He said that, when Milan Lukić asked if there were weapons in the attic, he repeated the request to one of the people in the house and then assured Milan Lukić that he knew all of the people and that they were good people. He claimed that in this way he prevented the searching of the attic.[185] After the house of VG-59's father was searched, he left Musići together with Milan Lukić and the other armed men.[186] As already stated, the Trial Chamber rejects that version of the events.

(b) Confiscation of VG-81's identity card

84. VG-81 gave evidence that, at around the 19th of May 1992, she walked past the Accused's house on her way from her own home in Kosovo Polje. She saw the Accused in the company of three armed soldiers and his wife. The Accused was dressed in his black waiter's uniform and was holding a gun. He demanded to see her identity card and, when she produced it, he confiscated it and asked her when she would be returning to Kosovo Polje. She told him that she expected to return around 6.00 pm. To this the Accused replied: "Don't let me look for you". VG-81 said that, without her identity card, it would be very difficult for her to leave the town or to pass through its several checkpoints.[187] When asked about this incident, the Accused denied that it had occurred and said that VG-81 had fabricated the allegation.[188]

85. On the basis of the evidence given by VG-81, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that she was sufficiently associated with the Accused to be able to readily identify him.[189] However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that her evidence was credible,[190] and it does not accept her evidence in relation to this incident. Further, the evidence does not suggest that the soldiers alleged to have been with the Accused at the time were members of Milan Lukić's paramilitary group. VG-81 was only able to say that they were not from Vi{egrad.

[189] VG-81 (T 1223). Her evidence was, however, exaggerated, in that she claimed that she would see the Accused up to ten times a day. The Accused said that he knew the witness well (T 1945-1946, 2241-2242).
[190] VG-81 was a very unsatisfactory witness in many respects. Her evidence covered five separate incidents in which the Accused is alleged to have participated. When she was called in the Prosecution's case in reply, she volunteered a sixth such incident, in which the Accused was alleged to have confined a number of people in his house, including her half brother. She was obliged to admit that she had not herself witnessed this incident, and she said that she had been prompted by others to testify in relation to it (T 3913, 3963-3965). She also gave evidence in relation to an audio tape which she had made of a meeting with a Defence witness. (This is referred to later in relation to the alibi, see par 145). She gave as her reason for recording the conversation that she needed the information to assist others to locate the graves of their loved ones, yet she turned the tape recorder off as soon as the Defence witness commenced to discuss the fate of those people (T 3922-3965). Her evidence on many issues was inconsistent, and she appeared to have considerable animus against the Accused. The Trial Chamber is of the view that it is unsafe to accept any of her evidence unless it is corroborated in a material aspect by independent evidence.

(c) Abduction of Professor Rasim Torohan

86. VG-81 gave evidence that, on 9 June 1992, she saw Milan Lukić, the Accused and another person whom she did not recognise stop in a red Passat on the road in front of Kosovo Polje. They began arguing with Professor Rasim Torohan, a Muslim. VG-81 claimed that she saw them push him into the red Passat of Milan Lukić. She said that he has not been seen since.[191] A man of the same name is registered with the ICRC as missing since June 1992.[192] The Accused was not asked to comment on this allegation. For the reasons already given, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of witness VG-81 is of sufficient credibility to establish that the Accused participated in this incident.[193]

(d) Black flag incident

87. VG-81 gave evidence that, on 10 June 1992, one day before the Muslim holiday of Kurban Bajram, she saw the Accused as a passenger in a green Zastava car in the area of Gajić. He was holding a black flag out of the window which bore an insignia of a skull and cross bones on it. He called out to a number of Muslims working in their fields: "Muslims, we are distributing Kurban meat tomorrow". The witness interpreted this as a reference to the Muslim custom of slaughtering a lamb to commemorate the death of relatives.[194] It was the Prosecution case that the black flag was similar to the one which VG-59 described as hanging in the lobby of the Vilina Vlas Hotel in early June, which the Prosecution asserts was the headquarters of Milan Lukić's paramilitary group.[195] When asked about this incident, the Accused denied that it had occurred, and he said that VG-81 had fabricated it.[196]

88. In the Prosecution case in rebuttal, VG-81 said that she had also seen the Accused carrying a black flag with a skull on it and calling for the residents of Kosovo Polje to surrender on 17 June 1992.[197] The Accused's alibi "defence" is discussed below, but regardless of the Trial Chamber's findings on that issue, it is not satisfied that the evidence of VG-81 is credible and it does not accept her evidence of the Accused's participation in these incidents, for the reasons already given.[198]

(e) The killing of the elderly Kurspahić couple

89. VG-115, who lived in Pionirska Street, gave evidence that, in the early summer, Milan Lukić, the Accused and another man arrived in the street at dusk one day in a Red Passat.[199] Milan Lukić asked VG-115 where her husband was and also whether there were any Muslims around. The three of them went into the Kurspahić house. VG-115 said that she could see the Kurspahić house because on that particular evening she was staying in a house very close by and she noticed that the lights were off. The red Passat was parked below the Kurspahić house. She said that Milan Lukić, the Accused and another person searched the house with flashlights. They found the old people on the first floor. The old people begged for their lives. The witness then heard a burst of gunfire and the screams of the old woman. The old man was killed first and the old woman afterwards. The next morning, the witness saw the door of the Kurspahić house open and the legs of the old people sticking out. The bodies were lying there for five or six days before they were taken away.[200] The Accused was not asked to comment on this incident.

90. VG-115's evidence of identification was nevertheless unsatisfactory.[201] So was her evidence of what she claimed to have seen both on this occasion and in relation to the Pionirska Street incident.[202] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that her evidence is sufficiently reliable for it to establish satisfactorily the participation of the Accused in the killing of this elderly couple and finds, accordingly, that the Prosecution has failed to establish his participation in the killing.

(f) The evidence of other relevant behaviour

91. VG-80 gave evidence that, during the month of June, she saw the Accused from her apartment window in Višegrad. She said that he was armed and in the company of other armed men in the vicinity of a garage outside her window. It appeared to her that they were looking for people or property in the garage. The Accused was dressed in dark clothing, wore a cowboy hat

[199] VG-115 knew the Accused before the war as a waiter in the Panos Restaurant (T 1013-1014). The Accused gave evidence that he had known VG-115 by sight for at least five years (The Accused, T 1947-1948, 1573).

[201] In her statement to the OTP, VG-115 had said that there were two persons named Mitar Vasiljević. In her evidence she admitted that she had made a mistake – there was Mitar Vasiljević the waiter, and Mitar Knezević who was older and had an eye missing (VG-115, T 1046). A photograph of Mitar Knezević was tendered before the Trial Chamber which demonstrated that Mitar Knezević and the Accused did not share any similar characteristics.

[202] The circumstances in which VG-115 claimed to have witnessed the killing of the elderly couple were confused, and her description of the bodies lying in the doorway for five days is inconsistent with the hearsay evidence of other witnesses who confirmed the fact that the couple had been killed (VG-101, T 1163; VG-38, T 1030; VG-18, T 1573-1574). The Trial Chamber's decision not to rely upon VG-115's evidence was also influenced by the unacceptability of evidence given by the witness in relation to the Pionirksa Street incident, which was in many respects completely inconsistent with the evidence of other witnesses. She also gave evidence of a continued association of the Accused with Milan Lukić in the killing of a number of people after the Pionirska Street incident, which the Trial Chamber finds, for reasons there given, to be unreliable.

and had a red coloured ribbon around his arm.[203] She also claimed to have seen the Accused shortly before 3 July 1992.[204] On this occasion, she saw him come out of her building dragging one leg. She was unable to tell whether he was wearing a cast.[205] VG-80 claimed to have known the Accused by sight before the war. She identified him in the photo array,[206] the probative value of which has already been discussed.[207] Her evidence appears to have been coloured by subsequent knowledge that the accused was alleging that he injured his leg at about this time, so to give it greater verisimilitude. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that her identification of the Accused on either occasion is sufficiently reliable to establish the Accused's association with Milan Lukić's group.

92. Although the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established that the Accused was a member of a paramilitary group, it does not accept the arguments put forward by the Defence in support of this finding. First, the Defence said that the Accused's commitments from the date of his mobilisation by the TO until the date of his admission to the Užice Hospital excluded the possibility of him acting with the paramilitary group. On 19 May 1992, the Accused was mobilised by the TO and deployed in the field kitchen in Prelovo, where he served until 29 May 1992. On that day, he was arrested and kept in the detention facilities of the Užamnica barracks until about 1 June 1992. It was submitted that, if the Accused had really been a member of any paramilitary group, he would never have been arrested.[208] Upon his release, he was assigned by the TO to organise the cleaning of the streets of Višegrad, which he did until he broke his leg on 14 June 1992. The Defence argued that it was absolutely impossible that one of the members of Milan Lukić's group would accept the humiliating task of cleaning the town.[209] Secondly, the Accused claimed that he could not have been a member of Milan Lukić's paramilitary group because he had nothing in common with the other members. They were all from Serbia and were much younger than he was. Moreover, they would not have accepted him, because he was a drunk.[210] Finally, the Defence argued that another indicator that the Accused was not a member of the paramilitary group is the fact that Milan Lukić as well as his paramilitary soldiers wore

[204] VG-80 gave evidence that she saw the Accused at a distance of between 9 feet 10 inches and 16 feet 1 inch (the estimate in imperial measurements results from the use of a plan of the courtroom in the construction of which the United Kingdom had been involved, as she estimated the distance by reference to the courtroom; the metric equivalent is between about 3 and 5 metres) (VG-80, T 735; Ex P 57).

camouflage military, or police uniforms which were mostly blue, whilst the Accused wore a dark single-coloured SMB uniform which was used by the former JNA.[211]

93. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused's commitments during the period from mid-May until mid-June 1992 did not prevent him from being associated with the paramilitary group to the limited extent already accepted. The Accused admitted that in late May, while he was deployed by the TO in the field kitchen in Prelovo, he was with Milan Lukić and other members of the paramilitary group when they searched the houses in the village of Musići.[212] Moreover, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the fact that the Accused spent around three days in the detention facility in the Užamnica barracks, for a reason which was not made clear during trial,[213] does not exclude the Accused's association with the paramilitary group before and after this short period. Also, the task of cleaning the street did not prevent the Accused from acting together with Milan Lukić and his men to the extent already accepted. The Accused gave evidence that he would carry out this task for only one hour per day, that no one set his timetable, that he was not supervised and that he was not required to report back to anyone.[214]

94. The Trial Chamber rejects the Defence argument that the Accused could not have been a member of the paramilitary group because the other members were outsiders and much younger than he was or because he was a drunk. This was mere speculation by the Accused, not evidence. Moreover, the Accused gave evidence that Mitar Knežević was, within the paramilitary group, the right hand of Milan Lukić.[215] It has been established that Mitar Knežević, who was from the area of Višegrad, was even older than the Accused and was also prone to alcohol abuse.[216] The Trial Chamber also rejects the argument of the Defence that the fact that the Accused wore another type of uniform to that worn by the other members of the paramilitary group implies that he was not associated with them.[217] The SMB uniform the Accused wore was a uniform of the former JNA,

The parties further agreed that the Accused would wear an olive grey (SMB) JNA type uniform with a double-headed eagle insignia. Occasionally he also wore a black military hat with the same insignia, see, Ex P 36-1 (w).

[213] The Accused gave different explanations as to the reason why he was kept in the detention facility in the Užamnica barracks. During his examination in chief, he suggested that he was arrested because he refused to carry out the dangerous task of bringing food to the frontline. During cross-examination, he gave evidence that the arrest might also have been a result of his drinking habits while on duty (T 1877, 2018).

which had been issued to him about ten years earlier as a member of the reserve forces. The Accused had worn this uniform since his mobilisation by the TO in mid-May 1992.[218]

95. To conclude, and as already stated, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused was a member of Milan Lukić's paramilitary group, or that his association with that group was such that it is possible to draw an inference beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused shared the general homicidal intentions of that group. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that he had some association with that group, in that he willingly acted as an informant to that group, and that this willingness arose from his close relationship with Milan Lukić.

VI. DRINA RIVER INCIDENT

A. The Events

96. Counts 4 and 5 of the Indictment charge the Accused with murder as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(a) of the Statute, and as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3 of the Statute and recognised as punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. Count 6 charges the Accused with inhumane acts as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(i) of the Statute, and Count 7 charges the accused with violence to life and person as a violation of the laws or customs of war, punishable under Article 3 of the Statute and recognised as punishable under Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. Each of these counts relates to the Drina River incident. In addition, Count 2 of the Indictment charges the Accused with persecution on political, racial and religious grounds as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(h) of the Statute. The persecution charge is based, inter alia, upon the Accused's participation in the Drina River incident, but it will be dealt with in a separate section of this Judgment.[219]

97. The Prosecution alleges that, on 7 June 1992, the Accused, together with his co-accused Milan Lukić and two other unidentified individuals, forcibly transported seven Bosnian Muslim civilians to the eastern bank of the Drina River. There, they are alleged to have forced the seven men to line up on the bank of the river and to have opened fire at them. Five of the seven men died as a result of the shooting, two escaped without physical injury.[220]

[220] See, Prosecution Final Trial Brief, 28 Feb 2002, pp 30-45.

98. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Prosecution has established that this incident occurred, and that the shooting resulted in the death of Meho Džafić, Ekrem Džafić, Hasan Kustura, Hasan Mutapčić and Amir Kurtalić.[221] The other two men, VG-14 and VG-32, survived the shooting without physical injury.[222] They did so by falling into the water when the shooting started and by pretending to be dead.[223] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused participated in the shooting and that he did so sharing the intention of the others in the group that the seven Bosnian men be killed.

99. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, on the afternoon of 7 June 1992,[224] Milan Lukić, and two other unidentified men[225] forcibly detained seven Muslim male civilians (VG-14, VG-32, Meho Džafić, Ekrem Džafić, Hasan Kustura, Hasan Mutapčić and Amir Kurtalić)[226] and took them to a house near the Bikavac Hotel in Višegrad.[227] A short time later, they directed these seven Muslim men into two cars, a red VW Passat, known to be in the possession of Milan Lukić, and a green Yugo, and drove them to the Vilina Vlas Hotel, in Višegradska Banja.[228] It was accepted by the parties that the Vilina Vlas Hotel was the headquarters of the paramilitary group led by Milan Lukić,[229] and that it had previously been used to detain Muslim civilians.[230] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that throughout the entire incident Milan Lukić carried a sniper rifle with a silencer, and that the other two men each carried an automatic rifle.[231]

100. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, once at the Vilina Vlas Hotel, the seven men were taken into the reception area, where the Accused, already present at the hotel, was standing near the hotel counter.[232] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, while Milan Lukić began to search for some keys, the seven unarmed men stood in a semi-circle inside the lobby of the hotel. One of the unidentified armed men guarded them, pointing his automatic rifle at them, preventing any of them from leaving the lobby of the hotel.[233] When one of the Muslims asked about their fate, this unidentified man answered that they were to be exchanged for some Serb captives.[234]

101. The Trial Chamber rejects the Accused's evidence that, while Milan Lukić was searching for the keys, he took Meho D'afić outside for a cigarette and that Meho D'afić had told him that the men were to be exchanged and requested the Accused to accompany them. As already stated, it accepts the evidence of VG-32 that the seven victims were standing in a semi-circle inside the lobby of the hotel, and that one of the armed men was guarding them.[235] The Trial Chamber further accepts the evidence of VG-32 that there was no conversation between Meho D'afić and the Accused whilst at the hotel.[236] There was no occasion when such a conversation could have taken place as alleged by the Accused.

102. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Milan Lukić, who could not find the keys he was looking for, ordered the Muslim men to go back to the cars, whereupon the seven Muslim men, Milan Lukić, the Accused and the two unidentified men entered the two cars and drove away.[237] The Muslim men travelling in the green Yugo were told once again by one of the paramilitaries travelling with them that they would be taken to an exchange.[238]

103. The Trial Chamber rejects the Accused's evidence that he was unarmed at the hotel.[239] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, when the Accused left the Vilina Vlas Hotel with Milan Lukić, the two unidentified armed men, and the seven Muslim men, he was in possession of an automatic weapon, which he carried to the Drina River. VG-32 gave evidence that he first saw the Accused carrying a weapon when he left the Vilina Vlas Hotel, and VG-14 gave evidence that he saw the Accused with an automatic rifle inside the lobby of the hotel.[240] When giving evidence in Court, both witnesses identified the weapon of the Accused as an automatic rifle.[241]

[239] VG-14 gave evidence that he saw the Accused with an automatic rifle inside the lobby of the hotel (VG-14, T 433, 440, 457), while VG-32, although he did not see him with a weapon before they left the hotel, did not suggest that he did not have one at an earlier stage. All he said was that he did not see him with a weapon inside the hotel (VG-32, T 261, 271, 275). The Accused claimed that he returned the weapon issued to him by the TO when he was arrested at Bikavac on 29 May 1992 and, after his release on 1 June 1992, he was not issued with any weapon (The Accused, T 1878, 1888); Ex P 15.1, p 77.
[240] VG-32 (T 261, 271, 275); VG-14 (T 433, 440, 457). VG-79 gave evidence that the three and sometimes four people walking towards the Drina River behind the seven Muslim men were all armed (T 324).
[241] VG-14 (T 467). The Trial Chamber does not attach significance to the fact that one of the two witnesses during a prior statement given to the investigators of the Prosecution identified the weapon of the Accused as a semi-automatic rifle.

104. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that once they reached Sase, instead of continuing towards Višegrad, the cars carrying the seven Muslim men turned right towards Višegradska Zupa, stopping about one kilometre later.[242] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the seven Muslim men were instructed to get out of the cars and ordered by Milan Lukić to walk through a field towards the bank of the Drina River, which was about 100 metres away. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that they were forced to walk at gunpoint towards the River. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the seven Muslim men were told that they would be killed if they tried to escape. [243]

105. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, when the Accused left the Vilina Vlas Hotel, he knew that the men were not to be exchanged but were to be killed. The evidence of the Accused himself was that he knew that Milan Lukić had committed serious crimes, including killings, in the area of Višegrad shortly prior to the Drina River incident. On the afternoon of 7 June 1992, during the drive from Višegrad to the Vilina Vlas Hotel, he had been told by the man who had driven him there that Milan Lukić had, on several occasions, taken out Muslim employees from the Varda Factory in order to mistreat or kill them. [244] The Trial Chamber rejects the Accused's evidence that it was only when Milan Lukić stopped the cars near Sase and ordered the seven men to walk towards the bank of the Drina River that he understood that these men were not to be exchanged, but that they were to be killed.[245]

106. The Trial Chamber rejects as wholly untrue the evidence of the Accused that he tried to persuade Milan Lukić to spare the life of Meho Džafić or any other man in that group.[246] The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of VG-32 that the Accused said nothing in response to the pleas of Meho Džafić as the men were marched towards the bank of the Drina River.[247]

107. The Trial Chamber also rejects the evidence of the Accused that, in any event, he was powerless to stop Milan Lukić from killing the Muslim men. VG-32 and VG-14 gave evidence of their impression that throughout the entire incident there was no one around Milan Lukić who could have affected him or his decisions and orders in a meaningful way. However, the Accused's claim of duress is inconsistent with the evidence that, one week prior to the shooting at the Drina River and during the Musići incident,[248] he had successfully pleaded with Milan Lukić not to mistreat and harass the people in that house. He asserted that he was the only person who could help on that occasion, and that he had prevented the people living in that house from being mistreated and harassed by Milan Lukić.[249] The Trial Chamber has already rejected that claim,[250] but the inconsistent claims by the Accused as to his relationship with Milan Lukić has persuaded the Trial Chamber that the Accused is prepared to give false versions of that relationship according to the benefit he seeks to obtain at the time each version is given. There was no other acceptable evidence that the Accused was under duress vis-à-vis Milan Lukić. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused willingly accompanied Milan Lukić and his group with the seven Muslim men to the Drina River.

108. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Milan Lukić, the Accused and the other two unidentified men pointed their guns, which had their safety catches off, at the Muslim men, as they walked towards the bank of the Drina River.[251] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused followed the men to the banks of the Drina River, and it rejects as untruthful the Accused's evidence that, when he realised that he could not persuade Milan Lukić to spare the men, he turned away from the group and stopped some 10 to 15 metres away from the river.[252]

109. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, when they reached the bank of the river, the seven Muslim men were lined up facing the river,[253] and that Milan Lukić, the Accused and the other two unidentified men lined up approximately five to six metres behind the Muslim men.[254]

110. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the evidence of VG-79, who observed the scene from the opposite bank of the Drina River, is not inconsistent with this finding. VG-79's evidence was that he saw three and sometimes four armed men walking towards the bank of the Drina River behind the seven unarmed men.[255] He said that, when the seven unarmed men lined up along the river, he saw only three of the armed men standing behind them. However, he also said that a fourth person was partially covered by a tree,[256] and that his focus when watching the scene was on two of the Muslim victims who were his friends rather than upon the four men who were armed.[257] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that all four men stood behind the seven Muslims and that the Accused was one of them.

111. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that some of the Muslim men begged for their lives and that their pleas were ignored.[258] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, following a brief discussion on the manner in which to shoot them,[259] the armed men opened fire shooting at the seven Muslims.[260] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, after two sequences of gunshots, one of the armed men remarked that someone was still alive. Two of the armed men then approached the river and fired more gunshots towards the Muslim men lying in the water.[261] Satisfied that all seven Muslim men were dead, the armed men walked back to the cars and drove away.[262]

B. The Factual Findings

112. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused fired his weapon at the same time as the other three, or that he personally killed anyone or more of the victims. VG-32 gave evidence that, immediately before the shooting started, he heard three clicks, which were produced by the specific devices of the automatic rifles of the Accused and the two other unidentified men. VG-32 said that, by adjusting those devices, the method of shooting was adjusted from bursts of gunfire to individual shots.[263] Milan Lukić's sniper rifle did not have such device. VG-14 gave evidence that the first sequence of shots consisted of three loud shots and one "bluff" or muted shot. He specified that the three loud shots came from the automatic rifles of the Accused and of the other two unidentified men, and that the "bluff" shot came from Milan Lukić's sniper rifle, which had a silencer.[264] Because of the extraordinarily tense situation in which they were at the time, the evidence given by VG-32 and VG-14 that they remembered the number of shots fired is not sufficiently reliable to base a finding beyond reasonable doubt on that evidence only that the Accused actually pulled the trigger. Even the most honest witnesses can convince themselves of what must have happened by a perfectly natural process of unconscious reconstruction. The Trial Chamber accepts that these two witnesses honestly believed that this is what happened, but it cannot exclude the very understandable and natural possibility that they have unconsciously reconstructed it.

113. Although the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that it has been established that the Accused actually killed anyone or more of the victims, it is nevertheless satisfied that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence is that the Accused, by his actions, intended that the seven Muslim men be killed, whether or not he actually carried out any of those killings himself. One member of the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence relating the number of clicks, although this evidence is not regarded by that Judge as essential or necessary to the determination of the accused's intention. The majority has no doubt that VG-32 honestly believed that he heard three clicks, but the majority is not satisfied that there is no element of perfectly natural reconstruction involved in that belief. The majority of the Trial Chamber makes an identical finding in relation to the evidence of VG-14 concerning the number of shots and the nature of the noise produced by the [263] VG-32 (T 279, 286-287). VG-32 did not mention this detail in the statement he gave to the investigators, even though he stated that still today he is sometimes woken up from his sleep by the sound of those three clicks. VG-32 (T 306, 279).

[264] VG-14 (T 440); VG-14 gave evidence that, following the brief discussion about the manner in which to shoot, "a click" was heard, which was produced by the weapons when being adjusted from bursts of gunfire to individual shots (T 439-440). VG-32 gave evidence that he did not count the number of shots (T 279-281, 307).

weapons being fired. The conclusion of all three members of the Trial Chamber in relation to the intent of the Accused that those seven men be killed is thus identical.

114. The Prosecution made it clear in its Pre-Trial Brief that the Accused was charged with inhumane acts in relation to that incident only in relation to the two survivors, and not the five murdered men.[265] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused intended that the two survivors of the shooting, VG-32 and VG-14, were also to be killed. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the participation of the Accused in the attempted murder of VG-32 and VG-14 constitutes a serious attack on their human dignity, and that it caused VG-32 and VG-14 immeasurable mental suffering. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused, by his acts, intended to seriously attack the human dignity of VG-32 and VG-14 and to inflict serious physical and mental suffering upon them.

VII. PIONIRSKA STREET INCIDENT

A. The Events

116. Count 1 of the Indictment charges the Accused with extermination as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(b) of the Statute, in relation to the Pionirska Street incident. Count 10 and Count 11 of the Indictment charge the Accused with murder as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(a) of the Statute, and as a violation of the laws or customs of war punishable under Article 3 of the Statute, recognised as punishable by common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. Count 12 of the Indictment charges the Accused with inhumane acts as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(i) of the Statute, while Count 13 charges the Accused with violence to life and person as a violation of the laws and customs of war punishable under Article 3 of the Statute, recognised as punishable by common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions. These counts also relate to the Pionirska Street incident. In addition, Count 2 of the Indictment charges the Accused with persecution on political, racial or religious grounds as a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 5(h) of the Statute. The persecution charge is based, inter alia, upon the Accused's participation in the Pionirska Street incident, but it will be dealt with below, in a separate section of this Judgment.[267]

117. The Prosecution alleges that, on 14 June 1992, the Accused directed a group of Bosnian Muslim women, children and elderly men to a house in Pionirska Street in the Mahala neighbourhood of Višegrad municipality.[268] It alleges that the Accused, in concert with his co-accused and other individuals, robbed the group from its money and valuables.[269] The Prosecution alleges that, later that same day, the Accused in concert with his co-accused and other individuals forcibly moved the group to a nearby house also on Pionirska Street and barricaded the group into one room of that house.[270] A number of other people were already present in that room. The Prosecution then alleges that, in concert with his co-accused and others, the Accused placed an incendiary device in the room which set the house on fire. It alleges that the room had been prepared for the fire earlier by the spread of flammable substances and that, as a result, the fire spread quickly. It further alleges that the Accused shone a flashlight on the people who tried to escape the fire through the windows of the room, whilst the co-accused fired upon them with automatic weapons.[271] The Prosecution claims that approximately 65 to 70 people died as a result of this incident, while a small number survived, some with serious physical injuries.[272]

118. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that on Sunday, 14 June 1992,[273] the fourth day of Kurban-Bajram, a group of about 60 Muslim civilians[274] were forced to leave the village of Koritnik as part of the ongoing campaign of "ethnic cleansing".[275] This group, comprising mainly women, children and the elderly,[276] was joined by about five other individuals from the area of Sase ("Koritnik group"),[277] and they travelled on foot to the town of Višegrad in search of a convoy which would take them to Muslim-held territory.[278] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, in its search for the convoy, the group inquired at the police station and was directed onwards to the Višegrad Hotel where the Red Cross was alleged to have been situated.[279]

119. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the group reached the Višegrad Hotel sometime between 12.15 and 1.00 pm on 14 June 1992.[280] Once there, they were told that the buses had already left for that day but that there would be another convoy the following day.[281] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the group were instructed to spend the night in the houses vacated by the fleeing Muslim population in the Mahala neighbourhood.[282]

120. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the group departed from the hotel to Pionirska Street in the Mahala neighbourhood. There, the group at first settled in two houses belonging to the Memić family, which were situated next to each other.[283] Later they moved into a single house, the house belonging to Jusuf Memić ("the Memić house").[284]

121. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that about one hour later,[285] sometime between 4.30 and 6.00 pm,[286] a group of armed men arrived at the Memić house. Amongst the armed men were Milan Lukić, Sredoje Lukić and Milan Sušnjar (also known as "Laco").[287] Some of the armed men entered the house whilst others remained outside.[288] Inside the house, the armed men ordered the people in the group to hand over their money and valuables, and subjected them to a strip search.[289] The search and collection of money and valuables took between one hour and two and a half hours.[290]

122. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the armed men left the house at around 7.00 to 7.30 pm,[291] and that they instructed the Koritnik group to remain in the house for the night.[292] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, before they left, some of the armed men took out Jasmina Vila and another woman and raped them.[293]

123. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, sometime later, a car of armed men returned to the house and ordered the group to move to another house.[294] There was some issue as to the time when they returned.[295] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that it was dark when the armed men returned,[296] and therefore that it must have been between 8.30 and 9.00 pm at the earliest.[297]

[297] Ex D 44 established that, on 14 June 1992, the sunset in Visegrad was at 8.24 pm. The reliability of this exhibit was seriously called into question by the Trial Chamber (Defence closing arguments, T 4936-4937). Ex P 148, the Muslim calendar for the year 1992, established that sunset was at 8.36 pm. The difficulty with this exhibit lies in that it is not known where the measurements were taken from (Defence closing arguments, T 4938). Moreover, it reflects the time of sunset, not necessarily the time when it gets dark, bearing in mind the longer Summer twilight

124. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the men who had been at the house earlier were amongst those who returned, including Milan Lukić, Sredoje Lukić and Milan Sušnjar.[298] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Kortinik group was told that the "Green Berets" were attacking and that they were to be moved to a safe place.[299] The group was then transferred to the house of Adem Omeragić ("the Omeragić house"),[300] situated about 20 to 50 metres away from the Memić house and next to the creek.[301] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, as the group was being transferred, the armed men, carrying flashlights, moved between the two houses guarding the group.[302] Despite this, during the transfer, two members of the group managed to break away from the group and hid behind a shed and then escaped.[303]

125. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Koritnik group was crowded into a single room in the ground floor of the Omeragić house, and that there were a number of other people already in there.[304] The group was then locked inside the house.[305] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, sometime later,[306] the door of the room was opened and armed men introduced an incendiary or explosive device into the overcrowded room.[307] This device ignited a fire near the door.[308]

126. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the house had been prepared in advance for the fire. The carpet in the room was wet and smelt like glue,[309] and the smoke from the fire was of unusual thickness.[310] The fire was high and it spread quickly, demonstrating that some type of flammable

(T 4938-9). In any case, it would appear that what is clear from the evidence is that the armed men returned to transfer the group in the dark, so that it would have necessarily been sometime after 8.30pm.

[298] VG-38 gave evidence that Milan Lukić, Sredoje Lukić, Milan Sušnjar and the Accused arrived (VG-38, T 1377). VG-101, VG-78 and VG-13 gave evidence that they saw Milan Lukić and the Accused (VG-101, T 1168; VG-78, T 1290; VG-13, T 1443). For the Accused's participation, see pars 148-153. VG-84 gave evidence that he saw Sredoje Lukić (VG-84, T 1673). VG-18 spoke simply of several men (VG-18, T 1595). VG-61 claimed that the Accused was there with Milan Lukić, Sredoje Lukić, Zoran Joksimović and another (VG-61, T 795). substance had been used.[311] Apart from the entrance door, two windows to the side of the room facing the creek provided the only escape routes.[312]

127. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, as the flames spread, the armed men hurled more explosives into the house.[313] Some of the people in the house attempted to get out by breaking the glass of the window and jumping out. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that some of the armed men stood outside underneath the windows to shoot at those who were attempting to flee. With the aid of flashlights they shot at those who were jumping out of the window or who had already done so.[314]

128. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that approximately sixty six (66) people died as a result of the fire. A number of the victims managed to escape the fire. V G-61's father ran through the flames and escaped through the front door when the explosion which caused the fire blasted the door open.[315] VG-18 managed to secure an opening in the reinforced glass of the window and was pushed outside by VG-84, who jumped out after her.[316] VG-38 followed suit.[317] VG-13 also jumped out of the window. As she attempted to flee, she was shot at and injured in the arm.[318] Edhem Kurspahić also managed to escape.

B. The "defence" of alibi and identification of the Accused

129. In response to the Prosecution's allegations that the Accused personally participated in the looting, the transfer of the group to the Omeragi} house, and the setting on fire of that house, the Accused raised a "defence" of alibi. He claimed that, at the time of these events, he was either on his way to, or present in, the General Hospital in Užice ("the Užice Hospital"). The Trial Chamber does not accept all of the evidence of the Accused in relation to the alibi. However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of Prosecution witnesses who claimed to have seen the Accused participating in the different stages of the Pionirska Street incident establishes beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused was not on the way to, or present in, the U`ice Hospital at the relevant time, when that evidence was considered in light of the alibi raised by the Accused.[319]

[319] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused was present, as he admitted, in the region of Pionirksa Street prior to this incident (VG-87, T 1090, 1105). Given the admission of the Accused that he was present in Pionirksa Street,

130. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has eliminated the reasonable possibility that the Accused was elsewhere at the time of the looting, transfer of the Kortinik group and setting on fire of the house.

131. The Accused gave evidence that he met his acquaintance Mujo Halilović and the group from Koritnik on his way to the Vučine neighbourhood, where he intended to collect a horse belonging to a Muslim who had left the area.[320] After speaking with Mujo Halilović,[321] he continued on his way to the Vučine neighbourhood.[322] He claimed that he arrived there at about 4.30 or 5.00 pm, and that once there he collected the horse and then returned riding the horse bareback through Pionirska Street.[323] He gave evidence that, when he arrived in the centre of Višegrad, the horse slipped in front of the Višegrad Hotel, that he fell from the horse and that the horse then fell on top of him. As a result, his lower left leg was broken. His evidence was that this occurred at about 5.00 pm.[324]

132. The Accused said that an ambulance arrived some ten to fifteen minutes after his fall, and that he was then driven to the Višegrad Health Centre.[325] He said that the ambulance then drove him for further treatment to the Užice Hospital, and that it left Višegrad at about 7.00 or 8.00 pm.[326] He claimed that the ambulance stopped for about 20 minutes in the village of Vardište on the way to Užice, at the coffee bar of his uncle.[327]

133. There was considerable evidence given in support of the alibi, by Petar Mitrović, Ratomir Simsić, Zivorad Savić, Dr Loncarević, Miloje Novaković and Dobrivoje Sikirić, all of whom corroborated the evidence of the Accused to differing degrees. Ratomir Simsić and Petar Mitrović said that they saw the Accused fall from the horse, and that the horse fall on the Accused's leg between 3.40 and 5.15 pm.[328] Zivorad Savić, the ambulance driver, said that he arrived at the scene at about 5.00 pm and drove the Accused to the Višegrad Health Centre.[329] Dr Goran Loncarević said that he treated the Accused when he was admitted at the Višegrad Health Centre and that he did meet with the Kortinik group, it is unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to consider in detail the evidence of witnesses that claimed to have seen the Accused in that vicinity on the day in question. However, to the extent that the evidence of those witnesses impacts upon other issues in the Prosecution case, the Trial Chamber will make some findings with respect to its reliability. See pars 168-178.

sometime between 4.00 and 6.00 pm.[330] Zivorad Savić said that he transported the Accused from the Višegrad Health Centre to the Užice Hospital, leaving the Health Centre between 6.00 and 7.00 pm.[331] Miloje Novaković said that he accompanied the Accused and Zivorad Savić to Užice Hospital, and he corroborated the times given in evidence.[332] Dobrivoje Sikirić, the uncle of the Accused, said that the Accused, Miloje Novaković and Zivorad Savić stopped at his coffee bar in Vardiste on their way to Užice Hospital.[333] Zivorad Savić and Miloje Novaković said that they arrived at the Užice Hospital between 8.40 and 9.00 pm.[334]

134. The Trial Chamber does not accept a great deal of the evidence of these witnesses which was given in support of the alibi.[335] All of the defence witnesses who gave such evidence were friends or acquaintances of the Accused, and the Trial Chamber believes that there was a degree of fabrication on their part in an endeavour to assist him.

135. In particular, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the records of the Višegrad Health Centre are reliable.[336] To establish the presence of the Accused at the Višegrad Health Centre, the protocol of registration of patients for the relevant period was produced.[337] These records were incomplete, and it appeared that there had been little attempt made to ensure that they were accurate. There exists an entry in those records bearing the name of Sredoje Lukić for 14 June 1992. The surname Lukić had been overwritten by the name Bogić.[338] Although that alteration in itself is not overly significant in relation to this Accused, it did add to the suspicion already felt by the Trial Chamber as to the reliability of the records of the Višegrad Health Centre.

[335] The majority of these witnesses for the Defence claimed to be certain or fairly certain that the date on which the Accused fractured his leg was 14 July 1992 because that day, the Holy Trinity, was of special religious significance for them (The Accused, T 2150; Milojka Vasiljević, T 2549, 2550; Ratomir Simsić, T 2819-20; Zivorad Savić, T 2882; Miloje Novaković, T 3045-3046); Ex D 53. Other witnesses for the Defence gave evidence that they could not recall the exact date upon which the Accused was admitted to hospital outside the information which was contained in the medical records, but they could ascertain that he was in fact in hospital (Dr Loncarević, T 3000; Milena Tomsevic, T 3207-3209; Dr Simić, T 3269; Slavica Pavlović, T 3408; Dr Jovanović, T 3631-2).

[338] The Trial Chamber accepts that this overwriting is not overly significant as proof that Sredoje Lukić, who is indicted together with the Accused as an alleged co-perpetrator of the fire burning on Pionirska Street, prepared an alibi defence, given that the year of birth that accompanies it does not even remotely correspond with Sredoje Lukić's year of birth. See further Ex D 54.

136. The Trial Chamber does, however, accept the accuracy of the medical records from the Užice hospital, of which some had been seized from Dr Aleksandar Moljević on 1 November 2000 pursuant to an order of the Tribunal,[339] and that these records give rise, at the least, to the reasonable possibility that the Accused was present at the Užice hospital as stated in those records.[340] Amongst the records which were seized were two ledgers, and a four-page medical history.[341] The first of the four pages of the case history bore the name and surname of the Accused, and recorded the date of his admission to Užice hospital as 14 June 1992.[342] The two ledgers - the protocol of patients admitted to Užice Hospital,[343] and the protocol of patients from the war zone admitted to Užice hospital[344] - both had entries bearing the name of Mitar Vasiljević and showed the admission date to the orthopaedic ward in Užice hospital as 14 June 1992. The later protocol recorded the time of admission as 9.35 pm.[345] These ledgers appeared to have been stored for quite a long time. They were covered in dust and dirt and smelt unpleasant.[346]

137. In addition to the admission records, the nurses' shift book from the orthopaedic ward at Užice Hospital bore the Accused's name under the heading of persons admitted during the third duty shift on 14/15 June 1992.[347] The third shift extended from 8.00 pm on 14 June 1992 until 6.00 am on 15 June 1992.[348] The time of the Accused's admission to the orthopaedic ward is thus consistent with the time recorded in the protocol of patients from the war zone admitted to Užice hospital and with the alibi raised by the Accused.

138. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that there was no evidence to suggest that these hospital records had been interfered with. The Prosecution conceded that, after subjecting them to extensive and repeated forensic analysis, the protocol of patients admitted to Užice Hospital, the protocol of patients from the war zone admitted to Užice hospital, and the four pages that made up the case history showed no sign of forgery.[349] The Prosecution also subjected the protocol of registration of patients to the Višegrad Health Centre for the relevant period to forensic analysis, and conceded again that, aside from an evident overwriting in one of the entries, bearing the name of a co-accused, there was nothing to suggest this record had been tampered with.[350]

139. The Trial Chamber rejects the Prosecution's contention that alleged inconsistencies in the medical records showed that the records did not relate to the Accused. The second page of the Accused's case history in the Užice Hospital described the cause of the fracture as a fall on the flat surface of the battlefield. The Accused was never at a battlefield, and he was never claimed to have been.[351] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that this inconsistency establishes that these medical records did not refer to the Accused. Any reference to the horse's role in causing the fracture to the Accused's leg was, as one defence witness put it, not material to the diagnosis.[352] Moreover, the Trial Chamber heard evidence that the term "battlefield" (ratište) was employed to designate the geographical area affected by war, which, in the context of June 1992 in the Užice Hospital in Serbia, primarily referred to the whole of Bosnia-Herzegovina.[353] Further, this use of the term "battlefield" also explained why the Accused's name was entered into the protocol of patients admitted from the war zone. The status of the Accused as a reservist of the Territorial Defence would also sufficiently explain why it is recorded in that protocol and also why the case history notes that the military post of the SUP was notified of the Accused's injury.[354]

140. The Trial Chamber rejects the Prosecution's contentions that inconsistencies in the medical record of the diagnosis suggested that the records were not that of the Accused. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Latin term fractura cruris, namely fracture of the lower leg, could refer to both fracture of the tibia only, and a fracture of the tibia and the fibula.[355] In this sense, the referral diagnosis recorded in the case history and in the protocol of patients admitted from the war zone - fracture of the fibia and the tibula - is not inconsistent with fractura cruris as the final diagnosis in the case history and in the operations protocol.[356] In this respect, the protocol of registration of patients to the Višegrad Health Centre recorded the diagnosis for the Accused on 14 June 1992 solely as fractura, which is an incomplete diagnosis rather than an inconsistent one.[357] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the alleged inconsistencies in the medical records, which could have gone some way to supporting the idea that someone else was using the Accused's name, were also to a large extent convincingly explained by witnesses.[358]

[356] Furthermore, the referral diagnosis is the diagnosis on the basis of which the patient would have been referred to Užice Hospital, and which would have appeared in the referral paper pursuant to which the patient would have been received in the Užice Hospital from the Višegrad Health Centre (Dr Loncarević, T 3014; Zivorad Savić, T 2874; Dr Moljević T 3731-2).
[358] Moreover, the blood group of the Accused coincided with the blood group that appeared under the Accused's name in the records that were seized from Dr Moljević. The Trial Chamber finds this last circumstance to be of limited significance insofar as the parties agreed that the frequency of the blood type of the Accused is 32.3 per cent of the population (T 4647-4649).

141. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the consistency of the medical records from different wards of the Užice hospital with each other further reinforced not just their reliability, but also their authenticity, insofar as it further demonstrated the absence of forgery.[359]

142. The Trial Chamber accepts that the x-ray which was seised by the Prosecution from Dr Moljević was probably not an x-ray of the Accused. The Trial Chamber accepts the view of Dr Raby that the x-ray is not of the Accused's leg.[360] However, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the authenticity of this x-ray does not affect its acceptance of the medical records, and that it does not eliminate the reasonable possibility that the Accused was on his way to or at the Užice hospital at the time when the transfer of the Koritnik group occurred in Višegrad. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that there was deliberate interference with the labelling of the x-ray, rather than a negligent but innocent mix-up of the x-rays of different patients.[361] It may also be the result of a deliberate attempt by someone to provide a false case in support of the Accused, but there has been no evidence that Dr Moljević, from whom it was seised, was involved in any way in tampering with these x-rays. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence

[359] The records from the Užice Hospital were largely consistent with each other, in terms of the patients' personal identification number, date of admission, the Accused's date of transfer to the psychiatric ward and date of release, and they also corresponded with the practice of the staff from the Užice Hospital which witnesses testified to (Ex P 136, Ex P 137, Ex P 138, Ex D 29, Ex D 30, Ex D 31 and Ex D 32).

[360] The evidence suggests that that the palafond - a specific point at the distal tibia - is common to the x-ray labelled with the name of the Accused and bearing the name of 14 June 1992 ("the 1992 x-ray" – Ex P 1151.1) and the x-rays of the Accused's lower left leg taken in 2001 ("the 2001 x-ray" – Ex P 21.1; Ex P 21.2; Ex P 21.4). This point is therefore ideal for the purpose of comparing the length of the fracture (Dr Raby, T 4230-4231; Dr De Grave, T 1702; Dr Vučetić, T 4072). The Trial Chamber accepts that a comparison of the distance from the palafond to the highest and to the lowest point of the fracture as depicted on the two x-rays, both on the frontal aspect and on the lateral aspect, clearly shows a significant difference between the fractures depicted on the 1992 x-ray and the 2001 x-ray (Ex D 39, p 6). Dr Raby identified the upper and the lower fracture points on the basis of a telltale mark which is a legacy of the healing process. Dr Raby said that, following a fracture, the remodelling of the bone will result in the formation of new bone tissue along the fracture site, which will be visible as a certain thickening of the healed bone along the original fracture site (Dr Raby, T 4232, 4236-4237; see also T 3237-3238, 4259-4261). The fractures depicted on both the 1992 x-ray and the 2001 x-ray are so called spiral fractures (Dr Raby, T 4241-4243; Dr Vučetić, T 4007, 4015; Dr De Grave, T 1706; Dr Moljević, T 3741). Given the special feature of a spiral fracture, the measurements of the lower and the upper fracture points taken on the frontal view are different from the same measurements taken from the lateral view (Dr Raby, T 4257-4258, 4275. See also Ex P 192, Ex D 40). This is the reason why the upper and the lower fracture points as measured by most expert witnesses on the lateral views are different from the upper and the lower fracture points determined by the same witnesses on the frontal views. The Trial Chamber accepts Dr Raby's evidence that it would be quite unusual for a spiral fracture to produce the same measurements from two different angles (T 4272, 4275). The Trial Chamber is satisfied that both the differences in the measurements of the fractures on the 1992 x-ray and the 2001 x-ray and the different appearance of the fracture plane cannot be the result of a re-fracture along the same fracture site or a second fracture close to the original fracture site (Dr Raby, T 4255-4256, 4262-4264). Nor can it be the result of morphological or structural changes of the bone, due to the passing of time (Dr Raby T 4276-4277). The Trial Chamber accepts the view of Dr Raby that the only conclusion is that the 1992 x-ray is not of the Accused's leg. The calcaneum bone is the heal bone: Ex P 167. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that a comparison of the calcaneum bone on the 1992 x-ray and on the 2001 x-ray also shows significant structural differences between the two (Dr Raby, T 4248-4253; Dr De Grave, T 1681, 1708-1711. See also Ex P 21.4). These differences cannot be due to the deterioration and regeneration process during a considerable period of time (Dr Raby, T 4249). These findings support the view of Dr Raby.

that the usual safeguards of identifying the patient by name on the x-ray itself were not always followed during the conflict.[362]

143. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Dr Moljević that the Accused was in hospital on the date and at the time recorded in the protocol of patients from the war zone admitted to the Užice hospital,[363] which corroborates that the Accused was in hospital at that time. Dr Moljević, a doctor at the orthopaedic ward and a member of the triage team at Užice admissions during the relevant period, knew the Accused well, and he was notified of the imminent arrival of the Accused at the hospital because of his friendship with him, and he followed up that notification.[364] The Trial Chamber notes that Dr Moljević relied upon the protocol of patients from the war zone admitted to the Užice hospital to determine the date and time that the Accused was admitted into the Užice Hospital.[365] The protocol, despite repeated and extensive forensic examinations at the behest of the Prosecution, showed no evidence to suggest that it had been interfered with.[366] Outside the time and date of the Accused's admission, Dr Moljević had a clear recollection of the events of that day. Dr Moljević was able to recall that Dragan Filipović, another patient from Višegrad whom he knew, was admitted earlier on the same day as the Accused.[367] The name of Dragan Filipović appears before the name of the Accused in the protocol of patients admitted from the war zone.[368]

144. The Prosecution led evidence that a fake identity card had been used by a person who is a defendant in other proceedings before the Tribunal for the purposes of obtaining free health care, and it relied upon that evidence as demonstrating that the alibi was unreliable. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that such evidence is of very little significance to this case, if any at all.[369] In that other case, three fake identity cards had been found on Dragan Nikolić at the time of his arrest. The fake identity cards showed his picture but with the names of two other individuals.[370] He had utilised one of the cards, which depicted him as a refugee, with the stated aim of securing access to free health

The witness, until he went to Užice, had lived his entire life in Višegrad, and his parents still live there. Other than as a waiter, the witness had no further contact with the Accused or his family (Dr Moljević, T 3693-3694).

145. The Prosecution relied upon evidence given of a subsequent statement alleged to have been made by the ambulance driver that he had taken the Accused to the Užice Hospital on 27 June or 28 June 1992, some two weeks after the Pionirska Street fire.[375] The ambulance driver denied that it was his voice on the tape recording produced by a Prosecution witness (VG-81), whose evidence in relation to other issues has already been criticised by the Trial Chamber.[376] The Prosecution's expert witness was unable to establish that there was more than a possibility that it was his voice.[377] The whole of the circumstances in which VG-81 said that she recorded the ambulance driver were highly suspect.[378] However, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that this evidence in no way impinges upon the credibility of the records of the Užice hospital already accepted by it as raising the reasonable possibility that the Accused was at, or on his way to the Užice hospital, at the time of the events in Pionirska Street.

146. The Trial Chamber in any event has serious doubts as to the reliability of the evidence of the witnesses who claimed to have seen or identified the Accused during the looting, transfer and fire. In expressing these doubts, the Trial Chamber has assessed the identification evidence of these witnesses in accordance with the principles set out earlier.[379] This finding is largely independent of the alibi evidence, but it is very substantially reinforced by that alibi evidence.

147. Looting - The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt the presence of the Accused during the looting of the Koritnik group. Three witnesses claimed that the Accused was involved in the looting; of these, two witnesses said that they observed the Accused during the looting of the group. VG-61 said that the Accused was involved,[380] but VG-61 was not present and, insofar as he may have been relying upon what his father told him, there is no mention of this in his father's statement.[381] VG-13 said that the Accused was standing in the doorway during the looting,[382] but this was not mentioned in her 1998 statement to the Prosecution.[383] VG-38 said that the Accused was standing outside when the looting occurred.[384] The evidence of identification of those witnesses is not sufficiently reliable as to warrant the conclusion that the Accused was present at the time when the Kortnik group was being looted.

148. Transfer - The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt the presence of the Accused during the transfer of the Kortinik group from the Memić house to the Omeragić house. VG-61 said that the Accused was involved in the transfer of the group to the house which was later set on fire,[385] but VG-61 was not present and, again insofar as he may be relying upon what his father told him, there is no mention of this in his father's statement.[386] The evidence of the four witnesses who purported to identify the Accused during the transfer (VG-101, VG-78, VG-13, VG-38) is insufficiently reliable to establish this fact when considered in conjunction with the evidence of the alibi raised by the Defence.[387]

149. VG-101 and VG-78 are sisters, both of whom escaped during the transfer of the group from the Memić house to the Omeragić house.[388] VG-101 gave evidence that as she was walking towards the Omeragić from the Memić house she saw the Accused, Milan Lukić, a man with a moustache and a fair and tall man.[389] She said that she faced the Accused in front of the Memić

[382] VG-13 (T 1494). VG-13 gave evidence that she knew the Accused as a waiter in the Panos Hotel, and in the new Hotel. VG-13 affirmed that she had known him for a long time, even as a young man, as they would attend the same parties, and that he had gone to school with one of the witness's relatives (VG-13, T 1432-1433). VG-13 identified the Accused in the photo array (Ex P 55-VG-13). The Accused maintained that he did not known VG-13 (The Accused, T 1945, 2169).

[383] Ex D 4.

[384] VG-38 (T 1371-1374). VG-38 said that he knew the Accused as a waiter in the Panos Hotel and in the Višegrad Hotel, and that he had a relative who was a trainee at one of the establishments where the Accused worked. VG-38 was thirteen and a half at the time of the Pionirska Street incident. VG-38 identified the Accused in the photo array at a time after the Accused had been arrested. He had learned about the arrest of the Accused from the media, and had seen his picture there (VG-38, T 1339, 1359-1360, 1413, 1416; Ex P 20-38). The witness identified the Accused as being present in the Višegrad Hotel and as escorting the group from there to Pionirska Street, evidence which the Trial Chamber rejects (see par 172). The Accused maintained that he did not known VG-38 (The Accused, T 1945, 2169).

[388] VG-78 (T 1295).

[389] VG-101 (T 1171). VG-101 said that she had seen the Accused pass through Prelovo, that his wife's name was Milojka, that his wife had a shop in Prelovo, and that she had seen the two of them walking together (VG-101, T 1155-1156, 1195). The wife of the Accused said that she had worked in Prelovo (Milojka Vašiljević, T 2559). VG-101 identified the Accused in the photo array (Ex P 55-101). The Accused said that he did not know VG-101 (The Accused, T 1945, 2169). During the time they earlier travelled from Kortinik to Vi{egrad, VG-101 and VG-78 who were sisters were never separated, and VG-78 agreed that they would have seen the same things during the course of their travels (VG-78, T 1298). However, their evidence did differ in relation to significant details (see house, at a touching distance.[390] Her sister was with her at the time.[391] As the group were being transferred, VG-101 and her sister managed to escape and hid behind a shed. [392] From this position VG-101 said that she could see the Accused standing in a spot which was lit with what appeared to her as floodlights.[393]

150. VG-78 gave evidence that she saw Milan Lukić and the Accused walking between the two houses, next to the Omeragić house, and that the Accused was paying more attention to the Omeragić house than to the Memi} house.[394] She said that a man with a moustache was standing with a rifle in front of the door of the house from which she was leaving (the Memi} house).[395] When she hid behind the shed, and as she was standing at the edge of the shed ready to flee for the woods, she cast a glance in the direction of the Accused and saw his profile for a moment. VG-78 claimed that the Accused was 10 to 20 steps away.[396] She acknowledged that she did not see him very well, though she said that she had recognised him as he was walking up and down.[397] She said that there was no light inside the Omeragić house, only outside, where it was lit up.[398]

151. VG-13 gave evidence that she saw the Accused walking ahead of the group carrying a rifle and a flashlight during the transfer, and that the Accused brought the first group to the Omeragić house, and held the door. She claimed that he yelled at them to hurry up and that he had shoved the witness's mother-in-law.[399] Her failure to refer to the Accused has having been present in the transfer in a previous account which he had given to the Prosecution of these events casts doubt upon her claim. [394] VG-78 (T 1290-1291; Ex D 3). VG-78 gave evidence that she saw the Accused several times as a passenger in the bus to Prelovo. She also said that she knew his wife by sight, and that his wife used to work in a shop at Banja (VG-78, T 1280-1281). The wife of the Accused said that she worked in various places in Vi{egrad, Prelovo, Sase and elsewhere (Milojka Vasiljević, T 2558-2259). VG-78 identified the Accused in the photo array (Ex P 55-78). The Accused said that he did not know VG-78 (The Accused, T 1945, 2169). In her statement to the MUP in 1995, VG-78 was able to refer only to "A certain Mitar, whose surname I do not know" as having been in front of the Hotel and in Pionirska Street during the afternoon when, as she put it, he gave a "safety certificate", but did not mention his presence in the evening during the transfer of the Koritnik group (VG-78, T 1300, 1307).

152. VG-38 gave evidence that the Accused and three other men were present during the transfer, but he gave no further details and he was unable to indicate the position which any of them took at the time of the transfer.[401]

153. The Trial Chamber notes that two survivors of the fire, VG-18 and VG-84, did not mention the Accused as having been present at the time of the transfer. This could, of course, be explicable by the circumstances in which the transfer took place, the darkness at the time, and their lack of any particular familiarity with the Accused previously. VG-18 did not recognise any of the men there,[402] although she did say in her statement to the Prosecution that Stredoje Lukić was one of them.[403] Although she had not known the Accused previously, she gave evidence that he had introduced himself by his own name during that afternoon when he was attempting to have the group from Kortinik stay together.[404]

154. The fire - As already stated, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused was present at the time of the setting on fire of the Pionirska Street house. Only one of the survivors (VG-13) gave evidence that the Accused was present when the Omeragić house was set on fire, and that he participated in the shooting of those attempting to escape the fire through the windows.[405] VG-13 said that she saw the Accused and Milan Lukić when they opened the door to the room in the Omeragić house, and that the Accused assisted Milan Lukić by lighting the area up with a flashlight whilst the latter placed an incendiary device on the floor.[406] VG-13 said that, when she jumped from the window, she landed in front of the Accused and Milan Lukić, and that the Accused shone a light on her whilst Milan Lukić shot and wounded her.[407] The Trial Chamber accepts that VG-13 knew the Accused from before the war, and that she believes that it was the Accused whom she saw. But, in view of the stressful situation under which her identification of the Accused is said to have taken place and the strength of the alibi evidence, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that her identification is sufficiently reliable to rebut the alibi.

[405] VG-13 (T 1455-1456). VG-61 gave evidence that the Accused was present during the shooting, but VG-61 was not present, and, insofar as he may be relying upon what his father told him, there is no mention of this in his father's statement (VG-61, T 795; Ex P 145).

155. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that sufficient doubt is cast upon the evidence which suggests that the Accused was present in Pionirska Street during the transfer of the group to the Omeragić house, and the fire, by the evidence which suggests that the Accused was either in or on the way to the U`ice Hospital at that time. It is the alibi evidence which ultimately leads the Trial Chamber to reject the Prosecution case that he was in Pionirska Street at the relevant times. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that this evidence establishes a reasonable possibility that, from approximately 8.00 pm on 14 June 1992, the Accused was not in Pionirska Street. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the medical records do establish that the Accused was admitted to Užice Hospital on 14 June 1992 at 9.35 pm. The Trial Chamber accepts that it takes at least one hour to drive from Višegrad, where he suffered his injury, to Užice.[408] The distance between these two towns is about 70 km.[409] Taking these facts into consideration, as well as the time necessary for the admission procedures, the Prosecution must eliminate the reasonable possibility that the Accused was not in Pionirska Street from approximately 8.00 pm onwards. It has not succeeded in doing so. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the transfer did not take place before 9.30 pm.[410] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused was present during the transfer of the Koritnik group from the Memić house to the Omeragić house and during the setting on fire of that house.[411]

156. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the evidence of Prosecution witnesses who claimed to have seen the Accused after 14 June 1992 cannot establish, beyond reasonable doubt, the falsity of the alibi raised by the Accused.[412] The Defence case was that the Accused remained in hospital until 28 June 1992 when he was released upon his wife's request, and this is consistent with the

[410] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that it was dark when the armed men returned to the Memić house to transfer the Koritnik group to the Omeragić house, and therefore that it must have been between 8.30 and 9.00 pm at the very earliest (see par 123 and footnote 297). Witnesses gave evidence that the armed men returned to the Memić house to transfer the group sometime between 9.30 and 12.00 pm. VG-13, VG-18 and VG-38 gave times between 9.30-10.30 pm (VG-13, T 1443; VG-18, T 1590; VG-38, T 1376). VG-38 was able to calculate the time because he was still wearing his watch (VG-38, T 1376). VG-101 and VG-61's father said that it was midnight (VG-101, T 1200; Ex P 145, T 896). VG-84 said it happened two and a half hours after sunset (VG-84, T 1670; see also Ex P 148 and footnote 297). The Prosecution contested the witnesses' evidence as to the time when the armed men returned, and argued that it had been earlier (Prosecution Final Brief, par 302-6). The Prosecution argued that the witnesses' perception of time was distorted because their watches had been looted and because of the apprehension they felt after having been looted. Instead, the Prosecution sought to rely on VG-87's evidence that the first time he was aware that something was burning was between 8.00 and 9.00 pm. However, VG-87 estimated that it must have been about 11.00 pm when he last heard his wife, and there has been evidence that she was already inside the house which was set on fire when the Koritnik group were brought inside (VG-87, T 1096, 1114; VG-18, T 1592; VG-13, T 1446, 1449). The evidence of VG-87 does not assist. The best evidence is that of VG-38, who was wearing his watch.

records of the Užice hospital already accepted by the Trial Chamber.[413] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of any of these Prosecution witnesses is sufficiently reliable to establish that the Accused was not in Užice Hospital at the times recorded in the Užice Hospital records.

157. VG-77 claimed that, on 18 June 1992, the Accused threatened to kill her and the group with whom she was leaving Višegrad.[414] VG-77 admitted that she did not see the face of the man who was threatening them, but concluded that he was the Accused because some men from the SUP addressed this man as "Mitar".[415] The witness did not mention this incident in either of her two prior statements to the Prosecution, and she was unable to identify the Accused from the photo array.[416] In these circumstances, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that her identification of the Accused is reliable in any way.

158. VG-105 said that she saw an individual whom she identified as "Vasiljević" comfort the daughter of a man whom he and Lukić were taking out of the fire station. The witness was present at the fire station with other inhabitants of Zljeb who had been confined there.[417] The witness gave inconsistent statements with respect to the date when she claimed to have sighted "Vasiljević".[418] She claimed that it would have been after 14 June 1992. She said that she knew the man she identified as "Vasiljević" by sight, but she did not know his name until she saw him at the fire station. She learnt his name and the name of "Lukić" from others at the fire station.[419] She identified the Accused in the photo array, but she did not identify him as the man whom she calls "Vasiljević".[420] In cross-examination, she claimed that "Vasiljević" had a moustache.[421] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the identification of the Accused by VG-105 is reliable in any way.

159. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of two separate identifications given by VG-115 can be accepted as reliable. VG-115's reliability as a witness has been dealt with earlier.[422] VG-115 said that she knew the Accused before the events in 1992, and that she saw him often.[423] The Accused acknowledged that he had known the witness by sight for at least five years.[424]

However, in her statement to the Prosecution, VG-115 said that there were two individuals by the name of Mitar Vasiljević. She claimed to have made a mistake in her statement.[425]

160. VG-115 claimed that she saw the Accused on two different occasions after the date of the house burning. During the first of these, she saw the Accused, Milan Lukić, Slobodan Roncević and others,[426] wound an elderly man by the name of Kahriman. She claims she observed this as she was crossing the new bridge in Višegrad. It was broad daylight, and she said that it was at the end of June or the beginning of July.[427] The second occasion she claimed to have seen the Accused was towards the end of July. This time she observed him with Milan Lukić and others beating and stabbing a man called "Kupus".[428] She claimed that she was approximately 15 to 20 steps away. She said that the Accused had addressed her, telling her to move on lest she should end up like "Kupus".[429]

161. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of VG-117 who claimed to have seen the Accused on 22 June 1992 is reliable. VG-117 gave evidence that she saw the Accused record the names of the Muslims who had been gathered in the Vuk Karadžić School in Višegrad. They had gathered there to join a convoy leaving the municipality.[430] She said that the Accused explained that he worked for the Red Cross, and that he took down their names as they entered the school.[431] She claimed to have had the Accused within her sight during that day for about half an hour. She said that she was a short distance away from him and that it was daylight.[432]

162. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that VG-117 knew the Accused sufficiently well to be able to recognise him. VG-117 said that she knew the Accused when they were children. Although she was six years older than the Accused, a whole group of them from neighbouring villages would play together and they would also tend to the cattle.[433] She also said that he would wait on her frequently in the Panos Hotel and, less frequently, in the Vilina Vlas Hotel.[434] She would also see him in the bus on his way to his father's house.[435] She identified the Accused in the photo array.[436] The Accused denied that VG-117 knew him as she claimed.[437]

163. Although the Trial Chamber accepts that VG-117 believes that she saw the Accused on 22 June 1992, which was after the Piorniska Street incident, so strong is the alibi evidence provided by the medical records that the Trial Chamber does not accept that her evidence, either alone or together with similar evidence upon which the Prosecution relies, establishes beyond reasonable doubt that the alibi was untrue. Because the evidence of VG-117 directly conflicts with the medical records and the evidence of other witnesses, her evidence is insufficient to establish the Accused's presence at the Vuk Karadžić School on 22 June 1992.[438]

164. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the credibility of VG-81 was so undermined during the course of the trial that her evidence of identifications of the Accused should not be relied upon.[439] VG-81 claimed to have seen the Accused on three different occasions after the date of the house burning on Pionirska Street. The first time was on 18 June in Sase, when she claimed to have seen the Accused and Milan Lukić arrive at Kosovo Polje, and saw Milan Lukić kill a person named Nurka Kos. Later the same day, she travelled to Sase and saw the Accused, Milan Lukić and another man standing behind four unknown men who were lined up along the river. She claimed that she observed them shoot the four men, who fell into the river.[440] She said that she was standing 150-200 metres away when she witnessed these events.[441] The second time was on 21 June 1992 when the witness claims to have seen a tipsy Mitar Vasiljević with Veljko Planinić (also known as "Razonda") coming from Sase, armed, singing songs about Bosniaks. The witness claimed to have been hiding 15 metres away.[442] The witness also claimed to have seen the Accused again on 25 June 1992 coming again from the direction of Sase, alone this time. She said she was between 10 to 30 metres away.[443] VG-81 also claimed that, up to 25 June 1992, she and others would see Mitar Vasiljević coming from the direction of Sase and going towards Višegrad through Kosovo Polje.[444]

165. Finally, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the identification made by VG-80 shortly before 3 July 1992 is sufficiently reliable, for the reasons given earlier.[445]

166. In summary, as stated earlier,[446] the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has eliminated the reasonable possibility that the Accused was not at the scene of the crime at the time of the looting, transfer and fire, nor is it satisfied in any case that the identifications made by the witnesses are sufficiently reliable to establish that the Accused was present at the time of the looting, of the transfer or at the time of the fire.[447]

C. Events Earlier on 14 June 1992

167. The Trial Chamber has found that the Prosecution has failed to establish that the Accused participated in the burning of the house in Pionirska Street or in the events which immediately preceded the killing of the Kortinik group. However, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused did earlier on that day seek to ensure that the Kortinik group remained together. The Prosecution relies upon these earlier events so as to include the Accused in a joint criminal enterprise to kill the Koritnik group in the burning of the house in Pionirska Street. Fundamental to any finding that the Accused participated in such a joint criminal enterprise, or even that he merely aided and abetted that joint criminal enterprise, is proof beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused knew that the Koritnik group were to be killed – not necessarily by having them burnt in a house, but killed in some way.

168. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, with some reservations as to his timing and as to his powers of observation, that VG-87, whilst he was hiding in the attic on Pionirska Street, had the Accused within his sight for an extensive period in the early part of the afternoon of 14 June 1992.[448] VG-87 gave evidence that he had been hiding in this or other attics because of the large scale killings of Muslims in Višegrad at that time and because he was fearful that he would also be killed.[449] He had been there for about a week at this time. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that VG-87 knew the Accused well enough to have made a reliable identification of him.[450] It is not satisfied, however, that VG-87 had the Accused in his sight for the four hours from mid-day until 4.00 pm as he claimed, but it is satisfied that he was watching the Accused for a substantial part of that time.

169. VG-87 said that the Accused was alone, and walked around Pionirska Street in the direction of Vuk Karad'ić School. Between the hours of 1.00 and 2.00 pm, he saw the Accused calling out to the residents of the street to come out and clean the street.[451] He said that the Accused was wearing a camouflage uniform with turned up trousers, that he was carrying a megaphone and a bottle but that he was not armed with a rifle. [452] VG-87 claimed that he heard the Accused speak into a megaphone when calling out for residents to clean the street.[453] VG-87 said that the street was relatively clean at the time, and he formed the view that the Accused was trying to discover how many Muslims remained in the area.[454] The Accused denied that he was engaged in cleaning the streets at that time or that he had a megaphone. He said that he had only ever used a megaphone once during the first day that he organised the cleaning of the town.[455] The Trial Chamber is of the view that whether or not the Accused was in possession of a megaphone is of little significance, and that the particular activities in which VG-87 said that the Accused was engaged at the time are not of great importance. What is of importance here is that VG-87 placed the Accused in Pionirska Street for a substantial part of the afternoon, for about four hours from midday, on 14 June 1992.

170. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of VG-87 that the Kortinik group arrived in Pionirksa Street at about 2.00 pm.[456] That evidence, and the evidence of VG-87 that the Accused was in Pionirska Street for a substantial part of the early afternoon, leads the Trial Chamber to reject the evidence that the Accused was present at the Višegrad Hotel when the Kortinik group first arrived there and that he escorted the group to the Muslim houses in the Mahala neighbourhood.[457] The Prosecution in its Final Trial Brief relies upon the evidence of VG-38, VG-78 and VG-101 as establishing the presence of the Accused at the Višegrad Hotel. The Prosecution claims that, on the basis of this evidence, the Accused, dressed in dark uniform and a black hat, told the group that there were no more buses that day and that there would be one the following day.[458] Its case is that the Accused then told the group that they should go up to Pionirska Street in the Mahala section of town where there were some abandoned houses which belonged to Muslims.[459] It claims that the Accused led the group to Pionirska Street with a few armed soldiers at the side of the group. The group walked in a long column two by two.[460]

171. VG-78 gave evidence that the Accused and others were in front of the hotel looking after those who missed the convoy. She said that, at the time she observed the Accused, he was ten steps away from her.[461] The Accused is said to have told them that the buses had left and that they should go to Mahala to spend the night. She observed the Accused slap a mentally handicapped woman.[462] The Accused, along with two or three others whom she only knew by sight accompanied the column of people from Kortinik.[463] It took them 45 minutes to reach Pionirska Street.[464] The sister of the witness (VG-101) was with her at the time, but VG-101 said that the group went alone and there was no one accompanying them.[465] In her January 2001 statement to the Prosecution, VG-78 said that no-one had taken them to the Mahala settlement, but they all knew where it was and they had hurried along. She explained this inconsistency in her evidence by saying that she had since recollected what had happened.[466] Reference has already been made earlier to the extent of the familiarity which VG-78 and VG-101 had with the Accused before these events.[467]

172. VG-38 stated that the Accused spoke to Milorad Lipovać, who had accompanied them to Vi{egrad. The Accused told them that there would be no more buses on that day but that there would be some on the following day.[468] The Accused was no more than five metres away. The Accused was wearing a large black hat and a black uniform. He was not armed.[469] VG-38 saw the Accused alone, accompanying the group and walking ahead of them. It took 20 minutes for the witness to reach the Mahala settlement.[470] When they reached the settlement, they went first into Mujo Memić's house and then moved to Jusuf Memić's house. The Accused was in front of the house when they arrived.[471] Reference has already been made earlier to the weight to be given to his evidence.[472]

173. VG-101 said that she saw the Accused get out of the driver's seat of a car before the Vi{egrad Hotel, and that he told them to go to the abandoned houses in Pionirska Street.[473] Both the Accused and his wife gave evidence that the Accused did not drive.[474] No-one else gave evidence of having seen the Accused drive a vehicle. VG-101 said that, when she saw the Accused, he was wearing a former JNA uniform and a large black hat and a black raincoat. He was wearing a large chain and cross over his uniform,[475] which no-one else has described.

174. VG-115 gave evidence that she saw the Accused, together with Milan Lukić and Sredoje Lukić amongst others, escorting a group of people through Pionirska Street and urging them forward.[476] Her unreliability as a witness has already been referred to, and the Trial Chamber does not accept her evidence of identification of the Accused.[477]

175. VG-61 said that the Accused was involved in escorting the Koritnik group,[478] but VG-61 was not present, and, insofar as he may be relying upon what his now deceased father told him, there is no mention of this in his father's statement.[479]

176. VG-13, who had not seen the Accused accompanying the group, gave evidence that, by the time she saw him standing in front of the door, she had already gone to Mujo Memic's house, had a cup of coffee and changed her wet clothes.[480] He was wearing a black suit and a hat. He was barefoot and had ribbons on his hat.[481] He was not carrying a weapon.[482]

177. VG-18 did not see the Accused accompanying the group to Pionirska Street to the Mahala settlement in Pionirska Street.[483] She said that the Accused appeared when the group stopped at the house of Jusuf Memić in Pionirska Street, when they were standing around pondering what to do. He told them that they should stay in one group and not disperse. It was VG-18's belief that none of the group had gone into the house of Jusuf Memić at this stage.[484] VG-18 said that the Accused was wearing a black suit and a hat and a black coat. He had a feather on his hat.[485]

178. VG-84 gave evidence that he could not remember whether the group had or not been escorted to Pionirska Street,[486] and he said that he saw the Accused when the group arrived at the house of Jusuf Memić. He gave evidence that the Accused was wearing a black suit and a hat, and that he was not armed.[487]

179. In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution places great emphasis upon the allegation that, when talking to the group from Kortinik in Pionirska Street, the Accused held himself out to be a representative of, or associated with, the Red Cross, both orally and in writing.[488]

180. Only two witnesses (VG-18 and VG-84) of a possible seven who were present at the time gave evidence that the Accused orally described himself as a representative of the Red Cross. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the quality of their evidence is sufficient to establish that the Accused did in fact hold himself out in that way. VG-18 and VG-84 are mother and son, both of whom survived the Pionirska Street fire. It is not suprising therefore that their evidence on the point coincides, and the fact that it does coincide does not give it any greater weight. Neither of these witnesses knew the Accused prior to the day of the house burning, and both are alleged to have learnt of his identity only when he introduced himself by name. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established that the Accused held himself out as being associated with the Red Cross, but it is satisfied that the Accused did seek to ensure that the group stayed together because he knew that some evil was to befall them.

181. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused did address the group and that he did hand a piece of paper to Mujo Halilović which he suggested was as a guarantee of their safety. VG-38,[489] VG-13,[490] VG-18[491] and VG-84[492] all gave evidence that they saw the Accused give Mujo Halilović a piece of paper. VG-101 saw the Accused give the piece of paper to one of the men.[493] In his statement, VG-61's father stated that Mujo Halilović showed him the "safety guarantee" given to him by "Naka Mitar".[494] VG-78 gave evidence that he had been told that the Accused was calling [487] VG-84 (T 1761). VG-77, who gave evidence that she had spoken to the Koritnik group before the Memićs' houses, also said that she later saw the Accused, together with another man, in the area (VG-77, T 697, 709). He was wearing a big yellow straw hat (VG-77, T 711). The reliability of her identification evidence has already been discussed. See par 157.

[488] This is said to be evidence of his participation in a joint criminal enterprise to kill the victims of the Pionirska Street incident because he was keen to ensure that they stayed together, and inside a house, in Pionirska Street, where they were to be killed (Prosecution Final Brief, par 310).

people to come out in order to give out some certificate which someone subsequently picked up.[495] She did not see the document.

182. The Prosecution asserts that VG-13 saw the reference to the Red Cross on that piece of paper. That assertion is not borne out by her evidence. She said that she was next to Mujo Halilović and he showed the document to her. It was handwritten and signed by the Accused, but she described it as having said only "Do not be afraid. Nobody is going to harm you", and then her evidence proceeded: "And Mr Vašiljević, my neighbour, he explicitly told us that the following morning we would be taken over by the Red Cross".[496] VG-13 did not mention the Accused handing out the document in her 1998 statement to the Prosecution,[497] but even if her evidence may be correct it does not establish that the Accused held himself out to be a representative of the Red Cross.

183. The Trial Chamber rejects as untrue the Accused's evidence that, if he did give Mujo Halilović a piece of paper, it would only have recorded his address on the paper. The Accused said in his evidence that he could not remember giving a piece of paper to Mujo Halilović but that, if he did so, it would only have contained his name and address. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence that Mujo Halilović walked past the house of the Accused nearly every day and as such it may reasonably be expected that Mujo Halilović would already have known the Accused's address.[498] The Accused gave evidence that he was inebriated at the time to such an extent as to cloud his recollection of events. Even if that were true, it does not deny the fact that he did give Mujo Halilović the piece of paper. The only evidence apart from that of the Accused himself which suggests that he was inebriated at that time was that of VG-87, the man who was hiding in the attic. He said that the Accused appeared to be under the influence of alcohol because he was barefoot and behaving in a childish manner.[499] He gave evidence that he was carrying a bottle.[500] VG-13 also gave evidence that the Accused was barefoot when he met with the group, and that he was holding a half-litre bottle of brandy.[501] There is some evidence that Mujo Halilović had some brandy with him,[502] but this does not detract from the evidence that the Accused did hand him a piece of paper which gave a guarantee of their safety.

184. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused misled the Koritnik group by wearing an armband with a red cross on it, thereby suggesting that he was working for the Red Cross. The evidence on that point is confused and contradictory, and the Trial Chamber is of the opinion that no safe finding could be made on the basis of that evidence.[503]

185. The Trial Chamber rejects the Defence argument that the Accused was not seeking to keep the group together, and that they kept together because they had no other alternative accommodation. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused intended to ensure that the group remained together, regardless of whether the representations made by the Accused were the sole reason of the group staying together. VG-18 claimed that she and her relatives were standing in front of Jusuf Memić's house still pondering where to go when the Accused addressed the group and told them to remain together.[504] VG-18 said that, had it not been for the instructions of the Accused and for his assurances, the group would have otherwise dispersed both as a security measure, and because some members of the group had relatives living elsewhere in town and were planning to stay with them. She claimed that the group believed the Accused when he told them that he was responsible for refugees and that they would be safe.[505] She also maintained, however, that one of her neighbours said they should spread out and that this neighbour had left to look for her aunt and uncle who had a house in the vicinity. This neighbour returned when she found them dead inside the house.[506] VG-101 said that she had already started out for a different house when the Accused called out from in front of Jusuf Memić's house for them to return and to remain together.[507] She said that, although they were a large group and would have needed two or three houses, the Accused told them to go into a single house.[508] VG-78, her sister, said that the Accused told them to go into the Memićs' houses and to spend the night there.[509] VG-61's father stated that his sons owned houses in the vicinity, but that he had been unable to find a neighbour willing to protect them there, so that he and his relatives did not dare go and stay in these houses but settled with the rest of the group.[510]

[503] A number of Defence witnesses, including the Accused himself, gave evidence that he was wearing a red ribbon when he fell off the horse. See Ratomir Simsić (T 2816); Zivorad Savić (T 2920); Miloje Novaković (T 3034); Petar Mitrović (T 2759-2760). The Accused testified that he was wearing a red ribbon to note that he was working in the task of cleaning the town (The Accused, T1897-1898, 2081). The Accused denied ever wearing the Red Cross insignia (The Accused, T 2184-2186). Other Defence witnesses gave evidence that the red ribbon that the Accused regularly wore at the time had some white in it and was reminiscent of the Red Cross emblem (VGD-22, T 2361; Dragisa Lindo, T 2433). Miloje Novaković mentioned the sign of the Red Cross in his statement to the Defence but not during his testimony (Miloje Novaković, T 3042-3045). Other witnesses were asked what the Accused was wearing and they did not mention any armband, although they were not specifically asked about it (VG-61, VG-101, VG-78, VG-38, VG-13, VG-18, VG-77, VG-115). None of the Prosecution witnesses relevant to this incident mentioned the red arm band in their testimonies. Only VG-80, who purported to identify the Accused in the month of June, said that she saw him with a red-coloured ribbon around his arm (VG-80, T 732-734). For a discussion of the reliability of this identification evidence, see par 91. VG-87 and VG-84 were expressly asked about it; the former denied having seen a red ribbon on the Accused, and the latter could not remember (VG-87, T 1107; VG-84, T 1762).

186. The evidence before the Trial Chamber is inconsistent in relation to the house into which the Koritnik group went. There was some evidence that the group settled in the two Memić houses, which were next to each other, but it remains unclear when exactly the group were gathered into a single house, the house of Jusuf Memić.[511] VG-61's father claimed that the group was gathered into one house when the looters arrived,[512] VG-13 claimed that it was after the Accused had given them the written safety guarantee,[513] while VG-38 said that it was before that event.[514] VG-78 claimed that the group was placed in both of the Memić houses, and that the majority of them went into the house of Jusuf Memić.[515] VG-101, VG-84 and VG-18 stated that they just went into the house of Jusuf Memić. VG-101 and VG-18 claimed that at the time they went in, no one else had yet gone into the house.[516]

187. Although the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established that the Accused forced the group into a single house, the Trial Chamber is satisfied from all the evidence that the Accused did seek to ensure that the group stayed together. He did this by his insistence that they do so and also by his assurances that they would be safe if they stayed together because the guarantee he had given Mujo Halilović would ensure they would not be harmed. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the Accused did so because he knew that some evil was to befall them.

D. Factual Findings

must establish that the Accused entered into an agreement with the group led by Milan Lukić to murder or mistreat these people, and that each of the participants, including the Accused, shared the intent of this crime.[517] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established that the Accused either entered into such an agreement or had the intent to kill these persons or to inflict inhumane acts against them.

189. The Trial Chamber does not accept the Prosecution's assertion that the plan to kill or mistreat the group as charged in the Indictment was first conceived when the Accused approached the group and sought to persuade them to remain together in the Memićs' houses in Pionirska Street.[518] Such a submission appears to suggest that the plan was conceived by the Accused, rather than by Milan Lukić. There is no basis in the evidence for that submission. It is pure speculation. The Prosecution's case is that everything said by the Accused to the group was intended to trick the group into remaining at the Memićs' houses so that he could go and find Milan Lukić and his accomplices to commit the crimes against the victims he identified and selected.[519] The Prosecution submits that the Accused's criminal intent is obvious from the fact that it was the Accused who wanted the group to remain together and that there can be no other reason for that fact other than the Accused had murder in mind.[520] Again, this is pure speculation on the Prosecution's part.

190. The Prosecution alternatively says (for the purposes of showing that the Accused aided and abetted those who did burn the house down) that the Accused knew that the group from Kortinik were to be killed or otherwise mistreated as pleaded in the Indictment. However, the evil which was to befall on them which the Accused had in mind may well have been, for instance, the forcible transfer of the victims to a non-Serb area. The Trial Chamber does not accept that the knowledge which the Prosecution must establish would be the only reasonable inference from the evidence. The fact that the Accused had recently taken part in shooting seven Muslim men in the Drina River incident is not a sufficient basis for a conclusion that the eventual death of these particular Muslims was the intent of the Accused in what he did.

191. In the present case, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused deliberately tried to keep the Koritnik group together. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the Accused knew that, for lack of a better expression, some evil would befall on them. The Prosecution has failed, however, to identify that evil and to establish what the Accused knew was to happen. As already stated, the Trial Chamber can only make a finding of guilt if its conclusion is the only reasonable conclusion available. The Trial Chamber does not accept that the only reasonable conclusion in this case is that the Koritnik group would be subjected to murder, extermination or inhumane acts as defined above.[521] To give just one reason why it cannot draw such a conclusion, the Trial Chamber points out that, at the relevant time, ethnic cleansing of non-Serb residents in the form of forced transfer and deportation was widespread in the Višegrad area, the Accused may well have thought that those people would likewise be forcibly transferred or deported, rather than being killed or subjected to inhumane acts as charged in the Indictment. Furthermore, and for the sake of completeness, had the Trial Chamber been satisfied that the Accused knew that those people would be mistreated, there was no evidence that he contributed thereto otherwise than by convincing them to stay together. There is no evidence that the Accused went to Milan Lukić to tell him of the whereabouts of the Koritnik group, as the Prosecution has suggested.[522] It is certainly not the only reasonable inference available.

192. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the only inference available on the evidence is that the Accused knew that the members of the Koritnik group were to be killed or otherwise mistreated in the manner described in the Indictment.[523]

VIII. VIOLENCE TO LIFE AND PERSON

A. The Law

193. The Accused is charged pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute with "violence to life and person".[524] Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions lists "violence to life and person" as one of the acts which must be prohibited at any time and in any place in the case of an armed conflict not of an international character.[525] The Appeals Chamber in Tadić stated that "customary international law imposes criminal liability for all serious violations of common Article 3".[526] This statement satisfies at once the first two requirements which must be met before a Trial Chamber may convict an accused for committing an offence under customary international law, namely, that the conduct in question is regarded as criminal under that body of law and that individual criminal responsibility may be imposed in case of breach. It may also be accepted that "violence to life and person" generally constitutes a "serious" violation of common Article 3.[527] However, the Trial Chamber must further satisfy itself that the criminal conduct in question was sufficiently defined and was sufficiently accessible at the relevant time for it to warrant a criminal conviction and sentencing under the criminal heading chosen by the Prosecution, in this case "violence to life and person". From the perspective of the nullum crimen sine lege principle, it would be wholly unacceptable for a Trial Chamber to convict an accused person on the basis of a prohibition which, taking into account the specificity of customary international law and allowing for the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal law, is either insufficiently precise to determine conduct and distinguish the criminal from the permissible, or was not sufficiently accessible at the relevant time. A criminal conviction should indeed never be based upon a norm which an accused could not reasonably have been aware of at the time of the acts, and this norm must make it sufficiently clear what act or omission could engage his criminal responsibility.[528]

194. The Blaškić Trial Chamber defined "violence to life and person" as "a broad offence which, at first glance, encompasses murder, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture and which is accordingly defined by the cumulation of the elements of these specific offences".[529] The Trial

Chamber added that the mens rea for this offence is "characterised once it has been established that the accused intended to commit violence to life or person of the victims deliberately or through recklessness".[530] Unfortunately, the Blaškić Trial Chamber omitted to identify the source of these propositions – in particular, relevant instances of state practice – upon which it relied to state them. The Prosecution did not provide any assistance on this point, despite the Trial Chamber's request for assistance.[531] The Trial Chamber itself has been unable to find any conclusive evidence of state practice – prior to 1992 – which would point towards the definition of that crime, despite the parties' submissions in this present case.

195. Both "life" and the "person" are protected in various ways by international humanitarian law. Some infringements upon each of these protected interests are regarded as criminal under customary international law. It is so, for instance, of murder, cruel treatment, and torture. But not every violation of those protected interests has been criminalised, and those that have, as with the three offences just mentioned, have usually been given a definition so that both the individual who commits the act and the court called upon to judge his conduct are able to determine the nature and consequences of his acts. The residual character of a criminal prohibition such as Article 3 of the Statute does not by itself provide for the criminalisation by analogy to any act which is even vaguely or potentially criminal,[532] and the statement by the Appeals Chamber in Tadić already quoted does not repair the absence of any definition of the crime at the time of the acts charged in the particular case.

196. The principle of nullum crimen sine lege "does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime".[533] Nor does it preclude the progressive development of the law by the court.[534] But under no circumstances may the court create new criminal offences after the act charged against an accused either by giving a definition to a crime which had none so far, thereby rendering it prosecutable and punishable, or by criminalising an act which had not until the present time been regarded as criminal.

[531] On 1 February 2002, the parties were requested by the Trial Chamber to provide assistance in respect of a number of issues, including the definition of "violence to life and person" under customary international law (Notice addressed to the Parties, Issues Upon Which the Assistance of the parties is Sought). It was subsequently made clear to the Prosecution that this request of assistance in relation to "violence to life and person" was directed to the identification of relevant state practice which would support the definition of that crime under customary international law as given in the Blaškić Trial Judgment (see, T 4827-4829). As a result of the Trial Chamber's request, the Prosecution filed its "Submission by the Prosecution on the Law with Respect to 'Violence to Life and Person", 28 Mar 2002, and the Defence filed its "Submission by the Defence on the Law with Respect to 'Violence to Life and Person'" on 12 Apr 2002.

197. The scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction ratione materiae is determined by customary international law as it existed at the time when the acts charged in the indictment were allegedly committed.[535] This limitation placed upon the jurisdiction of the Tribunal is justified by concerns for the principle of legality.[536] As stated by the Secretary-General,[537]

> F...g in assigning to the International Tribunal the task of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law, the Security Council would not be creating or purporting to legislate that law. Rather, the International Tribunal would have the task of applying existing international humanitarian law.

198. Accordingly, the Tribunal's Statute was not intended to create new criminal offences.[538] Instead, as stated by the Appeals Chamber, in establishing the Tribunal, the Security Council "simply created an international mechanism for the prosecution of crimes which were already the subject of individual criminal responsibility".[539] The fact that an offence is listed in the Statute, or comes within Article 3 of the Statute through common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, does not therefore create new law, and the Tribunal only has jurisdiction over any listed crime if it was recognised as such by customary international law at the time the crime is alleged to have been committed. Each Trial Chamber is thus obliged to ensure that the law which it applies to a given criminal offence is indeed customary.[540] The Trial Chamber must further be satisfied that this offence was defined with sufficient clarity for it to have been foreseeable and accessible, taking into account the specificity of customary international law.[541]

[535] See Prosecutor v. Kordić and Čerkez, Case No. IT-95-14/2-PT, Decision on the Joint Defence Motion to Dismiss the Amended Indictment for Lack of Jurisdiction Based on the Limited Jurisdictional Reach of Articles 2 and 3, 2 Mar 1999, pars 20 and 22. In order to determine the content of customary international law at the relevant time, the Trial Chamber cannot rely upon instances of state practice which are posterior to the acts under consideration other than to confirm the existence of the rule as it existed at the time of the acts. See also Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), pars 34-35.

[536] See Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), pars 34-35.

[537] Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), par 29.

[538] The Appeals Chamber clearly distinguished between the question of "criminalisation" of an act and that of its jurisdiction over it (see, Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 163).

[539] Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 170.

[540] See, eg. Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 170, where the Appeals Chamber said that the Tribunal has jurisdiction over crimes which were already subject to individual criminal responsibility prior to its establishment. See also, Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, par 94, in respect of Article 3 of the Statute.

[541] The Trial Chamber rejects the submission by the Prosecution that a distinction must be drawn between the principle of legality on the one hand and a so-called principle of specificity on the other, whereby the former would only be concerned with the existence of a criminal offence, while the latter would be concerned with the definition or elements of that offence (Submission by the Prosecution on the Law with respect to 'Violence to Life and Person', 28 Mar 2002, par 5).

199. The Trial Chamber must be satisfied that a given act is criminal under customary international law, because, for instance, a vast number of national jurisdictions have criminalised it or a treaty provision which provides for its criminal punishment has come to represent customary international law.[542] On the other hand, as stated by the Delalić Appeals Chamber, "a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provision on punishment of breaches".[543] The Trial Chamber may also, as suggested by the Appeals Chamber, be satisfied that, in the language of the ICCPR, those acts were "criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations".[544] For criminal liability to attach, it is not sufficient, however, merely to establish that the act in question was illegal under international law, in the sense of being liable to engage the responsibility of a state which breaches that prohibition,[545] nor is it enough to establish that the act in question was a crime under the domestic law of the person who committed the act.

200. It is important to underline that, when it comes to sources of international law, Draft Codes of the International Law Commission merely represent a subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. They may reflect legal considerations largely shared by the international community, and they may expertly identify rules of international law, but they do not constitute state practice relevant to the determination of a rule of customary international law.

201. Once it is satisfied that a certain act or set of acts is indeed criminal under customary international law, the Trial Chamber must satisfy itself that this offence with which the accused is charged was defined with sufficient clarity under customary international law for its general nature, its criminal character and its approximate gravity to have been sufficiently foreseeable and accessible. When making that assessment, the Trial Chamber takes into account the specificity of [542] For an example of the first scenario, see Furundžija Trial Judgment, pars 177-186 and Kunarac Trial Judgment pars 438-460 in respect of the offence of rape. For an example of the second scenario, see Delalić Appeals Judgment, pars 163-167 in respect of serious violations of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

[543] Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 162. Some treaty provisions do provide expressly for criminal sanctions, while some others have acquired such a criminal character over time, and some of those have even crystallised into a rule of customary law the breach of which entails the criminal liability of the person who committed the act. This is the case, for instance, of serious violations of common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions (see, Tadić Jurisdiction Decision pars 128-137).

[544] Article 15(2) of the ICCPR. See Delalić Appeals Judgment, par 173, which mistakenly quotes the text of Article 7(2) of the ECHR instead of Article 15(2) of the ICCPR. [545] A finding to the effect that a given norm is binding upon a state – qua custom or treaty law – does not entail that its breach may also engage the criminal liability of the individual who committed the act, let alone that it may have that effect under customary international law. See Kunarac Trial Judgment par 489.

international law, in particular that of customary international law.[546] The requirement of sufficient clarity of the definition of a criminal offence is in fact part of the nullum crimen sine lege requirement, and it must be assessed in that context.[547]

202. If customary international law does not provide for a sufficiently precise definition of a crime listed in the Statute, the Trial Chamber would have no choice but to refrain from exercising its jurisdiction over it, regardless of the fact that the crime is listed as a punishable offence in the Statute. This is so because, to borrow the language of a US military tribunal in Nuremberg, anything contained in the statute of the court in excess of existing customary international law would be a utilisation of power and not of law.[548]

203. In the absence of any clear indication in the practice of states as to what the definition of the offence of "violence to life and person" identified in the Statute may be under customary law, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that such an offence giving rise to individual criminal responsibility exists under that body of law.[549]

204. The Trial Chamber therefore acquits the Accused of the charge of violence to life and person pleaded in Counts 7 (Drina River incident) and 13 (Pionirska Street incident) of the Indictment.[550]

[548] For a similar reasoning and similar wording in respect of Control Council Law No 10, see Trials of War Criminals Before The Nuremberg Military Tribunals Under Control Council Law No 10 ("Hostage case"), Vol 11, 1240.

[549] The Prosecution, which was requested to assist the Chamber in that respect, also failed to find any instances of state practice which would be indicative of what the definition of "violence to life and person" might be under customary international law. As useful as the Commentaries to the 1949 Geneva Conventions may be to interpret the Conventions, they do not constitute state practice (see, Submission by the Prosecution on the Law with Respect to 'Violence to Life and Person', 28 Mar 2002, par 14). The Trial Chamber need not and does not make any finding as to whether the prohibition against "violence to life and person" is binding upon states (as opposed to individuals) qua customary international law.

[550] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the other criminal offences charged in the Indictment are firmly established as crimes under customary international law.

IX. MURDER

A. The Law

205. Counts 4, 5, 10 and 11 charge the Accused with murder, a well-defined crime under customary international law.[551] The elements of the definition of "murder" under customary international law are as follows:[552]

1. The victim is dead.
2. The death was caused by an act or omission of the accused, or of a person or persons for whose acts or omissions the accused bears criminal responsibility.
3. That act was done, or that omission was made, by the accused, or a person or persons for whose acts or omissions he bears criminal responsibility, with an intention:

   to kill, or to inflict grievous bodily harm, or to inflict serious injury, in the reasonable knowledge that such act or omission was likely to cause death.

B. Conclusions based upon factual findings relevant to these counts and responsibility of the Accused

1. Drina River incident

206. The Indictment charges the Accused with individual criminal upon the basis that he personally perpetrated the crime of murder of the Muslim men. The Prosecution has never suggested that he killed all five men who died in this incident. The Trial Chamber's finding that it was not satisfied that the Accused fired his weapon at the same time as the other three men with weapons would prevent a finding that the Accused personally perpetrated the crime of murder in relation to one or more of those five men. But the Prosecution case has, since at least the Pre-Trial Conference, always been that the Accused participated in a joint criminal enterprise to murder the seven Muslim men. That is the way in which the trial was conducted.

[551] Many individuals were convicted for murder, either as a war crime or a crime against humanity, for their actions during the Second World War. Further, every domestic legal system provides for the criminalisation, the punishment and the definition of such a crime. See, eg, Krnojelac Trial Judgment, par 324; Kvočka Trial Judgment, par 132; Krstić Trial Judgment, par 485; Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgment, par 235-236; Kupreškić Trial Judgment, pars 560-561; Blaškić Trial Judgment, par 217; Jelisić Trial Judgment, par 35; Delalić Trial Judgment, pars 422 and 439; Prosecutor v Akayesu, Case ICTR-96-4-T, Judgment, 2 Sept 1998 ("Akayesu Trial Judgment"), pars 587-589; Prosecution v Rutaganda, Case ICTR –96-3-T, Judgment, 6 Dec 1999 ("Rutaganda Trial Judgment"), par 79.

207. To attach criminal responsibility to the Accused for the joint criminal enterprise of murder, the Prosecution must establish that there was an agreement among the Accused, Milan Lukić and the other two unidentified men that the seven Muslim men would be murdered, and that each of those persons, including the Accused, shared the intent that they would be murdered.

208. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence is that there was an understanding amounting to an agreement between Milan Lukić, the Accused and the two unidentified men to kill the seven Muslim men. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence is that the Accused, by his actions, intended that the seven Muslim men be killed, whether or not he actually carried out any of those killings himself.[553]

209. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused personally participated in this joint criminal enterprise by preventing the seven Muslim men from fleeing by pointing a gun at them while they were detained at the Vilina Vlas Hotel, by escorting them to the bank of the Drina River and pointing a gun at them to prevent their escape, and by standing behind the Muslim men with his gun together with the other three offenders shortly before the shooting started.[554]

210. As pointed out above, if the agreed crime is committed by one or other of the participants in a joint criminal enterprise such as has already been discussed, all of the participants in that enterprise are equally guilty of the crime regardless of the part played by each in its commission.[555] The Trial Chamber is therefore satisfied that the Accused incurs individual criminal responsibility for the murder of the five Muslim men as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to murder. In those circumstances, it is unnecessary to deal with the further alternative basis of criminal responsibility upon which the Prosecution relies – that of aiding and abetting.

211. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crime of murder (as a crime against humanity) under Count 4 of the Indictment, and of the crime of murder (as a violation of the laws or customs of war) under Count 5 of the Indictment in respect of Meho Džafić, Ekrem Džafić, Hasan Kustura, Hasan Mutapčić and Amir Kurtalić.

2. Pionirska Street Incident

212. The Prosecution alleges that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the murder of about 70 Muslims as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to kill this group of people pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.[556] To establish the Accused's responsibility on this basis, the Prosecution must establish that the Accused entered into an agreement with the Milan Lukić group to murder these people and that each of the participants, including the Accused, shared the intent of this crime.[557] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution has established that the Accused either entered into such an agreement or had the intent to murder these people.

213. As pointed out above,[558] the Prosecution did not rely upon the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, so that the Accused cannot be held responsible for the natural and foreseeable consequences of effecting any joint criminal enterprise he may have agreed to commit a lesser crime. The Prosecution has therefore failed to establish that the Accused was part of a joint criminal enterprise to kill the Muslims locked in the house on Pionirska Street.

214. The Prosecution has also alleged that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the murder of about 70 people as an aider and abettor to the principal offenders of those murders. To establish the Accused's responsibility as an aider and abettor to the principal offenders, the Prosecution must establish that he was aware of the intent of the principal offenders, and that he carried out acts which rendered a substantial contribution to the commission of the intended crime by the principal offenders.[559] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the acts of the Accused in seeking to ensure that the group stayed together contributed to the commission of the crime by the principal offenders, but it is not satisfied, however, that the Accused was aware that the intent of the principal offenders was to murder members of the Kortinik group. The Accused cannot therefore be found to have incurred individual criminal responsibility as an aider and abettor to the murder of the members of the Kortinik group.

215. The Accused is therefore acquitted of the charge of murder (as a crime against humanity) in Count 10 of the Indictment and of the charge of murder (as a violation of the laws or customs of war) in Count 11 of the Indictment.

X. EXTERMINATION

A. The Law

216. The Indictment charges the Accused with "extermination" as a crime against humanity (Article 5(b) of the Statute), in relation to the Pionirksa Street incident only.[560]

217. In the discussions leading up to the adoption of the Nuremberg Charter, "extermination" was considered for the first time as an independent criminal offence rather than as a descriptive device encapsulating the commission of killings on a vast scale.[561] The phrase first appeared in Nuremberg in an American draft text for the Nuremberg Charter submitted to the other Allied delegations on 25 July 1945.[562] The phrase disappeared in three subsequent drafts only to re-appear on 31 July 1945 in a revised version of a draft once again submitted by the American delegation headed by Mr Justice Robert H Jackson. The crime of "extermination" was later included in Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter as well as in the Nuremberg Indictment as a crime against humanity,[563] but its definition was apparently not discussed or commented upon in the course of the debates between the representatives of the four Allied Powers nor, it appears, at any other point before the adoption of the Charter.[564]

218. The meaning and function of that phrase was clarified to some extent in the pronouncements made by the then US Chief Prosecutor, Mr Justice Jackson. In his Opening Speech, Mr Justice [560] Prosecution's Pre-Trial Brief, pars 7 and 145. The charges against this Accused in relation to the Bikavac incident have been withdrawn on the Prosecutor's motion of 12 July 2001 (see Prosecutor's Pre-Trial Brief, par 43).

[561] Earlier references to "extermination" as a factual descriptive device may be found, for instance, in one of the so-called Leipzig cases rendered by the German Supreme Court in Leipzig immediately following the First World War; in the case against Hans von Schack and Benno Kruska, the Supreme Court referred to an intentional typhus epidemic in a prisoners-of-war camp as a "weapon of extermination" (Transactions of the Reichstag, First Legislature, Vol 368, Nos 2254-2628, In re Hans von Schack and Benno Kruska, 7 July 1921 (printed text of the verdicts issued by the Supreme Court of the German Reich on the basis of the laws of 18 December 1919 and 24 Mar 1920, p 90).

[562] Redraft of Definitions of "Crimes", Submitted by American Delegation, 25 July 1945, in Report of Robert H Jackson, United States Representative to the International Conference on Military Trials, London, 1945.

[563] Count 4 of the Nuremberg Indictment (Crimes against Humanity) provided that "Fsğince the 1st September 1939, the persecution of the Jews was redoubled; millions of Jews from Germany and from the occupied Western Countries were sent to the Eastern Countries for extermination". It went on to list Jewish victims of mass murders and stated that "Fmğany concentration camps and ghettos were set up in which Jews were incarcerated and tortured, starved, subjected to merciless atrocities and finally exterminated. About 70,000 Jews were exterminated in Yugoslavia".

[564] Egon Schwelb, legal officer for the United Nations War Crimes Commission, suggested that the drafters of the Nuremberg Charter may have included the crime of extermination in order to "bring the earlier stages in the organization of a policy of extermination under the action of law, and that steps which are too remote from an individual act of homicide to constitute complicity in that act may be punishable as complicity in the crime of extermination" (E. Schwelb, "Crimes against humanity", 1946 British Yearbook of International Law, 178, 192).

