trial Chamber, although I believe that it should have respect for that decision and consider carefully whether it is appropriate to depart from it.

I. SUMMARY OF THE CHARGES

1. Mitar Vasiljević (the "Accused") is charged under the second amended Indictment ("the Indictment"), dated 12 July 2001, with ten Counts of crimes against humanity under Article 5 of the Statute and violations of the laws or customs of war under Article 3 of the Statute.

2. The Prosecution alleges that, during the Spring of 1992, Milan Lukić, a former inhabitant of Višegrad, returned to this town where he organized a small paramilitary unit. This paramilitary unit operated with the police and various military units stationed in Višegrad and was responsible for crimes against the local Muslim civilian population. This paramilitary organisation was often referred to by locals as the White Eagles, and it included Milan Lukić's cousin, Sredoje Lukić.

3. The Prosecution alleges that the Accused, a well-known waiter who worked for the Panos company which had several restaurants and coffee houses in the Višegrad area, joined Milan Lukić's group of paramilitaries and took part in the ethnic cleansing of the Višegrad area.

4. The Prosecution alleges that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crimes charged against him in accordance with Article 7(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal ("Statute"). It is alleged that, acting in concert with Milan and Sredoje Lukić and other unknown individuals, the Accused planned, instigated, ordered, committed and otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation and execution of the crimes charged in the Indictment.

5. There are two specific incidents pleaded in the Indictment:

a) The Drina River incident: It is alleged that, on or about 7 June 1992, the Accused together with his two co-accused (Milan Lukić and Sredoje Lukić) and other unidentified individuals, led seven Bosnian Muslim men to the bank of the Drina River. There, they forced the seven men to line up on the bank of the river, facing the river, and they opened fire at them. It is alleged that five of the seven men died as a result of the shooting while the other two escaped without serious physical injury.

b) The Pionirska Street incident: It is alleged that, on or about 14 June 1992, the Accused directed 65 Bosnian Muslim women, children and elderly men to a house on Pionirska Street in Nova Mahala in the Višegrad municipality. Later the same day, it is alleged, the Accused, in concert with the co-accused and other individuals, forcibly moved the group to a nearby house also on Pionirska Street, where he participated in barricading the people in one room, placed an incendiary device in the house and setting it on fire. It is further alleged that the Accused shone a light on people who tried to escape through the windows while the co-accused fired upon them with automatic weapons. Approximately 70 people died as a result of this incident, and a number of them survived, some with serious physical injuries.

6. The Accused is charged under Count 1 with extermination as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(b) of the Statute. This Count is based on his alleged participation, sometime in May and July 1992, in concert with the co-accused and other unknown individuals, in committing, planning, instigating, ordering and otherwise aiding and abetting the planning, preparation and execution of the crime of the extermination of a significant number of Bosnian Muslim civilians, including women, children and the elderly. This Count applies only to the Pionirska Street incident.[1]

7. The Accused is charged under Count 3 with persecution on political, racial or religious grounds as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(h) of the Statute. The Accused is alleged to have participated, in concert with the other two co-accused and other individuals, during the period of May and July 1992, in the persecution of Bosnian Muslim civilians throughout the municipality of Višegrad and elsewhere in the territory of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Prosecution alleges that the crime of persecution was perpetrated, executed and carried out by and through: (a) the murder of Bosnian Muslim and other non-Serb civilians; (b) the harassment, humiliation, terrorisation and psychological abuse of Bosnian Muslim and other non-Serb civilians; and (c) the theft and destruction of personal property of Bosnian Muslim and other non-Serb civilians. This Count applies to both the Drina River and the Pionirska Street incidents and to those two incidents only.[2]

8. The Accused is charged under Count 4 with murder as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(a) of the Statute and, under Count 5, for murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. The Accused is also charged under Count 6 with inhumane acts as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(i) of the Statute, and under Count 7 with violence to life and person as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. These four Counts relate to the Drina River incident.

[2] Pre-Trial Conference, 20 July 2001 (T 88-89).

9. In addition, the Accused is charged under Count 10 with murder as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(a) of the Statute, and under Count 11 for murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. The Accused is also charged under Count 12 with inhumane acts as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(i) of the Statute and under Count 13 with violence to life and person as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. These counts relate to the Pionirska Street incident.

10. Several Counts relate to charges against the two co-accused, Milan Lukić (Counts 1, 4 to 7, and 10 to 13) and Sredoje Lukić (Counts 1 and 10 to 13), who have not yet been transferred into the custody of the Tribunal and whose trial has been ordered to be heard separately.

II. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS REGARDING THE EVALUATION OF EVIDENCE

11. The evidence in this case has been assessed by the Trial Chamber in accordance with the Tribunal's Statute and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules") and, where no guidance is given by those sources, in such a way as will best favour a fair determination of the case and which is consistent with the essence of the Statute and the general principles of law.[3]

12. The Accused is entitled by Article 21(3) of the Statute to a presumption of innocence. This presumption places the burden of establishing the guilt of the Accused upon the Prosecution. In accordance with Rule 87(A), the Prosecution must establish the Accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. In determining whether the guilt of the Accused has been established to this standard with respect to each particular count in the Indictment, the Trial Chamber has been careful to consider whether there is any other reasonable explanation of the evidence accepted by it than the guilt of the Accused.[4] As stated by the Appeals Chamber, if there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from that evidence, and which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, he must be acquitted.[5]

13. Article 21(4)(g) of the Statute provides that no accused shall be compelled to testify against himself. In this case, the Accused did choose to testify and the Trial Chamber has been careful to take the evidence given by the Accused into account in determining whether or not the Prosecution case should be accepted. His election to give evidence does not mean that he accepted any onus to prove his innocence. Nor does it mean that a choice must be made between his evidence and that of the Prosecution witnesses. The approach taken by the Trial Chamber has been to determine whether the evidence of the Prosecution witnesses should be accepted as establishing beyond reasonable doubt the facts alleged, notwithstanding the evidence which the Accused and other Defence witnesses gave. The Trial Chamber notes that in this case the Accused chose to give evidence prior to the calling of other Defence witnesses, and thus did so without the benefit of knowing what those witnesses would say in their evidence. The Trial Chamber has taken this factor into account in favour of the Accused in considering the weight to be accorded to the evidence which he gave.