Jackson stated that "Ftghe Nazi conspiracy F...g always contemplated not merely overcoming current opposition, but exterminating elements which could not be reconciled with its philosophy of the State".[565] Further, Mr Justice Jackson referred to the Nazi plan "to exterminate peoples and institutions", in particular the Jews, the Poles, the Serbs and the Greeks.[566] After describing various German military campaigns, Mr Justice Jackson added that the Nazis targeting of Jews "never was limited to extermination in Germany; always it contemplated extinguishing the Jews in Europe and often in the world. F...g I shall refer only to enough of the evidence of these to show the extent of the Nazi design for killing Jews".[567] When addressing the issue of Nazi "scientific" experiments, Mr Justice Jackson also referred to the extermination of "undesirables".[568] Finally, in relation to criminal intent, Mr Justice Jackson warned the court that, although "a few defendants may show efforts to make specific exceptions to the policy of Jewish extermination", he was unaware of any instance "in which any defendant opposed the policy itself or sought to revoke or even modify it".[569]

219. The Judgment of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg contains many references to the concept of "extermination". In essence, the phrase refers to a wide scale enterprise directed against members of large groups of individuals – such as the Jews, the Poles, mentally retarded, the Communists – which leads or has the potential to lead to large scale killing of such individuals, regardless of the means or methods used to kill them.[570]

220. This interpretation of "extermination" as killings committed on a mass scale is further supported by the 1948 History of the United Nations War Crime Commission, which stated that the

It moved rapidly to organised mass violence against them, physical isolation in ghettos, deportation, forced labour, mass starvation, and extermination. F...g The conspiracy or common plan to exterminate the Jew was so methodically thoroughly pursued, that despite the German defeat and Nazi prostration this Nazi aim largely succeeded. phrase "extermination" as it appeared in Article 6(c) of the Nuremberg Charter "is apparently to be interpreted as murder on a large scale – mass murder".[571] The Commission went on to add that -

> The inclusion of both "extermination" and "murder" may be taken to mean that implication in the policy of extermination, without any direct connection with actual criminal acts of murder, may be punished as complicity in the crime of extermination.[572]

221. In addition, the Charter of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East ("Tokyo Charter"), the Control Council Law No 10 and the Nuremberg Principles again listed "extermination" as one of the crimes which, all other conditions being met, could amount to a crime against humanity.[573]

222. Later decisions used the phrase "extermination" in the same manner and with essentially a similar meaning.[574] However, none of these courts made any real attempt at defining precisely this offence or at distinguishing it from other crimes against humanity.[575] It is worth noting that in none of the reviewed cases were minor figures charged with "extermination" as a crime against humanity. Those who were charged with that criminal offence did in fact exercise authority or power over many other individuals or did otherwise have the capacity to be instrumental in the killing of a large number of individuals. Those, such as executioners, who were not in such position but who had participated in the killing of one or a number of individuals were generally charged with murder or related offences whilst the charge of "extermination" seems to have been limited to individuals who, by reason of either their position or authority, could decide upon the fate or had control over a large number of individuals.[576]

223. Other international or national instruments contain references to "extermination". Thus, for instance, Article 32 of the IV Geneva Convention of 1949 provides that:

> The High Contracting Parties specifically agree that each of them is prohibited from taking any measure of such a character as to cause the physical suffering or extermination of protected persons in their hands. This prohibition applies not only to murder, torture, corporal punishments, mutilation and medical or scientific experiments not necessitated by the medical treatment of a protected person, but also to any other measures of brutality whether applied by civilian or military agents. (emphasis added)

The Commentary of that provision, which distinguishes between "murder" and "extermination", insists on the latter's collective character and states that:

> The idea of "murder" may be compared with that of "extermination", in the first sentence of this Article. While murder is the denial of the right of an individual to exist, extermination refuses the same right to whole groups of human beings; it is a collective crime consisting of a number of individual murders.[577]

224. In May 1960, Israeli forces transferred Adolph Eichmann from Argentina to Israel to put him on trial for various criminal offences, including for extermination as a crime against humanity and for crimes against the Jewish people, a variant of the crime of genocide. At no time before Eichmann's trial had so many references to "extermination" been made. The phrase is variously and extensively used in the judgment of the District Court of Jerusalem as a synonym for killing on a vast scale, annihilation, extinction, death, elimination.[578] The difficulty in determining what the court meant when using the phrase "extermination" stems in part from the fact that in its Judgment the court referred to the crime of extermination as a crime against humanity but also to the extermination of the Jewish people, that is, to killing on a vast scale for the purpose of committing a genocide.[579] The intermingling in the Judgment of the factual basis relevant to both "extermination" as a crime against humanity and "extermination" as a means to a genocidal end, as well as the descriptive function of that phrase in the Judgment, makes it difficult to identify the precise elements of the definition of "extermination" as a crime against humanity which the Israeli court adopted. The following factors may, however, be identified in this judgment: "extermination"

[579] The 1950 Israeli Law on the Doing of Justice to Nazis and their Collaborators lists "extermination" as a crime against humanity. In the discussions leading up to the adoption of this law, Justice Minister Rosen appearing before the Israeli Parliament alluded to the "extermination" of the Jewish people in the following terms: "The law regarding Nazis and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment), like the law currently discussed in the Knesset, regarding the crime of genocide, the prevention and punishment thereof, of which the Knesset has begun its second reading but has not completed its legislation, has again brought before the Knesset the tragic episode, the most tragic episode in the history of our nation, the episode of the campaign of destruction and annihilation, in which six million of our people were exterminated." (27-28 Mar 1950) refers to killing on a vast scale; it is directed towards members of a collection of individuals (eg, the Jews); the method used to carry out the killing is irrelevant; knowledge of the vast murderous enterprise is required.

225. In addition to the criminalisation of the act of "extermination" as described above, the Trial Chamber notes that various other forms of arbitrary deprivation of life have been criminalised under customary international law.[580] Depending on the gravity of the act, the manner, context and state of mind in which the act is committed, customary international law provides for several criminal offences which cover various forms of arbitrary deprivation of life, such as, "wilful killing" as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions,[581] "murder" as a crime against humanity[582] or "killing members of the group" as an act of genocide.[583] All of them could, all other conditions being met, apply to the arbitrary killing of large numbers of civilians.

226. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the legal meaning of "extermination" as a crime against humanity may be established on the basis accepted by those decisions and instruments adopted prior to 1992, and by the instruments and decisions referred to which have drawn out the elements and principles which underlie that basis. The Trial Chamber notes that several Trial Chambers have now defined the crime of "extermination" and, at times, entered convictions under that heading.[584] This Trial Chamber accepts that the definition laid in those cases is largely consistent with the principles which this Trial Chamber has adopted.[585]

227. This Trial Chamber concludes from the material which it has reviewed that criminal responsibility for "extermination" only attaches to those individuals responsible for a large number of deaths, even if their part therein was remote or indirect.[586] Responsibility for one or for a limited

The person standing with drawn dagger over a fresh corpse must, by the very nature of justice, exonerate himself" (United States v Ohlendorf and others ("Einsatzgruppen case"), IV Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunal under Control Council Law No 10, p 459).

[584] Accused persons were convicted for "extermination" in the following cases: Akayesu Trial Judgment, pars 591-592 and 735-744; Rutaganda Trial Judgment, pars 82-84 and 403-418; Prosecutor v Musema, Case ICTR-96-13-T, Judgment, 27 Jan 2000 ("Musema Trial Judgment"), pars 217-219 and 942-951. The convictions for "extermination" were upheld on appeal in all three cases. In addition, the Krstić and Kayishema Trial Chambers gave a definition of the offence of "extermination", although neither accused in those cases was convicted on that basis; the prohibition against double conviction precluded the Trial Chamber from doing so (see, Krstić Trial Judgment, pars 490-505 and 684-686; Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana, Case ICTR-95-1-T, Judgment, 21 May 1999 ("Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Judgment"), pars 141-147 and 576-579).

[586] The Trial Chamber notes that the definition of "extermination" in the "elements of crimes" which supplement the Statute of the ICC does not contain such a requirement. It was thought during the discussions of these "elements" number of such killings is insufficient. The Trial Chamber also concludes that the act of extermination must be collective in nature rather than directed towards singled out individuals.[587] However, contrary to genocide, the offender need not have intended to destroy the group or part of the group to which the victims belong.

228. It is also apparent from the material reviewed that it is not sufficient to establish extermination for the offender to have intended to kill a large number of individuals, or to inflict grievous bodily harm, or to inflict serious injury, in the reasonable knowledge that such act or omission was likely to cause death as in the case of murder. He must also have known of the vast scheme of collective murder and have been willing to take part therein.[588] As opposed to persecution pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute, it need not be established that he acted on any discriminatory grounds. Also, the ultimate reason or motives – political or ideological – for which the offender carried out the acts are not part of the required mens rea and are, therefore, legally irrelevant.[589]

229. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the elements of the crime of "extermination" are as follows:

1. The material element of extermination consists of any one act or combination of acts which contributes to the killing of a large number of individuals (actus reus).

that such a requirement would be over-burdensome for the Prosecution, and that it was therefore undesirable (see, eg, R. Lee et al (eds), The International Criminal Court – Elements of Crimes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence, p 83). Such concern must remain, for the purpose of this Tribunal, beyond the scope of its consideration, particularly when, as in the present case, the adoption of a more lenient definition would be prejudicial to the accused. The International Tribunal must apply the law as it finds it, not as it would wish it to be. Furthermore, the definition eventually adopted in the elements of crimes for the ICC is directly inspired by the definition of "extermination" given in the Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Chamber Judgment, where it is stated that a limited number of killings or even one single killing could qualify as extermination if it forms part of a mass killing event (Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Judgment, par 147). This Trial Chamber notes that the Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Chamber omitted to provide any state practice in support of its ruling on that point, thereby very much weakening the value of its ruling as a precedent. No state practice has been found by this Trial Chamber which would support the finding of the Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Chamber. Although the Kayishema and Ruzindana Trial Judgment went on appeal, the definition of "extermination" was not the subject of an appeal nor was it dealt with by the Appeals Chamber in any way (Prosecutor v Kayishema and Ruzindana, ICTR-95-1-A, Judgment (Reasons), 1 June 2001).

[587] Most cases from the Second World War address thousands of death when using the term "extermination"; in one case, the court used the expression "extermination" when referring to the killing of 733 civilians (United States v Ohlendorf and others ("Einsatzgruppen case"), IV Trials of War Criminals before the Nuremberg Military Tribunal under Control Council Law No 10, 421). The Trial Chamber is not aware of cases which, prior to 1992, used the phrase "extermination" to describe the killing of less than 733 persons. The Trial Chamber does not suggest, however, that a lower number of victims would disqualify that act as "extermination" as a crime against humanity, nor does it suggest that such a threshold must necessarily be met.

[589] In Nuremberg, the International Military Tribunal made reference to "extermination", inter alia, in relation to mass murders committed for ideological reasons (Jews), political reasons (political opponents, communists and

2. The offender must intend to kill, to inflict grievous bodily harm, or to inflict serious injury, in the reasonable knowledge that such act or omission is likely to cause death, or otherwise intends to participate in the elimination of a number of individuals, in the knowledge that his action is part of a vast murderous enterprise in which a large number of individuals are systematically marked for killing or killed (mens rea).

B. Conclusions based upon factual findings relevant to this count and responsibility of the Accused

230. As already stated in relation to the murder charges, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the plan to kill the group was first conceived when the Accused approached the group and sought to persuade them to remain together in the Memićs' houses in Pionirska Street.[590] Nor is the Trial Chamber satisfied that the only inference available on the evidence is that the Accused knew that the members of the these people were to be killed or mistreated in the way charged in the Indictment.[591] And, as pointed out above,[592] the Prosecution did not rely upon the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, so that the Accused cannot be held responsible for the natural and foreseeable consequences of effecting any joint criminal enterprise he may have agreed to commit a lesser crime. The Prosecution has therefore failed to establish that the Accused was part of a joint criminal enterprise to exterminate the Muslims locked in the house on Pionirska Street, even had such a crime been established in the present case.

231. Concerning the Prosecution's allegation that the Accused may be held criminally liable as an aider and abettor to the crime of extermination, the Trial Chamber reaches the same conclusion as in relation to the murder counts, namely, that it is not satisfied that the Accused was aware that the intent of the principal offenders was to exterminate members of the Kortinik group.[593] The Accused cannot therefore be found to have incurred individual criminal responsibility as an aider and abettor to the extermination of the members of this group.

232. In addition, as pointed out above,[594] "extermination" supposes the taking of a large number of lives. It is unnecessary in the present case to determine whether sixty or seventy deaths alone satisfy this requirement of scale. The Prosecution has in any event failed to establish that the Accused knew that his acts were part of a vast collective murder in which a large number of individuals were systematically marked for extermination or were in fact exterminated. As far as the evidence in this case is concerned, the Accused is showed to have intended to kill only the seven Muslim men who were the victims of the Drina River incident.

233. The Accused is therefore acquitted of the charge of extermination (as a crime against humanity) in Count 1 of the Indictment.

XI. INHUMANE ACTS

A. The Law

234. The Accused is charged under Counts 6 and 12 of the Indictment with inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute. The crime of inhumane acts, like inhumane treatment under Article 3, and cruel treatment under Article 2, functions as a residual category for serious charges which are not otherwise enumerated under Article 5. All of these offences require proof of the same elements.[595] The elements to be proved are:[596]

(i) the occurrence of an act or omission of similar seriousness to the other enumerated acts under the Article;

(ii) the act or omission caused serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constituted a serious attack on human dignity; and

(iii) the act or omission was performed deliberately by the accused or a person or persons for whose acts and omissions he bears criminal responsibility.

235. To assess the seriousness of an act, consideration must be given to all the factual circumstances. These circumstances may include the nature of the act or omission, the context in which it occurred, the personal circumstances of the victim including age, sex and health, as well as the physical, mental and moral effects of the act upon the victim.[597] While there is no requirement that the suffering imposed by the act have long term effects on the victim, the fact that an act has had long term effects may be relevant to the determination of the seriousness of the act.[598]

236. The mens rea of inhumane acts is satisfied where the offender, at the time of the act or omission, had the intention to inflict serious physical or mental suffering or to commit a serious attack on the human dignity of the victim, or where he knew that his act or omission was likely to cause serious physical or mental suffering or a serious attack upon human dignity and was reckless thereto.[599]

237. In the Indictment (as interpreted in the Prosecution Pre-Trial Brief), the Prosecution charged inhumane acts in relation to the two survivors of the Drina River shooting and the survivors of the Pionirska Street fire.[600]

B. Conclusions based upon factual findings relevant to these counts and responsibility of the Accused

1. Drina River Incident

238. As stated above, the Prosecution made it clear that the Accused was charged with inhumane acts in relation to that incident only in relation to the two survivors, not the five murdered men.[601] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that there was an understanding amounting to an agreement between Milan Lukić, the Accused and the two unidentified men that the seven Muslim be killed, including the two survivors of the shooting, VG-32 and VG-14.[602] The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the Accused personally participated in this joint criminal enterprise in the manner described above.[603]

239. The Trial Chamber is further satisfied that the attempted murder of VG-32 and VG-14 constitutes a serious attack on their human dignity, and that it caused VG-32 and VG-14 immeasurable mental suffering, and that the Accused, by his acts, intended to seriously attack the human dignity of VG-32 and VG-14 and to inflict serious physical and mental suffering upon them.[604] The Trial Chamber is thus satisfied that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the attempted murder of these two Muslim men as inhumane acts pursuant to his participation in a joint criminal enterprise to murder them.[605]

240. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crime of inhumane acts (as a crime against humanity) under Count 6 of the Indictment in respect of VG-32 and VG-14.

2. Pionirska Street Incident

241. The Trial Chamber re-iterates the finding made above, namely, that it is not satisfied that the plan to kill or mistreat the group as charged in the Indictment was first conceived when the Accused approached the group and sought to persuade them to remain together in the Memićs' houses in Pionirska Street,[606] or that the only inference available on the evidence is that the Accused knew that the group from Koritnik were to be subjected to any inhumane acts as charged in the Indictment.[607] And, as pointed out in relation to the murder charges,[608] the Prosecution did not rely upon the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, so that the Accused cannot be held responsible for the natural and foreseeable consequences of effecting any joint criminal enterprise he may have agreed to commit a lesser crime. The Prosecution has therefore failed to establish that the Accused was part of a joint criminal enterprise to commit inhumane acts upon the Muslims locked in the house in Pionirska Street.

242. Concerning the Prosecution's allegation that the Accused may be held criminally liable as an aider and abettor to the crime of inhumane acts, the Trial Chamber reaches the same conclusion as in relation to the murder and extermination counts, namely, that it is not satisfied that the Accused was aware that the intent of the principal offenders was to cause serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity to the victims of the fire.[609] The Accused cannot therefore be found to have incurred individual criminal responsibility as an aider and abettor to the inhumane acts inflicted upon these people. The activity of the Accused in seeking to convince the Koritnik group to stay together in one place does not, on its own, amount to an inhumane act in the context of this case.

243. The Trial Chamber therefore acquits the Accused of the charge of inhumane acts (as a crime against humanity) in Count 12 of the Indictment.

XII. PERSECUTION

A. The Law

244. Count 3 charges the accused with persecution on political, racial and religious grounds pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute. The crime of persecution consists of an act or omission which:[610]

1. discriminates in fact and which denies or infringes upon a fundamental right laid down in international customary or treaty law (the actus reus); and

2. was carried out deliberately with the intention to discriminate on one of the listed grounds, specifically race, religion or politics (the mens rea).

245. Although the Statute does not explicitly require that the discrimination take place against a member of a targeted group, the act or omission must in fact have discriminatory consequences rather than merely be done with discriminatory intention.[611] Discriminatory intent by itself is not sufficient. Without this requirement an accused could be convicted of persecution without anyone having actually been persecuted. This possibility would render the distinction between the crime of persecution and other crimes (such as murder and torture) virtually meaningless.[612]

246. The act or omission constituting the crime of persecution may assume various forms, and there is no comprehensive list of what acts can amount to persecution.[613] It may encompass acts that are listed in the Statute[614] as well as acts that are not listed in the Statute.[615] The persecutory act or omission may encompass physical or mental harm or infringements upon individual freedom.[616] It may refer to a series of acts, or a single act may be sufficient.[617] In charging persecution, the principle of legality requires the Prosecutor to identify particular acts amounting to persecution rather than persecution in general.[618]

247. In order to qualify as persecution, the act or omission must reach a level of gravity at least equal to that of other offences listed in the Statute.[619] When considering whether an act or omission satisfies this threshold, acts should not be considered in isolation but should be examined in their context and with consideration of their cumulative effect.[620] Although it is not required that each underlying act constitute a violation of international law, the acts must, either separately or in combination, amount to persecution.[621]

248. The requirement of a specific discriminatory intent is unique to the crime of persecution.[622] The accused must consciously intend to discriminate for persecution to be established. It is not sufficient that the accused was merely aware that he is in fact acting in a discriminatory way.[623] The requirement that an accused consciously intends to discriminate does not require the existence of a discriminatory policy or, where such a policy is shown to exist, participation by the accused in the formulation of that discriminatory policy or practice by an authority.

249. The definition of persecution requires an act or omission that is in fact persecutory. Accordingly, the discriminatory intent must relate to the specific act charged as persecution. It is not sufficient that the act merely occurs within an attack which has a discriminatory aspect.[624] Occasionally, the law has been applied by this Tribunal on the basis that a discriminatory attack is a sufficient basis from which to infer the discriminatory intent of acts carried out within that attack. This approach may lead to the correct conclusion with respect to most of the acts carried out within the context of an discriminatory attack, but there may be acts committed within the context that were committed either on discriminatory grounds not listed in the Statute, or for purely personal reasons. Accordingly, this approach does not necessarily allow for an accurate inference regarding intent to be drawn with respect to all acts that occur within that context.

250. In the Indictment the Prosecution alleges that the crime of persecution was carried out through:[625]

(a) the murder of Bosnian Muslims and other non-Serb civilians;

(b) the harrassment, humiliation, terrorisation and psychological abuse of Bosnian Muslims and other non-Serb civilians; and

(c) the theft and destruction of personal property of Bosnian Muslims and other non-Serb civilians.

At the Pre-Trial Conference, it was agreed by the Prosecution that the persecution charge was based upon the Drina River incident and the Pionirska Street incident only.[626] The Trial Chamber's consideration of the crime of persecution is accordingly limited to those two incidents and, because the cumulative effect of the Accused's conduct must be considered, the ultimate finding of the Trial Chamber relates to that cumulative effect.

B. Conclusions based upon factual findings relevant to this count and responsibility of the Accused

251. The Trial Chamber has already found that the Accused acted as an informant to Milan Lukić's group, assisting that group in locating the Muslim population of Višegrad.[627] The Trial Chamber has already satisfied itself that the Accused did so with full awareness that the intent of Milan Lukić's group was to persecute the local Muslim population of Višegrad through the commission of the underlying crimes.[628] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that, in providing information to the group led by Milan Lukić, the Accused shared the intention of that group to persecute the local Muslim civilians on religious or political grounds. In order to convict the Accused for the crime of persecution, however, the Prosecution must also establish that the Accused participated in the commission of a persecutory act with a discriminatory intention. It is not sufficient to merely establish an intention to persecute. Where that act is not one of the offences enumerated in the Statute, it must be an act of equal gravity to those enumerated acts in order to form the basis of a charge of persecution.

252. There is no basis in the evidence for a finding beyond reasonable doubt what specific crimes were committed by the Milan Lukić's group which resulted from the assistance given by the Accused, or that the Accused was sufficiently aware of the circumstances in which Milan Lukić's group would use the information he gave them so as to constitute him as an aider and abettor of the crimes which they committed. Indeed, the Prosecution case, as limited at the Pre-Trial Conference, would exclude any reliance upon such crimes even if they had been identified sufficiently in the evidence.

253. The Prosecution charges the murder of Bosnian Muslim and other non-Serb civilians as persecution. These killings are separately charged as murder (a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5 (a) and a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute). Those acts amounting to murder under Article 5 of the Statute are as such of sufficient gravity to constitute persecution.

254. The Trial Chamber has already found that the Accused has individual criminal responsibility for murder punishable under Article 5 of the Statute in relation to five victims, pursuant to a joint criminal enterprise to kill the seven Bosnian Muslim men on the banks of the Drina River. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence is that these seven Muslim men were singled out for religious or political reasons, and that the killing of five of them were acts carried out on discriminatory grounds, namely, religious or political. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the acts of the Accused were in fact discriminatory, in that the men were killed only because they were Muslims. Accordingly, the Accused incurs individual criminal responsibility for the crime of persecution on the basis of the underlying crime of murder of five of the Bosnian Muslim civilians.

255. In addition, the Trial Chamber has already found that the Accused committed the offence of inhumane acts, a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute in relation to the two survivors of the Drina River shooting.[629] Those acts amounting to inhumane acts under Article 5 of the Statute are of sufficient gravity to constitute persecution. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence is that the intention to kill these two men, and the attempt to do so, were acts carried out on one of the prohibited discriminatory grounds and that these two men, like the five who were killed, were singled out for religious or political reasons. As stated in the previous paragraph, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the acts of the Accused were in fact discriminatory in that inhumane acts were inflicted against these men only because they were Muslims.

256. The Trial Chamber has already stated that it was satisfied that the Accused knew that some evil would befall the Koritnik group when they were being encouraged to stay together in Pionirska Street.[630] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused in doing so acted with the intent to discriminate on religious or political grounds. As already stated, the Trial Chamber has not been satisfied that the Accused shared the intent of Milan Lukić's group that the Koritnik group be killed.[631]

257. Count 3 of the Indictment charges the Accused with the "harassment, humiliation, terrorisation and psychological abuse of Bosnian Muslim and other non-Serb civilians". In its Pre-Trial Brief, the Prosecution submitted that "harassment, humiliation, terrorisation and psychological abuse" could be characterised as "cruel treatment" under common article 3(1)(a) or as "humiliating and degrading treatment" under common article 3(1)(c) of the Geneva Conventions.[632] The Prosecution submitted that the Accused was responsible for such crimes by virtue of the especially cruel methods which he is alleged to have employed to persecute the Bosnian Muslim population of Višegrad, in particular by herding approximately 140 civilians into buildings treated with flammable substance and burning them alive.[633]

258. The Trial Chamber has already stated its conclusion that the Accused has not been shown beyond reasonable doubt to have intended or known that such cruel, humiliating or degrading treatment would be inflicted to the group of Muslims which he persuaded to stay together in the house in Pionirska Street.[634] Nor is the manner in which the Accused acted in ensuring that the group stayed together "especially cruel", as the Prosecution has claimed. Nor was there any evidence that the Accused went to Milan Lukić to tell him of the whereabouts of the Koritnik group. That is mere speculation on the Prosecution's part. There are competing inferences available that the Accused had in mind that the Koritnik group would be forcibly transferred, looted and robbed or physically harmed. However, the very strong possibility that he had forcible transfer in mind (which has not been charged) prevents the Trial Chamber from concluding, for the purposes of the crime of persecution, that the only reasonable inference is that he had in mind those crimes which have been charged. In addition and as already pointed out above, the activity of the Accused in seeking to convince the Koritnik group to stay together in one place does not, on its own, amount to inhumane acts in the context of this case.[635]

259. Count 3 of the Indictment provides finally that persecution took the form of the "theft and destruction of personal property of Bosnian Muslims and other non-Serb civilians". The Prosecution Pre-Trial Brief does not contain any indication as to what role the Accused is alleged to have performed in that respect. As stated above, there is no satisfactory evidence that the Accused was present at the time of the looting.[636] Nor was there any evidence that he was part of a joint criminal enterprise to loot those people or destroy their property. For the reasons already given above,[637] it is not the only reasonable inference available that, when directing them into the Memić house, the Accused intended or knew that they would be robbed of their property or looted.

260. In summary, the Trial Chamber has not been satisfied that the Accused intended or knew of the intent of the principal offenders to either kill, harass, humiliate, psychologically abuse or loot the Kortinik group. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, however, that the Accused intended that the group be discriminated against in some way, and that he may have contributed in some way to the commission of the offences by the principal offenders by ensuring that the group stayed together. But, without the establishment of knowledge on his part that the intent was to kill, harass, humiliate, psychologically abuse or loot the group on discriminatory grounds, and in the absence of evidence that he made a substantial contribution to those crimes, the Accused's responsibility as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise or as an aider and abettor to that persecution has not been established. As already stated,[638] the Prosecution did not rely upon the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, so that the Accused cannot be held responsible for the natural and foreseeable consequences of effecting any joint criminal enterprise he may have agreed to commit a lesser crime. The Prosecution has therefore failed to establish that the Accused was part of a joint criminal enterprise to persecute the Muslims locked in the house on Pionirska Street.

261. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused incurs individual criminal responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute for the crime of persecutions pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute for his participation in the underlying crimes of murder (a crime against humanity) and inhumane acts (a crime against humanity) in relation to the shooting of the seven Bosnian men, including the killing of five of them, at the Drina River on 7 June 1992 as described above.[639] However, the Prosecution failed to establish that he was also liable for persecution in relation to the Pionirska Street incident.

262. The Trial Chamber finds that the Accused incurred individual criminal responsibility for the crime of persecution (as a crime against humanity) charged in Count 3 of the Indictment in relation to the murder of Meho Džafić, Ekrem Džafić, Hasan Kustura, Hasan Mutapčić and Amir Kurtalić and for the inhumane acts against VG-32 and VG-14.

XIII. CONVICTIONS ENTERED

263. The Accused has been found individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 7(1) for:

a) Count 3, persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute;

b) Count 4, murder as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) of the Statute;

c) Count 5, murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute;

d) Count 6, inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute;

264. The Accused has been acquitted of the offences charged in:

a) Count 1, extermination as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(b) of the Statute;

b) Count 7, violence to life and person as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute.

c) Count 10, murder as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) of the Statute;

d) Count 11, murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute;

e) Count 12, inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute;

f) Count 13, violence to life and person as a violation of the laws and customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute;

265. Each of the offences for which the Accused has been found to have incurred individual criminal responsibility relate to his participation in the Drina River incident. Cumulative convictions (convictions for different crimes charged in the indictment based on the same conduct) are permissible only if each crime involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other.[640] An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.[641] Where this test is not met, the Chamber must enter the conviction for the more specific crime, being the crime with an additional materially distinct element.[642]

266. Convictions for the crimes enumerated under Articles 3 and 5 of the Statute based on the same conduct are permissible, as each contains a materially distinct element.[643] The materially distinct element required by Article 3 is the requirement that there be a close link between the acts of the accused and the armed conflict.[644] That required by Article 5 offences is that the offence be committed within the context of a widespread or systematic attack directed against a civilian population.[645] Applying this test to the present case, convictions for murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war and any other crime charged under Article 5 of the Statute based on the same conduct are permissible. Whenever cumulative conviction under both Article 3 and Article 5 of the Statute is based on the same conduct, the Trial Chamber must ensure that the final or aggregate sentence reflects the totality of the criminal conduct and overall culpability of the offender.[646] The prejudice that an offender will or may suffer because of cumulative convictions based on the same conduct has to be taken into account when imposing the sentence.[647] With respect to convictions for the other charges within Article 5 of the Statute in relation to the Drina River incident, the Accused has been charged with murder (as a crime against humanity – Count 4) in relation to the five men who were killed and with inhumane acts (as a crime against humanity – Count 6) in relation of the two survivors and the two survivors only.[648] There is, therefore, no issue of cumulative conviction arising in relation to those two Counts as they are not based upon the same facts.

267. Persecution on political, racial or religious grounds pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute requires the materially distinct elements of a discriminatory act and discriminatory intent.[649] It is therefore the more specific provision vis-à-vis both murder as a crime against humanity and inhumane acts as a crime against humanity. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the crimes committed by the Accused at the Drina River were committed on political or religious grounds.[650] As a consequence, a conviction is to be entered for persecution pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute, but not for murder and inhumane acts pursuant to Article 5 of the Statute, with respect to the relevant conduct found to constitute the persecution charge.

268. Accordingly, in relation to the Drina River incident, the Accused is convicted for the crimes of:

(i) Persecution (as a crime against humanity) under Count 3 – which conviction incorporates his individual criminal responsibility for:

(a) the murder of the five men (as a crime against humanity) charged in Count 4, and

(b) the inhumane acts (as a crime against humanity) in relation to the two survivors, charged in Count 6.

(ii) Murder (as a violation of the laws or customs of war) in relation to five men, charged in Count 5.

XIV. SENTENCING CONSIDERATIONS

269. The Trial Chamber imposes a single sentence of imprisonment reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the Accused, and in accordance with Articles 23(1)[651] and 24(1)[652] of the Statute and with Rules 101(A)[653] and 87(C).[654] The fact that the Accused was convicted cumulatively in relation to the same facts has been taken into account when determining the appropriate sentence, to ensure that he was not punished twice for the same act. The sentence which reflects the totality of the Accused's criminal conduct and his overall culpability is imprisonment for 20 years. This section of the Judgment explains the considerations which led the Trial Chamber to impose that sentence.

270. As a preliminary matter, Article 24(1) of the Statute provides, inter alia, that in determining the term of imprisonment the Trial Chamber "shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia".[655] Although the Trial Chamber is not bound to follow the sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia,[656] recourse must be made to that sentencing practice as an aid in determining the sentence to be imposed.[657] What is required must go beyond merely reciting the relevant criminal code provisions of the former Yugoslavia; the general sentencing practice of the former Yugoslavia must be considered.[658]

271. Article 41(1) of the SFRY Code requires that consideration be given to:[659]

> (...) all the circumstances bearing on the magnitude of the punishment (extenuating and aggravating circumstances), and in particular, the degree of criminal responsibility, the motives from which the act was committed, the past conduct of the offender, his personal situation and his conduct after the commission of the criminal act, as well as other circumstances relating to the personality of the offender.

[651] Article 23(1) provides: "The Trial Chambers shall pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties on persons convicted of serious violations of international humanitarian law."
[652] Article 24(1) provides: "The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. [...]."
[653] Rule 101(A) provides: "A convicted person may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term up to and including the remainder of the convicted person's life."
[654] Rule 87(C) provides: "If the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more charges contained in the indictment, it shall impose a sentence in respect of each finding of guilt and indicate whether such sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently, unless it decides to exercise its power to impose a single sentence reflecting the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused."

This Article is generally similar to the sentencing provisions of Article 24(2) of the Statute and Rule 101(B).[660] Article 24(2) of the Statute directs the Trial Chamber to take into account the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person, while Rule 101(B) directs the Trial Chamber to consider any aggravating circumstances or any mitigating circumstances.

272. All of the above factors have been taken into account in determining the sentence, but the overriding sentencing obligation considered by the Trial Chamber has been that of fitting the penalty to the individual circumstances of the Accused and the gravity of the offences for which he has been found responsible.[661] This obligation has been formulated as follows:[662]

> FTghe sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.

Only those matters which were proved beyond reasonable doubt against the Accused have been considered against him in sentencing, including the aggravating factors.[663] The mitigating circumstances taken into account are those which have been established by the Accused on a balance of probabilities.[664]

273. The Trial Chamber has taken cognisance of retribution – interpreted as punishment of an offender for his specific criminal conduct – and general deterrence.[665] Both of these general sentencing factors form the backdrop against which the Accused's sentence has been determined.[666]

[660] Rule 101 largely repeats Arts 23 and 24 of the Statute; it provides in relevant part: "[...] (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 24, paragraph 2, of the Statute, as well as such factors as: (i) any aggravating circumstances; (ii) any mitigating circumstances including the substantial co-operation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction; (iii) the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia; (iv) the extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 10, paragraph 3, of the Statute. (C) Credit shall be given to the convicted person for the period, if any, during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending surrender to the Tribunal or pending trial or appeal."

[661] Kupre{ki} Appeal Judgment, par 442, Delali} Appeal Judgment, par 717; and Art 24(2) of the Statute, which states that the Trial Chamber in imposing the sentences "should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person." See also Aleksovski Appeal Judgment, par 182; Jelisi} Appeal Judgment, par 94.

[665] The Trial Chamber has applied the principle of public deterrence in determining the sentence to be imposed, but it has taken care that it has not been accorded undue prominence in that process: Tadi} Sentencing Appeal Judgment, par 48; Prosecutor v Todorovi}, Case IT-95-9/1-S, Sentencing Judgment, 31 July 2001 ("Todorovi} Sentencing Judgment"), pars 29-30; Krnojelac Trial Judgment, par 508. See also, Aleksovski Appeals Judgment, par 185; Delali} Appeal Judgment, par 806; Kunarac Trial Judgment, pars 840-841;.

274. The punishment which could have been imposed on the Accused in the former Yugoslavia at the relevant time is dealt with in Article 142(1) ("War crimes against the civilian population") of the SFRY Criminal Code.[667] It gives effect to the provisions of Geneva Convention IV and the two Additional Protocols, which are incorporated into the jurisdiction of the Tribunal by Article 2 of the Statute.[668] There appears to be no provision of the SFRY Criminal Code giving specific effect to the crimes against humanity enumerated in Article 5 of the Statute, although genocide (a specific category of crimes against humanity) is dealt with in Article 141 of the SFRY Criminal Code.[669]

275. In line with recent Appeals Chamber Judgments, the Trial Chamber has not considered that crimes against humanity should in principle attract a higher sentence than war crimes.[670]

Aggravating factors

[666] The Appeals Chamber views deterrence and retribution as the main general sentencing factors (for example, Aleksovski Appeal Judgment, par 185; Delali} Appeal Judgment, par 806). With respect to the former factor, it appears to focus on general deterrence only (Kunarac Trial Judgment, par 839).

[667] Article 142(1) provides: "Whoever in violation of rules of international law effective at the time of war, armed conflict or occupation, orders that civilian population be subject to killings, torture; inhuman treatment [...], immense suffering or violation of bodily integrity or health [...]; forcible prostitution or rape; application of measures of intimidation and terror, [...] other illegal arrests and detention [...]; forcible labour [...] or who commits one of the foregoing acts, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than five years or by the death penalty."

[668] Prosecutor v Tadi}, Case IT-94-1-T, Sentencing Judgment, 14 July 1997, par 8.

[669] Both Article 142(1) and Article 141 of the SFRY Criminal Code prescribe imprisonment for not less than five years or the death penalty upon conviction. Capital punishment was abolished by constitutional amendment in some of the republics of the SFRY, other than Bosnia and Herzegovina, in 1977, the new maximum sentence being 20 years imprisonment for the most serious offences Article 38 of the SFRY Criminal Code concerns prison sentences, and reads in part: "(1) The punishment of imprisonment may not be shorter than 15 days nor longer than 15 years. (2) The court may impose a punishment of imprisonment for a term of 20 years for criminal acts eligible for the death penalty. (3) For criminal acts committed with intent for which the punishment of fifteen years imprisonment may be imposed under statute, and which were perpetrated under particularly aggravating circumstances or caused especially grave consequences, a punishment of imprisonment for a term of 20 years may be imposed when so provided by statute. [...]." Official Gazette of the FRY, No 37, 16 July 1993, p 817. Delali} Trial Judgment, par 1206. From Nov 1998 the law in Bosnia and Herzegovina prescribes the death penalty only in exceptional circumstances: Art 34 of the Criminal Code of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which came into force on 28 Nov 1998, provides: "[...] (2) On an exceptional basis, for the more severe forms of criminal offences punished with long term imprisonment which were committed during the state of war or of imminent war danger, the law may exceptionally prescribe capital punishment. (3) In the case defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, the capital punishment may be pronounced and executed only during the state of war or imminent war danger." (Criminal Code of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina published by "Official Gazette of Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina", No 43-98, Nov 20, 1998). That Criminal Code also now provides for the imposition of "long term imprisonment" ranging from 20 to 40 years for the "the gravest forms of criminal offences [...] committed with intention". (Art 38).

[670] Tadi} Appeal Sentencing Judgment, par 69 ("The Appeals Chamber has taken account of the arguments of the parties and the authorities to which they refer, inclusive of previous judgments of the Trial Chambers and the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal. After full consideration, the Appeals Chamber takes the view that there is in law no distinction between the seriousness of a crime against humanity and that of a war crime. The Appeals Chamber finds no basis for such a distinction in the Statute or the Rules of the International Tribunal construed in accordance with customary international law; the authorized penalties are also the same, the level in any particular case being fixed by reference to the circumstances of the case. The position is similar under the

276. The Accused has been found criminally responsible as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to persecute the seven Bosnian Muslim men at the Drina River by killing or attempting to kill them. The Prosecution submits that there are several factors that aggravate the Accused's participation in this crime. It identifies the fact that there were multiple victims involved, who were killed "efficiently" by the side of the Drina River to avoid the problem of having to bury them, the fact that the victims were verbally abused before being killed, and the trauma still suffered by the survivors of the shooting.[671] The Trial Chamber accepts that each of these factors constitutes an aggravation of the crime.

277. The Prosecution also argued that the discriminatory purpose of the crimes and the selection of victims based on their ethnicity constitute an aggravating factor.[672] This can only be so where the crime for which an accused is convicted does not include a discriminatory state of mind as an element. The crime of persecution in Article 5(h) of the Statute already includes such an element. Such a discriminatory state of mind goes to the seriousness of the offence, but it may not additionally aggravate that offence.

278. A discriminatory state of mind may however be regarded as an aggravating factor in relation to offences for which such a state of mind is not an element. No violation of Article 3 charged in this Indictment requires such a state of mind. The Trial Chamber therefore accepts that, in relation to the murder conviction pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute, the Accused's discriminatory state of mind constitutes an aggravating factor. During the Bosnian conflict, ethnicity has variedly been exploited to gain political prominence or to retain power, to justify criminal deeds, or for the purpose of obtaining moral absolution for any act coloured by the ethnic cause. No such absolution is to be expected from this Tribunal. The Trial Chamber considers that crimes based upon ethnic grounds are particularly reprehensible, and the existence of such a state of mind is relevant to the sentence to be imposed either as an ingredient of that crime or as a matter of aggravation where it is not such an ingredient.

[672] Prosecution Final Trial Brief, par 478.

279. The Trial Chamber also considers as aggravation the fact that the pleas by the men for their lives were completely ignored by the Accused, and the cold-blooded nature of the killing and, to perhaps a lesser extent, the fact that one of the victims was well known to the Accused.[673]

Mitigating factors

280. The Accused maintained throughout the trial that he had not participated in the killing of the seven Bosnian Muslim men. However, he submitted that, if the Trial Chamber found him to be criminally responsible for the killing, any sentence to be imposed should be mitigated on the basis that at the time of the Drina River incident he had a diminished mental responsibility.

281. Rule 67(A) (i) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence provides that:

> As early as is reasonably practicable and in any event prior to the commencement of the trial:
>
> F...g the defence shall notify the Prosecutor of its intention to offer:
> (b) any special defence, including that of diminished or lack of mental responsibility; in which case the notification shall specify the names and addresses of witnesses and any other evidence upon which the accused intends to rely to establish the special defence.

In raising this issue, the Accused failed to comply with the provisions of Rule 67(A)(ii) by notifying the Prosecution prior to the commencement of the trial.[674] Rather, this issue evolved throughout the trial. The Trial Chamber considers that, notwithstanding the failure to so comply with Rule 67(A)(ii), the issue is one which should be considered. The Prosecution was given sufficient opportunity to meet this issue, so that no prejudice has been caused.

282. As was established in the Delalić Appeal Judgment, and conceded by the defence at the trial, the issue of diminished mental responsibility is relevant only to the sentence to be imposed. It is not a defence that if established would lead to the acquittal of the Accused.[675] The Accused bears the onus of establishing this defence on the balance of probabilities. In the Delalić Appeal Judgment the Appeals Chamber stated that:[676]

> As a defendant bears the onus of establishing matters in mitigation of sentence, where he relies upon diminished mental responsibility in mitigation, he must establish that condition on the balance of probabilities – that more probably than not such a condition existed at the relevant time.

[675] Delalić Appeal Judgment, par 590.

283. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that an accused suffers from a diminished mental responsibility where there is an impairment to his capacity to appreciate the unlawfulness of or the nature of his conduct or to control his conduct so as to conform to the requirements of the law.[677]

284. The defence case was that, at the time the Drina River incident occurred, the Accused's mental responsibility was significantly diminished by the chronic alcoholism of the Accused and his reaction to the death of his cousin. There was no acceptable evidence to support that case. The Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of Dr Vasiljević that, upon his observations of the Accused at the beginning of June, he formed the view that the Accused was psychotic at that time. Dr Vasiljević claimed that, in May or early June 1992, he was summoned to the Užamnica barracks by Captain Kovačević to attend to the Accused, who (it was alleged) was undergoing a psychological crisis.[678] It was alleged that the Accused was refusing to eat, was behaving in a strange way and was in need of medical assistance. The Accused had been present at the Užamnica barracks for several days and was being held there as a prisoner for differences he had had with his superiors. Dr Vasiljević said that he went to the barracks and, after talking to the Accused, he advised Captain Kovačević that it would be better that the Accused were released. His evidence was that the Accused was released either that evening or the following day, and that the next time he saw him was seven to eight days later.[679] At this time, Dr Vasiljević saw the Accused in the street with a group of men, and he had the impression that he was organising these people to work in cleaning the streets.[680] Dr Vasiljević said that, at the time he saw the Accused, he did not note down the exact diagnosis anywhere, but he said that, if he had entered the diagnosis, it would have been a reactive psychoneurosis, a condition following intoxication and exhaustion. His evidence was that the Accused was visibly agitated, the fingers of his hands were trembling and he was [677] The same principle has been adopted in Article 31(1)(a) of the ICC Statute (which talks about the "destruction" of criminal responsibility), which reflects the general intent of the "partial defence" of diminished responsibility adopted in some common law countries, as discussed in the Appeals Chamber's Judgment in Delalić et al (pars 586-590) The formulation also reflects the concept of diminished responsibility leading to mitigation in sentencing in some civil law countries, identified in the same Judgment: In France: Penal Code (1992), Article 122-1. In Germany: Penal Code, Sections 20-21. In Italy: Penal Code (1930), Articles 88-89. In the Russian Federation: Criminal Code (1996) (translated by W Butler, Criminal Code of the Russian Federation, Simmonds and Hill Publishing, London, 1997), Articles 21-22. In Turkey: Penal Code (International Encyclopaedia of Law, ed Prof Blancpain, Kluwer, vol 3), Articles 46-47. In Japan: Penal Code (1907), Article 39(2). In South Africa: Criminal Procedure Act, 1977, Section 78(7). In the former Yugoslavia: Criminal Code (1976) of the SFRY, Article 12; Croatian Penal Code (1997). The specific extent of the impairment required before mitigation becomes available in some countries in both systems (for example, "substantial") has been ignored for the sake of identifying the relevant general principles, as has the requirement in some common law countries that the impairment result from an abnormality of mind.

disinterested and indifferent and did not feel like talking. The doctor, who is related to the Accused and who has known him since he was born, found this behaviour to be unusual. When asked what treatment he gave the Accused at that time, he said that he was put on a drip of 5 percent glucose solution, a sedative and some vitamins. He could not recall whether he was treated in any other way.[681] He did not refer the Accused to a neuropsychiatrist for further treatment.[682]

285. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Dr Folnegović-Smalc (who was called by the Prosecution) that, if Dr Vasiljević had diagnosed the Accused as suffering from a reactive psychoneurosis, the mandatory course of action for a doctor diagnosing such a condition would be to ensure hospitalisation of the patient. This action is necessary because, by definition, a psychotic patient is one who is not able to take care of themselves or to control his or her actions.[683] Furthermore, she said that it is very unlikely that a patient in such a condition would be released without some follow-up, or that a reasonable doctor would have made such a recommendation.[684] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of Dr Vasiljević that the Accused was suffering from such a disorder at the relevant time.

286. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of forensic psychiatrist Dr Zorka Lopicić (who was called by the Defence) established that the Accused suffered from any diminishment of responsibility at the time of the Drina River incident on 7 June 1992. The Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of Dr Lopicić that, prior to his hospitalisation in July 1992, the Accused had been suffering from a prodromal psychosis for a number of weeks. Dr Lopicić attributed this to a pre-disposition to depressive psychosis, combined with chronic alcohol abuse. In her view, this pre-psychotic stage significantly reduced the responsibility of the Accused for his acts due to his impaired capacity to comprehend the possible consequences of his deeds. She based her conclusion upon what she had been told by the Accused was a hereditary tendency in the female side of his family to depressive psychosis, his reaction to the death of his cousin, and his constant fear.[685] The conclusion drawn by Dr Lopicić is a highly speculative one, and it does not assist the Trial Chamber to reach a reasonable conclusion as the mental state of the Accused at the relevant time. The Trial Chamber accepts the view of Dr Folnegović-Smalc that there were deficiencies in the analysis and conclusions of Dr Lopicić, primarily the failure of Dr Lopicić to identify a specific diagnosis of the Accused or to list the symptoms upon which her conclusion had been based.[686]

287. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence of the other witnesses for the defence establishes that the Accused suffered from any diminished mental responsibility at the time of the Drina River incident on 7 June 1992. Trainee doctor, Dr Slobodan Simić, gave evidence that he was present when the Accused was transferred to the psychiatric ward of the Užice hospital on 7 July 1992 and that he was very agitated at the time.[687] His evidence was that, at the date of the transfer, the Accused had manifestations of an acute psychotic disorder, could not control his behaviour and had to be tied.[688] His view was that it was highly probable that the mental disorder of the Accused was caused by his alcohol abuse, coupled with the high level of stress due to the war and the loss of his cousin.[689] This is inconsistent with the evidence of Dr Folnegović-Smalc, whose evidence the Trial Chamber prefers.

288. Dr Martinović, the head of the psychiatric department of the Užice hospital, gave evidence, based upon his examination of the medical records of the Accused, that the Accused suffered from an acute psychotic episode from the beginning of July 1992.[690] He stated, however, that additional evidence was needed before a conclusion could be reached that the Accused had a diminished capacity at the time of the commission of any crime prior to that time.[691]

289. As stated above,[692] the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Prosecution witness, Dr Folnegović-Smalc, as excluding any finding that the Accused suffered from any form of significant mental diminishment prior to 4 or 5 July 1992.

290. Dr Folnegović-Smalc gave evidence with respect to the concept of criminal accountability as it existed in the former Yugoslavia at the time. A person is accountable if he or she is able to understand the meaning of his/her actions and to control those actions. She identified four degrees of accountability recognised by Yugoslavian law: (1) fully accountable; (2) insignificant diminishment of accountability; (3) significant diminishment of accountability; and (4) incompetent. Her evidence was that "fully accountable" included people with minor psychological conditions such as mild or moderate depression and alcoholism. "Insignificant diminishment" included those people who understood the consequences of their acts but who commit those acts in circumstances which reduce their accountability to a minor degree. In this group she included persons inflicted with alcoholism, inebriation, degrees of mental retardation, dementia, and post-traumatic stress disorders. Persons falling within this category are responsible for their acts, but if one of the above circumstances is present this may be taken into account in mitigation.

291. Dr Folnegović-Smalc made a thorough consideration of whether the Accused was suffering from a number of mental defects which may mitigate his accountability for the crimes charged. Her opinion was based upon her interviews with, and observations of, the Accused over several days and upon the medical records of the Accused. The only defects which she could find from which the Accused had suffered were delirium or alcoholic psychosis. Her opinion was that it was most probable that the Accused suffered from delirium in 1992. Her evidence was that this could have been caused by alcohol deprivation or physical trauma. One of the important characteristics of delirium which she identified is that it appears suddenly. Her evidence was that, if delirium were caused by alcohol deprivation, the period which it would take from the last consumption of alcohol to the onset of delirium would be from several hours to several days, and as a rule less than seven days. If it were caused by physical trauma, it would be expected to commence within several hours to several days, and last up to several days. With respect to the Accused, she concluded that pre-delirium or delirium commenced on the 4 or 5 of July 1992.[693]

[690] As stated in the previous par, the Accused was admitted in the psychiatric ward of the hospital on 7 July 2002.

292. Dr Folnegović-Smalc also said that, at the time of his admission to hospital on the 14 June 1992, the Accused was not suffering from any mental disease or defect which would have affected his accountability for the crimes charged. She drew attention to the hospital records of the Accused's admission, which stated that the Accused was "conscious, oriented, does not have fever, actively mobile". She rejected the proposition that the admitting doctor, Dr Jovicević, could have failed to diagnosis delirum if the Accused had at that time been suffering from such a defect. One of the basic symptoms of delirum is disorientation, and the admitting doctor had clearly recorded that the Accused was orientated. In her view, this excluded the possibility that the Accused was at that time suffering from delirium.[694]

293. Dr Folnegović-Smalc concluded that, according to the accountability standards applied in the former Yugoslavia, the Accused would have been found to be fully accountable or to have an insignificant diminishment of accountability for his actions prior to his transfer to the psychiatric ward on 7 July 1992.[695] She further gave evidence that the Accused's interview with her, in which he described the incident of the Drina River, was "a description given by a man who was not mentally ill at the time".[696]

294. The two survivors of the Drina River incident did not mention any sign which would suggest that the Accused was suffering from any diminished mental responsibility at the time. The Accused never suggested in the course of his evidence that he was intoxicated on that day or that he was suffering from any other mental impairment which could have reduced his mental responsibility. The Accused did not make any suggestion to Dr Folnegović-Smalc during their meetings,[697] nor to the Prosecution when he gave his statement, that he was intoxicated on the relevant day or that he was suffering from any other mental impairment which could have reduced his mental responsibility.

295. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused has established on the balance of probabilities that, at the time of his participation in the Drina River incident, he was suffering from a diminished mental responsibility. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence that, upon the admission of the Accused to the Užice hospital on 14 June 1992, the Accused was conscious and coherent and showed no signs of psychosis or any other mental defect.[698] The Defence did not otherwise establish on the balance of probabilities that, at the time of the incident, the Accused was suffering from diminished mental responsibility. The Trial Chamber is therefore not satisfied that the Accused comes within the definition of the categories of insignificantly or significantly diminished mental responsibility provided by Yugoslav law. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber stresses that, however helpful they may be, the classes of degrees of accountability pursuant to Yugoslav law are not binding upon this Tribunal, but may only serve as guidance. The Trial Chamber prefers the definition of diminished responsibility which it formulated earlier.[699]

296. The Defence also put forward a number of other factors which, he claimed, should mitigate his sentence if convicted:[700] his family situation; his attitude towards the court; his repentance; his "earlier life and other circumstances that the court should Ŧ...ğ regard as mitigatŦingğ in the concrete case".[701] In its Final Brief, the Prosecution pointed out that the Accused had shown no remorse towards the victims, that he did not plead guilty and that he did not surrender voluntarily to the Tribunal.[702]

297. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused showed any remorse for his participation in the deaths of the five men, even though one of the victims was a person well known to him. Nor does the Trial Chamber accept the Accused's evidence that, on the day after the Drina River incident, he went to the police to report the killing. The Trial Chamber has accepted in [697] As pointed out above, Dr Folnegović-Smalc gave evidence that the Accused's interview with her in which he described the incident of the Drina River was "a description given by a man who was not mentally ill at the time" (T 4444).

[698] See above, par 292.

[700] Defence Final Brief, page 122.

[701] It was somewhat unclear what those "other circumstances" and "earlier life" referred to, although the Defence stated during its closing argument that this referred to the accused's "life and conduct prior to the arrest" (Defence Closing Argument, Hearing of 14 Mar 2002, T 4931).

[702] It must be said that, ever since Rule 85 was amended in July 1998 to require an accused person to give evidence in relation to sentence during the trial itself, it is from a practical point of view impossible for him to give evidence of remorse unless he pleads guilty.

mitigation the general spirit of co-operation very properly shown by lead counsel for the Accused, who trod a careful path in assisting the Trial Chamber without in any way compromising his obligations to the Accused, conduct for which the Accused himself should be given credit.

298. The fact that the Accused did not surrender to the Tribunal has not been given any weight either as mitigating or aggravating factor, since the Indictment relating to the Accused remained confidential until the day of his arrest. The Accused did not therefore have any opportunity to surrender if he had wanted to do so. Nor has the Trial Chamber regarded the fact that the Accused did not plead guilty as an aggravating factor, since an accused person has no obligation to do so and he has the right to remain silent should he choose that course.

299. The Prosecution submitted that the fact that the Accused gave a statement to the prosecution did not amount to "substantial co-operation" pursuant to Rule 101(B)(ii), as his statement "was self-serving and does not rise to the level of 'substantial co-operation'".[703] The Trial Chamber does not accept the Prosecution's argument insofar as it suggests that only a self-incriminatory statement could justify granting some mitigation to the accused for making a statement. It is true that the statement given by the Accused did not disclose anything which was not already known, or very little. But the actual content of such a statement is relevant to the amount of mitigation to give to the Accused for making it. The fact that he did give such a statement may in itself in some cases be a sign of co-operation, however modest. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the statement given by the Accused in the present case represented "substantial" co-operation pursuant to Rule 101(B)(ii), but it does not interpret Rule 101(B)(ii) as excluding the fact that a statement was made from the matters which may be taken into account in mitigation unless such co-operation is "substantial". Nevertheless, the co-operation which was given by the Accused was indeed modest, and it has been given very little weight.

300. The personal circumstances of the Accused, in particular the fact that he is married and has two children, have also been taken into account by the Trial Chamber as a mitigating factor in accordance with the decision of the Appeals Chamber in Kunarac.[704] The Defence did not put forward any other factor relevant to the Accused's life and conduct prior to the arrest which would otherwise mitigate his sentence, and no other factor has been established in the evidence on the balance of probabilities.

[704] Kunarac Appeals Judgment, par 362.

301. The Trial Chamber has considered the relative significance of the Accused in the broader context of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia, and it has taken into account the fact that the position of the Accused in the hierarchy was a low one.[705] The Trial Chamber does not accept that the Accused played any particularly significant role in the broader context of this conflict, but it notes that an accused's level in the overall hierarchy in the conflict is not ultimately decisive of the sentence given:[706]

> Establishing a gradation does not entail a low sentence for all those in a low level of the overall command structure. On the contrary, a sentence must always reflect the inherent level of gravity of a crime which "requires consideration of the particular circumstances of the cases, as well as the form and degrees of the participation of the accused in the crime." In certain circumstances, the gravity of the crime may be so great that even following consideration of any mitigating factors, and despite the fact that the accused was not senior in the so-called overall command structure, a very severe penalty is nevertheless justified.

302. This Accused was not a commander, his crimes were geographically very limited, and there is no evidence that his acts encouraged other offenders (other than as found in relation to the Drina River incident) or affected other victims of such crimes within the broader context of the conflict.

303. But his crimes were particularly serious in terms of the protected interests which he violated – the life as well as the physical and mental integrity of the victims, the consequences for the victims (death for five of them and great suffering for the other two), and the reasons for which these crimes were committed (that is, no reason other than sheer ethnic hatred).

304. The Accused has been found responsible for participating in the cold-blooded execution of five Bosnian Muslim civilians and the attempted murder of two others constituting the crimes of persecution (incorporating murder and inhumane acts) and murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war. The fact that he was a low-level offender in terms of the overall conflict in the former Yugoslavia cannot alter the seriousness of the offences for which he has been convicted or the circumstances in which he committed them.[707]

305. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused took part in the commission of those crimes voluntarily. There is no acceptable evidence that he was influenced in any significant way by reason of his relationship with Milan Lukić. There was no suggestion made in relation to sentence that he was acting under duress, nor was there any evidence to that effect. The Accused may have been a weak-willed person, but he was one who was happy to be led. There are, however, degrees of culpability within the concept of intention, and the Trial Chamber has taken into account the fact that the Accused did not appear to take part in the planning of the execution of the five Muslim men, but only became involved at the time when these men were brought to the Vilina Vlas Hotel a short time before they were killed.

306. For the purpose of determining an appropriate sentence, the Trial Chamber has considered sentences given to other accused before this Tribunal.[708] Because of the particular specificity of this case, it has found little assistance in those sentences. A sentence is, however, based primarily upon the circumstances of each case, and it must be individualised to the particular accused.[709]

1. On 26 October 1998, a Judge of the Tribunal reviewed and confirmed a sealed Indictment against the Accused and two co-accused, and issued a warrant of arrest and an order for surrender.[710]

2. The Accused was detained by SFOR and transferred to the Tribunal on 25 January 2000. The sealed Indictment was partially unsealed the same day.[711] On 26 January 2000, the President assigned the case to Trial Chamber II, then composed of Judge Cassese, Judge Mumba and Judge Hunt.[712] The Accused pleaded not guilty to all counts at his initial appearance on 28 January 2000, and he was remanded in custody.[713]

3. The Prosecution submitted an amended Indictment on 6 January 2000.[714] On 1 February 2000, Judge Pocar was assigned to the case, replacing Judge Cassese.[715] Judge Liu was assigned on 3 April 2000, replacing Judge Pocar.[716] The Accused raised his "defence" of alibi on 22 September 2000. On 30 October 2000, the Trial Chamber issued an order, under seal, which authorised the seizure of potential evidence relevant to the defence of alibi raised by the Accused.[717] Subsequently, two orders authorising the forensic examination of documents were issued, as well as orders authorising the medical and psychiatric examination of the Accused.[718]

4. The Prosecution submitted a second amended indictment ("Indictment") on 12 July 2001.[719] The Accused pleaded not guilty in relation to all the counts in the Indictment.[720] On 24 July 2001, the Trial Chamber, pursuant to Rule 82 (B) of the Rules, ordered that the Accused be tried

B. Trial phase

6. The trial commenced on 10 September 2001. The Prosecution case lasted until 9 October 2001;[725] the Defence case started on 23 October 2001 and lasted until 10 January 2002. The Prosecution case in reply started on 10 December 2001 and finished on 15 January 2002. The Trial Chamber sat for 54 days in total. Thirty-six Prosecution witnesses and twenty-eight Defence witnesses gave evidence orally before the Trial Chamber. The Accused gave evidence on 23 October, 25-26 October, 12-13 November, 5 December 2001 and 14-15 February 2002. Upon an application by the Prosecution, six written statements were admitted into evidence pursuant to Rule 92 bis.[726] The Prosecution was given leave to reopen its case on 11 January 2002, and it called one witness.[727] The Defence called witnesses in further response on 14 and 15 February 2002.

Having considered all of the evidence presented to it during the course of this trial, along with the written and oral submissions of the Office of the Prosecutor, hereafter "Prosecution", and the Defence for the accused, the Trial Chamber

HEREBY RENDERS ITS JUDGEMENT.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. The International Tribunal

1. The International Tribunal is governed by its Statute, adopted by the Security Council of the United Nations on 25 May 1993, hereafter "Statute",[1] and by the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal, hereafter "Rules", adopted by the Judges of the International Tribunal on 11 February 1994, as amended.[2] Under the Statute, the International Tribunal has the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991.[3] Articles 2 through 5 of the Statute further confer upon the International Tribunal jurisdiction over grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Article 2); violations of the laws or customs of war (Article 3); genocide (Article 4); and crimes against humanity (Article 5).

B. Procedural Background[4]

2. On 2 November 1995 the Prosecutor of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("the Tribunal") issued an indictment charging Zoran Kupre{ki}, Mirjan Kupre{ki}, Vlatko Kupre{ki}, Vladimir [anti}, Dragan Papi}, Drago Josipovi}, Stipo Alilovi} and Marinko Katava with grave breaches under Article 2(a), (c), (d) and (g) as well as violations of the laws or customs of war under Article 3 of the Tribunal's Statute. The basis of the indictment was the accused's alleged participation in the two conflicts in the village of Ahmi}i in the Lašva River Valley in Bosnia and Herzegovina on 20 October 1992 and 16 April 1993. During those conflicts, a large number of the Muslim citizens of that village were killed and expelled from their homes as part of a campaign of "ethnic cleansing" by the Croatian military.

[3] Art. 1 of the Statute.
[4] When the Trial Chamber speaks of Croatian or Croat forces in this Judgement it means the Bosnian Croatian forces and not those of the Republic of Croatia.

3. The indictment was reviewed and confirmed by Judge Gabrielle Kirk McDonald on 10 November 1995 against all accused. The Judge also issued an order for non-disclosure of the indictment on the same date. The latter order was vacated in part on 8 December 1995 by Judge Lal Chand Vohrah to allow the service of the arrest warrants against the accused and orders for surrender, signed by Judge Vohrah on the same day, on the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The non-disclosure order was further vacated by Judge McDonald on 3 April 1996 to allow the disclosure of the witnesses' names to law enforcement agencies designated by the Prosecution for purposes of the protection of those witnesses. On 26 June 1996 the non-disclosure order was fully vacated by Judge McDonald.

4. Due to difficulties with respect to the service of the indictments on the accused, Judge McDonald on 20 November 1996 issued an order under Rule 61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, inviting the Prosecutor to submit a written report on the measures taken to effect the personal service of the indictment up until 4 December 1996. The time limit was extended by an order of 4 December 1996 until 13 December 1996.

5. The Registrar publicised the indictment on 11 December 1996 under Rule 60 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. On 13 December 1996 the Prosecution submitted its report on the measures taken. Judge McDonald then ordered the Prosecutor on 6 January 1997 to submit the indictment to Trial Chamber II for public examination.

6. The accused Marinko Katava (on 14 May 1997), the accused Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki} and the co-accused Drago Josipovi} (on 15 May 1997) and the accused Dragan Papi} (on 28 May 1997), through their counsel, requested the Tribunal to quash the arrest warrants and declared their preparedness to come to The Hague; they were, however, fearful that they would have to spend a long time in detention before their case came to trial. They thus expressed their willingness to be questioned in Vitez. These applications were denied by an order of Judge McDonald of 16 June 1997.

7. On 3 October 1997, the Prosecutor applied to the Tribunal for an order for the detention of the accused. The order was granted on 3 October 1997 with regard to all accused by Judge Saad Saood Jan. On 4 October 1997, the Prosecutor applied for an order under Rule 59 bis of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence to allow her representatives to take any of the accused into custody and to transport them to the seat of the Tribunal. The application was granted by Judge Jan on the same date. The accused, with the exception of Vlatko Kupre{ki}, surrendered themselves on 6 October 1997.

8. On 8 October 1997 the accused, again with the exception of Vlatko Kupre{ki}, appeared before Trial Chamber I in accordance with Rule 62 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. They pleaded not guilty to the charges against them. Vlatko Kupre{ki} was arrested on 18 December 1997 and had his initial appearance before Trial Chamber II on 16 January 1998; he pleaded not guilty to all charges against him.

9. The Prosecution moved that the indictment against Marinko Katava be withdrawn, and leave to withdraw was granted on 19 December 1997 by a decision of Trial Chamber II of the same date, on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence against the accused to justify proceeding with his prosecution. On 23 December 1997, the Trial Chamber issued an order holding all pre-trial motions in abeyance on the grounds that the Prosecutor wished to amend the indictment. On the same date, the Trial Chamber granted leave to the Prosecution to withdraw the indictment against Stipo Alilovi}, because the accused had since died.

10. On 16 January 1998, a status conference was held before Trial Chamber II. It resulted in the scheduling order of 21 January 1998 regarding the filing of the Prosecution's pre-trial brief and other documents, as well as the Defence's response to them. On 22 January 1998 the Trial Chamber issued an order for the protection of five of the Prosecution witnesses under Rule 75 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

11. On 9 February 1998, the Prosecutor filed a motion for leave to amend the indictment, in which she replaced the previous charges under Article 2 of the Tribunal's Statute with charges under Article 5(a), (h) and (i) of the Statute (murder, persecution and other inhumane acts) and changed the charges under Article 3 of the Statute by referring to Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions (murder and cruel treatment).

12. Objections against the form of the indictment based on lack of specificity and cumulative charging were filed by counsel for the accused Dragan Papi} on 25 March 1998, for Vlatko Kupre{ki} on 29 March 1998, for Vladimir [anti} on 30 March 1998, for Zoran Kupre{ki} on 31 March 1998, for Drago Josipovi} on 2 April 1998 and for Mirjan Kupre{ki} on 16 April 1998. The Prosecutor replied to these motions on 21 April 1998. On 29 March 1998, the accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} moved to be provisionally released, and on 15 April 1998 requested a severance of the case against him. A motion for severance was also filed by counsel for the accused Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki} on 17 April 1998. The Prosecutor replied to these on 28 April 1998. By a decision of 15 May 1998, the Trial Chamber rejected the accused's motions as to defects in the form of the indictment. On the same day, the motions for severance of trials were also rejected and the motion of the accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} dismissed.

13. On 6 April 1998, the Prosecutor filed a motion to delay the disclosure of witness statements and witness identities on the grounds that some of the Prosecution witnesses had complained about being approached by persons on behalf of the accused and asked to provide exonerating witness statements in exchange for money; some witnesses were also fearful of reprisals. On 28 April 1998, the Trial Chamber issued a scheduling order setting 15 May 1998 as a hearing date on which oral argument was heard in closed session on the Prosecutor's motion of 6 April 1998 concerning the disclosure of witness statements and identities. On 21 May 1998, the Prosecution's motion for delaying the disclosure of witness statements and identities was denied, but certain safeguards for the witnesses and a procedure for contact with these witnesses by the Defence were established, including requests for assistance to the International Police Task Force (IPTF), SFOR and Bosnia and Herzegovina of 12 June 1998 in order to ensure compliance with the abovementioned decision.

14. A scheduling order of the Trial Chamber of 20 May 1998 set 17 August 1998 as the date for the commencement of the trial and requested the parties to finalise their pre-trial preparations.

15. On 13 July 1998 the Prosecution filed its pre-trial brief in which it summarised the factual allegations against the accused and their legal evaluation.

16. On 15 July 1998 the accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} moved that the indictment against him be withdrawn on the basis of insufficient evidence. The motion was dismissed by a decision of 11 August 1998, on the grounds that the issues raised by the accused could only be dealt with by a full hearing on the merits.

17. The trial began with the case for the Prosecution on 17 August 1998 before Trial Chamber II composed of Judges Cassese (presiding), May and Mumba. The case for the Prosecution in chief ended on 15 October 1998.

18. On 21 September 1998 the Trial Chamber handed down a guideline decision on communication between parties and witnesses, stating that as a matter of principle, once a witness had made the solemn declaration, none of the parties must approach him or her except with the leave of the Trial Chamber.

19. The President of the Tribunal authorised an on-site visit of the Trial Chamber to Ahmi}i by a decision of 29 September 1998. However, due to security concerns, this visit did not take place.

20. On 7 December 1998, counsel for the accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} filed a motion for withdrawal of the indictment against his client on the basis that the evidence of the Prosecution was insufficient. The Trial Chamber construed this request as a motion for a judgement of acquittal under Rule 98 bis of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, and denied the motion by a decision of 18 December 1998. The accused repeated his motion on 21 December 1998, and this motion was also rejected by a decision of the Trial Chamber of 8 January 1999.

21. On 11 January 1999, the presentation of the Defence case in-chief began, ending on 23 July 1999. The Prosecution presented rebuttal evidence between 27 September and 4 October 1999, and the Defence led rejoinder witnesses on 5 and 6 October 1999.

22. The Trial Chamber issued a decision on the order of the presentation of the evidence on 21 January 1999, setting out the procedure for examination-in-chief, cross- and re-examination of witnesses, which restated the oral ruling of the Trial Chamber in the hearing of 15 January 1999.

23. On 3 February 1999, the Trial Chamber in a decision of the same date addressed the question put forward by the Defence as to whether the defence of tu quoque was available under international humanitarian law, answering the question in the negative, on the grounds that the obligations under humanitarian law were applicable erga omnes. The Trial Chamber restated its position in a decision of 17 February 1999.

24. On 11 February 1999, with the consent of the parties, the Trial Chamber issued a decision to proceed by way of deposition with the hearing of witnesses on 11 and 12 February 1999, as for medical reasons, Judge Cassese was temporarily indisposed. As Judge May was also temporarily indisposed on medical grounds on 24 February 1999, the Trial Chamber on 25 February 1999, at the request of the Prosecution but against the objections of counsel for Dragan Papi}, issued a further decision to proceed by way of deposition with the hearing of witnesses on 24, 25 and 26 February 1999. This latter decision was appealed by counsel for Dragan Papi} and reversed by the Appeals Chamber in its decision of 15 July 1999.[5] However, counsel for Dragan Papi} subsequently waived his right granted under the Appeals Chamber's decision to have the respective witnesses re-heard before the full Trial Chamber.

25. On 6 May 1999, the Trial Chamber granted provisional release to the accused Drago Josipovi} to attend the funeral of his mother who had died on 5 May 1999. The accused left the detention unit on 7 May 1999, accompanied by a staff member of the Tribunal, and returned there on 10 May 1999. Subsequently, the other accused also applied for provisional release: Drago Josipovi}, Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki} by an oral motion during the hearing of 22 July 1999 and Dragan Papi} by a written motion on [5] IT-96-16-AR73.3 - Judge David Hunt appended a separate opinion, joining in the decision of the majority, but dissenting on some of the reasoning.

26 July 1999. All motions were denied by the Trial Chamber in its decision of 30 July 1999 on the grounds that while a majority of the Trial Chamber (Judge May dissenting) would be prepared to take exceptional circumstances into account, it nevertheless insisted that safety concerns be adequately addressed. In this regard, the relevant authorities of Bosnia and Herzegovina had refused to sign undertakings guaranteeing the return of the Kupre{ki} brothers to the detention unit and their arrest should they try to abscond, and thus the Trial Chamber could infer that such undertakings would also not be forthcoming with regard to the other two accused. Counsel for Drago Josipovi} sought leave to appeal this decision by a motion of 4 August 1999 and counsel for the accused Kupre{ki} by a motion of 6 August 1999. The Appeals Chamber, in two decisions of 18 August 1999,[6] denied leave to appeal, no exceptional circumstances having been shown, but stated that the Trial Chamber had erred in inferring from the refusal of Bosnia and Herzegovina to give undertakings for the accused Kupre{ki} that no such undertakings would therefore have been given for the appellant Josipovi} either.

26. The accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} applied anew for a judgement of acquittal under Rule 98 bis of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence on 23 July 1999; the request was denied by a decision of the Trial Chamber of 28 July 1999, which stated that Rule 98 bis only applied to a submission of no case to answer following the close of the case for the Prosecution, but was inapplicable once the evidence for the Defence had been put before the Court.

27. By decisions of 6 August 1999, the Registrar withdrew the assignment of defence counsel for all accused, on the basis that she had received information from the media that there had been an auction of paintings by Croat detainees organised by a Croatian support group, and that the revenues from this auction amounted to DM 4.300.000. From this the Registrar concluded that the accused were now able to pay for their own counsel. The accused objected to the withdrawal on the grounds that they had not received any significant financial support from that Croatian organisation apart from pocket money for the detention unit and support for their families. The Trial Chamber reversed the decisions of the Registrar by a decision of 3 September 1999; in the opinion of the Trial Chamber the burden of proof for the fact that the accused were no longer indigent was on the Registrar, and media reports alone could not be regarded as sufficient evidence for a court of law.

28. The accused Mirjan Kupre{ki} and Zoran Kupre{ki} filed another motion for provisional release on 3 September 1999, to which the application of Drago Josipovi} was joined on the same date. Their motions were denied by the Trial Chamber in its decision of 13 September 1999 for lack of exceptional circumstances under Rule 65 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. For the same reasons, the Trial Chamber denied the requests for provisional release of Dragan Papi} of 10 September 1999 and Vladimir [anti} of 9 September in its decisions of 14 September 1999.

29. The Trial Chamber, over 111 days, heard a total of 56 witnesses for the prosecution during their case in chief and another 4 during rebuttal, 96 witnesses for the Defence and one court witness. The accused Mirjan Kupre{ki}, Zoran Kupre{ki} and Vlatko Kupre{ki} also gave sworn testimony as witnesses in their own case between 14 and 23 July 1999. The three other accused chose not to testify on their own behalf.

30. The final trial briefs of the Prosecution and of all Defence counsel were submitted on 5 November 1999. Closing arguments were heard between 8 and 10 November 1999.

II. THE CHARGES AGAINST THE ACCUSED

31. The Prosecutor alleged the following facts and charged the following counts:

32. The accused helped prepare the April 1993 attack on the Ahmi}i-Šanti}i civilians by: participating in military training and arming themselves; evacuating Bosnian Croat civilians the night before the attack; organising HVO soldiers, weapons and ammunition in and around the village of Ahmi}i-Šanti}i; preparing their homes and the homes of their relatives as staging areas and firing locations for the attack, and by concealing from the other residents the fact that the attack was imminent.

33. Under COUNT 1 all six accused are charged with a CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 5(h) (persecution) of the Statute of the Tribunal, on the grounds that from October 1992 until April 1993 they persecuted the Bosnian Muslim inhabitants of Ahmi}i-Šanti}i and its environs on political, racial or religious grounds by planning, organising and implementing an attack which was designed to remove all Bosnian Muslims from the village and surrounding areas. As part of this persecution, the accused participated in or aided and abetted the deliberate and systematic killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians, the comprehensive destruction of their homes and property, and their organised detention and expulsion from Ahmi}i-Šanti}i and its environs.

34. Under COUNTS 2-9 the accused Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki} are charged with murder as a CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 5(a) (murder) of the Statute of the Tribunal, and a VIOLATION OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable by Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Article 3(1)(a) (murder) of the Geneva Conventions. When the attack on Ahmi}i-Šanti}i commenced in the early morning of 16 April 1993, Witness KL was living with his son, Naser, Naser's wife, Zehrudina, and their two children, Elvis (aged 4) and Sejad (aged 3 months). Armed with an automatic weapon, Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} entered Witness KL's house. Zoran Kupre{ki} shot and killed Naser. He then shot and wounded Zehrudina. Mirjan Kupre{ki} poured flammable liquid onto the furniture to set the house on fire. The accused then shot the two children, Elvis and Sejad. When Witness KL fled the burning house, Zehrudina, who was wounded, was still alive, but ultimately perished in the fire. Naser, Zehrudina, Elvis and Sejad all died and Witness KL received burns to his head, face and hands.

35. Under COUNTS 10 and 11 Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} are charged with a CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable by Article 5(i) (inhumane acts) of the Statute of the Tribunal and a VIOLATION OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable under Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Article 3(1)(a) (cruel treatment) of the Geneva Conventions, on the grounds of killing Witness KL's family before his eyes and causing him severe burns by burning down his home while he was still in it.

36. Under COUNTS 12-15 the accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} is charged with murder and inhumane and cruel treatment as CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 5(a) (murder), and Article 5(i) (inhumane acts) of the Statute of the Tribunal, as well as VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable by Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Article 3(1)(a) (murder and cruel treatment) of the Geneva Conventions. Before the 16 April 1993 attack, HVO soldiers armed with automatic rifles congregated at the residence of the accused in Ahmi}i. When the attack commenced, several HVO units used his residence as a staging area. Other HVO soldiers shot at Bosnian Muslim civilians from the accused's house throughout the attack. Members of the Pezer family, who were Bosnian Muslims, decided to escape through the forest. As they ran by the accused's house toward the forest, the accused and other HVO soldiers in front of his house, aiding and abetting each other, shot at the group, wounding D'enana Pezer, the daughter of Ismail and Fata Pezer, and another woman. D'enana Pezer fell to the ground and Fata Pezer returned to assist her daughter. The accused and the HVO soldiers shot Fata Pezer and killed her.

37. Under COUNTS 16-19, Drago Josipovi} and Vladimir [anti} are charged with CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 5(a) (murder) and 5(i) (inhumane acts) of the Statute of the Tribunal, as well as with VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, punishable by Article 3 of the Statute of the Tribunal and recognised by Article 3(1)(a) (murder and cruel treatment) of the Geneva Conventions. On 16 April 1993, numerous HVO soldiers, including the accused, attacked the home of Musafer and Suhreta Pušćul, while the family, which included two young daughters, was sleeping. During the attack, the accused and other HVO soldiers, aiding and abetting one another, forcibly removed the family from their home and then killed Musafer Pušćul whilst holding members of his family nearby. As part of the attack, the HVO soldiers, including the accused, vandalised the home and then burned it to the ground.

III. GENERAL BACKGROUND

A. The Origins of the Muslim-Croat Conflict (October 1992 - March 1994)

1. The Case for the Prosecution

38. The events which are the subject of this judgement concern the Muslim-Croat conflict of 1992-1993 which took place in central Bosnia during the war of dissolution of the former Yugoslavia. Muslims, or Bosniacs, and Croats initially fought side-by-side to resist the Serb/JNA attack in eastern and western Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992.[7] In central Bosnia, they maintained a front line against the Serbs in Turbe, near Travnik. As the conflict with the Serbs wore on, however, "ethnic cleansing" by Serb forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina drove Croat and Bosniac refugees into the interior of Bosnia, creating overcrowding and tension between the two nationalities and leading to a conflict between these former allies. The Muslim-Croat conflict ended only with the signing of the Washington Agreement on 2 March 1994, which created the Muslim-Croat Federation, an entity which exists to this day in the form of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, one of the two entities of Bosnia and Herzegovina under the Dayton Peace Agreement.

(a) General

39. The Prosecution contends that the attack on Ahmi}i of 16 April 1993, which is the principal subject of this judgement, took place as part of a campaign of "ethnic cleansing" waged by the Bosnian Croats during the Muslim-Croat conflict in order to create ethnically homogenous regions which could be united in an independent Bosnian Croat state. This autonomous region, under the control of the Bosnian Croat authorities and independent from the central control of the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina in Sarajevo, could eventually be annexed to the Republic of Croatia as part of a "Greater Croatia" in the mirror image of the "Greater Serbia" plan.

40. Croatia and Serbia's designs on the territory of Bosnia appear to be long-standing.[8] When, in April 1992,[9] the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina gained its independence, it appears that Serbia and subsequently Croatia put these designs into effect, with the use of their respective Bosnian Serb and Bosnian Croat agents.

41. The Prosecution has argued in this case that the Bosnian Croats pursued a separatist agenda through their political and military authorities.[10] As regards the evidence adduced in this case of Bosnian Croat aspirations to statehood, a Prosecution witness, Witness Q, referred to a conversation with one of the accused, Vlatko Kupre{ki}, after an October 1992 attack on the Muslims in Ahmi}i, in which the accused stated that the Croats would now get their own State.[11] Similar evidence indicates that Bosnian Croats sought autonomy from the central government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, based in Sarajevo.[12] Another witness, Vlado Alilovi}, said that while the so-called Croatian community of Herceg-Bosna was not conceived of as a State, it was thought of as a Croat community.[13]

(b) The Vance-Owen Plan

42. The Prosecution has suggested that one cause of the Muslim-Croat war was the Vance-Owen Agreement, which was formulated by the negotiators Cyrus Vance and David Owen in an attempt to solve the Yugoslav crisis. The Vance-Owen plan, which envisaged the partition of Bosnia into ethnically-based cantons, is said to have provided Bosnian Croats with the motive to "ethnically cleanse" Muslim minorities from what would be, under the Vance-Owen plan, Croat-dominated cantons. The Vance-Owen plan, it is claimed, was regarded by the Croats as lending the stamp of legitimacy to "ethnic cleansing" for territorial gain.

[10] For example, see the Prosecution's cross-examination of Zvonimir Cili}, T. 5317-5319, in which the Prosecution referred to the separatist thesis put forward by a Croat writer, Anto Valenta, notably in his book "The Partition of Bosnia and its Political Future", published in 1991. The witness denied, however, that Valenta's ideas were representative of those of the Croatian people as a whole: "In other words, it reflected his own positions, and this was not the position of any institution or organisation of Croatian people". Zvonimir Cilić, ibid., p. 5319.

43. Ahmi}i, the village in which the events that form the subject of this judgement took place, was situated in the Croat-dominated Canton 10. Certain witnesses have seen in this a motive for Bosnian Croat forces to attack it and to expel or kill its Muslim inhabitants.[14] As the witness Lt. Col. Watters explained, there was not only the motive but also the opportunity to do so on 16 April 1993.[15]

44. The attack on Ahmi}i, the Prosecution argues, represented one part of a coordinated plan of the Bosnian Croat authorities to "ethnically cleanse" Bosnian Muslims from the La{va River Valley,[16] and to secure a Croat-controlled route through Kiseljak.[17]

45. In April 1993, an ultimatum was addressed by the Croatian authorities of Bosnia to the authorities in Sarajevo to implement the Vance-Owen Plan immediately and to withdraw the Muslim troops from the provinces attributed to the Croats under the Geneva plan. Exhibit P333 is the report by Reuters of this ultimatum of 15 April 1993:

> "If Izetbegovi} does not sign this agreement by the 15th of April, the HVO will unilaterally enforce its jurisdiction in cantons three, eight and ten".[18]

The HVO expelled all the Muslims and burned their houses.

46. Exhibit P339 is a Joint Statement by the Representatives of the Croats and Muslims in the Vitez Municipality. Paragraph 4 states that "Fbğoth sides agree that in Vitez and Province 10, the Vance-Owen plan should be implemented even before it is signed by the Serbian side".

(c) Croat Nationalism, Militancy and Propaganda

47. The Prosecution has also sought to demonstrate that the attacks by Croats in Ahmi}i and in the La{va River Valley were committed in the context of an ideology of Croatian hegemony and that Bosnian Croats grew more militant and nationalistic from the spring of 1992 onwards. Young Croats allegedly began to appear in camouflage uniforms with the insignia of the HVO and its units,[19] sometimes with that of the "Usta{a", a Croatian fascist army unit during the Second World War. Croatian flags were said to have come to be prominently displayed by Croats in Ahmi}i.

48. The Prosecution explained the rise in discriminatory attitudes on the part of Bosnian Croats towards the Bosnian Muslims as, in part, the product of a campaign of virulent anti-Bosniac propaganda by the Bosnian Croat TV stations and authorities.[20] Witness S testified to the pro-Croatian and anti-Bosniac propaganda spread by Vitez TV under the patronage of the HVO, and the increasing emphasis on the division between Bosniacs and Croats.[21] Witness DD testified that once the Bosnian Croat political party was founded, the Bosniacs began to notice subtle changes, e.g. the fact that even small Croatian children had camouflage uniforms, made for them by their mothers.[22] Witness S, who had spent all his life in Ahmi}i until 16 April 1993, described the rise of Croat chauvinism in his area:

> "When they started calling us balijas ... as soon as we started having different names in comparison to our previous names, we knew what was in store".[23]

This attitude in turn provoked Bosnian Muslim propaganda, as is described by Witness S.[24]

2. The Case for the Defence

49. The Defence - with the exception of Vlatko Kupre{ki} - has presented an account of the Muslim-Croat conflict and its causes which is quite different from that presented by the Prosecutor. The Defence deny that the Bosnian Croats had any plan to create their own State and that they attacked or persecuted their Muslim neighbours to achieve this end. Witness Vlado Alilovi} said that Croats and Muslims voted overwhelmingly (99%) in favour of the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina in the referendum of February 1992, while the Serbs voted against.[25] Moreover, the Defence argue that it was the Muslims who, following the initial Serbian and JNA aggression, attacked the Croats in order to seize territory and to create a Muslim state:

> "They wanted to take Vitez and the surrounding villages, that is to say this central part of the state as we would call it, this strategic part of the territory. Because they needed this territory so that they could link up. If you look at the map, before and after that, these Muslim villages were all around, Muslim towns and villages and it was only Central Bosnia that was missing. That was the only thing they needed, Vitez, Busovača, part of Novi Travnik. [...T]here wasn't much tension or hostility at the very outset. After all, we had lived together for many years. For example, the place where I lived, it was quite natural that we would go and visit each other. However, these tensions mounted after various minor incidents, after Slimena fell, when people got all these weapons. After the refugees came from Krajina and Jajce, the Muslims remained in our territory, whereas Croats mainly left and went to Herzegovina and further on. They probably felt that they were stronger > than we were, and that they had outnumbered us, and it is only logical that they thought that they could take this territory for themselves".[26]

50. Other witnesses have found the origins of the conflict in the allegedly different attitude taken by the Croats to the conflict with the Serbs from that taken by the Bosniacs, as was explained by witness Vlado Alilovi}:

> "A deterioration of relations between the Croats and the Muslims occurred [...] when quite opposing views were taken regarding the aggression on Croatia. The Croatian side thought that after the aggression against Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina would become the target of aggression. The official authorities of Bosnia-Herzegovina, or at least the high-level leaders, upheld the view that that was not Bosnia's war and that they were not interested in it but, rather, that this was a war exclusively between Serbs and Croats".[27]

3. Findings of the Trial Chamber

51. The Trial Chamber is only able to make very limited findings on these background aspects, as the trial did not focus on whether or not there was a "Greater Croatia" project or whether or not the conflict between the Croats and Muslims could be characterised as an international armed conflict.

52. Given the paucity of evidence adduced by the Prosecutor in this trial, the Trial Chamber is unable to find that there existed a "Greater Croatia" project or that Bosnian Croats nurtured aspirations to statehood at the relevant time.

53. As regards the nature of the armed conflict, it is not necessary for the purposes of this trial to determine whether the armed conflict was international or internal, since the indictment contains no counts relating to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions, which would require proof of an international armed conflict.

54. By contrast, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that Croat nationalism and discrimination against Muslims was on the increase in central Bosnia in 1992-1993, due to a variety of factors, and that this may have contributed to the commission of the crimes forming the subject of this indictment. Whether there was equally a species of Muslim nationalism being preached does not affect this finding.

B. The Stages in the Muslim-Croat Conflict

1. The Fall of Jajce to the Serbs and the Influx of Muslim and Croat Refugees

55. In late autumn 1992, Jajce, a Muslim-Croat town fell to the Serbs. "Ethnic cleansing" of Croats and Muslims by Serb forces followed and led to a surge of refugees into central Bosnia.[28] The fall of Jajce, moreover, gave Serb forces access to the road to La{va and Central Bosnia, where there were important military installations and factories which the Serbs were anxious to seize.

(a) The Case for the Prosecution

56. The Prosecution has cast doubt on the causal nexus that the Defence has sought to establish between the influx of Muslim refugees and the genesis of fear and mistrust between the Croats and the Muslims, which would be the precursor to the attacks of October 1992 and April 1993.

(b) The Case for the Defence

57. The Defence has maintained that the displacement of several thousand Muslims and Croats, who entered Vitez and its environs, added to the already substantial influx of refugees who had fled the Serb aggression in eastern and western Bosnia and exacerbated pre-existing tensions between the two nationalities.[29]

---

[28] Vlado Alilovi} testified T. 5539 that, when Jajce fell, "most of the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina was cleansed of Croats and Muslims by the JNA, that is, by the Serbs".

(c) Findings of the Trial Chamber

58. The fall of Jajce to the Serbs undoubtedly did contribute to mutual fears and suspicions among the Muslims and Croats in the Vitez area. For the purposes of the present judgement, however, it is not necessary to dwell on these matters extensively.

2. Attacks on Bosnian Croats in the La{va River Valley

(a) The Case for the Prosecution

59. The evidence adduced here was only led by the Defence; it appears that the Prosecution does not contest this evidence as to the facts.

(b) The Case for the Defence

60. The Defence contends that the Muslim-Croat war, and in particular events in the La{va River Valley, can only be truly understood in the light of certain, specific attacks perpetrated by Muslim forces against Bosnian Croats in early 1993,[30] chief among which was an attack on the village of Dusina, as one of the defence counsel explained.[31]

(i) Dusina

61. On 25 January 1993, Muslim forces massacred some fourteen captured Croat soldiers and several civilians in Dusina. Željka Raji},[32] whose husband was among those killed, testified concerning the attack. A videotape showing the victims' bodies was also admitted into evidence.[33]

62. On 25 January 1993, the village of La{va was attacked by the Muslims. Women, children and elderly persons left La{va because they were warned of the attack, but men, including the witness's husband, stayed. The women and elderly, including the witness, went to Dusina, where at 5 a.m., on 26 January 1993, the village was attacked by rocket-propelled grenades. There were many Muslims, in two groups. First, there was one group of 50 or so who spoke Serbo-Croatian, and then a group who seemed to be Mujahedin. All were in uniform and had the insignia of the BiH army. They took their captives to the Muslim part of the village, using them on the way as "human shields".[34] The group of captives which included the witness were mistreated by the Muslims. Elderly Croats were taken out in groups and beaten. Then five men were executed.[35] According to the witness, a BiH soldier called out Augustine Rados Raji} and executed him, and then boasted of having killed the witness's husband.[36] The witness's husband had indeed been murdered while trying to negotiate the release of the captives.[37] Others were killed in this same way. One at least was savagely tortured before being killed.[38] Subsequently, Croat houses in the village were torched. Today – it is alleged - not a single Croat lives in La{va or Dusina. In La{va where the Croats lived, Muslims moved into their houses. Many other Croat witnesses for the defence testified that the events in Dusina traumatised the Croat community.[39]

(ii) Busovača

63. According to defence witnesses, there was also fighting between Muslims and Croats in Busovača in 1992-1993. Zvonimir Cili} testified that all the Croats from that municipality were expelled at the end of a conflict between the BiH army and Croats.[40] This was confirmed by Ljuban Grubesi}.[41]

(iii) Kidnapping of Zivko Toti} and the Killing of his Bodyguards

64. In addition to the events in Dusina, La{va and Busovača which occurred around January 1993, the kidnapping of Zivko Toti} and the killing of his escort on 15 April 1993 is said to have had a seriously destabilising effect on Muslim-Croat relations. Zivko Toti} was the head of the HVO Military Police in Zenica.[42] Four or five of Toti}'s bodyguards were killed during his kidnapping, allegedly by Muslim forces.[43] Zivko Toti} himself was not killed, however, and was eventually released.[44]

(iv) Attacks on Croats in Stari Vitez (Mahala)

65. The Defence have also pointed to the alleged militancy of the Muslims living in the Muslim quarter of Vitez (Stari Vitez) and Muslim attacks on Croats in Vitez. Zvonimir Cili} testified that the Muslims in Stari Vitez were literally digging in for a confrontation with the Croats.[45] He claimed that Vitez was shelled from Muslim positions on 16 April 1993.[46] He also produced several "Operations Reports" (Exhibits D40/2 and D41/2) during his testimony, which described a situation of complete panic in Vitez on 16 April 1993. A further Operations Report of 17 April 1993 (Exhibit D42/2) reported that Muslim forces were regrouping and fighting, in [anti}i among other places.

(v) Attacks on Croats in Zenica

66. Finally, the Defence have pointed to Zenica as a bastion of Muslim nationalism where Croats were mistreated, in order to demonstrate that Muslims were not, or not uniquely, the victims of dicrimination and persecution. Witness HH, an investigator for Tadeusz Mazowiecki, the Special Rapporteur on the Human Rights situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, testified that there were reports of harassment and arbitrary executions of Croats in Zenica.[47] Jadranka Toli},[48] a nurse in Zenica general hospital and a Croat, testified about persecution of Croats in Zenica, where they were in a minority. Croats therefore began to leave Zenica.[49] Zvonimir Cili} also testified to the persecution of Croats in Zenica in 1992-1993.[50]

[46] An exhibit was produced to the witness (D39/2), which was allegedly a list of HVO soldiers killed and wounded (23 killed and 63 wounded) in Vitez. It emerged during cross-examination that not all the soldiers mentioned in the document were, however, from the Vitez brigade.

(vi) Croat Propaganda and Preparation for an Attack by Bosnian Muslim Forces

67. The Defence has produced evidence that the Croat forces feared an attack by Muslims in 1993.[51]

(c) Findings of the Trial Chamber

68. The Trial Chamber finds that there were undoubtedly attacks by Muslim forces on Croat villagers in early 1992, which contributed to a background of mutual fear. The Trial Chamber, however, does not find that compelling evidence has been produced to show that the BiH army or the Muslims in general were planning to launch an attack on the Croats on 15-16 April 1993.

69. The evidence of defence witness Zvonimir Cili}, who was a good friend of Mario Čerkez and who joined the latter on the municipal staff as a political officer to provide information for the troops and the members of the municipal staff of the HVO, is instructive in this regard. His testimony reveals a tendency on the Croat side to spread alarm among the Croat population. Exhibit D34/2, a videotape of a news programme reporting the kidnapping of Zivko Toti}, is also instructive. The broadcaster recites all the alleged crimes committed by the Muslims against the Croats in an apparent attempt to incite hatred against the Muslims and BiH army. This vitiates Zvonimir Cili}'s assertion that the Croat leadership was trying to achieve conciliation among ethnic groups.

70. Moreover, the "Operations Report" dated 16 April 1993, produced by Zvonimir Cili}, appears to be one-sided in that it only mentions attacks on "Croatian houses in Krčevine and Nadioci", and nothing about the assault on Ahmi}i and massacres of Muslim civilians. The Report complains of Muslim forces attacking from Preočica and states, inter alia, that "attacks by Muslim forces are becoming more ferocious and bestial". The Trial Chamber finds that this evidence is not conclusive in as much as it could prove either that the Muslims were preparing for an attack or that the Croat forces were creating misinformation and propaganda to prepare their own population for an attack on the Muslims. The correct interpretation depends on the true situation: whether the Muslims were indeed preparing for an attack or not.

C. Muslim-Croat Relations in Central Bosnia

1. The Case for the Prosecution

(a) Good Muslim-Croat Relations before October 1992

71. All the evidence shows that before the Muslim-Croat conflict in 1992-1993, Muslims and Croats got on very well together in Ahmi}i and its environs. Muslims and Croats would visit each other, go to each other's weddings and help each other out as good neighbours. Witness KL testified to this effect of his Croat neighbours Zoran Kupre{ki}, Mirjan Kupre{ki} and Vlatko Kupre{ki}.[52] Prosecution witnesses Mehmed Ahmi},[53] Fahrudin Ahmi},[54] D,[55] L,[56] N,[57] S,[58] V,[59] W[60] and FF[61] testified in a like manner.

72. An expert witness who testified at the request of the Trial Chamber, the Norwegian anthropologist Dr. Tone Bringa, pointed out that before 1992, relations between Croats and Muslims were good. Except for religious practices, where they of course followed different habits and rituals, they did share aspects of their daily lives. They co-operated in the running of their villages, they visited one another at life-cycle events (weddings, funerals, etc) and they took an interest in each other's lives. Normally neighbours got along well, irrespective of whether they were Croats or Muslims. There were of course misunderstandings or quarrels, but they did not have to do with the ethnic community to which the neighbours belonged.[62]

73. According to the same expert witness, there was nevertheless potential for conflict. The Muslims and the Croats did not intermarry. There was therefore potential for having two opposite groups, each based on kinship ties, which coincided with ethnic ties or ethnic identification. As the witness put it:

> "...so in a conflict, which could be anything from a quarrel about sheep that run into your property, these kinds of conflicts, relatives would often have strong loyalties to each other and they would stand up for each other. So you would have conflicts where people who were related sided with each other against the person that they were then in conflict in (sic)".[63]

(b) Deterioration in Relations after October 1992 and the Separation of the Village Guards

74. According to Prosecution witnesses, it was chiefly the Croats who were to blame for the split between the Muslims and Croats in 1992. Fahrudin Ahmi} said it was the Croats who started to arm themselves and appeared menacing. Witness F said that Croats told him that Ahmi}i would be "another Vukovar", i.e. that it would be destroyed and its inhabitants killed.[64]

75. Dr. Bringa, the expert witness called by the Trial Chamber, testified as to her experiences and conclusions from the times she had spent with a Muslim family in a village in central Bosnia. Dr. Bringa visited the former Yugoslavia several times between 1987 and 1997 for a total of 15 months. She noticed the gradual shifting of allegiance from the neighbourly relations between Muslims and Croats to a more ethnicity-oriented affiliation and self-identification of sections of the Bosnian population.[65]

76. When asked for an explanation of whether and in what manner she had noticed the beginnings of ethnic divisions, the witness stated that originally it was not so much ethnic hatred as a growing fear of the events which were threatening the villagers from outside their close-knit community.[66] As Yugoslavia disintegrated, nationalist ideologies gradually brought about a change in the attitude of each group. Nationalist propaganda fuelled a change in the perception and self-identification of members of the various ethnic groups. Gradually the "other" persons, i.e. members of other ethnic groups, who were originally perceived merely as "diverse", came to be perceived as "alien" and then as "enemy". More specifically, they were perceived as potential enemies who were threatening to the identity or future prosperity of one's group.[67] The witness also felt that oppressive tactics such as checkpoints and interrogations were being used predominantly by the Croats and less by the Muslims.[68]

77. Other prosecution witnesses testified that the Bosnian Croat authorities set up checkpoints, for example at Dubravica, where they arrested Bosniacs, and otherwise tried to provoke them, that they would seize humanitarian aid bound for Tuzla, and do all they could to undermine the Bosniacs. The authorities would not investigate murders of Bosniacs, thus creating a culture of impunity and lawlessness.[69] Linked to this deterioration in relations was the separation of the joint village guards into Muslim and Croat guards in the spring of 1992.

2. The Case for the Defence[70]

78. Witnesses for the Defence agreed with prosecution witnesses that Muslims and Croats in Ahmi}i had excellent neighbourly relationships prior to the events which are the subject of the indictment.[71]

79. Where prosecution and defence witnesses differ is on the question of who bore the responsibility for the split between the two nationalities. The majority of defence witnesses (who were mostly Croats) maintained that it was the Muslims who wished to separate themselves from the Croats.[72]

[69] Witness B, T. 737-741; Witness AA, T. 3735-3738 saw Miroslav Bralo when they were both in prison; Bralo being in prison for the Salkić slaying in Nadioci. He related how Bralo was permitted a considerable degree of freedom and was allowed to assault some Arabs who were there in the prison. Shortly after his release, the witness was sent back to Kaonik prison on somewhat trumped-up charges. This second time he was again in prison with Miroslav Bralo, who was still there. The witness and Bralo were sent on trench digging details but they did not really dig the trenches – the Muslims did this - with the witness and Bralo sitting by, drinking and joking. The witness provoked the Muslims by saying things to them. Bralo beat them with his hands and spade. Bralo couldn't understand why he was in prison "only because of one Balija". Bralo was in prison for some two months, but he was allowed to visit his wife, drink, etc. The cell was never locked.

3. Findings of the Trial Chamber

80. The Trial Chamber finds that there was a split between Croats and Muslims in 1992, no doubt for a combination of the reasons adduced by prosecution and defence witnesses, the precise cause of which it is not necessary to determine for the purposes of this Judgement.

D. Persecution – Alleged Facts

1. The Case for the Prosecution

(a) General

81. The Prosecution maintains that the attacks on Ahmi}i in October 1992 and April 1993 were part of a systematic attack on the civilian population of the La{va River Valley intended to "cleanse" the area of Muslims.

82. Witness AA, a Muslim member of the "Jokers" i.e. of the Croatian Military Police, provided key evidence for this contention:

> Q. And what was the purpose of the Busovača campaign by the HVO as you understand it?
> A. My conclusion was that it should be cleansed, and at that time I believed it too. Later on, my colleagues with whom I was, and we said that the air should be rid of Balijas, you know, that it should be ethnically cleansed, and we talked about it, and that we would go to Vitez the next time.
> Q. Vitez would be the next target, is that what you're saying? That was the understanding?
> A. Yes. Yes, this is what we talked about, we in the Military Police.
> Q. When you talked about Vitez being the next place to be ethnically cleansed, did that include Ahmići as well? Was that also understood?
> A. Yes, of course.
> Q. Why do you say "of course"?
> A. Because Ahmići was practically on the road between Busovača and Vitez, and there were Muslims there too, the majority was Muslim, it had to be cleansed or removed. They simply had to be removed from there. Something had to be done, because they were a hindrance.

Q. Was the BiH army in Ahmići?
A. I never saw a single member of the BiH army in Ahmići, never. I say that because I passed there many times. So never. But I do know that most of them went to fight against the Serbs in Vlaši}, Visoko, somewhere else, but not -- they were not stationed in Ahmići.
Q. When BiH soldiers came home on leave, what would they do with their weapons, as far as you knew?
A. Most of them would leave them at the front, leave the weapons at the front. I know that, because I talked to some of the members that I knew, and they always complained that they didn't have enough weapons. And they even went in civilian clothes.
Q Now, you say that you knew that the BiH army was not in Ahmići. Did you think that was common knowledge in your group, in the Military Police, that there was no threat from the BiH army in Ahmići?
A. Yes. Yes. Had there been a Bosnian army in Ahmići, we would have known of it, or we would have at least seen someone in uniform or some other side, a member of the other side, but I never saw them, and everybod knew that. It was common knowledge.
Q. Which army was all around Ahmići at this time?
A. The HVO, on all sides more or less...[73]

(b) Discriminatory Acts from October 1992 until April 1993

83. The Trial Chamber has reviewed Prosecution evidence, which tends to show various factual elements that may be taken to constitute persecution of Muslims. In addition to these elements, the following material should be taken into account.

84. After the October 1992 attack, the HVO allowed Bosniacs to return to Ahmi}i, but the situation was evidently very tense. It would seem that the local Croats provoked and discriminated against the Muslim population. The Croats were in control of Ahmi}i after the October 1992 attack,[74] and "everything became Croatian". As Witness G testified: "... when we were allowed to go back home, everything was according to the Croats. For instance, at school I had to study the Croatian language, history was called Polviest, the Croatian term for it, instead of the subject musical culture, it was given an another name. The money that was used was the Dinar, the Croatian money, instead of the previous currency".[75] The HVO demanded the total surrender of Muslim forces and the right to re-locate, to disarm and to impose a curfew on them.[76] The Jokers, a special HVO unit referred to above, was notable for its persecution of the local civilian Muslim population.[77]

[74] Abdulah Ahmi}, T. 270.

85. According to the Prosecution, Bosnian Croat persecution of the Bosnian Muslim population was designed to dehumanise the latter so that it would be easier to commit acts of violence against them. Croats started to call Muslims by the derogatory term "balijas", expel them from their homes, threaten them and otherwise harass them on the sole basis of their ethnicity.[78]

86. In the view of the Prosecution the following examples of persecution of Muslims during this time are illustrative.

87. Fahrudin Ahmi} testified that he was told by Dragan Papi} and Vinko Vidović, when he tried to return to his home following the attack of October 1992, that he needed permission to do so. The following day, Papi} and Vidovi} threatened Fahrudin Ahmi}. Dragan Papi} approached Ahmi} holding the fuse of a bomb, and addressed him with the words "Why don't you monkeys surrender?" in reference to the Muslims. As a result of this intimidation, Fahrudin Ahmi} left his home the next day, fearing that it might be bombed if he stayed.[79]

88. Other instances of provocation were recounted by Witness A, who recalled a conversation which he had at the house of Ivo and Dragan Papi}, in which the Papi}s

She testified that Nenad Šantić took weapons from others too. Witness CA, T. 4577–4579, testified that her son was told to hand his weapon – one of the burnt weapons from Slemenj - to Nenad Šantić, and to tell others to hand in their weapons in Pirići.

blamed the Muslims for the war-time problems.[80] Abdulah Ahmi} referred to a conversation with Dragan Papi} in which the latter expressed admiration for Adolf Hitler and said that Hitler's methods should be applied to Bosnia.[81] Witness G told of the appearance of Croatian flags flying above Ivo and Dragan Papi}'s house, as if to suggest that Ahmi}i was now part of the territory of Croatia.[82] Conversely, the flag of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina was dragged along the road behind a motorcycle ridden by two HVO soldiers, according to the testimony of Fahrudin Ahmi}, whose sister-in-law witnessed this incident.[83]

89. Witness I, a Muslim who lived in the part of Ahmi}i known as [anti}i, where about 80% of the houses were owned by Croats, referred to the fact that Muslims were discriminated against in petrol rationing. The witness would have to go to the Hotel Vitez in order to get a certificate from the HVO for petrol. Other Muslims would not go to the Hotel Vitez for such a certificate, as they were afraid.[84]

90. Witness U, a Bosniac refugee who left Karaula because of Serb aggression, arrived in a village adjoining Ahmi}i around February 1993. This neighbouring village consisted mostly of Croat inhabitants, and he was forced to leave there after only 45 days due to Croat harrassment. He described the pressures put on Bosnian Muslims by the Bosnian Croats in the village, who stole from the Muslims, seized their property, searched their houses for weapons and generally mistreated them in such a way as to make it impossible for them to continue to live in the village.[85] His house was searched three times by the HVO Military Police. The witness also described the murder in the village of a Bosniac, Esad Salki}, which finally provoked his flight to Ahmi}i in February 1993. He went to Ahrni}i precisely because it was a Muslim village. There were approximately 150 other refugees in Ahmi}i, all of whom were Bosnian Muslims.

During this period in Ahmi}i, the Bosnian Croats would say that they could not guarantee the Muslims' safety because of "extremist" Croats, who wore HVO insignia.

91. Witness V referred to regular "drive-by" shootings by Bosnian Croats in Ahmi}i before the conflict of April 1993.[86] Witness Y confirmed this pattern of harrassment of Bosniacs in the period from October 1992 until April 1993 in Ahmi}i and surrounding villages – with houses being burnt, Bosniacs expelled, and drive-by shootings in Ahmi}i practically every night at dusk. Muslims were also expelled from surrounding villages such as Strane, Merdani, Pezići, Kovacevac, Rovna and Loncari.[87] The witness explained that the BiH army did not defend those villages because "all those who were armed and uniformed and members of the army were up at the frontlines towards the Serbs".[88]

92. Witness AA, a Muslim who served in the HVO, was 23 years old in 1993. He had known Vlado [anti} since childhood. Vlado [anti} had most recently been his superior in the police force. The witness grew up in the municipality of Vitez, in a mostly Croat village with mostly Croat friends despite the fact that he was himself a Muslim. Suprisingly for a Muslim from a Muslim family, Witness AA joined the HVO in the spring of 1992. He joined the 4th battalion of the Military Police, assigned to provide security to the Hotel Vitez, which was being used as the Headquarters for the HVO in central Bosnia and where [anti} had an office. [anti} wore a uniform and was in charge of investigating crimes committed by HVO soldiers. The HVO stole from Serbs, Muslims and the BiH army. Vlado [anti} knew these crimes were being committed but he did not investigate them.

93. From late 1992 until early 1993, when Witness AA was sent by Vlado [anti} to Busovača, he saw in Kaonik, 2-3 km from Busovača, Muslim houses which had been set on fire and that Muslim civilians had been sent to dig trenches. On the same trip, the witness saw that the village of Strane had been "ethnically cleansed" of Muslims: "not a single Muslim man, woman or child had remained there. All of them were expelled" by the HVO.[89] The same was true of Busovača[90] and Merdani.[91] The witness, who participated in the campaign, stated that the purpose of the Busovača campaign was "ethnic cleansing" – "to rid Fthe placeğ of Ftheğ Balijas".[92]

94. Captain Stevens attested to the climate of persecution in the Vitez area in April 1993. After Easter 1993, Zenica, overwhelmingly a Muslim town, was shelled by the HVO. Also in mid-April 1993, a petrol tanker exploded in the Muslim part of Vitez. Captain Stevens arrived on the scene the day after this explosion and heard that the tanker had been placed near what was thought to be a munitions dump. Local militia-type forces told him that two Muslims had been strapped into the cab of the tanker and that the HVO fired RPG 7 rounds to cause the explosion. Captain Stevens saw the effects of the explosion, namely massive destruction to the Muslim part of town (the western part of Vitez). These can be seen in Exhibit P160. This incident, referred to also in Lt.-Col. Watters' testimony, led immediately to a mass exodus of some 400 Muslims from Stari Vitez. Captain Stevens also saw the results of "ethnic cleansing" by local HVO forces in Nova Bila towards the end of his tour of duty.

2. The Case for the Defence

(a) General

95. The Defence and defence witnesses have frequently pointed out, as the Prosecution did, that prior to October 1992, relations between Muslims and Croats in the La{va River Valley were very good.

[92] T. 3717-3718.

(b) Croat Nationalism

96. Defence witnesses have downplayed the significance of Croat nationalism, for example the flying of the Croat checkerboard flag from Croat houses, including the Papi} house, in Ahmi}i. Ivo Vidovi} said that flags were flown simply to celebrate religious holidays, and that the Muslims also displayed flags.[93] This statement is supported by other witnesses. Several Croats flew a Croat flag in Ahmi}i, as Ljubica Milicevi} testified,[94] including Ivo Papi}, Slavko Milicevi} and Dragan Papi}. She also explained that even though Ivo Papi} flew a Croatian flag and never a Muslim one, the sympathy of the Papi} family lay with both communities.

97. By the same token, defence witnesses placed less emphasis upon the importance of Bosnian Croats donning uniforms. Goran Papi}, the younger brother of the accused Dragan Papi}, testified that Dragan Papi} wore a black uniform – which was a gift – simply in order to make it easier for him to pass the black-shirted HOS checkpoints in Zenica.[95]

98. Zvonimir Cili} testified that the Press Service of the Muslim-Croat Crisis Staff,[96] where he worked after the break-up of the SFRY in 1991, was composed of three Croats and two Muslims. The purpose of the Staff was to deal with the crisis which had arisen due to attacks being launched on Bosnian Croats and Muslims by the Serb-dominated JNA in 1991-1992. The crisis staff was staffed in proportion to the nationalities present in the Vitez municipality, i.e. Muslims, Croats, Serbs, Yugoslavs and others.

[95] T. 7056–7057: "Q. Are you aware that he owned and occasionally wore a black uniform? A. Yes, he did own a black uniform. It was given to him as a present by somebody whose vehicle he had prepared, because it was useful if he went to Zenica or somewhere else, he would not be stopped at the checkpoints, and that's why he would wear it sometimes though it was too small for him. So I saw him wearing it very rarely. Q. So it was a good idea to wear a black uniform if you went to Zenica? A. Yes, because the HOS was the only organised force in Zenica at the time, and all of them were wearing black uniforms. Q. And why did he wear the camouflage uniform? A. He wore it because everybody was wearing it. All young men were wearing uniforms. It was the fashion at the time just before the war. Q. So young people who were not members of any particular units -- A. Yes, they would get them from their friends and they would wear them".

99. In her everyday life, Gordana Cui} stated that she never noticed any intolerance towards Muslims, nor a desire to "cleanse" Ahmi}i of Muslims or to burn their houses.[97]

100. The Defence for Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} has also emphasised that both accused did not only have generally good relations with Muslims, but that they were especially friendly with a number of Muslims who, like the accused, were members of a folklore society. Both accused have testified that this society and socialising with the other members meant very much to them. Zoran Kupre{ki} explained at length how he kept up his interest and involvement in folklore from secondary school until 15 April 1993.[98] The group had performances on the occasion of Muslim and Croatian festivities (Bajram and Easter) up until March and April 1993.[99] Counsel for the accused submitted four photographs showing both accused in the company of the other members of the society and during performances.[100]

101. The accused Mirjan Kupre{ki} told the Trial Chamber that even a number of marriages across ethnic divides originated in that society.[101] He himself had very close personal contacts with members of the folklore society who came from a different ethnic background, namely Fahrudin Ahmi}, a Muslim, who was his best friend, and two Serbs

[98] T. 11179 and T. 11182–11183: "Q. Did you go on with your folklore activities while you were in the JNA? A. Yes. I was a dancer, a folklore dancer, and I was at the head of this folklore section in the JNA, and I also played in the orchestra."

[99] T. 11192-11193: "Can you tell us when your folklore group had a performance at a Muslim celebration last? When was the last time, a purely Muslim celebration? A. Well, I remember we had a performance, it was to celebrate the Muslim festival of Bajram, and it was in March 1993 at the fire brigade building at the Mahala in Vitez. I remember that. Q. When was Bajram? A. It was March 1993, at the end of March sometime. Q. After that, did you have performances of any kind together with your Muslim members at an exclusively Croatian celebration? A. Not for a long time afterwards. I remember several days before the conflict, we had a performance with the same group in Mosunj to celebrate the Catholic holiday of Easter. That was in April, the 10th or 11th of April, somewhere around there".

[101] T. 11564: "Q. When you got married and the rest of them married, were you best men to one another? A. Yes, of course, particularly those of us who were together in this folklore company, and we were together. Yes, of course, we were best men to one another, and, of course, we married between us. I could mention three or four marriages which were the product of that friendship in that folklore company. Q. You mean marriages between Croats and Muslims; is that so? A. Between Croats and Croats, and Croats and Muslims, and Croats and Serbs. They all intermarried, all variations".

who were the best men at his wedding.[102] In his view, the first conflict in October 1992 brought the members of the society even closer together.[103]

(c) Muslim Nationalism and Persecution of Croats

102. In contrast to the Prosecution case, the Defence have also painted a picture of Muslim nationalism and belligerence.

103. Witness DB/1,2, who lived in Krušcica, near Vitez, stated:

> "Ever since the SDA party came into beginning () and when I stopped working and they would turn their heads away from us and they would wave their flags and call out, "Alija, SDA, this will be a Muslim state". They started this kind of thing from May, 1992, which is when I first began to be afraid".

104. Jadranka Toli} testified at length[104] about the persecution of Croats by Muslims in Zenica.[105]

[102] T. 11565–11566: "Q. Who were those closest friends? A. Fahrudin Ahmi}, the late Fahrudin Ahmi}. I don't think I should waste any words about that. He was not only a friend from the folklore company, but he was also a man who was in the band with me together, that is, we had various things that we did together, which brought us together. ... There was also Ibrahim Salkić, another dancer, Veljko Cato, who was my best man, and he's a Serb. Miro Vujinović, another Serb, and he was also my best man".

[103] T. 11566: "Q. Did any changes happen in your relations after the first conflicts in 1992? A. I can say that after that first conflict, that those--that it may have brought us even closer together. Because of all those events, we simply did not want anything like that to affect us in any way, and we were all very eager to come even closer together in view of that".

[105] T. 6194: "Q. You said that in the Croatian areas homes were usually torched after the Croats were expelled. Did I understand you right? A. Yes. The houses were torched after the Croats were expelled, but this happened on the 18th of April. Q. Okay. So now we see that you don't know anything about the 16th. So now we're going to talk about the conduct of Muslim forces after they captured Croatian villages. What happened with the Croatian churches after the Muslims captured a Croatian village? A. Well, they would shoot at the churches. The church in Cajdras is full of bullet holes. The priest and two nuns were abused in Cahrcici".

(d) Absence of an Official Plan or Policy on the Part of the Bosnian Croat Political and Military Institutions to Persecute Muslims

105. Defence witnesses testified that the official organs of the Croatian community of Herceg-Bosna did not systematically or as a matter of policy discriminate against Bosnian Muslims. [106]

106. Vlado Alilovi} testified that the Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna was not intended to be a separate State and nor did it aspire to be a State. Alilovi} conceded that the Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna was, at a minimum, a Croatian autonomous region, but referred to the referendum on the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina in which 99% of the Muslims and Croats voted in favour of the integrity of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with Serbs voting against. This would, in his view, tend to demonstrate that the Croats of Bosnia and Herzegovina were not opposed to the existence of Bosnia and Herzegovina as a State and did not have designs on parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina as prospective Croatian autonomous regions.

107. Zvonimir Cili} stated that Ivan [anti}, head of the HVO in Vitez and commander of the crisis staff of Vitez municipality,[107] was working to achieve peaceful co-existence with the Muslims. The Defence produced various exhibits to Zvonimir Cili} to show that attempts were continually made to promote inter-ethnic harmony.[108]

108. Rudo Vidovi} testified that there was no discrimination against the Muslims at the Post Office, a public service in Vitez, where he was chief. After the incident of 20 October 1992 – which he said resulted from a "misunderstanding" between the Muslims and Croats - the Muslims did not show up at work for seven days, because they were afraid, but they were not disciplined for not showing up, even though by law an employee could be fired for being absent without leave for five days. Moreover, Vidovi}'s deputy was a Muslim who remained employed throughout 1992-1993. There was no attempt at the Post Office to impose an HVO oath of loyalty on employees.[109]

"From this document, we can see that attempts were continually made to re-establish the joint police station and joint government. Yes. This is one of these attempts and attempts were made continuously ... the municipal war government which is mentioned in item 3, it was not called Croatian or HVO? A. No, it was literally called Vitez municipality - the municipal war government of Vitez, so it was ethnically neutral".

(e) Whether the Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna had a Separatist Agenda

109. In cross-examination, Zvonimir Cili} was asked about the separatist ambitions of Herceg-Bosna. The witness admitted that he was familiar with the arguments of a book by Anto Valenta entitled THE PARTITION OF BOSNIA AND THE FIGHT FOR ITS INTEGRITY, which advocated the creation in Bosnia, through re-settlement, of ethnically pure and homogenous regions in order to prevent civil war. Cili} said that the Vance-Owen plan proposed the same arrangement, but he averred that this was never the policy of the HVO and nor was it official policy. While the money and language and so forth in the Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna was to be Croatian, this was only in contradistinction to the Cyrillic script and Serbian symbols, which the people did not wish to have imposed on them by the Serbs. The aim of the Croat authorities, he said, was not secession, although differences between Croats and Muslims were created by the Vance-Owen plan, which was accepted by the Bosnian Croats but rejected by the Bosnian government.[110] The witness added that "they [the Bosnian Muslims] felt, and this is my personal view, of course, they felt that they could gain from Croats what they had lost from the Serbs", and because of that they refused to sign the Vance-Owen plan.[111]

(f) Whether the Bosnian Croat Authorities Condoned Persecution of Muslims by Private Individuals

110. The Defence introduced evidence to rebut the Prosecution's allegation that the Bosnian Croat authorities condoned atrocities committed against Bosnian Muslim civilians. Exhibit D51/2 – produced to Vlado Alilović[112] – shows the HVO authorities trying to conduct an investigation into violations of international humanitarian law on 24 April 1993. Under item 2, it is stated that the HVO government of Vitez unanimously condemns all recorded crimes committed during the conflict between the BiH army and the HVO by any party.

111. Zvonimir Cili} stated that at this time, the civilian police were not functioning, as they did not have the necessary power. Nevertheless, they tried to enforce law and order and to protect Muslims and Croats alike. In this connection, the Defence produced Exhibit D29/2, a public announcement that a Croat had been killed in Novi Travnik while resisting arrest by Novi Travnik HVO for seriously wounding a Muslim citizen.

112. Similar evidence was led as to the diligence of the HVO civilian police in investigating offences against Muslims in relation to the Salki} slaying.

113. Zoran Strukar, a civilian police officer in Vitez at the relevant time, testified at length on this point. He stated that there was an atmosphere of general lawlessness in Vitez, and that explosions and other such occurrences were happening practically every evening, with Croat houses being blown up as well as Muslim houses.[113]

114. As mentioned above, before October 1992, the police forces in Vitez were jointly Croat and Muslim, but thereafter they split into Muslim and Croat police forces. Strukar said that the "Vitezovi", a special unit, took over the Vitez police station.[114] There were then plans to once again merge the two police forces. As part of the negotiations, the Muslims demanded that Pero Skopljak resign. In return the Croats asked the Muslim police chief to resign. Skopljak resigned because he did not want to be an obstacle to [113] See Exhibits D31/2, D78/2, T. 6795: "Q. Also, they mention here what you mentioned as well, that there is armed robbery, people are being wounded, and also sabotages in the town, in cafes, and so far there have been armed robberies in six houses (two Croats, one Serb, and three Muslims). Did the military police make any kind of attempt to deal with the security situation? Did you reach any kind of agreement with them? A. There were some discussions to the effect that there should be a ban on carrying weapons in town. I know that the chiefs talked about this, but agreement was never reached on this matter. Perhaps there was something on paper, but it was not carried out".

reconciliation. According to the witness, the Muslims did not, however, sack their chief, as promised, so an end was put to this rapprochement. The Muslim and Croat forces were severed, and the witness started to receive his salary from Mostar rather than from Sarajevo. Consequently, investigations split up – Croat police dealt with Croat areas and Muslim police with Muslim areas. Nevertheless, Muslims and Croats continued to conduct some investigations together.

115. The witness said that the situation was out of control. Everyone was in danger and afraid. In village areas, both Muslims and Croats, and some Serbs, set up a village guard at night, to ensure safety, because people realised that the police could not do much. As regards the killing of Muslims, Strukar stated that there were Croats killing Muslims, but also Muslims killing Muslims, and Croats killing Croats. Where Muslims were killed by Croats, investigations were carried out. An example was the Salki} slaying. The perpetrator was a Croat - Miroslav Bralo, alias Cicko – who was arrested and imprisoned in Kaonik. However, in the event he was treated leniently during his incarceration, as other witnesses have testified.[115] In short, Strukar testified that in his work as a civilian policeman, he did not have a different attitude towards a situation when the victim was a Croat from when the victim was a Muslim.[116]

(g) Whether State Enterprises Discriminated Against Muslims

116. In the geographical area of Vitez and Ahmi}i, a large segment of the population was employed in the times relevant to this indictment in large State-run factories and enterprises, such as the Princip factory in Vitez, or Vitezit, and Impregnacija. The evidence is that these factories, though allegedly under Bosnian Croat control, did not discriminate against Bosnian Muslims, but on the contrary, throughout the war maintained equitable proportions of Muslim and Croat workers in the workforce.

[115] See the testimony of Witness AA, at T. 3735-3738, who was imprisoned with Bralo, and saw that Bralo was allowed to move about freely and to abuse Muslim prisoners while incarcerated.

117. Defence witness Vlado Divkovi} was general manager of the Vitezit factory at the relevant time. He testified that there was no discrimination in lay-offs at the Vitezit factory against Muslims or on any ethnic or national basis. Lay-offs were occasioned by the Serb aggression, since Serbs bombed the factory complexes and cut off the supply of raw materials from eastern Bosnia (e.g. Gorazde), reducing output. The ethnic make-up of the factory reflected the national make-up in terms of percentage of Muslims, Croats and Serbs right through until 15 April 1993.[117] Divkovi} added that Muslim workers did not have to sign an oath of allegiance to the HVO.[118]

(h) Whether Relief Supplies were Distributed Equally to Muslims

118. Vlado Alilović stated that Muslims and Croats were equally able to obtain goods in Vitez in 1992-1993.[119] Defence witnesses also pointed out that Caritas, the Catholic charity, treated Muslims and Catholics, i.e. Croats, completely equally. Zeljko Blaz,[120] for example, a resident of Vitez who worked for Caritas from 1991 after he was made redundant by the Princip factory in Vitez, testified that Caritas helped all of those in need – refugees, old people - regardless of their ethnicity or religion. Merhamet, on the other hand, was a religious organisation which tended only to help Muslims. Blaz testified that Caritas continued to help both Muslims and Croats after Merhamet had been established. After the Muslim-Croat conflict started, Caritas still helped some 50 Muslim families in Vitez. Moreover, there was no attempt by any political or military body to influence Caritas to refuse assistance to Muslim families. Vlado Alilovi} testified to the same effect – that Caritas helped everyone, Muslims and Croats alike, but that Merhamet only helped Muslims - adding that Ivan [anti}, the HVO President in Vitez, requested aid for villages, e.g. Preočica, which were exclusively Muslim.[121]

(i) The Fact that Croat Civilians were also the Victims of Attacks by Bosnian Muslims

119. Defence counsel emphasised that atrocities were also committed against Croat civilians by Muslim forces. In particular, they drew attention to a particularly horrendous episode which took place in Miletići, a remote Croat hamlet in the mountains of central Bosnia, in April 1993. This was testified to by Witness HH[122] and Mr. Kujawinski.

120. Witness HH visited Mileti}i during his fact-finding mission for the United Nations Special Rapporteur Tadeusz Mazowiecki. In Mileti}i, he entered a room which was badly damaged, and which had blood on the floor and walls. He was told by locals that apparently five foreign Mujahedin had stayed there. These Mujahedin had tortured and killed five young Croats. As a consequence, most of the Croatian inhabitants of the village had fled.[123]

121. Witness HH also testified that there were reports of harassment and arbitrary executions of Croats in Zenica.[124]

122. Mr. Kujawinski, a British army NCO, visited Miletici on 27 April 1993. He was dispatched with two Warriors and a UNHCR Land Rover. It was very high in the hills, a "very, very small village". He saw dried blood by the entrance to a pink house in the village. The villagers were reticent, but eventually said that soldiers had come to the village, rounded everyone up and separated the few men of fighting age, who were then taken into the pink house. Eventually Kujawinski gained access to the house and found congealed blood everywhere, pillows that had been used, he thinks, to muffle shots, and clumps of hair and bone strewn on the walls. He was told that five men had been tortured or killed there.

123. Kujawinski went back to the hamlet the next day with a van and coffins and crosses. He managed to get the bodies, which had been there for several days and were therefore in a state of decomposition. He noted their names and took the bodies to a Catholic Church in Guca Gora, where he handed over the bodies to a monk for burial. The bodies were in a "shocking state" - one had his neck cut all the way around with a blunt instrument. Another had his fingers bent all the way backwards. On the second day, the witness was told that Mujahedin had been to the area – people whom they had never seen before. Mileti}i is 15-20 km from Ahmi}i.

124. It would appear that the events in Mileti}i may have been in reprisal for the events in Ahmi}i.

3. Findings of the Trial Chamber

125. The Trial Chamber considers that there is compelling evidence to the effect that, starting in mid-1992, tensions and animosity between Croats and Muslims rapidly escalated. This mutual animosity came to the fore in October 1992, when the episodes referred to earlier occurred. Between October 1992 and April 1993, relations between the two groups worsened and each group increasingly engaged in a policy of discrimination against the other. Whether the Croats pursued this policy in a more fierce and ruthless way and on a larger scale is a question that may be left unresolved for the purpose of this case: as the Trial Chamber has stated below in the section on the applicable law, the fact that the adversary engages in unlawful behaviour and persecutes or kills civilians cannot be a justification for similar and reciprocal conduct. As these trial proceedings concern Croats accused of having taken part in such a policy, the issue of the extent to which the Muslims also persecuted Croats is not material.

E. Governmental and Armed Forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992-1993

1. General

126. There were three principal governmental or quasi-governmental entities in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992-1993: the Government of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina based in Sarajevo, the Croatian Community of Herceg-Bosna based in Mostar and the Republika Srpska based in Pale. Although the Sarajevo government was the legitimate government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, many Croats perceived it as Muslim-dominated.[125] Corresponding to these governmental or quasi-governmental divisions, there were various armed forces, Military Police, civilian police, paramilitary formations and village guards operating in central Bosnia in 1992-1993, which were at different times either joint or formed along ethnic lines. There was, first, the Army of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, or the BiH army, which was perceived by certain Croats and Serbs to be Muslim-dominated. On the Croat side was the HVO and its armed forces. The Serbs fought in Bosnia through the JNA and later through their own Bosnian Serb army. There was also the Territorial Defence of Bosnia and Herzegovina which was essentially a Muslim force and which was later incorporated, at least on paper, into the BiH army. The Muslims then had some irregular formations, such as the Mujahedin. There were also special units of the Croats such as the Vitezovi. There was also a Croat Military Police (which included special units such as the Jokers), the Muslim Military Police, the Croat civilian police and the Muslim civilian police. In addition to the various armies, there were the village guards or patrols, which were initially joint [125] A defence witness, Vlado Divkovi}, T. 5791-5794, believed there were problems with the Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1992 in that it was not really operating because it was not possible to reach Sarajevo and also because the BiH government was boycotted by the Serb representatives. Accordingly a directive from the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina sent to the witness as manager of the Vitezit factory and directing that those who sided with the aggressor against Bosnia and Herzegovina, i.e. nationalist Serbs, should be fired, was ignored. The witness felt that the Government did not have the right to issue such a directive because Vitezit was socially-owned, rather than a public corporation, so only the Workers' Council of the enterprise could make such a move. Vlado Divkovi}, T. 5794: "Q. You said that that is why you did not pay attention to this document. A. Yes, of course. In view of the composition of the government at the time, it could not be respected throughout the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina. And, anyway, the document was passed without any legal grounds. Vitezit was never declared a public corporation. It was not an enterprise that the government could appoint the managers of".

Muslim-Croat operations but which split shortly before the conflict of October 1992 into separate patrols.

2. The Bosnian Croat forces

(a) The Bosnian Croat Leadership in Vitez

127. The two most important positions in the political leadership of Vitez were divided between the Croats and Muslims. Ivan [anti}, HVO President in Vitez and a Croat, was President of the municipality and Head of the Crisis Staff as a representative of the HDZ, while Fuad Kaknjo, a Muslim, was the President of the executive body. The other positions were shared out to correspond to the results in the elections. Ivan [anti}'s deputy was Pero Skopljak, a Croat, who was thus Vice-President of the HVO in the Vitez municipality.[126] According to Alilovi}, harmonious relations were maintained between the Croats and Muslims between October 1992 and April 1993.[127] However the Muslims and Croats eventually split up and formed parallel governments, the Croats basing theirs in Vitez, the Muslims in Mahala (Stari Vitez).

(b) The HVO and the Vitez Brigade

128. The HVO (Croatian Defence Council) was formed on 10 July 1992 in Vitez as a civil authority in order to most effectively organise defences against possible aggression. It was an executive authority.[128] While the Prosecution has portrayed the HVO as an instrument of Muslim oppression, the Defence has argued that it was primarily a defence council formed because of regional insecurity and the threat from the Serbs. The Defence have also argued that the HVO soldiers received instruction on the laws of war.[129] The HVO had various brigades in central Bosnia, including the Vitez brigade, [129] Zvonimir Cili}, T. 5152-5153: "A. Fifteen days after I joined the command as a political officer, on orders of Colonel Tihomir Bla{ki} which went through the municipal staff and other staffs, Mario Čerkez, the chief of staff, I was sent on this date, 19 Oct., to a seminar in Busovača which was organised by the with Mario Čerkez as its Commander, while Tihomir Bla{ki} was Commander of the HVO Central Bosnia Operative Zone.

129. The Defence has called a number of witnesses to show that the Vitez brigade, into which several of the accused were apparently conscripted on or after 16 April 1993, was barely operational and still in the process of being set up on 16 April 1993. The Defence therefore submits that it could not, and did not, have any role in the atrocities committed in Ahmi}i, which were instead the work of the Military Police, and in particular a specialist anti-terrorist unit thereof known as the Jokers.[130]

(c) Croatian Paramilitary Formations

130. In addition to regular HVO units, such as the Vitez brigade, there were Bosnian Croat paramilitary formations and Special Purpose Units (PNNs) such as the Vitezovi.[131] The Jokers – a special anti-terrorist unit of the Croat Military Police headquartered in the Bungalow in Nadioci – were also an élite unit functioning outside the traditional HVO representatives of the Red Cross in Geneva. Q. What was the topic of this seminar? A. This seminar was held for the representatives of the HVO, and as I found out -- and this was a full-day seminar; a similar one had been also organised for the representatives of the BiH army, and the topic of the seminar was the International Conventions on the Laws of War. We received a lot of promotional material in English and Croatian. We also saw films on the activities of the Red Cross, and many of us, for the first time, learned more about the history of the Red Cross and its goals and ... Q. Did the seminar also include a discussion of the Geneva Conventions? A. Yes. It was about the rights of prisoners, about the rights of prisoners of war, and I have to say that this seminar left a great impression on me. I asked myself, why are they showing us this? Because they were showing us a number of films from countries in Africa, South America, and they were very disturbing images. Q. And you thought that this could not happen in your region? A. Yes. I thought that it was very far removed and I thought that it could never happen in our country".

Several defence witnesses had difficulty explaining why their names appeared on HVO membership lists (Exhibit P353), when they did not consider themselves to have been members of the HVO. It seems they signed these lists simply in order to receive shares. As Zdenko Raji} testified, T. 7431: "A. Honesty was not at issue here. What was at stake here was to match the number of shares which the BiH army members were getting. [...] By including the names of elderly and women in this list as if they had been mobilised, meant increasing the number of people receiving shares. [...] Q. What is the relationship with the compensation that was received by the army of Bosnia-Herzegovina? A. Because of the fact that [...] they received many more shares. We tried to get as close to that number, to increase the number, to match their numbers, so that when these shares were distributed, that we would get as close to the number that they were getting".

structure, in this case operating through the command of the Military Police rather than the HVO. The Defence asserts that these private armies and paramilitary groups were responsible for much of the lawlessness rampant at the time in Vitez and its environs.[132]

131. The Defence argued that even Tihomir Bla{ki}, the regional commander of the HVO, could not issue orders to forces such as the Vitezovi. The Defence contends that the general situation was anarchic, with crimes being committed by both Muslims and Croats, but generally in the pursuit of petty criminality rather than for reasons linked to the struggle for ethnic hegemony.

(d) The Military Police and "The Jokers"

132. It appears that the Jokers were a specialist, anti-terrorist unit of the Croatian Military Police based locally in the Bungalow in Nadioci. Both the Jokers and HOS members wore black shirts and appeared to have assumed a "special operations" profile, replete with face paint, advanced weaponry, etc.

133. Both prosecution and defence witnesses have testified to the presence of members of the Jokers in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993, and prosecution witnesses in particular also witnessed individual Jokers committing killings of unarmed civilians. A prosecution witness, Mr. Kujawinski, an non-commissioned officer in the British army, saw a large group of soldiers celebrating at the Bungalow on 16 April 1993, and inferred that they were responsible for what had happened there that day. Members of the Jokers also confirmed to Captain Lee Whitworth that they had been involved in the assault on Ahmi}i.[133]

[132] Zoran Strukar, T. 6761–6765, T. 6851-6852 and T. 6855-6858, emphasised that the Vitez police force was multi-ethnic: the commander of the police was a Muslim and the chief of police was a Croat (Pero Skopljak). The ethnic composition of the police more or less reflected the ethnic composition of the population, roughly 50-50. See Exhibit D75/2: "What occurred reflects negatively among the Croatian population and is perceived as powerlessness of the legal organs and institutions of the HVO to counteract crime and criminals. In the ranks of [the] BiH [army] they could hardly wait for this, and it is commented upon as an open clash among the divided HVO forces. They follow further developments with satisfaction and expect such further clashes, which influences their morale considerably and they offer their "help". See also Exhibits D30/2 and D31/2, which are Reports on these crimes.

134. Witness AA, a member of the Jokers, testified that he was invited to join this unit in January 1993 by the accused Vladimir [anti}, who was the commander of the company to which the unit belonged - the 1st company of the 4th battalion of the HVO. [anti} told him that the unit would be better armed, equipped, paid and trained than the regular HVO and that it would be based in the "Bungalow" in Nadioci. The witness went to report there after the Busovača campaign, where he witnessed the destruction of Muslim villages.[134] He saw [anti} at the Bungalow virtually every day. On the instructions of [anti}, the members of the unit equipped the Bungalow by looting from Muslim houses in Busovača. [anti} also told them to find a name for the unit and they came up with the name Jokers which he approved; the Jokers could do nothing of significance without the orders of Vladimir [anti}.[135] The Jokers came from Vitez, Busovača, Nadioci, Vidovici, etc. As far as Witness AA knew, none of the Jokers were from Ahmi}i. The Bungalow itself was 5-10 minutes on foot from Ahmi}i.

135. Lee Whitworth, who served in the British army in Bosnia from May to November 1993 also spoke of the Jokers as an élite police unit based in the Bungalow. The witness was a liaison officer, tasked with building rapport with the local political, military and civilian leaders in the Bosnian government army and HVO. In that capacity, the witness met Vladimir [anti} as a senior military policeman in Vitez, at the 4th Battalion Military Police Headquarters of the HVO in the Hotel Vitez.[136] The witness also had occasion to pass by the Bungalow – which he referred to as the "Swiss Cottage" – and to converse with eight to ten soldiers. These soldiers described themselves as an élite police unit that was active in all the military successes of the HVO in the La{va [136] T. 4269. Captain Stevens, T. 2143, among many others, testified that the HVO commanders were based in the Hotel Vitez, which does not seem to be in dispute. Witness B, T. 740-742, who was a 37-year old ex-JNA captain (1st class), also testified, inter alia, that the directives and orders for the HVO seemed to come from the Hotel Vitez and the Commander, Mario Čerkez.

River Valley. They were predominantly dressed in black. They referred to themselves as Jokers – "Jokeri" – and they were very aggressive at first and made the witness's Muslim interpreter very fearful. Lee Whitworth wanted to meet the commander of the Jokers, and thus went to the Hotel Vitez. Vladimir [anti} came out in response to Whitworth's request to meet a senior police chief. He was introduced as the senior military police commander in the area. It later became apparent to the witness, throughout his tour, that in each of the municipalities - Vares, Zepce, Busovača, Travnik, Novi Travnik and Vitez - there would be a company group of the 4th Battalion. Hotel Vitez, it appears, was both a Battalion Headquarters and a Company Headquarters. Vladimir [anti} was head of the Company Headquarters, with the Jokers a part of that Company, while Pasco Lubici} was head of the Battalion Headquarters. The Jokers were set up as an anti-terrorist unit; they were part of the Military Police.[137]

3. The Bosnian Muslim Forces

(a) The Army of Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH army)

136. The Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina had its own army, namely the army of Bosnia and Herzegovina or the government forces. The Bosnian army was overwhelmingly deployed during the relevant period in the front-line against the Serbs, while the HVO was engaged to a lesser extent against the Serbs, being deployed instead in the La{va River Valley.[138] In Ahmi}i, there were no BiH battalions before April 1993.

[137] Zvonimir Cili}, T. 5143-5144: "... there was the civilian police as well, as well as the municipal authorities who sought in every possible way to maintain law and order, because this situation put the citizens in a very difficult position, and many of them sought ways to abandon the area. I think it was in January that the municipal government, the Croatian government in Vitez, took the decision to form an intervention squad. This intervention squad was composed of selected young men who had been tested in terms of their morals and also physically, they were mentally in good health, they had no criminal record, and they were ready to intervene physically and with force of arms to maintain law and order. A decision was even taken that they should have (sic) certain compensation. At the time it was quite considerable, because salaries were very low, whereas I think the members of the squad received up to 400 or 500 German marks, which was an extremely high salary for a month. For comparison's sake, the regular salaries in enterprises were about 50 marks".

[138] Witness Y, T. 3321: "Q. So according to this map, there were some HVO forces along the frontline with the Chetniks? A. Yes, as you can see, but very few. Q. Does the map indicate where the majority of

137. This characterisation of the BiH army and HVO deployment has been contested by the Defence. [139]

(b) Muslim Paramilitary Formations

138. Defence witnesses have described several Muslim defence forces: the Patriotic Legion, the Green Legion, the 7th Muslim Brigade, and the MOS (Muslim Defence Forces) which was formed by the Mujahedin.[140] The genesis of these organisations coincided with what the defence witnesses perceived to be the formation of the BiH army by the Muslim people.[141] It has also been contended by defence witnesses that these structures acted in concert[142] and fell under the mandate of the BiH army.[143]

(c) Mobilisation of Muslims

139. After the events of October 1992 described below, the Croats saw signs of what they perceived to be Muslim militancy. [144, 145]

HVO forces were during this time period which is marked on the map Dec. '92 and Jan. '93? A. Yes. Q. Where does this map indicate that the majority of the HVO forces were located? A. (Indicating). The La{va Valley". See also Exhibit P227, which shows the deployment of the BiH army, HVO and Serb forces.

[139] Vlado Alilovi}, T. 5476-5478, testified that on 16 April 1993, the BiH army tried to capture Vitez, the La{va River Valley and central Bosnia, as they did in Bugojno, Gornji Vakuf and other places. Muslim forces wanted to divide Busovača.

[141] Jadranka Tolić, T. 6148.

[142] Jadranka Tolić, T. 6149, testified that "All the units being formed, I would call them altogether by one name, Muslim forces, including the BiH army, the Green Legion, the Patriotic Legion, and the MOS, Mujahedin organisation. These were all Muslim forces. They operated together in coordination and that's how they carried out their tasks".

[143] Jadranka Tolić, T. 6154: "Q. So the BiH army carried out the negotiations and exchanged Zivko Toti} for Mujahedins. What does this tell you? A. Well, I said already earlier that these were Muslim forces, and they did everything in coordination. Both the Mujahedin and the BiH army. These were not separate structures. The Mujahedin were part of the BiH army".

[144] Gordana Cuić, T. 8144-8147.

[145] Jozo Alilovi}, T. 8335–8336, testified that the situation was very dangerous. The young men would shoot at anything. The witness had to inform his superiors that he no longer felt safe as a gamekeeper because of the possibility that he would be shot by these youths. Under cross-examination, he stated that the youths would take the automatic rifles with them while tending sheep, and shoot at birds.

(d) The Territorial Defence

140. The Bosniac Territorial Defence was incorporated into the BiH army in December 1992, but this produced no real change in how the Ahmi}i patrols were conducted.[146] There was some military training in the BiH army, but it was not a sophisticated military operation and it lacked equipment, supplies and manpower.[147]

(e) Bosnian Muslim Roadblocks and Checkpoints

141. The Prosecution has argued that Croat forces erected roadblocks at which Muslims were systematically harassed.[148] The Defence has sought to establish, however, that the practice of setting up roadblocks,[149] at which civilians were subject to harassment, was as much a practice of the Bosnian Muslim forces as of Bosnian Croat forces. The Prosecution has not disputed the latter fact.

(f) HOS

142. Zvonimir Cili} stated that, at least until 15 April 1993, the HOS was a joint Muslim and Croat force. HOS members, like the Jokers, wore black uniforms. However, after the Muslim-Croat split in October 1992, the Muslim part of the HOS remained as [147] This was confirmed by several witnesses. See for example Abdulah Ahmić, T. 341. Witness V, T. 3050-3051, who was on leave from the front-line with the Četniks, above Turbe, at the time of the events the subject of this indictment, and said that the Bosniac territorial defence was simply a patrol. Bosniac soldiers coming home from the frontline on leave would initially take their weapons home with them, but they ceased to do so as relations with the Croats grew tense, because the weapons were needed at the frontline for the next shift and because at checkpoints the HVO would confiscate the weapons from Bosniacs. Zvonimir Cili}. T. 5202, testified that, due to a shortage of uniforms on the Muslim side, it was common to come across people who were armed but not in uniform or only partly in uniform, and Witness V, T. 3085-3086 also confirmed that few Bosniacs had uniforms and that some went to the front in civilian clothes.

the HOS while the Croat element of the HOS became the Vitezovi, as distinct from the regular HVO's Vitez brigade.[150]

4. Comparative Strength of the Muslim and Croat Forces

(a) The Prosecution Case

143. Major Michael Dooley, an UNPROFOR Platoon Commander in Bosnia from October 1992 to 1993, noticed that the army of Bosnia and Herzegovina was very poorly armed compared to the HVO.[151] There were no BiH army soldiers in the region of Ahmi}i, and very few in Vitez. The majority of the BiH army soldiers were towards Travnik on the Serb front.[152]

(b) The Defence Case

144. The Defence, on the other hand, claim that the BiH army was better equipped than the HVO, and certainly had more manpower due to the greater concentration of Muslims in central Bosnia than Croats.[153, 154]

145. Defence witnesses also claimed that the Vitez armaments factory, Vitezit, continued to supply both the HVO and the BiH army during the conflict.[155] Defence witness Anto Raji} alleged that after the dissolution of the Anti-aircraft Defence (PZO), the Muslim contingent, which was apparently reabsorbed by the Territorial Defence, obtained two anti-aircraft guns from the Impregnacija explosives factory in Vitez and was Defence witness Ivan Taraba, T. 8734-8735, a worker at the SPS company in Vitez, also testified that the ethnic composition of the factories in Vitez was balanced to reflect the ethnic composition of the general population - approximately 50% Croats, 50% Muslims, and a few Serbs – and remained so throughout the conflict.

allocated half of the cannons.[156] Nonetheless, defence witness Divkovi} conceded that Vitezit was, after 16 April 1993, exclusively under HVO control and indeed that its production and supply to the HVO had a decisive impact on the latter's war effort against the BiH army.[157] Defence witnesses did not contest that it was easy for the Bosnian Croats to arm themselves.[158]

5. Findings of the Trial Chamber

146. The Trial Chamber finds that, in the La{va River Valley, the HVO was, by and large, better armed and equipped, and was able to set up more checkpoints than the Bosnian Territorial Defence. The Defence contention that the BiH army was better equipped than the HVO is contradicted by all the UN observers who testified, and the Chamber does not find it to be a credible assertion.

F. The Events of 19-20 October 1992, in Particular in Ahmi}i

147. Ahmi}i is located in central Bosnia, in the La{va River Valley, between Vitez and Zenica. The area of Ahmi}i is approximately 6 km^2 and falls within the Vitez Municipality. Adjacent to its boundaries are the villages of Nadioci to the south-east, [anti}i to the south-west, and Piri}i to the north-west. In the La{va Valley the town of Vitez is at the centre. It is approximately four kilometres from the centre of Vitez to the Ahmi}i area.

I don't know if anybody amongst my colleagues received such an order. Q. And according to your information, deliveries continued until the beginning of the war? A. Yes. Deliveries went on until April '94 -- excuse me, '93". T. 5836-5837: "Q. [...] what is the main reason that the La{va Valley or the part that remained under HVO control was not captured by the BiH army during the conflict? A. Probably the main reason which contributed to the defence of this area was this factory and the vast amount of explosives in it, so that we could continue to produce those military ammunitions during the war, and that was the main factor that made it possible for the people there to defend themselves. Q. Even though the superiority of the BiH army was quite significant in manpower? A. Yes, five, six, or seven times superior in numbers".

[158] Dragan Vidović, T. 8412-8413.

148. There exist traditional names for the various parts of the village. Lower Ahmi}i is referred to as Donji Ahmi}i, the most commonly referred to landmarks are the Catholic cemetery along the main Busovača/Vitez road, the primary school and the lower mosque on the secondary road leading off into Ahmi}i. This road goes up towards to Upper Ahmi}i or Gornji Ahmi}i, but between the upper and lower parts of Ahmi}i is an area called the Sutre or Grabovi, where the Kupre{ki} houses and the Sutre warehouse are situated. The upper mosque, which did not have a minaret is the landmark of Upper Ahmi}i. The area of Zume around [anti}i was predominantly an area inhabited by Croats and the landmark most frequently referred to is the Pican café. In Nadioci, the principal landmark is the Bungalow.

149. In the 1991 census, the population of Ahmi}i-[anti}i-Piri}i-Nadioci was 2173. Of these 4 villages, Muslims represented 32% of the population, Croats 62%, and minority groups made up 5%. A number of Muslim refugees came to the village in 1992. The total Muslim population of the Ahmi}i area was around 600 at the time. Ahmi}i is a small rural village similar to many others in the La{va Valley. It is a village where entire families live under one roof. Children attend primary school there, but due to its rural character, most residents at the time of the events covered here worked in the larger towns of Zenica and Vitez. Many of them worked in the Slobodan Princip Seljo factory (SPS) in Vitez which employed 2,400 persons, constituting 50% of the workforce in Vitez, with an estimated 70% of the population of Ahmi}i working there. Around the village, employment consisted mainly of manual labour and small-scale agriculture, mainly for the support of the families, many of whom would have a cow or two for milk, a few hens for eggs, and other livestock.

1. The Case for the Prosecution

150. On 19 October 1992, the Bosniacs in Ahmi}i erected a road-block by order of the Headquarters of the Territorial Defence in Vitez to prevent the HVO from going to Novi

Travnik.[159] As was stated by Witness Z, "we established this checkpoint in the evening. It was dusk, rather, in order to prevent a large concentration of the Croatian Defence Council, and they started from Počulica, Kiseljak, Busovača towards Novi Travnik".[160] The barricade was not heavily guarded. This act nevertheless provoked the fury of the HVO and led to an attack.[161]

151. Around 4.30 a.m., on 20 October 1992, a shell was fired from the direction of Zume and hit the top of the minaret. Heavy shooting then broke out. This went on until about 12 p.m. Houses, sheds and barns were set alight. The Bosniacs returned fire.[162]

152. During the attack, Upper Ahmi}i was shelled and the minaret, among other buildings, was hit by shells.[163] A Muslim boy was killed, apparently by a sniper bullet. The attack was mostly one-sided, with the Croatian assault predominating, although according to Abdulah Ahmi} there were some 30-40 armed Bosniacs resisting, and some unarmed Bosniacs, as well as some assistance from the BiH army. Due to conflicting accounts, it is difficult to estimate precisely how many Bosniacs were defending the barricade that day. It was also rumoured that some Croats were killed.[164]

153. During the attack, Mehmed Ahmi}'s house was destroyed. Mehmed Ahmi} was awakened that morning by the sound of an explosion. His house lay across the road from the Papi} house on the main road in Ahmi}i. By gaining control of the house, Bosnian Croat forces could thus control the main road from both sides.[165] A burst of gunfire was directed at Mehmed Ahmi}'s house, apparently from the direction of Ivo and Dragan Papi}'s house. His house was directly hit and set on fire with inflammable bullets. He crawled out of his house with his family, whilst being shot at by several soldiers from the direction of the Papi} house and the woods, including, allegedly, by Dragan Papi} himself from both locations, who used, inter alia, an anti-aircraft gun.[166] The witness and his family managed to escape without fatalities.

154. Witness D was also a victim of this attack. Bosnian Croat forces burned down her house and severely beat her husband for trying to save his cows. Witness D and her husband abandoned the village after their house was burned down.[167]

155. Fahrudin Ahmi} heard a detonation and an explosion, and saw that a fellow Muslim's barn had been set alight. He noticed shots being fired from the direction of the forest and the Papi} house.[168] The witness himself was seriously wounded in the arm by a gunshot during the attack.

156. Anti-aircraft guns were evidently used by the Bosnian Croats in the attack, fired from the vicinity of the Papi} house. According to Witness Y, the HVO seized the anti-aircraft guns from the Princip factory.[169] Witness Z confirmed that there was shooting from an anti-aircraft gun mounted on a flat-bed truck.[170]

157. More than half the Muslim population of the village fled Ahmi}i after the attack.[171] Witness B testified that the Bosniac population which was chased out came back between then and April 1993,[172] pursuant to an agreement reached with the Bosnian Croat authorities. Despite this, however, Muslim-Croat relations significantly worsened after the attack.[173]

2. The Case for the Defence

(a) The Muslims in Ahmi}i Caused the Conflict of 20 October 1992

158. The Defence, by contrast, have argued that the conflict of 20 October 1992 was the Muslims' fault,[174] on the basis that they had erected a barricade to prevent Bosnian Croat forces from travelling on the Vitez-Busovača road to fight the Serbs in Jajce, with the eventual result that Jajce fell to the Serbs.[175] Another reason for the conflict was given by defence witness Pero Papi}. He was allegedly told by Muris Ahmi} that the latter had been ordered to chase out the Croats, with permission to remove anything and to set the Croat's houses on fire so that the Croats could not return.[176] Hence, it would seem that the Croats of Ahmi}i claim that the 20 October 1992 attack was a pre-emptive strike against their Muslim neighbours, who for their part were preparing an attack on their Croat neighbours. According to Goran Males,[177] a further possible rationale for the roadblock was that the Vitez-Busovača road on which the roadblock was situated is the main communication route, and "just at the crossroads near Kaonik it links on to the Sarajevo to Zenica main road".

would have their windows broken. We were sorrowful, we didn't know what was happening. And so on, it went on like that. We saw that relations were not what they used to be. Before, we would exchange visits, and then suddenly, they somehow separated. They were doing something in secret. We didn't know what they were doing. But we saw that things were not what they used to be" (T. 1014).

[174] Goran Papi}, T. 7047, the younger brother of the accused Dragan Papić, starkly blamed the Muslims for this conflict: "the Muslims caused the conflict on that day and that conflict is their fault".

[175] This view was expressed by defence witnesses Ivo Vidovi}, T. 6945; Ivica Kupre{ki}, T. 7944; Zdenko Raji}, T. 7440; Anto Raji} T. 8681–8682 and Zdravko Vrebac, T. 7763 (who stated that local Croats from Ahmi}i-[anti}i were not involved in the conflict). Goran Males passed through the roadblock in question on 19 Oct. 1992, on his way from Podjele to Rijeka, although he had been warned by some Croats not to go towards Ahmi}i, because the road was blocked. He saw approximately 100 men at the roadblock, most of whom wore camouflage uniforms. He identified them as armed members of the BiH army, as well as a few civilians. The men at the roadblock insulted and threatened him, saying, "Let's kill him. [...] Gouge his eyes out," until a person went to fetch the commander, whom he identified as Fikret Ahmi}. The witness answered when the latter asked his first and last names, and he was let through. The roadblock consisted of fences and was built to prevent circulation from Busovača to Jajce. He confided these occurrences to a friend who corroborated the statement. Although Goran Males, T. 7261–7267, acknowledged that he did not know why the roadblock had been erected, he stated that he believed that the reason for the roadblock was to prevent people from Busovača from going to Jajce.

(b) The Conflict of 20 October 1992

159. Croat witnesses have presented a largely uniform account of the 20 October 1992 attack. They maintain that it occurred as a result of the establishment of the barricade by the Muslims and that it was considered as the first serious conflict between the HVO and the BiH army.[178] They say that the attack took the local Croats by surprise. Before dawn, there was heavy gunfire which woke them up and which continued for about ten minutes, with bullets flying everywhere. The shooting appeared to come from the HVO positions in Hrasno, which forms part of the municipality of Busovača, across the La{va River.[179] They also heard explosions.[180] A number of Croat witnesses state that around 5 a.m., they heard music from the mosque followed by an announcement: "Croats surrender – this is a holy war – jihad – you are surrounded, you have no chance".[181] This broadcast could be heard from 5-10 kilometres away, implying that some loudspeaker device must have been used.[182] Explosions lasted until around 9:30 a.m., and gunfire stopped in the afternoon.[183] The mosque's minaret was hit. Around 7:30 p.m., when there was a lull in the shooting, the local Croats were able to move to a shelter in Mirko Saki}'s basement[184] and Anto Bralo's shelter.[185] The Military Police of the HVO were involved in dismantling the barricade, assisted by members of the unit that was going to Jajce from Busovača and Kiseljak. There were approximately 15 soldiers defending the barricade, assisted by about 50 soldiers constituting "outside help".[186] The Croats from Ahmi}i,

He was in charge of a squad of about ten men, which was deployed in the forest near the Topola cemetery, but he did not take part in the conflict. He did not actually see the barricade. [anti}i and Pirići did not take part in the conflict.[187] Some houses were damaged, including the houses of Pero Papi} and Mehmed Ahmi},[188] and some barns were set on fire. A few Croats fled in the direction of Donja Rovna. They saw Muslims fleeing towards Upper Ahmi}i.[189] There were not too many casualties during this conflict, although they heard that a Muslim and a Croat had been killed.[190]

(c) Croat Neighbours Helped Muslims to Return to Ahmi}i after 20 October 1992

160. After the attack, the Muslims from Ahmi}i fled, some of their houses and barns having been damaged or destroyed. They started to come back, however, only four days after the conflict.[191] According to the Defence, the Croats did all they could to assist their former Muslim neighbours to return in peace. Ivica Kupre{ki} testified that the Croats protected the homes of the Muslims while they were away and that they arrested and reported a thief who tried to steal from one of the temporarily abandoned Muslim houses.[192] Ljubica Milicevi} testified that the mayor of Vitez insisted that the Muslims come back. She was never aware of any complaints from the Muslims that their property had been plundered.[193] A coordination commission was formed to protect the interests of citizens and which assisted in the reconstruction of destroyed houses.[194] Meetings were held in the village to create peace between Muslims and Croats. Every attempt was made to find a solution and to return to the situation as it had been before the first conflict.[195]

A large number of people, and I must underline this, these were damaged Muslim houses, but a large number of Croat citizens whole-heartedly contributed to this collection campaign to repair those houses and a number of those houses were repaired".

(d) Muslim-Croat Relations from October 1992 to April 1993

161. Despite these efforts, it appears from the entirety of the testimony that Croat-Muslim relations deteriorated significantly after the first conflict.[196] The two communities no longer trusted each other and tensions remained high.[197]

(e) Findings of the Trial Chamber

162. In the view of the Trial Chamber, it is apparent from the evidence that the establishment of the road-block by the Muslims on 19 October to prevent the passage of HVO troops heading toward Novi Travnik was the act that sparked the armed conflict of 20 October. In this regard, the Defence assertion that the conflict was caused by the Muslims seems to be persuasive. It would also seem to be established that the armed conflict occurred primarily between HVO armed forces from outside Ahmi}i and Muslim soldiers belonging to the BiH army. Nevertheless, some local Muslims and Croats either took part in the conflict or assisted those who were fighting.

163. The evidence also shows that the principal victims of the armed confrontation of 20 October were the Muslims. A number of their houses and barns were destroyed or set on fire or damaged, while fewer Croatian houses were damaged. That the local Muslims suffered most from the shelling and firing is borne out inter alia by the fact, admitted by both parties, that at the end of the armed clashes, most of the Muslim population of Ahmi}i fled the village, whereas no Croats left.

The village guards were separated. There were separate Croat-Muslim guards and Muslim village guards, and each separate group would stand guard in front of their own houses. The people working with me at the market I felt of a certain amount of distrust towards me. You couldn't do any work with them (sic) as you could before the conflict".
[197] Zdravko Vrebac, T. 7760.

164. The Trial Chamber also finds that when the conflict was over, the Croatian population of the village endeavoured to encourage the Muslims of Ahmi}i to return and actually helped them to do so.

G. The Events of 16 April 1993 in Ahmi}i

1. The Case for the Prosecution

(a) Croat Preparations for the Attack of 16 April 1993

165. The Prosecution alleges that the attack on Ahmi}i was carefully planned and that local Croats knew that it was going to take place and were evacuated before the offensive was launched. Many Muslim witnesses testified that on 15 April 1993, they saw many signs of a possible forthcoming attack or the harbingers of forced expulsion from the village. However, almost none of the Muslims took any precautionary measures, nor was the population evacuated, because, as Witness B put it, no-one expected the Croats to attack the Bosniacs in such a brutal manner.[198]

(i) The Croats' Military Preparations

166. Major Woolley, a British army officer in UNPROFOR, said that there was "tangible evidence that clearly there was a Croatian aggression starting"[199] on 15 April 1993 – a general offensive which preceded the assault on Ahmi}i - when HVO soldiers in Putis, a village about 7 km to the east of Vitez and far from the Serb frontline, fired over his troops' heads.

167. Esad Rizvanovi} testified that on 15 April 1993, in the early morning, he saw many vehicles moving about on the road from Vitez to Busovača. He saw men in uniform, but did not see any women or children.[200] Witness B said that he noticed a lot of activity in the Bungalow on 15 April 1993. He heard that a young ex-HVO soldier,

Zoran [anti}, stated that he heard that Vladimir [anti} had said, before the attack of 16 April 1993, that no men from 12 to 70 years of age should be left alive during the attack.[201]

168. Witness I noticed the signs of an imminent attack on 13-15 April 1993. On 13 April 1993, he was stopped and provoked by men in uniform, who would not let him go home. He was called into a bar by Nikica Plavci} who threatened him with a knife and then tried to shoot at him with an automatic rifle.[202]

169. Witness L described how, on 15 April 1993, he was working in Zume, in the direction of [anti}i. He passed by the Sutre shop of Vlatko Kupre{ki}, between 4 p.m. and 7 p.m. that evening, where he saw Ivica Kupre{ki}, Vlatko Kupre{ki} and two other men who he did not know standing outside the shop. As he passed by Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house that evening, the witness saw 20 to 30 uniformed soldiers on his lower balcony.

170. Witness M referred to the fact that on 15 April 1993, she saw 5-6 soldiers going into the basement of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[203]

171. On 15 April 1993, Witness O went to Zume, where he saw an anti-aircraft gun covered by tarpaulin. He also saw 5-6 soldiers in front of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.

172. Witness T related how, on 15 April 1993, her husband was in Stari Vitez. That evening he made a telephone call to the wife of her husband's uncle to find out about the situation in Ahmi}i, because in Vitez the Croats were arresting Muslims and taking them away. He passed the message to his family that they should not go anywhere out of the house and to take care. He also asked whether they had noticed anything. Witness T said

And he told me, "This is what is going to happen to your neighbours, and as you worked at my brother's, you and your children will not be touched". I got up. I saw what the situation was. I never experienced anything like that before, and I started for the exit door. He pointed an automatic rifle at me, and I thought, "This is the end". He pulled the trigger, but, fortunately for me, there was no bullet in it, and I went out".

that it was the only night which was so quiet that nothing could be heard. By contrast, on every other night shooting could be heard, but not on that particular night.[204]

173. Witness V recounted how his suspicions were aroused on 15 April 1993, when, around 5 p.m., he saw a group of approximately ten soldiers wearing camouflage uniforms and with weapons, as well as two civilians, between the houses of Zoran Kupre{ki} and Ivica Kupre{ki}. The witness did not, however, see Zoran or Mirjan Kupre{ki}.[205]

174. Witness X on one occasion saw Croat soldiers in Ahmi}i. When she asked where they were going, they replied, "We're going to Busovača, to take care of the balijas there".[206] On 15 April 1993, a Croat came and urinated on her fence and laughed at her family.[207]

175. Witness Y did not notice anything on 15 April 1993, but Nermin Kermo and Suad Ahmi} came to his place and said that they had noticed a large number of HVO soldiers in uniform around the Kupre{ki} houses and that as a result they had decided to double the night patrols to four men.[208]

176. Witness CA testified that, on 15 April 1993, she was drinking coffee with her husband at 3.30 p.m., and watching a television programme on which Dario Kordi} and Tihomir Bla{ki} were saying that their combatants had been attacked in the Bungalow, that there would be no more negotiations and that they "had only to wait for the order". Her son came to her house at 9 p.m., and said that Vitez television was showing the same provocative material.[209]

177. Witness F noticed certain unusual and disturbing events on 15 April 1993. His Croat friends did not come to play football as usual that evening. He also saw Ivo Papi} leaving Ahmi}i with some women in a red Lada and Ivica Kupre{ki} leaving Ahmi}i with his wife and children at 4-5 p.m., on 15 April 1993.[210] Witness G said that many students, mostly Croatian, were not at school on 15 April 1993. That day he also overheard his parents saying that vehicles were constantly coming and going from the Papi} house.[211] Some Croats hinted to their Muslim neighbours of what lay ahead. Witness EE, for example, related how, before 16 April 1993, Drago Josipovi} had said to Fahrudin Ahmi}, "Pity about these two houses down here", indicating the witness's houses and thereby displaying that he knew in advance of the attack and that he knew that it would involve the unnecessary destruction of civilian dwellings.[212]

178. Witness Z described an ominous atmosphere on 15 April 1993:

> "FOğn the 15th of April [...] The silence was unbearable. One cannot describe it, this atmosphere, the way it was, as if there were no birds around. You could only hear a car or two pass by. F...ğ We were all tense. We were all nervous. We were all afraid as to what would happen, what would not happen, whether there would be a war, whether there would not be a war. No one trusted anyone anymore".[213]

The witness went to bed in uniform around 2 a.m.

179. Witness FF noticed that on the evening of 15 April 1993, there were no lights in the Croat houses, which was unusual. The Muslim houses were lit as usual.[214]

[215] The factual descriptions which follow are restatements of what the witnesses testified. Even though some of them may be phrased in the indicative, only the Trial Chamber's findings are relevant as to the facts underlying the judgement.

180. Lt.-Col. Bryan Watters stated that the attack on Ahmi}i seemed to be part of a pre-emptive attack by Croat forces up and down the La{va River Valley against Muslim civilians and Muslim forces, which proved to be very successful as it took the Bosniacs completely by surprise.[216] The witness was in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 and was an eye-witness to the total destruction of the village and the massacre of civilians. In particular, he saw the bodies of 20-30 men, women and children on the roads, in the fields and outside the houses, including in an area across from the Catholic cemetery which BRITBAT designated as "the killing field" due to the number of bodies found there. He also saw 4-5 bodies placed nearby in a neat line by the road, as he drove towards the Busovača junction.[217] Lt.-Col. Watters noticed that despite the almost total destruction of the village of Ahmi}i, the Croat houses had been left untouched. By contrast, the Muslim houses had been "systematically destroyed"; the inhabitants killed and the houses then burned. Not only had the people and houses been destroyed but also crops, animals, etc. The witness concluded that, without a doubt, what had happened was a systematic and organised attempt to "ethnically cleanse" the village.[218] Lt.-Col. Watters also noticed the destruction of the two mosques in Ahmi}i in the lower and upper parts of the village.[219] Lt.-Col. Watters averred that Ahmi}i was not a military target; [220] there were no barracks or military installations in the village. In spite of this, the village was attacked with an arsenal of heavy weaponry, including at least one anti-aircraft weapon.[221] Lt-Col. Watters concluded that the significance of Ahmi}i was more symbolic than real, and lay within its tradition of producing a great number of Muslim leaders or Imams and teachers in Bosnia.[222]

181. Payam Akhavan, an international human rights lawyer who at the time was working for the United Nations Centre for Human Rights, now a Legal Adviser in the Office of the Prosecutor of this Tribunal, was in Ahmi}i on 1, 2 and 6 May 1993 as part of an investigative team, with witness HH, to compile information for a report of the Special Rapporteur on Human Rights, Tadeusz Mazowiecki. Akhavan spoke of the degree of destruction inflicted upon Ahmi}i as "total and all-embracing":

> "I believe that from approximately 150 to 200 homes in the village, there were fewer than 20 which had not been destroyed. The scale of destruction was extensive, there were homes which some 2 weeks after the attack ... were still smouldering. And there was also a real -- what would I describe as a smell of death really in the village. One could sense that there were still many bodies which had not been recovered from underneath the rubble. There was virtually not a living creature in the village. Even dogs and cats and cattle had been killed and were lying all over the roads. So I think on the whole, what struck me was the total and all-embracing form of the destruction of this village and its inhabitants".[223]

182. Payam Akhavan also visited the "killing field" described by Lt.-Col. Watters, which lay across the road from the Catholic cemetery and where the bodies of some 20 civilians had been found who had apparently been killed on the spot. He also noticed what appeared to be a sniper's nest with spent cases strewn about. Akhavan inspected various houses in Ahmi}i. On average, he found 30-50 shell casings in the vicinity of each destroyed home, as well as spent casings of anti-aircraft guns and casings of grenade launchers. He also found broken bottles that had apparently been used to carry gasoline or another flammable liquid for setting homes on fire. He concluded on the basis of the extensive incendiary damage that the houses had been deliberately set on fire, since the houses showed signs of small arms fire, not of heavy artillery, which would not in themselves spark a fire. Akhavan, and his colleague Witness HH, spoke to various survivors in Zenica of the attack on Ahmi}i and heard their stories of "ethnic cleansing". The survivors recounted that the attackers had been soldiers in HVO uniforms. When he tried to speak to Croatian inhabitants of Ahmi}i, however, Akhavan and his group came under sniper fire. Subsequently, in order to hear the explanation of the Bosnian Croat authorities, Akhavan met the military and political leaders of the Bosnian Croat community - Tihomir Bla{ki}, Mario Čerkez and Dario Kordi} – who admitted to being in control of the area, but denied responsibility for the attack on Ahmi}i, claiming that the attack had been committed by the Serbs or by the Muslims themselves in order to attract international sympathy. Since Ahmi}i was only 4 kilometres from the HVO military Headquarters in Vitez, however, Akhavan concluded it was not the Serbs or the Muslims who had carried out the assault, but the HVO.

183. Akhavan shared the view of Lt.-Col. Watters that Ahmi}i was not a military target but an undefended village and that the civilian inhabitants who were victims of the attack offered no military resistance. The attack on Ahmi}i lasted only one day, with the take-over and destruction completed on 16 April 1993. The exact number of victims was impossible to determine with certainty since many bodies could not be recovered from the rubble due to the danger of unexploded mines and booby-traps. Three hundred of the original Muslim inhabitants were still missing and in addition to these locals there had also been a large number of refugees in Ahmi}i on the day of the attack who had yet to be accounted for. Akhavan stated in cross-examination that although there were atrocities against Croats, for instance the beheading of a Croat in Mileti}i apparently committed as a reprisal for Ahmi}i by rogue Mujahedin, looking at central Bosnia as a whole, the Muslims were disproportionately victimised. There was a climate of fear and terror in the region that everyone experienced, but allegations of large-scale atrocities committed against Croats, for example in Zenica, were not credible at the time.[224] The attack on Ahmi}i was part of a pattern, according to Akhavan, namely that of establishing control by means of "ethnic cleansing" and there had been simultaneous and concerted attacks on Ahmi}i and surrounding villages.

184. Witness HH was at the time working at the United Nations Centre for Human Rights in Geneva and was fluent in Bosnian/Croatian/Serbian. The witness visited Ahmi}i on 2 May 1993 with BRITBAT. He saw that most of the homes in Ahmi}i were destroyed, except for what he was told were Croat homes. He and Akhavan attempted to speak to a woman with two children but they were shot at and fled. One soldier was wounded in this incident. Witness HH investigated one incident in particular, namely the attack on the house of Witness KL. Witness HH was told that he would find bodies at KL's house,[225] which he visited with BRITBAT. The house was gutted by fire and there were human remains – a charred backbone and other fragments that appeared to be human.[226]

185. Captain Charles Stevens, who was in central Bosnia from November 1992 to May 1993, provided personal security to Colonel Bob Stewart, the commander of BRITBAT. Captain Stevens accompanied Col. Stewart to Ahmi}i on three occasions at the end of April and early May 1993. The first visit took place on or around 17 April 1993. As BRITBAT arrived in Ahmi}i, the place was totally devastated, to an extent which was worse than the witness had hitherto seen elsewhere in central Bosnia. The minaret of the mosque had been destroyed by explosive charges which had been placed at its base in such a way as to cause it to fall onto and damage the mosque. There was no sign of life in Ahmi}i at all. As Captain Stevens moved up towards Upper Ahmi}i, where there were some fires still burning and some smouldering. Around the houses there were, in general, a large number of spent AK-47 cases. In the doorway of one house, he found two burnt bodies, one of a man and one that appeared to be a child.[227] On further investigation, he found the bodies of at least two other adults and a number of children in the cellar of the building.

186. During this visit, Captain Stevens met someone called "Dragan", who was armed with an AK-47 and who, by means of sign language and by drawing with a stick in the sand, intimated proudly that he, or he and his friends, had killed thirty-two Muslims.

"Dragan" wore a camouflage jacket and darker civilian trousers, and was clean-shaven. The witness could not conclude whether "Dragan" claimed to have killed the thirty-two Muslims in Ahmi}i or elsewhere, for example, on the battlefield.

187. The next day, the witness went back to Ahmi}i in the light of reports that BRITBAT had received from people who had fled. Captain Stevens went to Witness KL's house. The building was totally gutted, fire damage having destroyed the roof. There were red tiles covering the floor, charred wooden beams, and the witness saw the burnt upper body of an adult, and further back in the room, on the other side, what appeared to be the body of a smaller person, perhaps a child.[228] Overall, Captain Stevens got the impression of a pure "ethnic cleansing" operation having taken place in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993.[229]

188. Corporal Skillen, a member of the British army who was based in Vitez as a United Nations peacekeeper from November 1992 to May 1993, went to Ahmi}i twice on or around 22 April 1993 when he heard rumours of killings. The witness noticed the fallen minaret of one of the Ahmi}i mosques. He saw that the majority of the houses in Ahmi}i were totally destroyed or damaged beyond repair. Corporal Skillen visited one house, slightly above the mosque, which contained burnt bodies. On the outside of the house were two burnt bodies, one small[230] and one large male.[231] Downstairs there were the burnt corpses apparently of one adult and two small humans, the gender of which could not be determined due to the carbonisation of the bodies.[232] The whole cellar of the house was burnt and the windows smashed. Based on his expertise, the witness thought that the damage had been caused by a blast. The only people whom Corporal Skillen saw alive in Ahmi}i that day were a woman and a small child, sitting on the balcony of a house which stood out because it had sustained no damage at all, although the house was surrounded by buildings which had been destroyed. The woman and child were acting as if everything was normal and they were ignoring UNPROFOR. They did not ask for any assistance. The witness identified the house from photographs as Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[233] Passing the same house later, Corporal Skillen noticed two males in their mid-twenties, in matching uniform, casually passing the time of day. Corporal Skillen considered that the operation on Ahmi}i of 16 April 1993 transgressed all the principles and rules of warfare.[234]

189. Mr. Kujawinski, a Non-Commissioned Officer in the British Army was stationed in Vitez from November 1992 to April/May 1993 as a Platoon Sergeant in charge of a platoon equipped with four Warrior armoured fighting vehicles. He was sent to Ahmi}i on the afternoon of 16 April 1993, around 2.40 p.m. His mission was to recover a broken-down "Scimitar" (a light-weight vehicle used for reconnaissance). He saw palls of smoke from the turn-off to the mountain road to Zenica and many houses destroyed or on fire. Women and children who appeared to be dead were lying out in the open. He saw about 13 bodies. Then as he passed the cemetery, a woman, whom he later evacuated, jumped out with her hands in an imploring gesture. Kujawinski then went up past the Bungalow where he saw many soldiers, more than he had hitherto seen in one group during his tour in Bosnia. He estimated it was a company group, i.e. 100 soldiers. Everyone was dressed in very dark uniforms. They also bore an insignia which he was unable to identify – a red, white and blue shield, with an arch across the top - which he did not recognise as an HVO patch. He only recalled seeing that one unidentifiable patch that day. The soldiers had a lot of weapons and were very joyful, drinking beer and waving their weapons in the air as if to toast or celebrate what had happened. The witness "put one and one together" and concluded that these soldiers, who were 400-500 metres from the scenes of recent killings of women and children and of the destruction of the houses which he had just seen, had committed those acts.

190. The witness carried a camera everywhere with him and took photographs.[235] From the Bungalow, the witness drove through Ahmi}i, noticing dead cattle on the way and finding the broken-down Scimitar. At this point he could hear gunfire behind his soldiers and could see cattle being shot in a cruel manner in the fields. The witness towed the Scimitar back to the garage, and then returned to the village to rescue four women and a child, and in the event picked up 13 women and 2 children. Another vehicle accompanying him also collected a number of people with their belongings, including one man in civilian clothes who crawled out from behind a chained fence and boarded the vehicle. The witness did not hear shots at that time. He took the refugees to Travnik Hospital. The witness concluded that there had not been two sides to the conflict in Ahmi}i that day - merely one group of soldiers at the Bungalow and no defences in the village. The witness did not see any men in uniform or armed in Ahmi}i that day, neither of the HVO nor of the BiH army.

191. Major Michael Dooley, UNPROFOR Platoon Commander in Bosnia, testified that he went to Ahmi}i to investigate the situation there around noon on 16 April 1993. He led four armoured vehicles into the village. He saw many dead people by the side of the road and no signs of life, much less of resistance. Occasional shots were to be heard, which Major Dooley determined, on further passes through the village, represented a one-sided shooting into the village, rather than fighting between two sides. Major Dooley further ascertained that, despite the absence of any armed resistance, an anti-aircraft gun appeared to have been used in the attack: he saw large holes in the buildings from 0.5 calibre fire and 0.5 calibre shells, which is the calibre used by either a light anti-aircraft gun or the heaviest automatic fire.

192. As Major Dooley and his armoured vehicles continued to move through the village, the shooting around them intensified. Major Dooley and his soldiers themselves came under fire. He also saw ten HVO soldiers, lying in a ravine, who looked like a

"cut-off" group.[236] Major Dooley and his troops collected some twenty bodies in the three passes, but they saw many more dead, perhaps as many as fifty, who were civilian men and women, and included elderly persons, who appeared to have been shot at close range.[237] He considered that the initial attack was over by the time he arrived at noon. In his opinion, the assault on Ahmi}i was a very well coordinated attack by the Croats, executed by someone with a good grasp of military tactics.

193. The witness denied that there was any resistance by the Muslims in Ahmi}i. He did not see any BiH army soldiers in Ahmi}i, only Croat soldiers, and the victims he saw were all civilians, without weapons by their bodies. The witness conceded that he knew from Northern Ireland that terrorists could wear civilian clothes, but in these circumstances he believed the victims were not soldiers in civilian clothes because many had no shoes and none had any weapons besides them.

194. Under cross-examination, the witness admitted that it was strategically important to control the road to Travnik which cut through Ahmi}i. There were Mujahedin trying to get to Travnik; therefore it was important to the Croats to cut them off. Ethnically, the region was "like a dart-board – enclave followed by enclave". The witness admitted that it was a legitimate military tactic to cut the opponent's lines of communication to stop reinforcement. He also agreed that surprise is always condoned in warfare; "surprise is the name of the game".

[237] T. 2481–2482: "A. The ones that we collected were male and female. All of them were in their civilian clothes. ... I saw no children killed, but there were certainly male and female, and quite a few older people. Q. Did you see any weapons close to those bodies? A. They were all civilians. And perhaps an important point to note here was that the number of bullet wounds in each of the victims was great, which would suggest to me that the shooting was from a very close proximity". - When challenged on this last point under cross-examination, T. 2500, the witness clarified: "A. ... Obviously a great deal of our training is shooting at wooden targets and so you get a feel for grouping for shooting. These victims all had maybe half a dozen rounds in each and the bullet wounds were maybe two to three inches apart straddling their bodies. Now, to get such a grouping in one area as a line, you would have to be very close, and I would say "very close" would be maybe within ten feet of them. You'd be very close, as close as maybe you and I are together, in order to do that".

195. Major Woolley was deployed to Bosnia in November 1992 as a British army captain with UNPROFOR. During his stay in Bosnia, Major Woolley was mostly based in Vitez. On the morning of 16 April 1993, he was informed by a colleague that Vitez was a battle zone and that there were dead civilians and soldiers in the streets. Up until then, there had been nothing which indicated a Muslim-Croat conflict. He was despatched to Ahmi}i, with 2 Scimitars and a Warrior. He arrived at the village at around 11.30 a.m., and saw plumes and pillars of smoke.[238] He did not form an impression of what had happened until he spoke to a survivor, a Muslim woman, in a Muslim house by the lower mosque.[239] From what she told Major Woolley and from what hehad seen, he gathered that there had been a Croat offensive, starting around 6 a.m. Major Woolley saw an injured man who had suffered a gunshot wound to the back and elbow and who had lost a lot of blood. He spoke to survivors in one house. The people were all old women and children, in a state of shock, panic and fear. Major Woolley administered first-aid, and then went up the road. He saw that about 20% of the houses were burning, while the road and entire area appeared to be deserted. He did not see any military activity until he reached location II on Exhibit P229, where he saw soldiers dressed in green and carrying Kalashnikovs, whom he assumed belonged to the HVO because of their positioning outside the village.

196. Major Woolley then went into house no. 2 on Exhibit P229, where he saw a woman on a makeshift stretcher. She had a head wound evidently inflicted by a gunshot. He dressed the wound but she died. The other persons in the house were in great distress. The witness then went to the house belonging to Nermin Kermo where some thirty people were gathered:

> "The cellar was very dark, there was no lighting. There was an awful smell generally of, I suppose, wounds, and there was also smoke from people smoking. There were people crying, there was a woman breastfeeding, there were elderly people, women and children, and there was about up to 30 people probably in the cellar, five of whom had significant injuries".[240]

[238] See Exhibit P229, showing six points of interest in Major Woolley's tour of Ahmi}i: two burnt out houses (points a & b), the point where he rescued five casualties (at IV), and the point where he picked up five dead bodies (at VI).
[239] Point I – House 14 – on Exhibit P229.

197. There was a wounded 12 or 13 year old girl, two elderly men and some other wounded, all in civilian clothing. All were very scared and in shock. None of the men in the cellar had weapons. The most severely wounded were evacuated in the Warrior, while the others stayed in the house.[241] At one point, Major Woolley saw a wooden barn burning which he estimated had been set on fire around 3 p.m. A photograph taken by the witness[242] shows the minaret of the mosque still intact at 3 p.m., on 16 April 1993, which supports the conclusion that the minaret had been deliberately dynamited after and not during the morning offensive.

198. Based on his own observations, on the report of a woman in the village, and on the fact that "most deliberate offensives conducted by military men are done at dawn, because that's the time when the people are at least alertness, probably in their beds," Major Woolley believed that the attack on Ahmi}i was a dawn raid. He also confirmed that the dead bodies he found were all civilians. For example, at location VI on his map, he found five civilian bodies, which included elderly persons, who had died from multiple wounds.[243] These dead bodies were not in uniform, nor "mixed dress", i.e. with one or two items of uniform, which the witness was accustomed to seeing on Bosnian soldiers. Nor were there any guns anywhere near any of the victims. Moreover, each victim appeared to have sustained more than one gunshot wound, one looking as if he had been shot with automatic fire. Besides these evacuations, Major Woolley affirmed that he had picked-up many other bodies. Major Woolley's conclusion was that what happened in Ahmi}i was not a military operation but a "slaughter".[244]

(ii) Bosnian Muslim Eye-witnesses

199. The Chamber heard evidence from more than thirty-five Bosnian Muslims, former inhabitants of Ahmi}i who were victims of the attack of 16 April 1993. Their testimony, while each describing separate tragedies and losses, converges on the major points of the offensive and tells one coherent story. In general, witnesses were awoken around dawn, between 5 a.m. – 5.30 a.m., on 16 April 1993 by the sound of loud detonations followed by gunfire, often in the immediate vicinity of the witness's house. The witness would typically look out the window and see houses burning – notably the house of Witness KL which seems to be one of the first set alight – and HVO soldiers running around in camouflage uniforms and with heavy weapons. A common description was that bullets were flying everywhere and many witnesses testify that an anti-aircraft gun was used in the attack. The victims either managed to flee or were forced out of their houses by heavily armed HVO soldiers, often using insulting and threatening language, who would then proceed systematically to burn down the house, barns or any other outbuildings, killing the livestock in the process. At this point, many witnesses lost family members, who were either killed at close range by the soldiers in or around their houses, or gunned down as they ran from house to house. Those who survived either fled to the upper village and thence to Vrhovine and then Travnik or Zenica, or were rescued by UNPROFOR or collected by local Croats and deported to Dubravica School, where the Bosnian Croats ran a camp for Bosniac refugees. At Dubravica School, persons were mistreated, and there were accounts of rape and of refugees being used to dig trenches at the front lines.

[244] Major Woolley, T. 3554: "...whether there had been any soldiers in this village at all, [...] at the end of the day, these houses, these civilian houses, had been burnt down, were on fire - these were not houses that had any signs of being defended by soldiers or had any fortifications - and I think when you see 12 year old girls with bullet wounds and even men who could fight with gunshot wounds in their backs or women with gunshot wounds in their heads, it tells me that this is a slaughter of civilians".

200. The witnesses' accounts also agree on this point: that the conflict on 16 April 1993 was a one-sided offensive by heavily-armed HVO soldiers or paramilitaries against mostly unarmed civilian men, women and children. The witnesses all agree that there was no Bosnian Army in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993, that the village was undefended and that the only defence which took place that day were some gunshots from 2 or 3 Bosniacs around Nermin Kermo's house to defend that house and, more importantly, the many refugees in the basement, from massacre.

201. Abdulah Ahmi} was awakened before dawn by loud detonations which went on for approximately 15 minutes.[245] He heard one extremely loud detonation which possibly killed his brother, Muris, outside their house. Then his father and he were led out of their house by Bosnian Croat soldiers and shot at point-blank range, following a repeated command by one soldier to another to carry out his orders. The witness's father died – the witness saw his father's brains blown out before his eyes - but the witness himself miraculously survived when the bullet entered one cheek and passed out the other side.

202. The witness stated that both he and his father were wearing civilian clothes at the time and were clearly not soldiers. The Bosnian Croat soldiers who shot them were well-armed, with automatic rifles and bullet-proof vests. The witness and his father offered no resistance at all.

203. After being shot, Abdulah Ahmi} played dead, and then ran off and hid, semi-submerged, in a river under a bridge. From that position, he saw HVO forces being deployed in accordance with what appeared to be a plan, with 80-100 men moving in from the north side and 50-60 men from the south side. The witness saw both HV (army of the Republic of Croatia) and HVO soldiers among these men.

204. Subsequently, Abdulah Ahmi} left his position under the bridge and hid in a house, where he was attacked with a grenade which a soldier threw into the house. The witness was eventually rescued by Ivo Papi} and then taken to Dubravica school. While he was held in the Dubravica school, some Bosniac men were killed and he heard rumours of Bosniac women being raped.

205. The witness lost his father, mother and 3 sisters, who were 24, 23 and 16 years old.

206. Witness A was also a refugee in Ahmi}i, who had been driven away from Fo~a,[246] in eastern Bosnia, by the Serbs. He heard explosions and bombs and bullets flying about. Then he heard a loud banging on the door of his house. Soldiers entered, who were heavily armed and wearing camouflage uniforms, with painted faces and ribbons on their sleeves., A soldier asked Witness A's brother-in-law how old he was and left him alone when he replied that he was only fourteen years old. The soldiers, however, took the witness, who was older, with them.

207. As Witness A left the house, he saw houses burning and heard non-Muslims taunting dispossessed Bosniacs, saying that the "Balijas" were "burning down their own houses". The witness was made to put on a uniform and to walk ahead of a soldier who was wearing a Jokers patch. As he walked along, the witness saw five bodies lying against a fence: his father, the Paca family – a father and two sons - and a refugee from Zenica.[247] Witness A himself was, however, spared. He was told to identify the Croat houses and the Muslim houses, for the purposes of their selective destruction.[248]

208. Witness B testified that he heard a loud explosion and falling shells from 6 a.m. onwards. He saw HVO troops shooting, killing, and torching houses. The witness saw the slogan "48 hours of ashes" written by Croats as graffiti on the fallen minaret shown in Exhibit P66, and elsewhere.[249] He testified that the BiH army was not in the La{va River Valley at all on 16 April 1993. There were no Bosniac military units, because they were all away fighting the Serbs, nor were there any Bosniac civilian police.

[247] These bodies were shown in the photographic exhibits, Exhibits P53-56.

209. Witness C was 13 years old in April 1993 and lived in the lower part of Ahmi}i with his family, two boys, two girls and his mother and father. The witness and his brother were woken by the sound of gunfire. Bullets broke the window of their room and plaster fell on them. The family took refuge in the larder. Soldiers then came into the front yard and set everything on fire, including the stable where the family cow and sheep lived. A soldier then entered the house. He was wearing a Jokers patch, and the HVO insignia with checkerboard flag and a "U" for Usta{a. The soldier took the witness's brother to the balcony of the house. The witness then heard 3-4 gunshots being fired. Next the witness was taken out to the balcony with his mother and told to jump, whereupon he saw his dead brother on the ground below the balcony. The witness jumped next to his dead brother and then ran off. As he ran away, the witness saw a soldier trying to force the mother to jump by threatening her with a knife. Other soldiers in camouflage uniforms stood below the balcony, armed with knives and guns, and laughed and shouted, "Jump, jump" at the witness's mother.[250] As the witness ran towards the road, shots were fired at him, but he survived by zig-zagging and thus managed to reach the road where he was rescued by a man driving a Lada and was subsequently helped to flee by a Croat called Jozo.

210. Witness D, witness C's mother, said that the first thing she heard was bullets whizzing into her house. She fled to the larder. She then heard someone in the yard saying, "Burn everything here". The stable was set alight, and the animals burnt alive. Soldiers then entered the house and made her elder son jump from the balcony and shot him dead in the process. The soldiers then tried to make the witness jump, using the insulting term, "Balija", shouting "Jump, balija, jump!" A gun was put to her temple to force her to jump onto her murdered son and the soldiers were "laughing as if they were having fun".[251] She told the soldiers to kill her there and then, if they were going to kill her as she was not able to jump. However, the soldiers did not shoot her.

211. Among her family members, the witness's husband was shot in the shoulder and one son was murdered. Her daughter was slapped with a Koran and later was in a state of shock, trembling and covered in sweat. The soldiers looted the witness's house and shouted at her family, "Give me your money!" and "If I find more money, I'll cut you into pieces!"[252] Later the witness managed to escape to the Upper Ahmi}i with her daughter. Witness D did not see a single armed Muslim in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993.

212. Fahrudin Ahmi} testified that he awoke to the sound of gunfire. Shells were falling and all kinds of weapons were being fired. As he ran from his house, he was shot. Women and children were with him when he was shot, and thus also in the line of fire. The witness went into a house where UNPROFOR administered first-aid to him, but he was not taken to hospital because UNPROFOR said that the Croatian army had ordered that no-one was to be helped.[253] Shortly after UNPROFOR left, the house was nearly set on fire by incendiary bullets. The injury sustained by the witness was very serious: his hand was almost blown off and he remained in intense pain for months. He still has severe problems with his arm.

213. Fahrudin Ahmi}, like all the other victims of the attack who testified before the Trial Chamber, testified that he was not in uniform, nor had he any weapon with him; he had never possessed a weapon. The witness did not hear of any Croatian soldier being killed on 16 April 1993. He affirmed that there was neither a BiH army presence in Ahmi}i in April 1993, nor any Bosniac combat lines. The Croats, on the other hand, were well organised.

214. Witness E was 15 years old in 1993 and a refugee from Travnik. He was woken by shooting at 5.50 a.m. Soldiers threw grenades into his house, whereupon he left the house with his mother, sister and father, seeing two dead bodies as he emerged. He and his family members were told by soldiers to put their hands up and to keep their heads bowed. The witness then saw a further two dead bodies. The soldiers whom the witness saw were in camouflage uniforms, with automatic rifles and anti-tank rocket launchers. The witness's father, an elderly man, was called out of the line as they walked along and the witness never saw him again. The witness then saw another two soldiers, one wearing a balaclava, the other with his face painted black and both in camouflage uniforms. The soldiers had Military Police insignia. The witness walked very slowly with his mother and sister amidst heavy shooting from both sides, and from Croatian houses, to Upper Ahmi}i, from where they were later evacuated with women and children to Zenica.

215. Witness F was 14 years old in 1993, and lived in Ahmi}i with his 4-year-old sister, 8-year-old brother and his mother. Witness F lost his mother and brother. On that morning, he was awakened by heavy shooting. A grenade was thrown into the house. His mother tried to throw the grenade back but it exploded in her hand, blowing off her arm and at the same time killing the witness's brother. Another grenade was then thrown in which exploded and injured the witness in the lower part of his body, followed by a third grenade. Next, a soldier came in, dressed in a camouflage uniform and with his face painted black, carrying an automatic rifle and a rocket launcher on his back. The soldier had an orange armband, which was identified through Exhibit P103 as HVO insignia.[254] This soldier asked Witness F where his father was. Explosions erupted upstairs and the witness and his family hid in the pantry. The witness's mother was then hit by a bullet in the stomach. The family fled to the barn, with the witness carrying his dead brother and his sister. His mother joined them in the barn and died there some fifteen minutes later. The witness passed out in the barn, which was set on fire by soldiers.

[254] Witness F, T. 1388–1389. These were identified via Exhibit P103 (HV insignia), Exhibit P104 (HVO insignia), and Exhibit P118 (Vitezovi insignia). The witness recalled the Jokers insignia on soldiers in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993, although not necessarily in the form of Exhibit P45.

216. While the witness was in the barn, he heard a soldier outside saying that they had killed everyone in Lower Ahmi}i (around the lower mosque) and that they should move to the upper mosque. The soldiers saw the witness and his sister in the barn, next to the corpses of his brother and mother. The soldiers threw in a grenade to kill the livestock; they threw a grenade under the cow and then killed it with a rifle. The soldiers also killed a lamb. The witness testified that the soldiers were using a radio or mobitel to stay in touch with each other.

217. The witness sustained 18 injuries from the three grenades, including shrapnel wounds all over his body.

218. Later the witness returned to his house and collected some food and clothes. As he left, he saw Melissa Zec, a young child, lying next to her dead mother. She refused to leave her mother's side. Witness F also saw the body of Husein Ahmi} lying in his backyard. Witness F tried to go to Upper Ahmi}i, but he was turned back by a large group of soldiers with Jokers insignia, camouflage uniforms and automatic rifles, who said, "You cannot go up there. [The] HVO is up there. They don't distinguish between women, children and men. They kill everyone". Later, walking through the woods, he saw the dead body of Fata Pezer. The witness was taken to Dubravica school with his sister and Melissa Zec. There he saw HOS and other HVO soldiers. In the school, the witness saw Dzemila Ahmi} who was taken out and came back an hour later crying and saying she had been raped. Like other witnesses, Witness F did not see or hear of any Bosniac line of defence. If any such line existed, the witness said, it was a spontaneous defence – people standing before their homes to defend their families.

219. Witness G was thirteen years old in April 1993 and lived in Lower Ahmi}i with his father, mother and two sisters. The witness and his family were all asleep when they were woken by heavy fire, explosions, and bullets coming through the windows of their rooms and through the roof tiles. The witness heard his parents running down the hallway yelling, "Children, get up and get dressed!" The whole family ran downstairs to avoid the bullets coming through the ceiling. They went into a little room on the ground floor. An incendiary bullet then hit the house, but his mother managed to extinguish the fire. His father then said that they should go to the next-door neighbours' house. His father was unarmed and the whole family was in civilian clothes.

220. Witness G's family left the house one-by-one, with the witness in front. The witness ran towards their barn and some other houses. He heard a very loud burst of gunfire as he ran. He saw a neighbour, Zahir, lying dead in his garden, in civilian clothes – possibly in pyjamas - and a soldier in camouflage uniform and with insignia, and his face painted black, standing over Zahir with a rifle.

221. The witness next saw three soldiers wearing camouflage clothing and carrying rucksacks who were shooting at the upper village. These soldiers had insignia, possibly of the HV. The witness also saw Dragan Papi} standing with a rifle. The soldiers told the witness to run back and as he turned to run, they shot him in the back of the legs and he fell. He could see his parents and sisters running from the house.[255] His father, mother and elder sister were all killed.

222. The witness lay where he was and played dead all day. During that time he heard several explosions and sounds of attack and saw soldiers in camouflage uniforms, with rifles and rucksacks, passing by, including Dragan Papi}. He noticed insignia of the Vitezovi, the Jokers, the HVO and the HV. Some soldiers were in black uniforms. None of the soldiers tried to assist the witness, his parents or his sisters. While lying there, among other things, the witness saw two soldiers setting a house on fire and heard female screams and other sounds of people being killed, some of whom, he subsequently discovered, were his relatives. He saw a man killed in cold blood at close range, after his wife, son and daughter had been told to walk away. This happened right in front of the [255] T. 1469-1470. "As I fell, my parents had more or less reached these spots marked with the Xs, and my father spotted this soldier who was next to Zahir's house, who had come out to the corner of Zahir's house. He spotted him and these other soldiers, and he said, "Men, what are you doing? Let me pass. Let the women and the children pass and kill me". However, one of these who had shot at me who were behind my back ordered three times this person, this soldier who was there, to shoot at them, and he said, "Kill them. Kill them. Kill them". And he cursed at him, as if saying, "What are you waiting for?" And he fired two short bursts of fire, and my parents fell. I just managed to raise myself on my elbow, after which I fell to the ground altogether and stayed there immobile. I was conscious but I wasn't quite all there. Q. Did you see what happened to your sisters? A. Yes, I could see that they just fell together with my parents, and they were all on the ground. They were all lying down.

witness. The witness saw incendiary bullets being shot at a Bosniac, Hidajet's, house, which set it on fire. That night Witness G saw about 30 soldiers. The soldiers set Elvir's house on fire. On the radio he heard the soldiers saying: "How are you doing in Piri}i? Do you need any assistance? There's plenty of us over here", and then, "Please send us explosives for the lower mosque in Ahmi}i".[256]

223. When the soldiers had gone, the witness staggered over to a barn where he lost consciousness. He was woken by a powerful explosion which he believed was the mosque being blown up. The witness then went into another smouldering house – Elvir's - and collapsed there. According to his watch, he spent two days and two nights on the landing of the house, unconscious, and stayed in the house seven days in total, leaving on the eighth day. While in the house, he survived on water from a pipe and some marmalade. From the house he could see several bodies, including the bodies of his father, mother and older sister (the witness's little sister had disappeared but had not, in fact, been killed as the witness had believed), and the bodies of two others whom he believes were refugees. From his vantage point in Elvir's house, the witness also saw the Croatian families coming back to Ahmi}i after the assault with their livestock and belongings and continuing to live normal lives among the carnage as if nothing had happened. The witness could see that the Muslim houses had been destroyed while the Croat houses remained intact. The witness was finally rescued by UNPROFOR on the eighth day following the attack on Ahmi}i, and he was later reunited with his only surviving family member, his youngest sister.

224. Witness H was thirteen years old in April 1993 and belonged to a family of five, comprising herself, her father, mother, and two twin sisters who were five years old at the time. The witness was a next-door neighbour of Zoran, Mirjan and Vlatko Kupre{ki}.

225. Between 5.15 - 5.30 a.m., the witness was woken by a burst of gunfire which shattered the glass of the children's room. Her parents told her to go down into the basement, which was a shelter in which they had previously hidden during air-raids by the Serbs in 1992. From the shelter, the witness heard people running about in their house. Two grenades detonated; one in the kitchen and one in the living-room. The witness heard voices in front of the garage, telling her father to open the door. The witness thought the voices were friends wanting to enter the shelter, because they had fine relations with their neighbours, so she told her father to open the door. Her father went to open up the garage door. As he did so, there was a burst of gunfire in the hallway and a scream. The voices outside then said "Balija, come out", and her father started crying, saying "Please don't kill me". She then heard a burst of gunfire. The lid of the basement was then lifted and a voice said, "Is there anyone down there?" The witness replied, "Yes, me and my sisters".

226. Besides the Kupre{ki} brothers, there were three other soldiers, one of whom began to set the witness's house on fire by pouring petrol and setting it alight with a match while another soldier was looking through their closets. The witness got on her knees, begging Zoran Kupre{ki} for mercy. She tried to put the fire out but was abruptly ordered to stop and sent out of the house. As the witness left the house, she had to step over the corpse of Meho Hrustanovi}, a neighbour, who had been killed. She saw blood on his chest and realised that he had been killed by gunfire. The witness also saw the corpse of Hrustanovi}'s wife, Zafra, lying in front of her own house where she had been killed. She then saw the corpse of her own father. The witness, with her mother and sisters who were barefoot and in pyjamas, escaped to Upper Ahmi}i; then, amidst much shooting and shelling, to Vrhovine, and finally on foot to Zenica.

227. Witness I was woken in his home in Zume, a part of Ahmi}i, on 16 April 1993 by a powerful explosion. He saw that all the Muslim houses in Ahmi}i were on fire. He also noticed that his Croatian neighbours were hiding in Jozo Vrebac's shelter. An HVO soldier ordered him out of his house. The soldier had an automatic rifle and a "Scorpio", and wore a white belt. The witness surrendered two hand grenades to the soldier. The soldier said, "You see this house? ...This is no longer yours, and don't you dare come back here". The witness locked up his house and gave the keys to the soldier and left Zume. A Croat from Busovača now lives in his house.

228. Witness J testified that she awoke at 5.15 a.m. At 5.25 a.m., shelling started, and the mosque was fired upon. Around 5.30 a.m., she saw that Witness KL's house was on fire, as well as neighbouring houses, including that of Fahrudin Ahmi}. She heard a lot of shooting and hid in her pantry. Then soldiers broke down her door and started breaking everything. There were five soldiers, including Nenad [anti}, who was a neighbour, and whose face was painted black. The other soldiers did not have their faces painted. The soldiers were in camouflage uniforms, with HVO patches, and had rifles. They killed her husband and left. The witness then saw that the house was on fire, as well as all the surrounding Muslim houses, but apparently it did not burn down. She came out of her house towards dusk to feed the cow and saw her husband's body. She spent the night there. The next day, she was taken by Bosnian Croats to Dubravica, where there was rape and "a lot of terrible things going on".[257]

229. Hendrikus Prudon, a crime scene officer, corroborated Witness KL's account of what happened in his home on the morning of 16 April 1993. Prudon was commissioned by the Office of the Prosecutor to compile a ballistic-incendiary report on Witness KL's house amongst others, and he investigated the ruins for signs of fire damage, gunfire and explosives. During his investigation, Prudon found bullets and cartridge cases in various parts of the house, including anti-aircraft projectiles (Exhibit P170). He also found textiles and bone fragments. Prudon's Report concluded that the bones were of a child (of ten or eleven years of age) charred by a temperature of 1,000° – 1,600° celsius. In three areas of the house, there were holes in the floor, which appear to be where the sofas and table had burned and fallen through the floor.[258]

230. Witness K lost her husband and son on 16 April 1993. Her family consisted of her husband and three children: a son aged ten and two daughters aged six and four years. She was awoken by gunfire in the morning. Bullets were coming into the room in which she and her husband slept with all their children. She heard gunfire outside, as well as whispers and general noise. There was a banging on the door. At this point, bullets were flying about everywhere inside the house. The witness struggled over the door for about ten minutes to stop the soldiers outside from opening it, with the help of her husband. She screamed, saying, "There's only me and the children here! There's nobody else here! Stop shooting! Don't fire! Don't shoot my children!" Her son then said that he was wounded and her husband started shouting for the first time. A gun was pointed through the window and a blond soldier appeared, shouting "Out, out, out!" Her husband put his son on his shoulder and went out to the hallway and out the front door. There was a burst of gunfire, and the witness's husband and son fell down. Her son was dead, with bullets in his stomach while her husband was covered in blood, in great pain but alive. She tried to clean him up and lift him, but he died. The witness then went back into her house with her two daughters and stayed in the house. From there she saw Witness KL's and others' houses burning and the corpse of Munib Ahmi} and others. She realised that the soldiers were killing everyone and burning all the houses. She and her daughters eventually crawled out of the house to safety.

231. The witness estimated that the gunshots fired at her house came from the direction of the Croat houses in Lower Ahmi}i, the Kupre{ki} houses. She assumed they were attacked by their Croatian neighbours since the Muslims' properties were destroyed and Muslims were killed, whereas the Croatian houses were left untouched and their children were unharmed.

232. Witness L was wounded in the left arm during the attack as he ran from his home towards Upper Ahmi}i. Nevertheless he reached Vrhovine, where he was reunited with the rest of his family. His house was burned by the Croats that day. The witness was treated in Zenica.