[5] Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 458.

14. In general, the Trial Chamber has been careful to assess the evidence of all witnesses for the Prosecution and for the Defence in conjunction with the evidence of the Accused. This has been particularly so in considering the "defence" of alibi presented by the Accused to rebut the Prosecution's allegation that he participated in the Pionirska Street incident.

15. When a "defence" of alibi is raised by an accused person, the accused bears no onus of establishing that alibi. The onus is on the Prosecution to eliminate any reasonable possibility that the evidence of alibi is true.[6] In the circumstances of the present case, if the Trial Chamber is satisfied that there is a reasonable possibility that the Accused was at a place other than in Pionirska Street (where the Prosecution alleges that he was), then the Prosecution has failed to establish beyond reasonable doubt that he participated in the Pionirska Street incident.[7]

16. Of particular importance to the Accused's "defence" of alibi was the evidence of Prosecution witnesses who claimed to have seen the Accused at the scene of the Pionirska Street incident at the relevant time, and in the days following that incident. In assessing the identification evidence in general, the Trial Chamber has taken account of the circumstances in which each witness claimed to have observed the Accused, the length of that observation, the familiarity of the witness with the Accused prior to the identification and the description given by the witness of their identification of the Accused. The Trial Chamber has accepted that identification evidence involves inherent uncertainties due to the vagaries of human perception and recollection. The fact that a witness gives their evidence honestly is insufficient to establish the reliability of that evidence. The issue is not merely whether the evidence of an identification witness is honest; it is also whether the evidence is objectively reliable.[8]

17. The Prosecution sought to bolster the identification evidence of its witnesses by having those witnesses identify the Accused from a photo array. That array placed a photo of the Accused amongst photographs of 11 other men. The photo of the Accused shown to witnesses was taken after the arrest of the Accused, that is eight years after the alleged events. It was not established by

There was no challenge to this ruling in the Appeals Chamber: Prosecutor v Kunarac et al, IT-96-23 & IT-96-23/1-A, Judgment, 12 June 2002 ("Kunarac Appeal Judgment").

[7] It is not sufficient for the Prosecution merely to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the alibi is false in order to conclude that his guilt has been established beyond reasonable doubt. Acceptance by the Trial Chamber of the falsity of an alibi cannot establish the opposite to what it asserts. The Prosecution must also establish that the facts alleged in the Indictment are true beyond a reasonable doubt before a finding of guilt can be made against the accused.

[8] As to identification evidence generally, see Prosecutor v Kupreškić et al, Case IT-95-16-A, Judgment, 23 Oct 2001 ("Kupreškić Appeal Judgment"), pars 34-40, and footnoted references; Delalić Appeal Judgment, pars 491, 506; Prosecutor v Kunarac et al, IT-96-23 & 23/1-T, Decision on Motion for Acquittal, 3 July 2000 ("Kunarac Decision"), par 8; Kunarac Trial Judgment, pars 561-562.

the Prosecution that the appearance of the Accused at the time when the photograph was taken was the same as it was eight years earlier. Most witnesses were asked to identify the Accused from this photo array at the time of giving their witness statement to the Prosecution investigators. In most instances, this was many years after the events in which the Accused was alleged to have been involved. Some of the witnesses had by that time become aware that the Accused had been charged in relation to the activities of Milan Lukić's paramilitary group, and may have seen a photograph of the Accused in the media. Some of those witnesses were not able to identify the Accused on the photo array shown to them at the time of giving their statement to the Prosecution.

18. It would be unfair to the Accused for the Trial Chamber to attach any significant weight to the identifications of him from the photo array. Having seen the photo array for itself, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the photographs included in the array were of persons who shared similar characteristics to the Accused such as to make an identification of him from that array reliable. Only one other man could possibly have been identified from a description based upon a sighting of the Accused over a short period by a person to whom he was not previously known. The other men bore little if any similarity to the Accused. In any event, identification from a photograph is usually inherently unreliable where the witness was not previously familiar with the Accused. A photograph is only two dimensional, and it records what a person looks like in the one split second when that person may have been moving his or her features, and which may not therefore always provide a safe impression of what that person really looks like.

19. The Prosecution attempted to bolster the identification of the Accused further by having its witnesses identify the Accused in court. Because of the circumstances in which they are made, which almost inevitably lead to an identification of the person standing trial, no positive probative weight can be given to "in court" identifications.[9]

20. The Trial Chamber has also made a careful evaluation of the expert evidence adduced in this case by both the Prosecution and the Defence with respect to the authenticity of medical records purporting to relate to the Accused and relevant to the "defence" of alibi. In evaluating the probative value of this evidence, the Trial Chamber has considered the professional competence of the expert, the methodologies used by the expert and the credibility of the findings made in light of these factors and other evidence accepted by the Trial Chamber.

21. The Trial Chamber has also taken into account the extent of the consistency between the oral evidence of the witnesses at trial and statements given prior to trial. The Trial Chamber accepts that in most instances a witness's oral evidence will not be identical with the evidence given in such statement. The reason for this is that a witness may be asked questions at the trial not asked previously or may through questioning remember details previously forgotten. In general, the Trial Chamber has not treated minor discrepancies between the evidence of various witnesses, or between the evidence of a particular witness and a statement previously made by that witness, as discrediting their evidence where that witness had nevertheless recounted the essence of the incident charged in acceptable detail.[10] For these reasons, the Trial Chamber has not treated minor discrepancies between previous statements and oral testimony as discrediting the evidence of the witness as a whole, provided that the witness has been able to recount the essence of their previous evidence in reasonable detail. In determining whether any minor discrepancies should be treated as discrediting their evidence as a whole, the Trial Chamber has taken into account the fact that these events took place almost ten years before the witnesses gave evidence. Although the absence of a detailed memory on the part of these witnesses did make the task of the Prosecution more difficult, the lack of detail in relation to peripheral matters was in general not regarded as necessarily discrediting their evidence.[11]