233. Witness N, who was born in 1957 in Prijedor, was a former inmate of Keraterm camp and a refugee, expelled from Prijedor by the Serbs. He arrived in Ahmi}i on 20 August 1992, and settled in Upper Ahmi}i, living next door to the mosque. His family went to Austria and he stayed in Ahmi}i alone. Witness N participated in the village guard in Ahmi}i; his duty was to guard the people while they were praying in the mosque at dawn and evening. He possessed a short-barrelled weapon, which he carried on his person. The witness recalled that the assault of 16 April 1993 began with a direct hit on the minaret at 6.15 a.m. It was dawn, daylight had broken, but at the same time it was misty. There was then shooting from all quarters. Next came an infantry attack from the direction of the Catholic cemetery. As the attack went on, the witness helped to evacuate the wounded. He noticed shooting from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s store. The witness himself came under fire from a bunker consisting of sandbags piled up one on top of the other, from the direction of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s store,[259] at around 10 a.m. He thought it was a small anti-aircraft weapon firing at him. The witness succeeded in leaving Ahmi}i around 2 p.m. He escaped to Zenica, with the assistance of UNPROFOR.

234. Witness O was a refugee who came to Ahmi}i in November 1992. His family comprised his wife, three sons and two daughters. On 16 April 1993, the witness rose at around 3.45 a.m.; at 4 a.m., he saw lights at Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. He rose again around 5 a.m. At 5.30 a.m., there was considerable shooting. He then saw six soldiers in "motley" uniforms and with weapons going from house to house, who he believed had killed the local Muslims called Kurja, Sukrija, Naser and Huso, because he had seen the six soldiers going to their houses.[260] The witness, as he fled with his family to Vrhovine, saw the village ablaze and the houses of Muslims burning.

235. Witness P was 19 years old in April 1993 and lived in Lower Ahmi}i, where she had lived since her birth. Her family comprised her mother, father (Witness Q), a younger sister (Witness R), who was 16 years old, an elder sister and a brother (who was in Stari Vitez at the time of these events). Her brother lived with his family – his wife (Witness T) and three small children (aged 1½, 2½, and 4½ years) - on the ground floor of the same house. On 16 April 1993, a friend was also present in her house, and her family was also joined by her paternal uncle (Witness S) and his wife, and by two refugees, a man and woman, from Prijedor; thus making fourteen persons in total. Her closest Croatian neighbours were Vlatko Kupre{ki}, and Dragan, Gordana and Mirko Vidović.

236. Witness P's account of what transpired on 16 April 1993 is corroborated by the accounts of the members of the family who also testified – Witnesses Q, R, S, T and their evidence will, therefore, be treated together.

237. According to Witnesses P, Q, R, S and T, there was a loud detonation or explosion and shooting broke out between 5 - 5.30 a.m. The father Witness Q and the mother of the family told the children to get out of their beds. The family went down to the basement of the house. In the basement, the family was joined by Witness S who lived next door and who had also been woken by the sound of loud shooting from heavy weaponry. Witness S had seen houses burning near Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house and noticed shooting from Dragan Vidović's house and had seen wounded people passing by. The family continued to wait in the basement and in the brother's garage. The shooting intensified and they saw houses on fire and a wounded man. Witness T also saw shooting from heavy weaponry from Ivica Kupre{ki}'s house; loud detonations could be heard from the lower part of Ahmi}i. Witness Q noticed soldiers manoeuvring in a forest below the school, and other HVO soldiers in camouflage uniform advancing towards his house. The group in the basement then saw that they had no option but to flee to the upper village, which they did at around 8 – 8.30 a.m. They left the house together and climbed an elevation where the group hid in a shelter for ten minutes, discussing the escape route they should take.[261] This shelter was too small, however, for everyone to hide in, so they left for Nermin Kermo's house, as pre-arranged in the event of an air attack. They took a very narrow path with which Witness R was familiar from her childhood.

238. On their route, there was a plateau with a large clearing free of any growth. As the group of fleeing persons traversed this area and came to the edge of the hill, they heard people swearing at them. Witness Q then turned around and saw three soldiers and Vlatko Kupre{ki} in front of the latter's house, all holding automatic weapons. The soldiers cursed the group as "Balijas", asking why they had not been killed and where they had been hiding and telling them to give themselves up. According to Witness Q, the soldiers said "Fuck you balija mothers. Where were you? Where have you been so far?"[262] Witness R, who did not see the soldiers nor recognise the voices, testified that the voices she heard said, "Fuck you balija mothers, how come you're still alive?" Witness S heard the cursing of a group of soldiers, calling from the direction of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house, 50-70 metres away, and cast a momentary glance towards them. He saw a group of soldiers there, and one man who was not wearing a uniform, but Witness S was not sure that Vlatko Kupre{ki} was among them. According to Witness S, the soldiers shouted, "Balija mothers, where have you been hiding? How come you haven't been killed yet?"

239. The soldiers then began to shoot at the family and the other refugees. From the damage caused to surrounding trees, they appeared to be using fragmentation bullets. Witness T described how the bullets prevented her from helping her two and a half year old child, Maida, who had been shot and was apparently injured, with blood running down her face: "... from the shooting I couldn't help her, because bullets were falling all around her, and the bullets -- the earth would be -- shot up into the air when the bullet touched it. There were bullets all around and bullets going into the tree trunks".[263] As the shooting started, everybody ran. Witness T fell to the ground to protect her child.

240. When the soldiers started shooting from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house, Witness R lay down, at which point a bullet hit her in the leg, by the knee. Witness Q, the father of witness R, heard his daughter cry out and saw blood coming from her leg. The other members of the fleeing group ran "every which way" in order to save their lives and to escape the shooting. As his daughter cried out, "Mother, dear, I've been wounded. I'll die. You will lose me", her mother returned to help her and as she came to within three to four metres of the place where her daughter was, she fell, herself hit by a bullet. At the time she was hit, according to Witness Q, she was turned with her chest facing towards the direction from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house whence the shooting was coming. Witness Q then had to save his child by pulling her to the other side of the hill where she could not be hit by any more bullets coming from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. After he had pulled Witness R out, crawling on the plain, he came to the place where his wife was and pulled her by the legs to one side. He lifted her head and watched to see whether she gave any signs of life, but she did not. Her mouth was full of dirt and she was dead. Then a neighbour approached them from the other side of the hill, and Witness R cried out to him to help them. They took Witness R and carried her away to Nermin Kermo's house. All this time, there was shooting coming from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.

241. There was a basement in the lower section of Nermin Kermo's house where many other people from the lower section of the village had already gathered and were crying.[264] There Witness R received first aid; shirts were used to dress her wounds. After an hour's time, UNPROFOR came, and also administered first aid to Witness R and then removed her, and the other seriously wounded, in an Armoured Personnel Carrier.[265] Witness T noticed that when UNPROFOR arrived, the shooting stopped, but that once UNPROFOR left, there was intensive shelling of Nermin Kermo's house.

242. Witness P stayed at Nermin Kermo's house until midnight due to the constant shooting. Then she and others escaped in small groups to Vrhovine and Zenica via Dobrila. Witness S told the court how his father did not want to leave, thinking that he would not be hurt as he was an old man of 83 years, but that he was later killed, as was his mother, who was 70 years old.[266]

243. Witness U remembered hearing a strong blast at the time of the morning call to prayer on 16 April 1993. He heard shooting and saw four young uniformed soldiers bearing HVO insignia running past. People were fleeing – men, women and children – and those who did not flee were killed. The witness fled with his family, including his sister who was an invalid, in a group of 15-20 civilians, mostly women and children. They stopped between two hills, where they were blocked. Before his eyes, one woman, Nadira, was shot in the head and died from the wound.[267] The witness was himself wounded in the left arm, and remains disabled in that arm to this day. His sister, 37 years old at the time and bedridden, whom he was carrying in his arms, was also wounded. Another woman, Hajra, was at the same time shot in the chest and died instantly. Her sister, Zela, was also wounded. The shooting was coming from the direction of the Sutre store, owned by Vlatko Kupre{ki}. Witness U described how a female refugee, whose young son and husband had been killed, told them that they should hide "because they were killing all males, all males indiscriminately". She said, "Hide even in a mouse hole, but just hide".[268]

244. The witness hid in a pit for a while, until some HVO soldiers came along and ordered his family out. The witness's family was taken away, but the witness managed to remain concealed and, when soldiers started burning the garage where the pit was located, he and others managed to run out and returned to his house for four to five days, hiding under a concrete staircase, which had not burned. Then the witness and the others surrendered to four soldiers. One soldier bore the HVO insignia, while the others were in blue uniforms which had led him to believe they were UNPROFOR soldiers. The soldiers took the witness to a collection centre near a soccer stadium. On the way to the collection area, Witness U saw that most of the houses in the Muslim area of town were damaged or burnt down, while not a single house was damaged in the Croatian section.

245. Witness V lived in Upper Ahmi}i in April 1993 with his wife and two sons. He was on patrol on the evening of 15 April 1993. He went to bed at 4.30 a.m., but was woken by shooting.[269] He left the house with his gun to find out what was going on and went towards the main road. There was heavy shooting coming from the direction of Vlatko Kupreškić's house. The witness saw houses burning, notably from the direction of Sukrija or Witness KL's house. The witness, his brother and some others gathered by a stable. Then he retreated towards his house. He saw the wife of Sukrija "running with her children and crying, and she was so distraught. She cried out to us, 'Run for your life. They have killed Sukrija, they have set my house on fire'. She looked so terrible it defies description".[270] The witness said he had the impression that they "wanted to kill every living thing in sight".[271]

246. Witness V's cellar became crowded with civilians.[272] The witness and Mirhad Berbi} took up a position in order to defend the civilians in his cellar and because they had no means of retreat. The witness exchanged gunfire with HVO soldiers who were running towards his house, and one of whom was armed with a grenade launcher. Being outgunned, the witness then took up a position between his house and the upper mosque, behind some construction material, until UNPROFOR came. As soon as UNPROFOR arrived the shooting stopped. When UNPROFOR left, the shooting started again, and indeed intensified, particularly in a vengeful burst directed towards the witness's house, which had served as a haven for the wounded.[273] The witness stayed in his position – between the mosque and his house - until it became dark, and then he and the civilians in his basement decided to withdraw towards Vrhovine and Zenica. Those who stayed behind were killed and burned.

247. Witness W's mother, wife, sister and son were all murdered on 16 April 1993. That day, he was woken at 5.30 – 5.40 a.m. by an explosion. The witness saw soldiers running past and heard heavy shooting. The soldiers swore at Sefik Pezer, a Bosniac, cursing his "balija mother" and threatening to set his house on fire, which they eventually did. The witness and his whole family left the house due to the falling mortar shells and went towards Upper Ahmi}i. The witness caught up with his family by Vlatko

Kupre{ki}'s house. His wife was severely wounded in the head. Other Bosniacs were also wounded, while the daughter of a friend of his, Esad, was killed.[274]

248. The witness waited with his wife, by Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s store, amidst heavy shooting for 3-4 hours. A group of five HVO soldiers, wearing camouflage uniforms with the Croatian checkerboard flag, then came from towards Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house, and saw the witness and his wounded wife. The soldiers searched the witness and his family and started mistreating them. In the end, the witness said, "they came to some kind of compromise, that they wouldn't liquidate us".[275] From what the witness said, it is clear there was an order to exterminate the Muslims:

> "Some of them were in favour of liquidating us and others were not in favour of that, and then a man who was probably the leader of this group said, 'The job has been finished. You're free. Run. But as soon as you can. The commander should be coming in. If he sees that I've let you go, I will be liquidated too because no Muslim foot should tread on this soil."[276]

249. Another soldier who said that he was from Nesrovici said that the witness and his family "should all be slaughtered".[277] The witness managed to improvise a makeshift stretcher in which he took his wife to Ahmi}i. She was evacuated by UNPROFOR to Travnik, where she died.

250. Witness X lost her husband and one daughter that day. The witness heard a loud detonation from the direction of the Kupre{ki} houses. Then shooting started from all sides. Her family went down into their cellar. She saw people shooting at the Pezer house from Jevco Vidovi}'s, Ivica Vidovi}'s, Niko Vidovi}'s and Slavko Papi}'s houses. The witness saw a total of eight Bosniac houses burning.[278] She was told by a neighbour, "Run away, because they're taking everybody prisoner and killing people". She sent her children off with the neighbours and then heard her children crying from the direction of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house and then a burst of gunfire.

251. Next, four HVO soldiers who had just set Cazim Ahmi}'s house on fire stopped her and her husband. One of these HVO soldiers killed her husband in front of her eyes with a bullet through his forehead. The witness saw his brain spurting out. Her husband was wearing civilian clothes and had no weapon. The soldier then said to Witness X, "I'm going to set your house and barn on fire, so escape".

252. The witness fled and reached a spot below Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house where she found her children. One of her daughters had been killed by the shooting, another daughter had been wounded from shrapnel from a mortar shell and another woman had been killed. She was told "to get away from that open space because there was sniper fire coming from Vlatko's [Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s] house and that they would kill [her]".[279] Eventually, after some three and a half hours, the witness surrendered to HVO soldiers and, seeing Franjo Kupre{ki}, Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s father, asked for help.[280]

253. Franjo Kupre{ki} and two or three other soldiers stood over the witness and said, "We kill our own wounded, let alone yours", and "This is all for the village of Nezirovici. We'll kill you or we'll slaughter you, but we should rape you first, and you tell us that we can do what we like with you".[281] The Muslims had to agree that they were at the soldiers' mercy.[282] The HVO soldiers told them to go to Upper Ahmi}i to the upper mosque.[283] The witness walked to Upper Ahmi}i and emerged at Vrhovine with her children. She spent the night at Vrhovine and was transferred to Zenica the next morning.

254. On re-examination, Witness X referred to the fact that she heard soldiers calling for brandy and celebrating the fact that "they were all killed down there" (in Lower Ahmi}i), and saying "we've done a good job".[284] The voices were coming from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s yard and house. When the witness walked past Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house, it "was full of HVO soldiers in the yard". She also added that she saw that day the bodies of Sukrija and Meho and Meho's wife – all killed, all in civilian clothes.

255. Witness Y rose at 5 a.m., to go to work at the Princip factory. He was having coffee when he heard two bursts of gunfire from the direction of the Kupre{ki} houses. He told his wife to hide beneath the staircase. He saw Sukrija Ahmi}'s house on fire and five to ten uniformed soldiers in front of the house, armed with rocket-propelled grenades and with helmets on their heads. He ran back into his house, put on his uniform and took his rifle. He ran to Upper Ahmi}i to report to the command in Preočica. He telephoned the command and told them that the village had been attacked and was on fire and asked for assistance. The communication lines went dead, while they were talking. When the witness returned from Upper Ahmi}i, he saw that almost all the houses were burning, apart from his house and those of Nasid Ahmi} and Nermin Kermo.

256. The witness then joined Nermin Kermo and his brother and took cover in a thicket, near the upper mosque, and started to return fire. Witness Y said that 5-7 Bosnian Muslims – he, Nermin Kermo and a few others - defended the Bosniacs from the Croat attack in the upper village, and approximately the same number defended the lower village. They did not receive any assistance. The weapons the Bosniacs had were mostly burnt out rifles from Slimenje, of very poor quality and not very accurate.[285] They shot at the soldiers to stop them from burning his house and thus killing Witness Y's wife, and to protect the civilians who were in Nermin Kermo's basement. The witness shot about three magazines with his automatic rifle, i.e. 90 bullets, that day. UNPROFOR came at around noon with 3-4 vehicles. The witness went over to speak to them. He saw Nadira Ahmi} lying dead. UNPROFOR put some wounded people into the vehicles. At that point, the witness's wife broke cover and ran for Kermo's basement. The shooting died down when UNPROFOR came. Once UNPROFOR left, however: "there was a cannonade. There was shooting from all kinds of weapons, mortars, RPGs, PAMs, PATs, anti-aircraft guns, all kinds of weapons, artillery pieces. Whatever they had, they used to shoot all over Ahmi}i".[286]

257. Witness Y and Nermin Kermo stayed in their position until dusk. There was shooting all day. As dusk fell, more survivors from the lower part of the village appeared and they were transferred to Vrhovine. Some old people stayed and were all killed.[287]

258. Witness Z woke to the sound of shooting. His mother was in the hallway, "beside herself". Witness Z ran out with his rifle. He saw the Ahmi} houses on fire, bullets flying from anti-aircraft guns and shooting directed towards the lower mosque and surrounding houses. The witness said he did not use his gun that day, because he was afraid for the safety for his wife and mother. Moreover he took off his uniform, in which he had slept, and hid his weapon. His house was hit with bullets, so he ran with wife and mother to Galib Imsirevi}'s house, which was also already completely "drilled" with bullets. Galib was lying dead outside. Next the witness ran with a group of people to the house of Vlado [anti} (a neighbour, not the accused, who lived in Vitez). There was shooting all around and bullets flying all around them. Eight of them hid in a shed by Vlado [anti}'s house from 8.30 a.m. until approximately 4.30 p.m. When UNPROFOR came by, he flagged them down, and disguised himself as a woman in order to get on board. As they drove off, he saw Drago Josipovi} in camouflage uniform, with an automatic rifle but without face paint, in the company of four other soldiers with rifles.

259. Witness BB woke up at 5-5.30 a.m., when she heard a detonation. She and her family hid in the pantry. Then a female neighbour came by and said, "Let's run. We're being attacked. They are torching everything. They are killing everyone". The witness went with the neighbour and the neighbour's daughter to Ahmi}i, leaving her husband and son behind. They reached the Kupre{ki} houses, where they had to stop because the Grabovi houses were all burned. She saw the HVO running everywhere and she hid under a hill. There was shooting from all sides, from the Kupre{ki} houses as well as from Piri}i. After some time, a neighbour, Nadira Ahmi}, was hit in the back of the head and killed, then a 18-year old girl, Zirafeta Ahmi}, Hajra and Kemo were all hit by gunfire. They went with Kemo into a house and hid there, nine women and children. The shot which killed Nadira Ahmi} came from either Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house or Franjo Kupre{ki}'s house; according to the witness, it could not have come from anywhere else.[288]

260. In the same group as the witness were a dozen or so persons, including three men and a very young boy. None were in uniform and none had guns. HVO soldiers burst into the house in which they were hiding and harassed them.[289] They took them to a swamp called Dolina and kept them there for 2-3 hours. They then led the witness to the main road. They asked her where her husband and son were. When she said that she did not know, the soldiers said: "Well, we know where they are. We killed them and we sent them to God's garden to pick tangerines".[290] But in fact her son lived and she found him in Travnik hospital.

261. The witness was evacuated in an UNPROFOR vehicle. While waiting for UNPROFOR, she met a large number of refugees in a shed who had had members of their families killed before their very eyes.[291]

262. Witness CC was woken at approximately 6 a.m., by the sound of shooting and explosives. She saw houses on fire and decided to stay indoors with her family. Then soldiers arrived and started kicking and breaking the window with rifle butts. At that point, the witness and her family left the house. Outside, there were two soldiers - in black uniforms, with rifles and rucksacks, standing in front of the house of Husein Ahmi}. They told them to put their hands up, to bend their heads and not to look around, which they did. The witness saw two soldiers by Husein Ahmi}'s house brutally evicting a woman and her children from their house.[292] She saw another two soldiers on the other side of the house. One soldier had his face painted with black lines and the other had some sort of mask on his face so that only his eyes could be seen. As she left the house, she saw dead bodies lying on the ground two metres from their front door. At the front of the house, she left her father, as she was told to run wherever she could. So she ran by the mosque towards central and Upper Ahmi}i.[293]

263. Witness DD lost both her husband and son on 16 April 1993. She awoke to the sound of heavy shooting. She saw flashes outside the window and Muslim houses on fire. Looking out of the window, she saw three or more soldiers, including Drago Josipovi} with a rifle, shooting in the direction of her house. Soldiers started banging on the door, shouting "Nazif, come out, Nazif you balija motherfucker". Children were screaming. Bullets were flying everywhere, and there was a lot of smoke. The witness tried to find some clothes to dress the children, and her husband went downstairs and then came back and said, "Amir, Elma, you should go out too. They are calling you too". At this time, the soldiers, some of whom were masked, broke into the house. They took the family downstairs. The witness's son was then taken aside. The witness jumped at a refugees, also, that was a mother-in-law and a daughter-in-law with two young children, they had killed her husband and son too. They killed them before their very own eyes. I said that UNPROFOR would come and that we could all get out of there. At that time, we heard the UNPROFOR coming".

[292] T. 3873: "Q. The two soldiers in the vicinity of Husein's house, what were they doing? A. One of them stood in front of the house and talked to his sister-in-law, and she was crying and screaming and begging him to allow her to get clothes for her children so that she could change them. He hollered at her and said, "No way. Leave everything behind and run".

person who was not wearing any mask - a very thin man with some black paint on his face - and yelled, "Do not take my Amir away, please, my Amir". She started struggling with the soldier. At that point, Drago Josipovi} came from around the house. He had taken off his mask to wipe off some sweat but then he put it on again. The soldier with whom the witness was struggling became very angry and pointed his rifle at the witness. He was about to shoot the witness, when Drago Josipovi} shouted, "Leave her alone".[294]

264. Next, Witness DD's husband, Nazif, was led away. The witness herself was told to "get lost". She was led away to a barn, where her daughter and some other women were. They were locked in the barn. The soldiers then set fire to her house. The group was told to leave the barn and to go to the house of Slavko Vrebac. Witness DD asked a Croat if she could go to her son, Amir, who may have been killed or wounded, and she did not want him to suffer. But he would not let her. They reached the house of Slavko Vrebac. The wife of Vrebac was "very merry".[295] They stayed there when night fell. They were not allowed even to go to the toilet. They were given wooden frames of couches and sofas, without cushions or other comforts, to sleep on. It was damp. Later they were taken to Sivrino Selo, and then on towards Zenica.

265. Witness EE lived in Lower Ahmi}i until 16 April 1993. Her family comprised her husband, daughter (12 years old) and son (9 years old).[296] The first thing the witness remembered was a loud detonation, followed by shooting. She grabbed her children and with her husband tried to go to the bathroom, but the moment she opened the bathroom door, bullets flew through. She returned to the hallway. Then there were "terrible voices" calling on them to open up. They repeated several times "Open the door, this is the police", but the witness and her family kept quiet because they were terribly afraid by now. Then a burst of gunfire shattered the glass and the door. The witness's husband unlocked the other door. She saw soldiers in full military uniform. She recognised the soldiers as the accused Vladimir [anti}, Drago Josipovi}, as well as Zeljo Livanci}, Marinko Katava and Karlo Cerkez. Vladimir [anti} and Zeljo Livanci} were in camouflage uniform, with the HVO patch and helmets. They took her husband away, whereupon she heard a burst of gunfire. She never saw or heard from her husband again. As her husband was led away he said, "Don't kill my wife and children". The husband was in the clothes he slept in, namely an under-vest, underwear, vest and short pants.

266. One HVO soldier, Stipo Alilovi}, was left to guard her and her children as they went and stood in the corner. Then the other soldiers came back and stared at her and the children. Stipo Alilovi}, holding a grenade, said "What do I do with this grenade?" Zeljo Livanci} told her and her children to "get lost". The witness's mother had also been evicted from her house and was crouching outside, suffering from burns. The witness then went with her mother and two children to hide in a shed. She saw various soldiers around, some of whom were jumping from her verandah. Her house was on fire. She and her mother ran back into the house and managed to put out the fire with a hose. She then ran back and joined her children in the shed. But then her house was again set on fire with incendiary bullets and began to cave in. At this point, the witness saw soldiers outside Ramiz Ahmi}'s house saying, "Come out you balijas so that we can cut your throats. Come out you balijas, we're going to slaughter you".[297] She heard Ramiz Ahmi} telling his wife to come out and saw his house on fire.

267. The witness and her children stayed in the shed until dusk. There was shooting the whole day. Some soldiers came up to the shed, including Drago Josipovi} and Anto Papi}, both in full military gear. They called her out of the shed. Drago Josipovi} said, "Your shed is going to be set on fire now". Drago Josipovi} then told them to go to Anto Papi}'s house, where there were other Muslims, ostensibly for their own safety. She said she did not dare go and asked them to escort her there, which they did. At Anto Papi}'s house, the witness saw men, women and children who were crying, describing how their loved ones had been killed. Drago Josipovi} said, "Ah, Musafer has been killed too". Muslim men were sent out to go pick up their dead.[298]

268. Subsequently Witness EE was told to leave Anto Papi}'s house and to go in the direction of Zume. She ended up in a house in [anti}i which was a sort of camp. There were Muslims there, full of fear, who had learned of their relatives who had been killed. At one point, two HVO soldiers came in and selected the men from the group, took them out and – as it later emerged – pursuant to orders, killed them.[299] Fatima Ahmi} asked Nika Plavci} what had happened to her husband, Hasim. He told her, "Orders were issued and they were all killed". Then the witness had to go by foot to the Dubravica school where she stayed until 1 May 1993. At the Dubravica school, Usta{a propaganda was prominently displayed on the walls, including the sign of the black legion of the Usta{a.[300]

269. Witness FF was awoken at around 5.20 a.m., by two loud detonations. Her husband got up and woke the children. The witness looked out of a window and saw Muslim houses on fire. A bullet came through the window. Then her father-in-law and mother-in-law were at the entrance to their house. A voice told them, "If there are any men in there, they should come out". They left the house. She saw her brother-in-law standing in front of his house. A group gathered. She heard five shots from the shed. It all went quiet after that. A soldier said, "This is Alija Izetbegovi}'s fault for the war breaking out". The witness went to the cellar of Zdravko Vrebac. Women were there [299] T. 4126–4128: "Two HVO soldiers entered the room. They had the black socks over their heads with just slits for the eyes. All you could see were their eyes. One of them was fairly tall, the other one was a little shorter in build, and as we knew him personally, we concluded that it was Nika Plavci}. We called him Nika ^, that being a picture, and he was a photographer, in fact. ... As Fatima was in the corner with her husband, Ahmi} Hasim, he said, "You, you, you, you, you, let's go". Fatima jumped up and hugged Hasim, and she said, "Please don't take him away. He has a bad kidney and he has to have dialysis. Please don't take him away". "Don't worry about that," they said, "He'll be cured very quickly". Ramic Zenur, his brother Amir, and Mr. Engineer Helug Munir went out. A little boy from Loncari, he was fairly tall and thin, he managed, as the door was here, and the women had lined up against this door, when he left, he hid behind the women and crouched down. And that's how he stayed. He stayed alive by crouching and hiding behind the line of women. ... Q. Did Hasim and the other Muslim men who were taken, did they return at any time? A. No, never".

crying, saying that their husbands and sons had been killed. She stayed the night there. Later she fled, eventually reaching Zenica.

270. Witness GG was 28 years old and living with her father (who was away on 16 April 1993), mother and sister on the upper storey of a 2-storey house in Ahmi}i (Zume). She was awoken by shooting. An incendiary bullet entered their living-room and set the sofa on fire, which she tried to put out with water. She tried to telephone for help but the telephone was not working. The witness moved with her family down to the lower storey, via the outside staircase. There they were seen by five armed soldiers, who harassed them by pushing them into the lower storey apartment and cursing their "balija mothers". One of the soldiers was Anto Furund`ija, wearing camouflage uniform with a Jokers emblem on his sleeve, and one black line painted on both of his cheeks. The witness was told to go out to call her neighbours and to see if there were any menfolk. She protested, as there was shooting outside but the soldiers told her and her mother to get out. As she left, she heard one soldier saying into a walkie-talkie, "Everything is going to plan". The witness's mother turned around at one point, whereupon a soldier fired a burst of gunfire at her feet to make it clear to her that she had to keep going.

271. Witness GG walked in the direction of [anti}i. She saw Muslim houses burning. She also saw a soldier pouring something from a canister and flames rising in another part of the house. The witness then stayed at Mira's house. That evening, a Croat neighbour came by and said that it was not safe to stay there and that she should go to her daughter's house. That neighbour and her husband stayed the whole evening with them for their protection. The next day, the witness's mother went back to see her house, and after she had come back she told them that she had seen terrible things.[301]

[301] T. 4360. - "..., she came back all in tears, lost, she was trembling. Then we asked her what she had seen and what had happened. She said that the house had burned down, that she saw corpses in the yard, in our yard. She saw Muhamed Neslanović's corpse there. Behind our house she saw Ibrahim Pezer's corpse, and in front of house, since she went in front of the house of Sefik Pezer, she saw his corpse too".

272. The witness then had to move on to another house, where there were a lot of women and children, and a few men.[302] Anto Papi}, a Croat, was there as a guard, in uniform and with a rifle. While they were there, soldiers came in and took men out to kill them.[303] Then Nikica Plavci}, with a uniform and a gun, came and took them all to Dubravica school, where the witness was held from 18 April 1993 – 1 May 1993.

273. Witness CA, who was 58 at the time, heard a detonation at around 5.20 a.m., and immediately thought it had to be connected to what Dario Kordi} had said on the television the day before about waiting for orders. The witness called to her husband to get up. She saw four soldiers coming into her yard, in camouflage uniforms and carrying weapons. They stopped her and asked where her son and husband were. A soldier then threw a bomb into the larder. The witness noticed fire around her son's home. Then a soldier kicked down her door and said "I'll fuck your mother". Two other soldiers entered the house. One soldier took a lighter and set fire to the curtains. When she came back later, her house had burnt down.

274. The soldiers then told her husband to come out and got ready to kill him. The witness pleaded for mercy, and the soldiers let both of them go. They went to their son's house, being pushed along by a soldier with a rifle. There she found her son's children in tears. Her daughter-in-law said, "they're going to kill my children". The witness assured her that they would not. The youngest child was afraid, and said "they killed Dad". The witness went outside and saw her son, Fahran, lying there dead. A soldier said, "I didn't kill him. Alija killed him". The soldiers then said, "Go fuck yourselves". The witness and her husband went towards the La{va River.

275. The witness then saw Drago Josipovi} and Anto Papi}, both in camouflage uniforms and armed. Drago Josipovi} was crying, saying that the witness's deceased son had been like a brother to him. She asked him who did this, and Drago Josipovi} replied that it "must be some higher force" or somebody higher up. Drago Josipovi} arranged for the witness, her husband and grandchildren to be taken to Anto Papi}'s house.[304]

276. Later Witness CA went back to her son's house to collect her son's things and chickens. There was a pool of blood where her son had lain. She asked Drago Josipovi} if she could live in the summer kitchen. Josipovi} replied ".... As far as I am concerned don't go anywhere. But people will come and kill you. I can't do anything, I can't save you. Go and follow your people". She then saw some soldiers, one of whom spoke into his radio saying, "Yes, the operation was successful, they're lying in front of every house like pigs". The soldiers then took away her husband. She tried to stop them but he was taken away with other Muslims. She insisted that a person she knew named Nikica Slikica, who was passing by, tell her what happened to her husband, and Nikica replied that "the order came and they were all killed. Don't even ask, they were all killed".[305]

(c) Burial of the Victims of the Attack on Ahmi}i of 16 April 1993

277. Scores of victims were buried in a mass grave in Vitez on 28 April 1993. Stephen Hughes, an UNPROFOR officer, was involved in this mass burial. Three Croat bodies and approximately 96 Muslim bodies were buried. He assumed they had died violent deaths, either from gunshot wounds or from mortar blasts. Of the 96 bodies, he could see only two with camouflage jackets. The rest were civilian males and females of a variety of ages. He also saw some small packages which contained either heads of decapitated bodies or children; he could not see inside the sacks so he did not know which. The burial in the mass grave went on all day and into the evening.[306] The details of the mass grave burial were fully corroborated by Nihad Rehibi}, a former member of the JNA, who organised the burial in Stari Vitez on 28 April 1993. Rehibi} testified that the bodies buried were received from the HVO, via UNPROFOR, who acted as an intermediary. The corpses were from the Vitez area, mainly from Ahmi}i. Ninety-four bodies arrived that day, although there were more bodies on the list compiled by the HVO.[307] Initially, the bodies would be examined before burial and an attempt made to verify their identities from documents, for example identity cards, found on the bodies. However, as the day went on and darkness began to fall, they had to speed up the burials and the identities of the corpses could not always be verified and it was necessary to rely upon the HVO list alone. Some bodies were in a shocking state, with crushed skulls or knife marks on the necks. There were also a number of burnt or carbonised bodies. According to this witness:

> "Among the bodies, there were very many women. They were aged from all -- I mean, from the youngest to the eldest, there were children of three months, a child of seven years of age, a 12-year-old child, there were old men of 70 and more".[308]

278. In May 1993, UNPROFOR brought additional bodies, which appear on the list of corpses, including the carbonised corpses of Naser Ahmi} (#95 on the list), 7 years old, Elvis Ahmi} (#97 on the list), Edina Ahmi} (#96 on the list) and 3 month old Sejo (#98 on the list).[309] Not all the bodies buried that day were from Ahmi}i, but at least 70 bodies were. Nor were all the people who died in Ahmi}i buried in that mass grave.[310]

(i) Vitez Cinema

provided, but not excessively poor and there was no mistreatment. For example, relatives were allowed to bring food to detainees. Other defence witnesses were equally reluctant to admit that Muslims were unlawfully detained and mistreated by the Croats after the events of April 1993.[311] They also pointed out that able-bodied Croats were detained by Bosnian Muslim forces, in Zenica and Mahala (Stari Vitez).[312]

(ii) Dubravica School

280. Those persons who survived the attack on Ahmi}i were moved to a prison camp which had been set up in Dubravica school, where they were mistreated and used, inter alia, to dig trenches in contravention of the laws of war.[313] Witnesses F,[314] J[315] and Abdulah Ahmi}[316] spoke of rapes occurring at the Dubravica school. According to Witness U, the HVO was in charge of Dubravica school. 150-200 men, women and children, all Bosnian Muslims, were detained in a hall there. They were not free to leave. Witness U stayed in Dubravica school for six days, before he was evacuated by UNHCR because of his wounds.[317]

281. Witness CA spent ten days at Dubravica school, where horrible pictures were displayed showing the killing and raping of women.[318] The living conditions were

But you would concede, therefore, sir, that these numbers of Muslim persons were held in those locations and were not allowed to leave of their own will? A. Yes, I will agree. Q. terrible. Someone threatened to carve a cross into her forehead. Although she was not beaten, she said "there was lots of fear and we barely survived".[319]

2. The Case for the Defence

282. The Defence have argued that the Muslim forces planned and prepared for attacks on the Croats – both in October 1992 and April 1993 – creating fear on the part of the Croats. By contrast, the Defence maintain that Croat forces – the HVO at least – did not plan, and were not prepared for, any offensive on 16 April 1993.

(a) Croat Unpreparedness for an Offensive on 16 April 1993

283. Dragan Stojak testified that the HVO was unaware of imminent armed conflict in Vitez on 16 April 1993. On 15 April 1993, he was at the Information Centre, while his family – his wife, two children and mother - was in Mahala, in Stari Vitez, which was under the control of the BiH army. There were only five Croatian houses in Mahala. Therefore if he, who worked in the information centre, had known there would be hostilities in Mahala, he would have taken his family out and evacuated them to the Croatian part of Vitez. However, Ivan Taraba recalled seeing a bunker built, presumably by Muslims, in Mahala, on the outskirts of town, a few days before the conflict of 16 April 1993,[320] which would have warned Croats in Vitez of the possibility of an impending conflict. Dragan Grebenar, who worked under Mario Čerkez, the commander of the Vitez brigade, testified that, when he spoke to Mario Čerkez on 15 April 1993, there was no mention of a possible conflict. He said that the Bosnian army launched an assault on 16 April 1993 from the direction of Kuber and Zenica, but that the Croats were unaware that such an assault would be launched.[321] Witness DA/5 worked for the staff of the Muslim-dominated Territorial Defence of Vitez from May-June 1992.

No, no, we hadn't noticed a thing and we hadn't received any kind of information from anyone that there would be an attack that morning. Q. You were completely surprised when the shelling occurred? A. Exactly that way".

She noted, however, that the other Croats were, little by little, leaving the Territorial Defence. She felt that she was being by-passed and that information which she ought to receive as part of her job was being withheld from her, simply because she was a Croat. On one occasion, she was told to leave a meeting of the command of the Territorial Defence because she was the only Croat there.[322] She stated that the HVO Vitez brigade had not even begun to be organised on 16 April 1993. When the conflict did break out on that day, she was sent home, despite her important organisational role in deploying officers to the front line.[323]

284. The Prosecution suggested that this picture of HVO unpreparedness did not fit with HVO directives from Dario Kordi} and Tihomir Bla{ki}, which had been produced in evidence as exhibits and which placed Croat units on a "higher state of readiness".[324] An order entitled "Combat command" dated 16 April 1993 (Exhibit D38/2), 0130 hours, had been presented to Zvonimir Cili}. This order, which warned of the threat of incursion and attack on Vitez itself from "enemy (extremist Muslim forces)", was signed by Tihomir Bla{ki} and was addressed to the commander of the HVO brigade in Vitez, Mario Čerkez. The order stated that the task of Čerkez's HVO forces was "to occupy the defence region to block the villages and prevent all entrances to and exits from the villages". The order went on to state: "In the event of an open attack by the Muslims, neutralise them and prevent their movement with precise fire from P/N (small arms). Time of readiness at 0530 hours on 16 April 1993". Exhibit P336, a report prepared by Zvonimir Cili} on the night of 16-17 April 1993, refers to the "... regrouping of Muslim forces, whereby we could conclude that they will make an attempt at a breakthrough from the direction of Vrhovine in the [anti}i-Ahmi}i direction ... We are doing our best to thwart these intentions". However, Zvonimir Cili} stated categorically that the crimes committed in Ahmi}i were not committed by members of the Vitez brigade. No Croatian official ever said which individuals or unit were responsible. There were different theories as to who did it. In his report, though, he referred to what happened in Ahmi}i as "combat".

[323] T. 5472-5743: "Q. In that case, Madam, how can we understand that, on the 16th of April, you were at home at a crucial moment for the HVO, when it was apparently in an armed conflict, exposed to a very violent offensive, and you, you were at home? A. Yes, that is exactly right. I was at home. Regardless of the fact that I held a very responsible post, I basically had not started to carry out these duties fully. I simply -- I assume that the people in the brigade command were also taken by surprise by the situation, and I simply at that moment, in order to do something, somebody had to help me to do that. In order to structure the brigade, in order to mobilise. I assume, when the conflict broke out, everybody thought that this was something of a small scale and it would stop in a few days and we would continue to work, so I don't know".

(b) Bosnian Army Offensive on Kuber on or around 16 April 1993

285. The Defence has also submitted[325] that Muslim forces initiated offensives around Kuber – an elevation in the vicinity of Vitez - on 15 April 1993. Several witnesses testified to this effect: Zvonimir Cili}, Dragan Grebenar,[326] Rudo Kurevija,[327] Ljuban Grubesi},[328] Dragan Stojak[329] and Anto Plavci}[330].

[327] T. 5890-5891: "A. On the 15th of April I was at home. Yes, I was at home. In the evening -- this was already in the early morning hours of the 16th of April, the commander called me to the command office by telephone, called me to come to Stara Bila. I think this happened between 2.30 or 3.00 a.m., and all the other members of the command arrived there too. We received information that an attack by the Muslims was expected, and then on that day in the evening of that day, the attack on Kuber took place against HVO positions. The Muslims carried out this attack. So that an attack was expected, and I was instructed, together with the commander of the platoon in my village Mali Mosunj to establish a line of defence in between the houses facing the Muslims. So that's where I went, together with the commander. I engaged some men. We established points among our houses as the border of our houses and Muslim houses. [...] A. Upon my arrival at the command, I think Slavko was there and two more members of the command staff. I think Marinko came later. The commander verbally told us all the information, that he had received orders from the command of the brigade for lines of defence to be set up, and also, he informed us that an attack by Muslims was expected, as well as information that already in the evening hours an attack was carried out by Muslims in the region of Kuber. We were also told at that time that the commander of the Zenica HVO, Zivko Toti} had been arrested, together with his escort, that four members of the escort were killed, and I think there was an eyewitness, a Muslim, that Zivko was still being detained".
[329] T. 6307–6308: "The elevation of Kuber is on the crossroads between Busovača, Vitez and Zenica, and it is very important because it dominates the entire valley, and from it it is easy to exercise control over the entire town of Vitez and along the communications line between Vitez and Busovača, and it's also easy to reach Zenica from there. Q. Are you aware of the fighting on Kuber in April of 1993? A. Yes. I mostly heard about it and I also read reports of the civilian structures. There was sporadic fighting on the 15th of April in Kuber, and later, of course, it intensified during the 16th and the 17th, and according to Civil Defence reports, there were four persons killed in that area. Q. Did you know any of the persons who were killed? A. Yes, I did. I knew Mr. Livančić".

286. Anto Plavci} testified[331] as to a Muslim attack on Jelinak on 15 April 1993. Jelinak, Loncari and Putis are all on the slopes of Mount Kuber. Jelinak consisted of approximately 100 households – 50 Muslim, 50 Croat. Putis has about 80 households, 20-30% Croat. Loncari has about 70-80 households, comprised of Muslim as well as several Serb or orthodox households. Bakija was inhabited exclusively by Croats and there were about 20 households. These villages are directly adjacent to Ahmi}i.

287. Plavci} testified that the HVO had control of Kuber in 1993, but that there were BiH forces nearby and members of the Territorial Defence. On 15 April 1993, there was shooting from the Kuber area, which resulted in the wounding of some HVO members from Jelinak, who were evacuated. The witness heard that the BiH army had attacked the HVO from Zenica.

288. On 16 April, the fighting in Kuber intensified. The village of Jelinak came under fire from mortar shells. The village was surrounded and the only escape was toward Kaonik. People started fleeing Jelinak on 16-17 April 1993 – there had been fighting all night. On 17 April, the shooting was from all directions, and very close. All the Croats fled towards Kaonik, apart from two old men, one of whom was killed, whilst the other lost part of his leg from an explosion.

289. The BiH army took control of Jelinak on 18 April 1993, and it has been under Muslim control ever since. The same is true of Putis and Loncari. While Muslims who fled the conflict have returned, the Croats have not.

290. When the witness went back to his house in Jelenak on All Saint's Day, he saw that all the Croat houses had been burnt, and that they were abandoned and destroyed. The witness further pointed out that in Jelinak, it was the Croats who kept pigs, not the Muslims, who traditionally do not keep pigs. Thus if pigs were killed in Jelinak,[332] a plausible inference is that they were killed by Muslim forces. The witness also heard that Muslims had set houses in Putis and Bakija on fire around 18 April 1993. He, the witness, has not returned to his house to this day. The Prosecution submitted that his testimony was consistent with the whole Kuber area being one big battle-zone between Croats and Muslims, rather than one-sided "ethnic cleansing".[333]

(c) Bosnian Army Attacks on Croatian Villages in the Vicinity of Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993

291. The Defence further argues that the Bosniacs attacked the villages of Počulica, Krušcica, Brdo, Sivrino Selo and Bukina Kuca (Kuca) on 16 April 1993. The following witnesses testified concerning this: Zvonimir Cili},[334] Vlado Alilovi},[335] Rudo Kurevija[336] and Zeljko Papi}.[337]

292. Dragan Grebenar testified[338] that Počulica was shelled by the Muslims on 16 April 1993. Počulica was a village bordering on Ahmi}i with a majority Croat population, surrounded by Muslim villages. Prnjavor and Vrhovine were exclusively Muslim, whereas the upper part of the village of Počulica was mixed and the lower part of the village was populated exclusively by Croats. On 16 April 1993, around 5 a.m., a Croat woman called villagers to warn them that Počulica would be attacked by the Muslims from Vrhovine, Prnjavor and Veternica.[339] Subsequently, the witness testified, Počulica was shelled. The witness then heard the Hodža from the Mosque declaring, "Croats, you have five minutes to surrender or there'll be a slaughter".[340] The Muslims entered the village and the Croats tried to flee. The witness evacuated his house, under

In fact, would it -- to the best of your knowledge, Mr. Plavcić, wasn't there, in fact, just the area becoming a large battle zone with damage to both Croatian and Muslim properties? A. That is correct, that on the 18th all houses in the village of Jelinak and Putis, in Putis the Croatian houses and in the village of Jelinak all the houses were burning on the 18th, that's what I heard in Busovača that all the houses were on fire".

very heavy fire and was hit by shrapnel. He then reached Krizancevo Selo. One Croat was killed "in action", whilest other Croats were taken prisoner by the Mujahedin and killed by them.[341] All forty-two Croat houses, in the lower, Croat part of Počulica were burned down. Some houses were also burned down in the upper part of the village and towards the border with Visnjica.[342]

293. Grebenar testified that no Croat houses have since been rebuilt in Počulica nor have any of the 400 Croats who lived in Počulica returned after having been evacuated on 16 April 1993.[343] However, he did not himself see any Muslim soldiers on 16 April 1993 in the lower part of the village nor did he see where the shelling of his village came from; he relied on what people told him to form his opinion that the shelling came from certain Muslim positions; from trenches which had been dug around Tolovići.

294. The witness also admitted that his house had been burned down about a week after the attack of 16 April 1993, and therefore that the Croat houses might have been burned down later in reprisal for the massacres and destruction of property committed against the Muslims in Ahmi}i.

295. The witness testified that the Mujahedin forced Croat captives to dig trenches. He also admitted that he heard that the Croats made Muslim captives do the same.[344]

296. Zeljko Papi} also testified concerning the "ethnic cleansing" of Croats by Muslims in Počulica. On 16 April 1993, around 5.30 a.m., the witness was awoken by large explosions coming from the direction of Vitez. He went and hid in his basement with his family.[345] He could not identify who was shelling whom.[346] During the attack, [341] Anto Kristo was killed in action, apparently by a sniper within the village; the witness's neighbours Pero Papi}, Ivo Vidovi} and Jozo Vidovi} were killed while prisoners, T. 5994-5995. A Muslim from the village was also killed on 16 April 1993.

the witness saw armed soldiers going around "clearing" the Croat houses. He believed from the insignia that they were Muslim armed forces.[347]

297. The Croats were ordered out of their basement with their hands up. Some old people were left in the basement, where conditions were terrible. The witness's grandmother, who was over 80, died there. The others were marched in a column to Prnjavor. There the witness was imprisoned in the Community Centre. The army and police took him from there to dig trenches in Sivrono Selo. The Croats were occasionally used as human shields against shooting from the Croatian side.

298. The food and conditions at the community centre were terrible – the detainees had to lie on a concrete floor and there were insufficient blankets for the thirty people incarcerated there. They had to lie down in their clothes. They were often provoked by the soldiers. One soldier beat them up and made them shout Muslim prayers.

299. On 23 or 24 April 1993, in the community centre the witness was shot and was eventually taken to hospital, where he stayed until 13 May 1993 when he was exchanged.

300. The witness never returned to Počulica because Muslim refugees were now living in the Croat houses there. The Catholic church and graveyard in Zvisda were desecrated – the chapel was burnt, the gravestones broken.

301. The witness declared that he had seen foreign Mujahedin on 16 April 1993.[348]

[347] T. 6574. "At that moment uniformed soldiers of the Muslim nationality, in groups of about five to six men, there were quite a few groups made up of five to six men, and they took control and surrounded the Croatian houses, and their tactics were first to throw devices which led to strong detonation. From these explosions you could hear glass being shattered and things being destroyed in the houses".

[348] T. 6592-6593: "Q. And how did you know they were Mujahedins? A. Well, they didn't hide the fact. They had the scarfs that they wore. They did not understand Serbo Croatian and they were dark skinned compared to us that is. But, as I was born there, I knew, at least by sight, all the locals, including Počulica and Prnjavor from Vrhovine and Vjetrenica and further afield as well. Q. Did they instil fear in the Croats? A. Yes. Q. In what way did they do this? A. Well, they made us afraid of them because when they would

(d) The Attack on Ahmi}i

(i) The Eve of the Attack – 15 April 1993

a. The Kidnapping of Zivko Toti} and the Killing of his Escorts

302. In addition to the attacks on the villages, the kidnapping of Zivko Toti} and the killing of his bodyguards on 15 April 1993 is said to have had a disruptive effect on relations between Muslims and Croats. Toti} was the head of the HVO Military Police in Zenica.[349] Four or five of his bodyguards were killed during his kidnapping, allegedly by Muslim forces.[350] Toti} himself was, however, eventually released. [351]

b. 15 April 1993 in Ahmi}i

303. According to the Defence, and contrary to the assertions of Prosecution witnesses, there were no harbingers of the attack on Ahmi}i on 15 April 1993. Defence witnesses stated that everything was as normal that day. One witness (DC/1,2) described how her children went to school as usual, and that she went to Ankica Kupre{ki}'s house to greet her upon her return to the village after being in Germany where, again, everything was normal.[352] Most defence witnesses testified that they were not aware of the impending conflict.[353]

304. Ankica Kupre{ki} returned from Germany to Ahmi}i on 15 April 1993, following reports from her husband that the situation in Bosnia had returned to normality. She said there were no real fears of a Muslim offensive in Vitez at the time, even though she had heard about the Toti} kidnapping incident, and had seen a lot of Muslim roadblocks en route to Ahmi}i. That night people came to visit her and the party went on until midnight. No Muslim neighbors visited her but the witness did not know why this was so. During the conversations of that night, nobody mentioned any possible danger.[354] Gordana Cui}, who visited Ivica and Ankica Kupre{ki} that night, also testified that there was no discussion of an imminent attack.[355] Mirko Saki} testified that the men at the party did speak about the problems in central Bosnia, including the kidnapping of Commander Toti}.

305. Ivica Kupre{ki},[356] the husband of Ankica Kupre{ki}, picked up his wife at the airport on 15 April 1993. He was warned of the tensions caused by the Toti} kidnapping on 15 April 1993 when he passed through HVO and BiH army roadblocks. He arrived home around 6:30 p.m., and subsequently the above-mentioned gathering took place at his home until around midnight.

306. Niko Saki} testified that he had no idea that there would be an attack on 16 April 1993, otherwise he would have warned his Muslim neighbours.[357]

(ii) That the Attack on Ahmi}i was not Planned by the HVO in Advance

307. The Defence have called witnesses to prove that the HVO had no foreknowledge of the attack which was launched on 16 April 1993.

308. Witness DA/5, who at the relevant time was working to organise the HVO's Vitez brigade testified that on 15 April 1993, she had heard no mention of an imminent attack by the HVO.[358]

(iii) The Attack as a Military Operation

309. In contradiction to the depiction of the Ahmi}i massacre as the product of a Muslim assault for which Croat forces were unprepared, the Defence has at the same time argued that Ahmi}i was of strategic value, and therefore a legitimate military target. Vlado Divkovi} said that Vitez was of strategic value to the BiH army, in particular because of the Vitezit factory, of which he was the manager, which supplied both the HVO and the BiH army in 1992-1993 with materiél such as casings.[359] Similarly, it would have been very dangerous had the Vitez factory been shelled or fallen into enemy hands.[360]

310. The Defence denied that Ahmi}i was targeted because of its religious significance. Zvonimir Cili} stated that Ahmi}i was not special in terms of Islam. If anything, the town was known merely as being more urban than other villages in the area.[361]

(iv) Bosnian Croat Eye-witnesses to the Events in Ahmi}i of 16 April 1993

311. A large number of defence witnesses have been called to testify as to what happened in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993. While the Muslim inhabitants of Ahmi}i uniformly relate a story of violent eviction from their houses and the murder of their loved ones, the Croat inhabitants have a different, but equally uniform, account of the conflict. The Croat inhabitants of Ahmi}i were generally warned of an impending attack in the very early hours of 16 April 1993, if not earlier. Dragan Vidovi} explained that around 2-2:30 a.m., on 16 April 1993, he had a telephone call from Nenad [anti} saying that there was a problem and he should go to the house of Jozo Livanci}. When he arrived there, various people were already gathered. Ivica Vidovi}, who was in charge of civil defence in Ahmi}i-[anti}i-Pirići, said that there was some information that the Muslims were about to attack and that the Croats should take themselves and their families to a safe place.[362] Dragan Vidovi} then went and woke up various Croats and told them to go to the shelters. He took his family to the shelter in Niko Saki}'s house.

312. Ivica Kupre{ki} was awoken by Dragan Vidovi} at 4 a.m., and warned of a possible attack by the Muslims; he was told that he should take his family to a shelter. He woke his wife, Ankica Kupre{ki}. She packed some clothes and food and left for the shelter at about 4:55 a.m. She went to the house of Dragan and Jelena Trajanovski (the so-called Vrebac shelter). She was one of the first to arrive there. Mirjan Kupre{ki} arrived five to ten minutes later, pushing his sick mother in a wheelbarrow, accompanied by his wife and their two children. Zoran Kupre{ki} also came to the shelter. Ankica Kupre{ki} stayed there until 17 April 1993 when she was evacuated to Donja Rovna.[363] She was told the conflict was the result of an attack by the Muslims on Mahala. According to the witness, the shooting continued on 17 April 1993 as well[364]; in other words, it went on for two days.

313. Ivica Kupre{ki} returned to his house after having taken his family to the shelter, and he could see smoke and flames everywhere. He saw soldiers going in the direction of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. He also saw Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} evacuating their families. He hid in a boiler room near the Kupre{ki} houses. Two soldiers ran in, one in black, one in a camouflage uniform.[365] The soldiers told him to run to his house to get brandy for them. They said they were Jokers.

[362] T. 8424-8425: "Q. Can you tell us what Ivica Vidović, Jevco, told you what (sic) to do? A. He explained that there was some problems, that it was possible that we would be attacked by the Muslims, and that I should go and tell my family and my other neighbours and that I should take them to shelters. He told me, since it was on my way, to drop in to Niko Sakić's house and tell him that he should do the same in his area, to do what I was to do in my area".

[363] T. 7871: "Q. Then when did you leave this shelter and where did you go to? A. Then they told us that the Muslims, the Mujahedin had barged into Krtina Mahala, and many women and children down there were running. They were crying and screaming, and they were barefoot and hardly -- they hardly had any clothes on. [...All] these people who ran out of Krtina Mahala were evacuated to Donja Rovna".

[365] T. 7979-7980: "They had automatic rifles with them, and they had rounds of ammunition and several hand grenades. They had black bands over their foreheads, and they had paint on their faces. One of them had an M-48 rifle slung over his shoulder".

314. Milutin Vidovi} was awoken at 4.30 a.m., on 16 April 1993 by his father. He thought it was a false alarm as there had been many before. All his Croat neighbours were gathering in front of his house. Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} passed with their families, moving in the direction of Zume, and then returned. After the shooting started, the witness, Zoran Kupre{ki} and others went in the direction of a depression below the Kupre{ki} houses referred to as Dolina.[366] Several local Croats are alleged to have spent most of the day there, including Milutin Vidovi}, Zoran Kupre{ki}, and Mirjan Kupre{ki}.[367]

315. After about fifteen minutes in the depression, the group of men saw smoke rising from the direction of the Kupre{ki} houses. Between 9 a.m. and 10 a.m., Zoran Kupre{ki} and the witness went to see their families. They stopped by Milutin Vidovi}'s house first and went to the cellar. Milutin Vidovi} saw his and other families there. Zoran Kupre{ki}, Mirjan Kupre{ki} and Milutin Vidovi} then went in the direction of Zume to see the Kupre{ki} families. They met Anto Vidovi} on the way, who told them that one of their friends, Fahran Ahmi}, had been killed and "Mirjan Kupre{ki} literally started to cry, because they played in the band together and they were practically inseparable".[368]

316. On 18 April 1993, the group in the depression was taken by military policemen to some sort of front line in Pirići to dig trenches. It was the first time that they saw that the Muslim houses had been burnt down and that there were dead Muslims. Enver Sahi} was one of them. Zoran Kupre{ki} cried because they had been friends.[369]

[369] Dragan Vidovi}, T. 8446: "Q. Did you talk with the Military Police who brought you up there? A. Yes. About 20 metres before we reached the place where we stopped, one of those two said to us to guard that line well, and I quote him: "Because if the Muslims break through that line they will do to you the same that we did to them". Q. When you say "we", who do you mean? A. Those two military police members". - The witness dug in there and stayed there until the end of the war. The group of armed soldiers that went by had white belts, so he assumed they were military police. All had their faces painted, apart from Mirjan [anti}, a local whom he recognised. On 18 April 1993, they received instructions from the Military Police to dig trenches in Piri}i.

317. Croat inhabitants of Ahmi}i who had not been warned earlier of the impending conflict stated that they had been woken around 5:30 a.m., on 16 April 1993 by heavy gunfire. According to Croat witnesses, the gunfire apparently came from the direction of Busovača and Ahmi}i.[370] Ivo Vidovi} went out to the street where he could see people fleeing and he asked them what was going on. They replied that Muslim units had attacked Ahmi}i and that they were fleeing to a shelter. He fetched his family and also went towards a shelter.[371] Ljubica Milicevi} also took her children and left her house, first towards the woods, and then to a shelter. Goran Males was woken up by his mother, who had heard the shooting. Realising the seriousness of the situation, Males went to Rijeka to protect his farm. He went to the area called Cerveno Brdce, a defence line on a hill, where he stayed throughout the war.

318. Zdenko Raji} received a telephone call from Karlo Grabovac informing him that a conflict had broken out in Ahmi}i. He was ordered to go to Cerveno Brdce, on high ground some 200-300 metres from his house. He was tasked with seeing that the Muslims did not advance from the Vraniska area. The line of defence was established at Cerveno Brdce and covered about four kilometres. There were approximately 130 men at the defence line, including Goran Males. Zdenko Raji} pointed out the importance to the Croats of holding Radak bridge near Rijeka, since the Muslims blocked the road between Busovača and Vitez at Buhine Kuce.[372] Traffic had therefore to go through Rijeka and pass over Radak bridge, as the only way to get to Busovača via Nadioci. The witness stated that the Croats in the area would have been completely cut off if the bridge was inoperable, so units were sent to protect it from sabotage by the BiH army.

[371] T. 6950: "Q. Where did you go with your wife and children, to which shelter? A. I started toward the house of Jozo where all the others had been going because this had been our shelter before. When the Serbian planes flew over, we always took shelter there. ... I stayed for about ten minutes, then I went out to see what was going on and I met other people coming to the shelter. I talked to them about what was going on, because we didn't know what was happening. Q. Did you meet anyone who told you to go somewhere? A. I met Nenad Šantić, the commander of my village guard. Q. What did Nenad Šantić say to you? A. Nenad told me that I had to go and defend the bridge, Radakov Most, immediately'.

(e) Casualties on Both Sides in Vitez and Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993

319. Dragan Stojak testified that 1,300 – 1,400 Croats were killed during the conflict in Vitez and that almost 5,000 were wounded.[373] This figure, however, was for the whole war period, so it included those killed in the war with the Serbs. Under cross-examination by the Prosecution, it appeared that very few Croats died on 16 April 1993,[374] despite the witness's contention that the fighting on that day in Mahala was very intense and that Croats were killed there, including one who had had his throat slit.

320. Rudo Vidovi} and other defence witnesses consistently emphasised that there were casualties on both sides in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993. However, while no defence witness contested that more than one hundred Muslims died in Ahmi}i on that day, only one Croat death is consistently mentioned, namely that of Mirjan [anti}.[375] Vlado Alilovi} testified that five Croats were killed in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993; however, he could name only Mirjan [anti}, whom he knew. Moreover, whereas the vast majority of Muslim victims were civilians, Mirjan [anti} was a soldier.

(f) The Jokers and/or a Special Unit Committed the Attack on Ahmi}i

321. Many defence witnesses from Ahmi}i testified to having seen a large group of 30-40 armed soldiers in Ahmi}i on the morning of 16 April 1993, moving about at around 5 a.m., from Zume in the direction of the Kupre{ki} houses.

322. Milutin Vidovi} described seeing thirty well-armed individuals as he went to Niko Saki}'s shelter at 5 a.m., on 16 April 1993. The soldiers were in camouflage uniforms, with blackened faces and automatic rifles. The witness said they "looked like something out of a ninja film".[376] The soldiers also had white belts and Military Police insignia.

323. Dragan Vidovi} testified that he saw a group of soldiers that morning which appeared to be Military Police.[377]

324. Witness DC/1,2 saw a smaller group of soldiers: "They were all wearing camouflage uniforms. They were all in black, their faces were painted, all smeared. And I was so frightened [...]".[378]

325. Other defence witnesses who testified to seeing this group of soldiers in the early hours of 16 April 1993 moving from Zume towards the Kupre{ki} houses include Mirko Saki} [379] and Niko Saki}.[380]

[377] Note that Witness E recognised a soldier who worked in Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s Sutre store. T. 1270: "[...] Q. Can you please tell this Court where you felt you had seen that person before? In what circumstances? A. Well, this person that I have just described, I went to the Sutre shop cellar twice, three times, and there I met a similar person. [...]. Dragan Vidovi} said that Mirjan [anti}, whom he saw in the group of armed soldiers, used to work at Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s store, T. 8428 - 8429: "He was in the warehouse often. He would come to Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s warehouse often, and he knew the place. He moved around a lot. [...] Q. Could you tell us whether that shop, [which] was in Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s warehouse was the only shop that operated in those three villages of [anti}i, Pirići, and Ahmi}i? A. Yes, at that time, it was the only one that was working, so almost all the neighbours would come to the shop and buy the food that they needed".

[379] Mirko Saki}, T. 7614–7615, said that on the morning of 16 April 1993, shortly after he saw Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} pass with their families moving in the direction of Zume, maybe five or ten minutes after that a group of about 25 or 30 armed men appeared. Some were camouflaged, some were in black uniforms. They were fully armed, with RPGs, some with their faces painted in dark paint. The witness recognised one man, Mirjan Šantic. Some had white belts, which suggested a Military Police unit. They came from the direction of Zume, and went towards the Kupre{ki} houses.

[380] Niko Saki}, T. 8263–8265, saw 30-35 well-armed, uniformed soldiers pass by his house around 5.30 a.m., on 16 April 1993. Their faces were painted; each had two weapons. They went in the direction of the warehouse of Vlatko Kupre{ki}. They had white belts and pistol casings, holsters and some kind of coloured bands tied to their shoulders. Saki} also mentioned that there were Muslim as well as Croat families in the shelter of Niko Vidović on 16 April 1993 (the witness moved from the Vrebac shelter to the Vidovi} shelter at around 5 p.m., on 16 April 1993 because they were told it was safer) and thus the Muslims were not discriminated against: "Q. Who did you see in the shelter? Did you see both Croats and Muslims, and who were they? A. There were both Muslims and Croats in the basement. From the Muslims, there were three families. ... Q. Were the Muslims who were in the shelter with you also afraid, in the shelter of Niko Vidović, the Bilici and the Strmonja families? A. They were not afraid of us, the neighbours, but they were afraid just because of the gunfire, but I don't think that they would have been there if they had been afraid of us. Q. Did they know that the family -- the Ramic and the Strmonja families were in that shelter? A. Yes, they did, and from my house, from Mirko's apartment on the first

326. Ivica Kupre{ki} saw two soldiers possibly belonging to this group as he hid in the boiler room near the Kupre{ki} houses.[381] "They had automatic rifles with them, and they had rounds of ammunition and several hand grenades. They had black bands over their foreheads, and they had paint on their faces. One of them had an M-48 rifle slung over his shoulder".

327. The accused Zoran Kupre{ki} gave evidence before the Trial Chamber. He stated that by April 1993 the situation was not good: there had been talk about crimes against Croats in Dusina and La{va and he had heard rumours that there were Muhajedin in the vicinity of Piri}i. There were numerous refugees in Ahmići. Soldiers fired weapons in the air. There was apprehension but Zoran Kupre{ki} was not afraid of his neighbours.[382]

328. He said that he was at work until 2 p.m. on 15 April 1993 and then went into Vitez for a coffee with Senad Topoljak and Dragan Grebenar. Just before dusk his uncle Ivica brought his wife from Split. The accused and his wife went to Ivica's house that evening after 8 p.m., and stayed for half an hour. Zoran Kupre{ki} then went home, and to bed about midnight.[383]

329. When cross-examined about the evidence of Witness V, Zoran Kupre{ki} said he saw nothing of what Witness V claimed to have seen outside Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house; nor did anyone else mention it. None of the Kupre{ki}s left that night.[384]

330. Mirjan Kupre{ki} also gave evidence. He testified that on 15 April 1993 he was at work in the Sutre shop in Vitez. Friends came to the shop, such as Zdravko Vrebac and Veljko Cato. Mirjan Kupre{ki} finished work at 5 p.m. and went to the café where floor, Mirko came and Zoran came, and they called some woman called Ranka who used to work in UNPROFOR with ^, to make the Bilic and Strmonja families, to get them out of there. I don't know if they succeeded in that. Q. Who told them to call UNPROFOR? A. Because they could see them there -- I don't know who told them. I talked to them and I said it would be good to get those families out of there".

the musicians usually met. He noticed nothing unusual. About an hour and a half later he was taken home by Zdravko's cousin. There was only the regular checkpoint on the road and nothing out of the ordinary. When he arrived at home he found his son was ill. He went to Ivica's house and returned at 11 p.m.[385]

331. The accused Vlatko Kupre{ki} testified that he left with Ivica on 14 April 1993 for Split in the latter's car.[386] They arrived at Split at about 12 noon and bought salt, jeans and sneakers, all of which they put in the boot of the car. At about 9 p.m., they met Ivica's wife Ancika at the airport and spent the night in Baska Voda.[387]

332. On 15 April 1993, Vlatko Kupre{ki} arrived in Ahmići at about 6.30 p.m. He unloaded and prepared the goods which were to be delivered to Travnik the next morning. There were no soldiers at Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house or the shop that evening.[388] He had nothing to do with the attack and in no way helped with the preparations.[389] He denied having been outside the Hotel Vitez on 15 April or having been,[390] on 15 April, in the company of a group of soldiers, in front of his shop with soldiers, or on the balcony of his house.[391]

3. Findings of the Trial Chamber

333. The Trial Chamber considers that the Prosecution has adduced convincing evidence to show that the attack on Ahmići on 16 April 1993 was planned by HVO forces and the special unit of the Croatian Military Police called the Jokers. The Croatian inhabitants of Ahmići, or at least those of them who belonged to the HVO or were in contact with Croatian armed forces, knew that in the early morning of the 16 April 1993, Croatian forces would initiate a massive military attack. It is plausible to maintain that they acquired the conviction that an attack would be carried out at least on the occasion of the meeting that was held around 2.30 a.m., on 16 April, in Jozo Livancić's house. The Trial Chamber regards as credible the evidence led by the Prosecution to the effect that by 15 April many signs already indicated that a military operation was in the offing, and that many Croats were aware of this.

334. The Trial Chamber finds that the attack was carried out by military units of the HVO and members of the Jokers. The able-bodied Croatian inhabitants of Ahmići provided assistance and support in various forms. Some of them took part in the military operations against the Muslims. It is also true, however, that a few Croatian inhabitants of Ahmići endeavoured to save Muslim friends or neighbours by prompting them to escape and helping them in such attempts, or at any rate by providing them with suggestions as to how to avoid being killed.

335. The attackers targeted Muslim civilians and their houses. The Trial Chamber considers it to have been proved that there were no Muslim military forces in Ahmići nor any military establishment belonging to the BiH army. In addition to the men not of military age, the elderly, women and children, there were also able-bodied Muslims who were members on leave from the BiH army, or reservists who participated in the village guards. When the Croatian forces initiated the attack, not more than 10-15 Muslims in the upper part of Ahmići and not more than 10-15 Muslims in the lower part of the village responded by the use of arms. Given the patent disparity in number and in military equipment between the combatants, the Muslim response was clearly directed only toward the protection of a few houses where some survivors of the initial attack had taken shelter. Possibly the Muslim combatants also hoped to limit as much as possible the massacre of civilians.

336. The purpose of the attack was to destroy as many Muslim houses as possible, to kill all the men of military age, and thereby prompt all the others to leave the village and move elsewhere. The burning of the Muslim houses and the killing of the livestock were clearly intended to deprive the people living there of their most precious assets. It should be noted that, as convincingly proved by the testimony of a court expert witness, the Norwegian anthropologist Dr. Bringa,[392] the house and livestock had for their owners not only economic value, but also and probably even more importantly, emotional, psychological and cultural significance. The house represented the moral unity of the household and the moral character of its members. For the man as a father, the house he managed to build symbolised his social value, his commitment to his family and to their future well-being. For the women in particular, due to the communist tradition of repression of public religious life, the house was also the place where religious and ritual life could unfold. In addition, the house was a very important place for socialising; the seat of social links with other people. In short, to attack one's house meant to attack one's whole being.[393] Also the livestock, in addition to their economic value, took on a symbolic significance (for instance because Croats had pigs and Muslims did not).[394]

337. The Trial Chamber also finds that the attacks carried out on the Muslim inhabitants of Ahmići constituted a form of "personalised violence", as defined by Dr. Bringa; that is, violence directed at specific persons because of their ethnic identity.[395]

338. In short, the Trial Chamber finds that the Croatian attack of 16 April 1993 in Ahmići was aimed at civilians for the purpose of "ethnic cleansing". Whether the forced expulsion of Muslims from Ahmići was motivated by the strategic purpose of removing a Muslim pocket as the route between Busovača and Vitez, or was instead conceived of as a retaliation against the attacks by Muslim armed forces on Kuber and a few [393] As Court Witness Bringa put it, "the house you managed to build throughout your lifetime, when that's destroyed it's not only a physical thing that's destroyed, but it feels -- it's an attack on your whole being because you put so much into it" (T.10932).

[395] Court Witness Bringa illustrated this type of violence by citing a Muslim woman of another village who had told the witness that she was not scared of shells or grenades, "because there is just death and it is immediate. What I am terrified of are the pjesadija, the foot soldiers who come into my house, force themselves into my house. Maybe they rape, they kill your children in front of your eyes. F...ğ Shells don't ask me my name" (T. 10985-10986). "That's the point" -- observed the witness --"because from your name you can usually tell which ethnic identity you have" (ibid.). According to this witness, the foot soldiers mentioned by the Muslim woman "attack their F...ğ very being F...ğ the sense of their identity, by going in and attacking them personally" (T. 11016).

predominantly or exclusively Croatian villages of the area is a question that the Trial Chamber may leave unresolved for the purposes of this case.

IV. THE ROLE OF THE ACCUSED

339. In determining the role of the accused, the Trial Chamber has kept at the forefront of its consideration the following:

(a) The presumption of innocence embodied in Article 21 of the Statute which provides that the accused should be presumed innocent until proved guilty. This means that the burden of proof is on the Prosecution and before the defendant may be convicted of any offence the Prosecution must convince the Trial Chamber (beyond any reasonable doubt) of the defendant's guilt.

(b) The principle that the case against each accused must be considered separately. The fact that the accused have been tried together does not mean that their cases should not receive separate consideration. Accordingly the Trial Chamber has given separate consideration to the case of each accused.

(c) In cases where the Prosecution relies upon identification evidence, the Trial Chamber bears in mind the need to proceed with caution in connection with such evidence, particularly in cases where a witness obtained no more than a fleeting glance of a suspect. For instance, in the leading English case, the Court of Appeal pointed out the danger inherent in such evidence: i.e. that a witness can easily be mistaken about identification and that an honest but mistaken witness can be a convincing one.[396]

(d) All the accused are of good character and have called evidence to this effect. Due weight has been given in each case to this factor.

(e) The accused, Drago Josipović, Vladimir Šantić and Dragan Papić, did not give evidence. It is their right not to do so. As already noted the Statute encapsulates the presumption of innocence in Article 21(3). The Statute also provides that an accused shall not be compelled to testify against himself: Article 21(4)(g). Accordingly, no inference is to be drawn from the fact that these accused did not give evidence.

340. The Trial Chamber will now consider the case involving each accused.

A. Dragan Papić

1. Introduction

341. Although named fifth in the indictment, it will be convenient to deal with the case involving this accused first since he is charged only in Count 1. The Prosecution case against Dragan Papi} is that he played an active role in the armed conflict in October 1992, and that thereafter he was an active participant on the Croatian side, that he made preparations for the conflict on 16 April 1993 and that he took part in that conflict. The Defence case is that the accused was non-partisan, and that he played no active part in either conflict.

2. Background

342. Dragan Papi} is aged 32, having been born on 15 July 1967. A forester before the war, he lived with his family (including Ivo, his father) on the main road in Ahmi}i, not far from the junction of the road leading to Lower Ahmi}i. He is listed in the Register of the HVO Vitez Brigade as being a reservist between 8 April 1992 and 15 January 1996.[397] He was described by Witness D as a "good neighbour" before the war,[398] but another neighbour, Abdulah Ahmi}, testified that during the war he "changed completely".[399]

343. Abdulah Ahmi} testified that during a conversation in 1991, Dragan Papi} told him that he was studying German fascist literature, and that he supported the fascist method of destroying Jews and other nations; that he admired Hitler as a military leader who had organised the army and people well. Dragan Papi} said that it was necessary to apply this among the Croats.[400]

344. Prior to 16 April 1993, Dragan Papi} invited one of the refugees in Ahmi}i, Witness A, to his house for a chat and told him that he had been at the front as a sniper in the Blackshirts Unit. Dragan Papi} reproached Witness A and his family for being in Ahmi}i as refugees.[401]

345. On the other hand, his younger brother, Goran, said that Dragan Papi} was not a member of the HVO, and was not interested in politics. He was friendly with Muslims.[402] This evidence was supported by that of Dragan Papi}'s cousin, Pero Papi}[403] and Goran Males.[404] Another witness said that he had not heard Dragan Papi} express any negative attitude towards Muslims, who were willing to have their cars repaired by him, and that he went to Muslim funerals.[405] Statements were also produced from a family friend and a Franciscan friar, a parish priest in Vitez. They speak of Dragan Papi} as a friendly man with an easy-going nature, on good terms with his neighbours.[406] Another witness who knew him said that he was a hard worker who joked a lot and was not violent.[407]

3. His Conduct During the Armed Conflict on 20 October 1992

(a) Prosecution Evidence

346. Several witnesses gave evidence concerning the participation of Dragan Papi} in the armed conflict in October 1992. Mehmed Ahmi} gave evidence that Dragan Papi} fired at him and his house with an automatic weapon. The witness owned a shop on the main road opposite the Papi} house where he lived with his family above the shop: he and Ivo Papi} had been close as the latter was his neighbour and plumber. On 20 October 1992 at 5.30 a.m., the witness awoke to an explosion. At 7.30 a.m., he and his wife opened the shutters of their house to be met with a burst of gunfire from the Papi} house. The witness saw Dragan Papi} open fire from the front right upper floor window of his house. Dragan Papi} was wearing a black uniform and was using an automatic rifle.[408] Firing then started from all sides and the roof was set on fire with tracer bullets. At about 4 p.m., there was a lull in the shooting and the witness escaped to his father's house. To do so he crawled with a four-year-old child under his arm, following female relatives. Soldiers opened fire on him from the wood near the Papi} house (about 150 metres from the witness's house). Among the soldiers who were shooting at him he saw Dragan Papi}, who was using an anti-aircraft machine gun.[409] In cross-examination, it was pointed out that in his statement, the witness had said that it was the HVO who were firing the anti-aircraft guns at him, and not Dragan Papi}. However, the witness stated that he could observe and crawl with his child at the same time.[410]

347. The same day, after the shooting, when another prosecution witness, Fahrudin Ahmi}, a neighbour of the Papi}'s, was on his way to his house, he was stopped by Dragan Papi} and another man and told that he had to ask Slavko Skoro for permission to return home. They were dressed in camouflage uniform and were standing near a bunker and a machine gun. [411] The next day Dragan Papi} and the other man came to the witness's house and asked "Why don't you monkeys surrender?"[412] Dragan Papi} had a bomb fuse with him. He said to the witness that unless weapons were handed over they would be shelled.[413]

(b) Defence Evidence

348. The Defence case is that Dragan Papi} was not involved in the fighting that day. When the firing started, he fled with his family into the wood behind their house. From there he went to Rovna where he spent the day.

349. Four witnesses gave evidence about the events of that day concerning Dragan Papi}:

(a) His brother, Goran, said that the family were awoken by gunfire and heard a voice from the mosque calling on the Croats to give themselves up, together with their weapons. He and his family fled from their house and hid in the wood behind the house and then went to Rovna. There was no anti-aircraft gun in the wood.[414]

(b) Dragan Papi}'s cousin, Pero Papi}, said that he saw Dragan Papi} in the wood at about 5.30 a.m. with his wife and that Dragan Papi} went to Rovna. When cross-examined about Mehmed Ahmi}'s evidence about seeing Dragan Papi} and others armed in the wood, the witness said that this was incorrect and that Dragan Papi} only passed through the wood early on. Dragan Papi} spent the whole day in Rovna. The witness spent most of the day in the woods and testified that nobody opened fire from the woods or shot at Mehmed Ahmi}'s house.[415]

(c) Zdenko Raji}, a policeman from Vitez, was sent to Ahmići in command of a detachment of soldiers to guard the approaches to the barricade while other troops were attacking it. They went via an old railway line from the road to Rovna to the wood behind the Papi} houses where they remained all day until 4 p.m. On their way to the wood from the railway line between 5 - 5.30 a.m., they met a group of women, children and elderly people together with Dragan Papi}. They said that they were going to Donja Rovna. Dragan Papi} said that he was to take over an M60 mortar to send signals if the BiH Army started to move. The witness also said that nobody shot from the wood and that no PAT anti-aircraft gun was located there.[416]

(d) Zvonimir Šanti}, a resident of Donja Rovna and commander of the village guard said that in Rovna at about 8 a.m., he saw Dragan Papi} wearing a camouflage jacket and carrying an M60 mortar and bag. Dragan Papi} said that he did not know what was happening but there appeared to be a conflict between the Muslims and Croats and Nenad Šanti} had given him orders to go to Niva (about 100 metres from the witness's house).[417] Dragan Papi} remained at Niva until 4 p.m., when he called at the witness's house and asked if he could leave the mortar and bag until Nenad Šanti} sent someone to pick them up.[418]

4. His Conduct in the Period Between the Armed Conflicts

350. Several prosecution witnesses gave evidence of Dragan Papi}'s conduct in the period between the armed conflicts. In particular, they testified as to his role as a supporter of the Croat side and that he was a member of Croat forces in charge of a checkpoint:

(a) During this period Dragan Papi} was seen in the village armed and in uniform and going to the Bungalow.[419] He was seen in uniform carrying a sniper rifle with target sights and a strangulation device.[420] Witness V saw him wearing a black uniform many times.[421] Witness Z also saw him in a black uniform and on one occasion carrying a sniper rifle.[422] Abdulah Ahmi} saw him climbing into a truck carrying an anti-aircraft gun and firing the gun in the air.[423]

(b) Another witness saw a vehicle with an anti-aircraft machine gun in the driveway outside Dragan Papi}'s house.[424]

(c) Shortly after the October conflict, Witness B was stopped at a checkpoint outside the village. Dragan Papi} (who was armed with an M48 rifle) told him that he could not enter the village. Some days later Witness B went to Ahmi}i with Mario Čerkez (an HVO Commander): they came upon a checkpoint on the main road near the Papi} house with a dug-out and machine gun. After a conversation with Mario Čerkez, Dragan Papi} ordered the soldiers to remove all the obstacles.[425] In the witness's opinion, the checkpoint was under the command of Dragan Papi}.

(d) A checkerboard flag was flown outside the Papi} house.[426]

(e) Dragan Papi} was seen with others carrying military crates from Mario Papi}'s house.[427]

(f) Witness N testified that a man whom he was told was Dragan Papi}, wearing a black uniform, threatened him at the Bajram Festival.[428]

351. Others saw Dragan Papi} make specific preparations on 15 April 1993:

(a) Witness A saw Dragan Papi} leaving in a red Lada car with his wife and mother from his house and returning alone about 40 minutes later without them.[429] On 15 April 1993 Witness G overheard his parents saying that Dragan Papi}'s family were leaving and that vehicles were constantly coming and going from his house.[430]

(b) Abdulah Ahmi} was on his way home at 10 p.m. when he heard Ivo Papi} calling for Dragan. The witness noticed a large number of people at the Papi} house but did not pay much attention because people would gather quite frequently at Dragan Papi}'s house and sometimes there would be as many as 30 cars in the yard: friends of his would come to visit and he repaired their cars.[431]

352. On the other hand Goran Papi} gave evidence that Dragan Papi}'s work included the preservation of game; for this work he wore a green uniform and sometimes a camouflage jacket and carried an M48 rifle.[432] Dragan Papi}'s employment book was produced, showing him to have been in employment until 15 April 1993.[433] Ivo Vidovi} said that he saw Dragan Papi} often in forestry uniform and a camouflage jacket, or a camouflage jacket and jeans.[434] Goran Papi} also said that Dragan Papi} had a black uniform (given to him as a present) which he wore so that he would not be stopped at checkpoints: he wore camouflage because everyone was doing it as it was the fashion.[435] Dragan Papi} had neither a rifle with a telescopic sight nor a sniper rifle.[436] There was never a machine gun nor an AA-gun anywhere near the family home.[437] A checkerboard flag was flown on the house on religious holidays – as on other houses.[438]

5. His Conduct During the Attack of 16 April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

353. The Prosecution case is that Dragan Papi} was present in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 and was involved in the attack. When the shooting started Fahrudin Ahmi} and his family fled towards Upper Ahmi}i. Their route took them across the main road near Dragan Papi}'s house. The witness noticed two soldiers bending down next to Ivo Papi}'s house and saw a "glimmer (sic) of the fire from a firearm coming from Dragan Papi}'s window".[439] Shortly after, the witness was shot and wounded in the arm; he saw that the gunfire was coming from Mehmed Ahmi} and Dragan Papi}'s houses.[440]

354. Witness A saw a machine gun in front of Dragan Papi}'s house at one corner facing the road.[441] Witness Z heard gunfire coming from an anti-aircraft gun in a thicket owned by Dragan Papi} and his father.[442]

355. Witness G testified as to Dragan Papi}'s presence, armed and in uniform, in the vicinity of soldiers carrying out executions on 16 April 1993 in Ahmi}i, near the lower mosque. He knew Dragan Papi} because they were neighbours; their parents were close and he saw Dragan Papi} frequently. On the morning of 16 April the family fled their house and Witness G ran ahead of the rest. He came across three soldiers firing towards the village: he saw Dragan Papi} in the doorway of the house of Husein Ahmi} near the soldiers. Dragan Papi} was leaning against the door frame and carrying a rifle and the witness (who knew him) was 100 per cent certain it was him. The witness tried to run, but was cut down by a burst of gunfire. His parents and sisters were running towards him His father asked a soldier to let them pass, but the soldier ordered another soldier to kill them: the order was repeated twice, two bursts of gunfire followed and his parents and one sister (aged 11) were killed. His younger sister (aged 5) miraculously survived.[443]

During the day Witness G remained motionless where he lay, but was able to look around. He saw Dragan Papi} once or twice passing by wearing a camouflage uniform and a hat and in the company of soldiers.[444]

356. Captain Charles Stevens, then Regimental Sergeant-Major of the Cheshire Regiment, was in Ahmi}i some days after the massacre, and met a man who called himself "Dragan" and carried an AK47 rifle. The man indicated that he had killed 32 Muslims by drawing his hand across his throat. Captain Stevens subsequently identified Dragan Papi} in court, stating that "When someone tells you they have killed 32 people, you don't forget their face in a hurry".[445]

(b) Defence Evidence

357. The Defence case is that Dragan Papi} was not involved in any fighting that day. Having taken the women of the family to Rovna early in the morning, he stayed to guard the bridge over the Lašva River where he remained for the next ten days. Accordingly, he was not in Ahmići during the day of 16 April. The following evidence was given in support of this case.

358. Goran Papi} testified that the family again fled to the woods on being awoken by gunfire. Their father told Dragan to take his wife (who was pregnant at the time), mother and the other women to Rovna.[446] Dragan Papi} was seen in the woods by a neighbour who also saw him leaving and going in the direction of Rovna.[447]

359. Zvonimir Šanti} was on Radak bridge over the Lašva River between Ahmići and Rovna. He saw Dragan Papi} with his wife, mother and sister. Dragan Papi} asked the witness if he could put the family up. The witness already had two families in his house and so he put them with his brother, Anto Šanti}.[448] Dragan Papi} took them there and returned twenty minutes later and joined Dragan and Ivo Vidovi} guarding the bridge on the left (i.e., Ahmići) bank. The witness, meanwhile, was on the other side guarding the bridge with three other men. Dragan Papi} was dressed in a camouflage jacket and jeans and had an M48 rifle.[449] Dragan Papi} remained guarding the bridge for 7-10 days and then left.[450]

360. This evidence was supported by that of Ivo Vidovi} who said that he was told by Nenad Šanti} to guard the bridge. He went to the bridge and ten minutes later, at 6.30–7 a.m., Dragan Papi} arrived, coming from Donja Rovna and saying that he had taken his wife, mother and sister to a shelter there.[451] The witness said that he and Dragan Papi} kept guard all day: they had strict orders not to move away. Dragan Papi} did not leave for ten days or so, when Nenad Šanti} allowed him to go home because his wife had had a baby.[452] The witness said that he was one hundred per cent certain that Dragan Papi} did not leave his position for the first eight days of the conflict.[453]

6. Dragan Papi}'s Military Service: Records

361. A Mobilisation Report, an HVO Defence Department Report on Mobilisation in Vitez for the Period 16-28 April 1993, shows that 498 conscripts were mobilised.[454] The list includes all the accused except Vladimir Šanti}: none were on special duty for the elderly or disabled. However, there are no entries showing the date of mobilisation for the accused.

362. According to one witness, the document was produced for the purpose of distributing shares for wartime remuneration and service in the HVO.[455] This was supported by the evidence of a policeman from Vitez, Zdenko Raji}, who said that the purpose was to boost the number of shares received by Croats compared with Muslims;

thus it contained a number of women and elderly persons although some women did work in the non-combatant department of the HVO.[456]

363. In the Register of Members of 1992 Viteska Home Guard Regiment[457], Dragan Papi}'s time of service is shown as being from 8 April 1992 – 15 January 1996. His brother Goran disputed the correctness of this entry.[458]

364. In the List of Members of the 2nd Battalion of the Vitez Brigade of the HVO,[459] Dragan Papi} is described as a courier, having enrolled on 23 June 1992.

7. Findings of the Trial Chamber

365. In the light of the records relating to the accused's military service, it is difficult not to conclude that he was mobilised in the HVO during some of the time relevant to this indictment, although his precise role is not clear. Also, it is not disputed that he wore a uniform and carried a rifle in the village, although the Defence contends that the reason for doing so was connected with his work. The prosecution evidence indicates that he was active on the Croatian side; that he was seen firing an anti-aircraft gun and was active at a checkpoint. However, this evidence is an insufficient basis upon which to convict the accused on Count 1. What must be established is that he took an active part in either (or both) of the armed conflicts in October 1992 and April 1993.

366. In relation to the armed conflict on 20 October 1992, the Prosecution relies on one crucial witness, Mehmed Ahmi}, who identified the accused as shooting from his house early that morning and firing an anti-aircraft machine gun in the afternoon. It has already been noted that there were flaws in this witness's evidence, i.e. his claim to have been able to identify the accused, although he was crawling with his child at the time, and the fact that he did not mention this identification in his statement. In these circumstances the Trial Chamber is unable to accept Mr. Ahmi}'s evidence. There being no other evidence that the accused participated in the armed conflict that day this part of the Prosecution case is not made out.[460]

367. In relation to the attack on 16 April 1993, one witness, Witness G, gave direct evidence for the Prosecution concerning the accused's involvement in the attack. If the Trial Chamber accepts this witness's evidence, it would establish the accused's presence among the attacking forces in the village. However, the Trial Chamber does not find that it can rely on this evidence. This is because the witness made no mention of the presence of Dragan Papi} in any statement to the Office of the Prosecutor until his third witness statement, made only six months before the trial, although he did mention the accused, Dragan Papi}, in his first statement to the authorities of Bosnia-Herzegovina.[461] In cross-examination the witness testified that he had been afraid to do so.[462] He was also very hesitant in his description of the accused's uniform.[463] Witness G was an honest witness who had been through a dreadful ordeal on 16 April 1993. However, he was under the most stressful conditions imaginable and there must be some doubt about the accuracy of his identification of Dragan Papi}.

368. None of the remaining Prosecution evidence is sufficient to establish that Dragan Papi} was an active participant in the conflict, i.e. the evidence to the effect that he was seen driving his wife and mother from his house on 15 April or that people and vehicles were gathered there that evening, or that gunfire was seen coming from his room on 16 April. As for the evidence of Captain Stevens, the Trial Chamber cannot be sure that the witness identified the correct man in court five years after the event. Therefore, the Trial

[460] The evidence of Fahrudin Ahmi} in this connection does not, by itself, establish that the accused was an active participant. Even if it did, it would not be safe to rely on it in the light of the evidence of the four witnesses, called by the Defence, to the effect that the accused was not involved in the armed conflict.

Chamber finds that there is a reasonable doubt as to whether Dragan Papi} participated in the conflict that day.

B. Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki}

1. Introduction

369. It is convenient to summarise the evidence concerning Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} together since their cases are closely connected. These two accused are brothers. At all material times they lived with their families in adjoining houses in a cluster of houses referred to as Grabovi in the centre of the village between Upper and Lower Ahmi}i. The cluster also included the houses of their relatives Vlatko and Ivica Kupre{ki} and their families. The Prosecution case against them may be briefly set out here: (a) Zoran Kupre{ki} was an HVO Commander; (b) on 16 April 1993 they both took an active part in the assault on the Bosniac population of Ahmi}i. In particular, they took part in the murders of their neighbours, the family of Witness KL, of Suhret Ahmi} and Meho Hrstanovi}. They were also seen that same day in Ahmi}i, armed and dressed in camouflage uniforms.

370. Zoran Kupre{ki} is aged 41, having been born on 23 September 1958 in Vitez. He is married with three children. He is a former member of the League of Communists of the SFRY. He was an employee of the Slobodan Princip Seljo factory in Vitez, where he was in charge of maintenance of one of the units.[464]

371. Mirjan Kupre{ki} is 36, having been born on 21 October 1963; he is married with two children. He was employed as a mechanical technician until February 1992 in the Slobodan Princip Seljo factory and from August 1992 until 15 April 1993 he worked for his cousin Ivica, first in the Sutre store in Ahmi}i and then, ten days before the conflict, at the store in Vitez. In April 1994 when he was demobilised he returned to work for Sutre.[465]

2. Background

(a) Introduction

372. There is no dispute that these accused are of good character. Evidence to this effect was given by prosecution witnesses. They and their cousin Vlatko were described as growing up as fine, decent, well-behaved young men.[466] A neighbour, Witness D, knew both brothers: she said that they were good neighbours and did nothing bad to the Muslims nor showed them hatred. However, she also said that when they started talking of "Herceg-Bosna" the old intimacy was gone.[467] Witness S said that he had very good relations with Zoran with whom he socialised, and that Mirjan showed no signs of extremism.[468] At the Muslim feast of Bajram, held in March of 1993, Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} and their families celebrated at Fahrudin ("Fahran") Ahmi}'s house.[469]

373. The Defence called evidence to similar effect. Zoran Kupre{ki} was a member of the SPS Cultural Association, a multi-ethnic folklore society which performed dances of all ethnicities and to all groups. Zoran Kupre{ki} resisted pressure to join a purely Croatian association. At the end of March 1993 the folklore group performed at the Muslim festival of Bajram; several days before the conflict in April, the group performed in Mosunj to celebrate the Catholic holiday of Easter.[470]

374. Mirjan Kupre{ki} said he was brought up with Muslims and was on good terms with them. Muslims were close friends to his parents, including some close neighbours: Witness KL was one, but there were misunderstandings about the boundary. Mirjan

Kupre{ki} was also a member of the folklore society and was close friends with some members including Fahran Ahmi} and other Muslims and Serbs.[471]

375. Much evidence was given of the activities of Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} within this folklore or Cultural and Arts Society, in which they were described as leading figures.[472] For instance, Zdravko Vrebac said that in 1993 the Society was half Muslim and half Croat with some Serbs. Zoran Kupre{ki} was the main choreographer; Mirjan Kupre{ki} saw to the music together with the witness and Fahrudin Ahmić. These four were the principals.[473] The Society held frequent rehearsals and performed at weddings and other events in Vitez. In 1993 they performed for UNPROFOR.[474] Rudo Vidovi}, Director of the Telecom Centre for Central Bosnia, whose family home is in Ahmići and who grew up with Zoran Kupre{ki}, described him as having similar characteristics to the witness himself; a competitive spirit, upright, hardworking. The witness said that Mirjan Kupre{ki} was younger and had the same characteristics as Zoran Kupre{ki}.[475] Zoran Kupre{ki} was a member of the League of Communists but was not active after the elections. They did not express extremist views.[476] Zoran Kupre{ki}'s superior at work in the Princip factory, Ivan Tabara, said that Zoran Kupre{ki} as Head of Maintenance for machinery used for military production had 28 machine operators of mixed ethnicity under him: he had a correct attitude towards them and was responsible and regular in his attendance at work.[477] Adil Fafulovi}, a Muslim folk-dancer, a fellow member of the Society, gave evidence that Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} did not differentiate on grounds of ethnicity and invited Muslims to join the Society.[478] Veljko Cato, a Serb, and another member of the Society described Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} as honest family men, interested in folklore, dancing and socialising.[479]

376. According to another witness, Zoran Kupre{ki} was apolitical and did not express extremist views: he gave priority to family and the cultural society with its Muslims, Croats and Serbs, all singing and dancing together. He was popular among Muslims and Serbs. Mirjan Kupre{ki} held similar views.[480]

3. Involvement of the Accused in the HVO Prior to 16 April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

377. Both Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have military experience, both having completed their military service in the JNA, in which Zoran became a reserve officer[481] and in which Mirjan was trained as an infantry man.[482] Both are listed in the Register of the HVO Vitez Brigade as being reservists between 8 April 1992 and 22 and 23 January 1996.[483] It was disputed that the signature against Mirjan Kupre{ki}'s name was his.[484] However, he does not dispute that prior to and after the war he was a reservist.[485]

378. According to Witness JJ, a friend and work colleague of Zoran Kupre{ki}, the latter was a member of the HVO prior to 16 April 1993. He was absent from work at times and went to the front line. The witness saw him in uniform and he did not try to conceal the fact. He was present at an HVO oath-taking ceremony at Vitez stadium. She witnessed the oath-taking ceremony briefly: Zoran Kupre{ki} was a participant and took the oath, wearing a military uniform. He went to the front line for some time in the period between January to March 1993. About a month before 16 April 1993, Zoran Kupre{ki} told her that he was an HVO Commander.[486]

379. Evidence was given by two other witnesses that Zoran Kupre{ki} was an HVO Commander in the Grabovi area:

(a) Witness B was a Bosniac and former JNA Captain who became Security Officer for the Territorial Defence in Vitez. After the first conflict in October 1992 he visited Ahmi}i in connection with the return to the village of the Bosniac population who had fled. On this visit the witness spoke to Nenad Šanti} (whom he described as in command of the HVO in the area from Vitez to Ahmi}i). Nenad Šanti} told the witness that Zoran Kupre{ki} was the Commander of one area. The witness and Šanti} went to Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house and spoke to him. Šanti} said that Zoran Kupre{ki} should provide security and should guarantee that there would be no problems concerning the return of the Bosniac population. Zoran Kupre{ki} promised that there would be no problems and said that he would personally take action to ensure that there would be none.[487]

(b) Abdulah Ahmi}, a resident of Ahmi}i at the material time, said that he had learned that Zoran Kupre{ki} was the HVO Commander: he learned this because people went to Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house for negotiations concerning the return of the Muslims. He saw Zoran Kupre{ki} often, armed and in full gear: Zoran Kupre{ki} went to the front at Busovača and was in charge of village watches. The witness said that there were 5 or 6 Croatian families in Grabovi consisting of 20-30 people.[488]

380. According to Witness Y, who was the organiser of Muslim night patrols in Ahmi}i, Zoran Kupre{ki} called a meeting in the school and asked Witness Y to stop the Muslim watches. When the witness suggested joint patrols, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that he had no orders from his command to accept. Zoran Kupre{ki} also said that he was taking up a new post and would not be responsible for the area.[489]

381. According to Witness S, in 1992 and 1993 he saw both Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} in uniform, but Zoran wore his more often than Mirjan.[490]

(b) Defence Evidence

382. Zoran Kupre{ki} denied that he was a Commander or was ever addressed as such: his role for a time was to assign the village guards.[491] He had not participated in the HVO oath-taking parade in the stadium but had witnessed it as a member of the audience.[492]

383. According to Zoran Kupre{ki}, the Kupre{ki}'s started a watch in February 1992. Dragan Vidovi} had contacted him to see whether he would be in favour of a village guard. Zoran Kupre{ki} then went out every night on a two-hour shift. At first he wore civilian clothes: he was later given a uniform top which he then wore and he carried Ivica Kupre{ki}'s hunting carbine.[493] After the conflict on 20 October it was decided to place the guards on a more formal footing and it was agreed on 20 or 21 October that Zoran Kupre{ki} should be in charge of this. Zoran Kupre{ki} compiled these lists until late January 1993 when Dragan Vidovi} took over.

384. Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that in February or March 1992 Zoran asked him to join the village guard, which he did: he was one of about ten men. This guard duty continued until the first conflict. Mirjan Kupre{ki} did not have a rifle; he was given an old M48 rifle and two boxes of ammunition. He did not have a uniform, but sometimes used Zoran's camouflage jacket.

[493] Zoran Kupre{ki}, T. 11216-11224.

385. According to Zoran Kupre{ki}, Witness Y's evidence concerning a meeting was wrong as to the date. The meeting was in late January or early February 1993. He asked Witness Y not to maintain a checkpoint at the entrance to the village and not to patrol the main road. He said that Dragan Vidovi} would be in charge from now on. Zoran Kupre{ki} had no written or oral order from anyone telling him not to accept a Muslim proposal since he was not subordinate to anyone.[494]

386. According to their evidence, Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} took no active part in the armed conflict on 20 October 1992. Summarising their evidence, they said that shortly after the shooting started, they took their families to a shelter in Šantići and then returned to the neighbourhood of their own houses to a feature which was referred to as "the Depression" where they felt safer and where they remained until the afternoon.[495],[496] Others in the Depression at the time gave evidence of the presence of the accused there.[497] The Depression was a sizeable hollow in the ground, not far from the Kupre{ki} houses and next to the house of Niko and Mirko Saki}: it had always been a kind of shelter and was used as a gathering point for citizens in cases of emergency in the former Yugoslavia as well as a shelter from Serb air attacks.[498] They were not armed.[499]

387. According to Zoran Kupre{ki}, he took part in negotiations to ease tensions after the conflict of 20 October 1992. He took notes on one occasion[500] and signed an agreement[501] on another because he was told to do so. He took part in a discussion about people returning to their houses but had no say in anything else.[502]

4. Their Role in the Events of 16 April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

388. The prosecution evidence against either accused concerning events on 16 April 1993 begins with the evidence of Witness V who testified that on 15 April at about 5 p.m., he saw a group of 10 soldiers and two civilians in front of Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house. The soldiers were in camouflage uniforms and carried weapons.[503]

389. The Prosecution case against these two accused arising from their roles in the events of 16 April relates to three separate allegations:

(a) their alleged participation in murder and arson at the house of Witness KL;

(b) their alleged participation in murder and arson at the house of Suhret Ahmić; and

(c) their presence in Ahmi}i that day.

These matters will be considered separately.

(i) Their Alleged Participation in Murder and Arson at the House of Witness KL

390. Witness KL was an immediate neighbour of the Kupre{ki}'s in Grabovi (his house being nearest to that of Vlatko Kupre{ki}, but no distance from those of Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki}: he had known all three since their births). His evidence was that following the morning call to prayer there was an explosion. Zoran Kupre{ki} then appeared in Witness KL's house at the door of the living room (with a rifle, his face blackened and in a black uniform). Zoran Kupre{ki} shot and killed Witness KL's son (Naser). He then shot Witness KL's daughter-in-law (Zehrudina) and her son (Elvis, aged six or seven). The witness testified that he had been standing in the doorway to the living room, but "lost control" and fell behind the couch on which Elvis had been sleeping. According to the witness, shots were then fired at him but he was not hit. The witness's grandson (Sejad or 'Sejo', aged 3 months) was also shot and killed. Mirjan Kupre{ki} came into the room immediately after his brother, poured liquid from a bottle and set a couch on fire.[504] The men then left and Witness KL went into his bedroom. By this time, the house was on fire, the ceiling came down and eventually the witness made good his escape, running through the fire and sustaining burns to his hands and face as he did so.

391. Initially Witness KL hid in a hay-stack and woodpile near his house; finally he fled to Vrhovine, stopping on the way at his mother's house. On 17 April 1993 he was admitted to a hospital in Zenica were he was treated for severe burns to his face and hands. He remained in the hospital until 1 May 1994.

392. In cross-examination, Witness KL stated that both he and his six children had good relations with the Kupre{ki} brothers. Medical, divorce, and employment records were put to him but he denied that he had problems with his eyesight or alcoholism.[505] When asked why he did not tell his mother who the perpetrators were, the witness stated that he had not dared tell her, because she was an old woman (born in 1909) and could let it "slip out unintentionally, and then later on this could have cost me a lot".[506] He saw his granddaughter and his daughter-in-law in the hospital but did not discuss the events of 16 April 1993 with them. He said that he did tell another daughter, Witness EE.[507]

393. In some of his previous statements such as that made to Witness HH (a United Nations investigator), Witness KL said he was in the other room during the attack.[508] When confronted with such discrepancies he maintained that these were due to mistakes. In re-examination, Witness KL said that he was 100 per cent sure that Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} were responsible for the killings.

[508] Exhibit P82, para. 17.

394. It may be noted that at first the witness did not identify Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} as the killers and did not do so until February 1994. However, according to the evidence of Witness EE, when she saw him in hospital in Zenica he told her that Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} did the killing.[509]

395. It has not been disputed that these killings took place. On 6 May 1993 Payam Akhavan of the United Nations Centre for Human Rights and EEC Ambassadors visited the house and found the four bodies; two adults, an infant and a child.[510] Forensic examination of the house in July 1998 by a Dutch Crime Scene Investigator and subsequent forensic analysis showed that 20 cartridge cases and an anti-aircraft projectile were recovered, together with the bones of a child under some bed springs at the place where Witness KL described Elvis's bed.[511] No traces of inflammable liquids or other propellants were found but the fact that they were not found does not mean that they were not used.