22. In some cases, only one witness has given evidence of an incident with which the Accused is charged or otherwise involving the Accused. The Appeals Chamber has held that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not, as a matter of law, require corroboration.[12] In such a situation, the Trial Chamber has scrutinised the evidence of the Prosecution witness with great care before accepting it as sufficient to make a finding of guilt against the Accused.[13]

23. The findings by the Trial Chamber in relation to other individuals named in the evidence have been based on the evidence given in this trial, and they were made for the purposes of this trial. They have not been made for the purpose of entering criminal convictions against those other individuals. In particular, the two co-accused who have not yet been arrested, Milan Lukić and Sredoje Lukić, have not been found guilty beyond reasonable doubt in this trial of any of the crimes charged against them in the Indictment. They are not in any way bound by the findings made in this trial, and they will be able to challenge fully any evidence given in this trial which implicates them if it is given against them in their own trial before this Tribunal.

III. GENERAL REQUIREMENTS OF ARTICLE 3 AND ARTICLE 5 OF THE STATUTE

A. General requirements of Article 3 of the Statute

24. There are two general conditions for the applicability of Article 3 of the Statute: first, there must be an armed conflict; secondly, the acts of the accused must be closely related to the armed conflict.[14]

25. The requirement that the acts of the accused be closely related to the armed conflict does not require that the offence be committed whilst fighting is actually taking place, or at the scene of combat.[15] The laws of war apply and continue to apply to the whole of the territory under the control of one of the parties to the conflict, whether or not actual combat takes place there, until a general conclusion of peace or a peaceful settlement is achieved.[16] As stated by the Kunarac Appeals Chamber:[17]

> FTheğ armed conflict need not have been causal to the commission of the crime, but the existence of an armed conflict must have played a substantial part in the perpetrator's ability to commit it, his decision to commit it, the manner in which it was committed or the purpose for which it was committed.

That requirement would be satisfied if the crime were committed either during or in the aftermath of the fighting, provided that it is committed in furtherance of, or at least under the guise of, the situation created by the fighting.[18]

26. In addition, there are four conditions which must be fulfilled before an offence may be prosecuted under Article 3 of the Statute:[19]

(i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law;

(ii) the rule must be customary in nature or, if it belongs to treaty law, the required conditions must be met;

(iii) the violation must be serious, that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim; and

(iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule.

27. Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions is now part of customary international law,[20] and a serious violation thereof would at once satisfy the four requirements mentioned above.[21]

B. General requirements of Article 5 of the Statute

28. Article 5 of the Statute provides a list of offences which, if committed in an armed conflict and as part of "an attack directed against any civilian population", will amount to crimes against humanity. The expression "an attack directed against any civilian population" encompasses the following five sub-elements:[22]

(i) There must be an attack.[23]

(ii) The acts of the offender must be part of the attack.[24]

(iii) The attack must be "directed against any civilian population".[25]

(iv) The attack must be "widespread or systematic".[26]

(v) The offender must know of the wider context in which his acts occur and know that his acts are part of the attack.[27]

[24] Ibid, par 248; Kunarac Appeals Judgment, pars 85, 99-100.
[25] Art 5 of the Statute expressly uses the expression "directed against any civilian population". See Kunarac Appeals Judgment"), pars 85, 90-92, and Prosecutor v Tadić, Case IT-94-1-T, Judgment 14 July 1997 ("Tadić Trial Judgment, pars 635-644.

[27] Kunarac Appeals Judgment, pars 85, 102-104; Tadić Appeals Judgment, par 248.

29. An "attack" may be described as a course of conduct involving the commission of acts of violence.[28] In the context of a crime against humanity, the phrase "attack" is not limited to the use of armed force;[29] it also encompasses any mistreatment of the civilian population.[30]

30. The concepts of "attack" and "armed conflict" are distinct and independent. As the Tadić Appeals Chamber stated:[31]

> The two – the "attack on the civilian population" and the "armed conflict" – must be separate notions, although of course under Article 5 of the Statute the attack on "any civilian population" may be part of an "armed conflict".

The attack could precede, outlast or continue during the armed conflict, without necessarily being a part of it.[32]

31. As stated by the Appeals Chamber:[33]

> [When establishing whether there was an attack upon a particular civilian population, it is not relevant that the other side also committed atrocities against its opponent's civilian population.
>
>
> The existence of an attack from one side against the other side's civilian population would neither legitimize the attack against the civilian population nor displace the conclusion that those forces were in fact targeting a civilian population as such. Each attack against the other's civilian population would be equally illegitimate and crimes committed as part of this attack could, all other conditions being met, amount to crimes against humanity.

32. The acts of the accused must be part of the attack.[34] In effect, as stated by the Appeals Chamber, the nexus between the acts of the accused and the attack consists of the following two elements:[35]

(i) the commission of an act which, by its nature or consequences, is objectively part of the attack; coupled with

(ii) knowledge on the part of the accused that there is an attack on the civilian population and that his act is part thereof.

33. The expression "directed against any civilian population" specifies that, in the context of a crime against humanity, a civilian population is the primary object of the attack.[36] The protection of Article 5 extends to "any" civilian population including, if a state takes part in the attack, that state's own population.[37] It is therefore unnecessary to demonstrate that the victims were linked to any particular side of the conflict.[38]

34. The phrase "population" does not mean that the entire population of the geographical entity in which the attack is taking place must be subject to the attack.[39] As stated by the Appeals Chamber:[40]

> It is sufficient to show that enough individuals were targeted, or that they were targeted in such a way, so that the court is satisfied that the attack was in fact directed at the civilian "population", rather than at a number of selected individuals.

35. In addition, the attack must either be "widespread" or "systematic", thereby excluding isolated or random acts from the scope of crimes against humanity.[41] The phrase "widespread" connotes the large-scale nature of the attack and the number of victims, whist the phrase "systematic" connotes the organised nature of the acts of violence and the improbability of their random occurrence.[42] As stated by the Appeals Chamber:[43]

> Patterns of crimes – that is the non-accidental repetition of similar criminal conduct on a regular basis – are a common expression of such systematic occurrence.