396. On 7 May 1993 Witness KL spoke to Witness HH, an Officer of the United Nations Centre for Human Rights and told him that he knew those responsible: he said that they were his neighbours from the first house down the road. He also said that he was in the room and his family were killed in an adjacent room.[512]

397. The difficulty concerning the credibility of this witness's evidence is that it was not until ten months after the incident that he firmly identified Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} as the perpetrators of the massacre of his family. Despite the horror of what had happened and his supposed knowledge of those responsible, he did not divulge the fact when interviewed on 18 and 19 April for a local television station or (more significantly) when interviewed by investigators on 22 April 1993, when he said that he did not recognise the perpetrators. On 1 October 1998, when interviewed by an investigating judge, the witness said only that the figures resembled Zoran and Mirjan

Kupre{ki}. His explanation for these omissions is that he dared not identify the killers because of the wartime situation. However, the investigators and the investigating judge were Bosniacs and it is difficult to see why he should feel that identifying the perpetrators to them would have put him at risk.

398. It must also be noted that there is a further major discrepancy between his earlier accounts and those he gave subsequently. Initially he said he was in his bedroom when the killings took place whereas later he said that he was in the living room.

399. A possible explanation for the omissions and discrepancies may be that after conversations with others (notably his granddaughter), he had convinced himself that this is what he saw. He did not appear to the Trial Chamber to be an untruthful witness or one who had set out to lie deliberately; however he may have been mistaken.

(ii) Their Alleged Participation in Murder and Arson at the House of Suhret Ahmi}.

400. It is alleged that Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} participated in the murders of Suhret Ahmi} and Meho Hrstanovi} and the arson of Suhret Ahmi}'s house. Evidence concerning this was given by Witness H, who lived with her father Suhret and her family in a house adjacent to that of Witness KL who is her grandfather. Her evidence was as follows. She knew Zoran Kupre{ki}, Mirjan Kupre{ki} and Vlatko Kupre{ki} (the former two she saw practically every day and she played with Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s daughter). On 16 April 1993, she was awoken by gunfire which shattered the glass in her bedroom. The family took refuge in a shelter constructed next to the garage. A grenade was thrown into the house and her father was told to open the door. When he went outside he was shot and killed. Their neighbour, Meho Hrstanovi}, was killed in a burst of gunfire at their front door.[513] Witness H left the shelter when the trapdoor was lifted.

She was confronted by Zoran Kupre{ki} whom she recognised immediately (he was one metre away and she also recognised his voice): he told her that he had orders to kill everyone. Mirjan Kupre{ki} was in the hallway and the witness saw him climbing the stairs to the top floor. Zoran Kupre{ki} asked "What are we going to do with them, shall we kill them?" Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that he did not know. Soldiers then set fire to the house and the family left.[514] Zoran Kupre{ki} had black polish in lines on his face, he was in uniform, carrying a rifle and had a rocket launcher on his back. Mirjan Kupre{ki} was wearing a uniform with a line on each cheek and forehead. He was one metre from her and she had no difficulty identifying him. He too had a rifle and a rocket launcher. She looked at Mirjan Kupre{ki} and he looked at her and she could see his face clearly. She was positive that it was him.

401. In cross-examination, Witness H said that she was one thousand per cent sure that she had seen Zoran Kupre{ki}. She saw him for a couple of seconds and although the lights were not on, visibility was good since it was morning.[515]

402. She was cross-examined about a statement made to an investigating Judge on 17 December 1993.[516] Discrepancies between this statement and her evidence were pointed out. The statement said that her father had a rifle, that she saw him killed with a burst of gunfire, and that Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} were setting fire to the upper floor.[517] The witness, however, denied meeting the investigating Judge and denied that the signature on the statement was hers.[518]

403. This witness appeared confident and forceful. She was in no doubt at all about her identification of the three accused whom she knew well as they had been her neighbours all her life.[519] Although the circumstances could not have been more stressful, she had a good opportunity to identify all three accused since they were in close proximity to her.

404. Another witness, referred to as Witness SA, was in Suhret Ahmi}'s house at the time of the attack. She did not give evidence at the trial, but her statements were admitted as Court Exhibits.[520] In two statements in April 1993 (made in Zenica) she did not identify the perpetrators. In a third statement (in May 1993) she said that she did not recognise any of the soldiers. However, in December 1993, in a statement made to an Investigating Judge of the High Court in Zenica she said that she recognised Zoran, Mirjan, Ivica and Vlatko Kupre{ki} in full combat gear in her house. She repeated this in a statement to the Office of the Prosecutor in October 1994. In the view of the Trial Chamber, little or no weight can be placed upon the statements purporting to identify the accused. It was not until her fourth statement that the witness made any identifications. She did not give evidence and was, therefore, not subject to cross-examination about those discrepancies.

(iii) Other Evidence Relating to Their Presence in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993

405. Witness C, a 13 year-old boy, fled barefoot from his house when it was attacked by soldiers and his brother was killed. He was rescued by Croatian soldiers and taken to the house of Jozo Alilovi} (a Croatian friend and neighbour). The house is to the east of the village between the Catholic cemetery and the Bungalow. According to Witness C, at 11 a.m. or 12 noon Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} called at the house with others. They were dressed in camouflage uniforms with green straps on their shoulders and weapons (they did not have paint on their faces). They stayed for about an hour.[521]

406. Both Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} are listed in the HVO Mobilisation Report,[522] as being mobilised between 16 and 28 April 1993, although there is no indication of the precise date.

407. Witness JJ gave evidence that she had a number of meetings in Vitez with Zoran Kupre{ki} and that during the course of one of the meetings, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that the Jokers had been firing at fleeing civilians in Ahmi}i on 16 April, that one of them had raised his gun and threatened Zoran Kupre{ki} that unless he also shot at the civilians he himself would be shot. As a result, Zoran Kupre{ki} testified that in order to save himself he had shot into the air.[523]

(b) Defence Evidence

408. The accused deny that they participated in the crimes alleged, were in the places alleged or took any active part in the conflict at all.

409. On 15 April 1993 they were at work. Zoran Kupre{ki} testified that he was at work until 2 p.m., and then went into Vitez for a coffee with Senad Topoljak and Dragan Grebenar. On his way home things were normal. Just before dusk his uncle, Ivica, brought his wife from Split. Zoran Kupre{ki} and his wife went to Ivica's house that evening after 8 p.m., and stayed for half an hour. Ivica spoke about the barricades which he had come across and the incident in Zenica involving Toti} (an HVO officer who was killed). Zoran Kupre{ki} then went home and to bed about midnight.[524] When cross-examined about the evidence of Witness V, Zoran Kupre{ki} said he saw nothing of what Witness V claimed to have seen outside Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house; nor did anyone else mention it. None of the Kupre{ki}s left the village that night.[525]

410. Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that he left work in the Sutre shop in Vitez at 5 p.m., and went to a coffee shop before returning home where he found that his son was ill with a temperature. He, too, then went to Ivica's house, returning home at 11 p.m.[526] His evidence about his whereabouts in Vitez was supported by the evidence of a number of witnesses.[527]

411. Witnesses also gave evidence concerning the gathering at Ivica Kupre{ki}'s house, where friends and relatives of Mrs. Ankica Kupre{ki} had called to welcome her home.[528] The guests included Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} and their wives, Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s wife and Mirko Saki}.[529] According to Gordana Cui} and Witness DC/1,2 they talked of "normal things".[530] According to Ivica Kupre{ki}, they talked about the journey from Split and the Toti} case.[531] The guests left at about midnight.[532] Gordana Cui} said that she and Zoran Kupre{ki} had left earlier and gone to his house where her mother was: she stayed late, watching a music video-tape and talking of lots of things, not of war or of conflict.[533] She said that if Zoran Kupre{ki} had known that the conflict would break out the next day, he would have told her.[534]

412. Zoran Kupre{ki}'s account of the events of 16 April was as follows:

(a) He was awoken by a ring at the doorbell while it was still dark. He opened the front door to find Dragan Vidovi} who told him that there was a possibility of an attack by Mujahedin and that they should flee with their families.

(b) Zoran Kupre{ki} told his wife to get the children ready; he then went to rouse his brother and parents (he had put on a pair of jeans and a military top). He then returned to his house. He collected his family and with his parents and brother (with his mother in law in a wheelbarrow) went off towards Šanti}i and the shelter at the Vrebac house. He had Ivica's hunting carbine. There was no shooting at the time.[535] Some locals (Croats) were at Niko Saki}'s house, including Milutin Vidovi} who said that Zoran Kupre{ki}'s children would be safe at his house. Zoran Kupre{ki} took his family to Milutin Vidovi}'s house.[536]

(c) When he and his family and parents were going to Milutin Vidovi}'s house, he saw five or six well-armed soldiers in black and camouflage uniforms around Anto Pudja's house moving towards Niko Saki}'s house. They had painted faces and rifles and mortars, triangular insignia and some wore white belts. He concluded they were Croats who were coming to repel a possible attack; it was still dark and there was no shooting at the time.[537]

(d) Zoran Kupre{ki} and his brother (having put their families in shelters) returned to Niko Saki}'s' house. On the way they met the Didaks. Zoran Kupre{ki} then took the Didaks to Milutin Vidovi}'s house. He then returned towards Niko Saki}'s house. As he did so shooting started. It was now daybreak, between 5 and 6 a.m., and cloudy with drizzle. The shooting came from the direction of the Kupre{ki} houses and from the road by the cemetery.[538]

(e) Zoran Kupre{ki} ran back to Niko Sakić's house. Niko said that the others were in the Depression so Zoran Kupre{ki} went there where he saw Dragan Vidovi}, Mirko Saki}, his brother Mirjan, Dragan Samir and Drago Grgi}. After about 15-20 minutes smoke could be seen rising which appeared to come from his brother's house and then more smoke which seemed to come from Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house. (They later discovered that it was not coming from their houses). A short time later a shell fell nearby. The shooting was at its most intense for the first hour or two and then subsided. Mirko Saki} and Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki} went to see what had happened to their families. On the way, Anto Vidovi} told them that Fahran Ahmi}, their friend from the folklore group, had been killed. At 9 or 10 a.m., they reached the shelters.[539]

(f) When they went back towards the Depression, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that he heard screams and shooting in the area behind the Kupre{ki} houses or somewhere around the Sutre warehouse. The brothers met Nikola Omazi} near Mirko Saki}'s house. Nikola Omazi} said that Mirjan Šanti} had been killed. The brothers went into the Depression. The shooting had subsided. Mirjan Šanti}'s body was brought down on a ladder and the brothers helped to take the body to a shed at Niko Saki}'s house. Mirjan Šanti} was wearing a camouflage uniform with a white belt, the insignia of the Military Police and a light blue ribbon. This all happened sometime before 11 a.m.[540]

(g) They then returned to the Depression. As they were coming back they could see smoke rising from Muslim parts of the village: "you could gain the impression that the Muslims had been driven out of there".[541] There was shooting and the sound of UNPROFOR tanks. Later Ivica Raji} told the brothers that it was not their houses but those of Muslim neighbours which were burning. Ivica said that he had seen 10 soldiers at the Kupre{ki} brother's house who identified themselves as Jokers. In the afternoon the brothers went to Zume again. Sporadic fire continued until nightfall. There was then intense fire and a loud explosion: the minaret was destroyed. This was about 7.30 or 8 p.m. They spent the night in their uncle's stables.[542]

(h) Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} never went to Jozo Alilovi}'s house. They remained in the Depression all day in order to protect the shelter. Zoran Kupre{ki} carried Ivica's rifle the whole time. They did not know who was attacking whom or who would win.[543]

(i) When cross-examined by the Prosecution, Zoran Kupre{ki} denied that he had anything to do with the crimes on 16 April or that anybody with him had taken part in them.[544] He did not have time to call on Muslim neighbours. He did not pass Witness KL's or any other Muslim house. He did not take the car. The car was a small Fiat which was in the garage of Branko Livanci}.[545] They stayed in the Depression because they were 50-100 metres from the shelter in which their women and children were, so they could defend it.[546]

(j) When asked about the evidence of Witness KL and Witness H, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that Witness H could not have seen him or his brother because they were not there,[547] nor were they at Witness KL's house. He had normal relations with Witness KL and would greet him each day. He knew Nazir Ahmić. He never went to Witness KL's house as an adult, although he had been there as a child.[548] When examined by the Trial Chamber, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that he did not know Witness H: she was a child at the time and it was not customary to say hello to children when passing them.[549]

(k) When cross-examined about the statement of Witness JJ, Zoran Kupre{ki} said that she was wrong when she said that he had been threatened by Jokers and pretended to shoot at civilians.

413. Mirjan Kupre{ki}'s account of the events of 16 April was as follows:

(a) He was awoken before 5 a.m. by his brother Zoran, who told him that an attack from Barin Gaj was expected.[550] He roused his family. His mother-in-law suffered back-pain and his son Marko was ill. As a result, Mirjan Kupre{ki} informed nobody else of the news. The family set off for Zume, Mirjan Kupre{ki} taking his mother-in-law in a wheelbarrow. They met Zoran and their parents and all went together through the Depression.[551] On the road near Anto Pudja's house they passed some soldiers, commandos with white belts and holsters, some with painted faces and with several cases of ammunition. Mirjan Kupre{ki} concluded that they were Military Police: they had some type of insignia.[552]

(b) Mirjan Kupre{ki} left his family at the Vrebac shelter and returned to Niko Saki}'s house. When the shooting started, he was with others in front of the shelter at the back of the house and they ran into the Depression, at first to take shelter and later to observe what was going on:[553] Zoran Kupre{ki} was not with them, but joined them later. Mirjan Kupre{ki} had his rifle; Dragan Vidovi} and Zoran Kupre{ki} also had rifles. Zoran Kupre{ki} wore a camouflage jacket. Mirjan Kupre{ki} wore blue jeans and a long brown jacket and a green sweater. It was cold and there was drizzle or mist.[554] There were six men in the Depression in all.[555]

(c) The shooting lasted 2-3 hours and it was very intense. They tried to get out along the path but a shell fell nearby. When they tried again bullets were being fired through the forest. There was smoke coming from their houses and a high pillar of smoke rising from the road towards the mosque. There were detonations and small arms fire.[556] During the first lull Milutin Vidovi} came to the Depression to see whether they had any information. Mirjan Kupre{ki} then went to see his family with others. On the way, Anto Vidovi} told them that Fahrudin (Fahran) Ahmi} had been killed. (Mirjan Kupre{ki}, Fahrudin and Zdravko Vrebac had been inseparable friends).[557]

(d) On the way back from the shelter, Zoran said that he had been told that other persons had been killed. They heard that there were other casualties by the road near Fahran's house. Mirjan Kupre{ki} went with Mirko to the Saki} house briefly and then returned to the Depression. Nikola Omazi} told them that Mirjan Šanti} had been killed. Ivica Kupre{ki} and Nikola Omazi} put Mirjan Šanti}'s body on a ladder and carried the body to Nikola Saki}'s garage: Mirjan Šanti} wore a camouflage uniform, with an HVO Military Police insignia on his shoulder and a light blue ribbon.[558]

(e) UNPROFOR armoured personnel carriers (APCs) went towards Gornji Ahmi}i and the gunfire stopped. After the APCs left, gunfire started again immediately. About 4-5 p.m., there was another lull and then firing resumed again and stopped only after nightfall. Towards the evening the most intensive fire was from around the mosque. That night some slept in the stable and others in the gulley.[559]

(f) Over the course of 16 April, they heard that houses were on fire, including all those around the Kupre{ki} houses. During their visits to their families in Zume they saw houses burning and realised that Muslims had perished.[560]

(g) When cross-examined by the Prosecution, Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that the Vrebac shelter was closest: it was 10-15 minutes away. He did not use the car. Asked why they remained in the Depression the witness said that they were hiding in the Depression; they were close to the shelters where their families were and could keep an eye on the path.[561] Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that he did not doubt that what Witness H said had happened did happen but that it had nothing to do with him; he was not there, nor was his brother with him in that house. He had not been in Witness KL's house.[562]

414. The accused called witnesses to support their accounts of their journey to the shelter and arrival there.[563] They also called witnesses to support their account of spending the day in the Depression.[564] In this connection Dragan Vidovi} said that the men stayed in the Depression until it was dark when they went to Ivo Kupre{ki}'s stable.[565] When daylight came they went back to the Depression to keep an eye on the path; he agreed (in response to a question put by the Prosecution) that they were guarding the line of approach in case of a Muslim attack.[566] In re-examination Dragan Vidovi} said that the men in the Depression thought that they could offer some protection to the nearby shelters where the families were.[567] When examined by the Court, he said that there were patches of snow in the Depression: they did sit down but stood for most of the time when they were there.[568]

415. Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} denied that they had been in the house of Jozo Alilovi} on 16 April. Other evidence was given concerning this. Goran Papi} denied that he was in Jozo's house with Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} in the late morning, as the prosecution witness Witness C, had alleged.[569] Likewise, Jozo Alilovi} himself denied that Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} had ever come to his house that day.[570]

416. Anto Raji}, brother-in-law of Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki}, said that he had seen the broadcast of the interview on Sarajevo TV on 18 April 1993 with Witness KL from Zenica Hospital and that the end of the interview is missing from the recording produced by the Prosecution.[571] The interviewer asked Witness KL twice if he recognised the killers. He said that he did not because their faces were painted.[572] This evidence was supported by Mirko Safradin, a fellow member of the same anti-aircraft Defence Unit who said that he had witnessed the broadcast with Anto Raji}.[573]

417. Evidence of what happened to the accused after 16 April was given by Zoran Kupre{ki}. On 17 April, at 8 or 9 p.m., people fled from the shelters to Rovna. Zoran Kupre{ki} saw no bodies that day.[574] On 18 April there was still shooting in Gornji Ahmi}i and Gornji Pirići. At about 9 a.m., the accused and his brother went to their houses. Nothing was wrong with Zoran Kupre{ki}'s house apart from two broken windows.[575] Around 4–5 p.m., some military policemen appeared near the stable with some civilians: these men said that the accused had to go to the line at Gornji Pirići. Zoran Kupre{ki}, Mirjan Kupre{ki}, Dragan Vidovi}, Mirko Saki}, Ivica Kupre{ki} and Dragan Samija all then left together.[576] They passed Enver Sehi}'s house and saw the body of Enver and a burnt child's body in the house. There was a body on the balcony of another house and a further two bodies in between two houses. From the elevated ground they could see the entire village: "it was terrible ... everything was burned down".[577] Witness KL's house had burned down. At the line they were ordered to dig a trench. There was sporadic fire coming from Barin Gaj. They remained in the location for 2–3 days. They were then moved 500–600 metres to the right above Upper Ahmi}i.[578]

418. Mirjan Kupre{ki} said that on the evening of 17 April, he heard that his family had gone to Rovna: the next day he went to Rovna and saw his family at daybreak. He then went to his house to get his accordion. The house was in chaos: everything was pulled from drawers, doors were broken, window panes in the nursery were missing, bullet marks were on the walls, a fire was beginning to burn but died down, some things were missing and many empty cartridge cases were in front of the house.[579] In cross-examination it emerged that there are no documents concerning this damage; Mirjan

Kupre{ki} had not obtained any.[580] It is the evidence of Mirjan Kupre{ki} that on 18 April 1993 the Military Police told them that they had to go to the defence lines in Pirići where they were ordered to dig trenches. Mirjan Kupre{ki} was then transferred to Upper Ahmi}i where he remained until demobilised at the end of the war in April 1994.[581] (The Trial Chamber notes that Exhibit P353, page 30 shows an entry for Mirjan Kupre{ki} as being mobilised from 8 April 1992 to 22 January 1996. Mirjan Kupre{ki} said he did not sign this entry and does not know who did: this list was compiled for the allocation of shares).[582]

419. Zoran Kupre{ki} testified that he remained on the frontline for three or four months and was then asked to become the Commander of that sector of the line. He refused but agreed to become Deputy Commander. He carried out administrative duties in the command post in Zume. He wrote daily reports for the battalion. In January or February 1994 he was transferred to the battalion command where he did administrative work.[583] Zoran Kupre{ki} said he became a soldier on 18 April 1993 when taken away by the Military Police. He returned to work in May 1994.[584] He went to live in Vitez. He did not return to Ahmi}i because he had been affected by events there. A terrible crime had been committed there, by Croat people. He, Zoran Kupre{ki} did not participate in it.[585] When cross-examined by the Prosecution about the Vitez Brigade List,[586] Zoran Kupre{ki} said that the signature on page 30 is not that of his brother, whereas the signature on page 75 is his. He signed it in 1996 in the municipal office. The dates of service were being stretched so that the value of shares each individual received would be as large as possible. Zoran Kupre{ki} did not know who put the date of 8 April 1992 in the entry but guessed it indicates participation in the village guards

(although the guards had not started then). The entry "P" for "reserve" may reflect the fact that he was a reservist in 1992.[587]

420. The Defence called Liljana Sapina, a friend and colleague of Witness JJ and Zoran Kupre{ki}, to contradict the evidence given by Witness JJ. Liljana Sapina said that in the summer of 1997 Zoran Kupre{ki} asked her to try and locate Witness JJ to see if the latter would be willing to make a statement in his favour. Ms. Sapina did so and the parties met in her flat. Zoran Kupre{ki} asked Witness JJ to make a statement about his helping her during the war: she said she would, but was afraid to testify because of her children and her family. Subsequently, it was apparent that Witness JJ was reluctant to make a statement: she said that her phone was bugged and from what she said Liljana Sapina concluded that she was under pressure from the Muslim side to make a statement against Zoran Kupre{ki}.[588]

5. Findings of the Trial Chamber

421. The Trial Chamber bears in mind the undisputed evidence as to the character of these accused, their activities in the folklore society and their good relations with their Muslim neighbours and colleagues prior to the conflict. Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that both accused were active members of the HVO. In the case of Mirjan Kupreški}, this finding is based on the HVO Register and is also to be inferred from his activities on 16 April 1993 (dealt with below).

422. In the case of Zoran Kupreški}, the Trial Chamber finds that he was a local HVO Commander and that his activities were not limited to assigning village guard duties (as he alleged). The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness JJ on this topic and also finds that Zoran Kupreški} took part in the oath-taking ceremony and was present on duty on the front line as she alleged in her evidence. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness B and Abdulah Ahmi} in relation to the negotiations for the return of the Muslims after the conflict of 20 October and finds that Zoran Kupreški}'s role in these negotiations was more active than he himself admitted in evidence.[589] Finally, the Trial Chamber notes that Zoran Kupreški}, as a reserve officer and in charge of a maintenance unit at work, was used to the exercise of authority.

423. In relation to the events of 15 April 1993, the Trial Chamber accepts that the accused may have been at work that day and may have gone to a gathering at Ivica Kupreški}'s house that evening. However, the Trial Chamber does not accept their evidence, and that of their witnesses, that they did not know of the planned attack on the village the next morning. Preparations were already under way for the attack: in the light of what happened the next day, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that these accused must have known that an attack was planned and were ready to play a part in it. In this connection the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness V that he saw a group of soldiers, armed and in camouflage uniform, in front of Zoran Kupreški}'s house in the early evening of 15 April 1993.

424. With regard to the allegations of participation in the conflict of 16 April 1993, upon which the prosecution case is based, the Trial Chamber deals, first, with the alleged participation of the accused in murder and arson at the house of Witness KL. This allegation depends on the evidence of Witness KL. The Trial Chamber has already analysed that witness's evidence and found it wanting in credibility. The Trial Chamber found that the witness may have been mistaken in his identification of the accused as perpetrators of these crimes. Thus, there is no reliable evidence that the accused participated in the crimes at the house of Witness KL.

425. The Trial Chamber deals next with the allegation that the accused participated in the murders and arson at the house of Suhret Ahmić. This allegation depends principally upon the evidence of Witness H. The Trial Chamber has already analysed her evidence.

[589] It should be noted that the only evidence about the activities of the accused during the conflict on 20 Oct. 1992 was given by defence witnesses. Evidence about that day plays no specific part in the Prosecution case against these two accused. The Trial Chamber makes no findings except to comment that the evidence that the accused spent the day in the Depression appears unlikely to be true.

The Trial Chamber takes into consideration the criticism of her credibility arising from: (a) the discrepancies between her statement and her evidence; and (b) her denial that the signature on the statement is hers. However, these criticisms are outweighed by the impression made by the witness upon the Trial Chamber while she was giving evidence. Her evidence concerning the identification of the accused was unshaken. The Trial Chamber is in no doubt that she was a truthful and accurate witness of events on 16 April. Her evidence might have been confirmed by the statements of Witness SA; however, the Trial Chamber places no reliance on this evidence.

426. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that Zoran and Mirjan Kupreški}, armed, in uniform and with polish on their faces, were in the house of Suhret Ahmić immediately after he and Meho Hrstanović were shot and immediately before the house was set on fire. The Trial Chamber concludes from this evidence that the two accused were participants in the attack on the house as part of the group of soldiers who carried it out.

427. Turning to the evidence of Witness C that the accused were in the house of Jozo Alilović at about midday and that they were armed and in uniform, the Trial Chamber, having heard the evidence of Jozo Alilović, is not satisfied as to the accuracy of Witness C's identification of the accused, given the stressful conditions under which it was made and the appalling ordeal to which the young Witness C had been subjected.

428. Finally, the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness JJ that Zoran Kupreški} admitted to her that the Jokers had been firing on fleeing civilians and that under threats, he himself had fired into the air. Although Zoran Kupreški} denied making this admission and an attempt was made to undermine Witness JJ's credibility by calling Liljana Sapina, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that she told the truth. She came to give evidence despite pressure being exerted to prevent her coming and went to great lengths in her evidence to acknowledge the considerable part which Zoran Kupreški} had played in assisting her and her family during the conflict. There was no reason for her to have lied about Zoran Kupreški} in her evidence and every reason for thinking that she told the truth. This is not to say that Zoran Kupreški}, himself, told the truth in his admission to Witness JJ. It was no more than a partial admission by someone who was troubled by the horror of what had transpired that day. However, it is an admission of some participation on the part of Zoran Kupreški} and, as such, serves to undermine his contention that he did not participate in the conflict.

429. It will be apparent from the foregoing that the Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of the accused and their witnesses to the effect that the accused took no part in the crimes alleged and were elsewhere when they took place. While it is true that they may have taken their families to the shelter, the evidence about their doing so and their whereabouts during the morning are rejected as untrue. In particular, the evidence that they spent almost the entire day standing around with others in the Depression is inherently not credible given the circumstances of the conflict taking place that day in Ahmi}i.

430. In summary, the Trial Chamber concludes that both accused participated in the attack on Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 as soldiers in the HVO. It is reasonable to conclude that their part involved their providing local knowledge and their houses as bases for the attacking troops. In addition, they participated in the attack on at least one house. Of the two accused, Zoran Kupreški}, as the local HVO Commander, must be taken to have played a more leading role.

C. Vlatko Kupre{kić

1. Introduction

431. The Prosecution case against this accused is that he was involved in the preparations for the attack on Ahmi}i. His house was used as a gathering point for the attackers and he participated in the attack on the 16 April 1993, in particular, in the shooting of members of the Pezer family. The Defence case is that he did not participate at all in the attack or shooting. On 16 April he was concerned only with the protection of his family.

2. Background

432. Vlatko Kupre{ki} is 41 years old, having been born on 1 January 1958. He is married with two children. He is the cousin of Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} and co-owner of the Sutre shop on the road to Upper Ahmi}i in Grabovo. He lives on the road near the shop, and near the houses of Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki}.

3. Events Prior to April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

433. The Prosecution evidence concerning these events was as follows:

(a) One day in October 1992 Witness T saw Vlatko Kupre{ki} and his wife and a third person unloading weapons from a Yugo car on the road in front of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[590]

(b) Vlatko Kupre{ki} was seen by Witness B at the Hotel Vitez (the headquarters of the HVO) three to five times between October 1992 and April 1993.

(c) Reports of the Travnik police administration of December 1992 and February 1993 describe Vlatko Kupre{ki} as "Operations Officer for the Prevention of Crimes of Particular State Interest": his rank is shown as Inspector 1st Class.[591]

(d) When a neighbour made a plea for peace after the first conflict in Ahmi}i in October of 1992, Vlatko Kupre{ki} said that they (the Croats) had waited 45 years for their own State and now they had it.[592]

(b) Defence Evidence

434. Vlatko Kupre{ki}, in his own defence, said:

(a) He has a congenital heart condition (for which he was operated on in 1966) and must not undergo stress. He was relieved of military service as one hundred per cent disabled.[593] He produced his military identification card and certificates showing him to be unfit for military service[594] and called evidence to this effect.[595]

(b) He was against ethnically-based parties, including the HDZ. He was not, in any way, politically active and was never a member of the HVO. He was on very good terms with his Muslim neighbours (including the Pezer family). He was never an HVO soldier. He produced a statement from the local HDZ to this effect[596] and called witnesses to say that he was on good terms with Muslims and did not engage in political activity, wear a uniform or carry a gun.[597] The Defence also produced the statements of 14 character witnesses (all Muslims or Serbs) who spoke of the absence of nationalist or ethnic prejudice on the part of Vlatko Kupre{ki}.[598]

(c) Vlatko Kupre{ki} said that he was not a police operations officer but was carrying out an inventory for the police, and the police chief had to assign him to a vacant post in order to be able to pay him. He was assigned to the Office of the Crime Prevention Service and assigned a desk where he would work with the commission in making inventories of basic supplies.[599]

4. His Role on 15 April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

435. According to Witness KL, Vlatko Kupre{ki} was among HVO soldiers, carrying rifles, on the main road between 11 a.m. and 12 noon on 15 April 1993.[600]

436. Witness B saw him at the Hotel Vitez on 15 April at around 2 or 3 p.m., with two or three men in uniform, standing in front of the entrance to the hotel. He was in civilian clothes.[601]

437. On 15 April between 5 and 6 p.m., a neighbour saw 20-30 soldiers on Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s balcony; Vlatko Kupre{ki} himself was sitting outside the shop.[602] Another witness saw a truck arrive with soldiers at dusk. Five or six soldiers got out in the vicinity of the house.[603] Another witness also saw several soldiers in front of Vlatko Kupre{ki} 's house at dusk.[604] Witness V's diary records that on 15 April 1993 before dark he learned that the Croats were concentrating around the Kupre{ki} houses.[605]

(b) Defence Evidence

438. The Defence case was that on 15 April Vlatko Kupre{ki} was not in Vitez or Ahmi}i until the evening: he was accompanying his cousin, Ivica Kupre{ki}, on a trip to Split to collect the latter's wife from the airport on her return from Germany.

439. According to the evidence of Ivica and Vlatko Kupre{ki}, they left Ahmi}i on 14 April and were stopped at numerous roadblocks on the way.[606] Permits for the journey were produced.[607] They arrived at Split at about 12 noon. While in Split they went to the market and bought jeans (for re-sale) in cash and filled the boot of the car with them: they then held a business meeting at a company called Kotex about buying salt, but concluded no contracts. At about 9 p.m., they met Mrs. Ankica Kupre{ki} at the airport. They spent the night at Baska Voda, one hour from Split with Radoslav Simovi}. The next day (15 April) they set off for Ahmi}i. They got home at about 6.30 p.m. and unloaded the jeans at Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[608] Further supporting evidence about the journey was given by Witness DE,[609] Radoslav Simovi}[610] and Mrs. Ljubica Kupre{ki}.[611]

440. Vlatko Kupre{ki} gave evidence about events that evening. He said that he unloaded the goods from the boot of the car and spent the evening preparing the goods for a buyer from Travnik to whom the goods were to be delivered on 16 April. There were no soldiers at his house or in front of it, or at the shop that evening. Everything was normal. He had nothing to do with the army: he did not prepare weapons or ammunition at his house as a staging post.[612]

441. Vlatko Kupre{ki} denied that he was outside the Hotel Vitez earlier that day, and denied going into the HVO Headquarters.[613] He was not, on 15 April, with a group of soldiers in front of his shop nor with soldiers on the balcony of his house.[614] There were lights on in his house (as alleged by Witnesses M and O) during the night: there were lights on the balconies and parking space for safety reasons.[615]

5. His Role on 16 April 1993

(a) Prosecution Evidence

442. Two documents point to Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s having been mobilised on 16 April 1993:

(a) His name appears on the HVO Mobilisation Report,[616] dated 30 April 1993, as being mobilised on a date between 16 and 28 April 1993. (His name does not appear on the reserve list. Additionally, he is listed neither for special duties nor as a medical corps driver);

(b) An HVO Certificate of 4 June 1996 was recovered from his briefcase on his arrest confirming that Vlatko Kupre{ki} was a member of the 92nd Viteska Home Guard Regiment between 16 April 1993 and January 1996. He is described as performing duties as "Assistant Commander for Health Matters".[617]

443. Gunfire came from the vicinity of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house during the early part of the day. According to Esad Rizvanovi} (a refugee in Ahmi}i, who was staying in a house close to the lower mosque) the first shots were in the direction of the mosque and the lower part of the village, coming from the Kupre{ki} houses including that of Vlatko Kupre{ki}.[618]

444. Witness E was another refugee whose family were staying in a house near the lower mosque. Shortly after 6.20 a.m., he was fleeing with his mother and sister along a path towards Upper Ahmi}i. They were forced to stop because of gunfire, some of which, according to Witness E, came from the direction of the houses, one being the house of Vlatko Kupre{ki}.[619]

445. Evidence was given that Vlatko Kupre{ki} was in the vicinity of Suhret Ahmi}'s house shortly after Suhret was murdered. When Witness H ran with her family from the house, they were forced to turn back because they came to a clearing where they were in danger of being shot. When they returned to their house, the witness saw Vlatko Kupre{ki} (wearing a blue overcoat with something under it) in front of the garage of her house. This was at about 5.45 a.m.[620] Her evidence was supported by the evidence of Witness KL who said that upon looking out of the window of his house after the murder of his family, he saw Vlatko Kupre{ki} leave the yard of Suhret's house, cross his (Witness KL's) garden and go towards Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s own house.[621]

446. Witness KL also testified that while he was hiding in a stack of hay in his barn later in the day, he saw five young men killed: the shots appeared to come from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. Three Croat soldiers came out of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house, patted the bodies and returned towards the same house.[622]

447. There was evidence of the following activity during the day of the attack from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house:

(a) Witness N came under fire from in front of the store.[623]

(b) Witness V heard shooting coming from the direction of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[624] Witness W was in the vicinity of the house, hiding during the morning with his grievously wounded wife, when they were accosted by a group of soldiers who came from bushes to the right of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[625] Witness BB saw her neighbour Nadira fatally wounded by a shot which came from the house of Vlatko or Franjo Kupre{ki}.[626]

(c) Witness X was also hiding there: one of her daughters (aged 19) was killed and another wounded. She testified that about midday Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s yard was full of soldiers. She heard voices calling for brandy and lunch: somebody said that everybody had been killed down there and that they had done a good job.[627]

448. A defence witness, Witness DE, was cross-examined about a statement made to a representative of the BiH army on 25 June 1993,[628] where he stated that "it was said that the destruction of the Ahmi}i mosque was ordered by Nenad Šanti} with the support of Vlatko Kupre{ki}". The witness said in evidence that that is what he heard, what people were saying, but nobody proved it.[629] In re-examination, the witness said people from Ahmi}i were detained at Dubravica school and he took food to them. He asked them who destroyed the mosque and one replied masked soldiers. He then asked what Vlatko did: one said Vlatko took shelter; another said that he had not seen Vlatko but that all Croats are the same. After the war Vlatko denied destroying the mosque saying "my friend you know I would never do anything like that",[630] and he said that he was ready to do his part in the reconstruction.[631]

449. Finally, evidence was given of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s alleged participation in an attack on the Pezer family which culminated in the killing of Fata Pezer and the wounding of Dženana Pezer. Fata Pezer was the wife of Ismail Pezer and mother of Dženana. They lived in a house on the opposite side of a small hill (which then existed, but which has now been flattened) from the Kupre{ki} houses. On the morning of the attack, they were joined by Witness S and his wife and by a refugee, Witness CF and his family, who had been living nearby. At about 8 or 8.30 a.m., the whole group (consisting of about 15 people including four small children) set off for the house of Nermin Kermo which was not far away in the direction of Upper Ahmi}i. Five witnesses from the group gave evidence: they were referred to as Witnesses P, Q, R, S and T. The journey involved going down a gully and climbing a hill opposite Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[632] The route was described by Witness Q. In cross-examination Witness Q was shown a video-recording made in April 1998 in which Witness CF is shown describing a different route.[633] Witness Q commented that the route described by Witness CF was marshy and was not passable at the time.[634] This evidence was corroborated by that of Witness S, who was also shown the video-recording and who stated that the route described by Witness CF was not the one taken. As the party climbed the hill, they heard shouting and swearing and came under fire from a group of soldiers standing in front of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. As a result of the shooting Fata was killed and D'enana was wounded. The five witnesses all gave evidence concerning these incidents. The witnesses said that the soldiers were in front of Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. Two witnesses, Q and S, said that there was a civilian with the soldiers. Witness Q identified the civilian as Vlatko Kupre{ki}. Vlatko Kupre{ki} was 50-60 metres away and the witness had him in his view for several moments; he had known Vlatko Kupre{ki} all his life and said that he was 100 per cent sure it was him.[635] This evidence as to distance was confirmed by the evidence of Howard Tucker, an Investigator with the Office of the Prosecutor, who measured the distance with range-finding binoculars and found it to be 53 metres.[636]

450. The Prosecution called Witness II in rebuttal on this topic. He said that he was crossing the meadow when he heard cries for help coming from the top of the hill where he found Fata, D'enana and Ismail Pezer. Fata and Dženana were lying on the ground. Fata showed no signs of life. The witness went to another part of the hill to observe. He said that there was shooting from the house of Vlatko Kupre{ki}. He saw five to six soldiers with painted faces and helmets running near Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house: their rifles were pointed in the direction of the Pezer family and himself. He then picked up Dženana, put her over his shoulder and carried her, using the hill as shelter, towards

Kermo's house. Two minutes elapsed between his hearing cries for help and his reaching Fata Pezer. When he reached her there were gunshots, coming primarily from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. However, he noticed no civilians among the soldiers. It is his opinion that the Pezers were hit from Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house.[637]

(b) Defence Evidence

451. The Defence case is that Vlatko Kupre{ki} was not involved in the conflict and did not participate in any of the killing or wounding of civilians or the looting and burning of property. The Defence case is also that between 5.30 and 6 a.m., Vlatko Kupre{ki} was taking his family to Jozo Vrebac's shelter in Šantići where he remained with them until 10 a.m., when he set off to try and contact his father in the family home, ending up in Niko Saki}'s house where he remained until after midday.

452. Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s account in evidence of the events that day was as follows:

(a) At 5 a.m., the telephone rang; he answered and an unknown person said "Vlatko, what are you waiting for? Go to the shelter". He did not take this seriously, but Ivica Kupre{ki} then rang and told him to go to the shelter: everyone had left. His wife told him someone had already called at 3 a.m. that morning. He left quickly with his family (wife, two children and mother): his father refused to go to the shelter. They went to Ivica Kupre{ki}'s house, found nobody there and went to Niko Saki}'s house where they met Saki}. They then went on towards Zume: when they were near the sportsground they heard heavy fire and detonations. They went to Jozo Vrebac's shelter, arriving at about 6 a.m.[638]

(b) He stayed in the shelter until 10 a.m., when he left to go and see his father. He told his wife that he was going to help the wounded. When he got to Niko Saki}'s house the latter told him to come in. By this time there was continuous shooting and Niko Saki} said that he had seen HVO soldiers going towards Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house. Vlatko Kupre{ki} remained in Saki}'s kitchen until the shooting died down at about 12.30 p.m., when he left for his own house.[639]

(c) As he approached his own house he saw a soldier, outside the house at the entrance, who challenged him. Vlatko Kupre{ki} said that he had come to get his father. The soldier took him into the house. There were approximately 7 or 8 soldiers in a room in the house. His father was sitting in a chair. The front door had been broken down, the house had been ransacked, merchandise thrown around and the flower pots spilled. The house had been looted. Vlatko Kupre{ki} was upset and angry but a soldier pointed to the house of Suhreta Ahmi} (which was on fire) and said: "Is that what you want? .... Scram, come and get your father later". Vlatko Kupre{ki} ran out and returned to Niko Saki}'s house. On the way he met Drago Grgi}, another soldier in camouflage uniform, and Anto Vidovi}. He then fled to the basement of Nikola Samija's house where he remained until the shooting subsided again at 4 p.m., when he returned to Jozo Vrebac's shelter. The soldiers he had seen had painted faces, most had camouflage uniforms, two had black uniforms and some had helmets: all had ribbons on the left shoulder and were well-armed. They were all unknown to him.[640] In his evidence he commented that the soldiers had entered his house violently, perhaps because it was a good vantage point for viewing Ahmi}i. It was probably a very useful point for them strategically.[641]

(d) He stayed in Jozo Vrebac's shelter until 6 p.m., when he went to collect his father, returning to the shelter at 7 p.m. There were then no soldiers inside or around the house. His father told him that soldiers had burst into the house and shot from the house and from around it. (Vlatko Kupre{ki} himself, in the morning, had seen shell casings). The father said he had helped Cazim Ahmi} to assist his wife by providing a blanket and axe from which Cazim could make a stretcher. His father told him nothing about the Pezer's predicament.[642]

(e) Vlatko Kupre{ki} denied killing anyone or taking property or setting property on fire. He did not participate in the killing or wounding of the Pezer family: he did not come home until about 1 p.m., on 16 April.[643] He was not in Witness H's yard at 6 a.m.[644] He was not in Witness KL's yard: he did not have a blue coat. He was not with soldiers shooting in front of his house or involved in the killing of Fata Pezer as alleged by Witness Q: he was in the shelter.[645]

(f) When cross-examined, Vlatko Kupre{ki} said he was wearing civilian clothes; a chocolate-coloured winter jacket and corduroy trousers.[646] Prior to 16 April 1993 he did not have a rifle but had a pistol for self-defence and that no more than 10 bullets were ever fired from it.[647] On 16 April at approximately 1 p.m., when he met Dragan Grgi}, the latter gave him a small rifle (a hunting carbine) to give to Ivica Kupre{ki}: the weapon went off and Vlatko Kupre{ki} gave it back to Dragan Grgi}.[648]

453. The evidence of the accused as to his clothing, the circumstances of their being woken and their journey to the shelter was supported by the evidence of his wife, Mrs. Ljubica Kupre{ki}[649] and cousin Ivica Kupre{ki}.[650]

454. The evidence of the accused that he was present in the shelter from about 6 a.m. until 10 a.m. was supported by that of his wife Ljubica,[651] Ivo Vidovi},[652] Ljuba Vidovi}[653] and Gordana Cui}.[654]

455. Niko Saki} gave evidence in support of the accused's account of events at his house. This witness was cross-examined about a statement which he made in January 1998 in which he said Vlatko Kupre{ki} appeared at his house at about 10 a.m., to help in the evacuation of the wounded, remained for three hours and then left. The witness said that he thought that Vlatko Kupre{ki} could provide medical assistance because, in the witness's personal opinion he was unfit.[655]

456. Further evidence was given concerning conditions in the house of the accused on 16 April:

(a) Witness DE said that between 6.30 and 9 a.m., he tried to phone Vlatko Kupre{ki} but could not get through or there was no answer: at 9 a.m., somebody picked up the phone and, when the witness asked for Vlatko Kupre{ki}, brusquely said that Vlatko Kupre{ki} was not there and put the phone down.[656]

(b) According to Ljubica Kupre{ki}, Franjo (Vlatko's father) had said that three camouflaged soldiers had come to the house, asking for money and stealing a synthesizer.[657]

(c) Witness DF said that he was waiting at his home for Vlatko Kupre{ki} to bring the jeans (as promised) but by 8 a.m., he had not done so and the witness phoned him. Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s father (Franjo) answered and said that Vlatko Kupre{ki} had escaped with his wife, mother and children to the shelter: there was a war going on. Shooting could be heard on the phone. Franjo Kupre{ki} died after the war but before he died he told the witness "that on 16 April masked members of the special police had entered the village and nobody could recognise them because they wore paint on their faces".[658]

457. The Defence called a great deal of evidence to contradict the Prosecution evidence concerning the murder of Fata Pezer. Summarising that evidence, it is convenient, first, to deal with the evidence of Professor Wagenaar, Professor of Experimental Psychology, University of Leiden, who gave his expert opinion on the identification of Vlatko Kupre{ki} by Witness Q. The Professor said that the important aspect of the recognition by Witness Q was the distance over which the observation was carried out. He said that, based on his studies, at the distance of 40 metres the accuracy rate is 50 per cent, i.e., it is as likely that a person would make a mistake as that they would be correct. Therefore, the likelihood of a witness making a mistake at 60 metres is higher than 50 per cent.[659] On the other hand, matters such as the length of the observation, the fact that the person identified was in a group, and the fact that Witness Q could not provide details of clothing are not relevant since this is a case of recognition.[660]

458. The Defence also called evidence to show that Fata Pezer was not shot on the slope opposite Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house (as alleged by the Prosecution) but on the other side of the hill at a place from which the house could not be seen. They called four factual witnesses on this topic:

(a) Witness CF and Witness CE (a husband and wife respectively) were Muslim refugees from Prijedor living in the school in Ahmi}i. According to their evidence, on the morning of 16 April they heard shooting and went to the Pezer house and then accompanied the family on the journey to Nermin Kermo's house. They said that they were in the wood when the shooting started and the people were hit.[661] A video recording was played,[662] showing Witness CF demonstrating the alleged route taken from the Pezer house across the meadow and giving a commentary which may be summarised as follows. They were fired upon from behind as they were in the wood. Witness CF was wounded in the neck and shoulder. Fata fell dead to his left and remained on the spot; the little girl (Dženana) was picked up and the rest went on.[663] Both witnesses were cross-examined. Witness CF was cross-examined about a statement he had made to defence counsel on 18 March 1998, the day that they were filming, in which he said that they started walking from the Pezer house across a meadow under a hill on the right side towards the forest (i.e. an account which supports the Prosecution case).[664] The witness said in evidence that in fact the slope was to the left of the hill.[665] He was also cross-examined about a statement made to an Office of the Prosecutor Investigator of 9 June 1998,[666] in which he said that he was shot from behind when running away from the main road and the Sutre store.[667] Witness CE was cross-examined about a statement she made to an Office of the Prosecutor Investigator in June 1998 in which she said that they hid for a while in a vegetable storage shelter. [668] She did not remember saying in the statement that the voice came from the Sutre shop or that somebody from the direction of the Sutre shop, or next to it, started shooting at them. She denied saying this.[669]

(b) In the light of these very serious discrepancies between their statements and their evidence, the Trial Chamber places no reliance on the evidence of these witnesses. In any event, the Trial Chamber prefers the evidence of the prosecution witnesses as to the route taken, in particular the evidence of Witness Q who knew the area well, as opposed to the two defence witnesses who had only been there for a few months.

(c) Witness CG lived near the lower mosque and said that on 16 April when the shooting began, he and his family left their house and went to an old house with a cellar 50 metres from their house. At about 8 a.m., the witness heard a scream and saw a line of people 150 metres away. He heard shouting and screaming. He saw people in the middle of the wood on a path on the side of the hill facing the witness. Gunfire was coming from all round and fragmentation bullets were hitting the trees. The shooting was coming from Hrasno. The weapons being used were not ordinary rifles, but weapons of a higher calibre. The witness left the house at about 1 p.m. and took the path to Nermin Kermo's house. Just below the wood he came across Fata's body next to the path: it was in the same place as he had seen the group of people.[670]

(d) Stipan Vidovi} said that 10-12 days after the conflict, he found the body of Fata Pezer in the woods about 100-150 meters behind her house. It is not possible from that place to see Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house or yard because it is in a wood and there is a hill in between. The body had originally been found by two other men but they did not recognise Fata and told the witness. He could not tell if the body had been displaced before he discovered it. He ensured that the Red Cross were informed and they removed the body.[671]

459. The Defence called a Land Surveyor, Mr. Kesi}, to show that the place where Stipan Vidovi} found the body of Fata Pezer is in the same area as the place where Witness F said that he saw Fata Pezer's body on 17 April. Vlatko Kupre{ki}'s house cannot be seen from either of these places as it lies on the other side of the hill.[672]

460. With regard to the evidence regarding the finding of the body of Fata Pezer, the Trial Chamber notes that the position where the body was found cannot establish where the shooting occurred because of the possibility of the body having been moved after the shooting.

461. The Defence next called two witnesses from Zagreb to give evidence concerning the injuries to Dženana Pezer and Witness CF and the way in which those injuries were inflicted, namely Professor Skavi}, Professor of Forensic Medicine and Mr. Catipovi}, a Ballistics Expert at the Ministry of the Interior.[673] Their evidence may be summarised as follows:

(a) the injuries to Dženana Pezer were wounds to the right leg above and below the knee and included a fracture of the shin and the intrusion of alien metal bodies The injury to Dženana Pezer's shin was due to a bullet or shrapnel; the explosion was on the right side and the projectile came from the right.[674] Witness CF sustained injuries to the right side of his neck and back; in fact this was a single injury, starting with a groove to the right side of the neck, the projectile then entering the right shoulder and exiting above the right shoulder blade. This wound was caused by a small firearm or fragmentation bullet. The groove formed by the projectile in the neck suggests that it is more likely to have been caused by shrapnel since a firearm would cause a narrower groove. The injury was inflicted from upward and then backward and downward.[675]

(b) the injuries to Witness CF were caused by a bullet (or fragment) fired from a firearm of heavy calibre: an MK-84 machine gun or heavier rather than to an automatic rifle. The bullets must have been fragmentation bullets which hit the treetops and then hit Witness CF in the neck, because the channel is too irregular. The injury D'enana Pezer's leg could not have been caused by a small bullet but by a projectile from an MK-84 machine gun or anti-aircraft gun hitting the trees.[676]

6. Findings of the Trial Chamber

462. The Trial Chamber takes account of the undisputed evidence that, prior to the conflict this accused was on good terms with Muslims and displayed no nationalist or ethnic prejudice. The Trial Chamber also takes account of the evidence (again undisputed) that he suffers from a congenital heart condition and, as a result, was excused from military service. However, this condition neither prevented him from leading an active life (as his evidence concerning his business shows), nor meant that he could not play a part in the events with which this trial is concerned.

463. In this connection, the Trial Chamber finds that in 1992-1993 Vlatko Kupreški} was an Operations Officer in the police with the rank of Inspector, as the Report of the Travnik Police Administration shows. The Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of the accused to the effect that he was concerned merely to make inventories of supplies for the police, and finds that he was an active operations officer. This occupation explains why he was seen unloading weapons from a car in front of his house in October 1992 and April 1993 and was again seen there on the afternoon of 15 April 1993. This is all evidence which the Trial Chamber accepts.

464. In addition to his police duties, the accused was engaged in business. It is his case that he did not return to Ahmi}i on 15 April until the evening when he got back from the trip to Split. On the other hand, the Prosecution evidence is that he was seen in Ahmi}i during the morning of 15 April at the Hotel Vitez (as noted) during the afternoon, and in the early evening in the vicinity of soldiers who were at his house. The Trial Chamber accepts the Prosecution evidence on this topic. While it has not been disputed by the Prosecution that the accused made the journey to Split, there is no evidence, apart from that given by the accused and his witnesses, as to the time of his return. The Trial Chamber is prepared to accept that Witness KL may have been mistaken in his identification of the accused in the morning, but is not prepared to accept that Witness B and Witness L are mistaken in their identification of the accused later in the day. Witness B, himself a security officer in the Territorial Defence and Witness L, a neighbour, both knew the accused and there is no reason to think either that they were mistaken or that they were lying during their evidence. The explanation for the discrepancy in the evidence is that the accused returned earlier in the day than he or his witnesses admitted.

465. The Trial Chamber also accepts the evidence given by the Prosecution witnesses in relation to the troop activities in and around the accused's house on the evening of 15 April. This evidence is confirmed by the entry in Witness V's diary recording that he learned that evening that the Croats were concentrating around the Kupreški} houses.

466. The Trial Chamber concludes from the above evidence that Vlatko Kupreški} was involved in the preparations for the attack on Ahmi}i in his role as police operations officer and as a resident of the village. The Trial Chamber also concludes that the accused allowed his house to be used for the purposes of the attack and as a place for the troops to gather the night before.

467. With regard to events on 16 April, it was not disputed that shots may have been fired from Vlatko Kupreški}'s house (although the circumstances in which they were fired are in dispute). The Trial Chamber finds that the first shots came from the Kupreški} houses, including that of the accused, as alleged by Esad Rizvanović, and that firing continued from that house or its vicinity during the day as alleged by Witness E, Witness V, Witness W, Witness KL and Witness BB and the witnesses to the firing upon the Pezer family (dealt with below).

468. In this connection the Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of the accused that the firing from his house had no connection with him and came about because soldiers broke into his house and used it. The Trial Chamber concludes that part of the accused's contribution to the attack was to authorise the use of his house for this purpose.

469. With regard to the evidence relating to the direct participation of the accused in the conflict of 16 April, the significant part is that relating to the shooting of the Pezer family, involving, as it did, the killing of Fata Pezer and the wounding of her daughter, D'enana. The Trial Chamber accepts that those responsible for these crimes were a group of soldiers standing in front of Vlatko Kupreški}'s house. Whatever the exact cause of D'enana's injuries was, the Trial Chamber is in no doubt that there was a group of soldiers firing, as alleged. However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that Vlatko Kupreški} was among them. Only one witness,Witness Q, identified the accused. This witness did so at a distance of over 50 metres: a distance at which, as Professor Wagenaar pointed out, a witness is as likely to be mistaken as not. In the absence of confirmation of the correctness of this identification, the Trial Chamber is not able to be sure that it is correct. Accordingly, the allegation that Vlatko Kupreški} was present when these crimes were committed is not made out.

470. The other evidence relating to the presence of the accused during the armed conflict was that given by Witness H, who contends that the accused was in the vicinity of Suhret Ahmi}'s house at about 5.45 a.m. and shortly after the latter was murdered. This evidence was disputed by the accused. The evidence of Witness H has already been discussed in connection with the cases of the co-accused Zoran and Mirjan Kupreški}. She knew Vlatko Kupreški} and had no doubt of her identification of him. Her evidence was supported by the evidence of Witness KL. The Trial Chamber finds that this identification was correct and that Vlatko Kupreški} was in the vicinity shortly after the attack on Suhret Ahmi}'s house. There is no further evidence as to what the accused was doing there,[677] but the Trial Chamber concludes that he was present and ready to lend assistance in whatever way he could to the attacking forces, for instance by providing local knowledge. In this connection the Trial Chamber notes that he is recorded in two documents as being mobilised as a member of an HVO regiment on 16 April.

471. It follows that the evidence of the accused and his witnesses as to his non-participation in the conflict is rejected as untruthful. His role in the conflict was to assist in the preparation for it and to be present and ready to give assistance during it.

[677] The suggestion in the evidence of Witness DE that Vlatko Kupreški} may have had anything to do with the destruction of the mosque is unsubstantiated and is discounted by the Trial Chamber.

D. Drago Josipović and Vladimir Šantić

1. Introduction

472. The cases involving these two accused may conveniently be considered together because both are charged together with offences in count 1 and counts 16-17 (the attack on the Pušćul family and their house).

2. Background

(a) Drago Josipović

473. Drago Josipović is aged 44, having been born on 14 February 1955. Prior to the conflict he worked in a factory. The following evidence was given regarding his conduct and associations:

(a) Witness G, who lived in Ahmi}i with his family was 13 years old in 1993. In the early 1990's he was a friend of Drago Josipović's son, Goran. Witness G said in evidence that a rifle was kept in the porch of the Josipovi} house and Drago Josipovi} used to wear a uniform, a pistol and a belt.[678]

(b) Drago Josipovi}'s wife, Slavica, came from what Witness Z described as an "Ustaša family" (her brother was Nenad Šanti}). Drago Josipovi} was seen with a rifle, usually in civilian clothes, but, on occasion, in uniform.[679] Witness GG in the period before the attack on 16 April saw Drago Josipovi} in a camouflage uniform with HVO patches.[680] She also saw Slavica in uniform on television with Dario Kordi} when HVO soldiers were taking a solemn oath.[681] Witness CB said that the accused was a member of the HVO but was not on active duty: he was a member of the village guard taking part in patrols.[682]

(c) Witness EE knew Drago Josipovi} well as a neighbour: she had known him since childhood.[683] She also knew Vladimir Šanti} since she used to meet him during the course of her work for the Vitez Municipality and often used to see him in the street going towards the Hotel Vitez.[684] Passing her house before the conflict, Drago Josipovi} had said to Fahrudin Ahmi} (who was killed on 16 April) "pity for those two houses here". Fahrudin then told Witness EE what Drago Josipovi} had said.[685]

(d) The accused's name appears on the HVO Mobilisation Report[686] as having been mobilised between 16 and 28 April 1993.

474. Witnesses called by the Defence painted a different picture. Drago Josipovi} was portrayed as a quiet, hardworking craftsman, not politically active and on good terms with his neighbours.[687] He was a member of the village guard[688] and had a rifle which had belonged to Fahrudin Ahmi}, but which had been surrendered to Nenad Šanti} who had given it to Drago Josipovi}. The latter was not comfortable with this.[689]

(b) Vladimir Šanti}

475. The accused is by profession a policeman. He is aged 41, having been born on 1 April 1958. The Prosecution case is that by the time of the conflict he was a Commander in the Military Police and had an office in the Hotel Vitez.[690] In January

1993 he had been promoted from Criminal Inspector to Commander of the 1st Company of the 4th Battalion, which was under the command of Pasko Ljubici}.[691]

476. Evidence concerning his position was given by Prosecution witnesses:

(a) Witness B, a Muslim Territorial Defence Security Officer in Vitez took up complaints which he had received about the activities of the Military Police with Vladimir Šanti}, either on the telephone, or in person in Vladimir Šanti}'s office. On one occasion Anto Furundžija came into the office in uniform, his face masked by cream and carrying a gun. Anto Furund`ija said to Vladimir Šanti}: "It's all right, we're back". Vladimir Šanti} asked "How did it go? Is everything all right?" In the witness's opinion, Vladimir Šanti} was the superior of the former.[692]

(b) Brigadier Asim Dzambasovi} of the BiH army, a professional soldier and former JNA officer, described six documents[693] signed by Vladimir Šanti} as documents all signed by a company commander and one[694] as a company commander's report to the Commander of the Military Police.[695]

477. Vladimir Šanti} was also Commander of the Jokers. This was according to the evidence of Witness AA, who was a Muslim member of the HVO Military Police and a member of the Jokers. Witness AA had known Vladimir Santi} since childhood, their fathers having been friends, and Vladimir Šanti} was his superior when he joined the HVO Military Police.[696] According to Witness AA, Vladimir Šanti} told him of the establishment of a "special purpose or anti-terrorist" unit to be set up at the Bungalow in Nadioci. The witness's platoon reported there.[697] Vladimir Šanti} gave them orders, e.g. telling them to decide on a name for the unit, to take anything they needed for the Bungalow from Busovača and to visit the lines at Rovna. Vladimir Santi} approved the election of Anto Furundžija as "Immediate Commander". In the witness's view the Jokers could do nothing without orders from Vladimir Šanti}.[698] In March 1993 Vladimir Šanti} signed three orders imposing various punishments on Witness AA.[699]

478. On the other hand, defence witnesses gave evidence of his good character. According to one witness, distantly related to him, Vladimir Šanti} was employed in the civilian police before the war and was an exemplary individual.[700] According to another witness (Zeljko Kocaj) he never drew attention to himself as a nationalist.[701] Declarations were admitted from his wife, sister, a colleague and a Muslim family friend, which speak of his professional approach to his work, sociability and friendliness, including a willingness to help to those in need, of whatever religion.[702]

3. Their Alleged Participation in the Killing of Musafer Pu{}ul and Burning of the Pu{}ul House

(a) Prosecution Evidence

479. The Prosecution relied on the evidence of one witness, Witness EE, in the case against the accused in relation to these allegations. Witness EE's evidence was as follows: at dawn on 16 April there was a loud detonation and shooting. Voices could be heard calling out her husband, Musafer's, name: "Open the door, this is the police". There was then a burst of gunfire and Musafer opened the door. Soldiers in full uniform were on the verandah outside the door: the witness was at the door and recognised Drago Josipovi}, Vladimir Šanti}, Zjeliko Livanci}, Marinko Katava and Karlo ^erkez. Šanti} and Livanci} then took Musafer away and the witness never saw him again. Šanti} and Livanci} were wearing camouflage uniforms with an HVO patch and they were wearing helmets (the only ones to do so).[703] Drago Josipovi} told Witness EE and her children to go into the corner of the veranda and threatened to cut their throats. When the witness and the children went into the corner, a single soldier, Stipo Alilovi}, remained. Then the group of soldiers re-appeared, including Drago Josipovi}. Livanci} ordered the witness and children to get out. She and the children went outside near some sheds where her mother was. While there, the witness saw Vlado Šanti} passing by: she hailed him, but he moved away.[704] The witness, her children and mother spent the day in a shed. There was shooting throughout the day, and soldiers set fire to her house. Towards evening Drago Josipovi} (in full military gear), Anto Papi} and Jozo Livanci} came to the shed. They told her to come out and she, her mother and the children did so. Drago Josipovi} said that the shed would be set on fire. (She asked for the cows to be let out and he let the animals out). She was told to go to Anto Papi}'s house with her family, which is where they went.[705] While they were in front of the shed Drago Josipovi} told her that her husband Musafer had been killed.[706]

480. In cross-examination Witness EE said that she wore glasses outside and when driving a car, but not in the house or at work. She was not wearing her glasses on 16 April.[707] Her husband (Musafer) was killed beside the shed: she could hear shooting while Drago Josipovi} was ordering her to go into the corner. Her late mother was standing there and watching Vladimir Šanti} and Zeljo Livanci} as they were leading him behind the shed.[708] Drago Josipovi} wore a camouflage cap but she recognised him: ". . . it was Drago. I saw the moustache and everything and I saw him there. I recognised him by everything because we saw each other every day. We were neighbours".[709] In re-examination she testified that Drago Josipovi} was "in full military gear, camouflage uniform, camouflage cap, HVO insignia and weapons".[710] She had no doubt that Drago Josipovi} and Vladimir Šanti} were in her yard on the morning of 16 April 1993.[711]

481. The following is a summary of statements made by Witness EE:

(a) On 5 May 1993 at Zenica the witness made a tape-recorded statement for an Officer of the United Nations Centre for Human Rights (Witness HH). According to the latter's note of the recording[712] the witness said that on 16 April she heard shouting at the door, telling her husband to open the door. When Musafer opened the door she saw HVO soldiers, whom she knew. Zeljko Ivanci} took her husband and fired three bursts of gunfire into him; thereupon she saw Stipo Alilovi}, Drago Josipovi} and Vladimir Šanti}. Stipo Alilovi} told her to shut up and threatened to kill the witness and her children.

(b) On 14 May 1993 in a statement to Zenica Security Services she said that Stipo Alilovi} ordered Zjelko Livanci} to take her husband and he took him behind a shed and shortly after she heard a burst of gunfire.[713]

(c) On 20 December 1993, in a statement to the Zenica court she said that Zjelko Livanci} took her husband behind the shed and fired three bursts of gunfire into him.[714]

(d) On 1 February 1995, in a statement made to investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor, she said that Zjelko Livanci}, Vladimir Šanti}, Drago Josipovi} and Marinko Katava took Musafer behind the shed: she heard many bursts of gunfire from the shed where they took her husband.[715] She said in evidence that she had not said that the four men took her husband off.

482. The Defence called evidence to cast doubt on the credibility of Witness EE. The purpose was to show that Marinko Katava, Stipo Alilovi} and Zeljko Livanci} were not in Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 and, accordingly, that the witness was mistaken in her identification of them as parties to the killing of her husband.

(a) The Defence called evidence to show that Stipo Alilovi} was in the Netherlands on 16 April 1993, i.e. the evidence of Mrs. Dragica Krizanac, the widow of Stipo Alilovi},[716] supported by the evidence of Ms. Johanna Hume, a Dutch friend of the Alilovi}'s whose daughter went to the same school as the Alilovi}'s daughter.[717] Documents were exhibited to the same effect.[718]

(b) Evidence was called that Marinko Katava was in his apartment in a building on Marshall Tito Street, Vitez on the morning of 16 April; i.e., the evidence of Witness CD, who lived in the same apartment,[719] and Marinko Katava himself.[720]

(c) Evidence was called as to the presence of Zeljo Livanci} in Kuber on the morning of 16 April. According to this evidence Livanci} was Commander of a unit of guards who went to Kuber on 13 April and which were still there on 16 April and which remained there all day.[721] Livanci} was killed on 17 April.

483. The Prosecution sought (and were granted) leave to withdraw the indictment against Katava on the grounds that there was an insufficient evidentiary basis to justify proceeding with the prosecution. However, the decision to withdraw the indictment was one for the Prosecution and it does not follow that Witness EE is mistaken in her identification of the accused. Similarly, even if she was mistaken about her identification of Katava (and Alilovi} and Livanci}), it does not necessarily mean that she was mistaken in her identification of Drago Josipović and Vladimir Šantić. Although she did not see the accused for long (a matter of seconds),[722] she recognised them as people known to her before the attack (Drago Josipovi} as a neighbour for more than 30 years and Vladimir Šanti} professionally).

4. Their Alleged Participation in Other Incidents on 16 April 1993

(a) Drago Josipovi}

(i) Prosecution Evidence

484. Drago Josipovi} was identified as a participant in other attacks on the homes of his neighbours in which the male inhabitants of the houses were executed and the houses set on fire. This was part of what appears to have been a concerted attack on Muslim homes in the area.

485. First, it is alleged that Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the house of Nazif and Senija Ahmi}, during which Nazif and his 14 year old son, Amir, were killed. Witness DD gave evidence of this attack. She saw Drago Josipovi} among soldiers near Asim's house, shooting at Nazif's house: the soldiers came to the latter house. A soldier took Amir behind the house and a shot was heard. Drago Josipovi} then came from behind the house, taking off his mask or cap to wipe sweat from his forehead. Drago Josipovi} pointed a rifle and told a soldier with whom she had been struggling to leave the witness alone.[723] It seemed to the witness that Drago Josipovi} was in command.[724] She had known Drago Josipovi} as a neighbour for 21 years prior to the attack.

486. Secondly, it is alleged that Drago Josipović participated in an attack in which Fahrudin ('Fahran') Ahmi} was killed. Fahrudin's mother, Witness CA, gave evidence regarding this attack. (She was a Court witness, called by the Trial Chamber). She lived in Zume near Fahrudin and Drago Josipovi}: only a fence separated her house from that of Drago Josipovi}. She said she had good relations with Drago Josipovi} 's mother who was like a sister to her. Drago Josipovi} grew up with her children in her courtyard; her son, Fahrudin and Drago were like "blood brothers".[725] Her evidence was as follows:

(a) On the morning of the 16 April at about 5.20 a.m., after some detonations, Witness CA saw four soldiers in camouflage uniforms and with rifles coming from Drago Josipovi}'s yard to her house. They asked for her son, Fahrudin, and shortly afterwards threw a bomb into the upper part of her house. They then broke in and put her husband up against a pillar to be shot. She successfully pleaded for his life. The soldiers then told her to leave (which she did) and they set fire to the house. Witness CA then went to Fahrudin's house where his children told her that he had been killed.[726] She subsequently saw his body.

(b) Later she saw Drago Josipovi} nearby with a man called Anto Papi}; they had camouflage uniforms and weapons. She asked Drago Josipovi} where he was when Fahrudin was killed. He was crying and said he would have done something if he could, but he could not do anything. When asked who had ordered the killing, he said "somebody higher up, some higher force".[727] At Drago Josipovi}'s suggestion the witness and her family were taken to Anto Papi}'s house. While they were in the house Witness CA asked Drago Josipovi} to collect two other families from their houses which he did. Drago Josipovi} told the witness that Musafer Puš}ul had been killed and that Jozo Livanci} had told him.[728]

(c) The next day, on 17 April 1998, Drago Josipovi} and Anto Papi} told the witness and her husband to go to Ramiz's yard. When she met Drago Josipovi} later, she asked him to accompany her. He refused, saying that he could not save them since there was shooting and they would all be killed. He told her to follow her people.[729]

They went to Ramiz's yard and her husband was subsequently taken away and executed.

487. It may be noted that there was evidence of a similar attack on another house nearby on 16 April (although Drago Josipovi} was not identified as a participant). This evidence, given by Witness FF, was to the effect that shots were fired at the house, her husband Razim was taken from the house and while she and her children were locked in a barn her husband was executed.[730]

488. The remaining evidence concerning Drago Josipovi}'s conduct on 16 April concerns events at or near the Ogrjev Plant:

(a) Witness Z said that he saw Drago Josipovi} on the main road near the Ogrjev Plant at about 4.30 p.m., leading a group of soldiers, wearing a camouflage uniform and multi-coloured cap and with an automatic rifle, but no paint on his face.[731]

(b) According to Witness Z, Aladin Karahodja, night watchman at the Ogrjev Plant, told Witness Z that on 16 April 1993 Drago Josipovi} took his gun from him and threatened him.[732]

(c) According to Witness BB, Aladin told her that Drago Josipovi} had locked him in his hut and told him that he would see everything and be the last to be killed.[733] (Aladin is now dead). However, the Trial Chamber notes that this allegation was not contained in Witness BB's statement made in 1995.

489. There is no other direct evidence of Vladimir Šanti}'s involvement in attacks on 16 April 1993. However there is evidence of the accused's involvement with the Jokers from which the Prosecution invited the Trial Chamber to conclude that he participated in such attacks, at least in his capacity as Commander of the Jokers. This evidence was as follows:

(a) According to Witness B, on 16 or 17 April 1993 a young HVO soldier, Zoran Šanti}, was arrested in Stari Vitez and was questioned. Witness B overheard part of the questioning. Zoran Šanti} said that he had spent the last few months at the Bungalow as a messenger and that it was full of troops and Special Purpose Units: he had often seen Vladimir Šanti} there. On the evening of 15 April 1993 "there was intensified activity with arming, equipment and fresh forces coming in". Zoran Šanti} was at the Bungalow and Vladimir Šanti} came in a car with a crate of alcohol. There had been a meeting at which he overheard Vladimir Šanti} say that the order was that not a single male from 12-70 years must remain alive; everyone else was to be captured.[734] (The Trial Chamber bears in mind that this evidence is double hearsay).

(b) A video tape of a TV report (alleged to have been made by Bosnian Croat TV from Busovača) relating to events on the evening of 16 April showed a scene at 2248 hours which Witness AA identified as showing the Jokers in the Bungalow with Pasko Ljubici} and Vladimir Šanti}.[735] The Defence did not dispute that Vladimir Šanti} is shown on the tape but disputed the circumstances in which it was filmed and said that the time shown therein was not accurate.

(c) According to Sulejman Kavazovi}, on 24 April 1993 he was taken to the Bungalow where he saw Vladimir Šanti}, wearing a black uniform normally worn by the Jokers, together with 50 or 60 people from various units. Vladimir Šanti} ordered some men to take the witness to Kratine.[736]

(d) Zaim Kabler, a Muslim prisoner and an acquaintance of Vladimir Šanti}'s, said that he saw Vladimir Šanti} at the Bungalow on 26 April 1993 in a camouflage shirt and patches.[737]

5. Defence Evidence concerning Events on 16 April 1993

(a) Drago Josipović

490. The case for this accused is that he was not involved in the murders as alleged by the Prosecution. He alleges that he was not at the location alleged at the material time but that he instead spent the day moving around the houses nearby, in particular, those of Anto Bralo and Anto Papić. He took no part in military activity but rather, was helping others find shelter (including Muslims).

491. In support of this case Drago Josipović called evidence from five of his neighbours and another witness was called by the Trial Chamber. First, Anto Papić said that at 5.15 a.m., he saw Drago Josipović going past his (the witness's) house. The witness was in his yard and invited Drago Josipović in for a cup of coffee. Drago Josipović said he was going to his father-in-law's in Rovna where he had some business. After ten minutes shots were fired. Drago Josipović said he did not know what it was. The witness suggested that they go to see who was firing. They went out and met Witness CB (the wife of Fahran) and her children. She asked the witness for shelter. He agreed. There were a number of Muslims at his house. Drago Josipović brought Mirsad Osmancevi} and Casim Rami} and family to the witness's house where they were protected.[738] Later he also brought back Witness EE.[739]

492. This evidence was supported by the evidence of Mr. and Mrs Kova}, Mr. Anto Bralo and Mrs. Finka Bralo, who described the accused moving around with Anto Papi} in the vicinity of Anto Papi}'s house between 5.30 and 5.45 a.m. that morning and taking Muslims to that house.[740] These witnesses, together with Witness CB, testified that Drago Josipović remained in this vicinity all day and helped various Muslims to find shelter in the house.[741]

[738] T. 9927-9933.

493. It may be noted that Mr. Kova} and Mr. Bralo said that Drago Josipović was carrying a rifle.[742] Also, there was evidence that the accused was wearing an army vest which he lent to Mirsad Osmancevi} (a member of the BiH Army).[743] The vest had an insignia which was similar to that on the Croat flag, a small chessboard.[744]

494. A suggestion appeared to be made that a man called Slavko Rajkovi} (a Croat soldier wearing a Jokers patch), who was himself killed on 16 April 1993, and who was seen together with other soldiers wearing black uniforms with painted faces in front of Ramiz Ahmi}'s house, may have been responsible for the killings. Evidence of this was given by Josip Vidovi} and Josip Covi}.[745]

495. Witness CB was the wife of Fahran Ahmi} and gave evidence which tended to contradict that of her mother-in-law, Witness CA. Witness CB said that she and her family were awoken by loud explosions. They went downstairs. A grenade was thrown into an adjacent room. A shot was fired into the door and a man came in.[746] She said that he was tall and blonde, wearing a camouflage uniform with the insignia of the Military Police on his arm.[747] The man told the family to get out. Her husband, Fahran, went out – the man shot him in a burst of gunfire. The rest of the family remained in the house. Her mother-in-law, Fatima, came to the house. A Croat soldier in camouflage uniform told them to leave.[748] They left the house and went across the fields. There was gunfire all around.[749] They met Drago Josipovi} and Anto Papi}. This was before 6 a.m.[750] The witness said that Fahran had been killed and they expressed their condolences. Drago Josipović said that if he had been there he would have been killed. Anto Papi} and Drago Josipović told them to go to Anto Papi}'s house: his family would share their fate. The witness agreed with her statement to the Office of the Prosecutor that in her opinion Drago Josipović could not have been near her house when her husband was killed. The distance between the witness's house and Anto Papi}'s house was 10 minutes walk.[751]

496. Dragan Cali}, who was foreman of the warehouse in the Ogrjev plant, was called to give evidence about events at the plant. He said in evidence that Aladin Karahodja was one of the guards (he was between 27-30 years old and healthy). He was on duty from 4 p.m. on 15 April 1993 to 8 a.m. on 16 April 1993. According to the rules, he could not leave until the foreman arrived. The witness did not go to work on 16 April. Aladin could have climbed out over the fence or gone through the small gate which was not locked. If the guard hut was locked a person inside could get out through the door or window. On 18 April the witness returned to work and everything was in order: the door was unlocked and a pistol was in the drawer with two rounds which had been issued to Aladin.[752]

(b) Vladimir Šanti}

497. The Defence case is one of alibi, i.e. that at the time that Witness EE alleged that he was one of the party who attacked her house and killed her husband, Vladimir Šanti} was in fact in the HVO Headquarters in the Hotel Vitez. He called two witnesses in support of his alibi.

498. The first witness was Davor Bileti}, a member of the 4th Batallion of the HVO Military Police, employed in security in the Hotel Vitez. He said that at midnight of 15 April, he was on duty at the reception desk at the Hotel. At 5.15 a.m. on 16 April Vladimir Šanti} arrived as usual: there was a clock on the desk and the witness was aware of the time as he had to wake up those who were going on guard duty. Vladimir Šanti} came to the hotel on foot: he was dressed in a camouflage uniform and was carrying a pistol.[753] The witness exchanged greetings with Vladimir Šanti} who then went into the Military Police office behind the reception. At 5.30 a.m., there was a loud detonation, followed by smaller detonations which shattered some of the glass. There was also fire from rifles. Shells and bullets were falling around the hotel. The witness took up position outside the entrance: he heard Vladimir Šanti}'s voice.[754] The witness remained at his post at the entrance until 11 a.m., when he went to get a sandwich and saw Vladimir Šanti} going into the mess. At about 6 p.m., the witness went to get his dinner and again saw Vladimir Šanti} in the mess.[755] After 8 p.m., the witness and six others from hotel security were sent to the Bungalow by vehicle. He saw Vladimir Šanti} in front of the Bungalow. The group stayed for 20 minutes at the Bungalow and were then taken to the frontline at Kratine.[756]

499. The second witness, Ivica Franji}, was at the time Manager of the Hotel Vitez. According to his evidence, he was living in Kruscice, about 1 km. from the hotel.[757] On 16 April, having been woken by detonations, he left for the hotel, arriving there between 6.15 - 6.30 a.m. He saw Vladimir Šanti} in the lobby of the hotel and asked him what was going on, only to receive a dismissive reply, to the effect that "well, don't you see?" The witness left the hotel shortly afterwards because none of his staff were there. Šanti} stayed in the lobby, issuing instructions.[758] This witness was cross-examined about an interview with an Office of the Prosecutor Investigator in March 1999 (in the presence of both Prosecution and Defence Counsel) in which (contrary to his evidence) he said that he left the hotel by the exit to the coffee shop: the witness said in evidence that he went through the coffee shop to the main entrance.[759]

6. Findings of the Trial Chamber

500. Dealing, first, with Vladimir Šanti}, the Trial Chamber finds that in April 1993 he held the following positions. It was not disputed that he was commander of the 1st Company of the 4th Battalion of the Military Police: the evidence of Witness B and the documents signed by the accused in this capacity make this clear.

501. The Trial Chamber also finds that Vladimir Šanti} was Commander of the Jokers. In this connection the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness AA who, as a member of the Jokers, gave evidence that the accused was their Commander.

502. The Trial Chamber finds that Drago Josipovi} was a member of the HVO prior to 16 April 1993; he was a member of the village guard and was seen in the village in uniform and with a rifle. The Trial Chamber accepts the Prosecution evidence on this point and notes that much is undisputed. However, the background, views and conduct of the accused's wife are irrelevant.

503. Turning to the alleged direct participation of both accused in the conflict on 16 April 1993, the prosecution relies on the evidence of Witness EE, who identified them both as participants in the attack on her house when her husband was murdered. Her evidence, together with the evidence called to cast doubt on it, have been analysed above. The thrust of the criticism is that she mis-identified three other participants. It is accepted by the Trial Chamber that the witness was mistaken in her identification of Katava and Alilovi}, since there is compelling evidence that neither was in Ahmi}i that morning. (It is not accepted that she was mistaken about Livanci} since the only evidence concerning his whereabouts that morning came from two of his colleagues). However, it does not follow from the fact that the witness was mistaken in the identification of two of the participants that she was mistaken in the identification of the accused. The witness struck the Trial Chamber as a trustworthy and careful witness who identified the two accused in a statement made within three weeks of these offences and has not, in any way, retracted it. The Trial Chamber accepts her evidence and finds that Vladimir Šanti} and Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the Pušćul house: they were part of the group of soldiers who attacked and burned the house and murdered Musafer Pušćul.

504. The Trial Chamber also finds that Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the house of Nazif Ahmi} in which Nazif and his 14 year old son were killed. The Prosecution case, in relation to these crimes, rests upon the evidence of Witness DD. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that she accurately identified the accused. The witness had known the accused as a neighbour for a great many years and had a ample opportunity to identify him during the incident. The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the witness accurately described the role played by the accused in the attack and that he was, in fact, in a commanding position with regard to the troops involved.

505. On the other hand, having heard the evidence of Witness CB, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the house of Fahran Ahmi}. At most, his comments to Witness CA amount to his saying that he knew of the incident and had not been able to do anything to prevent it.

506. The evidence concerning Drago Josipovi} and the nightwatchman of the Ogrjev Plant is hearsay and inconclusive. However, the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness Z regarding the presence of the accused leading soldiers near the plant on the afternoon of 16 April.

507. In relation to Vladimir Šanti}, the Trial Chamber is unable to accept the evidence of the conversation overheard by Witness B. As noted, this evidence is double hearsay and lacks any features which could confirm its reliability. On the other hand, the Trial Chamber notes the scene displayed on the video tape, referred to in the same paragraph, showing the accused at the Bungalow with the Jokers in the Bungalow on the evening of the conflict.

508. In finding that Vladimir Šanti} was present during the conflict, the Trial Chamber rejects his alibi. In relation to one of the two witnesses whom the accused called to support his alibi, Davor Biletić, an indication of this witness's lack of credibility was that although he was a member of the Military Police in Vitez, he denied knowing anything about the Jokers.[760] He also denied knowing Vladimir Šanti}'s rank.[761] In relation to the second witness, Ivica Franji}, the Trial Chamber, having noted the discrepancy between his evidence and the interview he gave, does not accept his evidence.

509. The Trial Chamber, likewise, rejects the defence put forward by Drago Josipovi} and his witnesses. The picture which they paint of the accused spending the day moving around the locality to very little apparent purpose is simply not credible. The truth is that he was armed and active, playing his full part in the attacks on his neighbours, sometimes having command over a group of soldiers.

V. THE APPLICABLE LAW

A. Preliminary Issues

1. General

510. Two particular arguments which have either been put forward by the Defence in their submissions or which are implicit in the testimony of witnesses called by the Defence need to be rebutted in the strongest possible terms.

511. The first is the suggestion that the attacks committed against the Muslim population of the Lašva Valley were somehow justifiable because, in the Defence's allegation, similar attacks were allegedly being perpetrated by the Muslims against the Croat population.[762] The Trial Chamber wishes to stress, in this regard, the irrelevance of reciprocity, particularly in relation to obligations found within international humanitarian law which have an absolute and non-derogable character. It thus follows that the tu quoque defence has no place in contemporary international humanitarian law. The defining characteristic of modern international humanitarian law is instead the obligation to uphold key tenets of this body of law regardless of the conduct of enemy combatants.

512. A second strand of argument resorted to by the Defence has been to challenge the civilian character of the Muslim population of Ahmići by alleging that the village of Ahmići was not an undefended village.[763] The Defence contends that the non-combatant status of the Muslim population of Ahmići should be determined in fact and not by [762] See, inter alia, the Defence's Submission of Witnesses (sic) Summaries pursuant to the Request of the Trial Chamber on 15 Oct. 1998, Nov. 10 1998 (filed 13 Nov. 1998), Doc. No. D2943-D2928: "the commander of the Army of Bosnia and Herzegovina (sic) in Ahmići [...] confessed crying before the major (sic) group of Croats that Nijaz Sivro was the one who was in charge and set targets [for...] the Army of Bosnia and [H]erzegovina with the final aim of persecution of Croats from Ahmići [...]" and T. 5999-6033.

[763] See for instance Defence's submission of the Answer whether on 16 April 1993 a massacre was carried out in Ahmići [...], Nov. 10, 1998, filed 13 Nov. 1998, Doc. No. D2958-D2947: "Ahmići was not [an] undefended village in which all Moslems were (sic) the civilian population [.... M]any people were killed ... because it is (sic) a sad consequence of the war and armed conflict".

formalities[764] and that it cannot encompass persons who had previously taken part in any fashion in hostilities, had previously taken up arms or who spontaneously took up arms to resist an attacker.[765] According to these submissions, the civilian deaths in Ahmići resulted from skirmishes between warring factions and hence, were militarily-justified actions.[766]

513. Whether or not this is correct – and this is a matter that will be addressed later – it is nevertheless beyond dispute that at a minimum, large numbers of civilian casualties would have been interspersed among the combatants. The point which needs to be emphasised is the sacrosanct character of the duty to protect civilians, which entails, amongst other things, the absolute character of the prohibition of reprisals against civilian populations. Even if it can be proved that the Muslim population of Ahmići was not entirely civilian but comprised some armed elements, still no justification would exist for widespread and indiscriminate attacks against civilians. Indeed, even in a situation of full-scale armed conflict, certain fundamental norms still serve to unambiguously outlaw such conduct, such as rules pertaining to proportionality.

514. The Trial Chamber will also address an issue of general relevance and of a methodological nature, namely, the importance it should attach to case law in its findings on international humanitarian law and international criminal law.

[764] See for example the Defence's assertion that members of the BiH Army seldom wore uniforms or distinctive insignia and hence, the mere fact that none of the victims appeared to be wearing uniforms cannot be dispositive of this issue. (See Petition of the Counsels of the Accused Zoran and Mirjan Kupreškić, filed 12 Nov. 1998, Doc. No. D2904-D2891, at para. 7: "... in (sic) the incriminated time most of the members (sic) of the BiH had no uniforms, that they were (sic) in civilian clothes, with no special marks on them, and they were dressed that way when they left for the front line with Serbs, so, according to that, the fact that no dead persons in uniforms have been seen, does not mean that they were not army members". No. D5970-D5879, at p. 18: "In Ahmići [on April 16 1993 ...t]he resistance was significant and organised" and the closing argument of defence counsel Radović, T. 12733-12734.

[765] See for instance the Defence's Closing Brief of 5 Nov. 1999, at p. 84: "[P]rivate individuals [...] who had previously taken part in any fashion in the internal hostilities, who previously had taken arms, or who spontaneously take up arms to resist an attacker [...] directly take part in hostilities and, therefore, are [not] covered by this definition of "non-combatant" [or] protected by ICTY Art. 3".

2. The Tu Quoque Principle is Fallacious and Inapplicable: The Absolute Character of Obligations Imposed by Fundamental Rules of International Humanitarian Law

515. Defence counsel have indirectly or implicitly relied upon the tu quoque principle, i.e. the argument whereby the fact that the adversary has also committed similar crimes offers a valid defence to the individuals accused.[767] This is an argument resting on the allegedly reciprocal nature of obligations created by the humanitarian law of armed conflict. This argument may amount to saying that breaches of international humanitarian law, being committed by the enemy, justify similar breaches by a belligerent. Or it may amount to saying that such breaches, having been perpetrated by the adversary, legitimise similar breaches by a belligerent in response to, or in retaliation for, such violations by the enemy. Clearly, this second approach to a large extent coincides with the doctrine of reprisals, and is accordingly assessed below. Here the Trial Chamber will confine itself to briefly discussing the first meaning of the principle at issue.

516. It should first of all be pointed out that although tu quoque was raised as a defence in war crimes trials following the Second World War, it was universally rejected. The US Military Tribunal in the High Command trial, for instance, categorically stated that under general principles of law, an accused does not exculpate himself from a crime by showing that another has committed a similar crime, either before or after the commission of the crime by the accused.[768] Indeed, there is in fact no support either in State practice or in the opinions of publicists for the validity of such a defence.

[767] See for instance the cross-examination of Witness Y, where defence counsel Ms. Glumać gave a list of Croatian villages from which Croats were allegedly expelled and their houses burnt, supporting the inference that the Croats justified the massacres in Ahmići in terms of revenge (T. 3344-46). See also paras. 23, 125 and 338, ibid.

See also 'Final Report of the Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780 (1992),' UN Doc. S/1994/674 (27 May 1994), p. 18, para. 63.

517. Secondly, the tu quoque argument is flawed in principle. It envisages humanitarian law as based upon a narrow bilateral exchange of rights and obligations. Instead, the bulk of this body of law lays down absolute obligations, namely obligations that are unconditional or in other words not based on reciprocity. This concept is already encapsulated in Common Article 1 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, which provides that "The High Contracting Parties undertake to respect [...] the present Convention in all circumstances" (emphasis added). Furthermore, attention must be drawn to a common provision (respectively Articles 51, 52, 131 and 148) which provides that "No High Contracting party shall be allowed to absolve itself or any other High Contracting Party of any liability incurred by itself or by another High Contracting Party in respect of breaches referred to in the preceding Article [i.e. grave breaches]". Admittedly, this provision only refers to State responsibility for grave breaches committed by State agents or de facto State agents, or at any rate for grave breaches generating State responsibility (e.g. for an omission by the State to prevent or punish such breaches). Nevertheless, the general notion underpinning those provisions is that liability for grave breaches is absolute and may in no case be set aside by resort to any legal means such as derogating treaties or agreements. A fortiori such liability and, more generally individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law may not be thwarted by recourse to arguments such as reciprocity.

518. The absolute nature of most obligations imposed by rules of international humanitarian law reflects the progressive trend towards the so-called 'humanisation' of international legal obligations, which refers to the general erosion of the role of reciprocity in the application of humanitarian law over the last century. After the First World War, the application of the laws of war moved away from a reliance on reciprocity between belligerents, with the consequence that, in general, rules came to be increasingly applied by each belligerent despite their possible disregard by the enemy.[769] The underpinning of this shift was that it became clear to States that norms of international humanitarian law were not intended to protect State interests; they were primarily designed to benefit individuals qua human beings. Unlike other international norms, such as those of commercial treaties which can legitimately be based on the protection of reciprocal interests of States, compliance with humanitarian rules could not be made dependent on a reciprocal or corresponding performance of these obligations by other States. This trend marks the translation into legal norms of the "categorical imperative" formulated by Kant in the field of morals: one ought to fulfil an obligation regardless of whether others comply with it or disregard it.

[769] This is translated in para. 121 of the 1958 British Manual of Military Law into a clear rejection of a broad principle of reciprocity: A belligerent is thus not justified in declaring himself freed altogether from the obligation to observe the laws of war or any of them on account of their suspected or ascertained violation by his adversary. (UK War Office, Manual of Military Law, Part III, The Laws and Usages of

519. As a consequence of their absolute character, these norms of international humanitarian law do not pose synallagmatic obligations, i.e. obligations of a State vis-à-vis another State. Rather -- as was stated by the International Court of Justice in the Barcelona Traction case (which specifically referred to obligations concerning fundamental human rights) -- they lay down obligations towards the international community as a whole, with the consequence that each and every member of the international community has a "legal interest" in their observance and consequently a legal entitlement to demand respect for such obligations.[770]

520. Furthermore, most norms of international humanitarian law, in particular those prohibiting war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide, are also peremptory norms of international law or jus cogens, i.e. of a non-derogable and overriding character.[771] One illustration of the consequences which follow from this classification is

War on Land (H. Lauterpacht (ed.), London, HMSO, 1958), para. 121, n. 1(a)). This Manual does, however, leave open the possibility of reprisals against an earlier violation by the enemy (see paras. 642-9 of the Manual).

[771] Art. 53, Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 23 May 1969. A peremptory norm or jus cogens principle is a norm that enjoys a higher rank in the international hierarchy than treaty law and even 'ordinary' customary rules: Prosecutor v. Furundžija, (IT-95-17/1-T), Judgement, Trial Chamber, 10 December 1998, (hereafter Furundžija, Judgement, 10 Dec. 1998), at para. 153. With regard to the impermissibility of reservations to human rights conventions with respect to peremptory norms, see also that if the norms in question are contained in treaties, contrary to the general rule set out in Article 60 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, a material breach of that treaty obligation by one of the parties would not entitle the other to invoke that breach in order to terminate or suspend the operation of the treaty. Article 60(5) provides that such reciprocity or in other words the principle inadimplenti non est adimplendum does not apply to provisions relating to the protection of the human person contained in treaties of a humanitarian character, in particular the provisions prohibiting any form of reprisals against persons protected by such treaties.

3. The Prohibition of Attacks on Civilian Populations

521. The protection of civilians in time of armed conflict, whether international or internal, is the bedrock of modern humanitarian law. In 1938, the Assembly of the League of Nations, echoing an important statement made, with reference to Spain, in the House of Commons by the British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain,[772] adopted a Resolution concerning the protection of civilian populations against bombing from the air, in which it stated that "the intentional bombing of [the] civilian population is illegal".[773] Indeed, it is now a universally recognised principle, recently restated by the International Court of Justice, that deliberate attacks on civilians or civilian objects are absolutely prohibited by international humanitarian law.[774]

522. The protection of civilians and civilian objects provided by modern international law may cease entirely or be reduced or suspended in three exceptional circumstances: (i) when civilians abuse their rights; (ii) when, although the object of a military attack is comprised of military objectives, belligerents cannot avoid causing so-called collateral damage to civilians; and (iii) at least according to some authorities, when civilians may legitimately be the object of reprisals.

523. In the case of clear abuse of their rights by civilians, international rules operate to lift that protection which would otherwise be owed to them. Thus, for instance, under Article 19 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, the special protection against attacks granted to civilian hospitals shall cease, subject to certain conditions, if the hospital "[is used] to commit, outside [its] humanitarian duties, acts harmful to the enemy", for example if an artillery post is set up on top of the hospital. Similarly, if a group of civilians takes up arms in an occupied territory and engages in fighting against the enemy belligerent, they may be legitimately attacked by the enemy belligerent whether or not they meet the requirements laid down in Article 4(A)(2) of the Third Geneva Convention of 1949.

524. In the case of attacks on military objectives causing damage to civilians, international law contains a general principle prescribing that reasonable care must be taken in attacking military objectives so that civilians are not needlessly injured through carelessness. This principle, already referred to by the United Kingdom in 1938 with regard to the Spanish Civil War,[775] has always been applied in conjunction with the principle of proportionality, whereby any incidental (and unintentional) damage to civilians must not be out of proportion to the direct military advantage gained by the military attack. In addition, attacks, even when they are directed against legitimate military targets, are unlawful if conducted using indiscriminate means or methods of warfare, or in such a way as to cause indiscriminate damage to civilians. These principles have to some extent been spelled out in Articles 57 and 58 of the First Additional Protocol of 1977. Such provisions, it would seem, are now part of customary international law, not only because they specify and flesh out general pre-existing norms, but also because they do not appear to be contested by any State, including those which have not ratified the Protocol. Admittedly, even these two provisions leave a wide margin of discretion to belligerents by using language that might be regarded as leaving the last word to the attacking party. Nevertheless this is an area where the "elementary considerations of humanity" rightly emphasised by the International Court of Justice in the Corfu Channel,[776] Nicaragua[777] and Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons[778] cases should be fully used when interpreting and applying loose international rules, on the basis that they are illustrative of a general principle of international law.

[775] In his statement in the House of Commons on the Spanish civil war, the British Prime Minister stated that one of the rules applicable in any armed conflict was the rule whereby "[r]easonable care must be

525. More specifically, recourse might be had to the celebrated Martens Clause which,[779] in the authoritative view of the International Court of Justice, has by now become part of customary international law.[780] True, this Clause may not be taken to mean that the "principles of humanity" and the "dictates of public conscience" have been elevated to the rank of independent sources of international law, for this conclusion is belied by international practice. However, this Clause enjoins, as a minimum, reference to those principles and dictates any time a rule of international humanitarian law is not sufficiently rigorous or precise: in those instances the scope and purport of the rule must taken in attacking [...] military objectives so that by carelessness a civilian population in the neighbourhood is not bombed". (House of Commons, Debates, 21 June 1938, vol. 337, cols. 937-938).

[777] ICJ Reports, 1986, p. 112, para. 215.

[779] The Martens Clause was first set forth in the preambular provisions of the 1899 Hague Convention concerning the Laws or customs of War on Land which reads as follows:

> Until a more complete code of the laws of war is issued, the High Contracting Parties think it right to declare that in cases not included in the Regulations adopted by them, populations and belligerents remain under the protection and empire of the principles of international law, as they result from the usages established between civilised nations, from the laws of humanity, and the requirements of the public conscience.

The French text of this Article reads as follows:

> En attendant qu'un code plus complet des lois de la guerre puisse être édicté, les Hautes Parties Contractantes jugent opportun de constater que, dans les cas non compris dans les dispositions réglementaires adoptées par Elles, les populations et les belligérants restent sous la sauvegarde et sous l'empire des principes du droit des gens, tels qu'ils résultent des usages établis entre nations civilisées, des lois de l'humanité et des exigences de la conscience publique.

A modern version of this clause is to be found in Art. 1(2) of Additional Protocol I of 1977, which refers, instead, to "the principles of humanity and [...] the dictates of public conscience" ("principes de l'humanité et des exigences de la conscience publique").

be defined with reference to those principles and dictates. In the case under discussion, this would entail that the prescriptions of Articles 57 and 58 (and of the corresponding customary rules) must be interpreted so as to construe as narrowly as possible the discretionary power to attack belligerents and, by the same token, so as to expand the protection accorded to civilians.

526. As an example of the way in which the Martens clause may be utilised, regard might be had to considerations such as the cumulative effect of attacks on military objectives causing incidental damage to civilians. In other words, it may happen that single attacks on military objectives causing incidental damage to civilians, although they may raise doubts as to their lawfulness, nevertheless do not appear on their face to fall foul per se of the loose prescriptions of Articles 57 and 58 (or of the corresponding customary rules). However, in case of repeated attacks, all or most of them falling within the grey area between indisputable legality and unlawfulness, it might be warranted to conclude that the cumulative effect of such acts entails that they may not be in keeping with international law. Indeed, this pattern of military conduct may turn out to jeopardise excessively the lives and assets of civilians, contrary to the demands of humanity.

527. As for reprisals against civilians, under customary international law they are prohibited as long as civilians find themselves in the hands of the adversary. With regard to civilians in combat zones, reprisals against them are prohibited by Article 51(6) of the First Additional Protocol of 1977, whereas reprisals against civilian objects are outlawed by Article 52(1) of the same instrument. The question nevertheless arises as to whether these provisions, assuming that they were not declaratory of customary international law, have subsequently been transformed into general rules of international law. In other words, are those States which have not ratified the First Protocol (which include such countries as the U.S., France, India, Indonesia, Israel, Japan, Pakistan and Turkey), nevertheless bound by general rules having the same purport as those two provisions? Admittedly, there does not seem to have emerged recently a body of State practice consistently supporting the proposition that one of the elements of custom, namely usus or diuturnitas has taken shape. This is however an area where opinio iuris sive necessitatis may play a much greater role than usus, as a result of the aforementioned Martens Clause. In the light of the way States and courts have implemented it, this Clause clearly shows that principles of international humanitarian law may emerge through a customary process under the pressure of the demands of humanity or the dictates of public conscience, even where State practice is scant or inconsistent. The other element, in the form of opinio necessitatis, crystallising as a result of the imperatives of humanity or public conscience, may turn out to be the decisive element heralding the emergence of a general rule or principle of humanitarian law.

528. The question of reprisals against civilians is a case in point. It cannot be denied that reprisals against civilians are inherently a barbarous means of seeking compliance with international law. The most blatant reason for the universal revulsion that usually accompanies reprisals is that they may not only be arbitrary but are also not directed specifically at the individual authors of the initial violation. Reprisals typically are taken in situations where the individuals personally responsible for the breach are either unknown or out of reach. These retaliatory measures are aimed instead at other more vulnerable individuals or groups. They are individuals or groups who may not even have any degree of solidarity with the presumed authors of the initial violation; they may share with them only the links of nationality and allegiance to the same rulers.

529. In addition, the reprisal killing of innocent persons, more or less chosen at random, without any requirement of guilt or any form of trial, can safely be characterized as a blatant infringement of the most fundamental principles of human rights. It is difficult to deny that a slow but profound transformation of humanitarian law under the pervasive influence of human rights has occurred. As a result belligerent reprisals against civilians and fundamental rights of human beings are absolutely inconsistent legal concepts. This trend towards the humanisation of armed conflict is amongst other things confirmed by the works of the United Nations International Law Commission on State Responsibility. Article 50(d) of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility, adopted on first reading in 1996, prohibits as countermeasures any "conduct derogating from basic human rights".[781]

530. It should be added that while reprisals could have had a modicum of justification in the past, when they constituted practically the only effective means of compelling the enemy to abandon unlawful acts of warfare and to comply in future with international law, at present they can no longer be justified in this manner. A means of inducing compliance with international law is at present more widely available and, more importantly, is beginning to prove fairly efficacious: the prosecution and punishment of war crimes and crimes against humanity by national or international courts. This means serves the purpose of bringing to justice those who are responsible for any such crime, as well as, albeit to a limited extent, the purpose of deterring at least the most blatant violations of international humanitarian law.

531. Due to the pressure exerted by the requirements of humanity and the dictates of public conscience, a customary rule of international law has emerged on the matter under discussion. With regard to the formation of a customary rule, two points must be made to demonstrate that opinio iuris or opinio necessitatis can be said to exist.

532. First, even before the adoption of the First Additional Protocol of 1977, a number of States had declared or laid down in their military manuals that reprisals in modern warfare are only allowed to the extent that they consist of the use, against enemy armed forces, of otherwise prohibited weapons – thus a contrario admitting that reprisals against civilians are not allowed. In this respect one can mention the United States military manual for the Army (The Law of Land Warfare), of 1956,[782] as well as the

After stating that reprisals against "protected persons" are prohibited pursuant to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, the Manual goes on to state that "[h]owever, reprisals may still be visited on enemy troops who have not yet fallen into the hands of the forces undertaking the reprisals" (para. 497(c)). In sub-para (a) of the same paragraph it is stated that "[t]he employment by a belligerent of a weapon the use of which is normally precluded by the law of war would constitute a lawful reprisal for intentional mistreatment of prisoners of war held by the enemy".