36. The Appeals Chamber has stated that neither the attack nor the acts of the accused need to be supported by any form of "policy" or "plan".[44] There is nothing under customary international law which requires the imposition of an additional requirement that the acts be connected to a policy or plan.[45] At most, the existence of a policy or plan may be evidentially relevant, but it is not a legal element of the crime.[46]

37. Concerning the required state of mind, the accused[47] -

> F...ğ must have had the intent to commit the underlying offence or offences with which he is charged, and F...ğ he must know "that there is an attack on the civilian population and that his acts comprise part of that attack, or at least Fthat he tookğ the risk that his acts were part of the attack".

Furthermore, when it comes to his criminal liability, the motives of the accused for taking part in the attack are irrelevant, and a crime against humanity may be committed for purely personal reasons.[48]

38. In addition to these five requirements, the Statute provides that a crime against humanity may only be committed, pursuant to Article 5, "when committed in armed conflict". This jurisdictional requirement requires the existence of an armed conflict at the time and place relevant to the indictment, but it does not necessitate any material nexus between the acts of the accused and the armed conflict.[49]

C. Findings of facts relevant to the general requirements of Article 3 and Article 5 of the Statute

39. The municipality of Višegrad is located in south-eastern Bosnia and Herzegovina, bordered on its eastern side by the Republic of Serbia. Its main town, Višegrad, is located on the eastern bank of the Drina River. In 1991, about 21,000 people lived in the municipality, about 9,000 in the town of Višegrad. Approximately 63% of the population was of Muslim ethnicity, while about 33% was of Serb ethnicity.[50]

40. In November 1990, multi-party elections were held in this municipality. Two parties, the primarily Muslim SDA (Party for Democratic Action) and the primarily Serb SDS (Serbian Democratic Party), shared the majority of the votes. The results closely matched the ethnic composition of the municipality, with 27 of the 50 seats that composed the municipal assembly being allocated to the SDA and 13 to the SDS.[51] Serb politicians were dissatisfied with the distribution of power, feeling that they were under-represented in positions of authority. Ethnic tensions soon flared up.[52]

41. From early 1992, Muslim citizens were disarmed or requested to surrender their weapons.[53] In the meantime, Serbs started arming themselves and organised military training.[54] Muslims also attempted to organise themselves, although they were much less successful in doing so.[55]

42. From 4 April 1992, Serb politicians repeatedly requested that the police be divided along ethnic lines.[56] Soon thereafter, both of the opposing groups raised barricades around Višegrad,[57] which was followed by random acts of violence including shooting and shelling.[58] In the course of one such incident, mortars were fired at Muslim neighbourhoods.[59] As a result, many civilians fearing for their lives fled from their villages.[60] In early April 1992, a Muslim citizen of Višegrad, Murat Sabanović, took control of the local dam and threatened to release water. On about 13 April 1992, Sabanović released some of the water, damaging properties downstream.[61] The following day, the Užice Corps of the Yugoslav National Army ("JNA") intervened, took over the dam and entered Višegrad.[62]

43. Even though many Muslims left Višegrad fearing the arrival of the Užice Corps of the JNA,[63] the actual arrival of the Corps had, at first, a calming effect.[64] After securing the town, JNA

officers and Muslim leaders jointly led a media campaign to encourage people to return to their homes.[65] Many actually did so in the later part of April 1992.[66] The JNA also set up negotiations between the two sides to try to defuse ethnic tension.[67] Some Muslims, however, were concerned by the fact that the U`ice Corps was composed exclusively of Serbs.[68]

44. Soon thereafter, convoys were organised, emptying many villages of their non-Serb population.[69] On one occasion, thousands of non-Serbs from villages on both sides of the Drina River from the area around the town of Višegrad were taken to the football stadium in Višegrad.[70] There, they were searched for weapons and were addressed by a JNA commander. He told them that the people living on the left side of the Drina River could return to their villages, which had been cleansed of "reactionary forces", whereas the people from the right side of the Drina River were not allowed to go back. As a consequence, many people living on the right side of the Drina River either stayed in the town of Višegrad, went into hiding or fled.[71]

45. On 19 May 1992, the JNA withdrew from Višegrad.[72] Paramilitary units stayed behind,[73] and other paramilitaries arrived as soon as the army had left town.[74] Some local Serbs joined them.[75] The Accused admitted that he knew that some of those paramilitaries killed or robbed

Muslim civilians and that they were committing such crimes only because the victims were of Muslim ethnicity.[76]

46. A particularly violent and feared group of Serb paramilitaries was led by the co-accused Milan Lukić.[77] In the course of a few weeks, this group committed many crimes, ranging from looting to murders.[78] The Accused knew Milan Luki} well. The Accused was in a kum relationship – a strong Serbian family bond – with Milan Lukić. In 1995 or 1996, he was Milan Lukić's best man at his wedding, and since 1998 he has been the godfather of Milan Lukić's child.[79] He also knew the other men who were associated with Milan Lukić,[80] and he knew that they and Milan Luki} had committed serious crimes.[81] Despite that knowledge, the Accused was seen together with these men on several occasions during the period relevant to the Indictment.[82]

47. Those non-Serbs who remained in the area of Višegrad, or those who returned to their homes, found themselves trapped, disarmed and at the mercy of paramilitaries which operated with the complicity, or at least with the acquiescence, of the Serb authorities, in particular by the then Serb-only police force.[83]

48. Sometime in May 1992, the Accused was present when Milan Luki} and his men searched the village of Musi}i for weapons.[84] During this search, money and other valuables disappeared from some of the houses that had been searched.[85] The Accused stood guard while the search was undertaken.[86]

49. As early as June 1992, non-Serb civilians were arbitrarily killed.[87] In one such incident, on or about 7 June 1992, Milan Lukić, the Accused and two other men, took seven Muslim men to the bank of the Drina River where they were shot.[88] Five of them were killed.[89] This incident will be referred to as the Drina River Incident.[90]

50. On 14 June 1992, more than 60 Muslim civilians of all ages fleeing from Koritnik and Sase were locked up in a Muslim house in Pionirska Street, Višegrad, by local Serb paramilitaries, led by Milan Lukić. The house was then set on fire. Those who tried to escape through one of the windows were shot at and all but six were burned alive.[91] This incident will be referred to as the Pionirska Street Incident.[92]

51. Many other incidents of arbitrary killings of civilians took place in Višegrad during this period.[93] From early April 1992 onwards, non-Serb citizens also began to disappear.[94] For the next few months, hundreds of non-Serbs, mostly Muslim, men and women, children and elderly people, were killed.