Dutch "Soldiers Handbook" (Handboek voor de Soldaat) of 1974.[783] True, other military manuals of the same period took a different position, admitting reprisals against civilians not in the hands of the enemy belligerent.[784] In addition, senior officials of the United States Government seem to have taken a less clear stand in 1978, by expressing doubts about the workability of the prohibition of reprisals against civilians.[785] The fact remains, however, that elements of a widespread opinio necessitatis are discernible in international dealings. This is confirmed, first of all, by the adoption, by a vast majority, of a Resolution of the U.N. General Assembly in 1970 which stated that "civilian populations, or individual members thereof, should not be the object of reprisals".[786] A further confirmation may be found in the fact that a high number of States have ratified the First Protocol, thereby showing that they take the view that reprisals against civilians must always be prohibited.[787] It is also notable that this view was substantially upheld by the Art. 35: "[...] Collective punishments [of civilians], the taking of hostages, and reprisals [against civilians] are prohibited" (unofficial translation). These provisions have been restated in the edition of March 1995 of the Dutch Manual, at Art. 6 (pp. 7-43).

[784] See for example the British Manual (The Law of War on Land, The War Office, 1958, p. 184, para 644 and note 2). The Austrian Manual (Truppenführung), Bundesministerium für Landesverteidigung, Wien 1965, p. 255, para 48, lists the various categories of persons and objects against whom reprisals are prohibited by the Geneva Conventions, but specifies that these are the reprisals "expressly prohibited" (ausdrücklich verboten).

[785] In his report to the United States Secretary of State, the U.S. Deputy Legal Adviser and Head of the U.S. Delegation to the Geneva Diplomatic Conference of 1974-77 stated that in his view the Geneva Conference had "gone unreasonably far in its prohibition of [reprisals]" (text in 72(2) American Journal of International Law, 1978 at p. 406) and added: "It is unreasonable to think that massive and continuing attacks directed against a nation's civilian population could be absorbed without a response in kind. By denying the possibility of response and not offering any workable substitute, Art. 51 [of the First Additional Protocol] is unrealistic and cannot be expected to withstand the test of future conflicts. On the other hand, it will not be easy for any country to reserve, explicitly, the right of reprisal against an enemy's civilian population, and we shall have to consider carefully whether such a reservation is indispensable for us" (ibid). Furthermore, it has been reported that the United States JCS (Joint Chiefs of Staff), faced with the possibility that other States would not accept individual monitoring mechanisms, expressed misgivings about the acceptance of the prohibition of reprisals against civilians. (J.A. Roach, in ICCR Review, 1991, 67 at p. 183, note 7: "If the United States cannot rely on neutral supervision to ensure compliance with humanitarian law, then the threat of unilateral retaliation retains its importance as a deterrent sanction to ensure at least a minimum level of humane behaviour by US adversaries").

[786] U.N. General Assembly Resolution 2675 (XXV) of 9 Dec. 1970.

[787] It should, however, be noted that in 1998 the United Kingdom, in ratifying the First Additional Protocol of 1977, made a reservation concerning the obligations of Articles 51 and 55 of the Protocol on the use of reprisals against civilians (see the letter sent on 28 January 1998 by the British Ambassador C. Hulse to the

ICRC in its Memorandum of 7 May 1983 to the States parties to the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the Iran-Iraq war[788] and by Trial Chamber I of the ICTY in Martić.[789]

533. Secondly, the States that have participated in the numerous international or internal armed conficts which have taken place in the last fifty years have normally refrained from claiming that they had a right to visit reprisals upon enemy civilians in the combat area. It would seem that such claim has been only advanced by Iraq in the Iran-Iraq war of 1980-1988[790] as well as – but only in abstracto and hypothetically, by a few States, such as France in 1974[791] and the United Kingdom in 1998.[792] The aforementioned elements seem to support the contention that the demands of humanity and the dictates of public conscience, as manifested in opinio necessitatis, have by now brought about the formation of a customary rule also binding upon those few States that at some stage did not intend to exclude the abstract legal possibility of resorting to the reprisals under discussion.

534. The existence of this rule was authoritatively confirmed, albeit indirectly, by the International Law Commission. In commenting on sub-paragraph d of Article 14 (now Article 50) of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility, which excludes from the regime of lawful countermeasures any conduct derogating from basic human rights, the [788] The ICRC pointed out the following: "The Iraqi forces have indiscriminately and systematically bombarded towns and villages, causing casualties among the civilian inhabitants and considerable destruction of civilian property. Such acts are inadmissible, the more so that some were declared to be reprisals before being perpetrated. [...] Such acts are in total disregard of the very essence of international humanitarian law applicable in armed conficts, which is founded on the distinction between civilians and military forces" (memorandum from the International Committee of the Red Cross to the States Parties to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949 Concerning the Conflict Between the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Republic of Iraq, Geneva, May 7, 1983, partially reproduced in M. [791] See Diplomatic Conference on the Reaffirmation and Development of International Humanitarian Law Applicable in Armed Conflict, Geneva 1974-77, Official Records, Vol. VI, 1977, at 162. France voted against the provision prohibiting reprisals, stating, inter alia, that it was "contrary to existing international law" (idem).

Commission noted that Article 3 common to the four 1949 Geneva Conventions "prohibits any reprisals in non-international armed conflicts with respect to the expressly prohibited acts as well as any other reprisal incompatible with the absolute requirement of humane treatment".[793] It follows that, in the opinion of the Commission, reprisals against civilians in the combat zone are also prohibited. This view, according to the Trial Chamber, is correct. However, it must be supplemented by two propositions. First, Common Article 3 has by now become customary international law.[794] Secondly, as the International Court of Justice rightly held in Nicaragua, it encapsulates fundamental legal standards of overarching value applicable both in international and internal armed conflicts.[795] Indeed, it would be absurd to hold that while reprisals against civilians entailing a threat to life and physical safety are prohibited in civil wars, they are allowed in international armed conflicts as long as the civilians are in the combat zone.

535. It should also be pointed out that at any rate, even when considered lawful, reprisals are restricted by; (a) the principle whereby they must be a last resort in attempts to impose compliance by the adversary with legal standards (which entails, amongst other things, that they may be exercised only after a prior warning has been given which has failed to bring about the discontinuance of the adversary's crimes); (b) the obligation to take special precautions before implementing them (they may be taken only after a decision to this effect has been made at the highest political or military level; in other words they may not be decided by local commanders); (c) the principle of proportionality (which entails not only that the reprisals must not be excessive compared to the precedent unlawful act of warfare, but also that they must stop as soon as that unlawful act has been discontinued) and; (d) 'elementary considerations of humanity' (as mentioned above).

536. Finally, it must be noted, with specific regard to the case at issue, that whatever the content of the customary rules on reprisals, the treaty provisions prohibiting them were in any event applicable in the case in dispute. In 1993, both Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina had ratified Additional Protocol I and II, in addition to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949.[796] Hence, whether or not the armed conflict of which the attack on Ahmići formed part is regarded as internal, indisputably the parties to the conflict were bound by the relevant treaty provisions prohibiting reprisals.

4. The Importance the International Tribunal can Attach to Case Law in its Findings of Law

537. This issue, albeit of general relevance and of a methodological nature, acquires special significance in the present judgement, as it is largely based on international and national judicial decisions. The Tribunal's need to draw upon judicial decisions is only to be expected, due to the fact that both substantive and procedural criminal law is still at a rudimentary stage in international law. In particular, there exist relatively few treaty provisions on the matter. By contrast, especially after World War II, a copious amount of case law has developed on international crimes. Again, this is a fully understandable development: it was difficult for international law-makers to reconcile very diverse and often conflicting national traditions in the area of criminal law and procedure by adopting general rules capable of duly taking into account those traditions. By contrast, general principles may gradually crystallise through their incorporation and elaboration in a series of judicial decisions delivered by either international or national courts dealing with specific cases. This being so, it is only logical that international courts should rely heavily on such jurisprudence. What judicial value should be assigned to this corpus?

538. The value to be assigned to judicial precedents to a very large extent depends on and is closely bound up with the legal nature of the Tribunal, i.e. on whether or not the Tribunal is an international court proper. The Trial Chamber shall therefore first of all consider, if only briefly, this matter – a matter that so far the Tribunal has not had the opportunity to delve into.

539. Indisputably, the ICTY is an international court, (i) because this was the intent of the Security Council, as expressed in the resolution establishing the Tribunal, (ii) because of the structure and functioning of this Tribunal, as well as the status, privileges and immunities it enjoys under Article 30 of the Statute, and (iii) because it is called upon to apply international law to establish whether serious violations of international humanitarian law have been committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia. Thus, the normative corpus to be applied by the Tribunal principaliter, i.e. to decide upon the principal issues submitted to it, is international law. True, the Tribunal may be well advised to draw upon national law to fill possible lacunae in the Statute or in customary international law. For instance, it may have to peruse and rely on national legislation or national judicial decisions with a view to determining the emergence of a general principle of criminal law common to all major systems of the world.[797] Furthermore, the Tribunal may have to apply national law incidenter tantum, i.e. in the exercise of its incidental jurisdiction. For instance, in determining whether Article 2 of the Statute (on grave breaches) is applicable, the Tribunal may have to establish whether one of the acts enumerated there has been perpetrated against a person regarded as "protected" under the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949. To this end it may have to satisfy itself that the person possessed the nationality of a State other than the enemy belligerent or Occupying Power. Clearly, this enquiry may only be carried out on the basis of the relevant national law of the person concerned. The fact remains, however, that the principal body of law the Tribunal is called upon to apply in order to adjudicate the cases brought before it is international law.

540. Being international in nature and applying international law principaliter, the Tribunal cannot but rely upon the well-established sources of international law and, within this framework, upon judicial decisions. What value should be given to such decisions? The Trial Chamber holds the view that they should only be used as a "subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law" (to use the expression in Article 38(1)(d) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which must be regarded as declaratory of customary international law). Hence, generally speaking, and subject to the binding force of decisions of the Tribunal's Appeals Chamber upon the Trial Chambers, the International Tribunal cannot uphold the doctrine of binding precedent (stare decisis) adhered to in common law countries. Indeed, this doctrine among other things presupposes to a certain degree a hierarchical judicial system. Such a hierarchical system is lacking in the international community. Clearly, judicial precedent is not a distinct source of law in international criminal adjudication. The Tribunal is not bound by precedents established by other international criminal courts such as the Nuremberg or Tokyo Tribunals, let alone by cases brought before national courts adjudicating international crimes. Similarly, the Tribunal cannot rely on a set of cases, let alone on a single precedent, as sufficient to establish a principle of law: the authority of precedents (auctoritas rerum similiter judicatarum) can only consist in evincing the possible existence of an international rule. More specifically, precedents may constitute evidence of a customary rule in that they are indicative of the existence of opinio iuris sive necessitatis and international practice on a certain matter, or else they may be indicative of the emergence of a general principle of international law. Alternatively, precedents may bear persuasive authority concerning the existence of a rule or principle, i.e. they may persuade the Tribunal that the decision taken on a prior occasion propounded the correct interpretation of existing law. Plainly, in this case prior judicial decisions may persuade the court that they took the correct approach, but they do not compel this conclusion by the sheer force of their precedential weight. Thus, it can be said that the Justinian maxim whereby courts must adjudicate on the strength of the law, not of cases (non exemplis, sed legibus iudicandum est) also applies to the Tribunal as to other international criminal courts.

[797] A reference to such a method is made in the Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), (S/25704), 3 May 1993, at paragraph 58 (hereafter Report of the Secretary-General).

541. As noted above, judicial decisions may prove to be of invaluable importance for the determination of existing law. Here again attention should however be drawn to the need to distinguish between various categories of decisions and consequently to the weight they may be given for the purpose of finding an international rule or principle. It cannot be gainsaid that great value ought to be attached to decisions of such international criminal courts as the international tribunals of Nuremberg or Tokyo, or to national courts operating by virtue, and on the strength, of Control Council Law no. 10, a legislative act jointly passed in 1945 by the four Occupying Powers and thus reflecting international agreement among the Great Powers on the law applicable to international crimes and the jurisdiction of the courts called upon to rule on those crimes. These courts operated under international instruments laying down provisions that were either declaratory of existing law or which had been gradually transformed into customary international law. In many instances no less value may be given to decisions on international crimes delivered by national courts operating pursuant to the 1948 Genocide Convention, or the 1949 Geneva Conventions or the 1977 Protocols or similar international treaties. In these instances the international framework on the basis of which the national court operates and the fact that in essence the court applies international substantive law, may lend great weight to rulings of such courts. Conversely, depending upon the circumstances of each case, generally speaking decisions of national courts on war crimes or crimes against humanity delivered on the basis of national legislation would carry relatively less weight.

542. In sum, international criminal courts such as the International Tribunal must always carefully appraise decisions of other courts before relying on their persuasive authority as to existing law. Moreover, they should apply a stricter level of scrutiny to national decisions than to international judgements, as the latter are at least based on the same corpus of law as that applied by international courts, whereas the former tend to apply national law, or primarily that law, or else interpret international rules through the prism of national legislation.

B. Crimes Against Humanity

1. Objective and Subjective Elements of the Crimes Under Article 5

543. Article 5 of the Statute of the International Tribunal deals with crimes against humanity. The essence of these crimes is a systematic policy of a certain scale and gravity directed against a civilian population. In the Nikolić Rule 61 decision, the Trial Chamber set forth in broad terms three distinct components of crimes against humanity under the ICTY Statute:[798]

> First, the crimes must be directed at a civilian population, specifically identified as a group by the perpetrators of those acts. Secondly, the crimes must, to a certain extent, be organised and systematic. Although they need not be related to a policy established at State level, in the conventional sense of the term, they cannot be the work of isolated individuals alone. Lastly, the crimes, considered as a whole, must be of a certain scale and gravity.

544. The following elements can be identified as comprising the core elements of crimes against humanity: first, the existence of an armed conflict; second, that the acts were part of a widespread or systematic occurrence of crimes directed against a civilian population (the requirement that the occurrence of crimes be widespread or systematic being a disjunctive one[799]) and finally, that the perpetrator had knowledge of the wider context in which his act occurs.[800]

2. The Requirement of an Armed Conflict

545. By requiring that crimes against humanity be committed in either internal or international armed conflict, the Security Council, in establishing the International

[799] As the Trial Chamber stated in its Judgement: "it is now well established that the requirement that the acts be directed against a civilian "population" can be fulfilled if the acts occur on either a widespread basis or in a systematic manner" (Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, para. 646).
[800] Ibid., at paras. 626 and 657.

Tribunal, may have defined the crime in Article 5 more narrowly than is necessary under customary international law.[801] It is nevertheless sufficient for the purposes of Article 5 that the act occurred in the course or duration of any armed conflict. The type and nature of such conflict – whether international or internal – is therefore immaterial.[802] An armed conflict can be said to exist whenever there is a resort to armed force between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State.[803]

546. The nature of the nexus required under Article 5 of the Statute is merely that the act be linked geographically as well as temporally with the armed conflict.[804]

3. 'Directed Against a Civilian Population'

547. It would seem that a wide definition of "civilian" and "population" is intended. This is warranted first of all by the object and purpose of the general principles and rules of humanitarian law, in particular by the rules prohibiting crimes against humanity. The latter are intended to safeguard basic human values by banning atrocities directed against human dignity. One fails to see why only civilians and not also combatants should be protected by these rules (in particular by the rule prohibiting persecution), given that these rules may be held to possess a broader humanitarian scope and purpose than those prohibiting war crimes. However, faced with the explicit limitation laid down in Article 5, the Trial Chamber holds that a broad interpretation should nevertheless be placed on the word "civilians", the more so because the limitation in Article 5 constitutes a departure from customary international law.

[801] See Prosecutor v. Tadić, (IT-94-1-AR72), Decision on Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction, Appeals Chamber, 2 Oct. 1995, (hereafter Tadić, Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995) at para. 141: 'It is by now a settled rule of customary international law that crimes against humanity do not require a connection to international armed conflict. Indeed ... customary international law may not require a connection between crimes against humanity and any conflict at all'.

[802] Ibid., at para. 142: "Art. 5 may be invoked as a basis for jurisdiction over crimes committed in either internal or international armed conflicts".

[803] Ibid., at para. 70.

[804] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber in Tadić noted that "[...] the temporal scope of the applicable rules clearly reaches beyond the actual hostilities. Moreover, the [...] nature of the language [...] suggests a broad geographical scope as well" (ibid., at para. 69).

548. The above proposition is borne out by the case law. Of particular relevance to the present case is the finding in Barbie[805] (admittedly based on general international law) that "inhumane acts and persecution commited in a systematic manner, in the name of a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy, not only against persons by reason of their membership of a racial or religious community but also against the opponents of that policy, whatever the form of their "opposition" could be considered a crime against humanity.[806] In the Vukovar Rule 61 Decision of 3 April 1996, a Trial Chamber held that crimes against humanity may be committed even where the victims at one time bore arms.[807]

549. Thus the presence of those actively involved in the conflict should not prevent the characterization of a population as civilian and those actively involved in a resistance movement can qualify as victims of crimes against humanity.

4. Can Crimes Against Humanity Comprise Isolated Acts?

550. In general terms, the very nature of the criminal acts over which the International Tribunal has jurisdiction under Article 5, in view of the fact that they must be 'directed against any civilian population,' ensures that what is to be alleged will not be one particular act but, instead, a course of conduct.[808] Nevertheless, in certain circumstances, a single act has comprised a crime against humanity when it occurred within the

[806] Ibid., at 137.
[807] On this point, the Trial Chamber held that "Fa]lthough according to the terms of Article 5 of the Statute of this Tribunal [...] combatants in the traditional sense of the term cannot be victims of a crime against humanity, this does not apply to individuals who, at one particular point in time, carried out acts of resistance. As the Commission of Experts, established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780, noted, "it seems obvious that Article 5 applies first and foremost to civilians, meaning people who are not combatants. This, however, should not lead to any quick conclusions concerning people who at one particular point in time did bear arms. ... Information of the overall circumstances is relevant for the interpretation of the provision in a spirit consistent with its purpose". (Prosecutor v. Mrksi} et al, Review of Indictment Pursuant to Rule 61, 3 Apr. 1996, para. 29, citing Report of the Commission of Experts established pursuant to Security Council Resolution 780, Doc. 5072 necessary context.[809] For example, the act of denouncing a Jewish neighbour to the Nazi authorities - if committed against a background of widespread persecution – has been regarded as amounting to a crime against humanity.[810] An isolated act, however – i.e. an atrocity which did not occur within such a context – cannot.

5. The Policy Element

551. With regard to the "form of governmental, organisational or group policy" which is to direct the acts in question, the Trial Chamber has noted that although the concept of crimes against humanity necessarily implies a policy element, there is some doubt as to whether it is strictly a requirement, as such, for crimes against humanity. In any case, it appears that such a policy need not be explicitly formulated, nor need it be the policy of a State.[811]

552. The need for crimes against humanity to have been at least tolerated by a State, Government or entity is also stressed in national and international case-law. The crimes [809] On this point, the Trial Chamber in Tadić has held that "[c]learly, a single act by a perpetrator taken within the context of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population entails individual criminal responsibility and an individual perpetrator need not commit numerous offences to be held liable. Although it is correct that isolated, random acts should not be included in the definition of crimes against humanity, that is the purpose of requiring that the acts be directed against a civilian population and thus "[e]ven an isolated act can constitute a crime against humanity if it is the product of a political system based on terror or persecution" (Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, para. 649, footnotes omitted).

[810] See e.g. the judgements of the Supreme Court for the British zone in: Entscheidungen des Obersten Gerichtshofes für die Britische Zone in Strafsachen, Vol. I, pp. 6 et seq.; 19 et seq.; 39 et seq.; 45 et seq.; 49 et seq.; 56 et seq.

[811] Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, at para. 653, where the Trial Chamber noted that "[t]he reason that crimes against humanity so shock the conscience of mankind and warrant intervention by the international community is because they are not isolated, random acts of individuals but rather result from a deliberate attempt to target a civilian population." It went on to explain that although traditionally this requirement was understood to mean that there must be some form of State policy to commit these acts occurred during this period, this was no longer the case (ibid., at para. 654). See also Prosecutor v. Nikolić, Rule 61 decision, at para. 26: "Although they [the crimes in question] need not be related to a policy established at State level, in the conventional sense of the term, they cannot be the work of isolated individuals alone."

at issue may also be State-sponsored or at any rate may be part of a governmental policy or of an entity holding de facto authority over a territory.[812]

553. National case-law tends, in particular, to emphasise that crimes against humanity are usually the manifestation of a criminal governmental policy. As observed by the Canadian Supreme Court in the case of Finta:[813]

> The central concern in the case of crimes against humanity is with such things as state-sponsored or sanctioned persecution, not the private individual who has a particular hatred against a particular group or the public generally.

554. The aforementioned judgements and others on the same matter implicitly illustrate the nature and implications of the link between an offence and a large-scale or systematic practice of abuses necessary in order for the offence to be characterised as a crime against humanity. In particular, they enable us to answer the question of whether the offence must be perpetrated by organs or agents of a State or a governmental authority or on behalf of such bodies, or whether it may be committed by individuals not acting in an official capacity, and in the latter case, whether the offence must be approved of or at least condoned or countenanced by a governmental body for it to amount to a crime against humanity.

555. While crimes against humanity are normally perpetrated by State organs, i.e. individuals acting in an official capacity such as military commanders, servicemen, etc., there may be cases where the authors of such crimes are individuals having neither official status nor acting on behalf of a governmental authority. The available case-law seems to indicate that in these cases some sort of explicit or implicit approval or endorsement by State or governmental authorities is required, or else that it is necessary for the offence to be clearly encouraged by a general governmental policy or to clearly fit within such a policy. In addition to many decisions concerning crimes against humanity perpetrated by individuals acting an a private capacity,[814] the Weller case may prove to be of some relevance to this issue. This case gave rise to six different judgements by German courts after World War II[815] and involved the ill-treatment of Jewish civilians by two persons under the command of Weller, a member of the SS, who was at the time not in uniform and was acting on his own initiative. After the injured parties reported to the Jewish community, which in turn complained to the local Gestapo, the head of the Gestapo informed the wronged Jews that Weller's actions were an isolated event which would in no way be approved. Thereafter Weller was summoned by the Gestapo and strongly taken to task by the district leader of the Nazi party. On appeal to the Supreme Court for the British zone, it was held that the offence did indeed constitute a crime against humanity, on the grounds that it was sufficient for the attack on human dignity to be connected to the national-socialist system of power and hegemony.[816]

The aforementioned decisions are on the Tribunal's files (they have been kindly provided to the Tribunal by the Nordrhein Westfälisches Hauptstaatsarchiv).

[816] In this regard the Supreme Court noted that "[a]ctions which seemingly or actually originated from quite personal decisions were also often and readily put by the national-socialist leadership at the service of its criminal goals and plans. This held true even for actions which outwardly were even disapproved of [...] The link, in this sense, with the national-socialist system of power and tyranny does in the case at issue manifestly exist [as] the actions of the accused fitted into the numerous persecutory measures which were then imposed against the Jews in Germany or could at any time be imposed against them. [...] [Th]e link with the national-socialist system of power and tyranny does not exist only in the case of those actions which are ordered and approved by the holders of hegemony; that link exists also when those actions can only be explained by the atmosphere and conditions created by the authorities in power. The trial court was [thus] wrong when it attached decisive value to the fact that the accused after his action was "rebuked" and that even the Gestapo disapproved of the excess as an isolated infringement. That this action nevertheless fitted into the persecution of Jews effected by the State and the party, is shown by the fact that the accused ... was not held criminally responsible... in proportion to the gravity of his guilt...." (See Entscheidungen, ibid., vol.1, pp. 206-207).

6. Knowledge of the Context Within Which the Perpetrator's Actions are Taken: the Mens Rea Requirement

556. The determination of the elements comprising the mens rea of crimes against humanity has proved particularly difficult and controversial. Nevertheless, the requisite mens rea for crimes against humanity appears to be comprised by (1) the intent to commit the underlying offence, combined with (2) knowledge of the broader context in which that offence occurs.[817]

557. With regard to the latter requirement (knowledge), the ICTR in Prosecutor v. Kayishema noted as follows:[818]

> Ftğhe perpetrator must knowingly commit crimes against humanity in the sense that he must understand the overall context of his act. []Part of what transforms an individual's act(s) into a crime against humanity is the inclusion of the act within a greater dimension of criminal conduct; therefore an accused should be aware of this greater dimension in order to be culpable thereof. Accordingly, actual or constructive knowledge of the broader context of the attack, meaning that the accused must know that his act(s) is part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population and pursuant to some sort of policy or plan, is necessary to satisfy the requisite mens rea element of the accused.

558. Two aspects of the subjective requirement of crimes against humanity are now free from dispute. Subsequent to the Appeals Chamber's decision in Prosecutor v. Tadić,

The Supreme Court for the British zone returned to this matter, although only fleetingly, in its decision of 10 October 1949 (unpublished), where it restated its position on the issue of crimes against humanity (see pp. 4-5 of the typescript).

[817] Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, at para. 656. See also ibid., para. 659, where it was noted that "if the perpetrator has knowledge, either actual or constructive, that these acts were occurring on a widespread or systematic basis ... that is sufficient to hold him liable for crimes against humanity. Therefore the perpetrator must know that there is an attack on the civilian population [and ...] know that his act fits in with the attack ....". Note the recent finding of the Tadić Appeals Chamber, which has declared erroneous the Trial Chamber's enunciation of a negative element; namely, that crimes against humanity must not be committed for the purely personal motives of the perpetrator: Prosecutor v. Tadić, (IT-94-1-A), Judgement, Appeals Chamber, 15 July 1999, (hereafter Tadić, Appeals Chamber Judgement, 15 July 1999), at para. 248-52.

crimes against humanity need be committed with a discriminatory intent only with regard to the category of "persecutions" under Article 5(h); ie. the sole category in which discrimination comprises an integral element of the prohibited conduct. Otherwise, a discriminatory animus is not an essential ingredient of the mens rea of crimes against humanity.[819] Nor are the motives (as distinct from the intent) of the accused, as such, of special pertinence.[820]

7. The Constituent Offences

559. The instant case involves counts of murder under Article 5(a) (counts 2, 4, 6, 8, 12 and 16), persecutions under Article 5(h) (count 1) and inhumane acts under Article 5(i) (counts 10, 14 and 18). Murder and inhumane acts will here be considered; persecution forms part of a separate analysis.

(a) Article 5(a): Murder

560. The constituent elements of murder under Article 5(a) of the Statute are well known.[821] They comprise the death of the victim as a result of the acts or omissions of the accused, where the conduct of the accused was a substantial cause of the death of the victim.[822] It can be said that the accused is guilty of murder if he or she engaging in conduct which is unlawful, intended to kill another person or to cause this person grievous bodily harm, and has caused the death of that person.

561. The requisite mens rea of murder under Article 5(a) is the intent to kill or the intent to inflict serious injury in reckless disregard of human life.[823] In Kayishema it was noted that the standard of mens rea required is intentional and premeditated killing. The result is premeditated when the actor formulated his intent to kill after a cool moment of reflection. The result is intended when it is the actor's purpose, or the actor is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.[824]

(b) Article 5(i): Other Inhumane Acts

562. The expression "other inhumane acts" was drawn from Article 6(c) of the London Agreement and Article II(1)(c) of Control Council Law No. 10.

563. There is a concern that this category lacks precision and is too general to provide a safe yardstick for the work of the Tribunal and hence, that it is contrary to the principle of the "specificity" of criminal law. It is thus imperative to establish what is included within this category. The phrase "other inhumane acts" was deliberately designed as a residual category, as it was felt to be undesirable for this category to be exhaustively enumerated. An exhaustive categorization would merely create opportunities for evasion of the letter of the prohibition. The importance of maintaining such a category was elucidated by the ICRC when commenting on what would constitute a violation of the obligation to provide "humane treatment" contained in common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions:[825]

> [I]t is always dangerous to try to go into too much detail – especially in this domain. However great the care taken in drawing up a list of all the various forms of infliction, it would never be possible to catch up with the imagination of future torturers who wished to satisfy their bestial instincts; and the more specific and complete a list tries to be, the more restrictive it becomes. The form of wording adopted is flexible and, at the same time, precise.

564. In interpreting the expression at issue, resort to the ejusdem generis rule of interpretation does not prove to be of great assistance. Under this rule, that expression would cover actions similar to those specifically provided for. Admittedly such a rule of interpretation has been relied upon by various courts with regard to Article 6(c) of the London Agreement. Thus, for instance, in the Tarnek case, the District Court of Tel-Aviv held in a decision of 14 December 1951 that the definition of "other inhumane acts" laid down in the Israeli Law on Nazi and Nazi Collaborators (Punishment) of 1950, which reproduced the definition of Article 6(c), was to apply only to such other inhumane acts as resembled in their nature and their gravity those specified in the definition.[826] This interpretative rule lacks precision, and is too general to provide a safe yardstick for the work of the Tribunal.

565. The Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) (Article 7(k)) provides greater detail than the ICTY Statute as to the meaning of other inhumane acts: "other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to the body or to mental or physical health".[827] However, this provision also fails to provide an indication, even indirectly, of the legal standards which would allow us to identify the prohibited inhumane acts.[828]

[826] See 18 ILR, 1951, p. 540. See also the Enigster case (Decision of 4 Jan. 1952 by the same Court), ibid., at p. 541-2.

[827] With regard to a similar concept, that of 'inhuman treatment' under Art. 2(b) (grave breaches), the ICTY Trial Chamber in Delalić et al. noted that "inhuman treatment" was constituted by "an intentional act or omission [...] which causes serious mental or physical suffering or injury or constitutes a serious attack on human dignity" (Prosecutor v. Delali} et al, (IT-96-21-T), Judgement, Trial Chamber, 16 Nov. 1998, (hereafter Delali} et al., Judgement, 16 Nov. 1998), at para. 543). The Trial Chamber also suggested a negative definition, namely that inhuman treatment is treatment which causes severe mental or physical suffering but which falls short of torture, or lacks one of the elements of torture (e.g. a prohibited purpose or official sanction). (Ibid. at para. 542). Whether a given conduct constitutes inhuman treatment will be determined on a case-by-case basis and appears ultimately to be a question of fact (ibid., at para. 544. See also Kayishema and Ruzindana, Judgement, 21 May 1999, at para. 151: "[T]he acts that rise to the level of inhuman acts should be determined on a case-by-case basis").

[828] The International Law Commission, commenting on Art. 18 of its Draft Code of Crimes further states that "[t]he Commission recognized that it was impossible to establish an exhaustive list of the inhumane acts which might constitute crimes against humanity. First, this category of acts is intended to include only additional acts that are similar in gravity to those listed in the preceding subparagraphs. Second, the act must in fact cause injury to a human being in terms of physical or mental integrity, health or human dignity" (Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-Eighth Session, 6 May-26 July 1996, UNGAOR 51st Sess. Supp. No. 10 (A/51/10) (Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind), at para. 17, p. 103).

566. Less broad parameters for the interpretation of "other inhumane acts" can instead be identified in international standards on human rights such as those laid down in the Universal Declaration on Human Rights of 1948 and the two United Nations Covenants on Human Rights of 1966. Drawing upon the various provisions of these texts, it is possible to identify a set of basic rights appertaining to human beings, the infringement of which may amount, depending on the accompanying circumstances, to a crime against humanity. Thus, for example, serious forms of cruel or degrading treatment of persons belonging to a particular ethnic, religious, political or racial group, or serious widespread or systematic manifestations of cruel or humiliating or degrading treatment with a discriminatory or persecutory intent no doubt amount to crimes against humanity: inhuman or degrading treatment is prohibited by the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Article 7), the European Convention on Human Rights, of 1950 (Article 3), the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights of 9 June 1994 (Article 5) and the 1984 Convention against Torture (Article 1).[829] Similarly, the expression at issue undoubtedly embraces the forcible transfer of groups of civilians (which is to some extent covered by Article 49 of the IVth Convention of 1949 and Article 17(1) of the Additional Protocol II of 1977), enforced prostitution (indisputably a serious attack on human dignity pursuant to most international instruments on human rights), as well as the

[829] As for the specification of what constitutes cruel, debasing, humiliating or degrading treatment, resort can of course be had to the important case-law of the relevant international bodies, chiefly to the United Nations Torture Committee and the European Commission and Court of Human Rights.
It is worth adding that resort to the standards laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights has already been made in 1950 by a Belgian court. The Conseil de guerre of Brussels, in a judgment of 8 Feb. 1950, held that Art. 5 of the Universal Declaration, prohibiting torture and inhuman treatment can be utilised for the application of the so-called Marten's clause in the IVth Hague Convention of 1899. It noted, at p. 566, that "in searching for the principles of the law of nations as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity and the dictates of public conscience, the Court-Martial is presently guided by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ..." [D]ans la recherche des principes du droit des gens tels qu'ils résultent des usages etablis entre nations civilisees, des lois de l'humanité et des exigences de la conscience publique, le Conseil de guerre est aujourd'hui guidé par la declaration universelle des droits de l'homme [...]. After citing Art. 5 of the Declaration, the court went on to say that "[...] suspending a human being by his hands tied behind his back from a pulley specially rigged for the purposes is torture; [...] blows to the face, delivered so repeatedly and violently that they caused it to swell up and, in several cases, broke some teeth, constitute cruel treatment" (ibid.). ([L] a pendaison d'un être humain, par les mains liées derriere le dos, à une poulie specialement aménagée a cet effet, est une torture; [...] des coups au visage, à ce point répétés et violents qu'ils l'ont tuméfié et dans plusieurs cas, ont brisé des dents, constituent un traitement cruel (in 30 Revue de droit pénal et de criminologie, 1949-50, p. 566).

enforced disappearance of persons (prohibited by General Assembly Resolution 47/133 of 18 December 1992 and the Inter-American Convention of 9 June 1994). Plainly, all these, and other similar acts, must be carried out in a systematic manner and on a large scale. In other words, they must be as serious as the other classes of crimes provided for in the other provisions of Article 5. Once the legal parameters for determining the content of the category of "inhumane acts" are identified, resort to the ejusdem generis rule for the purpose of comparing and assessing the gravity of the prohibited act may be warranted.

C. Persecution as a Crime Against Humanity

567. Persecution under Article 5(h) has never been comprehensively defined in international treaties. Furthermore, neither national nor international case law provides an authoritative single definition of what constitutes 'persecution'. Accordingly, considerable emphasis will be given in this judgement to elucidating this important category of offences.

568. It is clear that persecution may take diverse forms, and does not necessarily require a physical element.[830] Additionally, under customary international law (from which Article 5 of the Statute derogates), in the case of persecution, the victims of crimes against humanity need not necessarily be civilians; they may also include military personnel. An explicit finding to this effect was made by the French courts in the Barbie and Touvier cases.[831] Under Article 5 of the Statute, a key constituent of persecution appears to be the carrying out of any prohibited conduct, directed against a civilian population, and motivated by a discriminatory animus (political, racial or religious grounds).[832] Beyond these brief observations, however, much uncertainty exists.

[830] In this regard, another Trial Chamber has held that "persecution can take numerous forms, so long as the common element of discrimination in regard to the enjoyment of a basic or fundamental right is present, and persecution does not necessarily require a physical element". (Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, at para. 707).

[831] In both cases the crimes at issue were held to constitute persecution. In the Barbie decision, the French Court of Cassation held that crimes against humanity in the form of persecution had been perpetrated against members of the French resistance movements (ibid.). The same view was taken by the Chambre d'accusation of the Court of Appeal of Paris in a judgment of 9 July 1986 in the same case and confirmed by the Chambre d'accusation of the Court of Appeal of Paris in a Judgment of 13 April 1992 in the Touvier case (ibid.). The Chambre d'accusation stated that Jews and members of the Resistance persecuted in a systematic manner in the name of a State practising a policy of ideological supremacy, the former by reason of their membership of a racial or religious community, the latter by reason of their opposition to that policy, can equally be the victims of crimes against humanity. (ibid., p. 352; emphasis added).

569. The non-legal or "common understanding" of the term persecution also varies widely. For example, in its comment on the International Law Commission's Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind of 1991, the United States remarked that the dictionary definition of the verb "to persecute" is "to annoy with persistent or urgent approaches, to pester".[833] Such a definition of persecution for the purposes of a criminal trial is clearly inapplicable before this Tribunal, due to the fact that crimes against humanity, far from being trivial crimes, are offences of extreme gravity.

570. Turning to the text of Article 5, the general elements of crimes against humanity, such as the requirements of a widespread or systematic nature of the attack directed against a civilian population, are applicable to Article 5(h) and have already been set out above. The text of Article 5, however, provides no further definition of persecution or how it relates to the other sub-headings of Article 5, except to state that persecution must be on political, racial, or religious grounds.[834] From the text of Article 5 as interpreted by the Appeals Chamber in Tadić, it is clear that this discriminatory purpose applies to persecution alone.[835]

571. With regard to a logical construction of Article 5, it could be assumed that the crime of persecution covers acts other than those listed in the other subheadings: each subheading appears to cover a separate crime. However, on closer examination, it appears that some of the crimes listed do by necessity overlap: for example,

[832] The question is thus raised as to whether a crime against humanity could also be committed on discriminatory grounds not enumerated in the list provided in Art. 5(h) (eg. discrimination on grounds of gender, political opinion or social class): see Tadić, Appeals Chamber Judgement, 15 July 1999, at para. 285.

[833] 13th Report on the Draft code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, UN Doc. A/CN.4/455, 24 March 1995 at para. 75; Comments and Observations of Governments on the Draft Code, UN Doc. A/CN.4/448, 1 March 1993, at p. 97.

[834] Although the text of Article 5 reads "political, racial, and religious grounds", these grounds should be read disjunctively: Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, at paras. 711-713.

extermination necessarily involves murder, torture may involve rape, and enslavement may include imprisonment. Hence, the wording of Article 5, logically interpreted, does not rule out a construction of persecution so as to include crimes covered under the other subheadings. However, Article 5 does not provide any guidance on this point. The Report of the Secretary-General is also silent on persecution and does not further elucidate the matter.

572. From the submissions of the parties, it appears that there is agreement between the parties that (a) persecution consists of the occurrence of a persecutory act or omission, and (b) a discriminatory basis is required for that act or omission on one of the listed grounds. Two questions remain in dispute: (a) must the crime of persecution be linked to another crime in the Statute, or can it stand alone? (b) what is the actus reus of persecution and how can it be defined? Each of these issues will be addressed in turn.

1. The Alleged Need for a Link Between Persecution and Other International Crimes.

573. The Defence alleges that the Tadi} definition of persecution contravenes a long-standing requirement that persecution be "in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal".[836] This wording is found in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal (IMT) which defines crimes against humanity as follows:

> [...] murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, or persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated (emphasis added).

574. This wording is repeated in the Charter of the IMT for the Far East, and was upheld in the 1950 UN Declaration of Principles of the Nuremberg Charter and Judgement (Principle VI(c)). Although Control Council Law No. 10 eliminated this requirement, the ICC Statute upholds it in Article 7(1)(h). The Defence therefore asserts that there is a consensus that persecution is a "relatively narrow concept", and argues that "persecution should thus be construed as including only acts enumerated elsewhere in the Statute, or, at most, those connected with a crime specifically within the jurisdiction of the ICTY". The Prosecution Brief is silent on whether or not such a link is required.

575. It is evident that the phrase "in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal" contained in Article 6(c) refers not just to persecution but to the entire category of crimes against humanity. It should be noted that when this category of crimes was first laid down in Article 6(c), all crimes against humanity were subject to the jurisdictional requirement of a link to an armed conflict. Thus crimes against humanity could only be punished if committed in execution of or in connection with a war crime or a crime against the peace. Crimes against humanity constituted a new category of crimes and the framers of Article 6(c) limited its application to cases where there already existed jurisdiction under more "well-established" crimes such as war crimes.

576. Moreover, in its application of Article 6(c), the IMT exercised jurisdiction over individual defendants who had allegedly committed only crimes against humanity, even when there was only a tenuous link to war crimes or crimes against the peace. This is demonstrated by the Judgement rendered by the IMT in the case of defendant von Schirach. Von Schirach, as Gauleiter of Vienna, was charged with and convicted of crimes against humanity for the deportation of Jews from Austria. The IMT concluded that Von Schirach was probably not involved in the "development of Hitler's plan for territorial expansion by means of aggressive war", nor had he been charged with war crimes. However, the link to another crime under the Charter (that of aggression) was found in the fact that "Austria was occupied pursuant to a common plan of aggression. Its occupation was, therefore, a "crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal".[837] Another example is found in the case of Streicher, publisher of Der Stürmer, an anti-

[837] Judgement of the International Military Tribunal, Trial of Major War Criminals before the IMT, Nuremberg, (14 Nov. 1945 – Oct. 1946) (hereafter IMT Judgement), Vol. I, p. 318.

Semitic weekly newspaper. Streicher was convicted for "incitement of the German people to active persecution". There was no evidence that he had ever committed war crimes or "that he was ever within Hitler's inner circle of advisers; nor during his career was he closely connected with the formulation of the policies which led to war".[838] Nevertheless he was convicted of persecution as a crime against humanity (in connection with war crimes).[839]

577. What is most important, and indeed dispositive of the matter, is that an examination of customary international law indicates that as customary rules on crimes against humanity gradually crystallised after 1945, the link between crimes against humanity and war crimes disappeared. This is evidenced by; (a) the relevant provision of Control Council Law No. 10,[840] which omitted this qualification; (b) national legislation (such as the Canadian[841] and the French[842] laws); (c) case-law[843]; (d) such international treaties as the Convention on Genocide of 1948, the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity of

[840] Art. II(c) of Control Council Law No. 10 defines crimes against humanity as "[a]trocities and offences, including but not limited to murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, or other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, or persecutions on political, racial, or religious grounds whether or not in violation of the domestic laws of the country where perpetrated". As was held in US v. Josef Alstötter et al. (the Justice case), Trials of War Criminals (before the Nuremberg Military Tribunal, (hereafter NMT)) Vol. III at p. 974: ". . . it must be noted that Control Council Law No. 10 differs materially from the Charter. The latter defines crimes against humanity as inhumane acts, etc., committed, "in execution of, or in connection with, any crime within the jurisdiction of the tribunal", whereas in C. C. Law 10 the words last quoted are deliberately omitted from the definition".

[841] S. 7 (3.76) of the Canadian Criminal Code provides that: "[C]rimes against humanity" means murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, persecution or any other inhumane act or omission that is committed against any civilian population or any identifiable group of persons, whether or not it constitutes a contravention of the law in force at the time and in the place of its commission, and that, at that time and in that place, constitutes a contravention of customary international law or conventional international law or is criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by the community of nations".

[842] Art. 212-1, para. 1 of the French Criminal Code (enacted by the Law no. 92-1336 of 16 Dec. 1992, modified by the Law no. 93-913 of 19 July 1993, entered into force on 1 March 1994) provides that

> "La déportation, la réduction en ensclavage ou la pratique massive et systématique d'exécutions sommaires, d"enlèvements de personnes suivis de leur disparition, de la torture ou d'actes inhumains, inpirés par des motifs politiques, philosohpiques, raciaux ou religieux et organisés en execution d'un plan concerté à l'encontre d'un groupe de population civile sont punies de la réclusion criminelle à perpetuité".

1968, and the Convention on Apartheid of 1973; and (e) the prior jurisprudence of the International Tribunal.[844] This evolution thus evidences the gradual abandonment of the nexus between crimes against humanity and war crimes.[845]

578. The Defence relies on Article 7(1)(h) and 2(g) of the ICC Statute to argue that persecution must be charged in connection with another crime under that Statute. Article 7(1)(h) states:

> Persecution against any identifiable group or collectivity on political, racial, national, ethnic, cultural, religious, gender as defined in paragraph 3, or other grounds that are universally recognised as impermissible under international law, in connection with any act referred to in this paragraph or any crime within the jurisdiction of the Court;

579. Article 7(2)(g) provides:

> "Persecution" means the intentional and severe deprivation of fundamental rights contrary to international law by reason of the identity of the group or collectivity;

580. Article 7(2) thus provides a broad definition of persecution and, at the same time, restricts it to acts perpetrated "in connection" with any of the acts enumerated in the same provision as constituting crimes against humanity (murder, extermination, enslavement, etc.) or with crimes found in other provisions such as war crimes, genocide, or aggression. To the extent that it is required that persecution be connected with war crimes or the crime of aggression, this requirement is especially striking in the light of the fact that the ICC Statute reflects customary international law in abolishing the nexus between crimes against humanity and armed conflict. Furthermore this restriction might easily be circumvented by charging persecution in connection with "other inhumane acts of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health" under Article 7(1)(k). In short, the Trial Chamber finds that although the Statute of the ICC may be indicative of the opinio juris of many States, Article 7(1)(h) is not consonant with customary international law. In addition, it draws attention to an important provision of the ICC Statute dealing with this matter. The application of the provisions contained in Part II of the Statute (on jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable law), including Article 7 on crimes against humanity, is restricted by Article 10 of the same Statute which provides that "Nothing in the Statute shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute" (emphasis added). This provision clearly conveys the idea that the framers of the Statute did not intend to affect, amongst other things, lex lata as regards such matters as the definition of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

[844] Tadić, Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995, paras. 140-141.

[845] At present, customary international law bans crimes against humanity whether they are committed in time of war or peace (see on this point the dictum by the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995, para. 141).

581. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber rejects the notion that persecution must be linked to crimes found elsewhere in the Statute of the International Tribunal. It notes that in any case no such requirement is imposed on it by the Statute of the International Tribunal.

2. The Actus Reus of Persecution

(a) Arguments of the Parties

582. The Prosecution argues that "persecutory act" should be defined broadly and that it should include both acts not covered by the Statute and acts enumerated elsewhere in the Statute, particularly other subheadings of Article 5, when they are committed with discriminatory intent.[846] According to the Prosecution:

> (a) [T]he crime of persecution has prominence [under customary international law], providing a basis for additional criminal liability in relation to all inhumane acts. [Were it not the case that crimes against humanity could comprise other crimes enumerated in the Statute], this would allow an accused to escape additional culpability for persecution merely by showing that the relevant act falls under another provision of the Statute or elsewhere in the indictment. Persecution is one of the most serious crimes against humanity and an interpretation of the Statute which does not recognise it as such is not tenable.

583. The Prosecution submits that persecution also includes acts not covered elsewhere in the Statute. Thus the persecution charge in the Indictment pertains to "an ethnic cleansing campaign" composed of the killing of Muslim civilians, destruction of their homes and property, and their organised detention and expulsion from Ahmići-Šantići and its environs.

584. According to the Defence a broad interpretation of persecution would be a violation of the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege).[847] Persecution should be narrowly construed, so as to give guidance as to what acts constitute persecution and to prevent possible abuses of discretion by the Prosecution. The Defence submits that on a statutory construction of Article 5, murder is not included in persecution.[848]

585. The Defence does not agree with the conclusion of the Trial Chamber in Tadi} that persecutory acts could include, "inter alia, those of a physical, economic, or judicial nature, that violate an individual's right to the equal enjoyment of his basic rights".[849] The Defence submits that persecution should not include acts which are legal under national laws, nor should it include acts not mentioned in the Statute "which, although not in and of themselves inhumane, are considered inhumane because of the discriminatory grounds on which they are taken".[850] Such a definition, in the submission of the Defence, would be too broad and strains the principle of legality. They contend that the Tadi} definition, which basically follows that of the International Law Commission (ILC) Draft Code, should be rejected in favour of the definition found in the ICC Statute, which "embodies the existing consensus within the international community", and which has taken a much narrower approach to the definition of persecutory acts in its Article 7(2)(g).[851]

(b) Discussion

586. The Trial Chamber will now discuss previous instances in which a definition of persecution has been suggested: firstly, in the corpus of refugee law and secondly, in the deliberations of the International Law Commission. The purpose of this discussion is to determine whether the definition propounded there may be held to reflect customary international law.

587. It has been argued that further elaboration of what is meant by the notion of persecution is provided by international refugee law. In its comments on the Draft Code presented in 1991, the government of the Netherlands stated: "It would be desirable to interpret the term 'persecution' in the same way as the term embodied in the Convention on refugees is interpreted".[852] The concept of persecution is central to the determination of who may claim refugee status under the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees of 1951, as supplemented by the 1967 Protocol.[853]

588. However, the corpus of refugee law does not, as such, offer a definition of persecution.[854] Nor does human rights law provide such a definition. The European [852] Comments and Observations of Governments on the International Law Commission Draft Code, UN Doc. A/CN.4/448, 1 March 1993, p. 93.

[853] Art. 1A(2) of the Refugee Convention defines a refugee as someone who: "[. . .] owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country; or who [. . .] is unwilling to return to it". Art. 33 of the same Convention states: "No Contracting State shall expel or return ("refouler") a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion".

[854] The UNHCR Handbook on Procedures and Criteria for Determining Refugee Status, (hereafter UNHCR Handbook) states at para. 51: "There is no universally accepted definition of "persecution", and various attempts to formulate such a definition have met with little success. From Art. 33 of the 1951 Convention, it may be inferred that a threat to life or freedom on account of race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership of a particular social group is always persecution. Other serious violations of human rights - for the same reasons - would also constitute persecution".

Commission and the Court have on several occasions held that exposing a person to a risk of persecution in his or her country of origin may constitute a violation of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights.[855] However, their decisions give no further guidance as to the definition of persecution.[856] In an attempt to define who may be eligible for refugee status, some national courts have delivered decisions on what acts may constitute persecution.[857] Other cases show that national courts in applying refugee law have given persecution a broad definition, and have held that it includes denial of access to employment or education[858] or more generally have drawn the conclusion that "there is an open ended category of forms of conduct capable of amounting to persecution, to be evaluated in the light of the Convention from case to case".[859]

589. The Trial Chamber finds, however, that these cases cannot provide a basis for individual criminal responsibility. It would be contrary to the principle of legality to convict someone of persecution based on a definition found in international refugee law or human rights law. In these bodies of law the central determination to be made is whether the person claiming refugee status or likely to be expelled or deported has a "well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion". The emphasis is more on [855] Art. 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights provides that "[n]o one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".

[857] For example, Judge McHugh of the Australian High Court in Chan v. Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs held that "[a]s long as the person is threatened with harm and that harm can be seen as part of a course of systematic conduct directed for a Convention reason against that person as an individual or as a member of a class, he or she is "being persecuted" for the purpose of the Convention [. . .] Moreover, to constitute "persecution" the harm threatened need not be that of loss of life or liberty [. . .] Other forms of harm short of interference of life or liberty may constitute 'persecution' for the purposes of the Convention and Protocol. Measures 'in disregard' of human dignity may, in appropriate cases, constitute persecution [. . .] ((1989) 169 CLR 379). The Judgement went on to hold that "[p]ersecution on account of race, religion and political opinion has historically taken many forms of social, political, and economic discrimination. Hence, the denial of access to employment, to the professions and to education or the imposition of restrictions on the freedoms traditionally guaranteed in a democratic society such as freedom of speech, assembly, worship or movement may constitute persecution if imposed for a Convention reason" (idem).

the state of mind of the person claiming to have been persecuted (or to be vulnerable to persecution) than on the factual finding of whether persecution has occurred or may occur. In addition, the intent of the persecutor is not relevant.[860] The result is that the net of "persecution" is cast much wider than is legally justified for the purposes of imposing individual criminal responsibility. The definition stemming from international refugee law or human rights law cannot therefore be followed here.

590. Little guidance in the interpretation of "persecution" is provided by the ILC Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind. The International Law Commission, which originally based its definition of crimes against humanity on the Nuremberg Charter, has included persecution since its earliest draft.[861]. The ILC proposed a definition of persecution in its commentary on the Draft Code dated 1996 which stated as follows:[862]

[859] R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Sasitharan Queens Bench Division (Crown Office List) Co/ 1655/98, 23 June 1998, per Sedley J.

[860] Immigration and Naturalization Service, Petitioner v. Jairo Jonathan Elias-Zacarias, Supreme Court of the United States, 1992 U.S. Lexis 550. The UNHCR Handbook states in paragraphs 52 and 53: "Due to variations in the psychological make-up of individuals and in the circumstances of each case, interpretations of what amounts to persecution are bound to vary. In addition, an applicant may have been subjected to various measures not in themselves amounting to persecution (e.g. discrimination in different forms), in some cases combined with other adverse factors (e.g. general atmosphere of insecurity in the country of origin). In such situations, the various elements involved may, if taken together, produce an effect on the mind of the applicant that can reasonably justify a claim to well-founded fear of persecution on 'cumulative grounds'".

[861] The Nuremberg Principles stated that Art. 6(c) of the Charter "distinguished two categories of punishable acts, to wit: first, murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation and other inhuman acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war, and second, persecution on political, racial or religious grounds" (Nuremberg Principles, Report of the International Law Commission to the General Assembly, 2nd Session (5 June –29 July 1950) UN Doc. A/1316, para. 120).

[862] Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its forty-eighth session, 6 May-26 July 1996, at 98. It is not clear whether the International Law Commission interprets persecution to include other subheadings of the Article on crimes against humanity. In its Commentary on its 1991 Draft (UN Doc. A/46/10), the International Law Commission states the following: "Persecution on social, political, racial, religious, or cultural grounds, already a crime under the 1954 draft Code, relates to human rights violations other than those covered in the previous paragraphs, committed in a systematic manner or on a mass scale by government officials or by groups that exercise de facto power over a particular territory and seek to subject individuals or groups of individuals to a kind of life in which enjoyment of some of their basic rights is repeatedly or constantly denied. Persecution may take many forms, for example, a prohibition on practising certain kinds of religious worship; prolonged and systematic detention of individuals who represent a political, religious or cultural group; a prohibition on the use of a national

> The inhumane act of persecution may take many forms with its common characteristic being the denial of the human rights and fundamental freedoms to which every individual is entitled without distinction as recognised in the Charter of the United Nations (Articles 1 and 55) and the ICCPR (Art. 2). The present provision would apply to acts of persecution which lacked the specific intent required for the crime of genocide.

591. As neither refugee law nor the ILC draft is dispositive of the issue, in resolving matters in dispute on the scope of persecution, the Trial Chamber must of necessity turn to customary international law. Indeed, any time the Statute does not regulate a specific matter, and the Report of the Secretary-General does not prove to be of any assistance in the interpretation of the Statute, it falls to the International Tribunal to draw upon (i) rules of customary international law or (ii) general principles of international criminal law; or, lacking such principles, (iii) general principles of criminal law common to the major legal systems of the world; or, lacking such principles, (iv) general principles of law consonant with the basic requirements of international justice. It must be assumed that the draftspersons intended the Statute to be based on international law, with the consequence that any possible lacunae must be filled by having recourse to that body of law.

592. In its discussion, the Trial Chamber will focus upon two distinct issues: (a) can the acts covered by the other subheadings of Article 5 fall within the notion of persecution? and (b) can persecution cover acts not envisaged in one of the other subheadings of Article 5?

(c) Can the Acts Covered by the Other Subheadings of Article 5 Fall Within the Notion of Persecution?

593. As noted above, the Prosecution argues that whereas the meaning of "persecutory act" should be given a broad definition, including a wide variety of acts not enumerated in the Statute, it should also include those enumerated in the Statute and particularly other language, even in private; systematic destruction of monuments or buildings representative of a particular social, religious, cultural or other group. Such acts could come within the scope of this Article when subheadings of Article 5 when they are committed with discriminatory intent.[863] By contrast, the Defence argues that it would be a violation of the principle of legality (nullum crimen sine lege) for this Tribunal to apply Article 5(h) to any conduct of the accused.[864] On this view, persecution should be narrowly construed, so as to give guidance as to what acts constitute persecution and to prevent possible abuses of discretion by the Prosecution.[865]

594. With regard to the question of whether persecution can include acts laid out in the other subheadings of Article 5, and particularly the crimes of murder and deportation, the Trial Chamber notes that there are numerous examples of convictions for the crime of persecution arising from the Second World War. The IMT in its findings on persecution included several of the crimes that now would fall under other subheadings of Article 5. These acts included mass murder of the Jews by the Einsatzgruppen and the SD, and the extermination, beatings, torture and killings which were widespread in the concentration camps. Similarly, the judgements delivered pursuant to Control Council Law No. 10 included crimes such as murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment and torture in their findings on the persecution of Jews and other groups during the Nazi era. Thus the Military Tribunals sitting at Nuremberg found that persecution could include those crimes that now would be covered by the other subheadings of Article 5 of the Statute.

595. The International Military Tribunal in its Judgement referred to persecution, stating that: "the persecution of the Jews at the hands of the Nazi Government has been proved in the greatest detail before the Tribunal. It is a record of consistent and committed in a systematic manner or on a mass scale".

[863] Prosecutor's Brief, paras. 31-32.

[864] Brief of the Defendants Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} on Legal Trial Issues, filed on 19 Nov. 1998

[865] The Closing briefs of two of the accused, Vladimir [anti} and Dragan Papi}, both filed 5 Nov. 1999, indicate acceptance of a broader definition of persecution. The Defence Final Brief for the accused Vladimir [anti} states: "The Defence admits that such inhuman acts can occur in very many forms which have one mutual characteristic and that is denial of fundamental rights and freedoms which an individual is systematic inhumanity on the greatest scale".[866] The IMT commenced with a description of the early policy of the Nazi government towards the Jewish people: discriminatory laws were passed which limited offices and professions permitted to Jews; restrictions were placed on their family life and rights of citizenship; Jews were completely excluded from German life; pogroms were organized which included the burning and demolishing of synagogues; Jewish businesses were looted; prominent Jewish businessmen were arrested; a collective fine of 1 billion marks was imposed on Jews; Jewish assets were seized; the movement of Jews was restricted; ghettos were created; and Jews were compelled to wear a yellow star.[867] According to the IMT, "[t]hese atrocities were all part and parcel of the policy inaugurated in 1941 [. . .] But the methods employed never conformed to a single pattern".[868]

596. At Nuremberg, organisations[869] as well as individual defendants[870] were convicted of persecution for acts such as deportation, slave labour, and extermination of the Jewish people pursuant to the "Final Solution". Moreover, several individual defendants were convicted of persecution in the form of discriminatory economic acts.[871] An example is the defendant Frick who had "drafted, signed, and administered many laws designed to eliminate Jews from German life and [the] economy", and thus "paved the way for the Final Solution [. . .]".[872]

597. It is clear from its description of persecution that the IMT accorded this crime a position of great prominence and understood it to include a wide spectrum of acts entitled to without distinction" (p. 8). The Defence's Closing Brief for the accused Dragan Papi} states: "The concept of persecution covers a wide sphere . . ."

perpetrated against the Jewish people, ranging from discriminatory acts targeting their general political, social and economic rights, to attacks on their person.

598. This broad interpretation of persecution was upheld in subsequent cases. None of the courts endeavoured to define persecution but the term was generally used to describe the treatment suffered by the Jews and other groups specifically targeted by the Nazis. Persecution was a central allegation in several of the cases brought before Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10. The Tribunals held that in persecuting Jews and other groups, the accused had infringed a wide variety of rights.[873] For example, in US v. Ernst von Weizsäcker (the Ministries Case), the United States Military Tribunal stated:

> Hitler made the Jewish persecution one of the primary subjects of his policy to gain and retain power [...]. The persecution of the Jews went on steadily from step to step and finally to death in foul form.[874]

599. The Tribunal described the progression of infringement of rights, which started with the deprivation of rights of citizenship; rights to work and education; economic and property rights; and then led to arrest and confinement in concentration camps; beatings,

The US Military Tribunal, in a summary of the evidence against the accused von Roques, stated that "many of the documents heretofore show ill-treatment and persecution of the civilians within the accused von Roques' area of command. Other documents show the establishment of ghettos for the Jews; requirements that they wear the Star of David; prohibition of Jewish rites; confiscation of Jewish ritual articles; requirements that Jews surrender all foreign exchange securities, precious metals, and precious stones; terror killings of suspect partisan and partisan sympathisers; so-called mopping-up exercises and turning over of Jews and Communists to the SD [. . .]".

[874] Ministries Case, NMT, Vol. XIV at p. 471: "The Jews of Germany were first deprived of the rights of citizenship. They were then deprived of the right to teach, to practice professions, to obtain education, to engage in business enterprises; they were forbidden to marry except among themselves and those of their own religion; they were subject to arrest and confinement in concentration camps, to beatings, mutilation and torture; their property was confiscated; they were herded into ghettos; they were forced to emigrate and to buy leave to do so; they were deported to the East, where they worked to exhaustion and death; they became slave labourers; and finally over six million were murdered". See also the United States Military Court in the Trial of Ulrich Greifelt et al. (RuSHA case) NMT Vol. V. Ulrich Greifelt and his co-accused from the RuSHA (Reichs Security Head Office) were convicted inter alia of participation in a program of genocide aimed at the destruction of foreign nations and ethnic groups, "in part by murderous extermination, and in part by elimination and suppression of national characteristics" (p. 88). The Notes on the Case (Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, UN War Crimes Commission, (hereafter UNWCC), 1948 Vol XIII) state at p. 1-2 "The trial dealt with the main body of racial persecutions which distinguished so conspicuously the Nazi regime inside the Third Reich".

mutilation and torture; deportations; slave labour and "finally over six million were murdered".[875] The US Military Tribunal did not purport to find a common definitive element in the wide variety of acts it illustrated.[876]

600. It is clear that the courts understood persecution to include severe attacks on the person such as murder, extermination and torture; acts which potentially constitute crimes against humanity under the other subheadings of Article 5. This conclusion is supported by the findings of national courts in cases arising out of the Second World War. For example, Gauleiter Artur Greiser was charged with and convicted by the Supreme National Tribunal of Poland of participating in crimes against the Polish and Jewish people, including acts of persecution and extermination, by, inter alia, "murdering them on the spot, concentrating them in ghettos . . . whence they were being gradually deported and murdered, mainly in the gas-chambers of the extermination camp at Chelmno [. . .], submitting the Jewish population from the very beginning of the occupation to every possible kind of vexation and torment, from verbal and physical effronteries to the infliction of the most grievous bodily harm, in a way calculated to inflict the maximum of physical suffering and human degradation".[877]

601. In the case of Willy Zühlke, a former German prison warden was convicted by the Netherlands Special Court in Amsterdam of co-operating in the German policy of humiliation and persecution of Jews by holding them in illegal detention, beating and kicking them, and mistreating and humiliating them in other ways. It was noted by the Netherlands Special Court that "Jewish prisoners were ill-treated by him in a far more brutal manner than the other prisoners".[878]

602. Adolf Eichmann was convicted, inter alia, of causing the murder, extermination, enslavement, starvation, and deportation of civilian Jewish people by the Israeli Supreme Court. The Court found that "in carrying out the above-mentioned activities [Eichmann] persecuted Jews on national, racial, religious and political grounds".[879] Furthermore, in 1985 the French Cour de Cassation convicted Klaus Barbie of "persecution against innocent Jews, [. . .] carried out for racial and religious motives with a view to their extermination, in furtherance of the "Final Solution".[880] In 1986 the Zagreb District Court passed judgement in the case of Andrija Artukovi}, a prominent member of the "Ustaša" movement in the self-proclaimed "Independent State of Croatia" during the Second World War. In this capacity he had ordered mass killings and deportations to a concentration camp. The Court held that his intent stemmed from his "Ustaša orientation, by which persecutions, concentration camps and mass killings of Serbs, Jews, Gypsies, as well as Croats who did not accept the ideology, were a part of the implementation of a program of creating a "pure" Croatia".[881] The Court sentenced Artukovi} to death, describing him as one of the "ruthless murderers, who under the cover of 'protecting purity of race and faith' and with the aim of realising their Nazi-Fascist ideology, [...] killed, slaughtered, tortured, crippled, exposed to great suffering, and persecuted thousands and thousands of people, among whom women and children".[882]

603. More recently, in the case of Prosecutor v. Tadi} before this Tribunal, Tadi} was convicted under Article 5(h) for his role in "the attack on Kozarac and the surrounding areas, as well as the seizure, collection, segregation and forced transfer of civilians to camps, calling-out of civilians, beatings and killings".[883] It is noted that these acts potentially fall under other sub-headings of Article 5, although no objection based upon this fact was put forward by the Trial Chamber.

604. These findings emphasise the conclusion of international tribunals and national courts that the crime of persecution both during and since the Second World War did not consist only of those acts not covered by the other types of crimes against humanity. On the contrary, these Tribunals and courts specifically included crimes such as murder, extermination and deportation in their findings on persecution.

605. The Trial Chamber finds that the case-law referred to above reflects, and is indicative of, the notion of persecution as laid down in customary international criminal law. The Trial Chamber therefore concludes that acts enumerated in other sub-clauses of Article 5 can thus constitute persecution. Persecution has been used to describe some of the most serious crimes perpetrated during Nazi rule. A narrow interpretation of persecution, excluding other sub-headings of Article 5, is therefore not an accurate reflection of the notion of persecution which has emerged from customary international law.

606. It should be added that if persecution was given a narrow interpretation, so as not to include the crimes found in the remaining sub-headings of Article 5, a lacuna would exist in the Statute of the Tribunal. There would be no means of conceptualising those crimes against humanity which are committed on discriminatory grounds, but which, for example, fall short of genocide, which requires a specific intent "to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group". An example of such a crime against humanity would be the so-called "ethnic cleansing", a notion which, although it is not a term of art, is particularly germane to the work of this Tribunal.

607. Although the actus reus of persecution may be identical to other crimes against humanity, what distinguishes the crime of persecution is that it is committed on discriminatory grounds. The Trial Chamber therefore accepts the submission of the Prosecution that "[p]ersecution, which can be used to charge the conduct of ethnic cleansing on discriminatory grounds is a serious crime in and of itself and describes conduct worthy of censure above and apart from non-discriminatory killings envisioned by Article 5".[884]

(d) Can Persecution Cover Acts not Envisaged in one of the Other Subheadings of Article 5?

608. The Prosecution argues that persecution can also involve acts other than those listed under Article 5. It is their submission that the meaning of "persecutory act" should be given a broad definition and includes a wide variety of acts not enumerated elsewhere in the Statute.[885] By contrast, the Defence submits that the two basic elements of persecution are (a) the occurrence of a persecutory act or omission, and (b) a discriminatory basis for that act or omission on one of the listed grounds. As mentioned above, the Defence argues that persecution should be narrowly construed.

609. The Trial Chamber is thus called upon to examine what acts not covered by Article 5 of the Statute of the International Tribunal may be included in the notion of persecution. Plainly, the Trial Chamber must set out a clear-cut notion of persecution, in order to decide whether the crimes charged in this case fall within its ambit. In addition, this notion must be consistent with general principles of criminal law such as the principles of legality and specificity. First, the Trial Chamber will examine what types of acts, aside from the other categories of crimes against humanity have been deemed to constitute persecution. Secondly, it will examine whether there are elements underlying these acts which assist in defining persecution.

610. The Judgement of the IMT included in the notion of persecution a variety of acts which, at present, may not fall under the Statute of the International Tribunal, such as the passing of discriminatory laws, the exclusion of members of an ethnic or religious group from aspects of social, political, and economic life, the imposition of a collective fine on them, the restriction of their movement and their seclusion in ghettos, and the requirement that they mark themselves out by wearing a yellow star.[886] Moreover, and as mentioned above, several individual defendants were convicted of persecution in the form of discriminatory economic acts.[887]

611. It is also clear that other courts have used the term persecution to describe acts other than those enumerated in Article 5. A prominent example is the trial of *Josef Altstötter et al. (*the Justice Trial*).*[888] Altstötter and the other accused were former German Judges, Prosecutors or officials of the Reich Ministry of Justice. They were charged with a common design, conspiracy, plan and enterprise which "embraced the use of the judicial process as a powerful weapon for the persecution and extermination of all opponents of the Nazi regime regardless of nationality and for the persecution and extermination of races".[889]

612. The U.S. Military Tribunal in the Justice case held that the national pattern or plan for racial persecution was one of actual extermination of Jewish and Polish people, but that "lesser forms of racial persecution were universally practiced by governmental authority and constituted an integral part in the general policy of the Reich".[890] These lesser forms of persecution included the passing of a decree by which Jews were excluded from the legal profession; the prohibition of intermarriage between Jews and persons of German blood and the severe punishment of sexual intercourse between these groups; and decrees expelling Jews from public services, educational institutions, and from many business enterprises. Furthermore, upon the death of a Jew his property was confiscated, and under an amendment to the German Citizenship Law, the Security Police and the SD could also confiscate property of Jews who were alive. Jews were subject to more severe punishments than Germans; the rights of defendants in court were severely circumscribed; courts were empowered to impose death sentences on Poles and Jews even if not prescribed by law; and the police were given carte blanche in the punishment of Jews without resort to the judicial process.[891] In summary, what was considered to be persecution in the Justice case was the use of a legal system to implement a discriminatory policy.

613. The jurisprudence of the national courts provides further examples such as the trial of Hans Albin Rauter, before the Netherlands Special Court in The Hague. Rauter, a Nazi SS Obergruppenführer and a General of the Waffen-SS and the Police, was convicted and sentenced to death for his intentional participation in the framework of the German policy of persecution of the Jews, which manifested itself in multifarious measures.[892] Also, Artukovi} was found guilty of acts such as the passing and implementation of discriminatory decrees ranging from Decrees on racial identity and the protection of Aryan blood or the honour of the Croatian people to the Decree on deporting unsuitable and dangerous individuals to internment and labour camps.[893]

614. The Trial Chamber is thus bolstered in its conclusion that persecution can consist of the deprivation of a wide variety of rights. A persecutory act need not be prohibited explicitly either in Article 5 or elsewhere in the Statute. Similarly, whether or not such acts are legal under national laws is irrelevant. It is well-known that the Nazis passed many discriminatory laws through the available constitutional and legislative channels which were subsequently enforced by their judiciary. This does not detract from the fact [892] For instance, "[h]e issued orders under which Jews were subjected to discriminatory treatment and gradually segregated from the rest of the population, which facilitated their being detected and apprehended at a later date for slave labour and eventual extermination. Jews were ordered to wear a Star of David in public, and were forbidden to take part in public gatherings, to make use of public places for amusement, recreation or information, to visit public parks, cafes and restaurants, to use dining and sleeping cars, to visit theatres, cabarets, variety shows, cinemas, sports clubs, including swimming baths, to remain in or make use of public libraries, reading rooms, and museums. A special curfew was introduced for all Jews between the hours of 8 p.m., and 6 a.m. Later orders banned them from railway yards and the use of any public or private means of transport. These measures were followed by the erection of concentration camps in various places. They culminated in systematic round-ups of Jews, who were sent to the concentration camps in order to be deported to Germany or Poland, where they were to be used for slave labour or exterminated". (Trial of Hans Albin Rauter, Bijzondere Gerechtshof te 's-Gravenhage, 4 May 1948, (referred to in the Judgement of the Bijzondere Raad van Cassatie, 12 Jan. 1949, Nederlandse Jurisprudentie, 1949, No. 89); English Translation in UNWCC, Vol. XIV 1949, p. 93).

that these laws were contrary to international legal standards. The Trial Chamber therefore rejects the Defence submission that persecution should not include acts which are legal under national laws.

615. In short, the Trial Chamber is able to conclude the following on the actus reus of persecution from the case-law above:

(a) A narrow definition of persecution is not supported in customary international law. Persecution has been described by courts as a wide and particularly serious genus of crimes committed against the Jewish people and other groups by the Nazi regime.

(b) In their interpretation of persecution courts have included acts such as murder, extermination, torture, and other serious acts on the person such as those presently enumerated in Article 5.

(c) Persecution can also involve a variety of other discriminatory acts, involving attacks on political, social, and economic rights. The scope of these acts will be defined more precisely by the Trial Chamber below.

(d) Persecution is commonly used to describe a series of acts rather than a single act. Acts of persecution will usually form part of a policy or at least of a patterned practice, and must be regarded in their context. In reality, persecutory acts are often committed pursuant to a discriminatory policy or a widespread discriminatory practice, as was found by the Zagreb District Court in Artukovi}.[894]

(e) As a corollary to (d), discriminatory acts charged as persecution must not be considered in isolation. Some of the acts mentioned above may not, in and of [894] Ibid., p. 24: "The defendant has committed a war crime by his actions against humanity and international law. He implemented racist law, which amounted to an imitation of the law of the Third Reich against non-Aryans, Jews, and Gypsies. He also savagely and ruthlessly treated Serbs in Croatia, hundreds of thousands of whom perished in internment, concentration and labour camps, and other places. He did not choose means to eliminate and kill Serb, Croats who had not accepted the Ustaša ideology and system, Jews, communists, Gypsies, anti-fascists, and members of other ethnic groups. themselves, be so serious as to constitute a crime against humanity. For example, restrictions placed on a particular group to curtail their rights to participate in particular aspects of social life (such as visits to public parks, theatres or libraries) constitute discrimination, which is in itself a reprehensible act; however, they may not in and of themselves amount to persecution. These acts must not be considered in isolation but examined in their context and weighed for their cumulative effect.[895]

3. The Definition of Persecution

616. In the Judgement of Prosecutor v. Tadi}, Trial Chamber II held that persecution is a form of discrimination on grounds of race, religion or political opinion that is intended to be, and results in, an infringement of an individual's fundamental rights. It is not necessary to have a separate act of an inhumane nature to constitute persecution, but rather, the discrimination itself makes the act inhumane. The Trial Chamber held that the crime of persecution encompasses a wide variety of acts, including, inter alia, those of a physical, economic, or judicial nature that violate an individual's basic or fundamental which planned, prepared, executed and systematically implemented such crimes, as the crimes against humanity, which are most characterised by the mass destruction of human beings".

[895] The Tribunal in the Justice trial NMT Vol. III, p.1063) found that: "The record contains innumerable acts of persecution of individual Poles and Jews, but to consider these cases as isolated and unrelated instances of perversion of justice would be to overlook the very essence of the offence charged in the indictment. The defendants are not now charged with conspiracy as a separate and substantive offence, but it is alleged that they participated in carrying out a governmental plan and program for the persecution and extermination of Jews and Poles, a plan which transcended territorial boundaries as well as the bounds of human decency [...]".

The Notes on the case, UNWCC, 1948, Vol. VI state at pp. 82-3 that "it is probably true to say that the Tribunal regarded as constituting crimes against humanity not merely a series of changes made in the legal system of Germany but a series of such alterations as involved or were pursuant to persecutions on political, racial or religious grounds, or (perhaps) such as led to the commission of "atrocities and offences, including but not limited to murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, rape, or other inhumane acts against any civilian population". In similar terms, the Zagreb District Court in the case of Artukovi} found that "[t]he obligation of wearing a sign to signify Jewish origin [...] was not only inhuman behaviour [with regard] to the whole people, but also a revealing foreboding of death". It is not each individual act, but rather their cumulative effect that matters. (Ibid., UNWCC, p. 15).

rights. The discrimination must be on one of the listed grounds to constitute persecution.[896]

617. As mentioned above, this is a broad definition which could include acts prohibited under other subheadings of Article 5, acts prohibited under other Articles of the Statute, and acts not covered by the Statute. The same approach has been taken in Article 7(2)(g) of the ICC Statute, which states that "[p]ersecution means the intentional and severe deprivation of fundamental rights contrary to international law by reason of the identity of the group or collectivity" (emphasis added).

618. However, this Trial Chamber holds the view that in order for persecution to amount to a crime against humanity it is not enough to define a core assortment of acts and to leave peripheral acts in a state of uncertainty. There must be clearly defined limits on the types of acts which qualify as persecution. Although the realm of human rights is dynamic and expansive, not every denial of a human right may constitute a crime against humanity.

619. Accordingly, it can be said that at a minimum, acts of persecution must be of an equal gravity or severity to the other acts enumerated under Article 5. This legal criterion has already been resorted to, for instance, in the Flick case.[897]

[896] Tadić, Trial Chamber Judgement, 7 May 1997, at paras. 697, 710.

[897] In this case, the U S Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg held that "[n]ot even under a proper construction of the section of Control Council Law No. 10 relating to crimes against humanity, do the facts [compulsory taking of Jewish industrial property] warrant conviction. The "atrocities and offences" listed therein, "murder, extermination," etc., are all offences against the person. Property is not mentioned. Under the doctrine of ejusdem generis the catch-all words "other persecutions" must be deemed to include only such as affect the life and liberty of the oppressed peoples. Compulsory taking of industrial property, however reprehensible, is not in that category". (Flick et. al., in NMT Vol. VI, p. 1215). This statement was taken up and used by the U.S. Military Tribunal in US v. Krauch et al., (Farben case) (NMT Vol. VIII pp. 1129-1130). See also Notes on the Case, UNWCC, Vol. IX, which states at p. 50, that the judgement in the Flick case declared that "A distinction could be made between industrial property and the dwellings, household furnishings and food supplies of a persecuted people" and thus left open the question whether such offences against personal property as would amount to an assault upon the health and life of a human being (such as the burning of his house or depriving him of his food supply or his paid employment) would not constitute a crime against humanity".

S104

620. It ought to be emphasised, however, that if the analysis based on this criterion relates only to the level of seriousness of the act, it does not provide guidance on what types of acts can constitute persecution. The ejusdem generis criterion can be used as a supplementary tool, to establish whether certain acts which generally speaking fall under the proscriptions of Article 5(h), reach the level of gravity required by this provision. The only conclusion to be drawn from its application is that only gross or blatant denials of fundamental human rights can constitute crimes against humanity.

621. The Trial Chamber, drawing upon its earlier discussion of "other inhumane acts", holds that in order to identify those rights whose infringement may constitute persecution, more defined parameters for the definition of human dignity can be found in international standards on human rights such as those laid down in the Universal Declaration on Human Rights of 1948, the two United Nations Covenants on Human Rights of 1966 and other international instruments on human rights or on humanitarian law. Drawing upon the various provisions of these texts it proves possible to identify a set of fundamental rights appertaining to any human being, the gross infringement of which may amount, depending on the surrounding circumstances, to a crime against humanity. Persecution consists of a severe attack on those rights, and aims to exclude a person from society on discriminatory grounds. The Trial Chamber therefore defines persecution as the gross or blatant denial, on discriminatory grounds, of a fundamental right, laid down in international customary or treaty law, reaching the same level of gravity as the other acts prohibited in Article 5.

622. In determining whether particular acts constitute persecution, the Trial Chamber wishes to reiterate that acts of persecution must be evaluated not in isolation but in context, by looking at their cumulative effect. Although individual acts may not be inhumane, their overall consequences must offend humanity in such a way that they may be termed "inhumane". This delimitation also suffices to satisfy the principle of legality, as inhumane acts are clearly proscribed by the Statute.[898]

623. The Trial Chamber does not see fit to identify which rights constitute fundamental rights for the purposes of persecution. The interests of justice would not be served by so doing, as the explicit inclusion of particular fundamental rights could be interpreted as the implicit exclusion of other rights (expressio unius est exclusio alterius). This is not the approach taken to crimes against humanity in customary international law, where the category of "other inhumane acts" also allows courts flexibility to determine the cases before them, depending on the forms which attacks on humanity may take, forms which are ever-changing and carried out with particular ingenuity. Each case must therefore be examined on its merits.

624. In its earlier conclusions the Trial Chamber noted that persecution was often used to describe a series of acts. However, the Trial Chamber does not exclude the possibility that a single act may constitute persecution. In such a case, there must be clear evidence of the discriminatory intent. For example, in the former Yugoslavia an individual may have participated in the single murder of a Muslim person. If his intent clearly was to kill him because he was a Muslim, and this occurred as part of a wide or systematic persecutory attack against a civilian population, this single murder may constitute persecution. But the discriminatory intent of the perpetrator must be proved for this crime to qualify as persecution.

625. Although acts of persecution are often part of a discriminatory policy, the Trial Chamber finds that it is not necessary to demonstrate that an accused has taken part in the formulation of a discriminatory policy or practice by a governmental authority. An example is that of the defendant Streicher: "In his speeches and articles [...] he infected the German mind with the virus of anti-Semitism, and incited the German People to active persecution".[899] He did so not in any official capacity but as the publisher of an anti-Semitic journal, Der Stürmer. The Tribunal concluded that his "incitement to murder and extermination at the time when Jews in the East were being killed under the most horrible conditions clearly constitutes persecution" and sentenced him to death.[900]

[898] In this regard the Trial Chamber notes that the US Military Tribunal in the Einsatzgruppen case (NMT Vol IV) stated at p. 49: "Can it be said that international conventions and the law of nations gave no warning to these accused that their attacks against ethnic, national, religious, and political groups infringed the rights of mankind? We do not refer to localised outbursts of hatred nor petty discriminations which unfortunately occur in the most civilised of states. When persecutions reach the scale of nationwide campaigns designed to make life intolerable for, or to exterminate large groups of people, law dare not remain silent (. . .) The Control Council simply reasserts existing law when naming persecutions as an international offence."

626. The Trial Chamber observes that in the light of its broad definition of persecution, the Prosecution cannot merely rely on a general charge of "persecution" in bringing its case. This would be inconsistent with the concept of legality. To observe the principle of legality, the Prosecution must charge particular acts (and this seems to have been done in this case). These acts should be charged in sufficient detail for the accused to be able to fully prepare their defence.

627. In sum, a charge of persecution must contain the following elements:

(a) those elements required for all crimes against humanity under the Statute;

(b) a gross or blatant denial of a fundamental right reaching the same level of gravity as the other acts prohibited under Article 5;

(c) discriminatory grounds.

[899] IMT Judgement, p. 302.

[900] Ibid., pp. 302-4. This is also demonstrated in cases brought before German courts acting under Control Council Law no. 10. The Oberster Gerichtshof für die Britische Zone in Köln, 9 Nov, 1948, StS 78/48 held that denunciation "is [...] intimately linked to the National Socialists' regime of violence and arbitrariness because, from the very outset, it clearly fitted into the organised campaign of persecution against all Jews and everything Jewish in Germany which all humanity not under the sway of National Socialism perceived as an assault and, although directed against this one victim only, became part and parcel of all the mass crimes committed during the persecution of Jews (translation on file with the ICTY)".
More generally, the Düsseldorf Oberlandesgericht stated in a Judgement of 20 May 1948 (Criminal Chamber 3/48) that National Socialism has built up a power mechanism in the party and State which could be set in motion against anyone from anywhere. Not only the holder of the power himself who used his own personal position of power against someone weaker can be a perpetrator of a crime against humanity but also anyone who on his own initiative also participated in any way or even only encouraged the commission of such acts. (Judgement of Düsseldorf Regional Appellate Court, 20 May 1948, translation on file with ICTY, p. 4).

4. The Application of the Definition set out above to the Instant Case

628. The Trial Chamber will now examine the specific allegations in this case, which are the "deliberate and systematic killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians", the "organised detention and expulsion of the Bosnian Muslims from Ahmići-Šantići and its environs", and the "comprehensive destruction of Bosnian homes and property". Can these acts constitute persecution?

629. In light of the conclusions above, the Trial Chamber finds that the "deliberate and systematic killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians" as well as their "organised detention and expulsion from Ahmići" can constitute persecution. This is because these acts qualify as murder, imprisonment, and deportation, which are explicitly mentioned in the Statute under Article 5.

630. The Trial Chamber next turns its attention to the alleged comprehensive destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property. The question here is whether certain property or economic rights can be considered so fundamental that their denial is capable of constituting persecution. The Trial Chamber notes that in the Judgement of the IMT, several defendants were convicted of economic discrimination. For example, Göring "persecuted the Jews . . . and not only in Germany where he raised the billion mark fine . . . this interest was primarily economic - how to get their property and how to force them out of economic life in Europe".[901] Defendants Funk and Seyss-Inquart were also charged with acts of economic discrimination.[902]

631. The Trial Chamber finds that attacks on property can constitute persecution. To some extent this may depend on the type of property involved: in the passage from Flick cited above the Tribunal held that the compulsory taking of industrial property could not be said to affect the life and liberty of oppressed peoples and therefore did not constitute persecution. There may be certain types of property whose destruction may not have a severe enough impact on the victim as to constitute a crime against humanity, even if such a destruction is perpetrated on discriminatory grounds: an example is the burning of someone's car (unless the car constitutes an indispensable and vital asset to the owner). However, the case at hand concerns the comprehensive destruction of homes and property. Such an attack on property in fact constitutes a destruction of the livelihood of a certain population.[903] This may have the same inhumane consequences as a forced transfer or deportation. Moreover, the burning of a residential property may often be committed with a recklessness towards the lives of its inhabitants. The Trial Chamber therefore concludes that this act may constitute a gross or blatant denial of fundamental human rights, and, if committed on discriminatory grounds, it may constitute persecution.

5. The Mens Rea of Persecution

632. The Trial Chamber will now discuss the mens rea requirement of persecution as reflected in international case-law.

633. Both parties agree that the mental element of persecution consists of discriminatory intent on the grounds provided in the Statute. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber will elaborate further on the discriminatory intent required.

634. When examining some of the examples of persecution mentioned above, one can discern a common element: those acts were all aimed at singling out and attacking certain individuals on discriminatory grounds, by depriving them of the political, social, or economic rights enjoyed by members of the wider society. The deprivation of these rights can be said to have as its aim the removal of those persons from the society in which they live alongside the perpetrators, or eventually even from humanity itself.

635. The grounds on which the perpetrator of persecution may discriminate are listed in Article 5(h) of the Statute as political, racial or religious grounds.[904]

636. As set forth above, the mens rea requirement for persecution is higher than for ordinary crimes against humanity, although lower than for genocide. In this context the Trial Chamber wishes to stress that persecution as a crime against humanity is an offence belonging to the same genus as genocide. Both persecution and genocide are crimes perpetrated against persons that belong to a particular group and who are targeted because of such belonging. In both categories what matters is the intent to discriminate: to attack persons on account of their ethnic, racial, or religious characteristics (as well as, in the case of persecution, on account of their political affiliation). While in the case of persecution the discriminatory intent can take multifarious inhumane forms and manifest itself in a plurality of actions including murder, in the case of genocide that intent must be accompanied by the intention to destroy, in whole or in part, the group to which the victims of the genocide belong. Thus, it can be said that, from the viewpoint of mens rea, genocide is an extreme and most inhuman form of persecution. To put it differently, when persecution escalates to the extreme form of wilful and deliberate acts designed to destroy a group or part of a group, it can be held that such persecution amounts to genocide.

D. The Question of Cumulation of Offences (Concursus Delictorum)

1. The Issue in Dispute

(a) Prosecutor's Submissions

(i) General

637. It is the Prosecutor's contention that a person may be charged with, and convicted of, various crimes even when that person has only engaged in one criminal action against

[904] The RuSHA trial (ibid.) dealt with persecution of Jewish and Polish people, Greiser was charged with the persecution of Polish as well as Jewish people, Rauter was charged with persecution of relatives of the same victim or victims. In other words, according to the Prosecutor the same act or transaction against one or more victims may simultaneously infringe several criminal rules and can consequently be classified as a multiple crime. For instance, one act (say, murder) may be both a war crime and a crime against humanity.

638. To support this view the Prosecutor relies on previous decisions of the ICTY and the ICTR authorising cumulative charging.[905] In particular, reliance is placed on the Akayesu Judgement of the ICTR and the Tadić Judgement of the ICTY Trial Chamber. The Prosecutor also refers to an interlocutory decision rendered in this case on the subject of cumulation of offences. The Prosecutor places principal reliance on the test enunciated by a Trial Chamber of the ICTR in its Akayesu judgement of 2 September 1998. According to this test, "when more than one offence contained in the Articles of the Statute applies to a single set of facts, each offence may be separately charged: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did".[906]

639. The Prosecutor endorses this test over that set out by this Trial Chamber in this case in its Decision on Defence Challenges to the Form of the Indictment of 15 May 1998, according to which:[907]

> The Prosecutor may be justified in bringing cumulative charges when the Articles of the Statute referred to are designed to protect different values and when each Article requires proof of a legal element not required by the others.

The Prosecutor submits that this test, inasmuch as it requires the conjunction of these two conditions, and does not allow for the third condition postulated in the Akayesu

Judgement, mentioned above, is "overly restrictive".[908] Nevertheless, the Prosecutor submits that even this restrictive test is met in this case.[909]

640. The third approach referred to by the Prosecutor may be referred to as the Tadić approach. In an oft-quoted dictum from the Tadić Decision on Defence Motion on Form of the Indictment, the Trial Chamber stated:[910]

> In any event, since this is a matter that will only be at all relevant insofar as it might affect penalty, it can best be dealt with if and when matters of penalty fall for consideration. What can, however, be said with certainty is that penalty cannot be made to depend on whether offences arising from the same conduct are alleged cumulatively or in the alternative. What is to be punished by penalty is proven criminal conduct and that will not depend upon technicalities of pleading.

641. In the Tadić Sentencing Judgement,[911] concurrent sentences were imposed for offences which had been cumulatively charged in the indictment in relation to one set of facts. The same approach was taken in the Delalić et al.[912] and Furundžija[913] final Judgements, as well as in a number of interlocutory decisions on preliminary motions objecting to the form of the indictment,[914] on the basis of the Tadić dictum quoted above. The Prosecutor therefore also relies on the Tadić approach to justify cumulative charging.

642. Applying the tests enunciated above to the present case, the Prosecutor argues that it is justified in cumulatively charging (i) murder as a crime against humanity (Article 5(a) of the Statute) and persecution as a crime against humanity (Article 5(h) of the Statute), and (ii) murder as a crime against humanity (Article 5(a) of the Statute) and murder as a war crime (Article 3 of the Statute, incorporating the prohibition on murder laid down in Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions), as these crimes have different elements and protect different societal values. It can also be assumed that the Prosecutor would use the same reasoning to justify the cumulative charging of (iii) inhumane acts as a crime against humanity (Article 5 of the Statute) and cruel treatment as a war crime (Article 3 of the Statute).

(ii) Murder as a Crime Against Humanity (Article 5(a) of the Statute) and Persecution as a Crime Against Humanity (Article 5(h) of the Statute)

643. The Prosecution argues that murder and persecution, as crimes against humanity, are not co-extensive but rather have different elements, and may thus be cumulatively charged applying the test set forth in the Akayesu case.[915] There may be acts of persecution apart from murder, and there may be murders which do not constitute acts of persecution. To support this latter contention, the Prosecution maintains that murder as a crime against humanity may be committed without a discriminatory intent, whereas persecution requires just such a discriminatory element. Thus the Prosecution disagrees with the holding in the Tadić Trial Chamber Judgement that all crimes against humanity must be committed with a discriminatory intent. This finding was itself overruled by the Appeals Chamber in the same case.[916] Accordingly the Prosecution argues that these two crimes can be cumulatively charged, under the first limb of the Akayesu test, viz. that they both have different elements.

644. Second, the Prosecution argues that different values are protected by these different provisions, and hence that the second, disjunctive limb of the Akayesu test is also satisfied.[917]

645. Third, with regard to the third, disjunctive limb – the "description" test – referred to in the Akayesu case, the Prosecution argues that "charging such unlawful conduct under these separate provisions serves to fully describe the magnitude of the offence ...",[918] and for this reason too there can be cumulative charging.

646. Since the Kupreškić test involves the same first two limbs as those in Akayesu, but construed as conjunctive rather than disjunctive requirements – and since the Tadić test does not lay down a test but merely permits cumulative charging – the Prosecution concludes that "[t]he guidelines for multiple charging established by the decisions in Tadić and Akayesu and Kupreškić, among others, thus are fully satisfied by the charging decision in this case".[919]

(iii) Murder as a Crime Against Humanity (Article 5(a) of the Statute) and Murder as a War Crime (Article 3 of the Statute, Incorporating the Prohibition on Murder Contained in Common Article 3)

647. The Prosecution addresses this same issue of cumulative charging in the context of murder as a crime against humanity (Article 5(a) of the Statute) and murder as a war crime (Article 3 of the Statute, incorporating Common Article 3's prohibition on murder). The Prosecution argues that murder as a crime against humanity has different elements from murder as a war crime:[920]

> The elements for the crime of murder as a crime against humanity and as a violation of the laws or customs of war are not identical. The chapeaux of the two crimes are very different. Crimes against humanity must 'be directed against any civilian population as part of a widespread or systematic practice or policy'. This prerequisite is not one required to establish a violation of the laws or customs of war.

648. Second, the Prosecution argues that crimes against humanity and war crimes protect different societal interests. The Prosecution cites the ICTR Trial Chamber in

Akayesu to support both of these views.[921] Accordingly, the Prosecution argues that it is permissible to charge murder as a crime against humanity and murder as a war crime in relation to the same set of facts.[922] The Prosecution also alludes to the negative test applied in Akayesu, according to which it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where "one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, for example, murder and grievous bodily harm, robbery and theft, or rape and indecent assault".

649. On this issue, the Prosecution states that "[g]iven that neither the ICTY nor the ICTR has established jurisprudence indicating that crimes can be charged as lesser included offences of other crimes, the Prosecutor thus charges lesser included offences separately".[923] It is not clear whether, by the phrase "lesser included offences", the Prosecutor is referring to, for example, murder (crimes against humanity) / murder (war crimes) or, instead, murder (war crimes) / inflicting serious bodily injury (war crimes). This issue will be dealt with below, when the concept of "lesser included offences" is explored.

(iv) Inhumane acts as a Crime Against Humanity (Article 5(i) of the Statute) and Cruel Treatment as a War Crime (Article 3 of the Statute)

650. Although the matter of cumulatively charging inhumane acts as a crime against humanity (Article 5(i) of the Statute) and cruel treatment as a war crime (Article 3 of the Statute) is not specifically addressed in the Prosecution brief, it may be assumed that the arguments in (ii) apply, mutatis mutandis to this scenario. Thus, to the extent that inhumane acts and cruel treatment have different elements and/or protect different interests, they may be cumulatively charged applying the Akayesu test (if either of these two conditions is met) and the Kupreškić test (if both of these conditions are met).[924]

[924] This issue arises for consideration since the amended indictment in this case cumulatively charges inhumane acts and cruel treatment in Counts 10 and 11, Counts 14 and 15 and Counts 18 and 19.

(b) Submissions of the Defence

651. The Defence disagrees with the submissions of the Prosecution. Pursuant to a request of the Trial Chamber that the Parties submit briefs on this issue,[925] Counsel for four of the accused have submitted briefs, which shall be considered in turn.

652. Counsel for Zoran Kupreškić and Mirjan Kupreškić submitted a joint Brief ("Kupreškić Brief").[926] In the Kupreškić Brief, the Defence endorses the test articulated by this Trial Chamber in this case in its Decision of 15 May 1998 imposing a two-fold conjunctive requirement for cumulation of offences. Conversely, the Defence disapproves of the test propounded in Akayesu, both because it renders the two requirements articulated by this Trial Chamber in this case disjunctive rather than conjunctive requirements by use of the word "or" rather than "and", and because it adds a third, disjunctive requirement ("where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did"), which, the Defence argues, is contrary to the non bis in idem rule and the civil law principle of "imperfect concurrence". The Defence requests the Court to reject the Tadić test for the same reasons. According to the Defence, the Trial Chamber, in order to decide this issue, should apply the laws, doctrine and jurisprudence on "imperfect concurrence" of the former Yugoslavia, at least to the extent that resort to international law and general principles of criminal law does not furnish a complete answer.[927]

653. The Defence further argues that the Tadić jurisdiction decision precludes double charging of murder under Articles 3 and 5. In this regard, it quotes the Appeals Chamber when it stated that "Article 3 may be taken to cover all violations of international humanitarian law other than the 'grave breaches' of the four Geneva Conventions falling under Article 2 (or, for that matter, the violations covered by Articles 4 and 5, to the extent that Articles 3, 4 and 5 overlap)".[928] Thus Article 3 is a residual clause which applies only if the principal norm cannot apply. Therefore if murder is charged under Article 5(a) or (h), it cannot be charged under Article 3. [929]

[927] Kupre{kic Brief, para. 74. The Defence cites Bassiouni as arguing that, since the Tribunal's Statute does not include a "general part", aside from Art. 7 of the Statute, the Tribunal should apply the law of the former Yugoslavia in order to act in accordance with the principle of legality.

654. Moreover, the Defence agrees with the Tadić Trial Chamber's holding that "acts that are found to be crimes against humanity under other heads of Article 5 will not be included in the consideration of persecution as a separate offence under Article 5(h)",[930] based on the conclusion – with which the Prosecution and the Tadić Appeals Chamber disagrees - that discriminatory intent is required for all crimes against humanity.

655. The Defence asserts that even if no discriminatory intent was required for Article 5(a) (murder), cumulative charging under Article 5(a) and (h) is nonetheless impermissible as murder with intent to discriminate is an aggravated form of murder.[931] This distinction between the basic form of an offence and an aggravated form is a paradigm of a "lesser included offence in common law [...] systems or 'imperfect concurrence' [...] by reason of specialty [...] in civil law systems".[932] According to the principle of speciality, where one crime, e.g. murder, is composed of some but not all elements of the other crime, e.g. discriminatory murder, and the former crime does not have any elements which are not included in the latter crime, then the latter crime is the only one to apply when all the elements are present.

656. The Defence submits that the Prosecution conceded that Articles 3 and 5(a) murder constitute lesser included offences to murder under Article 5(h), but asserted that neither the ICTY nor the ICTR has established jurisprudence indicating that crimes can be charged as lesser included offences of other crimes. The Defence asserts that the Akayesu Judgement established such jurisprudence.

657. The Defence applies the same reasoning to deny the permissibility of cumulative charging under Article 3 and Article 5(a).

658. Counsel for Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} also filed a Petition,[933] which similarly argues that "ideal concurrence" is impermissible in this case, evoking the principle of specialty.

660. Defence Counsel for Vladimir Šantić submitted a brief[935] in which the Defence uses the civil law concepts of real concurrence, ideal concurrence and apparent concurrence to argue that cumulative charging is not permissible under the present indictment.

661. "Real concurrence" occurs when the perpetrator commits several crimes, albeit in a single transaction, either by violating the same criminal provision against more than one person or by violating a number of distinct criminal provisions through disparate acts. The Defence does not give an example of real concurrence. Since this is a well-known concept in civil law countries and examples proliferate in the case-law, the Trial Chamber will mention, as an instance of the former sub-class, the commission of more than one murder by killing several people in a spray of gunfire; an example of the latter would be reckless driving and failure to assist a person injured as a result of the reckless driving, where there are disparate acts of driving recklessly and of not stopping after knowingly colliding with someone. The Defence states that cumulative charging is permissible only under real concurrence.

662. Neither "apparent concurrence" (unechte Konkurrenz, concours apparent d'infractions) nor "ideal concurrence" (Idealkonkurrenz, concours idéal d'infractions) are defined by the Defence. However, the notions are well-known in civil law countries, although there is no unanimity about their exact definition. It is usually held that "apparent concurrence" occurs when the perpetrator performs an act that may appear to simultaneously breach several criminal provisions, whilst in reality it only violates one.
662. In many legal systems "ideal concurrence" occurs when a person through one act breaches more than one criminal provision. For an instance drawn from German law: if a father uses violence to have sexual intercourse with his minor daughter, he has at one and the same time committed unlawful coercion, incest, sexual abuse of a person under his legal protection and, possibly, bodily harm. In French law, the production of a forged document may amount to both "usage de faux", namely making use of a forged document with intent to defraud, and attempted deceit ("tentative d'escroquerie").

663. In contrast to "real concurrence", the Defence states that cumulative charging is not permissible in the case of ideal concurrence or apparent concurrence. In its discussion, ideal concurrence and apparent concurrence are not distinguished; rather they are conflated. The Defence mentions three principles designed to deal with and solve problems of apparent/ideal concurrence: specialty, subsidiarity, consumption, and a possible fourth principle, alternativity.[936]

664. Under "specialty", one crime, e.g. murder, may be qualified by the addition of further elements, e.g. the intent to destroy a racial group in whole or in part, as a specialised crime, i.e. genocide. In this case, if the additional element is present, then the special crime, i.e. genocide, should be charged and not both the special crime and the general crime, i.e. murder, and the accused can only be convicted of one crime.

665. It is widely held that the "subsidiarity" principle applies when one crime is a preparatory form of a second crime, so that if the second crime is completed, only that second crime should be charged. For example, a person might detain another person in order to kill him; murder should then be charged, not illegal detention and murder. In many legal systems "consumption" applies where one crime is "consumed" by another, a notion which parallels the common law idea of "lesser included offences", e.g. robbery consumes theft, rape consumes sexual assault, etc. The fourth notion, "alternativity", refers to the situation where one or more legal descriptions might apply to an act; then the "predominant" description should be chosen, e.g., in Akayesu, the crime of genocide rather than complicity in genocide.

666. In its brief the Defence also discusses the common law notion of double jeopardy which often leads to the same result as the civil law concepts just explained.[937]

667. The Defence concludes that:

(a) Bringing cumulative charges in the case of apparent concurrence is not permissible. It is possible [only] in the case of genuine concurrence. However, bringing alternative charges could be permissible, and the Prosecutor has already resorted to this solution several times.

(b) The crime of murder and the crime of persecution as crimes against humanity, especially in the Kupreškić case are typical cases of apparent concurrence, and in this case bringing cumulative charges, delivering a decision on two crimes and delivering two sentences is not possible. By the application of the criteria of subsidiarity and alternativity the accused (if found guilty at all) can be convicted for only one of these crimes.

(c) In the same way as (b), a violation of the laws or the customs of war should be assessed in relation to murder charged as a crime against humanity.

(d) Persecution and murder as crimes against humanity and murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war protect certain different, but also certain identical interests and values and entirely meet the criteria according to which they can be characterised as apparent concurrence. This requires the exclusion of bringing cumulative charges, of delivering cumulative decisions and of delivering cumulative sanctions from the point of view of substantive criminal law. At the same time, from the point of view of criminal procedure, it requires application of the double jeopardy rule as well as of the rule non bis in idem.[938]

2. Discussion

(a) General

668. The Trial Chamber considers that this issue has a broad import and great relevance, all the more so because it has not been dealt with in depth by an international criminal court.[939] The Trial Chamber shall therefore consider it in its general dimension, so as to set out what it considers to be the correct legal standards on the basis of which the question must be decided in casu.

669. In delving into this new area of international criminal law, the Trial Chamber will rely on general principles of international criminal law and, if no such principle is found, on the principles common to the various legal systems of the world, in particular those shared by most civil law and common law criminal systems. In this search for and examination of the relevant legal standards, and the consequent enunciation of the principles applicable at the international level, the Trial Chamber might be deemed to set out a sort of ius praetorium. However, its powers in finding the law are of course far more limited than those belonging to the Roman praetor: under the International Tribunal's Statute, the Trial Chamber must apply lex lata i.e. existing law, although it has broad powers in determining such law.[940]

[938] Ibid., para. 26.

[939] None of the *Tadi}, Prosecutor v. Kambanda, ((ICTR 97-23-S),* Judgement and Sentence, 4 Sept. 1998), Delali} et al. or Furund`ija, final Judgements treated of the issue in depth. The Akayesu Judgement contains a brief discussion on the subject of "Cumulative Charges" (Judgement, 2 Sept. 1998, paras 461-470); so does the Judgement in Kayishema and Ruzindana, 25 May 1999 at paras. 625-650.

[940] See the Report of the Secretary-General, at para. 34: "... the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to specific conventions does not arise". See also Decision on

670. It is appropriate to emphasise at the outset that the question of cumulation of charges is material in two distinct but closely intertwined respects. First of all, it is relevant from the viewpoint of substantive international criminal law. On this score the questions that arise are: (i) whether and on what conditions the same act or transaction may infringe two or more rules of international criminal law and (ii) in case of a double conviction for a single action, how this should be reflected in sentencing. Secondly, the question of cumulation is relevant from the viewpoint of procedural international criminal law. In this respect the question presents itself as follows: (i) when and on what conditions can the Prosecutor opt for cumulative charges for the same act or transaction? (ii) when should she instead put forward alternative charges? (iii) with what powers is a Trial Chamber vested when faced with a charge that has been wrongly formulated by the Prosecutor? In the opinion of the Trial Chamber the correct solution to both problems can only be found by first resolving the issue from the viewpoint of substantive law.

671. The Trial Chamber shall therefore examine the general legal criteria by which it is possible to distinguish cases where the same act or transaction infringes two or more provisions of the Statute from those cases where although the same seemingly holds true, in reality only one provision is breached. The Trial Chamber shall then establish which criteria should be applied to determine sentence when a single act is an offence under two or more Articles of the Statute.

672. In the light of the conclusions reached as a result of this analysis, the Trial Chamber shall dwell on the procedural aspects of this issue.

(b) Issues of Substantive Criminal Law

(i) Principles on Multiple Offences in International Criminal Law

Application for Leave to Appeal by Hazim Delić (Defects in the form of the Indictment), Delalić et al., 6 Dec. 1996, Bench of the Appeals Chamber: "the Tribunal's Statute does not create new offences but rather serves to give the Tribunal jurisdiction over offences which are already part of customary law" (para. 26); see also the final Judgement in Delalić et al., Judgement, 16 Nov. 1998: "The Statute does not create

673. Under traditional international criminal law it was exceedingly difficult to apply general principles concerning multiple offences so as to identify cases where the same act or transaction breached various rules of international criminal law and cases where instead only one rule was violated.

674. Under Article 6 of the London Agreement of 8 August 1945 some acts could qualify both as war crimes and crimes against humanity: e.g., mass murder or deportation of foreign civilians in occupied countries. True, that provision made it clear that some actions could only be characterised as crimes against humanity: for example, persecution on religious or political grounds of enemy civilians or persecution, on those same grounds, of civilians having the same nationality as the persecutor. By the same token, other actions could only qualify as war crimes: for example, wanton destruction of enemy property not justified by military necessity, pillage, use of prohibited weapons or execution of hostages. Nevertheless, as stated above, there was an area where the two categories overlapped. In addition, those instruments which provided for the various penalties consequent upon the various crimes did not distinguish between war crimes and crimes against humanity: they envisaged the same penalties (death sentence, imprisonment etc.) for both categories in the same terms. This holds true, for example, for Control Council Law No.10.[941]

675. It is therefore not surprising that the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg (IMT) convicted many defendants both of war crimes and crimes against humanity for substantive law, but provides a forum and framework for the enforcement of existing international humanitarian law" (para. 417, and discussion at paras. 414-417).

[941] Art. II paragraph 3 of which provides that:
"Any person found guilty of any of the crimes above mentioned may upon conviction be punished as shall be determined by the tribunal to be just. Such punishment may consist of one or more of the following:
a) Death.
b) Imprisonment for life or for a term of years, with or without hard labour.
c) Fine, and imprisonment with or without hard labour, in lieu thereof.
d) Forfeiture of property.
e) Restitution of property wrongfully acquired.
f) Deprivation of some or all civil rights".

the same act.[942] Similarly, the various military courts sitting at Nuremberg after World War II found many defendants guilty of both categories of crimes and sentenced them for both.

676. This pattern can be explained by three factors. First, at that time the class of "crimes against humanity" had just emerged and there were concerns about whether by convicting defendants of such crimes the courts would be applying ex post facto law. Secondly, and as a consequence, the relevant criminal provisions at the time did not draw a clear-cut distinction between the two classes of crimes. Thirdly, the general concepts of international criminal law were still in a state of flux.

677. The Trial Chamber holds the view that a satisfactory legal solution to the questions at issue can now be reached. The legal notion of "crimes against humanity" is now firmly embedded in positive international law, its legal contours are neatly drawn and it no longer gives rise to doubts as to its legitimacy; in particular, its application does not raise the issue of retroactive criminal law. General principles of international criminal law, whenever they may be distilled by dint of construction, generalisation or logical inference, may also be relied upon. In addition, it is now clear that to fill possible gaps in international customary and treaty law, international and national criminal courts may draw upon general principles of criminal law as they derive from the convergence of the principal penal systems of the world. Where necessary, the Trial Chamber shall use such principles to fill any lacunae in the Statute of the International Tribunal and in customary law. However, it will always be necessary to bear in mind the dangers of wholesale incorporation of principles of national law into the unique system of international criminal law as applied by the International Tribunal.

678. It is possible to set out the following notions and principles.

[942] However, two defendants (Streicher and von Schirach) were only found guilty of crimes against humanity (IMT Judgement, pp. 304, 320), while another two defendants, Raeder and Doenitz, the two highest commanders of the naval forces, were convicted only of war crimes (IMT Judgement, pp. 317, 315) (Raeder was also convicted of crimes against peace and conspiracy to commit crimes against peace).

(a) Generally speaking, two different legal situations may arise. First of all, it is possible for various elements of a general criminal transaction to infringe different provisions. For instance, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights has repeatedly held that the "forced disappearance of human beings is a multiple and continuous violation of many rights under the [American] Convention [on Human Rights] that the States Parties are obligated to respect and guarantee".[943] The Court rightly noted that the kidnapping of a person is contrary to Article 7 of the Convention, prolonged isolation and deprivation of communication is contrary to Article 5, while secret execution without trial followed by the concealment of the body is contrary to Article 4.[944] In another case dealing with the illegal detention and subsequent killing of two persons by Colombian armed forces, the Court held that the respondent State had breached Article 7, laying down the right to personal liberty, and Article 4, providing for the right to life.[945]

(b) Similarly, when applying Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights referred to below, the European Commission and Court have not ruled out the possibility of a differentiated characterisation of various actions. Thus in the Greek case the European Commission held that some actions of the respondent State constituted torture, while other actions amounted to inhuman treatment.[946]

(c) Clearly, in these instances there exist distinct offences; that is, an accumulation of separate acts, each violative of a different provision. In civil law systems this situation is referred to as concours réel d'infractions, Realkonkurrenz, concorso reale di reati, etc. These offences may be grouped together into one general transaction on the condition that it is clear that the transaction consists of a cluster of offences.

679. The situation is different with regard to the case of one and the same act or transaction simultaneously breaching two or more provisions. The European Court has repeatedly held that "one and the same fact may fall foul of more than one provision of the Convention and Protocols".[947] It is appropriate, however, to distinguish between two categories of such acts or transactions.

(a) First, there may be an act or transaction that breaches one provision in some respects and another provision in other respects. Consider for example the shelling of a religious group of enemy civilians by means of prohibited weapons (e.g. chemical weapons) in an international armed conflict, with the intent to destroy in whole or in part the group to which those civilians belong. This single act contains an element particular to Article 4 of the Statute (on genocide) to the extent that it intends to destroy a religious group, while the element particular to Article 3 (on war crimes) lies in the use of unlawful weapons.

(b) Second, there may be acts or transactions that are fully covered by both provisions. Consider for example the systematic rape, by combatants, of enemy civilians in an occupied territory. This conduct is envisaged by, and runs contrary to, for example, both Article 3 (on war crimes) and Article 5(g) (on crimes against humanity). This also applies to the case of lesser included offences, e.g. torture and cruel treatment (cruel treatment being the lesser included offence), both envisaged as offences under Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions, taken in conjunction with Article 3 of the Statute.

680. Certain criteria for deciding whether there has been a violation of one or more provisions consistently emerge from national legislation and the case-law of national courts and international human rights bodies. In other words, it is possible to deduce from a survey of national law and jurisprudence some principles of criminal law common to the major legal systems of the world. These principles have to some extent been restated by a number of international courts. One test has been enunciated and spelled out by certain national courts, such as those in the United States. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Morey v The Commonwealth (1871) for instance held that:[948]

> A single act may be an offence against two statutes: and if each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either statute does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other.

681. This has been followed in subsequent United States jurisprudence, notably the case of Blockburger v United States of America (1932) which approved the above criteria, since known as the "Blockburger test":[949]

> The applicable rule is that where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offences or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not.

682. The test then lies in determining whether each offence contains an element not required by the other. If so, where the criminal act in question fulfils the extra requirements of each offence, the same act will constitute an offence under each provision.

683. If the Blockburger test is not met, then it follows that one of the offences falls entirely within the ambit of the other offence (since it does not possess any element which the other lacks). Then the relationship between the two provisions can be described as that between concentric circles, in that one has a broader scope and completely encompasses the other. In these cases the choice between the two provisions is dictated by the maxim in toto iure generi per speciem derogatur (or lex specialis derogat generali), whereby the more specific or less sweeping provision should be chosen. This maxim reflects a principle laid down both in general international law and in many national criminal systems (see e.g. Article 55 paragraph 2 of the Dutch Criminal Code[950] and Article 15 of the Italian Criminal Code).[951]

684. The rationale behind the principle of speciality is that if an action is legally regulated both by a general provision and by a specific one, the latter prevails as most appropriate, being more specifically directed towards that action. Particularly in case of discrepancy between the two provisions, it would be logical to assume that the law-making body intended to give pride of place to the provision governing the action more directly and in greater detail.

685. When each of the two provisions requires proof of a fact which the other one does not require, civil law courts tend to speak of "reciprocal speciality" and find that both provisions apply. In sum, the reciprocal speciality doctrine leads to the same result as the Blockburger test.

686. In other cases, although the provisions cannot be said to be in a lex specialis - lex generalis relationship, it would nonetheless appear unsound to apply both provisions. This was illustrated by Judge Nieto-Navia, then President of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, in his dissenting opinion in the Caballero Delgado and Santana case:[952]

> In criminal law if a person is killed by a dagger it is obvious that he was also the victim of wounding. However, the crime that was committed is murder, and no judge will interpret the norms in such a way that the dead person was the victim of "murder and wounding".

[950] "Where an act is punishable under one general penal provision and a special penal provision applies, only the special penal provision shall be applicable".

[952] Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Caballero Delgado and Santana case, Judgment of 8 Dec. 1955, p. 99.

687. This notion corresponds to the common law doctrine of the "lesser included offence".[953]

688. In civil law jurisdictions, a double conviction is ruled out in such cases by the so-called principle of consumption.[954] Its ratio is that when all the legal requirements for a lesser offence are met in the commission of a more serious one, a conviction on the more serious count fully encompasses the criminality of the conduct.

689. In international law, albeit not in a criminal context, a similar principle may be found in the case-law of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights concerning the application of Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Article 3 of the Convention prohibits various actions, which may be grouped together into the following three classes: (i) torture, (ii) inhuman treatment or punishment, and (iii) degrading treatment or punishment.

690. Interestingly, the European Commission and Court have never applied the three provisions cumulatively. In substance, it may be inferred from their decisions that torture is any inhuman and degrading treatment which is deliberately inflicted for one of a number of specified purposes, e.g. to obtain information, and which causes extreme suffering; inhuman treatment or punishment is any action causing severe suffering and lacking in any justification; degrading treatment or punishment is any action which grossly humiliates an individual before himself or others, or drives him to act against his conscience or will. It follows that torture always constitutes inhuman and degrading treatment as well. By contrast, inhuman treatment or punishment may not amount to torture or to degrading treatment or punishment. Similarly, degrading treatment or [954] See e.g. its application by the Austrian Supreme Court: Decision of the Oberster Gerichtshof of 3.4.1962, reported in the Evidenzblatt of the Österreichische Juristenzeitung ("EvBl") 1962/427, p. 527, Decision of the Oberster Gerichtshof of 7.10.1969, reported in Ev.Bl. 1970/143, Decision of the Oberster Gerichtshof of 16.2.1977, reported in the Ev.Bl. 1977/165, p. 360 and LSK 1983/162, in EvBl 1984/57, p. 220. punishment may result from an action which does not constitute torture or inhuman treatment or punishment.

691. The Aksoy case illustrates how Article 3 has been applied by the two international bodies. In this case, the European Court, after finding that the facts complained of amounted to torture, held that "[i]n view of the gravity of this conclusion, it [was] not necessary for the Court to examine the applicant's complaints of other forms of ill-treatment".[955]

692. In sum, the European Commission and Court have held that the more serious breach (torture) prevails over the other two less serious ones (inhuman treatment or degrading treatment). The two bodies have refrained from a multiple characterisation of the same action falling foul of Article 3: whenever an action proved to be contrary to both the proscription of inhuman treatment (or of degrading treatment) and to that of torture, the Commission and Court opted for the more serious breach. Presumably, the rationale behind this approach is twofold: (1) the European Commission and Court have applied a principle analogous to that of consumption; and (2) they have considered that the various norms of Article 3 all pursue the same goal and safeguard the same basic values.

[955] Eur. Court HR, Aksoy v. Turkey judgment of 18 Dec. 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-VI, p. 2279. The Bundesgerichtshof held in a decision of 30 April 1999 on the appeal of *Jorgić, (BGH, Urt. V. 30 April 1999 – 3 STR 251/98, OCG, Düsseldorf)* that the offence of genocide did not in the first place protect the life and health of the individual, but the integrity and living conditions of the racial, ethnic, religious or national group subjected to such attacks (NStZ 1999, p. 396 and 401). Thus the Federal Court concluded that the offence of genocide may be committed over a longer period of time and the individual acts of murder etc. occurring therein are not of and by themselves counts of genocide, but rather of murder, committed in Tateinheit with genocide (ibid., at p. 397). The Court of First Instance had convicted Jorgić of 11 counts of genocide. The conviction was therefore modified by the Federal Court to only one count, but the sentence remained unchanged and the appeal was finally dismissed (ibid., at p. 399).

693. The latter rationale leads us to a further test, which consists in ascertaining whether the various provisions at stake protect different values. Again, traces of this can be found in both the common law and civil law systems.[956]

694. Under this test, if an act or transaction is simultaneously in breach of two criminal provisions protecting different values, it may be held that that act or transaction infringes both criminal provisions. Take the example of resort to prohibited weapons with genocidal intent. This would be contrary to both Article 3 and Article 4 of the Statute. Article 3 intends to impose upon belligerents the obligation to behave in a fair manner in the choice of arms and targets, thereby (i) sparing the enemy combatants unnecessary suffering and (ii) protecting the population from the use of inhumane weapons. By contrast, Article 4 primarily intends to protect groups from extermination. A breach of both provisions with a single act would then entail a double conviction.

695. However, the Trial Chamber's review of national case law indicates that the test is hardly ever used other than in conjunction with, and in support of, the other tests mentioned above (Blockburger and reciprocal speciality, as well as the principles of speciality and consumption).[957] This test is therefore unlikely to alter the conclusions reached through the application of these principles.

[956] This test, advanced by the Prosecution in its Brief, is one applied in the dissenting judgement of Ritchie, J in the Canadian case of Kienapple v The Queen [1975] 1 S C R. 729, at 731, in which Kienapple appealed against his conviction both for rape and for unlawful carnal knowledge of a female under fourteen years of age. This judgement, contained the following passage:

> "The purpose and effect of s.146(1) is in my view to protect female children under the age of fourteen years from sexual advances leading to intercourse by male persons over that age ... and I cannot subscribe to a result which relieves an assailant from the consequences of violating a child on the ground that his act also constitutes the crime of rape" (ibid., at p. 734).

> "Attendu que si la loi punit de la peine de mort la destruction par l'effet d'un explosif d'un édifice habité ou servant à l'habitation, parce que ce fait met en péril des vies humaines, ce crime n'en est pas moins essentiellement établi en vue d'assurer la protection des propriétés".

(ii) Relationship Between the Various Offences Charged in the Indictment

696. Having set out the general principles of criminal law governing multiple offences in international law, the Trial Chamber will now apply these principles to the relations between the various substantive provisions of the Statute relied upon by the parties in the instant case.

697. Unlike provisions of national criminal codes or, in common-law countries, rules of criminal law crystallised in the relevant case-law or found in statutory enactments, each Article of the Statute does not confine itself to indicating a single category of well-defined acts such as murder, voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, theft, etc. Instead the Articles embrace broad clusters of offences sharing certain general legal ingredients. It follows that, for instance, a crime against humanity may consist of such diverse acts as the systematic extermination of civilians with poison gas or the widespread persecution of a group on racial grounds. Similarly, a war crime may for instance consist in the summary execution of a prisoner of war or the carpet bombing of a town.

698. In addition, under the Statute of the International Tribunal, some provisions have such a broad scope that they may overlap. True, some acts may only be characterised as war crimes (Article 3), e.g., the use of prohibited weapons against enemy combatants, attacking undefended towns, etc. Other acts or transactions may only be defined as crimes against humanity (Article 5): e.g., persecution of civilians, whatever their nationality, on racial, religious or political grounds. However, other acts, depending upon certain circumstances, may either be characterised as war crimes or both as war crimes and crimes against humanity. For instance, murder, torture or rape of enemy civilians normally constitute war crimes; however, if these acts are part of a widespread Gerichtshof of 3 April 1962, in EvBl 1962/427, p. 527 (different values protected in conjunction with no consumption of the lesser offence).

The only cases in which a multiple conviction was entered for a single action by virtue of the "different protected values test", although under the speciality test a single conviction would have been appropriate, the Trial Chamber is aware of, were decided by the Italian Corte di Cassazione (Decision of 6 Oct. 1964, reported in summary in Giustizia penale, 1965, II, p. 205 and decision of 21 Jan. 1982, reported in or systematic practice, they may also be defined as crimes against humanity. Plainly, Articles 3 and 5 have a different scope, which, however, may sometimes coincide or overlap.

699. In order to apply the principles on cumulation of offences set out above specific offences rather than diverse sets of crimes must be considered. The Trial Chamber will therefore analyse the relationship between the single offences with which the accused are charged, such as murder as a war crime, murder as a crime against humanity, etc.

a. Relationship Between "Murder" under Article 3 (War Crimes) and "Murder" under Article 5(a) (Crimes Against Humanity)

700. Following the principles set out above, the relevant question here is whether murder as a war crime requires proof of facts which murder as a crime against humanity does not require, and vice versa (the Blockburger test). Another relevant question is whether the prohibition of murder as a war crime protects different values from those safeguarded by the prohibition of murder as a crime against humanity.

701. With regard to the former question, while murder as a crime against humanity requires proof of elements that murder as a war crime does not require (the offence must be part of a systematic or widespread attack on the civilian population), this is not reciprocated. As a result, the Blockburger test is not fulfilled, or in other words the two offences are not in a relationship of reciprocal speciality. The prohibition of murder as a crime against humanity is lex specialis in relation to the prohibition of murder as a war crime.[958]

Cassazione penale, 1983, p. 621). However, as the Corte di Cassazione admitted in the decision of 21 Jan. 1982, its own jurisprudence on the issue is far from homogeneous (ibid., p. 623).

[958] This result is borne out by the Appeals Chamber in its Decision on Jurisdiction:

"Article 3 thus confers on the International Tribunal jurisdiction over [any] serious offence against international humanitarian law not covered by Article 2, 4 or 5. Article 3 is a fundamental provision laying down that any "serious violation of international humanitarian law" must be prosecuted by the International Tribunal. In other words, Art. 3 functions as a residual clause designed to ensure that no serious violation of international humanitarian law is taken away from the jurisdiction of the

702. In addressing the latter question, it can generally be said that the substantive provisions of the Statute pursue the same general objective (deterring serious breaches of humanitarian law and, if these breaches are committed, punishing those responsible for them). In addition, they protect the same general values in that they are designed to ensure respect for human dignity. Admittedly, within this common general framework, Articles 3 and 5 may pursue some specific aims and protect certain specific values. Thus, for instance, the prohibition of war crimes aims at ensuring a minimum of humanitarian concern between belligerents as well as maintaining a distinction between combatants' behaviour toward enemy combatants and persons not participating in hostilities. The prohibition of crimes against humanity, on the other hand, is more focused on discouraging attacks on the civilian population and the persecution of identifiable groups of civilians.

703. However, as under Article 5 of the Statute crimes against humanity fall within the Tribunal's jurisdiction only when committed in armed conflict, the difference between the values protected by Article 3 and Article 5 would seem to be inconsequential.

704. As explained above, the validity of the criterion based on the difference in values protected is disputable if it is not also supported by reciprocal speciality between the two offences. It follows that, given also the marginal difference in values protected, the Trial Chamber may convict the Accused of violating the prohibition of murder as a crime against humanity only if it finds that the requirements of murder under both Article 3 and under Article 5 are proved.

b. Relationship Between "Persecution" under Article 5(h) (Crimes Against Humanity) and "Murder" under Article 5(a) (Crimes Against Humanity)

705. On the grounds set out above, the Trial Chamber agrees with the Prosecutor that "persecution" may comprise not only murder carried out with a discriminatory intent but also crimes other than murder. Count 1 of the indictment, which charges persecution, refers not only to killing, but also to "the comprehensive destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property" (para. 21(b)) and "the organised detention and expulsion of the Bosnian Muslims from Ahmići-Šantići and its environs" (para. 21(c)); in short, what in non-legal terms is commonly referred to as "ethnic cleansing". There are clearly additional elements here beyond murder.

International Tribunal (emphasis added)". See Tadić, Appeals Chamber Decision on Jurisdiction, 2 Oct. 1995, para. 91.

706. As for the relations between murder as a crime against humanity and persecution as a crime against humanity, it should be noted that persecution requires a discriminatory element which murder, albeit as a crime against humanity, does not. The Trial Chamber is of the view therefore that there is reciprocal speciality between these crimes; indeed, both may have unique elements. An accused may be guilty of persecution for destroying the homes of persons belonging to another ethnic group and expelling the occupants, without however being found guilty of any acts of killing. The destruction of homes and the expulsion of persons, if carried out with a discriminatory intent, may in and of themselves be sufficient to constitute persecution. Equally, an accused may commit a non-discriminatory murder as part of a widespread attack on a civilian population which, because it is non-discriminatory, fails to satisfy the definition of persecution. These, then, are two separate offences, which may be equally charged.

707. If an accused is found guilty of persecution, inter alia because of the commission of murders, it seems that he should be found guilty of persecution only, and not of murder and persecution, because in that case the Blockburger test is not met: murder is in that case already encompassed within persecution as a form of aggravated murder, and it does not possess any elements which the persecutory murders do not. Hence, in that case, murder may be seen as either falling under lex generalis or as a lesser included offence, and a conviction should not ensue when there is already a conviction under lex specialis or for the more serious offence, i.e. persecutory murder.

708. Things however are different when a person is charged both with murder as a crime against humanity and with persecution (including murder) as a crime against humanity. In this case the same acts of murder may be material to both crimes. This is so if it is proved that (i) murder as a form of persecution meets both the requirement of discriminatory intent and that of the widespread or systematic practice of persecution, and (ii) murder as a crime against humanity fulfils the requirement for the wilful taking of life of innocent civilians and that of a widespread or systematic practice of murder of civilians. If these requirements are met, we are clearly faced with a case of reciprocal speciality or in other words the requirements of the Blockburger test are fulfilled. Consequently, murder will constitute an offence under both provisions of the Statute (Article 5(h) and (a)).

709. Let us now consider whether the prohibition of persecution as a crime against humanity protects different values from those safeguarded by the prohibition of murder as a crime against humanity. It is clear that the criminalisation of murder and persecution may serve different values. The prohibition of murder aims at protecting innocent civilians from being obliterated on a large scale. More generally, it intends to safeguard human life in times of armed conflicts. On the other hand, the ban on persecution intends to safeguard civilians from severe forms of discrimination. This ban is designed to reaffirm and impose respect for the principle of equality between groups and human beings.

710. This test then bears out and corroborates the result achieved by using the other test. Under the conditions described above, the test based on protection of values leads to the conclusion that the same act or transaction (murder) may infringe two different provisions of Article 5 of the Statute.

c. Relationship Between "Inhumane Acts" under Article 5(i) (Crimes Against Humanity) and "Cruel Treatment" under Article 3 (War Crimes)

711. These two crimes are clearly presented as alternatives in the Indictment and should be considered as such. Except for the element of widespread or systematic practice required for crimes against humanity, each of them does not require proof of elements not required by the other. In other words, it is clear that every time an inhumane act under Article 5(i) is committed, ipso facto cruel treatment under Article 3 is inflicted. The reverse is however not true: cruel treatment under Article 3 may not be covered by Article 5(i) if the element of widespread or systematic practice is missing. Thus if the evidence proves the commission of the facts in question, a conviction should only be recorded for one of these two offences: inhumane acts, if the background conditions for crimes against humanity are satisfied, and if they are not, cruel treatment as a war crime. Given this, it is not strictly necessary to consider the "different values test", since the Blockburger test is ultimately dispositive of the issue.

d. Relationship Between the Charges for Inhumane Acts (or Cruel Treatment) and the Charges for Murder

712. A brief word here should be said about the relationship between charges for inhumane acts/cruel treatment and murder. In Counts 2-9, for example, the accused are charged with the murder of the Ahmić family, and in Counts 10-11 for inhumane acts/cruel treatment of Witness KL by murdering his family before his eyes. These are clearly separate offences. Not only are the elements different, but the victims are even different. Witness KL's family are the victims of the murder counts, while Witness KL himself is the victim of the inhumane acts/cruel treatment counts.

(iii) The Sentence to be Imposed in the Event of More Than One Conviction for A Single Action

713. The question remains as to how a double conviction for a single action shall be reflected in sentencing. Both parties seem to agree that a defendant should not suffer two distinct penalties, to be served consecutively, for the same act or transaction. However, the Trial Chamber is under a duty to apply the provisions of the Statute and customary international law. Article 24(1) of the Statute provides that:

> The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. In determining the term of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia.

714. Pursuant to Article 48 of the former SFRY Criminal Code, which is still applied in the successor States of the SFRY, if the accused has committed several criminal offences by one action, the court shall first assess the punishment for each criminal offence and then proceed with the determination of the principal punishment. In the case of imprisonment, the court shall impose one punishment consisting of an aggravation of the most severe punishment assessed, but the aggravated punishment may not be as high as the total of all incurred punishments.[959]

715. The 1997 Criminal Code of the Republic of Croatia contains similar rules on sentencing in the case of multiple offences committed by one action.[960] Outside the former Yugoslavia, the Italian Criminal Code includes a similar rule.[961]

716. As was held by the Trial Chamber in the Tadić case, "[t]he practice of courts in the former Yugoslavia does not delimit the sources upon which the Trial Chamber may rely in reaching its determination of the appropriate sentence for a convicted person".[962] In numerous legal systems, the penalty imposed in case of multiple conviction for offences committed by one action is limited to the punishment provided for the most serious offence. An instance of this approach is represented by Article 52(2) of the German Penal Code.[963]

(1) If, by one or more acts, the perpetrator has committed more than one criminal offence for which he is being tried simultaneously, the court shall first determine the sentences for each offence and then impose a single sentence for all the offences.
(2). The single sentence shall be imposed according to the following rules:
i) if the death penalty was determined for one of the concurrent criminal offences, only that sentence shall be imposed;
ii) if a sentence of twenty years imprisonment was determined for one of the concurrent criminal offences, only that sentence shall be imposed;
iii) if sentences of imprisonment are determined for concurrent criminal offences, the single sentence shall be greater than each individual sentence determined, but it shall not be greater than the sum of the sentences determined, nor shall it be greater than a term of imprisonment of fifteen years;
iv) if sentences of up to three years imprisonment were determined for all concurrent criminal offences, the single sentence may not exceed eight years of imprisonment.

[960] See Art. 60 of the Croatian Penal Code of 1997.

[961] Art. 81 of the Codice Penale reads:
"(1) Anyone who, by a single act or omission, violates different provisions of law or commits more than one violation of the same provision of law, shall be punished with the punishment which would be imposed for the most serious violation, increased up to no more than three times that sentence. [...]

[962] Tadi}, Sentencing Judgement, 14 July 1997, at para. 9.

717. Faced with this discrepancy in municipal legal systems, the Trial Chamber considers that a fair solution can be derived both from the object and purpose of the provisions of the Statute as well as the general concepts underlying the Statute, and from "the general principles of justice applied by jurists and practised by military courts" referred to by the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg.[964]

718. The following proposition commends itself as sound. If under the principles set out above a Trial Chamber finds that by a single act or omission the accused has perpetrated two offences under two distinct provisions of the Statute, and that the offences contain elements uniquely required by each provision, the Trial Chamber shall find the accused guilty on two separate counts. In that case the sentences consequent upon the convictions for the same act shall be served concurrently, but the Trial Chamber may aggravate the sentence for the more serious offence if it considers that the less serious offence committed by the same conduct significantly adds to the heinous nature of the prevailing offence, for instance because the less serious offence is characterised by distinct, highly reprehensible elements of its own (e.g. the use of poisonous weapons in conjunction with the more serious crime of genocide).

719. On the other hand, if a Trial Chamber finds under the principles set out above that by a single act or omission the accused has not perpetrated two offences under two distinct provisions of the Statute but only one offence, then the Trial Chamber will have to decide on the appropriate conviction for that offence only. For example, if the more specialised offence, e.g. genocide in the form of murder, is made out on the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, then a conviction should be recorded for that offence and not for the offence of murder as a war crime. In that case only one conviction will be recorded and only one sentence will be imposed.

(1) If the same act violates several criminal statutes or violates the same statute more than once, only one punishment may be imposed.
(2) If several criminal statutes have been violated, the punishment shall be determined by the statute which provides the most severe kind of punishment. It may not be any less severe than the other applicable statutes permit.

(c) Issues of Procedural Criminal Law

(i) The Power of the Prosecutor to Opt for Cumulative or Alternative Charges

720. In the light of the foregoing discussion, the Trial Chamber shall answer the query raised above regarding when the Prosecutor may present cumulative charges for the same act or transaction.

721. The approach currently adopted by the Prosecution creates an onerous situation for the Defence, on the grounds that the same facts are often cumulatively classified under different headings, very often -- as in the case at issue -- under two different heads (war crimes, and crimes against humanity), and in other cases before the Tribunal under three (or even possibly four) different heads. Admittedly, the Defence is made cognisant of the various classifications of the facts propounded by the Prosecution and is thus enabled to make its case. The fact remains, however, that the charges are made cumulatively and therefore placed on the same footing, even though the facts which allegedly infringe various provisions of the Statute may, legally speaking, violate only one provision.

722. Neither the Statute nor the Rules establish how the charges must be brought by the Prosecutor. Generally speaking, if under the principles set out above, the facts allegedly committed by the accused are in breach of only one provision of the Statute, the Prosecutor should present only one charge. If, in the Prosecutor's view, the alleged facts simultaneously infringe more than one provision of the Statute, the Prosecutor should present cumulative charges under each relevant provision.

723. In practice, however, the Prosecutor may legitimately fear that, if she fails to prove the required legal and factual elements necessary to substantiate a charge, the count may be dismissed even if in the course of the trial it has turned out that other elements were present supporting a different and perhaps even a lesser charge. As we shall see, at least for the time being it is questionable that the iura novit curia principle (whereby it is for a court of law to determine what relevant legal provisions are applicable and how facts should be legally classified) fully applies in international criminal proceedings. If this is so, the eventuality just described might indeed result in a dismissal of the charge.

724. The Trial Chamber holds that the issue must be settled in the light of two basic but seemingly conflicting requirements. There is first the requirement that the rights of the accused be fully safeguarded. The other requirement is that the Prosecutor be granted all the powers consistent with the Statute to enable her to fulfil her mission efficiently and in the interests of justice.

725. The former requirement demands among other things that the accused be "informed promptly and in detail [...] of the nature and cause of the charge against him" (Article 21 (4) (a) of the Statute). It follows that the accused is entitled to know the specifics of the charges against him, namely the facts of which he is accused and the legal classification of these facts. In particular, as far as this legal element is concerned, he must be put in a position to know the legal ingredients of the offence charged.

726. It follows from the latter requirement (that relating to the functions of the Prosecutor), that legal technicalities concerning classification of international offences should not be allowed to thwart the mission of the Prosecutor, which is to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law. The efficient fulfilment of the Prosecution's mission favours a system that is not hidebound by formal requirements of pleading in the indictment.

727. These requirements may be harmonised in the following manner.

The Prosecution:

(a) may make cumulative charges whenever it contends that the facts charged violate simultaneously two or more provisions of the Statute in accordance with the criteria discussed above;

(b) should charge in the alternative rather than cumulatively whenever an offence appears to be in breach of more than one provision, depending on the elements of the crime the Prosecution is able to prove. For instance, the Prosecution may characterise the same act as a crime against humanity and, in the alternative, as a war crime. Indeed, in case of doubt it is appropriate from a prosecutorial viewpoint to suggest that a certain act falls under a stricter and more serious provision of the Statute, adding however that if proof to this effect is not convincing, the act falls under a less serious provision. It may also prove appropriate to charge the indictee with a crime envisaged in a provision that is – at least in some respects - special vis-à-vis another (e.g. Article 4 of the Statute) and, in the alternative, with a violation of a broader provision (e.g. Article 2 or 3 of the Statute), so that if the evidence turns out to be insufficient with regard to the special provision (the lex specialis), it may still be found compelling with respect to a violation of the broader provision (the lex generalis). However the Prosecution should make clear that these are alternative formulations by use of the word "or" between the crimes against humanity and war crimes charges, for example, and refrain in these circumstances from using the word "and", to make clear the disjunctive and alternative nature of the charges being brought.

(c) should refrain as much as possible from making charges based on the same facts but under excessive multiple heads, whenever it would not seem warranted to contend, in line with the principles set out above in the section on the applicable law, that the same facts are simultaneously in breach of various provisions of the Statute.

(ii) The Obligations of the Prosecutor When She Decides to Change the Legal Classification of Facts in the Course of Trial and the Power of a Trial Chamber When it Disagrees with the Prosecutor's Legal Classification of the Facts.

728. Neither the Statute nor the Rules establish how Trial Chambers should act in the case of an erroneous legal classification of facts by the Prosecutor. In particular, no guidance is offered on how a Trial Chamber should proceed when certain legal ingredients of a charge have not been proved but the evidence shows that, if the facts were differently characterised, an international crime under the jurisdiction of the Tribunal would nevertheless have been perpetrated. Absent such guidance, and in view of the lack of any general principles of international criminal law on this matter, it may prove useful to establish how most national criminal systems regulate this matter. This examination serves the purpose of establishing whether principles of criminal law common to the major legal systems of the world exist on this matter.[965]

729. In two of the major common law jurisdictions - England and Wales, and the United States of America – there is a system of "lesser included offences" and "alternative verdicts" which establishes which offences need to be separately charged in the indictment and which offences are automatically considered as lesser alternatives (e.g. murder and manslaughter, robbery and theft).[966]

730. In England, the position is now largely governed by Statute. Section 6(3) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 reads:

[965] See Furundžija, Judgement, 10 Dec. 1998, paras. 177-178.

[966] See also, in this regard, the Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Zambia of 1 April 1934. Art. 181 of the Zambian Procedural Code, which deals with lesser included offences, provides as follows:

> (1) When a person is charged with an offence consisting of several particulars, a combination of some only of which constitutes a complete minor offence, and such combination is proved but the remaining particulars are not proved, he may be convicted of the minor offence although he was not charged with it;
> (2) When a person is charged with an offence and facts are proved which reduce it to a minor offence, he may be convicted of the minor offence although he was not charged with it.

A specific example of this is contained in Section 186(1) of the Zambian Code, which states that if a person is charged with rape and the court is of the opinion that he is not guilty of that offence but that he is guilty of, say, indecent assault, he may be convicted of that offence even though he was not charged with it. Additionally, Art. 213(1) provides that "[w]here, at any stage of a trial before the accused is required to make his defence, it appears to the court that the charge is defective either in substance or in form, the court may ... make such order for the alteration of the charge, either by way of amendment of the charge or by the substitution or addition of a new charge, as the court thinks necessary to meet the circumstances of the case". Where an alteration of a charge is made, Art. 213(3) obliges the court to allow for an adjournment if it is of the opinion that the accused may have been thereby "misled".

For similar provisions, see also Section 169 of the Nigerian Criminal Procedure Act 1958 and Section 219 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1963, whereby a court can convict an accused for an offence not charged if the evidence adduced supports a conviction on that charge and Sections 256-269 of the South African Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. In particular, Section 270 of this Act reads as follows:

> If the evidence on a charge for any offence not referred to in the preceding sections of this Chapter does not prove the commission of the offence so charged but proves the commission of an offence which by reason of the essential elements of that offence is included in the offence so charged, the accused may be found guilty of the offence so proved.

In practice, the effect of Section 270 is that a court can convict an accused only of lesser included offences, the essential elements of which must be included in the offence charged. (See S v. Mbatha 1982 (2) SA 145 (N); S v. Mei 1982 (1) SA 299 (O); S v. Mavundla 1980 (4) SA 187 (T); and S v. Nkosi 1990 (1) SACR 653 (T)).

> 6. – (3) Where, on a person's trial on indictment for any offence except treason or murder, the jury finds him not guilty of the offence specifically charged in the indictment, but the allegations in the indictment amount to or include (expressly or by implication) an allegation of another offence falling within the jurisdiction of the court of trial, the jury may find him guilty of that other offence or of an offence of which he could be found guilty on an indictment specifically charging that other offence.

731. As for murder, manslaughter is always available as an alternative verdict, and need not be charged in the indictment; likewise, under the common law (as opposed to statutory law) theft is always available as an alternative verdict to robbery, and so on for all lesser included offences. Treason – always treated as a unique crime – seems to be the only offence for which there is no possible alternative verdict.

732. It is worth noting that the Criminal Law Act 1967 would apply not only to "lesser included offences" but also to offences where the elements are different. For example, a person charged with rape could also be convicted of robbery if it is alleged in the indictment that he had also forcibly taken money from the rape victim. However, in these circumstances it would be preferable to amend the indictment to add the new count rather than for the Judge to give an oral direction as to the jury's powers under section 6(3) of the above act.[967] "Lesser included offences" are not the only alternative verdicts. Theft and handling of stolen goods are alternative verdicts, as it is not permissible for an accused to be convicted of both offences with respect to the same goods, but neither is a "lesser included" version of the other.[968] Likewise, indecent assault is an alternative to a charge of unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 – i.e. the prosecution does not need to charge indecent assault in the indictment – although neither offence is necessarily more serious than the other. In the United States of America, alternative verdicts for lesser included offences not charged in the indictment are possible under Rule 31(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.[969] There is an "elements test" for what constitutes a "lesser included offence".[970]

733. Broader powers are conferred on courts in most civil law countries, including the States of the former Yugoslavia.[971] Generally speaking, in these countries the principle iura novit curia (the court is expected and required to establish the law, while the facts must be proved by the parties) prevails. It follows that courts enjoy greater latitude in the determination of the applicable law than courts of common law countries. However, on close scrutiny it appears that in some civil law systems the powers of courts in the matter under discussion are more limited than in other systems. In short, in some countries the court may only reclassify, in the course of the trial, the facts of the case after duly warning the accused and enabling him to prepare his defence. Germany and Spain belong to this category. In other countries, such as France and Italy, courts may instead give a different legal characterisation of the facts from that propounded by the Prosecution, without necessarily advising the accused. This is permissible even in cases where the [969] Rule 31(1) of the US Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provides: "The defendant may be found guilty of an offense (sic) necessarily included in the offense charged or of an attempt to commit either the offense charged or an offense necessarily included therein if the attempt is an offense".

[970] Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705 (1989).

[971] Art. 272 of the 1985 SFRY Law on Criminal Procedure, dealing with pre-trial proceedings, provides that when making a ruling under Art. 269(3) and Arts. 270 and 271, the Chamber is not bound by the legal characterisation of the offence specified by the Prosecutor in the indictment. Arts. 269(3), 270 and 271 refer, respectively, to a finding that a criminal offence falls instead within the jurisdiction of another court (Art. 269(3)); a finding that the facts alleged does not comprise a criminal offence, that circumstances exist to preclude criminal culpability or that insufficient evidence exists to support the charge (Art. 270) and special cases, such as private prosecutions (Art. 271). Additionally, Art. 337(1) of the SFRY law permits a prosecutor to amend the indictment in the course of a hearing if the evidence presented "indicates that the factual situation outlined in the indictment has changed". In such circumstances, the court may adjourn the main hearing to allow the Defence to prepare (Art. 337(2)). Furthermore, in issuing its judgment, the court "shall not be bound by the legal characterisation of the act proposed by the prosecutor" (Art. 346(2)). This, in practice, has been interpreted to mean that the court may decide that the offence proved is either a more or a less serious offence than that charged if the factual circumstances outlined in the indictment so dictate. (See the commentary by Petrić (ed.), The Law on Criminal Procedure as Explained by the Case Law (Belgrade, 1983) at p. 198, concerning the equivalent and substantively identical provision in the earlier SFRY Code of 1976).
Art. 346(2) of the 1997 Law on Criminal Procedure of the Republic of Croatia is identical to its counterpart in the SFRY Law on Criminal Procedure. In addition, and with regard to Croatian pre-trial proceedings, Arts. 274(3), 275, 276, 277 and 341(1) and (2) of the Croatian Law on Criminal Procedure mirror Arts. 269(3), 270, 271, 272 and 337(1) and (2) of the SFRY Law on Criminal Procedure, considered above.

court eventually classifies the facts as a more serious offence than that charged by the Prosecution.

734. A brief survey of these legal systems may prove useful. In German law, changes in the legal characterisation of facts during the pre-trial or trial stage are dealt with under sections 206, 207 and 265 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[972] If the court deciding on the confirmation of the indictment is of the opinion that a different legal characterisation is warranted, the order confirming the indictment will contain a notice to that effect. The court is not bound by this notice if at the trial stage the judges change their minds. If the characterisation changes yet again during the trial, the accused must be given a warning by the court, except for where lesser included offences are concerned. The accused may then request an adjournment to prepare his defence. In the case of a mere change in the legal assessment of the otherwise unchanged facts, this adjournment is discretionary. The accused only has a right to an adjournment if the evidence at trial suggests new circumstances that would make the application of a more severe offence or sanction possible.[973]

735. In Spanish law, Article 653 of the Code of Criminal Procedure allows the Prosecution to charge in the alternative and especially reserves the parties' right to re-evaluate the offences after the evidence has been heard.[974] The law permits the presiding judge, where necessary, to ask the Prosecution and the Defence after the evidence has been presented whether they wish to amend their evaluations,[975] and if the Prosecution intends to charge a more serious offence than originally charged, Article 793 No. 7 LECrim gives the court a discretion to grant an adjournment to the Defence.[976] The court

[975] Ibid., Art. 793.
[976] A similar procedure applies in the recently established jury trial (tribunal del jurado) under Arts. 29 No. 3, 42 and 48 of the Ley Orgánica 5/1995, de 22 de mayo, del Tribunal del Jurado. Art. 733 LECrim empowers the court in extraordinary circumstances to give the parties a warning that the charges may qualify for different legal classification and to ask them to present their views on the matter. However, this is a rather exceptional procedure given the adversarial nature of the Spanish trial. It would appear, though, that under constitutional law the court is always required to give a warning under Art. 733 LECrim before must hand down its sentence regarding all the legal aspects of the facts proven and may thus in the ordinary trial proceedings find the accused guilty of any offence that he has been warned of under Article 733 LECrim, even though the Prosecution may not have amended its charges.[977]

736. A different approach is taken in France and Italy. In France, the case-law has established the principle whereby, as long as the facts alleged by the Prosecution remain the same, courts are empowered to legally characterise those same facts in a manner different from that suggested by the prosecution, and without giving any prior notice to the accused.[978] This would seem to entail, amongst other things, that the court is authorised to find that the crime of which the accused is guilty is more serious than that charged by the Prosecutor – again, on the condition that the facts charged remain the same.

737. In Italy, Article 521(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that "in its judgement the court may give a legal definition to the facts different from that set forth in the charge, as long as the crime is within the competence of that court". The following two paragraphs of the same provision envisage instead the possibility that the facts are changed in the course of trial. If the court establishes that the facts are different from those set out in the indictment, or if the Prosecutor sets forth a new charge, the court must return the file to the Prosecutor and enable the accused to prepare his defence. The case sentencing the accused on a more serious charge if the Prosecution does not address the issue, or risk having its verdict quashed on appeal in terms of Art. 851 No. 4 LECrim

[977] This follows from a comparison of Art. 742 LECrim, which applies to ordinary and jury trials, and Art. 794 No. 3 LECrim, which deals with the expedited procedure (procedimiento abreviado) applicable to certain classes of relatively minor offences. In these kinds of proceedings the court may not find the defendant guilty of any offence other than the one charged if the new offence protects a different interest or the verdict would lead to a substantial change in the acts tried (mutación sustancial del hecho enjuiciado). Art. 742 LECrim does not contain that restriction.

[978] According to the French Court of Cassation "il appartient aux juridictions correctionnelles de modifier la qualification des faits et de substituer une qualification nouvelle à celle sous laquelle ils leur étaient déférés", on condition, however, that facts are not changed (the new characterisation is admissible "à la condition qu'il ne soit rien changé ni ajouté aux faits de la prévention et que ceux-ci restent tels qu'ils ont été retenus dans l'acte de saisine".) (See Cass. Crim., 22 April 1986, in Bulletin Criminel, no. 136; see also Cass. Crim., 21 June 1989, in Bulletin Criminel, no. 267).

law has clearly inferred from these provisions that, whenever the facts remain the same, courts are not bound by the legal classification of those facts propounded by the prosecutor. Courts may even find that the crime perpetrated by the accused is more serious than the crime charged in the indictment.[979]

738. It is apparent from the above survey that no general principle of criminal law common to all major legal systems of the world may be found. It therefore falls to the Trial Chamber to endeavour to look for a general principle of law consonant with the fundamental features and the basic requirements of international criminal justice.

739. In this regard, two basic requirements – already referred to above – acquire paramount importance on account of the present status of international criminal law. One is the requirement that the rights of the accused be fully safeguarded. The other requirement is that the Prosecutor and, more generally, the International Tribunal be in a position to exercise all the powers expressly or implicitly deriving from the Statute, or inherent in their functions, that are necessary for them to fulfil their mission efficiently and in the interests of justice.

740. Turning to the former requirement, it must be emphasised again that at present, international criminal rules are still in a rudimentary state. They need to be elaborated and rendered more specific either by international law-making bodies or by international case law so as to gradually give rise to general rules. In this state of flux the rights of the accused would not be satisfactorily safeguarded were one to adopt an approach akin to that of some civil law countries. Were the Trial Chamber allowed to convict persons of a specific crime as well as any other crime based on the same facts, of whose commission the Trial Chamber might be satisfied at trial, the accused would not be able to prepare his defence with regard to a well-defined charge. The task of the defence would become exceedingly onerous, given the aforementioned uncertainties which still exist in international criminal law. Hence, even though the iura novit curia principle is normally applied in international judicial proceedings,[980] under present circumstances it would be inappropriate for this principle to be followed in proceedings before international criminal courts, where the rights of an individual accused are at stake. It would also violate Article 21(4)(a) of the Statute, which provides that an accused shall be informed "promptly and in detail" of the "nature and cause of the charge against him".

741. On the other hand, the other requirement relating to the efficient discharge of the Tribunal's functions in the interest of justice warrants the conclusion that any possible errors of the Prosecution should not stultify criminal proceedings whenever a case nevertheless appears to have been made by the Prosecution and its possible flaws in the formulation of the charge are not such as to impair or curtail the rights of the Defence.

742. A careful balancing of the two aforementioned requirements leads to the following conclusions:

(a) It may happen that, in the course of the trial, the Prosecutor finds that she has not proved beyond reasonable doubt the commission of the crime charged, but that a different offence, not charged in the indictment, has been proved which has different objective or subjective elements. For instance the Prosecutor may come to the conclusion that there is evidence of torture as a crime against humanity rather than rape as a crime against humanity; or of plunder of private property as a war crime instead of the attack of undefended dwellings or buildings as a war crime. She may consider that there is evidence of the extermination of civilians as a crime against

It would seem that the best definition of the principle is that given by the ICJ. in Fisheries (Jurisdiction):
"The Court [...], as an international judicial organ, is deemed to take judicial notice of international law and is therefore required [...] to consider on its own initiative all rules of international law which may be relevant to the settlement of the dispute. It being the duty of the Court itself to ascertain and apply the relevant law in the given circumstances of the case, the burden of establishing or proving rules of international law cannot be imposed upon any of the parties, for the law lies within the judicial knowledge of the Court". (ICJ Reports 1974, p. 181, para. 18).

humanity rather than of killing members of an ethnic group as genocide; or of unlawful deportation or transfer of civilians as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions instead of genocide taking the form of deliberately inflicting on an ethnic or religious group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or part. To such cases others can be assimilated. Consider for instance the case where the Prosecutor realises that the charge of committing crimes against humanity in the form of deportation or imprisonment cannot be proved, while the charge of aiding and abetting in the execution of this crime can be substantiated by sufficient evidence. In this case the modality of participation in the commission of the crime is different from (albeit perhaps less serious than) actual perpetration. In these cases the Prosecutor must request the Trial Chamber to be granted leave to amend the indictment so as to afford the Defence the opportunity to contest the charge.

(b) During the course of the trial, the Prosecutor may conclude that a more serious offence than that charged in the Indictment has been or may be proved. For instance, she considers that while the accused had been charged with a war crime consisting of killing civilians, in the course of trial evidence has been presented showing that he may be found guilty of genocide in the form of killing members of an ethnic or religious group with the intent to destroy that group, in whole or in part. Or she may consider that while the crime charged was a war crime consisting of causing inhuman treatment to civilians, evidence has been presented showing that the accused engaged in torture as a crime against humanity. Clearly, once again the Prosecutor must request leave to amend the Indictment, so as to avoid any jeopardy to the rights of the accused. Again, the accused must be put in a position to contest the charges and to this end he must be informed promptly and in detail of the "nature and cause of the charge against him" (Article 21(4)(a) of the Statute). The same concept applies to the Trial Chamber, should it consider that a more serious offence has been proved in court.

(c) The Prosecutor may conclude during the trial that a lesser included offence, not charged in the Indictment, may be or has been proved in court. For instance, she considers that the murder of civilians charged as a crime against humanity has not been made out for lack of proof of a widespread or systematic practice, while evidence is sufficient for proving that a war crime was committed, consisting of the murder of civilians. Or else she concludes that the charge of genocide consisting of the killing of members of an ethnic group cannot be proved for lack of the requisite intent to destroy in whole or in part, the group; by contrast, evidence may be produced proving that the killing of civilians may be charged as a war crime. Clearly, these are cases where the lex specialis invoked by the Prosecutor is found not to be applicable, whereas the lex generalis is still applicable.

743. If in these and similar cases the Prosecutor is or believes she is able to prove all the elements of a crime except for that which make up an additional element elevating the crime to a more serious category, she need not request leave to amend the Indictment. For the accused has been given the opportunity to contest all the elements of the crime charged. If one of the elements is lacking, this does not entail that the crime has not been committed, provided all the elements of a lesser included offence are proven. However, it would seem advisable that prompt notice be given by the Prosecutor to the Defence and the Trial Chamber that she proposes to submit that the lesser but not the greater offence has been committed, so that the acused may know the particulars of the case against him or her.

744. Let us apply the same criteria for the power, if any, of Trial Chambers to depart from the classification of the offence suggested by the Prosecutor.

745. If it is the Trial Chamber that concludes that the more serious offence has not been proved, it is sufficient for it to make this finding in its judgement, without ordering the Prosecutor to amend the Indictment. To give a practical example, an accused may be charged in an indictment with one count of murder as a crime against humanity. During the trial, it is conclusively proved that the accused committed the murder in circumstances that would characterise it as a war crime, but it is not proved that the crime was committed in the context of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population. In those circumstances the Trial Chamber could convict the accused of murder as a war crime, despite the fact that that crime has not been charged in the indictment.

746. Similarly, the Trial Chamber may conclude that the facts proven by the Prosecutor do not show that the accused is guilty of having perpetrated a war crime; they show instead that he aided and abetted the commission of the crime. In this case, the Trial Chamber may classify the offence in a manner different from that suggested by the Prosecutor, without previously notifying the Defence of the change in the nomen iuris. For the same reason the Trial Chamber may find that the accused, charged with perpetrating a murder as a crime against humanity, is instead guilty of participating in a common design to commit murder as a crime against humanity.

747. If instead the Trial Chamber finds in the course of trial that the evidence conclusively shows that the accused has committed a more serious crime than the one charged, it may call upon the Prosecutor to consider amending the indictment. Alternatively, it may decide to convict the accused of the lesser offence charged. The same course of action should be taken by the Trial Chamber in the event the Prosecutor should decide not to accede to the Trial Chamber's request that the indictment be amended.

748. Similarly, if the Trial Chamber finds in the course of trial that only a different offence can be held to have been proved, it should ask the Prosecutor to amend the indictment. If the Prosecutor does not comply with this request, the Trial Chamber shall have no choice but to dismiss the charge.

VI. LEGAL FINDINGS

A. General

749. In the course of this trial, the Trial Chamber has had to assess the involvement, if any, of the six accused and their potential culpability within a tragic episode of the armed conflict that raged in Bosnia and Herzegovina between 1992 and 1994. On 16 April 1993, in a matter of few hours, some 116 inhabitants, including women and children, of Ahmi}i, a small village in central Bosnia, were killed and about 24 were wounded; 169 houses and two mosques were destroyed. The victims were Muslim civilians. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, on the evidence before it in this case, that this was not a combat operation. Rather, it was a well-planned and well-organised killing of civilian members of an ethnic group, the Muslims, by the military of another ethnic group, the Croats. The primary purpose of the massacre was to expel the Muslims from the village, by killing many of them, by burning their houses and their livestock, and by illegally detaining and deporting the survivors to another area. The ultimate goal of these acts was to spread terror among the population so as to deter the members of that particular ethnic group from ever returning to their homes.

750. This tragedy carried out in a small village reflects in a microcosm the much wider tensions, conflicts and hatreds which have, since 1991, plagued the former Yugoslavia and caused so much suffering and bloodshed. In a matter of a few months, persons belonging to different ethnic groups, who used to enjoy good neighbourly relations, and who previously lived side by side in a peaceful manner and who once respected one another's different religious habits, customs and traditions, were transformed into enemies. Nationalist propaganda gradually fuelled a change in the perception and self-identification of members of the various ethnic groups. Gradually the "others", i.e. the members of other ethnic groups, originally perceived merely as "diverse", came instead to be perceived as "alien" and then as "enemy"; as potential threats to the identity and prosperity of one's group. What was earlier friendly neighbourly coexistence turned into persecution of those "others".

751. Persecution is one of the most vicious of all crimes against humanity. It nourishes its roots in the negation of the principle of the equality of human beings. Persecution is grounded in discrimination. It is based upon the notion that people who share ethnic, racial, or religious bonds different to those of a dominant group are to be treated as inferior to the latter. In the crime of persecution, this discriminatory intent is aggressively achieved by grossly and systematically trampling upon the fundamental human rights of the victim group. Persecution is only one step away from genocide – the most abhorrent crime against humanity - for in genocide the persecutory intent is pushed to its uttermost limits through the pursuit of the physical annihilation of the group or of members of the group. In the crime of genocide the criminal intent is to destroy the group or its members; in the crime of persecution the criminal intent is instead to forcibly discriminate against a group or members thereof by grossly and systematically violating their fundamental human rights. In the present case, according to the Prosecution - and this is a point on which the Trial Chamber agrees - the killing of Muslim civilians was primarily aimed at expelling the group from the village, not at destroying the Muslim group as such. This is therefore a case of persecution, not of genocide.

752. The fact that in this area of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the armed conflict frequently took the form of persecution is vividly depicted in the words of one Muslim woman mentioned by one of the witnesses in this trial. "I do not fear the shells and bombs that may fall on my house," she said. "They do not ask for my name. I fear the foot soldiers who break into my house and kill and wound in a very personal way and commit atrocities in front of the children". The main target of these attacks was the very identity – the very humanity – of the victim.

753. The "personal violence" most feared by this Muslim woman is that which is carried out against other human beings solely upon the basis of their ethnic, religious or political affiliation. It is persecutory violence.

754. The massacre carried out in the village of Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 comprises an individual yet appalling episode of that widespread pattern of persecutory violence. The tragedy which unfolded that day carried all the hallmarks of an ancient tragedy. For one thing, it possessed unity of time, space and action. The killing, wounding and burning took place in the same area, within a few hours and was carried out by a relatively small groups of members of the Bosnian Croatian military forces: the HVO and the special units of the Croatian Military Police, the so-called Jokers. Over the course of the several months taken up by these trial proceedings, we have seen before us, through the narration of the victims and the survivors, the unfolding of a great tragedy. And just as in the ancient tragedies where the misdeeds are never shown but are only recounted by the actors, numerous witnesses have told the Trial Chamber of the human tragedies which befell so many of the ordinary inhabitants of that small village.

755. Indisputably, what happened on 16 April 1993 in Ahmi}i has gone down in history as comprising one of the most vicious illustrations of man's inhumanity to man. Today, the name of that small village must be added to the long list of previously unknown hamlets and towns that recall abhorrent misdeeds and make us all shudder with horror and shame: Dachau, Oradour sur Glâne, Katijn, Marzabotto, Soweto, My Lai, Sabra and Shatila, and so many others.

756. To be sure, the primary task of this Trial Chamber was not to construct a historical record of modern human horrors in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The principal duty of the Trial Chamber was simply to decide whether the six defendants standing trial were guilty of partaking in this persecutory violence or whether they were instead extraneous to it and hence, not guilty.

757. At the end of the trial, we have come to the conclusion that, with the possible exception of one of the accused, this Trial Chamber has not tried the major culprits, those most responsible for the massacre of 16 April 1993, those who ordered and planned, and those who carried out the very worst of the atrocities against innocent civilians.

758. We thus had to confine ourselves to the six persons accused by the Prosecutor before our Trial Chamber, to determine whether and to what extent they participated in the crimes perpetrated in Ahmi}i. Our task has not been easy. More than six years after those events – events that occurred far away from The Hague – we have had to shoulder the heavy burden of establishing incredible facts by means of credible evidence.

759. We have now accomplished our arduous task and our findings, on the evidence before us, are as follows.

B. Existence of an Armed Conflict

760. The attack on Ahmi}i was undertaken as part of the beginning of the Croat-Muslim war and is thus sufficiently closely related to an armed conflict. The attack was not a single or unauthorised event brought about by rogue factions of the HVO or the Military Police. It was part of an overall campaign in the La{va River Valley, intended to bring about "ethnic cleansing" through a systematic and widespread attack as a pre-condition of unrestricted Croat dominance over the area, promoted or at least condoned by the HVO and Military Police, and more generally, by the leadership of Croatia.

The reason for this forced expulsion was the achievement of territorial homogeneity by the Croats. The Muslims were identified as the group that was to be expelled.

C. The Persecutory Nature of the Croatian Attack on Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 - Ahmi}i as an undefended village

761. The entirety of the evidence brought before the Trial Chamber shows that the attack by the Croats was a planned and highly organised operation. The use of different classes of heavy weaponry such as rocket launchers and anti-aircraft guns proves that it was not only an operation by a special purpose unit like the Jokers, who did not dispose of such an arsenal, but that the HVO as a professional army was itself actively involved in the attack. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that there were no significant military units or installations of the BiH present in the area of the village at the time of the attack, but that the HVO and Military Police actually exploited the absence of the BiH for a surprise attack on the village.

762. The Trial Chamber also finds beyond reasonable doubt that the attack was not a military combat operation such as a pre-emptive defensive strike against a threat of Muslim armed aggression. On the contrary, the aim of the attack was the forced expulsion of the Muslim population from the area, as from the entire La{va River Valley. The attack was carried out in an indescribably cruel manner, sparing not even the lives of women and small children. The many bodies of civilians found in the village after the attack, especially those of very young children, the wholesale destruction of Muslim - and only of Muslim – houses and even the destruction of the livestock of the Muslim families, do not match the picture the Defence tried to paint, which was that of a military battle between two armies. In such a case it would have been highly improbable that it was almost exclusively Muslim persons who were killed and Muslim houses destroyed. In a pitched battle between two armies the so-called collateral damage on both sides would have been divided more evenly. Nor does the concept of a military combat engagement accord with the fact that the houses of Muslim civilians were broken into and the male members of military age pulled out and executed. Above all the intentional killing of children, at least one of which was only three months old, cannot be reconciled with the view that this was an action demanded and guided by strategic or tactical necessities. In sum, the damage and harm inflicted by the Croats on the Muslim civilian population was not collateral; it was the primary purpose of the attack.

763. The herding together of the Muslims, who had survived the killing and shooting, during and after the attack, and their ensuing detention at places such as the Dubravica school, underlines the Croatian objective of making sure that no Muslim was left free to live in the village. The systematic burning of the Muslim houses is proof of a "scorched-earth" policy on the part of the Croatians, done in order to further the aim that, as one witness put it, "no Muslim foot shall tread this soil".

764. The Defence's claim that Ahmi}i was not an undefended village must thus be rejected as completely unfounded.

D. Irrelevance of Similar Conduct by Muslims against Croats in Other Villages

765. As pointed out above in the section on the applicable law, in international law there is no justification for attacks on civilians carried out either by virtue of the tu quoque principle (i.e. the argument whereby the fact that the adversary is committing similar crimes offers a valid defence to a belligerent's crimes) or on the strength of the principle of reprisals. Hence the accused cannot rely on the fact that allegedly there were also atrocities committed by Muslims against Croatian civilians.

E. The Accused

1. Dragan Papi}

766. Dragan Papi} was charged under count 1 with persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute.

767. The accused Dragan Papi} was mobilised in the HVO during some of the time relevant to this indictment although his precise role is not clear. He wore a uniform and carried a rifle in the village. In relation to the armed conflict on 20 October 1992, the Prosecution relies on one crucial witness, Mehmed Ahmi}, who identified the accused as shooting from his house early in the morning and firing an anti-aircraft machine gun in the afternoon. This witness's evidence is not accepted by the Trial Chamber. That the accused participated in the armed conflict that day has not been proved

768. In relation to the armed conflict on 16 April 1993, the Trial Chamber does not find that it can rely on the evidence of Witness G. Witness G was an honest witness who had been through a dreadful ordeal on 16 April. However, he was under the most stressful conditions imaginable and there must be some doubt about the accuracy of his identification of Dragan Papi}. None of the remaining Prosecution evidence is sufficient to establish that Dragan Papi} was an active participant in the conflict.

769. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that there is reasonable doubt as to whether Dragan Papi} participated in the conflict that day, and accordingly finds the accused not guilty under count 1.

2. Zoran Kupre{ki}

(a) Count 1

770. The accused, together with his brother Mirjan Kupre{ki}, was charged with persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1 of the indictment.

771. The Trial Chamber has defined the actus reus of persecution under Article 5(h) of the Statute as the gross or blatant denial, on discriminatory grounds, of a fundamental right, laid down in international customary or treaty law, reaching the same level of gravity as the other acts prohibited in Article 5 of the Statute. As a crime against humanity the common prerequisites of a link with an armed conflict, a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population in furtherance of a systematic policy, and the grave nature of the offences also apply. The requisite mens rea is the intent to discriminate, to attack persons on account of their racial or religious characteristics or political affiliation as well as knowledge of the widespread or systematic nature of the attack on civilians.

772. The mode of participation in the wider sense under Article 7(1) of the Statute and as charged in the indictment is either direct commission by the accused, i.e. as the sole perpetrator or as a co-perpetrator, or as an aider and abettor. The definition for both categories was recently given by the Appeals Chamber in its Judgement in Tadi} of 15 July 1999.[981] Co-perpetration requires a plurality of persons, the existence of a common plan, design or purpose which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided for in the Statute and participation of the accused in the common design.

As far as mens rea is concerned, what is required is the intent to perpetrate a certain crime as the shared intent on the part of all co-perpetrators. An aider and abettor as opposed to a principal perpetrator carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain crime; this support must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. The requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of a specific crime by the principal.

773. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the accused was an active member of the HVO. Zoran Kupreški} was a local HVO Commander and his activities were not limited to assigning village guard duties. Zoran Kupreški} took part in the oath-taking ceremony and was present on duty on the front line as stated by Witness JJ in her testimony. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness B and Abdulah Ahmi} in relation to the negotiations for the return of the Muslims after the conflict of 20 October and finds that Zoran Kupreški}'s role in these negotiations was more active than he himself admitted. Finally, the Trial Chamber notes that Zoran Kupreški}, as a reserve officer and in charge of a maintenance unit at work, was used to the exercise of authority. The accused did know of the planned attack on the village the next morning, for which preparations were already under way, and was ready to play a part in it.

774. With regard to the alleged participation of the accused in murder and arson at the house of Witness KL on 16 April 1993, the Trial Chamber has already analysed that witness's evidence and found it wanting in credibility. Thus, there is no reliable evidence that the accused, together with his brother Mirjan, participated in the crimes at the house of Witness KL. The Trial Chamber, having heard the evidence of Jozo Alilovi}, is not satisfied as to the accuracy of Witness C's identification of the accused, given the stressful conditions under which it was made and the appalling ordeal to which the young Witness C had been subjected.

775. As to the murders and arson at the house of Suhret Ahmi}, the Trial Chamber has already analysed the evidence of Witness H, and is in no doubt that she was a truthful and accurate witness of events on 16 April. The Trial Chamber places no reliance on the statements of Witness SA.

776. Zoran Kupre{ki}, together with his brother Mirjan Kupreški}, was in the house of Suhret Ahmi} immediately after he and Meho Hrstanovi} were shot and immediately before the house was set on fire, as part of the group of soldiers who carried out the attack.

777. The Trial Chamber accepts that Zoran Kupreški} admitted to Witness JJ that the Jokers had been firing on fleeing civilians and that under threat, he himself had fired into the air.

778. The Trial Chamber rejects the evidence of the accused and his witnesses to the effect that he took no part in the crimes alleged and was elsewhere when they took place.

779. In summary, the Trial Chamber concludes that Zoran Kupre{ki}, together with his brother Mirjan, participated in the attack on Ahmi}i on 16 April 1993 as a soldier in the HVO. Zoran Kupre{ki}, together with his brother Mirjan Kupre{ki}, was present as an attacker on that day and actively involved in the events. It can be safely inferred that he also provided local knowledge to the HVO and Military Police not familiar with the situation of the village, and entered the house and expelled the family of Suhret Ahmi}. Zoran Kupreški}, as the local HVO Commander, played the more leading role.

780. On the basis of his participation in the events from October 1992 until 16 April 1993, as outlined above, the Trial Chamber finds that the accused attacked his Muslim neighbours solely due to their ethnicity and with the aim of cleansing the village of any Muslim inhabitants.

781. The accused, together with his brother Mirjan, in a gross and blatant manner denied his Muslim fellow citizens their fundamental rights to life, freedom of movement and free enjoyment of their family life and property, all against the background of numerous killings, woundings etc. committed by the HVO and the Military Police. His actions and their consequences are of such a heinous nature that there can be no dispute that they match in gravity the other offences commonly included under Article 5 of the Statute. The civilian character of the victims cannot seriously be called into question.

782. The accused acted as a co-perpetrator, together with his brother Mirjan Kupre{ki}, within the meaning of Article 7(1) of the Statute, because he adhered to a common plan for the execution of the cleansing campaign in the village, which by necessity was a highly coordinated effort and required full prior knowledge of the intended activities and subordination to a common plan of action.

783. There can be no doubt on the basis of the circumstances proven that the accused was aware of the wider background to the attack mentioned above, especially with respect to the connection with the beginning of a large-scale armed conflict against the BiH, and that the main if not sole motivation for his participation was the forced expulsion of Muslims from the La{va River Valley region, thus displaying a clear discriminatory intent. From this it follows that the accused was aware that he would not engage in a battle between military units, but would be attacking helpless and unprepared civilians.

784. Accordingly the Trial Chamber finds Zoran Kupre{ki} guilty of persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1 of the indictment.

(b) Counts 2 - 11

785. The accused, together with his brother Mirjan Kupre{ki}, was charged with murder, inhumane acts as crimes against humanity under Article 5(a), (i) and cruel treatment under Article 3 of the Statute in connection with Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions under counts 2 – 11 of the indictment.

786. As to these counts, pertaining to the attack on the family of Witness KL, the Trial Chamber finds on the basis of the evidence before it, as set out above, that it is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was present at the scene of the crime and thus cannot draw any inference as to his possible participation in these events.

787. The Trial Chamber thus finds the accused Zoran Kupre{ki} not guilty with regard to counts 2 – 11.

3. Mirjan Kupre{ki}

(a) Count 1

788. The accused, together with his brother Zoran Kupre{ki}, was charged with persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1 of the indictment.

789. Mirjan Kupreški} was an active member of the HVO. This finding is based on the HVO Register and is to be inferred from his activities on 16 April 1993 described above under the heading of his brother Zoran.

790. With regard to his involvement in the activities from October 1992 until 16 April 1993, the Trial Chamber refers to the facts set out above with regard to his brother, Zoran Kupre{ki}. They were all committed together with the accused Mirjan Kupre{ki} and thus apply mutatis mutandis to him. The same is true for the requisite mens rea of the accused.

791. Accordingly the Trial Chamber finds Mirjan Kupre{ki} guilty of persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1 of the indictment.

(b) Counts 2 - 11

792. The accused, together with his brother Zoran, was charged with murder, inhumane acts as crimes against humanity under Article 5(a), (i) and cruel treatment under Article 3 of the Statute in connection with Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions under counts 2 – 11 of the indictment.

793. As to these counts, pertaining to the attack on the family of Witness KL, the Trial Chamber finds on the basis of the evidence before it, as set out above, that it is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was present at the scene of the crime and thus cannot draw any inference as to his possible participation in the events.

794. The Trial Chamber finds the accused Mirjan Kupre{ki} not guilty with regard to counts 2 – 11.

4. Vlatko Kupre{ki}

(a) Count 1

795. Under count 1 the accused was charged with persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute.

796. Prior to the conflict this accused was on good terms with Muslims and displayed no nationalist or ethnic prejudice. In 1992-1993, Vlatko Kupreški} was a member of the police, namely an "Operations Officer for the Prevention of Crimes of Particular State Interest", with the rank of Inspector 1st Class. The accused was not merely concerned to make inventories of supplies for the police, as he instead claims. He was unloading weapons from a car in front of his house in October 1992 and April 1993 and was again seen there on the afternoon of 15 April 1993.

797. With regard to the evidence of the accused that he did not return to Ahmi}i on 15 April until the evening when he got back from the trip to Split, the Trial Chamber accepts the prosecution evidence that he was seen in Ahmi}i during the morning of 15 April, at the Hotel Vitez and during the afternoon and in the early evening in the vicinity of soldiers who were at his house.

798. The Trial Chamber also accepts the testimony given by the prosecution witnesses in relation to the troop activity in and around the accused's house on the evening of 15 April, which is also confirmed by the entry in Witness V's diary recording that he learned that evening that the Croats were concentrating around the Kupreški} houses.

799. Vlatko Kupreški} was involved in the preparations for the attack on Ahmi}i in his role as police operations officer and as a resident of the village. He allowed his house to be used for the purposes of the attack and as a place for the troops to gather the night before.

800. With regard to the shooting of the Pezer family, those responsible for these crimes were a group of soldiers standing in front of Vlatko Kupreški}'s house. However, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that Vlatko Kupreški} was among them. Only one witness identified the accused, Witness Q, at a distance of over 50 metres: a distance at which a witness is as likely to be mistaken as not. In the absence of confirmation of the correctness of this identification the Trial Chamber is not able to be sure that it is correct. That Vlatko Kupreški} was present when these crimes were committed is thus not proven.

801. The other evidence relating to the presence of the accused during the armed conflict was that given by Witness H, of the accused being in the vicinity of Suhret Ahmi}'s house at about 5.45 a.m., and shortly after the latter was murdered. The Trial Chamber finds that this identification was correct and that Vlatko Kupreški} was in the vicinity shortly after the attack on Suhret Ahmi}'s house. There is no further evidence as to what the accused was doing there, but he was present, ready to lend assistance in whatever way he could to the attacking forces, for instance by providing local knowledge.

802. The evidence of the accused and his witnesses as to his non-participation in the conflict is not credible.

803. Vlatko Kupre{ki} helped prepare and supported the attack carried out by the other accused, the HVO and Military Police, by unloading weapons in his store and by agreeing to the use of his house as a strategic point and staging area for the attacking troops. His role is thus not quite as prominent as that of the other accused, which is why the Trial Chamber finds that he merely supported the actions of the others, conduct which must be subsumed under aiding and abetting and not under co-perpetration. The accused had the requisite mens rea, as he was aware that his actions would substantially and effectively assist the attackers in their activities, that he would help them in carrying out their mission of cleansing Ahmi}i of its Muslim inhabitants. He also knew that the attack would not be a battle between soldiers, but that the Muslim civilians of his own village would be targeted.

804. Accordingly the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty under count 1 of aiding and abetting persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5 (h) of the Statute.

(b) Counts 12 – 15

805. Under counts 12 – 15, the accused was charged with murder and inhumane acts as crimes against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) and (i) of the Statute, and with murder and cruel treatment as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute in connection with Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions.

806. With respect to these counts, the Trial Chamber finds that it cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was present at the scene of the crime, and cannot draw any inference as to his involvement in the events.

807. The Trial Chamber therefore finds the accused not guilty with regard to counts 12 to 15.

5. Drago Josipovi}

(a) Count 1

808. The accused, together with Vladimir [anti}, was charged under count 1 with persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute.

809. Drago Josipovi} was a member of the HVO prior to 16 April 1993; he was a member of the village guard and was seen in the village in uniform and with a rifle.

810. As to the direct participation of the accused in the conflict on 16 April 1993, the Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness EE, who identified him, together with the accused Vladimir [anti}, as a participant in the attack on her house when her husband was murdered. The Trial Chamber finds that Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the Pu{ćul house: he was part of the group of soldiers who attacked and burned the house and murdered Musafer Pu{ćul.

811. Drago Josipovi} also participated in the attack on the house of Nazif Ahmi} in which Nazif and his 14 year old son were killed. This was not charged as a separate count in the indictment, nor did the Prosecutor request after the commencement of the trial to be granted leave to amend the indictment so as to afford the Defence the opportunity to contest the charge. Consequently, in light of the principle set out above in the part on the applicable law, these facts cannot be taken into account by the Trial Chamber as forming the basis for a separate and specific charge. They constitute, however, relevant evidence for the charge of persecution. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that Witness DD accurately identified the accused, and that the witness accurately described the role played by the accused in the attack and that he was, in fact, in a position of command with regard to the troops involved.

812. Having heard the evidence of Witness CB, the Trial Chamber is, however, not satisfied that Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the house of Fahran Ahmi}. The Trial Chamber accepts the evidence of Witness Z concerning the presence of the accused leading soldiers near the Ogrjev plant on the afternoon of 16 April.

813. The Trial Chamber rejects the evidence put forward by Drago Josipovi} of him spending the day moving around the locality to very little apparent purpose. The truth is that he was armed and active, playing his full part in the attacks on his neighbours, sometimes having command over a group of soldiers.

814. The Trial Chamber concludes therefore that Drago Josipovi} participated in the murder of Musafer Pu{ćul, participated in the attack on the house of Nazif Ahmi} and was actively involved in the burning of private property. On this basis, the Trial Chamber finds that the accused, together with Vladimir [anti}, was present at the scene of the crime as part of a group that went to the house with the common intent to kill and/or expel its inhabitants and to set it on fire. He did this solely because the victims were Muslims, for the same reasons set out above with respect to Mirjan and Zoran Kupre{ki}. The accused was aware that he would be attacking unarmed and helpless civilians, and that this attack was part of the beginning of a large-scale campaign of "ethnic cleansing" of Muslims from the La{va River Valley.

815. These actions fulfil the requirements of persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute.

816. The Trial Chamber therefore finds the accused guilty of persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1.

(b) Counts 16 - 19

817. The accused was charged under counts 16 to 19 with murder and other inhumane acts as crimes against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) and (i) of the Statute, as well as murder and cruel treatment as violations of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute in connection with Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions.

818. Murder under Article 5(a) of the Statute comprises the death of the victim as a result of the acts or omissions of the accused. Moreover, the conduct of the accused must be a substantial cause of the death of the victim. The offence requires the intent to kill or the intent to inflict serious injury in reckless disregard of human life. Inhumane acts under Article 5(i) of the Statute are intentional acts or omissions which infringe fundamental human rights causing serious mental or physical suffering or injury of a gravity comparable to that of other crimes covered by Article 5.

819. The accused, even though he may not himself have killed Musafer Pu{ćul, by his active presence in the group, together with Vladimir [anti}, has fulfilled the actus reus of murder as a co-perpetrator. The same applies for the suffering caused to the family by being forced to witness the murder of Musafer Pu{ćul, being expelled from their family home and having their home destroyed. These acts clearly constitute the actus reus of other inhumane acts.

820. Drago Josipovi}, as may be safely inferred from his actions, had the requisite intent both for murder and inhumane acts. He knew that the inhabitants of that house were going to be killed, and if not killed then at least expelled and their house burned down. That witnessing the death of a loved one and the loss of the family home would cause serious mental suffering was equally obvious to the accused when he embarked upon his crimes. He also acted in pursuance of a common design together with the accused Vladimir [anti}. This is borne out by his actions described under count 1. The accused also had the requisite mens rea.

821. As stated above with regard to multiple charges in the part on the applicable law, Article 5(a) and (i), as crimes against humanity, protect different values and interests and may be charged cumulatively. This also applies to charging these acts under Article 5(h) as persecution.

822. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the accused guilty of murder and other inhumane acts as crimes against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) and (i) of the Statute under counts 16 and 18.

823. By contrast, the Trial Chamber finds that counts 17 and 19 were improperly charged cumulatively with the more serious offences under Article 5 of the Statute. As pointed out above in the part on the applicable law, Article 3 of the Statute, as far as murder and cruel treatment are concerned, protects the same interests as Article 5(a) and (i). However, while murder as a crime against humanity requires proof of elements that murder as a war crime does not require (the offence must be part of a systematic or widespread attack on the civilian population), this is not reciprocated. As a result, the two offences are not in a relationship of reciprocal speciality. The prohibition of murder as a crime against humanity is lex specialis in relation to the prohibition of murder as a war crime and must therefore prevail.

824. For reasons of law, the Trial Chamber therefore finds the accused not guilty with regard to counts 17 and 19.

6. Vladimir [anti}

825. The accused, together with Drago Josipovi}, was charged under count 1 with persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute

826. Vladimir Šanti} in April 1993 was the commander of the 1st Company of the 4th Battalion of the Military Police. He was also Commander of the Jokers.

827. As was described with respect to the accused Drago Josipovi}, Vladimir [anti}, together with the latter, participated in the murder of Musafer Pu{ćul and the burning of his house. In addition, from his position as a company commander of the Military Police and commander of the Jokers, it can be safely inferred that he passed on the orders of his superiors to his men, and his presence on the scene of the attack also served as an added encouragement for his subordinates to abide by the orders they had received.

828. The Trial Chamber refers to the facts and the law explained above with respect to the accused Drago Josipovi}. They apply mutatis mutandis to the accused Vladimir [anti}.

829. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the accused guilty of persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute under count 1.

(a) Counts 16 – 19

830. Under counts 16 to 19, the accused, together with Drago Josipovi}, was charged with murder and other inhumane acts as crimes against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) and (i) of the Statute, as well as murder and cruel treatment as violations of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute in connection with Common Article 3(1)(a) of the Geneva Conventions.

831. The Trial Chamber refers to the facts and the law set out above with respect to the accused Drago Josipovi}. They apply mutatis mutandis to the accused Vladimir [anti}.

832. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the accused guilty of murder and other inhumane acts as crimes against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) and (i) of the Statute under counts 16 and 18.

833. For reasons of law, the Trial Chamber therefore finds the accused not guilty with regard to counts 17 and 19.

VII. SENTENCING

A. Introduction

834. The Trial Chamber will proceed to sentence each of the accused pursuant to the findings of guilt pronounced.

835. The Prosecutor made submissions regarding sentence in her Closing Brief, filed on 5 November 1999, as well as oral submissions in the hearing of 9 November 1999. Written submissions on sentencing were made on behalf of the following accused: Zoran Kupre{ki},[982] Dragan Papi},[983] Mirjan Kupre{ki},[984] Vladimir Šanti}[985] and Drago Josipovi}.[986] No express written submissions on sentencing were made on behalf of Vlatko Kupre{ki}.[987] No oral submissions were made on behalf of any of the accused.[988]

B. Sentencing Provisions

836. The Statute and the Rules contain certain provisions relating to sentencing that are to be considered by the Trial Chamber.

837. Article 23 ("Judgement") of the Statute provides that "[t]he Trial Chambers shall pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties on persons convicted of serious violations of international humanitarian law". Article 24 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence deal with the penalties a Trial Chamber may impose.

838. Read together, Article 24 and Rule 101, as supplemented by Rule 85(A)(vi), allow for factors other than those expressly mentioned to be considered when determining the proper sentences to be imposed.

C. Factors to be Considered in Sentencing

1. SFRY Criminal Code Provisions

839. Pursuant to Article 24(1) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber "shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia" in determining the terms of imprisonment. Rule 101(B) also requires the Trial Chamber to "take into account" such general practice.

840. It is clear from these provisions - in particular the phrase "have recourse to" and "take into account" - that the Trial Chamber is not bound to follow the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia. Reference should be made to the said sentencing practice as an aid in determining the sentences to be imposed by the Trial Chamber.

841. In general terms, Article 41 ("General principles in determining punishment") of the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ("SFRY Criminal Code") sets out the various factors to be taken into account in determining sentence.[989] This Article is essentially similar to the sentencing provisions of the Statute and the Rules of the International Tribunal.

842. Articles 38, 48 and 142 of the SFRY Criminal Code should also be considered. Article 38 ("Imprisonment") of the SFRY Criminal Code reads in part:

[989] In particular, Art. 41(1) of the SFRY Criminal Code provides: "The court shall weigh the punishment to be imposed on the perpetrator of a criminal offence within the legal limits of the punishment for that offence, bearing in mind the purpose of punishment and taking into consideration all the circumstances which influence the severity of the punishment (mitigating and aggravating circumstances), and in particular: the degree of criminal responsibility; motives for the commission of the offence; the severity of threat or injury to the protected value; circumstances of the commission of the offence; the perpetrator's previous conduct; the perpetrator's personal circumstances and his behaviour subsequent to the commission of the offence; as well as other circumstances relating to the perpetrator".

> (1) The punishment of imprisonment may not be shorter than 15 days nor longer than 15 years.
> (2) The court may impose a punishment of imprisonment for a term of 20 years for criminal acts eligible for the death penalty.
>
> (3) For premeditated criminal acts for which the punishment of fifteen years imprisonment may be imposed under statute, and which were perpetrated under particularly aggravating circumstances or caused especially grave consequences, a punishment of imprisonment for a term of 20 years may be imposed when so provided by statute.

> (6) A convicted person who has served half of his term of imprisonment, and exceptionally a convicted person who has served a third of his term, may be excused from serving the rest of his term on the condition that he does not commit a new criminal act by the end of the period encompassed by his sentence.

Capital punishment was abolished by constitutional amendment in 1977 in some of the republics of the SFRY other than Bosnia and Herzegovina. Since then, the maximum sentence has been 20 years imprisonment.[990] A 20 year prison sentence may only be imposed for the most serious types of criminal offences.[991]

843. Article 48 ("Combination of criminal acts") of the SFRY Criminal Code deals with the question of punishment of offenders found guilty of several offences.[992]

(2). The single sentence shall be imposed according to the following rules:
i) if the death penalty was determined for one of the concurrent criminal offences, only that sentence shall be imposed;
ii) if a sentence of twenty years imprisonment was determined for one of the concurrent criminal offences, only that sentence shall be imposed;

844. Chapter Sixteen of the SFRY Criminal Code is entitled "Criminal Acts Against Humanity and International Law". Article 142(1) ("War crimes against the civilian population") of the SFRY Criminal Code falls within the said Chapter, and it provides the following:

> Whosoever, in violation of rules of international law effective at the time of war, armed conflict or occupation, orders an attack on civilian populations, an inhabited area, individual civilian persons or persons hors de combat which results in death, serious injury or serious deterioration of health [... or], causing immense suffering or a violation of bodily integrity or health; displacement or resettlement [...]; forcible prostitution or rape; introduction of measures of intimidation and terror, [...], imposing collective punishment, [...]; confiscation of property, plunder of property belonging to the civilian population, unlawful and arbitrary destruction or large-scale appropriation of property not justified by military necessity, [...] or whosoever commits any of the foregoing acts, shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than five years or by the death penalty.

845. As has been held in the Tadi} Sentencing Judgement, this Article gives effect in the former Yugoslavia to the provisions of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of 12 August 1949 and its Protocols, which is incorporated into the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal by Article 2 ("Grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949") of the Statute.[993] There appear to be no provisions of the SFRY Criminal Code which give specific effect to those crimes against humanity referred to in Article 5 ("Crimes against humanity") of the Statute. However, genocide, itself a specific category of crime against humanity, is dealt with in Article 141 of the SFRY Criminal Code.[994] Article 141 also prescribes imprisonment for not less than five years or the death penalty. Further, Article 154 of the SFRY Criminal

iv) if sentences of up to three years imprisonment were determined for all concurrent criminal offences, the single sentence may not exceed eight years of imprisonment.

Code deals with racial and other discrimination, which, in some respects, could be said to relate to the counts on persecution as a crime against humanity. Article 154(1) reads as follows:

> Whoever on the basis of distinction of race, colour, nationality or ethnic background violates basic human rights and freedoms recognized by the international community, shall be punished by imprisonment for a term exceeding six months but not exceeding five years.

846. As has already been made clear, the provisions of the SFRY Criminal Code serve as a guide. In particular, the Trial Chamber is not bound to impose a maximum sentence of 20 years imprisonment only. According to Rule 101, the Trial Chamber may impose a sentence of life imprisonment.

847. Article 33 of the SFRY Criminal Code provides for three reasons for the imposition of sentences, namely,

> (1) preventing the offender from committing criminal acts and his rehabilitation;
>
> (2) deterrent effect upon others not to commit criminal acts;
> (3) [...] influence on the development of the citizens' social responsibility and discipline.

2. General Sentencing Policy of the International Tribunal

848. The Trial Chamber is of the view that, in general, retribution and deterrence are the main purposes to be considered when imposing sentences in cases before the International Tribunal. As regards the former, despite the primitive ring that is sometimes associated with retribution,[995] punishment for having violated international humanitarian law is, in light of the serious nature of the crimes committed, a relevant and important consideration. As to the latter, the purpose is to deter the specific accused as well as others, which means not only the citizens of Bosnia and Herzegovina but persons worldwide from committing crimes in similar circumstances against international humanitarian law.[996] The Trial Chamber is further of the view that another relevant sentencing purpose is to show the people of not only the former Yugoslavia, but of the world in general, that there is no impunity for these types of crimes. This should be done in order to strengthen the resolve of all involved not to allow crimes against international humanitarian law to be committed as well as to create trust in and respect for the developing system of international criminal justice.

849. The Trial Chamber also supports the purpose of rehabilitation for persons convicted in the hope that in future, if faced with similar circumstances, they will uphold the rule of law.

3. Factors Relevant to Sentencing in Respect of Each Accused

850. The Trial Chamber will next consider the various factors which influence the determination of appropriate sentences for each accused convicted, in accordance with the provisions of Article 24 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

(a) Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki}

851. Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have been found guilty on Count 1 (persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute).

852. The sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime. Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have been found guilty of persecution in the form of the expulsion of Muslim civilians, including women and children from Ahmi}i-[anti}i and its environs, the destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property and their active presence in the area whilst armed. In particular, they entered the house and expelled the family of Suhret Ahmi}. This is in spite of the fact that even as late as March 1993 both attended Muslim holiday celebrations. Of the two accused, Zoran Kupre{ki} played a more leading role as the local commander.

853. The fact that Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} voluntarily surrendered to the International Tribunal on 6 October 1997 is a factor in mitigation of their sentence.

(b) Vlatko Kupre{ki}

854. Vlatko Kupre{ki} has been found guilty on Count 1 (persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute).

855. Vlatko Kupre{ki} has been found guilty of persecution in the form of aiding and abetting, by helping in the preparation of the attack on Ahmi}i, such as unloading weapons in his store and allowing his house to be used in the attack. He was also present near the house of Suhret Ahmi}, shortly after the attack on the latter's house. Thus he was clearly supportive of the attack.

856. It is noted that prior to the conflict this accused was on good terms with Muslims and displayed no nationalist or ethnic prejudice.

857. Unlike the other accused, Vlatko Kupre{ki} did not surrender to the International Tribunal. He was arrested on 18 December 1997. During the arrest there was an exchange of fire with the arresting forces.

(c) Drago Josipovi}

858. Drago Josipovi} has been found guilty on Count 1 (persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute); Count 16 (murder as a crime against humanity under Article 5(a) of the Statute); and Count 18 (other inhumane acts as a crime against humanity under Article 5(i) of the Statute).

859. As far as persecution is concerned, Drago Josipovi} played an active role in the killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians in Ahmi}i, the destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property and the expulsion of Bosnian Muslims from the Ahmi}i-[anti}i region. In particular, Drago Josipovi} participated in the attack on the Pušćul house, during which the house was burnt down and Musafer Pušćul was killed and the family was expelled from their home after having been forced to witness the murder of Musafer Pušćul. He also participated in the attack on the house of Nazif Ahmi} in which Nazif and his 14-year old son were killed and he was actively involved in the burning of private property. The attack was launched in the early hours of the morning, allowing the victims no opportunity whatsoever to escape.

860. In mitigation, the evidence shows that Drago Josipovi} lent an HVO army vest to Mr. Osmanovi}, a Muslim, to assist him to escape. During the attack on 16 April he stopped other soldiers from killing Witness DD. Another factor in mitigation is that he voluntarily surrendered to the International Tribunal on 6 October 1997.

(d) Vladimir [anti}

861. Vladimir [anti} has been found guilty on Count 1 (persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute); Count 16 (murder as a crime against humanity under Article 5(a) of the Statute); and Count 18 (other inhumane acts as a crime against humanity under Article 5(i) of the Statute).

862. Concerning the conviction on the persecution count, Vladimir Šanti}'s role was most serious, since he was a commander, who assisted in the strategic planning of the whole attack. He also passed on orders from his superiors to his subordinates, which amounted to the reissuing of the orders that were illegal in the circumstances. This role renders particularly grave his participation in the offences committed. Furthermore, he played an active role in the killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians in Ahmi}i, the destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property and the expulsion of Bosnian Muslims from the Ahmi}i-[anti}i region. In particular, Vladimir [anti} participated in the attack on the Pu{ćul house, during which the house was burnt down, Musafer Pu{ćul was killed and the family was expelled from their home after having been forced to witness the murder of Musafer Pu{ćul. The attack was launched in the early hours of the morning, allowing the victims no opportunity whatsoever to escape.

863. Vladimir Šanti} voluntarily surrendered to the International Tribunal on 6 October 1997 which is treated by the Trial Chamber as a mitigating circumstance.

D. The Sentence to be Imposed for a Multiple Conviction

864. Drago Josipovi} and Vladimir [anti} have been convicted on more than one count.

865. The Trial Chamber has dealt with the problems relating to multiple convictions above. Here it will suffice to say the following: Article 48 of the SFRY Criminal Code, on the one hand, provides for the imposition of a single or composite sentence where an accused has been convicted for more than one criminal act based on the commission of one deed or several deeds. It also provides that a court shall first assess the sentence for each of the criminal acts before determining the composite sentence.

866. Where an accused has been convicted on more than one count based on the commission of one or several deeds, the practice of the International Tribunal, on the other hand, has been to impose sentences on each count to be served concurrently.[997]

867. In practice, there is no real difference in effect between the imposition of concurrent sentences for multiple sentences and one composite sentence for multiple offences. In the unlikely event of there being uncertainty about the length of the concurrent or consecutive sentences to be served, the State of imprisonment could approach the International Tribunal for clarification. Similarly, if a convicted person is eligible for pardon or commutation of sentences according to the law of the State of [997] Delali} et al., Judgement, 16 Nov. 1998, para. 1286; Tadi}, Sentencing Judgement, 14 July 1997, para. 75; *Prosecutor v. imprisonment, the State must inform the President of the Tribunal, who will determine whether pardon or commutation is appropriate. Further, in the event of a succesful appeal on any count, there would be no problems with the sentences.

868. The Trial Chamber will thus follow the sentencing practice of the International Tribunal.

AMENDED INDICTMENT

The Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, pursuant to her authority under Article 18 of the Statute of the Tribunal, charges:

ZORAN KUPRE[KI], MIRJAN KUPRE[KI], VLATKO KUPRE[KI], DRAGO JOSIPOVI], DRAGAN PAPI] and VLADIMIR [ANTI]

with CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY and VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OR CUSTOMS OF WAR, as set forth below:

Background

1. On 03 March 1992, Bosnia and Herzegovina declared its independence; it was recognised as an independent state by the European Council on 06 April 1992.

2. From at least 03 July 1992, the Croatian Community of Herzeg-Bosna ("HZ-HB") considered itself an independent political entity inside Bosnia and Herzegovina.

3. From at least October 1992 until at least the end of May 1993, the HZ-HB armed forces, known as the Croatian Defence Council ("HVO"), were engaged in an armed conflict with the armed forces of the government of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

4. From the outset of hostilities in January 1993, the HVO systematically attacked villages chiefly inhabited by Bosnian Muslims in the Lašva River Valley Region in Central Bosnia and Herzegovina. These attacks resulted in the death and wounding of numerous civilians.

5. The persecution of Bosnian Muslim civilians escalated in frequency throughout the early part of 1993, culminating in simultaneous attacks throughout the Lašva River Valley Region on 16 April 1993.

6. On 16 April 1993, at approximately 0530 hrs., HVO forces attacked the town of Vitez and the nearby villages of Donja Ve~eriska, Sivrino Selo, [anti}i, Ahmi}i, Nadioci, Stara Bila, Ga~ice, Piri}i and Preo~ica. All the villages are within a ten kilometre radius from the village of Ahmi}i.

7. During the attacks, groups of HVO soldiers went from house-to-house killing and wounding Bosnian Muslim civilians and burning houses, barns and livestock. The offensive, which lasted several days, was a highly co-ordinated military operation involving hundreds of HVO troops.

8. When the HVO forces attacked the villages and towns in the Lašva River Valley on 16 April 1993, the village of Ahmi}i experienced significant killing and destruction. Located approximately five kilometres east of Vitez, Ahmi}i had a pre-attack population of approximately 466 inhabitants, with approximately 356 Bosnian Muslims and 87 Bosnian Croats. After the attack, there were no Bosnian Muslims left living in Ahmi}i.

9. ZORAN KUPRE[KI], MIRJAN KUPRE[KI], VLATKO KUPRE[KI], DRAGO JOSIPOVI], DRAGAN PAPI] and VLADIMIR [ANTI] helped prepare the April attack on the Ahmi}i-[anti}i civilians by: participating in military training and arming themselves; evacuating Bosnian Croat civilians the night before the attack; organising HVO soldiers, weapons and ammunition in and around the village of Ahmi}i-[anti}i; preparing their homes and the homes of their relatives as staging areas and firing locations for the attack; and, by concealing from the other residents that the attack was imminent.

10. The HVO attack on Ahmi}i-[anti}i targeted houses, stables, sheds and livestock owned by Bosnian Muslim civilians. The HVO first shelled Ahmi}i-[anti}i from a distance, then groups of soldiers went from house-to-house attacking civilians and their properties using flammable tracer rounds and explosives. The HVO soldiers deliberately and systematically fired upon Bosnian Muslim civilians. The HVO soldiers also set fire to virtually every Bosnian Muslim-owned house in Ahmi}i-[anti}i.

11. Approximately 103 Bosnian Muslim civilians were killed in and around Ahmi}i-[anti}i. Of the 103 persons killed, approximately 33 were women and children. The HVO soldiers destroyed approximately 176 Bosnian Muslim houses in Ahmi}i-[anti}i, along with two mosques.

The Accused

12. ZORAN KUPRE[KI], son of Anto and brother of Mirjan, was born on 23 September 1958 in the village of Piri}i. He was a HVO soldier in the Ahmi}i area. Before the war, he operated a business in Ahmi}i with his cousin, VLATKO KUPRE[KI].

13. MIRJAN KUPRE[KI], son of Anto and brother of Zoran, was born on 21 October 1963 in the town of Vitez. He was a HVO soldier in the Ahmi}i area, together with his brother, ZORAN KUPRE[KI], and cousin, VLATKO KUPRE[KI].

14. VLATKO KUPRE[KI], son of Franjo, was born on 01 January 1958 in the village of Piri}i. Before the war, he lived and worked in Ahmi}i where he operated a business with his cousin, ZORAN KUPRE[KI]. He was a HVO soldier in the Ahmi}i area, together with his cousins, MIRJAN KUPRE[KI] and ZORAN KUPRE[KI].

15. DRAGO JOSIPOVI], son of Niko, was born on 14 February 1955 in [anti}i. Before the war, he was a chemical worker by profession. He was a HVO soldier in [anti}i.

16. DRAGAN PAPI] was born in the village of Šanti}i on 15 July 1967. He lived in Ahmi}i, Vitez and was a HVO soldier.

17. VLADIMIR ŠANTI], also known as "VLADO", was born on 01 April 1958 in Donja Ve~eriska. Before the war he lived in Vitez and was a policeman by profession. He was a HVO soldier in Vitez.

General Allegations

18. At all times relevant to this indictment, the accused were required to abide by the laws or customs governing the conduct of war.

19. Each of the accused is individually responsible for the crimes alleged against him in this indictment, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Tribunal Statute. Individual criminal responsibility includes committing, planning, instigating, ordering, or otherwise aiding and abetting, in the planning, preparation or execution of any crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 5 of the Tribunal Statute.

In the aforesaid Order, it was stated in particular that the General Assembly had requested that the advisory opinion of the Court be rendered "urgently"; reference was also made to the procedural time-limits already fixed for the request for an advisory opinion previously submitted to the Court by the World Health Organization on the question of the Legality of the use by a State of nuclear weapons in armed conflict.

By letters dated 23 June 1995, the Registrar requested the States entitled to appear before the Court and the United Nations to inform him whether they intended to take part in the oral proceedings; it was indicated, in those letters, that the Court had decided to hear, during the same public sittings, oral statements relating to the request for an advisory opinion from the General Assembly as well as oral statements concerning the above-mentioned request for an advisory opinion laid before the Court by the World Health Organization, on the understanding that the United Nations would be entitled to speak only in regard to the request submitted by the General Assembly, and it was further specified therein that the participants in the oral proceedings which had not taken part in the written proceedings would receive the text of the statements and comments produced in the course of the latter.

7. By a letter dated 20 October 1995, the Republic of Nauru requested the Court's permission to withdraw the written comments submitted on its behalf in a document entitled "Response to submissions of other States". The Court granted the request and, by letters dated 30 October 1995, the Deputy-Registrar notified the States to which the document had been communicated, specifying that the document consequently did not form part of the record before the Court.

10. The Court must first consider whether it has the jurisdiction to give a reply to the request of the General Assembly for an Advisory Opinion and whether, should the answer be in the affirmative, there is any reason it should decline to exercise any such jurisdiction.

The Court draws its competence in respect of advisory opinions from Article 65, paragraph 1, of its Statute. Under this Article, the Court > "may give an advisory opinion on any legal question at the request of whatever body may be authorized by or in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations to make such a request".

11. For the Court to be competent to give an advisory opinion, it is thus necessary at the outset for the body requesting the opinion to be "authorized by or in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations to make such a request". The Charter provides in Article 96, paragraph 1, that:

> "The General Assembly or the Security Council may request the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinion on any legal question."

Some States which oppose the giving of an opinion by the Court argued that the General Assembly and Security Council are not entitled to ask for opinions on matters totally unrelated to their work. They suggested that, as in the case of organs and agencies acting under Article 96, paragraph 2, of the Charter, and notwithstanding the difference in wording between that provision and paragraph 1 of the same Article, the General Assembly and Security Council may ask for an advisory opinion on a legal question only within the scope of their activities.