52. Many of those who were killed were simply thrown into the Drina River, where many bodies were found floating.[95] Of all the bodies pulled out of the water, only one appeared to be that of a Serb.[96] Hundreds of other Muslim civilians of all ages and of both sexes were exhumed from mass graves in and around Višegrad municipality.[97]

53. The number of disappearances peaked in June and July 1992.[98] Sixty-two percent of those who went missing in the municipality of Višegrad in 1992 disappeared during those two months.

Most if not all of those who disappeared were civilians.[99] The pattern and intensity of disappearances in Višegrad paralleled that of neighbouring municipalities which now form part of Republika Srpska.[100] Disappearances in those various neighbouring municipalities occurred at approximately the same time.[101]

54. Non-Serb citizens were subjected to other forms of mistreatment and humiliation, such as rapes or beatings.[102] Many were deprived of their valuables, by Milan Lukić and his men amongst others.[103] Injured or sick non-Serb civilians were denied access to medical treatment. On one occasion, a Muslim woman who was severely burned was denied proper and adequate medical treatment and, in place of a medical prescription, was advised by a local Serb doctor to cross the mountains and the frontline in order to find a hospital on the other side where they would be prepared to treat her.[104] Two Serb witnesses testified that it would not have been safe for them to provide Muslims with medical assistance.[105]

55. Many non-Serb civilians who had not yet fled were systematically expelled in an orderly fashion.[106] Convoys of buses were organised to drive them away, and the police force sometimes escorted them.[107] In the process of their transfer, identification documents and valuables were often taken away.[108] Some of these people were exchanged, whilst others were killed. In one incident, Muslim men who had been told that they would be exchanged were taken off a bus, lined up and executed.[109] Muslim homes were looted and often burnt down.[110] The two mosques located in the town of Višegrad were destroyed.[111]

56. As a result of this process, by the end of 1992, there were very few non-Serbs left in Višegrad.[112] Hundreds had been killed arbitrarily, while thousands of others had been forcibly expelled or forcibly transferred through violence and fear. Today, most of the people living in Višegrad are of Serb ethnicity.[113] Such dramatic changes in ethnic composition occurred systematically throughout what is now the Republika Srpska, but proportionally the changes in Višegrad were second only to those which occurred in Srebrenica.[114]

D. Conclusions relevant to the general requirements of Article 3 and Article 5 of the Statute

57. The parties agreed, and the Trial Chamber is satisfied, that, at all times relevant to the Indictment, there was an armed conflict in the municipality of Višegrad.[115] The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the acts of the Accused were closely related to the armed conflict. Although he did not take part in any fighting, the Accused was closely associated with Serb paramilitaries, his acts were all committed in furtherance of the armed conflict, and he acted under the guise of the armed conflict to commit the crimes which the Trial Chamber accepted that he committed.[116]

58. The Trial Chamber is satisfied upon the evidence before it that there was a widespread and systematic attack against the non-Serb civilian population of the municipality of Višegrad at the time relevant to the Indictment.[117] The attack took many forms, starting with the Serb take-over of the town and the systematic and large-scale criminal campaign of murders, rapes and mistreatment of the non-Serb population of this municipality, particularly the Muslims, which eventually culminated in one of the most comprehensive and ruthless campaigns of ethnic cleansing in the Bosnian conflict. Within a few weeks, the municipality of Višegrad was almost completely cleansed of its non-Serb citizens, and the municipality was eventually integrated into what is now Republika Srpska.[118]

59. Although the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused was a member of any paramilitary group, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that he acted as an informant to a paramilitary group led by Milan Lukić, by providing that group with local information about Muslims. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that he did so in the knowledge that Lukić and his men committed crimes against non-Serb civilians.[119]

60. Finally, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the acts of the Accused comprised part of the widespread and systematic attack against the non-Serb civilian population of the municipality of Višegrad. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused knew of the attack, as he knew of the situation of non-Serb civilians in Višegrad and he was told about the commission of crimes committed against non-Serb civilians, by, inter alia, Milan Lukić with whom he was associated.[120] Also, in view of the sheer scale and systematic nature of the attack, the Accused must have noticed the consequences of this campaign upon the non-Serb civilian population of the Višegrad municipality. With that knowledge, the Accused decided to pursue the goals of this attack and to perpetuate it by committing very serious criminal offences, which objectively formed a part of that attack. In so doing, the Accused willingly and consciously took an active part in the attack upon the non-Serb civilian population of the municipality of Višegrad.

[120] See The Accused, T 1882, 2103-2105. As stated under the incident charged in the Indictment under pars 12 and 13 (Counts 4 through 7), the Accused gained that knowledge not later than 7 June 1992, prior to the moment when the first acts charged in the Indictment were committed.

IV. INDIVIDUAL CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

61. The Prosecution alleges that the Accused is criminally responsible for his participation in the crimes alleged in the Indictment pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Tribunal's Statute. Article 7(1) provides that:

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime.

The Prosecution pleaded Article 7(1) in its entirety. Article 7(1) includes within its terms the criminal responsibility of the Accused as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise.[121]

A. Committing

62. The Accused will only incur individual criminal responsibility for committing a crime under Article 7(1) where it is proved that he personally physically perpetrated the criminal act in question or personally omitted to do something in violation of international humanitarian law.[122]

B. Joint Criminal Enterprise

63. In the Indictment, the Prosecution alleges that the Accused "acted in concert" with Milan Lukić, Sredoje Lukić and other unknown individuals with respect to acts of extermination, persecution, murder, inhumane acts and violence to life and person. At the Pre-Trial Conference on 20 July 2001, the Prosecution was asked to state clearly what it meant by the use of the term "in concert".[123] The Prosecution initially stated that all it was trying to convey was that the Accused was not acting alone and that he did not commit the crimes by himself, but it was eventually agreed that the Prosecution was relying upon a joint criminal enterprise. The Prosecution did not plead the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, by which a member of that enterprise who did not physically perpetrate the crimes charged himself is nevertheless criminally responsible for a crime which went beyond the agreed object of that enterprise, if (i) the crime was a natural and foreseeable consequence of the execution of that enterprise, and (ii) the accused was aware that such a crime was a possible consequence of the execution of that enterprise, and, with that awareness, he participated in that enterprise.[124] Indeed, when asked, counsel for the Prosecution expressly disclaimed any intention to rely upon such a case.[125] The Trial Chamber will therefore consider only the first and second categories of joint criminal enterprise.

64. The first and second categories are basic forms of a joint criminal enterprise.[126] Both require proof that the accused shared the intent of the principal offenders of the crime.[127] The distinction drawn between the two categories relates to subject matter only, the second category being associated with the concentration camp cases or like situations.[128]

65. For individual criminal liability to arise under a joint criminal enterprise, the Prosecution must establish the existence of a joint criminal enterprise and the participation of the accused in that enterprise.[129]

66. The Prosecution must establish the existence of an arrangement or understanding amounting to an agreement between two or more persons that a particular crime will be committed. The arrangement or understanding need not be express, and it may be inferred from all the circumstances. The fact that two or more persons are participating together in the commission of a particular crime may itself establish an unspoken understanding or arrangement amounting to an agreement formed between them then and there to commit that particular criminal act.[130]

67. A person participates in a joint criminal enterprise by personally committing the agreed crime as a principal offender, or by assisting the principal offender in committing the agreed crime as a co-perpetrator (by undertaking acts that facilitate the commission of the offence by the principal offender),[131] or by acting in furtherance of a particular system in which the crime is committed by reason of the accused's position of authority or function, and with knowledge of the nature of that system and intent to further that system.[132] If the agreed crime is committed by one or other of the participants in a joint criminal enterprise such as has already been discussed, all of the participants in that enterprise are equally guilty of the crime regardless of the part played by each in its commission.[133]

[131] The Trial Chamber understands the term "co-perpetrator" as referring to a participant in a joint criminal enterprise who was not the principal offender. The co-perpetrator shares the intent of the joint criminal enterprise and is distinguishable from a person who merely aids and abets a joint criminal enterprise; see Krnojelac Trial Judgment, par 77.

68. The Prosecution must also establish that the person charged shared a common state of mind with the person who personally perpetrated the crime charged (the "principal offender") that the crime charged should be carried out, the state of mind required for that crime.[134] Where the Prosecution relies upon proof of state of mind by inference, that inference must be the only reasonable inference available on the evidence.[135]

69. If the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has proved that the Accused shared the state of mind required for the commission of any of the crimes in which he is alleged to have participated pursuant to a joint criminal enterprise, it may then consider whether it has nevertheless been proved that the Accused incurred criminal responsibility for any of those crimes as an aider and abettor to their commission.

C. Aiding and Abetting

70. An accused will incur individual criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting a crime under Article 7(1) where it is demonstrated that the accused carried out an act which consisted of practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the principal offender of the crime.[136] The act of assistance need not have caused the act of the principal offender, but it must have had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime by the principal offender.[137] The act of assistance may be either an act or omission, and it may occur before or during the act of the principal offender.[138] Mere presence at the scene of the crime is not conclusive of aiding and abetting unless it is demonstrated to have a significant encouraging effect on the principal offender.[139]

71. To establish the mens rea of aiding and abetting, it must be demonstrated that the aider and abettor knew (in the sense that he was aware) that his own acts assisted in the commission of the specific crime in question by the principal offender.[140] The aider and abettor must be aware of the essential elements of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the principal offender's state of mind. However, the aider and abettor need not share the intent of the principal offender.[141] The fact that the aider and abettor does not share the intent of the principal offender generally lessens his criminal culpability from that of an accused acting pursuant to a joint criminal enterprise who does share the intent of the principal offender.

V. THE ACCUSED'S RELATIONSHIP WITH THE PARAMILITARY GROUP LED BY MILAN LUKIĆ

72. Soon after the withdrawal of the Užice Corps of the JNA from Višegrad on 19 May 1992, several paramilitary organisations carried out widespread criminal activity within the territory of the municipality of Višegrad. A particularly violent and feared group of Serb paramilitaries was led by Milan Lukić, one of the co-Accused in the Indictment against the Accused (hereinafter "the paramilitary group").[142] Milan Lukić, who originates from the municipality of Višegrad, left the area about five years prior to the outbreak of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina and worked in Switzerland and in Obrenovać, Serbia. Sometime in early May 1992, he returned to Višegrad together with about 10 men who were at the time living in Obrenovać.[143] With these men and other individuals from the area of Vi{egrad, Milan Lukić formed a paramilitary group which in the course of a few weeks committed dozens of crimes, ranging from looting to rape and murder.[144]

73. The existence of this group and its involvement in criminal activities against the non-Serb civilian population of Vi{egrad was not disputed by the Defence.[145] The Prosecution alleges that the Accused was a member of or was closely associated with the paramilitary group and participated in the crimes committed by them. The Prosecution alleges that the Accused carried out the crimes charged in the Indictment in concert with Milan Lukić and other members of the paramilitary group.[146]

74. It was not in dispute that the Accused was present on 7 June 1992 during the incident on the bank of the Drina River, or that in the afternoon of 14 June 1992 he was in Pionirska Street where he had some interaction with at least one person from the group which was killed in the house burning incident later that day.[147] However, as the Prosecution placed great emphasis in support of its case upon the assertion that the Accused was a member of, or was closely associated with, Milan Lukić's paramilitary group, this issue is important to the determination of the Accused's responsibility for the crimes charged in the Indictment. In order to avoid the circularity which determining that issue would entail, the Trial Chamber has not considered the Drina River or Pionirska Street incidents in identifying the existence of that relationship.

75. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused did have some association with Milan Lukić's paramilitary group, but it is not satisfied that he was a member of that group or that (except as otherwise stated) he participated directly in the crimes which that group committed in Višegrad. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Milan Lukić and most of his associates had not lived in Višegrad for some time, and that they sought the assistance of local Serbs to help them identify the targets of their crimes. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused was acquainted with many members of the group prior to the events of 1992 and that, because of his close relationship with Milan Lukić, the Accused was a ready source of local information for the group about the location of Muslims in the area of Višegrad, and that he gave that information to the group with the full realisation that it would be used to persecute Muslims.[148] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that that association is a sufficient basis by itself for any finding that the Accused shared the general homicidal intentions of that group.

76. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused was able during his evidence to provide many details about the paramilitary group, the timing of its arrival in Višegrad and its members' identity and whereabouts,[149] its structure and composition,[150] the attire of its members,[151] and the group's relationship with the police,[152] than were commonly known within Višegrad.[153] The

He could not tell with certainty whether they were members of a paramilitary group (T 3021-3022). Dragisa Diki}, a car mechanic from Vi{egrad, gave evidence that during the war there were some paramilitary organizations called the White Eagles in Vi{egrad. However, he did not know any of them, and thought that they were from Serbia (T 2294, 2303-2305, 2314-1315). Dragisa Lindo, a carpenter from Tresevine, a village close to Vi{egrad, gave evidence that at the beginning of the war there were some paramilitaries in Višegrad, but he did not know who they were. He presumed they were from Serbia. He also gave evidence that amongst VGD-3 to VGD-10 he only knew VGD-10 (Sredoje Lukić), who was a policeman from Vi{egrad (T 2401-2402, 2430-2431, 2443). Dragan Simi}, a teacher from Vi{egrad, gave evidence that amongst VGD-3 to VGD-10 he only knew VGD-10 (Sredoje Luki}), who was a policeman in Vi{egrad and that he did not know whether any of them or Mitar Kneževi} was a member of a paramilitary group (T 2493, 2511-2512). VGD-23, a policeman from Vi{egrad, gave evidence that he did not know whether anyone among VGD-3 to VGD-10 was a member of a paramilitary group (T 2643, 2679). Zivorad Savi}, an ambulance driver from Vi{egrad, gave evidence that, when the JNA left, there were many paramilitaries in the area of Vi{egrad who committed all kind of crimes. He also gave evidence that he knew that, in Summer 1992 over a period of two months, Milan Luki} would pick up people in his red VW Passat and kill them. However, he was convinced that about half the people from Vi{egrad had no knowledge about that fact (T 2861, 2890-2891, 2914-2917). Snezana Neskovi}, a Serbian citizen of Vi{egrad, who was elected to the municipal council on behalf of the SDS and who was 30 years old at the time relevant to the indictment, gave Accused claimed that he knew these details because during the second half of May 1992 he saw the paramilitary group around town.[154] Moreover, he was present when in late May 1992 some of the members of the group searched the houses in the village of Musići and on 7 June 1992 during the incident at the bank of the Drina River.[155] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused, by reason of his kum relationship with the family of Milan Lukić, has a particularly close relationship with Milan Lukić.[156] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused could not have gained all this information merely from those circumstances, although it is satisfied that he may have gained some of it in that way.[157] Moreover, had he gained all the information by seeing members of the group around the streets of Višegrad, the Trial Chamber would expect some of the citizens of Višegrad giving evidence to be able to provide similar information, which was not the case.[158] On the other hand, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused's knowledge of the group, or the fact that the Accused was in a kum relationship with Milan Lukić, is sufficient to establish that the Accused was a member of the group. For that evidence to be capable of establishing that fact, it was necessary for the Prosecution to eliminate any reasonable possibility that the Accused gained his knowledge of the members of the group merely from the role played by him as an informant to the group, his involvement with them in the Musići incident (discussed below) and by virtue of his kum relationship with the family of Milan Lukić. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has done so.

77. The Accused claimed that after the events at the Drina River he had tried to avoid the company of Milan Lukić.[159] However, he admitted that in 1995 or 1996 he was best man for Milan Lukić at his wedding,[160] and that in 1997 or 1998 he was the godfather at the baptism of Milan Lukić's child.[161] The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence that there were four other men who also had the same kum relationship to Milan Lukić who could have been best man to evidence that as a woman she did not know anything about the paramilitaries in Vi{egrad. Moreover, the issue of security with respect of the paramilitaries was never discussed in the municipal council (T 3602-3603, 3672-3673).

[155] As to the incident in Musići, see pars 80-83; as to the Drina River incident, see pars 96-115.

[156] The Accused did not dispute that he had a particularly close relationship with Milan Lukić or that they were in a kum relationship. The Trial Chamber heard extensive evidence on the cultural phenomenon of kum relationships in Serbian culture (The Accused, T 1949-1950, 1954, 1957).

[157] According to the Accused's account relative to an incident in Musić in late May 1992, which will be discussed below, the Accused did not have any contact with those persons whom the Accused believed were members of the paramilitary group other than with Milan Lukić. As to the incident on the Drina River, there is no evidence from the Accused or from the two survivors of the incident that there was any kind of interaction between the Accused and the two unidentified co-perpetrators, who were known to the Accused (The Accused, T 2114; VG-32, T 286, 303).

Milan Lukić and the godfather of his child.[162] Even if these men had lived some distance away, the Accused gave evidence that a kum would travel great distances to christen a child or to be the best man.[163] The Trial Chamber also heard evidence that certain extreme circumstances may justify severing a kum relationship.[164] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the incident on the Drina River, discussed later,[165] would qualify as such extreme circumstances. However, the fact that the Accused failed to sever his kum relationship with Milan Lukić after this incident does no more than raise a suspicion of a closer relationship with the paramilitary group, and then only because the Accused allowed it to continue despite his knowledge of Milan Lukić's very serious criminal activity.

78. To establish the Accused's membership or close association with the group, the Prosecution also relied upon a number of incidents in which it alleges that the Accused participated with the paramilitary group in the commission of crimes in the Vi{egrad area. The incidents specifically relied upon in the Prosecution Final Trial Brief are (a) the searching of the house of VG-59's father in Musići, (b) the confiscation of VG-81's identity card, (c) the abduction of Rasim Torohan, (d) the "black flag" incident, (e) the killing of the elderly Kurspahić couple, and (f) the evidence of VG-80 of two other occasions where the Accused was seen to act suspiciously.[166] As discussed immediately below, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that, with respect to the first of those incidents - (a) the searching of the house of VG-59's father in Musići - the Accused's participation with Milan Lukić and others has been established. However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has sufficiently established any of the other incidents relied upon. In relation to each of those other incidents in which the Accused is alleged to have been involved, evidence of that alleged participation was given by one witness only,[167] and either the identification of the Accused or the credibility of the witness giving that evidence is of such poor quality that the evidence is insufficient for a finding that those incidents occurred.

79. The Prosecution also adduced evidence of other incidents in which the Accused is alleged to have participated with Milan Lukić and others in the commission of criminal acts in the Prosecution Final Trial Brief.[168] These incidents are specifically relied upon as rebutting the alibi "defence" raised by the Accused, and they are discussed later in that section of the Judgment.[169] They are

(g) the threats issued to VG-77, (h) the confinement of the Zljeb group in the fire station, (i) the killing of Kahriman, (j) the killing of Kupus, and (k) the killing of Nurka Kos in Kosovo Polje and of four other men in Sase.[170] For present purposes, it is sufficient to state that the Trial Chamber does not accept that the evidence of any of those other alleged incidents established the Accused's membership of Milan Lukić's group, or an association from which it can be inferred that the Accused shared the general homicidal intentions of that group.

(a) Searching of the house of VG-59's father in Musići

80. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused participated with Milan Lukić and others in the searching of the house of VG-59's father in Musići in late May 1992. The Accused admitted that he was present during this incident and that he was armed.[171] The Trial Chamber accepts the version of events given of that incident by witnesses VG-59 and VG-55, notwithstanding the different account given by the Accused, which the Trial Chamber rejects as an untruthful attempt to exculpate himself. The evidence of the Accused did not cause the Trial Chamber to have any doubt as to the truth of the evidence of these two witnesses. Both VG-59 and VG-55 knew the Accused from childhood, and neither had any bias against him which would cause them to colour their testimony.[172] In fact, had they wanted to give false evidence against the Accused, they could have exaggerated his role in the crimes committed against the people of Musići, which they did not. They did not suggest that he was otherwise involved in any criminal conduct. Indeed, the Accused gave evidence that, in his view, VG-59's and VG-55's evidence was accurate, despite the discrepancies between their account and his own.[173]

81. VG-55 and VG-59 gave evidence that, one evening towards the end of May 1992, about seven to ten armed men came to their village, Musići. Amongst them were Milan Lukić and the Accused, who walked into the house of VG-59's father. In the meantime, the other paramilitaries took money and other valuables from other houses in that village.[174] The Accused stood in the doorway with his automatic rifle, preventing anyone in the house from leaving. At the same time, Milan Lukić searched the house.[175] There was no doubt in VG-59's mind that the role of the [173] The Accused (T 2060): "FProsecution's questionğ There's no reason that you're aware of that VG59 would say anything false about you, is there? FThe Accused's answerğ No. I mean, that's exactly what I'm trying to say. Of course, the witnesses didn't enjoy the situation, I mean the fact that I was there, but I feel thankful because they could have said all kinds of things about me, that I had come there on the second or third occasion, that I had taken those women to be raped, and so on and so forth. I think that they were rather correct in their testimonies."

Accused was to guard the entrance of the house.[176] During the search, VG-55 feared that she might be killed, and she attempted to start a conversation with the Accused, whose wife had been her school friend. She held this fear even though neither the Accused nor Milan Lukić expressly threatened anyone in the house or acted aggressively.[177]

82. VG-59 gave evidence that he believed that the Accused was a member of the paramilitary group because of his involvement in the incident described above.[178] VG-59 also believed that the Accused was present in the village when the paramilitary group came back on the following day, and once again at the beginning of June. However, he conceded that he did not see the Accused during those incidents, and his belief that the Accused would have been present because VG-59 had assumed that he was a member of the group is an insufficient basis for the establishment of either of those facts.[179]

83. The Accused sought to give an innocent explanation for his participation in the Musići incident which the Trial Chamber rejects as an untruthful fabrication. He claimed that, at the time of the incident, he was working in Prelovo. In the late afternoon of the day in question, he was hitchhiking from Prelovo to Višegrad and he accepted a ride home with Milan Lukić. At the time, as he would usually do during his service in Prelovo, he was carrying an automatic rifle which had been issued to him by the Territorial Defense ("TO").[180] He claimed that on the way to Višegrad Milan Lukić, along with several other cars carrying members of the paramilitary group, stopped in the village of Musići in order to check if anyone in the village had weapons. Milan Lukić, a blond woman and the Accused went to the house of VG-59's father, whilst the other members of the paramilitary group went to other homes in the village.[181] He claimed that during this incident he repeatedly begged Milan Lukić to take it easy and not to provoke anyone,[182] and that he told VG-59 not to worry and that everything would be alright.[183] He said that he felt awkward about the situation because he went to school with the brother of VG-55 and VG-59 was a school friend of his wife, and he added that he had urged Milan Lukić to leave. As Milan Lukić searched the house, he waited near the door as he was too embarrassed to enter because he knew the family very well.[184]