In the view of the Court, it matters little whether this interpretation of Article 96, paragraph 1, is not correct; in the present case, the General Assembly has competence in any event to seise the Court. Indeed, Article 10 of the Charter has conferred upon the General Assembly a competence relating to "any questions or any matters" within the scope of the Charter. Article 11 has specifically provided it with a competence to "consider the general principles . . . in the maintenance of international peace and security, including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments". Lastly, according to Article 13, the General Assembly "shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of . . . encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification".

12. The question put to the Court has a relevance to many aspects of the activities and concerns of the General Assembly including those relating to the threat or use of force in international relations, the disarmament process, and the progressive development of international law. The General Assembly has a long-standing interest in these matters and in their relation to nuclear weapons. This interest has been manifested in the annual First Committee debates, and the Assembly resolutions on nuclear weapons; in the holding of three special sessions on disarmament (1978, 1982 and 1988) by the General Assembly, and the annual meetings of the Disarmament Commission since 1978; and also in the commissioning of studies on the effects of the use of nuclear weapons. In this context, it does not matter that important recent and current activities relating to nuclear disarmament are being pursued in other fora.

Finally, Article 96, paragraph 1, of the Charter cannot be read as limiting the ability of the Assembly to request an opinion only in those circumstances in which it can take binding decisions. The fact that the Assembly's activities in the above-mentioned field have led it only to the making of recommendations thus has no bearing on the issue of whether it had the competence to put to the Court the question of which it is seised.

13. The Court must furthermore satisfy itself that the advisory opinion requested does indeed relate to a "legal question" within the meaning of its Statute and the United Nations Charter.

The Court has already had occasion to indicate that questions

> "framed in terms of law and rais[ing] problems of international law . . . are by their very nature susceptible of a reply based on law . . . [and] appear . . . to be questions of a legal character" (Western Sahara, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1975, p. 18, para. 15).

The question put to the Court by the General Assembly is indeed a legal one, since the Court is asked to rule on the compatibility of the threat or use of nuclear weapons with the relevant principles and rules of international law. To do this, the Court must identify the existing principles and rules, interpret them and apply them to the threat or use of nuclear weapons, thus offering a reply to the question posed based on law.

The fact that this question also has political aspects, as, in the nature of things, is the case with so many questions which arise in international life, does not suffice to deprive it of its character as a "legal question" and to "deprive the Court of a competence expressly conferred on it by its Statute" (Application for Review of Judgement No. 158 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1973, p. 172, para. 14). Whatever its political aspects, the Court cannot refuse to admit the legal character of a question which invites it to discharge an essentially judicial task, namely, an assessment of the legality of the possible conduct of States with regard to the obligations imposed upon them by international law (cf. Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1947-1948, pp. 61-62; Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 6-7; Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, para. 2, of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 155).

Furthermore, as the Court said in the Opinion it gave in 1980 concerning the Interpretation of the Agreement of 25 March 1951 between the WHO and Egypt:

> "Indeed, in situations in which political considerations are prominent it may be particularly necessary for an international organization to obtain an advisory opinion from the Court as to the legal principles applicable with respect to the matter under debate . . ." (Interpretation of the Agreement of 25 March 1951 between the WHO and Egypt, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 87, para. 33.)

The Court moreover considers that the political nature of the motives which may be said to have inspired the request and the political implications that the opinion given might have are of no relevance in the establishment of its jurisdiction to give such an opinion.

14. Article 65, paragraph 1, of the Statute provides: "The Court may give an advisory opinion . . ." (Emphasis added.) This is more than an enabling provision. As the Court has repeatedly emphasized, the Statute leaves a discretion as to whether or not it will give an advisory opinion that has been requested of it, once it has established its competence to do so. In this context, the Court has previously noted as follows:

> "The Court's Opinion is given not to the States, but to the organ which is entitled to request it; the reply of the Court, itself an 'organ of the United Nations', represents its participation in the activities of the Organization, and, in principle, should not be refused." (Interpretation of Peace Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania, First Phase, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 71; see also Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 19; Judgments of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO upon Complaints Made against Unesco, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 86; Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 155; and Applicability of Article VI, Section 22, of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1989, p. 189.)

The Court has constantly been mindful of its responsibilities as "the principal judicial organ of the United Nations" (Charter, Art. 92). When considering each request, it is mindful that it should not, in principle, refuse to give an advisory opinion. In accordance with the consistent jurisprudence of the Court, only "compelling reasons" could lead it to such a refusal (Judgments of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO upon Complaints Made against Unesco, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 86; Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 155; Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 27; Application for Review of Judgement No. 158 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1973, p. 183; Western Sahara, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1975, p. 21; and Applicability of Article VI, Section 22, of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1989, p. 191). There has been no refusal, based on the discretionary power of the Court, to act upon a request for advisory opinion in the history of the present Court; in the case concerning the Legality of the Use by a S[illegible] Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, the refusal to give the World Health Organization the advisory opinion requested by it was justified by the Court's lack of jurisdiction in that case. The Permanent Court of International Justice took the view on only one occasion that it could not reply to a question put to it, having regard to the very particular circumstances of the case, among which were that the question directly concerned an already existing dispute, one of the States parties to which was neither a party to the Statute of the Permanent Court nor a Member of the League of Nations, objected to the proceedings, and refused to take part in any way (Status of Eastern Carelia, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 5).

15. Most of the reasons adduced in these proceedings in order to persuade the Court that in the exercise of its discretionary power it should decline to render the opinion requested by General Assembly resolution 49/75K were summarized in the following statement made by one State in the written proceedings:

> "The question presented is vague and abstract, addressing complex issues which are the subject of consideration among interested States and within other bodies of the United Nations which have an express mandate to address these matters. An opinion by the Court in regard to the question presented would provide no practical assistance to the General Assembly in carrying out its functions under the Charter. Such an opinion has the potential of undermining progress already made or being made on this sensitive subject and, therefore, is contrary to the interest of the United Nations Organization." (United States of America, Written Statement, pp. 1-2; cf. pp. 3-7, II. See also United Kingdom, Written Statement, pp. 9-20, paras. 2.23-2.45; France, Written Statement, pp. 13-20, paras. 5-9; Finland, Written Statement, pp. 1-2; Netherlands, Written Statement, pp. 3-4, paras. 6-13; Germany, Written Statement, pp. 3-6, para. 2*(b)*.))

In contending that the question put to the Court is vague and abstract, some States appeared to mean by this that there exists no specific dispute on the subject-matter of the question. In order to respond to this argument, it is necessary to distinguish between requirements governing contentious procedure and those applicable to advisory opinions. The purpose of the advisory function is not to settle ‹ at least directly ‹ disputes between States, but to offer legal advice to the organs and institutions requesting the opinion (cf. Interpretation of Peace Treaties I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 71). The fact that the question put to the Court does not relate to a specific dispute should consequently not lead the Court to decline to give the opinion requested.

Moreover, it is the clear position of the Court that to contend that it should not deal with a question couched in abstract terms is "a mere affirmation devoid of any justification", and that "the Court may give an advisory opinion on any legal question, abstract or otherwise" (Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, 1948, I.C.J. Reports 1947-1948, p. 61; see also Effect of Awards of Compensation Made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1954, p. 51; and Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 27, para. 40).

Certain States have however expressed the fear that the abstract nature of the question might lead the Court to make hypothetical or speculative declarations outside the scope of its judicial function. The Court does not consider that, in giving an advisory opinion in the present case, it would necessarily have to write "scenarios", to study various types of nuclear weapons and to evaluate highly complex and controversial technological, strategic and scientific information. The Court will simply address the issues arising in all their aspects by applying the legal rules relevant to the situation.

16. Certain States have observed that the General Assembly has not explained to the Court for what precise purposes it seeks the advisory opinion. Nevertheless, it is not for the Court itself to purport to decide whether or not an advisory opinion is needed by the Assembly for the performance of its functions. The General Assembly has the right to decide for itself on the usefulness of an opinion in the light of its own needs.

Equally, once the Assembly has asked, by adopting a resolution, for an advisory opinion on a legal question, the Court, in determining whether there are any compelling reasons for it to refuse to give such an opinion, will not have regard to the origins or to the political history of the request, or to the distribution of votes in respect of the adopted resolution.

17. It has also been submitted that a reply from the Court in this case might adversely affect disarmament negotiations and would, therefore, be contrary to the interest of the United Nations. The Court is aware that, no matter what might be its conclusions in any opinion it might give, they would have relevance for the continuing debate on the matter in the General Assembly and would present an additional element in the negotiations on the matter. Beyond that, the effect of the opinion is a matter of appreciation. The Court has heard contrary positions advanced and there are no evident criteria by which it can prefer one assessment to another. That being so, the Court cannot regard this factor as a compelling reason to decline to exercise its jurisdiction.

18. Finally, it has been contended by some States that in answering the question posed, the Court would be going beyond its judicial role and would be taking upon itself a law-making capacity. It is clear that the Court cannot legislate, and, in the circumstances of the present case, it is not called upon to do so. Rather its task is to engage in its normal judicial function of ascertaining the existence or otherwise of legal principles and rules applicable to the threat or use of nuclear weapons. The contention that the giving of an answer to the question posed would require the Court to legislate is based on a supposition that the present corpus juris is devoid of relevant rules in this matter. The Court could not accede to this argument; it states the existing law and does not legislate. This is so even if, in stating and applying the law, the Court necessarily has to specify its scope and sometimes note its general trend.

19. In view of what is stated above, the Court concludes that it has the authority to deliver an opinion on the question posed by the General Assembly, and that there exist no "compelling reasons" which would lead the Court to exercise its discretion not to do so.

An entirely different question is whether the Court, under the constraints placed upon it as a judicial organ, will be able to give a complete answer to the question asked of it. However, that is a different matter from a refusal to answer at all.

20. The Court must next address certain matters arising in relation to the formulation of the question put to it by the General Assembly. The English text asks: "Is the threat or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance permitted under international law?" The French text of the question reads as follows: "Est-il permis en droit international de recourir à la menace ou à l'emploi d'armes nucléaires en toute circonstance?" It was suggested that the Court was being asked by the General Assembly whether it was permitted to have recourse to nuclear weapons in every circumstance, and it was contended that such a question would inevitably invite a simple negative answer.

The Court finds it unnecessary to pronounce on the possible divergences between the English and French texts of the question posed. Its real objective is clear: to determine the legality or illegality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons.

21. The use of the word "permitted" in the question put by the General Assembly was criticized before the Court by certain States on the ground that this implied that the threat or the use of nuclear weapons would only be permissible if authorization could be found in a treaty provision or in customary international law. Such a starting point, those States submitted, was incompatible with the very basis of international law, which rests upon the principles of sovereignty and consent; accordingly, and contrary to what was implied by use of the word "permitted", States are free to threaten or use nuclear weapons unless it can be shown that they are bound not to do so by reference to a prohibition in either treaty law or customary international law. Support for this contention was found in dicta of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the "Lotus" case that "restrictions upon the independence of States cannot . . . be presumed" and that international law leaves to States "a wide measure of discretion which is only limited in certain cases by prohibitive rules" (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, pp. 18 and 19). Reliance was also placed on the dictum of the present Court in the case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) that:

> "in international law there are no rules, other than such rules as may be accepted by the State concerned, by treaty or otherwise, whereby the level of armaments of a sovereign State can be limited" (I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 135, para. 269).

For other States, the invocation of these dicta in the "Lotus" case was inapposite; their status in contemporary international law and applicability in the very different circumstances of the present case were challenged. It was also contended that the above-mentioned dictum of the present Court was directed to the possession of armaments and was irrelevant to the threat or use of nuclear weapons.

Finally, it was suggested that, were the Court to answer the question put by the Assembly, the word "permitted" should be replaced by "prohibited".

22. The Court notes that the nuclear-weapon States appearing before it either accepted, or did not dispute, that their independence to act was indeed restricted by the principles and rules of international law, more particularly humanitarian law (see below, paragraph 86), as did the other States which took part in the proceedings.

Hence, the argument concerning the legal conclusions to be drawn from the use of the word "permitted", and the questions of burden of proof to which it was said to give rise, are without particular significance for the disposition of the issues before the Court.

23. In seeking to answer the question put to it by the General Assembly, the Court must decide, after consideration of the great corpus of international law norms available to it, what might be the relevant applicable law.

*

24. Some of the proponents of the illegality of the use of nuclear weapons have argued that such use would violate the right to life as guaranteed in Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as in certain regional instruments for the protection of human rights. Article 6, paragraph 1, of the International Covenant provides as follows:

> "Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life."

In reply, others contended that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights made no mention of war or weapons, and it had never been envisaged that the legality of nuclear weapons was regulated by that instrument. It was suggested that the Covenant was directed to the protection of human rights in peacetime, but that questions relating to unlawful loss of life in hostilities were governed by the law applicable in armed conflict.

25. The Court observes that the protection of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights does not cease in times of war, except by operation of Article 4 of the Covenant whereby certain provisions may be derogated from in a time of national emergency. Respect for the right to life is not, however, such a provision. In principle, the right not arbitrarily to be deprived of one's life applies also in hostilities. The test of what is an arbitrary deprivation of life, however, then falls to be determined by the applicable lex specialis, namely, the law applicable in armed conflict which is designed to regulate the conduct of hostilities. Thus whether a particular loss of life, through the use of a certain weapon in warfare, is to be considered an arbitrary deprivation of life contrary to Article 6 of the Covenant, can only be decided by reference to the law applicable in armed conflict and not deduced from the terms of the Covenant itself.

26. Some States also contended that the prohibition against genocide, contained in the Convention of 9 December 1948 on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, is a relevant rule of customary international law which the Court must apply. The Court recalls that, in Article II of the Convention genocide is defined as > "any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

> (a) Killing members of the group; Killing members of the group;
>
> (b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group; Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;
>
> (c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to being about its physical destruction in whole or in part; Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to being about its physical destruction in whole or in part;
>
> (d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group; Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;
> (e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group." Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group."

It was maintained before the Court that the number of deaths occasioned by the use of nuclear weapons would be enormous; that the victims could, in certain cases, include persons of a particular national, ethnic, racial or religious group; and that the intention to destroy such groups could be inferred from the fact that the user of the nuclear weapon would have omitted to take account of the well-known effects of the use of such weapons.

The Court would point out in that regard that the prohibition of genocide would be pertinent in ti. if the recourse to nuclear weapons did indeed entail the element of intent, towards a group as such, required by the provision quoted above. In the view of the Court, it would only be possible to arrive at such a conclusion after having taken due account of the circumstances specific to each case.

27. In both their written and oral statements, some States furthermore argued that any use of nuclear weapons would be unlawful by reference to existing norms relating to the safeguarding and protection of the environment, in view of their essential importance.

Specific references were made to various existing international treaties and instruments. These included Additional Protocol I of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, Article 35, paragraph 3, of which prohibits the employment of "methods or means of warfare which are intended, or may be expected, to cause widespread, long-term and severe damage to the natural environment"; and the Convention of 18 May 1977 on the Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques, which prohibits the use of weapons which have "widespread, long-lasting or severe effects" on the environment (Art. 1). Also cited were Principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration of 1972 and Principle 2 of the Rio Declaration of 1992 which express the common conviction of the States concerned that they have a duty "to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction". These instruments and other provisions relating to the protection and safeguarding of the environment were said to apply at all times, in war as well as in peace, and it was contended that they would be violated by the use of nuclear weapons whose consequences would be widespread and would have transboundary effects.

28. Other States questioned the binding legal quality of these precepts of environmental law; or, in the context of the Convention on the Prohibition of Military or Any Other Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques, denied that it was concerned at all with the use of nuclear weapons in hostilities; or, in the case of Additional Protocol I, denied that they were generally bound by its terms, or recalled that they had reserved their position in respect of Article 35, paragraph 3, thereof.

It was also argued by some States that the principal purpose of environmental treaties and norms was the protection of the environment in time of peace. It was said that those treaties made no mention of nuclear weapons. It was also pointed out that warfare in general, and nuclear warfare in particular, were not mentioned in their texts and that it would be destabilizing to the rule of law and to confidence in international negotiations if those treaties were now interpreted in such a way as to prohibit the use of nuclear weapons.

29. The Court recognizes that the environment is under daily threat and that the use of nuclear weapons could constitute a catastrophe for the environment. The Court also recognizes that the environment is not an abstraction but represents the living space, the quality of life and the very health of human beings, including generations unborn. The existence of the general obligation of States to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction and control respect the environment of other States or of areas beyond national control is now part of the corpus of international law relating to the environment.

30. However, the Court is of the view that the issue is not whether the treaties relating to the protection of the environment are or not applicable during an armed conflict, but rather whether the obligations stemming from these treaties were intended to be obligations of total restraint during military conflict.

The Court does not consider that the treaties in question could have intended to deprive a State of the exercise of its right of self-defence under international law because of its obligations to protect the environment. Nonetheless, States must take environmental considerations into account when assessing what is necessary and proportionate in the pursuit of legitimate military objectives. Respect for the environment is one of the elements that go to assessing whether an action is in conformity with the principles of necessity and proportionality.

This approach is supported, indeed, by the terms of Principle 24 of the Rio Declaration, which provides that:

> "Warfare is inherently destructive of sustainable development. States shall therefore respect international law providing protection for the environment in times of armed conflict and cooperate in its further development, as necessary."

31. The Court notes furthermore that Articles 35, paragraph 3, and 55 of Additional Protocol I provide additional protection for the environment. Taken together, these provisions embody a general obligation to protect the natural environment against widespread, long-term and severe environmental damage; the prohibition of methods and means of warfare which are intended, or may be expected, to cause such damage; and the prohibition of attacks against the natural environment by way of reprisals.

These are powerful constraints for all the States having subscribed to these provisions.

32. General Assembly resolution 47/37 of 25 November 1992 on the Protection of the Environment in Times of Armed Conflict, is also of interest in this context. It affirms the general view according to which environmental considerations constitute one of the elements to be taken into account in the implementation of the principles of the law applicable in armed conflict: it states that "destruction of the environment, not justified by military necessity and carried out wantonly, is clearly contrary to existing international law". Addressing the reality that certain instruments are not yet binding on all States, the General Assembly in this resolution "[a]ppeals to all States that have not yet done so to consider becoming parties to the relevant international conventions."

In its recent Order in the Request for an Examination of the Situation in Accordance with Paragraph 63 of the Court's Judgment of 20 December 1974 in the Nuclear Tests (New Zealand v. France) Case, the Court stated that its conclusion was "without prejudice to the obligations of States to respect and protect the natural environment" (Order of 22 September 1995, I.C.J. Reports 1995, p. 306, para. 64). Although that statement was made in the context of nuclear testing, it naturally also applies to the actual use of nuclear weapons in armed conflict.

33. The Court thus finds that while the existing international law relating to the protection and safeguarding of the environment does not specifically prohibit the use of nuclear weapons, it indicates important environmental factors that are properly to be taken into account in the context of the implementation of the principles and rules of the law applicable in armed conflict.

34. In the light of the foregoing the Court concludes that the most directly relevant applicable law governing the question of which it was seised, is that relating to the use of force enshrined in the United Nations Charter and the law applicable in armed conflict which regulates the conduct of hostilities, together with any specific treaties on nuclear weapons that the Court might determine to be relevant.

35. In applying this law to the present case, the Court cannot however fail to take into account certain unique characteristics of nuclear weapons.

The Court has noted the definitions of nuclear weapons contained in various treaties and accords. It also notes that nuclear weapons are explosive devices whose energy results from the fusion or fission of the atom. By its very nature, that process, in nuclear weapons as they exist today, releases not only immense quantities of heat and energy, but also powerful and prolonged radiation. According to the material before the Court, the first two causes of damage are vastly more powerful than the damage caused by other weapons, while the phenomenon of radiation is said to be peculiar to nuclear weapons. These characteristics render the nuclear weapon potentially catastrophic. The destructive power of nuclear weapons cannot be contained in either space or time. They have the potential to destroy all civilization and the entire ecosystem of the planet.

The radiation released by a nuclear explosion would affect health, agriculture, natural resources and demography over a very wide area. Further, the use of nuclear weapons would be a serious danger to future generations. Ionizing radiation has the potential to damage the future environment, food and marine ecosystem, and to cause genetic defects and illness in future generations.

36. In consequence, in order correctly to apply to the present case the Charter law on the use of force and the law applicable in armed conflict, in particular humanitarian law, it is imperative for the Court to take account of the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons, and in particular their destructive capacity, their capacity to cause untold human suffering, and their ability to cause damage to generations to come.

37. The Court will now address the question of the legality or illegality of recourse to nuclear weapons in the light of the provisions of the Charter relating to the threat or use of force.

38. The Charter contains several provisions relating to the threat and use of force. In Article 2, paragraph 4, the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of another State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations is prohibited. That paragraph provides:

> "All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations."

This prohibition of the use of force is to be considered in the light of other relevant provisions of the Charter. In Article 51, the Charter recognizes the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs. A further lawful use of force is envisaged in Article 42, whereby the Security Council may take military enforcement measures in conformity with Chapter VII of the Charter.

39. These provisions do not refer to specific weapons. They apply to any use of force, regardless of the weapons employed. The Charter neither expressly prohibits, nor permits, the use of any specific weapon, including nuclear weapons. A weapon that is already unlawful per se, whether by treaty or custom, does not become lawful by reason of its being used for a legitimate purpose under the Charter.

40. The entitlement to resort to self-defence under Article 51 is subject to certain constraints. Some of these constraints are inherent in the very concept of self defence. Other requirements are specified in Article 51.

41. The submission of the exercise of the right of self-defence to the conditions of necessity and proportionality is a rule of customary international law. As the Court stated in the case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America) (I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 94, para. 176): "there is a specific rule whereby self-defence would warrant only measures which are proportional to the armed attack and necessary to respond to it, a rule well established in customary international law". This dual condition applies equally to Article 51 of the Charter, whatever the means of force employed.

42. The proportionality principle may thus not in itself exclude the use of nuclear weapons in self-defence in all circumstances. But at the same time, a use of force that is proportionate under the law of self-defence, must, in order to be lawful, also meet the requirements of the law applicable in armed conflict which comprise in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law.

43. Certain States have in their written and oral pleadings suggested that in the case of nuclear weapons, the condition of proportionality must be evaluated in the light of still further factors. They contend that the very nature of nuclear weapons, and the high probability of an escalation of nuclear exchanges, mean that there is an extremely strong risk of devastation. The risk factor is said to negate the possibility of the condition of proportionality being complied with. The Court does not find it necessary to embark upon the quantification of such risks; nor does it need to enquire into the question whether tactical nuclear weapons exist which are sufficiently precise to limit those risks: it suffices for the Court to note that the very nature of all nuclear weapons and the profound risks associated therewith are further considerations to be borne in mind by States believing they can exercise a nuclear response in self-defence in accordance with the requirements of proportionality.

44. Beyond the conditions of necessity and proportionality, Article 51 specifically requires that measures taken by States in the exercise of the right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council; this article further provides that these measures shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security. These requirements of Article 51 apply whatever the means of force used in self defence.

45. The Court notes that the Security Council adopted on 11 April 1995, in the context of the extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, resolution 984 (1995) by the terms of which, on the one hand, it

> "[t]akes note with appreciation of the statements made by each of the nuclear-weapon States (S/1995/261, S/1995/262, S/1995/263, S/1995/264, S/1995/265), in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear-weapon States that are Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons," and, on the other hand, it

> "[w]elcomes the intention expressed by certain States that they will provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used".

46. Certain States asserted that the use of nuclear weapons in the conduct of reprisals would be lawful. The Court does not have to examine, in this context, the question of armed reprisals in time of peace, which are considered to be unlawful. Nor does it have to pronounce on the question of belligerent reprisals save to observe that in any case any right of recourse to such reprisals would, like self-defence, be governed inter alia by the principle of proportionality.

47. In order to lessen or eliminate the risk of unlawful attack, States sometimes signal that they possess certain weapons to use in self-defence against any State violating their territorial integrity or political independence. Whether a signalled intention to use force if certain events occur is or is not a "threat" within Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter depends upon various factors. If the envisaged use of force is itself unlawful, the stated readiness to use it would be a threat prohibited under Article 2, paragraph 4. Thus it would be illegal for a State to threaten force to secure territory from another State, or to cause it to follow or not follow certain political or economic paths. The notions of "threat" and "use" of force under Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter stand together in the sense that if the use of force itself in a given case is illegal ‹ for whatever reason ‹ the threat to use such force will likewise be illegal. In short, if it is to be lawful, the declared readiness of a State to use force must be a use of force that is in conformity with the Charter. For the rest, no State ‹ whether or not it defended the policy of deterrence ‹ suggested to the Court that it would be lawful to threaten to use force if the use of force contemplated would be illegal.

48. Some States put forward the argument that possession of nuclear weapons is itself an unlawful threat to use force. Possession of nuclear weapons may indeed justify an inference of preparedness to use them. In order to be effective, the policy of deterrence, by which those States possessing or under the umbrella of nuclear weapons seek to discourage military aggression by demonstrating that it will serve no purpose, necessitates that the intention to use nuclear weapons be credible. Whether this is a "threat" contrary to Article 2, paragraph 4, depends upon whether the particular use of force envisaged would be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of a State, or against the Purposes of the United Nations or whether, in the event that it were intended as a means of defence, it would necessarily violate the principles of necessity and proportionality. In any of these circumstances the use of force, and the threat to use it, would be unlawful under the law of the Charter.

49. Moreover, the Security Council may take enforcement measures under Chapter VII of the Charter. From the statements presented to it the Court does not consider it necessary to address questions which might, in a given case, arise from the application of Chapter VII.

50. The terms of the question put to the Court by the General Assembly in resolution 49/75K could in principle also cover a threat or use of nuclear weapons by a State within its own boundaries. However, this particular aspect has not been dealt with by any of the States which addressed the Court orally or in writing in these proceedings. The Court finds that it is not called upon to deal with an internal use of nuclear weapons.

51. Having dealt with the Charter provisions relating to the threat or use of force, the Court will now turn to the law applicable in situations of armed conflict. It will first address the question whether there are specific rules in international law regulating the legality or illegality of recourse to nuclear w per se; it will then examine the question put to it in the light of the law applicable in armed conflict proper, i.e. the principles and rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict, and the law of neutrality.

* *

52. The Court notes by way of introduction that international customary and treaty law does not contain any specific prescription authorizing the threat or use of nuclear weapons or any other weapon in general or in certain circumstances, in particular those of the exercise of legitimate self defence. Nor, however, is there any principle or rule of international law which would make the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons or of any other weapons dependent on a specific authorization. State practice shows that the illegality of the use of certain weapons as such does not result from an absence of authorization but, on the contrary, is formulated in terms of prohibition.

53. The Court must therefore now examine whether there is any prohibition of recourse to nuclear weapons as such; it will first ascertain whether there is a conventional prescription to this effect.

54. In this regard, the argument has been advanced that nuclear weapons should be treated in the same way as poisoned weapons. In that case, they would be prohibited under:

> (a) the Second Hague Declaration of 29 July 1899, which prohibits "the use of projectiles the object of which is the diffusion of asphyxiating or deleterious gases";
>
> (b) Article 23 (a) of the Regulations respecting the laws and customs of war on land annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 18 October 1907, whereby "it is especially forbidden: ...to employ poison or poisoned weapons"; and
> (c) the Geneva Protocol of 17 June 1925 which prohibits "the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and of all analogous liquids, materials or devices".

55. The Court will observe that the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV do not define what is to be understood by "poison or poisoned weapons" and that different interpretations exist on the issue. Nor does the 1925 Protocol specify the meaning to be given to the term "analogous materials or devices". The terms have been understood, in the practice of States, in their ordinary sense as covering weapons whose prime, or even exclusive, effect is to poison or asphyxiate. This practice is clear, and the parties to those instruments have not treated them as referring to nuclear weapons.

56. In view of this, it does not seem to the Court that the use of nuclear weapons can be regarded as specifically prohibited on the basis of the above-mentioned provisions of the Second Hague Declaration of 1899, the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907 or the 1925 Protocol (see paragraph 54 above).

57. The pattern until now has been for weapons of mass destruction to be declared illegal by specific instruments. The most recent such instruments are the Convention of 10 April 1972 on the Prohibition of the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological (Biological) and Toxin Weapons and on their destruction ‹ which prohibits the possession of bacteriological and toxic weapons and reinforces the prohibition of their use ‹ and the Convention of 13 January 1993 on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction prohibits all use of chemical weapons and requires the destruction of existing stocks. Each of these instruments has been negotiated and adopted in its own context and for its own reasons. The Court does not find any specific prohibition of recourse to nuclear weapons in treaties expressly prohibiting the use of certain weapons of mass destruction.

58. In the last two decades, a great many negotiations have been conducted regarding nuclear weapons; they have not resulted in a treaty of general prohibition of the same kind as for bacteriological and chemical weapons. However, a number of specific treaties have been concluded in order to limit:

(a) the acquisition, manufacture and possession of nuclear weapons (Peace Treaties of 10 February 1947; State Treaty for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria of 15 May 1955; Treaty of Tlatelolco of 14 February 1967 for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, and its Additional Protocols; Treaty of 1 July 1968 on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons; Treaty of Rarotonga of 6 August 1985 on the Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone of the South Pacific, and its Protocols; Treaty of 12 September 1990 on the Final Settlement with respect to Germany);

(b) the deployment of nuclear weapons (Antarctic Treaty of 1 December 1959; Treaty of 27 January 1967 on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies; Treaty of Tlatelolco of 14 February 1967 for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, and its Additional Protocols; Treaty of 11 February 1971 on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons and Other Weapons of Mass Destruction on the Sea-Bed and the Ocean Floor and in the Subsoil Thereof; Treaty of Rarotonga of 6 August 1985 on the Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone of the South Pacific, and its Protocols); and

(c) the testing of nuclear weapons (Antarctic Treaty of 1 December 1959; Treaty of 5 August 1963 Banning Nuclear Weapon Tests in the Atmosphere, in Outer Space and under Water; Treaty of 27 January 1967 on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies; Treaty of Tlatelolco of 14 February 1967 for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, and its Additional Protocols; Treaty of Rarotonga of 6 August 1985 on the Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone of the South Pacific, and its Protocols).

59. Recourse to nuclear weapons is directly addressed by two of these Conventions and also in connection with the indefinite extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of 1968:

(a) the Treaty of Tlatelolco of 14 February 1967 for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America prohibits, in Article 1, the use of nuclear weapons by the Contracting Parties. It further includes an Additional Protocol II open to nuclear-weapon States outside the region, Article 3 of which provides:

> "The Governments represented by the undersigned Plenipotentiaries also undertake not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against the Contracting Parties of the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America."

The Protocol was signed and ratified by the five nuclear-weapon States. Its ratification was accompanied by a variety of declarations. The United Kingdom Government, for example, stated that "in the event of any act of aggression by a Contracting Party to the Treaty in which that Party was supported by a nuclear-weapon State", the United Kingdom Government would "be fr... reconsider the extent to which they could be regarded as committed by the provisions of Additional Protocol II". The United States made a similar statement. The French Government, for its part, stated that it "interprets the undertaking made in article 3 of the Protocol as being without prejudice to the full exercise of the right of self-defence confirmed by Article 51 of the Charter". China reaffirmed its commitment not to be the first to make use of nuclear weapons. The Soviet Union reserved "the right to review" the obligations imposed upon it by Additional Protocol II, particularly in the event of an attack by a State party either "in support of a nuclear-weapon State or jointly with that State". None of these statements drew comment or objection from the parties to the Treaty of Tlatelolco.

(b) the Treaty of Rarotonga of 6 August 1985 establishes a South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone in which the Parties undertake not to manufacture, acquire or possess any nuclear explosive device (Art. 3). Unlike the Treaty of Tlatelolco, the Treaty of Rarotonga does not expressly prohibit the use of such weapons. But such a prohibition is for the States parties the necessary consequence of the prohibitions stipulated by the Treaty. The Treaty has a number of protocols. Protocol 2, open to the five nuclear-weapon States, specifies in its Article 1 that:

> "Each Party undertakes not to use or threaten to use any nuclear explosive device against:
> (a) Parties to the Treaty; or Parties to the Treaty; or
> (b) any territory within the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone for which a State that has become a Party to Protocol 1 is internationally responsible." any territory within the South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone for which a State that has become a Party to Protocol 1 is internationally responsible."

China and Russia are parties to that Protocol. In signing it, China and the Soviet Union each made a declaration by which they reserved the" right to reconsider" their obligations under the said Protocol; the Soviet Union also referred to certain circumstances in which it would consider itself released from those obligations. France, the United Kingdom and the United States, for their part, signed Protocol 2 on 25 March 1996, but have not yet ratified it. On that occasion, France declared, on the one hand, that no provision in that Protocol "shall impair the full exercise of the inherent right of self-defence provided for in Article 51 of the ... Charter" and, on the other hand, that "the commitment set out in Article 1 of [that] Protocol amounts to the negative security assurances given by France to non-nuclear-weapon States which are parties to the Treaty on . . . Non-Proliferation", and that "these assurances shall not apply to States which are not parties" to that Treaty. For its part, the United Kingdom made a declaration setting out the precise circumstances in which it "will not be bound by [its] undertaking under Article 1" of the Protocol.

(c) as to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, at the time of its signing in 1968 the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR gave various security assurances to the non-nuclear-weapon States that were parties to the Treaty. In resolution 255 (1968) the Security Council took note with satisfaction of the intention expressed by those three States to > that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used".

> "provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation . . .

On the occasion of the extension of the Treaty in 1995, the five nuclear-weapon States gave their non-nuclear-weapon partners, by means of separate unilateral statements on 5 and 6 April 1995, positive and negative security assurances against the use of such weapons. All the five nuclear-weapon States first undertook not to use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States that were parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. However, these States, apart from China, made an exception in the case of an invasion or any other attack against them, their territories, armed forces or allies, or on a State towards which they had a security commitment, carried out or sustained by a non-nuclear-weapon State party to the Non-Proliferation Treaty in association or alliance with a nuclear-weapon State. Each of the nuclear-weapon States further undertook, as a permanent Member of the Security Council, in the event of an attack with the use of nuclear weapons, or threat of such attack, against a non-nuclear-weapon State, to refer the matter to the Security Council without delay and to act within it in order that it might take immediate measures with a view to supplying, pursuant to the Charter, the necessary assistance to the victim State (the commitments assumed comprising minor variations in wording). The Security Council, in unanimously adopting resolution 984 (1995) of 11 April 1995, cited above, took note of those statements with appreciation. It also recognized > "that the nuclear-weapon State permanent members of the Security Council will bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Council and seek Council action to provide, in accordance with the Charter, the necessary assistance to the State victim"; and welcomed the fact that

> "the intention expressed by certain States that they will provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear- weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used."

60. Those States that believe that recourse to nuclear weapons is illegal stress that the conventions that include various rules providing for the limitation or elimination of nuclear weapons in certain areas (such as the Antarctic Treaty of 1959 which prohibits the deployment of nuclear weapons in the Antarctic, or the Treaty of Tlatelolco of 1967 which creates a nuclear-weapon-free zone in Latin America), or the conventions that apply certain measures of control and limitation to the existence of nuclear weapons (such as the 1963 Partial Test-Ban Treaty or the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons) all set limits to the use of nuclear weapons. In their view, these treaties bear witness, in their own way, to the emergence of a rule of complete legal prohibition of all uses of nuclear weapons.

61. Those States who defend the position that recourse to nuclear weapons is legal in certain circumstances see a logical contradiction in reaching such a conclusion. According to them, those Treaties, such as the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, as well as Security Council resolutions 255 (1968) and 984 (1995) which take note of the security assurances given by the nuclear-weapon States to the non-nuclear-weapon States in relation to any nuclear aggression against the latter, cannot be understood as prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons, and such a claim is contrary to the very text of those instruments. For those who support the legality in certain circumstances of recourse to nuclear weapons, there is no absolute prohibition against the use of such weapons. The very logic and construction of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, they assert, confirm this. This Treaty, whereby, they contend, the possession of nuclear weapons by the five nuclear-weapon St[illegible] been accepted, cannot be seen as a treaty banning their use by those States; to accept the fact that those States possess nuclear weapons is tantamount to recognizing that such weapons may be used in certain circumstances. Nor, they contend, could the security assurances given by the nuclear-weapon States in 1968, and more recently in connection with the Review and Extension Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in 1995, have been conceived without its being supposed that there were circumstances in which nuclear weapons could be used in a lawful manner. For those who defend the legality of the use, in certain circumstances, of nuclear weapons, the acceptance of those instruments by the different non-nuclear-weapon States confirms and reinforces the evident logic upon which those instruments are based.

62. The Court notes that the treaties dealing exclusively with acquisition, manufacture, possession, deployment and testing of nuclear weapons, without specifically addressing their threat or use, certainly point to an increasing concern in the international community with these weapons; the Court concludes from this that these treaties could therefore be seen as foreshadowing a future general prohibition of the use of such weapons, but they do not constitute such a prohibition by themselves. As to the treaties of Tlatelolco and Rarotonga and their Protocols, and also the declarations made in connection with the indefinite extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, it emerges from these instruments that:

(a) a number of States have undertaken not to use nuclear weapons in specific zones (Latin America; the South Pacific) or against certain other States (non-nuclear-weapon States which are parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons);

(b) nevertheless, even within this framework, the nuclear-weapon States have reserved the right to use nuclear weapons in certain circumstances; and

(c) these reservations met with no objection from the parties to the Tlatelolco or Rarotonga Treaties or from the Security Council.

63. These two treaties, the security assurances given in 1995 by the nuclear-weapon States and the fact that the Security Council took note of them with satisfaction, testify to a growing awareness of the need to liberate the community of States and the international public from the dangers resulting from the existence of nuclear weapons. The Court moreover notes the signing, even more recently, on 15 December 1995, at Bangkok, of a Treaty on the Southeast Asia Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone, and on 11 April 1996, at Cairo, of a treaty on the creation of a nuclear-weapons-free zone in Africa. It does not, however, view these elements as amounting to a comprehensive and universal conventional prohibition on the use, or the threat of use, of those weapons as such.

64. The Court will now turn to an examination of customary international law to determine whether a prohibition of the threat or use of nuclear weapons as such flows from that source of law. As the Court has stated, the substance of that law must be "looked for primarily in the actual practice and opinio juris of States" (Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1985, p. 29, para. 27).

65. States which hold the view that the use of nuclear weapons is illegal have endeavoured to demonstrate the existence of a customary rule prohibiting this use. They refer to a consistent practice of non-utilization of nuclear weapons by States since 1945 and they would see in that practice the expression of an opinio juris on the part of those who possess such weapons.

66. Some other States, which assert the legality of the threat and use of nuclear weapons in certai circumstances, invoked the doctrine and practice of deterrence in support of their argument. They all that they have always, in concert with certain other States, reserved the right to use those weapons in the exercise of the right to self-defence against an armed attack threatening their vital security interests. In their view, if nuclear weapons have not been used since 1945, it is not on account of an existing or nascent custom but merely because circumstances that might justify their use have fortunately not arisen.

67. The Court does not intend to pronounce here upon the practice known as the "policy of deterrence". It notes that it is a fact that a number of States adhered to that practice during the greater part of the Cold War and continue to adhere to it. Furthermore, the Members of the international community are profoundly divided on the matter of whether non-recourse to nuclear weapons over the past fifty years constitutes the expression of an opinio juris. Under these circumstances the Court does not consider itself able to find that there is such an opinio juris.

68. According to certain States, the important series of General Assembly resolutions, beginning with resolution 1653 (XVI) of 24 November 1961, that deal with nuclear weapons and that affirm, with consistent regularity, the illegality of nuclear weapons, signify the existence of a rule of international customary law which prohibits recourse to those weapons. According to other States, however, the resolutions in question have no binding character on their own account and are not declaratory of any customary rule of prohibition of nuclear weapons; some of these States have also pointed out that this series of resolutions not only did not meet with the approval of all of the nuclear-weapon States but of many other States as well.

69. States which consider that the use of nuclear weapons is illegal indicated that those resolutions did not claim to create any new rules, but were confined to a confirmation of customary law relating to the prohibition of means or methods of warfare which, by their use, overstepped the bounds of what is permissible in the conduct of hostilities. In their view, the resolutions in question did no more than apply to nuclear weapons the existing rules of international law applicable in armed conflict; they were no more than the "envelope" or instrumentum containing certain pre-existing customary rules of international law. For those States it is accordingly of little importance that the instrumentum should have occasioned negative votes, which cannot have the effect of obliterating those customary rules which have been confirmed by treaty law.

70. The Court notes that General Assembly resolutions, even if they are not binding, may sometimes have normative value. They can, in certain circumstances, provide evidence important for establishing the existence of a rule or the emergence of an opinio juris. To establish whether this is true of a given General Assembly resolution, it is necessary to look at its content and the conditions of its adoption; it is also necessary to see whether an opinio juris exists as to its normative character. Or a series of resolutions may show the gradual evolution of the opinio juris required for the establishment of a new rule.

71. Examined in their totality, the General Assembly resolutions put before the Court declare that the use of nuclear weapons would be "a direct violation of the Charter of the United Nations"; and in certain formulations that such use "should be prohibited". The focus of these resolutions has sometimes shifted to diverse related matters; however, several of the resolutions under consideration in the present case have been adopted with substantial numbers of negative votes and abstentions; thus, although those resolutions are a clear sign of deep concern regarding the problem of nuclear weapons, they still fall short of establishing the existence of an opinio juris on the illegality of the use of such weapons.

72. The Court further notes that the first of the resolutions of the General Assembly expressly proclaiming the illegality of the use of nuclear weapons, resolution 1653 (XVI) of 24 November [illegible] (mentioned in subsequent resolutions), after referring to certain international declarations and binding agreements, from the Declaration of St. Petersburg of 1868 to the Geneva Protocol of 1925, proceeded to qualify the legal nature of nuclear weapons, determine their effects, and apply general rules of customary international law to nuclear weapons in particular. That application by the General Assembly of general rules of customary law to the particular case of nuclear weapons indicates that, in its view, there was no specific rule of customary law which prohibited the use of nuclear weapons; if such a rule had existed, the General Assembly could simply have referred to it and would not have needed to undertake such an exercise of legal qualification.

73. Having said this, the Court points out that the adoption each year by the General Assembly, by a large majority, of resolutions recalling the content of resolution 1653 (XVI), and requesting the member States to conclude a convention prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance, reveals the desire of a very large section of the international community to take, by a specific and express prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons, a significant step forward along the road to complete nuclear disarmament. The emergence, as lex lata, of a customary rule specifically prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons as such is hampered by the continuing tensions between the nascent opinio juris on the one hand, and the still strong adherence to the practice of deterrence on the other.

74. The Court not having found a conventional rule of general scope, nor a customary rule specifically proscribing the threat or use of nuclear weapons per se, it will now deal with the question whether recourse to nuclear weapons must be considered as illegal in the light of the principles and rules of international humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict and of the law of neutrality.

75. A large number of customary rules have been developed by the practice of States and are an integral part of the international law relevant to the question posed. The "laws and customs of war" ‹ as they were traditionally called › were the subject of efforts at codification undertaken in The Hague (including the Conventions of 1899 and 1907), and were based partly upon the St. Petersburg Declaration of 1868 as well as the results of the Brussels Conference of 1874. This "Hague Law" and, more particularly, the Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, fixed the rights and duties of belligerents in their conduct of operations and limited the choice of methods and means of injuring the enemy in an international armed conflict. One should add to this the "Geneva Law" (the Conventions of 1864, 1906, 1929 and 1949), which protects the victims of war and aims to provide safeguards for disabled armed forces personnel and persons not taking part in the hostilities. These two branches of the law applicable in armed conflict have become so closely interrelated that they are considered to have gradually formed one single complex system, known today as international humanitarian law. The provisions of the Additional Protocols of 1977 give expression and attest to the unity and complexity of that law.

76. Since the turn of the century, the appearance of new means of combat has ‹ without calling into question the longstanding principles and rules of international law › rendered necessary some specific prohibitions of the use of certain weapons, such as explosive projectiles under 400 grammes, dum-dum bullets and asphyxiating gases. Chemical and bacteriological weapons were then prohibited by the 1925 Geneva Protocol. More recently, the use of weapons producing "non-detectable fragments", of other types of "mines, booby traps and other devices", and of "incendiary weapons", was either prohibited or limited, depending on the case, by the Convention of 10 October 1980 on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects. The provisions of the Convention on "mines, booby traps and other devices" have just been amended, on 3 May 1996, and now regulate in greater detail, for example, the use of anti-personnel land mines.

77. All this shows that the conduct of military operations is governed by a body of legal prescriptions. This is so because "the right of belligerents to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited" as stated in Article 22 of the 1907 Hague Regulations relating to the laws and customs of war on land. The St. Petersburg Declaration had already condemned the use of weapons "which uselessly aggravate the suffering of disabled men or make their death inevitable". The aforementioned Regulations relating to the laws and customs of war on land, annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907, prohibit the use of "arms, projectiles, or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering" (Art. 23).

78. The cardinal principles contained in the texts constituting the fabric of humanitarian law are the following. The first is aimed at the protection of the civilian population and civilian objects and establishes the distinction between combatants and non-combatants; States must never make civilians the object of attack and must consequently never use weapons that are incapable of distinguishing between civilian and military targets. According to the second principle, it is prohibited to cause unnecessary suffering to combatants: it is accordingly prohibited to use weapons causing them such harm or uselessly aggravating their suffering. In application of that second principle, States do not have unlimited freedom of choice of means in the weapons they use.

The Court would likewise refer, in relation to these principles, to the Martens Clause, which was first included in the Hague Convention II with Respect to the Laws and Customs of War on Land of 1899 and which has proved to be an effective means of addressing the rapid evolution of military technology. A modern version of that clause is to be found in Article 1, paragraph 2, of Additional Protocol I of 1977, which reads as follows:

> "In cases not covered by this Protocol or by other international agreements, civilians and combatants remain under the protection and authority of the principles of international law derived from established custom, from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience."

In conformity with the aforementioned principles, humanitarian law, at a very early stage, prohibited certain types of weapons either because of their indiscriminate effect on combatants and civilians or because of the unnecessary suffering caused to combatants, that is to say, a harm greater than that unavoidable to achieve legitimate military objectives. If an envisaged use of weapons would not meet the requirements of humanitarian law, a threat to engage in such use would also be contrary to that law.

79. It is undoubtedly because a great many rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict are so fundamental to the respect of the human person and "elementary considerations of humanity" as the Court put it in its Judgment of 9 April 1949 in the Corfu Channel case (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22), that the Hague and Geneva Conventions have enjoyed a broad accession. Further these fundamental rules are to be observed by all States whether or not they have ratified the conventions that contain them, because they constitute intransgressible principles of international customary law.

80. The Nuremberg International Military Tribunal had already found in 1945 that the humanitarian rules included in the Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907 "were recognized by all civilized nations and were regarded as being declaratory of the laws and customs of war" (International Military Tribunal, Trial of the Major War Criminals, 14 November 1945 ‹ 1 October 1946, Nuremberg, 1947, Vol. 1, p. 254).

81. The Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 2 of Security Council resolution 808

(1993), with which he introduced the Statute of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of P. Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, and which was unanimously approved by the Security Council (resolution 827 (1993)), stated:

> "In the view of the Secretary-General, the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law . . .
> The part of conventional international humanitarian law which has beyond doubt become part of international customary law is the law applicable in armed conflict as embodied in: the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the Protection of War Victims; the Hague Convention (IV) Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and the Regulations annexed thereto of 18 October 1907; the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide of 9 December 1948; and the Charter of the International Military Tribunal of 8 August 1945."

82. The extensive codification of humanitarian law and the extent of the accession to the resultant treaties, as well as the fact that the denunciation clauses that existed in the codification instruments have never been used, have provided the international community with a corpus of treaty rules the great majority of which had already become customary and which reflected the most universally recognized humanitarian principles. These rules indicate the normal conduct and behaviour expected of States.

83. It has been maintained in these proceedings that these principles and rules of humanitarian law are part of jus cogens as defined in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 23 May 1969. The question whether a norm is part of the jus cogens relates to the legal character of the norm. The request addressed to the Court by the General Assembly raises the question of the applicability of the principles and rules of humanitarian law in cases of recourse to nuclear weapons and the consequences of that applicability for the legality of recourse to these weapons. But it does not raise the question of the character of the humanitarian law which would apply to the use of nuclear weapons. There is, therefore, no need for the Court to pronounce on this matter.

84. Nor is there any need for the Court elaborate on the question of the applicability of Additional Protocol I of 1977 to nuclear weapons. It need only observe that while, at the Diplomatic Conference of 1974-1977, there was no substantive debate on the nuclear issue and no specific solution concerning this question was put forward, Additional Protocol I in no way replaced the general customary rules applicable to all means and methods of combat including nuclear weapons. In particular, the Court recalls that all States are bound by those rules in Additional Protocol I which, when adopted, were merely the expression of the pre-existing customary law, such as the Martens Clause, reaffirmed in the first article of Additional Protocol I. The fact that certain types of weapons were not specifically dealt with by the 1974-1977 Conference does not permit the drawing of any legal conclusions relating to the substantive issues which the use of such weapons would raise.

85. Turning now to the applicability of the principles and rules of humanitarian law to a possible threat or use of nuclear weapons, the Court notes that doubts in this respect have sometimes been voiced on the ground that these principles and rules had evolved prior to the invention of nuclear weapons and that the Conferences of Geneva of 1949 and 1974-1977 which respectively adopted the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the two Additional Protocols thereto did not deal with nuclear weapons specifically. Such views, however, are only held by a small minority. In the view of the vast majority of States as well as writers there can be no doubt as to the applicability of humanitarian law to nuclear weapons.

86. The Court shares that view. Indeed, nuclear weapons were invented after most of the princi rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict had already come into existence; the Confe ences of 1949 and 1974-1977 left these weapons aside, and there is a qualitative as well as quantitative difference between nuclear weapons and all conventional arms. However, it cannot be concluded from this that the established principles and rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict did not apply to nuclear weapons. Such a conclusion would be incompatible with the intrinsically humanitarian character of the legal principles in question which permeates the entire law of armed conflict and applies to all forms of warfare and to all kinds of weapons, those of the past, those of the present and those of the future. In this respect it seems significant that the thesis that the rules of humanitarian law do not apply to the new weaponry, because of the newness of the latter, has not been advocated in the present proceedings. On the contrary, the newness of nuclear weapons has been expressly rejected as an argument against the application to them of international humanitarian law:

> "In general, international humanitarian law bears on the threat or use of nuclear weapons as it does of other weapons.
> International humanitarian law has evolved to meet contemporary circumstances, and is not limited in its application to weaponry of an earlier time. The fundamental principles of this law endure: to mitigate and circumscribe the cruelty of war for humanitarian reasons." (New Zealand, Written Statement, p. 15, paras. 63 64.)

None of the statements made before the Court in any way advocated a freedom to use nuclear weapons without regard to humanitarian constraints. Quite the reverse; it has been explicitly stated,

> "Restrictions set by the rules applicable to armed conflicts in respect of means and methods of warfare definitely also extend to nuclear weapons" (Russian Federation, CR 95/29, p. 52);
> "So far as the customary law of war is concerned, the United Kingdom has always accepted that the use of nuclear weapons is subject to the general principles of the jus in bello" (United Kingdom, CR 95/34, p. 45); and
> "The United States has long shared the view that the law of armed conflict governs the use of nuclear weapons ‹ just as it governs the use of conventional weapons" (United States of America, CR 95/34, p. 85.)

87. Finally, the Court points to the Martens Clause, whose continuing existence and applicability is not to be doubted, as an affirmation that the principles and rules of humanitarian law apply to nuclear weapons.

88. The Court will now turn to the principle of neutrality which was raised by several States. In the context of the advisory proceedings brought before the Court by the WHO concerning the Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, the position was put as follows by one State:

> "The principle of neutrality, in its classic sense, was aimed at preventing the incursion of belligerent forces into neutral territory, or attacks on the persons or ships of neutrals. Thus: 'the territory of neutral powers is inviolable' (Article 1 of the Hague Convention (V) Respecting the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers and Persons in Case of War on Land, concluded on 18 October 1907); 'belligerents are bound to respect the sovereign rights of neutral powers . . .' (Article 1 to the Hague Convention (XIII) Respecting the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers in Naval War, concluded on 18 October 1907), 'neutral states have equal interest in having their rights respected by belligerents . . .' (Preamble to Convention on Maritime Neutrality, concluded on 20 February 1928). It is clear, however, that the principle of neutrality applies with equal force to transborder incursions of armed forces and to the transborder damage caused to a neutral State by the use of a weapon in a belligerent State." (Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict, Nauru, Written Statement (I), p. 35, IV E.)

The principle so circumscribed is presented as an established part of the customary international law.

89. The Court finds that as in the case of the principles of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict, international law leaves no doubt that the principle of neutrality, whatever its content, which is of a fundamental character similar to that of the humanitarian principles and rules, is applicable (subject to the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter), to all international armed conflict, whatever type of weapons might be used.

90. Although the applicability of the principles and rules of humanitarian law and of the principle of neutrality to nuclear weapons is hardly disputed, the conclusions to be drawn from this applicability are, on the other hand, controversial.

91. According to one point of view, the fact that recourse to nuclear weapons is subject to and regulated by the law of armed conflict does not necessarily mean that such recourse is as such prohibited. As one State put it to the Court:

> "Assuming that a State's use of nuclear weapons meets the requirements of self defence, it must then be considered whether it conforms to the fundamental principles of the law of armed conflict regulating the conduct of hostilities" (United Kingdom, Written Statement, p. 40, para. 3.44);
> "the legality of the use of nuclear weapons must therefore be assessed in the light of the applicable principles of international law regarding the use of force and the conduct of hostilities, as is the case with other methods and means of warfare" (United Kingdom, Written Statement, p. 75, para. 4.2(3)); and
> "The reality . . . is that nuclear weapons might be used in a wide variety of circumstances with very different results in terms of likely civilian casualties. In some cases, such as the use of a low yield nuclear weapon against warships on the High Seas or troops in sparsely populated areas, it is possible to envisage a nuclear attack which caused comparatively few civilian casualties. It is by no means the case that every use of nuclear weapons against a military objective would inevitably cause very great collateral civilian casualties." (United Kingdom, Written Statement, p. 53, para. 3.70; see also United States of America, Oral Statement, CR 95/34, pp. 89-90.)

92. Another view holds that recourse to nuclear weapons could never be compatible with the principles and rules of humanitarian law and is therefore prohibited. In the event of their use, nuclear weapons would in all circumstances be unable to draw any distinction between the civilian population and combatants, or between civilian objects and military objectives, and their effects, largely uncontr[illegible] could not be restricted, either in time or in space, to lawful military targets. Such weapons would kill and destroy in a necessarily indiscriminate manner, on account of the blast, heat and radiation occasioned by the nuclear explosion and the effects induced; and the number of casualties which would ensue would be enormous. The use of nuclear weapons would therefore be prohibited in any circumstance, notwithstanding the absence of any explicit conventional prohibition. That view lay at the basis of the assertions by certain States before the Court that nuclear weapons are by their nature illegal under customary international law, by virtue of the fundamental principle of humanity.

93. A similar view has been expressed with respect to the effects of the principle of neutrality. Like the principles and rules of humanitarian law, that principle has therefore been considered by some to rule out the use of a weapon the effects of which simply cannot be contained within the territories of the contending States.

94. The Court would observe that none of the States advocating the legality of the use of nuclear weapons under certain circumstances, including the "clean" use of smaller, low yield, tactical nuclear weapons, has indicated what, supposing such limited use were feasible, would be the precise circumstances justifying such use; nor whether such limited use would not tend to escalate into the all-out use of high yield nuclear weapons. This being so, the Court does not consider that it has a sufficient basis for a determination on the validity of this view.

95. Nor can the Court make a determination on the validity of the view that the recourse to nuclear weapons would be illegal in any circumstance owing to their inherent and total incompatibility with the law applicable in armed conflict. Certainly, as the Court has already indicated, the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict ‹ at the heart of which is the overriding consideration of humanity ‹ make the conduct of armed hostilities subject to a number of strict requirements. Thus, methods and means of warfare, which would preclude any distinction between civilian and military targets, or which would result in unnecessary suffering to combatants, are prohibited. In view of the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons, to which the Court has referred above, the use of such weapons in fact seems scarcely reconcilable with respect for such requirements. Nevertheless, the Court considers that it does not have sufficient elements to enable it to conclude with certainty that the use of nuclear weapons would necessarily be at variance with the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict in any circumstance.

96. Furthermore, the Court cannot lose sight of the fundamental right of every State to survival, and thus its right to resort to self-defence, in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter, when its survival is at stake.

Nor can it ignore the practice referred to as "policy of deterrence", to which an appreciable section of the international community adhered for many years. The Court also notes the reservations which certain nuclear-weapon States have appended to the undertakings they have given, notably under the Protocols to the Treaties of Tlatelolco and Rarotonga, and also under the declarations made by them in connection with the extension of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, not to resort to such weapons.

97. Accordingly, in view of the present state of international law viewed as a whole, as examined above by the Court, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court is led to observe that it cannot reach a definitive conclusion as to the legality or illegality of the use of nuclear weapons by a State in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which its very survival would be at stake.

98. Given the eminently difficult issues that arise in applying the law on the use of force and above all the law applicable in armed conflict to nuclear weapons, the Court considers that it now needs to examine one further aspect of the question before it, seen in a broader context.

In the long run, international law, and with it the stability of the international order which it is intended to govern, are bound to suffer from the continuing difference of views with regard to the legal status of weapons as deadly as nuclear weapons. It is consequently important to put an end to this state of affairs: the long-promised complete nuclear disarmament appears to be the most appropriate means of achieving that result.

99. In these circumstances, the Court appreciates the full importance of the recognition by Article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons of an obligation to negotiate in good faith a nuclear disarmament. This provision is worded as follows:

> "Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

The legal import of that obligation goes beyond that of a mere obligation of conduct; the obligation involved here is an obligation to achieve a precise result ‹ nuclear disarmament in all its aspects ‹ by adopting a particular course of conduct, namely, the pursuit of negotiations on the matter in good faith.

100. This twofold obligation to pursue and to conclude negotiations formally concerns the 182 States parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, or, in other words, the vast majority of the international community.

Virtually the whole of this community appears moreover to have been involved when resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly concerning nuclear disarmament have repeatedly been unanimously adopted. Indeed, any realistic search for general and complete disarmament, especially nuclear disarmament, necessitates the co-operation of all States.

101. Even the very first General Assembly resolution, unanimously adopted on 24 January 1946 at the London session, set up a commission whose terms of reference included making specific proposals for, among other things, "the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction". In a large number of subsequent resolutions, the General Assembly has reaffirmed the need for nuclear disarmament. Thus, in resolution 808 A (IX) of 4 November 1954, which was likewise unanimously adopted, it concluded > "that a further effort should be made to reach agreement on comprehensive and co-ordinated proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for: . . . (b) The total prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear weapons and weapons of mass destruction of every type, together with the conversion of existing stocks of nuclear weapons for peaceful purposes."

The same conviction has been expressed outside the United Nations context in various instruments.

102. The obligation expressed in Article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear We includes its fulfilment in accordance with the basic principle of good faith. This basic principle is set forth in Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Charter. It was reflected in the Declaration on Friendly Relations between States (resolution 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970) and in the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference of 1 August 1975. It is also embodied in Article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 23 May 1969, according to which "[e]very treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith".

Nor has the Court omitted to draw attention to it, as follows:

> "One of the basic principles governing the creation and performance of legal obligations, whatever their source, is the principle of good faith. Trust and confidence are inherent in international co-operation, in particular in an age when this co-operation in many fields is becoming increasingly essential." (Nuclear Tests (Australia v. France), Judgment of 20 December 1974, I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 268, para. 46.)

103. In its resolution 984 (1995) dated 11 April 1995, the Security Council took care to reaffirm "the need for all States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to comply fully with all their obligations" and urged

> "all States, as provided for in Article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to nuclear disarmament and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control which remains a universal goal".

The importance of fulfilling the obligation expressed in Article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons was also reaffirmed in the final document of the Review and Extension Conference of the parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, held from 17 April to 12 May 1995.

In the view of the Court, it remains without any doubt an objective of vital importance to the whole of the international community today.

104. At the end of the present Opinion, the Court emphasizes that its reply to the question put to it by the General Assembly rests on the totality of the legal grounds set forth by the Court above (paragraphs 20 to 103), each of which is to be read in the light of the others. Some of these grounds are not such as to form the object of formal conclusions in the final paragraph of the Opinion; they nevertheless retain, in the view of the Court, all their importance.

105. For these reasons,

THE COURT,

(1) By thirteen votes to one,

Decides to comply with the request for an advisory opinion;

IN FAVOUR: President Bedjaoui; Vice-President Schwebel; Judges Guillaume, Shahabuddeen, Weeramantry, Ranjeva, Herczegh, Shi, Fleischhauer, Koroma, Vereshchetin, Ferrari Bravo, Higgins; AGAINST: Judge Oda.

(2) Replies in the following manner to the question put by the General Assembly:

A.Unanimously,

There is in neither customary nor conventional international law any specific authorization of the threat or use of nuclear weapons;

B.By eleven votes to three,

There is in neither customary nor conventional international law any comprehensive and universal prohibition of the threat or use of nuclear weapons as such;

IN FAVOUR: President Bedjaoui; Vice-President Schwebel; Judges Oda, Guillaume, Ranjeva, Herczegh, Shi, Fleischhauer, Vereshchetin, Ferrari Bravo, Higgins; AGAINST: Judges Shahabuddeen, Weeramantry, Koroma.

C.Unanimously,

A threat or use of force by means of nuclear weapons that is contrary to Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter and that fails to meet all the requirements of Article 51, is unlawful;

D.Unanimously,

A threat or use of nuclear weapons should also be compatible with the requirements of the international law applicable in armed conflict, particularly those of the principles and rules of international humanitarian law, as well as with specific obligations under treaties and other undertakings which expressly deal with nuclear weapons;

E. By seven votes to seven, by the President's casting vote,

It follows from the above-mentioned requirements that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law; However, in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake;

DÉCLARATION DE M. BEDJAOUI, PRÉSIDENT

1. Les déclarations et autres opinions individuelles ou dissidentes n'ont jamais bénéficié de ma part d'une grande faveur. J'y ai donc très rarement recouru. Toutefois, l'adoption par la Cour du paragraphe E du dispositif du présent avis grâce à la voix prépondérante dont je dispose en ma qualité de Président, conformément à l'article 55 du Statut, est en soi un événement suffisamment exceptionnel pour m'inciter à me départir de ma réserve habituelle en la matière. Au demeurant, je considère le recours à cette déclaration moins comme l'exercice d'une simple faculté que comme l'accomplissement d'un véritable devoir et ce, tant en raison de la responsabilité que j'ai ainsi été amené à assumer dans l'exercice normal de mes fonctions de Président, que des enjeux du paragraphe susmentionné.

2. Avec l'arme nucléaire, l'humanité est comme en sursis. Ce terrifiant moyen de destruction massive fait partie, depuis un demi-siècle, de la condition humaine. L'arme nucléaire est entrée dans tous les calculs, dans tous les scénarios, dans tous les schémas. Depuis Hiroshima, un matin du 6 août 1945, la peur est peu à peu devenue la première nature de l'homme. Le parcours terrestre de celui-ci a pris l'aspect de ce que le Coran appelle "un long voyage nocturne", comme un cauchemar dont l'humanité ne parvient pas, à ce jour, à entrevoir la fin.

3. La Charte de l'Atlantique avait pourtant promis de "délivrer l'homme de la peur" et celle de San Francisco de "préserver les générations futures du fléau de la guerre". Un long chemin reste encore à parcourir pour exorciser cette nouvelle terreur de l'homme qui l'a fait renouer avec celle de ses ancêtres qui craignaient jadis la chute sur leur tête d'un ciel d'orage chargé de foudre. Mais la situation de l'homme du XXe siècle se distingue, à bien des égards, de celle de son ancêtre: il est armé de connaissance; il s'expose de son propre fait à l'autodestruction; ses inquiétudes sont plus fondées. Pourtant doué de raison, l'homme n'a jamais été aussi déraisonnable; son destin se brouille; sa conscience s'obscurcit; sa vision se trouble et ses coordonnées éthiques tombent, comme feuilles mortes, de l'arbre de vie.

4. On reconnaîtra toutefois que l'homme a fait quelques efforts pour sortir de sa nuit noire. Ainsi, l'humanité paraît, aujourd'hui du moins, plus soulagée que dans les années 80 où elle se menaçait elle-même de la "guerre des étoiles". Le vent mortel d'une guerre cosmique, totale et hautement sophistiquée, qui désintégrerait notre planète, risquait plus que jamais de souffler sur l'humanité ces années-là. Des engins en orbite dans la banlieue de la Terre pouvaient diriger leur gueule d'enfer nucléaire sur notre globe, pendant que des satellites militaires, de reconnaissance, d'observation, de surveillance ou de communication, pouvaient se multiplier. Le système mortifère allait se mettre en place. Le "gouvernement universel de la mort", la "thanatocratie", comme l'avait appelée un spécialiste de l'histoire et de la philosophie des sciences, le Français Michel Serres, se disait prêt à installer ses batteries à toutes les périphéries de la planète. Mais heureusement la détente, puis la fin de la guerre froide, mirent un terme à ces préparatifs terrifiants.

6. L'homme se fait à lui-même un chantage nucléaire pervers et permanent. Il faut savoir l'en délivrer. La Cour avait le devoir de prendre sa part, si minime soit-elle, de cette oeuvre salvatrice pour l'humanité; elle l'a fait en toute conscience et en toute humilité, compte tenu des limites que lui imposent d'une part son Statut et d'autre part le droit international applicable.

7. Jamais, en effet, la Cour n'aura sans doute autant scruté les éléments les plus complexes d'un problème qu'à l'occasion de l'examen de celui des armes nucléaires. Dans l'élaboration du présent avis, la Cour a été guidée par le sens des responsabilités particulières qui sont les siennes et par sa volonté de dire le droit tel qu'il est, en ne cherchant ni à le noircir, ni à l'embellir. Elle a entendu éviter toute tentation de le créer et elle n'est assurément pas sortie de son rôle en pressant les Etats de légiférer au plus vite pour parachever l'oeuvre entreprise par eux jusqu'ici.

8. Cette très importante question des armes nucléaires s'est malheureusement révélée être un domaine où la Cour a dû constater qu'il n'existe pas de réponse immédiate et claire à la question qui lui était posée. Il faut espérer que la communauté internationale saura rendre justice à la Cour d'avoir rempli sa mission ‹ même si sa réponse peut paraître insatisfaisante › et qu'elle s'attache au plus vite à corriger les imperfections d'un droit international qui n'est en définitive que la création des Etats eux-mêmes. Ces imperfections, la Cour aura eu au moins le mérite de les signaler et d'appeler la société internationale à y remédier.

9. Comme son avis consultatif l'atteste, la Cour n'a à aucun moment perdu de vue que l'arme nucléaire constitue un moyen potentiel de destruction de l'humanité tout entière. Pas un instant, elle n'a omis de prendre en compte cet enjeu éminemment vital pour la survie de l'humanité. Le drame de conscience auquel les uns et les autres ont été confrontés se reflète à bien des égards dans le présent avis. Mais la Cour ne pouvait à l'évidence pas aller au-delà de ce que dit le droit. Elle ne pouvait pas dire ce que celui-ci ne dit pas.

10. Au terme de son avis, la Cour s'est ainsi bornée à un constat, tout en se trouvant dans l'incapacité d'aller au-delà. Certains ne manqueront pas d'interpréter le paragraphe E du dispositif comme envisageant la possibilité pour les Etats de recourir à l'arme nucléaire dans des circonstances exceptionnelles. Pour ma part, et eu égard à ce qui précède, je me sens en conscience obligé de faire une lecture différente de ce paragraphe, qui m'a permis d'apporter mon soutien à ce texte. Je m'en explique ci-après.

11. Je ne saurais assez insister sur le fait que l'incapacité de la Cour de dépasser le constat auquel elle est parvenue ne peut en aucune manière être interprétée comme une porte entrouverte par celle-ci à la reconnaissance de la licéité de la menace ou de l'emploi d'armes nucléaires.

12. La jurisprudence de l'affaire du Lotus, que certains ne manqueront pas de ressusciter, mérite d'être très fortement relativisée dans le contexte particulier de la question faisant l'objet du présent avis consultatif. On exagèrerait l'importance et on déformerait la portée de cette décision de la Cour permanente si on l'isolait du contexte particulier, à la fois judiciaire et temporel, dans lequel elle est intervenue. La décision en question exprimait sans aucun doute l'air du temps, celui d'une société internationale encore très peu institutionnalisée et régie par un droit international de stricte coexistence, lui-même reflet de la vigueur du principe de la souveraineté de l'Etat.

13. Il est à peine besoin de souligner que la physionomie de la société internationale contemporaine est sensiblement différente. En dépit de la percée encore limitée du "supra- nationalisme", on ne saurait nier les progrès enregistrés au niveau de l'institutionnalisation, voire de l'intégration et de la "mondialisation", de la société internationale. On en verra pour preuve la multiplication des organisations internationales, la substitution progressive d'un droit international de coopération au droit international classique de la coexistence, l'émergence du concept de "communauté internationale" et les tentatives parfois couronnées de succès de subjectivisation de cette dernière. De tout cela, on peut trouver le témoignage dans la place que le droit international accorde désormais à des concepts tels que celui d'obligations erga omnes, de règles de jus cogens ou de patrimoine commun de l'humanité. A l'approche résolument positiviste, volontariste du droit international qui prévalait encore au début du siècle - et à laquelle la Cour permanente n'a d'ailleurs pas manqué d'apporter son soutien dans l'arrêt susmentionné [«Le droit international régit les rapports entre des Etats indépendants. Les règles de droit liant les Etats procèdent donc de la volonté de ceux-ci, volonté manifestée dans des conventions ou dans des usages acceptés généralement comme consacrant des principes de droit et établis en vue de régler la co-existence de ces communautés indépendantes ou en vue de la poursuite de buts communs.» (Affaire du « Lotus », arrêt no 9, 1927, C.P.J.I. série A no 10, p. 18.)] - s'est substituée une conception objective du droit international, ce dernier se voulant plus volontiers le reflet d'un état de conscience juridique collective et une réponse aux nécessités sociales des Etats organisés en communauté. A l'évolution de la société internationale elle-même, il convient d'ajouter les progrès enregistrés dans le domaine technologique, qui rendent désormais possible une éradication totale et pratiquement instantanée du genre humain.

14. Par ailleurs, au delà des éléments de temps et de contexte, tout distingue la décision de la Cour permanente de l'avis de la présente Cour: la nature du problème posé, les enjeux du prononcé et la philosophie sous-jacente aux conclusions retenues. En 1927, la Cour permanente, dans le cadre de l'examen d'une question d'importance beaucoup plus modeste, était en effet arrivée à la conclusion qu'un comportement non expressément interdit par le droit international se trouve autorisé de ce seul fait.

[« La Cour doit donc, en tout état de cause, examiner s'il existe, oui ou non, une règle de droit international limitant la liberté des Etats d'étendre la juridiction pénale de leurs tribunaux à une situation réunissant les circonstances du cas d'espèce » (ibid., p. 21);

et la Cour de conclure:

« Il y a donc lieu de constater qu'aucun principe de droit international, dans le sens de l'article 15 de la Convention de Lausanne du 24 juillet 1923, ne s'oppose à l'exercice des poursuites pénales dont il s'agit. En conséquence, la Turquie, en intentant, en vertu de la liberté que le droit international laisse à tout Etat souverain, les poursuites pénales en question, n'a pu, en l'absence de pareils principes, agir en contradiction des principes du droit international aux termes du compromis. » (Ibid., p. 31)]

Dans le présent avis, au contraire, la Cour ne conclut ni à la licéité ni à l'illicéité de la menace ou de l'emploi de l'arme nucléaire; des incertitudes quant au droit et aux faits, elle n'infère aucune liberté en la matière. Elle ne suggère pas davantage qu'une telle licence pourrait de quelque manière que ce soit en être déduite. Alors que la Cour permanente avait actionné le seul feu vert de l'autorisation, n'ayant trouvé dans le droit international aucune raison d'actionner le feu rouge de l'interdiction, la Cour actuelle ne s'estime en mesure de n'actionner ni l'un ni l'autre de ces signaux.

15. Ainsi, la Cour, dans le présent avis, fait preuve de beaucoup plus de circonspection que sa devancière dans l'affaire du Lotus, quand elle affirme aujourd'hui que ce qui n'est pas expressém prohibé par le droit international n'est pas pour autant autorisé.

16. Tout en ne se prononçant ni pour la licéité de la menace ou de l'emploi de l'arme nucléaire, ni pour leur illicéité, la Cour prend acte, dans son avis, de l'existence d'un processus très avancé de mutation du droit international en la matière, ou, en d'autres termes, d'une tendance actuelle à la substitution d'une norme de droit international à une autre, la première n'existant pas encore et la seconde n'existant déjà plus. Encore une fois, si la Cour, en tant qu'organe judiciaire, a estimé ne pas pouvoir aller au-delà d'un tel constat, les Etats ne sauraient y voir, à mon avis, une quelconque autorisation d'agir à leur guise.

17. La Cour est évidemment consciente du caractère à première vue insatisfaisant de sa réponse à l'Assemblée générale. Cependant, si la Cour peut laisser l'impression à certains qu'elle s'est arrêtée à mi-chemin de la tâche qui lui a été confiée, je suis au contraire d'avis qu'elle a rempli sa mission en allant, dans sa réponse à la question posée, jusqu'où les éléments à sa disposition lui permettaient d'aller.

18. Dans la seconde phrase du paragraphe E du dispositif de l'avis, la Cour indique qu'elle est parvenue à un point de son raisonnement qu'elle ne peut dépasser qu'en s'exposant au risque d'adopter une conclusion qui irait au delà de ce qui lui paraît légitime. C'est là la position de la Cour en tant que corps judiciaire. Nombre de juges ont adhéré à cette position mais sans doute chacun avec une approche et une interprétation qui lui sont propres. On aura sûrement observé que la répartition des voix, tant en faveur que contre le paragraphe E, n'a nullement obéi à un clivage géographique, ce qui est un signe d'indépendance des membres de la Cour, que je me plais à souligner. Ayant ainsi expliqué le sens qu'il y a lieu de reconnaître selon moi au prononcé de la Cour, je voudrais maintenant revenir brièvement sur les raisons de fond qui m'ont amené à y adhérer.

19. Le droit international humanitaire est un corpus de règles particulièrement exigeant et ces dernières ont vocation à s'appliquer en toutes circonstances. La Cour l'a pleinement reconnu.

20. Les armes nucléaires paraissent bien ‹ du moins dans l'état actuel de la science ‹ de nature à faire des victimes indiscriminées, confondant combattants et non-combattants et causant de surcroît des souffrances inutiles aux uns comme aux autres. L'arme nucléaire, arme aveugle, déstabilise donc par nature le droit humanitaire, droit du discernement dans l'utilisation des armes. L'arme nucléaire, mal absolu, déstabilise le droit humanitaire en tant que droit du moindre mal. Ainsi l'existence même de l'arme nucléaire constitue un grand défi à l'existence même du droit humanitaire, sans compter les effets à long terme dommageables pour l'environnement humain dans le respect duquel le droit à la vie peut s'exercer. A moins que la science ne parvienne à découvrir l'arme nucléaire "propre" qui frapperait le combattant en épargnant le non-combattant, il est clair que l'arme nucléaire a des effets indiscriminés et constitue un défi absolu au droit humanitaire. Guerre nucléaire et droit humanitaire paraissent par conséquent deux antithèses qui s'excluent radicalement, l'existence de l'une supposant nécessairement l'inexistence de l'autre.

21. Il ne fait pas de doute pour moi que la plupart des principes et règles du droit humanitaire et, en tout cas, les deux principes interdisant l'un l'emploi des armes à effets indiscriminés et l'autre celui des armes causant des maux superflus, font partie du jus cogens. La Cour a évoqué cette question dans le présent avis; mais elle a toutefois déclaré qu'elle n'avait pas à se prononcer sur ce point dans la mesure où la question de la nature du droit humanitaire applicable aux armes nucléaires ne rentrait pas dans le cadre de la demande que lui a adressée l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies. La Cour n 'en a pas moins

22. Le droit à la survie de l'Etat est lui aussi un droit fondamental et s'apparente, à maints égards, à un droit "naturel". Cependant, la légitime défense ‹ fût-elle exercée dans des conditions extrêmes mettant en cause la survie même d'un Etat ‹ ne peut engendrer une situation dans laquelle un Etat s'exonérerait lui-même du respect des normes "intransgressibles" du droit international humanitaire. Il peut donc se produire, dans certaines circonstances, une opposition irréductible, une collision frontale de principes fondamentaux dont l'un ne saurait se réduire à l'autre. Il reste que l'emploi de l'arme nucléaire par un Etat dans des circonstances où sa survie est en jeu risque à son tour de mettre en danger la survie de l'humanité tout entière, précisément du fait de l'engrenage de la terreur et de l'escalade dans l'emploi de telles armes. On manquerait par conséquent de la plus élémentaire prudence si on plaçait sans hésitation la survie d'un Etat au dessus de toutes autres considérations, et en particulier au dessus de la survie de l'humanité elle même.

23. Comme la Cour l'a reconnu, l'obligation de négocier de bonne foi un désarmement nucléaire concerne les quelque 182 Etats parties au Traité de non-prolifération. Il me paraît pour ma part possible d'aller au delà de cette conclusion et d'affirmer qu'il existe en réalité une double obligation générale, opposable erga omnes, de négocier de bonne foi et de parvenir au résultat recherché. Il n'est en effet pas déraisonnable de penser qu'eu égard à l'unanimité, au moins formelle, qui prévaut en ce domaine, cette double obligation de négocier de bonne foi et de parvenir au résultat prévu a désormais revêtu, après cinquante ans, un caractère coutumier. Pour le reste, je partage entièrement l'opinion de la Cour quant à la portée juridique de cette obligation. Je me contenterai seulement de souligner une fois encore toute l'importance du but à atteindre compte tenu en particulier des incertitudes qui subsistent encore. La Cour devait à l'évidence le dire. Eu égard au lien très étroit que cette question entretient, par le fait des choses, avec celle de la licéité ou de l'illicéité de la menace ou de l'emploi d'armes nucléaires, on ne saurait reprocher à la Cour d'avoir statué ultra petita. Cette dernière notion est en tout état de cause étrangère à la procédure consultative.

24. La solution dégagée par le présent avis consultatif fait le constat sans complaisance de la réalité juridique, tout en exprimant et traduisant fidèlement l'espoir, partagé par tous, peuples et Etats, que le but ultime de toute action dans le domaine des armes nucléaires restera toujours le désarmement nucléaire, que ce but n'est plus utopique et qu'il est du devoir de tous de le rechercher plus activement que jamais. De l'existence de cette volonté d'engagement dépend le destin de l'homme, car comme l'écrivait Albert Einstein, "le sort de l'humanité sera celui qu'elle méritera".

DÉCLARATION DE M. HERCZEGH

Selon l'article 9 du Statut de la Cour internationale de Justice, les Membres de celle-ci «assurent dans l'ensemble la représentation des grandes formes de civilisation et des principaux systèmes juridiques du monde». En conséquence, il est inévitable que des différences d'approche théorique surgissent entre eux concernant les traits caractéristiques du système du droit international et de ses branches, l'existence ou la non-existence de lacunes dans ce système et la solution des conflits éventuels entre ses règles, ainsi que d'autres questions plus ou moins fondamentales. La préparation d'un avis consultatif sur la question fort complexe posée par l'Assemblée générale au sujet de la licéité de la menace ou de l'emploi des armes nucléaires «en toute circonstance» a mis en relief les différentes conceptions du droit international qui existent au sein de la Cour. La diversité de ces conceptions a empêché celle-ci de pouvoir arriver à une solution plus complète, et partant à un résultat plus satisfaisant. La rédaction des motifs, comme celle des conclusions de l'avis consultatif, reflètent ces divergences. Il convient toutefois de noter que, la Cour, sur plusieurs points très importants, s'est exprimée de manière unanime.

A mon avis, l'état actuel du droit international aurait cependant permis, dans le cadre de l'avis consultatif, la formulation d'une réponse plus précise et moins chargée d'incertitudes et d'hésitations à la demande de l'Assemblée générale. Dans les domaines où l'on ne trouve pas d'interdiction complète et universelle de certains actes «en tant que tels», l'application des principes généraux du droit permet de régler le comportement des sujets de l'ordre juridique international, les obligeant ou les autorisant, selon le cas, à s'abstenir ou à agir d'une manière ou d'une autre. Les principes fondamentaux du droit international humanitaire, correctement mis en valeur dans les motifs de l'avis consultatif, interdisent d'une manière catégorique et sans équivoque l'emploi des armes de destruction massive et, parmi celles-ci, des armes nucléaires. Le droit international humanitaire ne connaît pas d'exception à ces principes.

Je considère que la Cour aurait dû éviter entièrement de traiter de la question des représailles en temps de conflits armés, dont un examen minutieux aurait, à mon avis, dépassé le cadre de la demande soumise par l'Assemblée générale. En l'état, la Cour a pensé utile de mentionner la question dans son avis, mais l'a fait de manière trop brève, ce qui risque de donner lieu à des interprétations hâtives et mal fondées.

Les rapports entre les points C et E, tels qu'ils apparaissent au paragraphe 105 de l'avis consultatif, ne semblent pas tout à fait clairs, et la cohérence de leur contenu respectif n'apparaît pas parfaite. La menace ou l'emploi de la force au moyen d'armes nucléaires doit, selon le point C, satisfaire «à toutes les prescriptions» de l'article 51 de la Charte des Nations Unies, qui concerne le droit naturel de légitime défense, tandis que la seconde phrase du point E indique que > «la Cour ne peut cependant conclure de façon définitive que la menace ou l'emploi d'armes nucléaires serait licite ou illicite dans une circonstance extrême de légitime défense dans laquelle la survie même d'un Etat serait en cause».

Or, le libellé de cette dernière phrase n'est pas à mon avis aisément conciliable avec la référence faite auparavant à «toutes les prescriptions» de l'article 51 de la Charte. Les paragraphes 40 et 41 de l'avis ont précisé que le droit de recourir à la légitime défense est soumis à des restrictions et qu'il existe une «règle spécifique ... bien établie en droit international coutumier» selon laquelle «la légitime défense ne justifierait que des mesures proportionnées à l'agression armée subie, et nécessaires pour y riposter». Je pense que la Cour aurait pu faire de cette constatation l'objet de conclusions formelles au paragraphe 105 de l'avis consultatif, qui aurait ainsi gagné en précision.

L'une des nombreuses tâches assignées à l'Assemblée générale vise ‹ selon l'article 13 de la Charte des Nations Unies ‹ «le développement progressif du droit international et sa codification». Transformer, par voie de codification, des principes généraux du droit et des règles coutumières en règles de droit conventionnel pourrait exclure certaines des faiblesses inhérentes au droit coutumier et pourrait sûrement contribuer à mettre fin aux controverses qui ont préludé à la demande d'avis adressée à la Cour par l'Assemblée générale quant à la licéité ou à l'illicéité de la menace ou de l'emploi des armes nucléaires, et cela en attendant le désarmement nucléaire complet sous un contrôle international strict et efficace.

J'ai voté en faveur du point E du paragraphe 105 de l'avis, bien que j'estime que ledit point aurait pu résumer d'une manière plus précise l'état actuel du droit international quant à la question de la menace et de l'emploi d'armes nucléaires «en toute circonstance». En effet, voter contre ce point aurait signifié prendre une position négative vis-à-vis de certaines conclusions essentielles - exprimées également dans cet avis et auxquelles le point E fait allusion - que je fais miennes entièrement.

DECLARATION OF JUDGE SHI

I have voted in favour of the operative paragraphs of the Advisory Opinion of the Court, because I am generally in agreement with its reasoning and conclusions.

However, I have reservations with regard to the role which the Court assigns to the policy of deterrence in determining lex lata on the use of nuclear weapons.

Thus, for instance, paragraph 67 of the Opinion states

> "It [the Court] notes that it is a fact that a number of States adhered to that practice during the greater part of the Cold War and continued to adhere to it. Furthermore, the Members of the international community are profoundly divided on the matter of whether non-recourse to nuclear weapons over the past fifty years constitutes the expression of an opinio juris. Under these circumstances the Court does not consider itself able to find that there is such an opinio juris."

Then in the crucial paragraph 96 it is stated

> "nor can it [the Court] ignore the practice referred to as 'policy of deterrence', to which an appreciable section of the international community adhered for many years".

In my view, "nuclear deterrence" is an instrument of policy which certain nuclear-weapon States use in their relations with other States and which is said to prevent the outbreak of a massive armed conflict or war, and to maintain peace and security among nations. Undoubtedly, this practice of certain nuclear weapon States is within the realm of international politics, not that of law. It has no legal significance from the standpoint of the formation of a customary rule prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons as such. Rather, the policy of nuclear deterrence should be an object of regulation by law, not vice versa. The Court, when exercising its judicial function of determining a rule of existing law governing the use of nuclear weapons, simply cannot have regard to this policy practice of certain States as, if it were to do so, it would be making the law accord with the needs of the policy of deterrence. The Court would not only be confusing policy with law, but also take a legal position with respect to the policy of nuclear deterrence, thus involving itself in international politics - which would be hardly compatible with its judicial function.

Also, leaving aside the nature of the policy of deterrence, this "appreciable section of the international community" adhering to the policy of deterrence is composed of certain nuclear weapon States and those States that accept the protection of the "nuclear umbrella". No doubt, these States are important and powerful members of the international community and play an important role on the stage of international politics. However, the Court, as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, cannot view this "appreciable section of the international community" in terms of material power. The Court can only have regard to it from the standpoint of international law. Today the international community of States has a membership of over 185 States. The appreciable section of this community to which the Opinion refers by no means constitutes a large proportion of that membership, and the structure of the international community is built on the principle of sovereign equality. Therefore, any undue emphasis on the practice of this "appreciable section" would not only be contrary to the very principle of sovereign equality of States, but would also make it more difficult to give an accurate and proper view of the existence of a customary rule on the use of the weapon.

S247

DECLARATION OF JUDGE VERESHCHETIN

The reply of the Court, in my view, adequately reflects the current legal situation and gives some indication for the further development of the international law applicable in armed conflict.

However, I find myself obliged to explain the reasons which have led me to vote in favour of paragraph 2E of the dispositif, which carries the implication of the indecisiveness of the Court and indirectly admits the existence of a "grey area" in the present regulation of the matter.

The proponents of the view that a court should be prohibited from declaring non liquet regard this prohibition as a corollary of the concept of the "completeness" of the legal system. Those among their number who do not deny the existence of gaps in substantive international law consider that it is the obligation of the Court in a concrete case to fill the gap and thus, by reference to a general legal principle or by way of judicial law-creation, to provide for the "completeness" of the legal system.

On the other hand, there is a strong doctrinal view that the alleged "prohibition" on a declaration of a non liquet "may not be fully sustained by any evidence yet offered" (J. Stone, "Non Liquet and the Function of Law in the International Community", The British Year Book of International Law, 1959, p. 145). In his book devoted specifically to the problems of lacunae in international law, L. Siorat comes to the conclusion that in certain cases a court is obliged to declare a non liquet (L. Siorat, Le problème de lacunes en droit international, Paris, 1958, p. 189).

In critically assessing the importance for our case of the doctrinal debate on the issue of non liquet, one cannot lose sight of the fact that the debate has concerned predominantly, if not exclusively, the admissibility or otherwise of non liquet in a contentious procedure in which the Court is called upon to pronounce a binding, definite decision settling the dispute between the Parties. Even in those cases, the possibility of declaring a non liquet was not excluded by certain authoritative publicists, although this view could not be convincingly supported by arbitral and judicial practice.

In the present case, however, the Court is engaged in advisory procedure. It is requested not to resolve an actual dispute between actual Parties, but to state the law as it finds it at the present stage of its development. Nothing in the question put to the Court or in the written and oral pleadings by the States before it can be interpreted as a request to fill the gaps, should any be found, in the present status of the law on the matter. On the contrary, several States specifically stated that the Court "is not being asked to be a legislator, or to fashion a régime for nuclear disarmament" (Samoa, CR 95/31, p. 34) and that "[t]he Court would be neither speculating nor legislating, but elucidating the law as it exists and is understood by it . . ." (Egypt, CR 95/23, p. 32; see also the oral statement of Malaysia, CR 95/27, p. 52.)

Even had the Court been asked to fill the gaps, it would have had to refuse to assume the burden of law-creation, which in general should not be the function of the Court. In advisory procedure, where the Court finds a lacuna in the law or finds the law to be imperfect, it ought merely to state this without trying to fill the lacuna or improve the law by way of judicial legislation. The Court cannot be blamed for indecisiveness or evasiveness where the law, upon which it is called to pronounce, is itself inconclusive. Even less warranted would be any allegation of the Court's indecisiveness or evasiveness in this particular Opinion, which gives an unequivocal, albeit non-exhaustive, answer to the question put to the Court.

In its reply the Court clearly holds that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would fall within the of the prohibitions and severe restrictions imposed by the UN Charter and a number of other multilateral treaties and specific undertakings as well as by customary rules and principles of the law of armed conflict. Moreover, the Court found that the threat or use of nuclear weapons "would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law". It is plausible that by inference, implication or analogy, the Court (and this is what some States in their written and oral statements had exhorted it to do) could have deduced from the aforesaid a general rule comprehensively proscribing the threat or use of nuclear weapons, without leaving room for any "grey area", even an exceptional one.

The Court could not, however, ignore several important considerations, which debarred it from embarking upon this road. Apart from those which have been expounded in the reasoning part of the Opinion, I would like to add the following. The very States that called on the Court to display courage and perform its "historical mission", insisted that the Court should remain within its judicial function and should not act as a legislator, requested that the Court state the law as it is and not as it should be. Secondly, the Court could not but notice the fact that, in the past, all the existing prohibitions on the use of other weapons of mass destruction (biological, chemical), as well as special restrictions on nuclear weapons, had been established by way of specific international treaties or separate treaty provisions, which undoubtedly point to the course of action chosen by the international community as most appropriate for the total prohibition on the use and eventual elimination of weapons of mass destruction. And thirdly, the Court must be concerned about the authority and effectiveness of the "deduced" general rule with respect to the matter on which the States are so fundamentally divided.

Significantly, even such a strong proponent of the "completeness" of international law and the inadmissibility of non liquet as H. Lauterpacht observes that, in certain circumstances, the > "apparent indecision [of the International Court of Justice], which leaves room for discretion on the part of the organ which requested the Opinion, may ‹ both as a matter of development of the law and as a guide to action ‹ be preferable to a deceptive clarity which fails to give an indication of the inherent complexities of the issue. In so far as the decisions of the Court are an expression of existing international law ‹ whether customary or conventional ‹ they cannot but reflect the occasional obscurity or inconclusiveness of a defective legal system." (H. Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court, reprinted ed., Cambridge, 1982, p. 152; emphasis added.)

In my view, the case in hand presents a good example of an instance where the absolute clarity of the Opinion would be "deceptive" and where on the other hand, its partial "apparent indecision" may prove useful "as a guide to action".

If I may be allowed the comparison, the construction of the solid edifice for the total prohibition on the use of nuclear weapons is not yet complete. This, however, is not because of the lack of building materials, but rather because of the unwillingness and objections of a sizeable number of the builders of this edifice. If this future edifice is to withstand the test of time and the vagaries of the international climate, it is the States themselves ‹ rather than the Court with its limited building resources ‹ that must shoulder the burden of bringing the construction process to completion. At the same time, the Court has clearly shown that the edifice of the total prohibition on the threat or use of nuclear weapons is being constructed and a great deal has already been achieved.

The Court has also shown that the most appropriate means for putting an end to the existence of any "grey areas" in the legal status of nuclear weapons would be "nuclear disarmament in all its aspects under strict and effective international control". Accordingly, the Court has found that there exists an obligation of States to pursue in good faith and bring to a conclusion negotiations leading to this supreme goal.

DÉCLARATION DE M. FERRARI BRAVO

J'ai voté en faveur de l'avis consultatif sur la licéité des armes nucléaires parce que je pense qu'il est du devoir de la Cour internationale de Justice de n'épargner aucun effort pour répondre au mieux aux questions que lui posent les organes principaux des Nations Unies habilités à la saisir, surtout lorsqu'une telle réponse peut augmenter les possibilités de sortir d'une impasse qui, dans le cas actuel, perdure depuis plus de cinquante ans en faisant peser une ombre triste et menaçante sur l'humanité tout entière.

Dans sa fonction d'organe judiciaire principal des Nations Unies (article 92 de la Charte), la Cour a été, entre autres, créée juste pour cela et elle ne doit pas se demander si sa réponse, au mieux de ce qu'elle peut faire, pourra contribuer à l'évolution de la situation. Elle n'a pas non plus à se justifier si sa réponse n'est pas exhaustive. Je souscris par conséquent pleinement aux motifs qui étayent la décision prise par la Cour de faire droit à la demande de l'Assemblée générale.

A ce propos, il est toutefois nécessaire de dire que la question se présente sous un angle tout à fait différent lorsque la saisine provient d'une institution spécialisée des Nations Unies, dont la compétence pour s'adresser à la Cour est, pour des raisons de principe, bien délimitée. J'ai, partant, voté aussi en faveur de l'avis par lequel la Cour décide de ne pas répondre à la demande de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et je trouve qu'il y a de la logique dans ce comportement. La Cour, en effet, est l'organe judiciaire principal des Nations Unies, mais elle ne l'est pas d'autres organisations internationales dont le droit de la saisir demande à être soigneusement limité si l'on veut conserver un partage correct de compétences - et donc, d'efficacité - entre organismes internationaux, en évitant que des fonctions politiques, que la logique du système a confiées seulement aux Nations Unies, soient usurpées par d'autres organisations qui, pour ne rien dire d'autre, n'ont ni la compétence, ni la structure pour ce faire.

Ceci dit, je reste toutefois fort insatisfait quant à certains passages cruciaux de la décision car elle me semble, pour dire la vérité, peu courageuse et parfois de lecture difficile.

Notamment, je regrette que la Cour ait arbitrairement réparti en deux catégories la longue ligne des résolutions de l'Assemblée générale qui commence par la résolution 1 (I) du 24 janvier 1946 et qui, au moins jusqu'à la résolution 808 (IX), se présente sous la forme d'une série de résolutions adoptées à l'unanimité. Je pense que ces résolutions sont fondamentales; tel est le cas surtout de la première, dont le libellé avait déjà été arrêté à Moscou avant la création des Nations Unies (pour l'histoire de la résolution ainsi que pour les démarches entreprises à Moscou en vue de confier aux Nations Unies le contrôle de l'énergie atomique dont, à ce moment là, seuls les Etats-Unis possédaient les clés voir The United Nations in World Affairs, 1945-1947, New York and London, 1947, p. 391 et suiv.), et qui pourrait, à la rigueur, être assimilée aux stipulations de la Charte. Elle démontre en effet, et à mon avis clairement, l'existence d'un véritable engagement solennel d'éliminer toute arme atomique dont la présence dans les arsenaux militaires était jugée illicite. La résolution disait ceci :

> «5. ... En particulier, la Commission [établie par la résolution] présente des propositions déterminées en vue :
> .....

c) d'éliminer, des armements nationaux, les armes atomiques et toutes autres armes importantes permettant des destructions massives.» (Les italiques sont de moi.)

Ces idées ont été répétées à plusieurs reprises dans d'autres résolutions de l'Assemblée générale immédiatement après la création des Nations Unies (voir par exemple la résolution 41 (I) ou la résolution 191 (III)).

Je sais très bien que la guerre froide intervenue peu après (et dont il ne m'appartient pas de désigner les responsables, tout en soulignant qu'ils ne se trouvent pas dans un seul camp) a empêché le développement de cette notion d'illicéité (abandonnée par la suite par les Etats-Unis qui en avaient été les promoteurs), en suscitant l'apparition de toute une série d'argumentations tournant autour du concept de dissuasion nucléaire qui n'a (et c'est important, comme on le verra ci-après) aucune valeur juridique.

Mais à mon avis, il reste que l'illicéité existait déjà et que toute production d'armes nucléaires devait, par conséquent, se justifier au vu de cette tache noire d'illicéité que l'on ne pouvait pas effacer. On doit par conséquent déplorer qu'une telle conclusion ne ressorte pas clairement du raisonnement de la Cour qui, au contraire, est souvent d'une lecture compliquée, sinueuse, et finalement peu efficace.

Cela mis à part, il reste à dire qu'un certain nombre de conclusions auxquelles la Cour est arrivée ne sont pas reflétées dans les résultats dont il est fait état au dispositif. Ce sont des lacunes graves, mais elles s'expliquent par la difficulté de former sur certaines composantes du présent avis consultatif, des majorités cohérentes.

Il est toutefois important de reconnaître qu'il reste le paragraphe 104 de l'avis, introductif au dispositif, dont l'importance est vraiment cruciale. Il suggère en effet au lecteur attentif d'évaluer dans son ensemble le raisonnement fait par la Cour, de tenir compte de ces parties du raisonnement qui ne sont pas reflétées dans des passages du dispositif et, qui plus est, de se rendre compte des inévitables lacunes du raisonnement. Que les lecteurs, et pas seulement les universitaires, en profitent en gardant à l'esprit qu'un avis consultatif, malgré les similitudes procédurales, n'est pas un arrêt. Et celui-ci surtout.

Certes, il n'existe pas une règle précise et spécifique qui interdise l'arme atomique et qui tire toutes les conséquences de cette interdiction. La théorie de la dissuasion, à laquelle l'avis ne réserve qu'une rapide mention (surtout au paragraphe 96), aurait mérité quelques considérations supplémentaires. J'ai déjà dit qu'à mon avis l'idée de dissuasion nucléaire n'a aucune valeur juridique et j'ajoute que la théorie de la dissuasion, tout en créant une pratique des Etats nucléaires et de leurs alliés, n'est pas en mesure de créer une pratique juridique sur laquelle fonder le début de création d'une coutume internationale. On pourrait arriver à dire que l'on est en présence d'un anti-droit, si on pense aux effets qu'elle a eus sur la Charte des Nations Unies.

Je ne vais pas jusque-là, mais je ne peux m'empêcher de constater que c'est grâce à la doctrine de la dissuasion que la portée révolutionnaire de l'article 2, paragraphe 4, de la Charte s'est réduite, alors que parallèlement la portée de l'article 51, qui en était le contrepoint selon une logique traditionnelle, s'est étendue avec la formation autour de cette norme de toute une série de constructions conventionnelles, comme le montrent les deux systèmes régissant respectivement l'Alliance atlantique d'une part et, pendant sa durée d'existence, le pacte de Varsovie. Ce sont des systèmes qui sans doute sont régis par des règles juridiques mais qui procèdent d'une idée qui relève essentiellement d'un constat politique donc non juridique, qui consiste à prendre acte du fait que le Conseil de sécurité ne peut pas fonctionner face à un conflit majeur, comme le serait le cas échéant celui qui fait l'objet du présent avis.

Voici comment la rivière qui sépare l'article 2, paragraphe 4, de l'article 51 s'est élargie grâce aussi à l'énorme caillou de la dissuasion qu'on a jeté dedans. Et cela a entraîné la nécessité pour enjamber la rivière de jeter un pont et pour ce faire, d'utiliser les matériaux dont nous disposons maintenant, à savoir l'article VI du traité sur la non-prolifération nucléaire.

J'ai de forts doutes sur le point de savoir si ces développements sont réellement partagés par la Cour, car la manière très ramassée que la Cour a choisie pour traiter de la dissuasion ne permet pas de bien comprendre si tel est réellement l'avis de la Cour. Mais elle ne permet pas non plus de l'exclure. En tout cas les opinions individuelles ou dissidentes jointes à l'avis (je ne vois pas une grande différence entre les unes et les autres) contribueront à éclairer ce point (ainsi que d'autres, bien entendu).

De toute façon, telle est à mes yeux la raison fondamentale pour laquelle l'avis de la Cour est obligé de contenir, dans sa partie finale, des développements fondés sur une clause d'un traité qui, n'étant pas universel, ne devrait pas en bonne logique y figurer. Mais ces développements sont tout à fait justifiés par la situation dans laquelle nous nous trouvons, où le TNP se présente comme le seul moyen pour arriver rapidement à une solution qui puisse prévenir des conséquences catastrophiques.

En conclusion, je pense qu'une règle précise et spécifique qui interdise l'arme atomique et qui tire toutes les conséquences de cette interdiction n'existe pas encore.

Il est évident que dans la situation politique des années qui vont de 1945 à 1985 une telle règle n'aurait pas pu se former. Mais, dirais-je, l'ensemble de la production normative des dernières cinquante années, surtout en matière du droit humanitaire de la guerre, est quand même inconciliable avec le développement technologique de la construction d'armes nucléaires. Peut-on, par exemple, s'imaginer qu'au moment où le droit humanitaire, partie essentielle et toujours plus importante du droit de la guerre et (depuis peu) aussi de la paix, engendre toute une série de principes pour la protection de la population civile ou pour la sauvegarde de l'environnement, ce même droit international continue d'abriter en son sein la licéité par exemple de l'usage de la bombe à neutrons qui laisse intact l'environnement mais ... seulement avec la «petite» conséquence de l'anéantissement de la population ! Si tel est le cas, peu importe de trouver une norme spécifique sur la bombe à neutrons car elle devient automatiquement illicite par contraste avec la majorité des règles du droit international.

Ce phénomène n'est pas nouveau, car à toute époque de son développement, dès le début de l'ère moderne, le droit international qui est essentiellement un droit coutumier, donc de formation spontanée, a connu des situations où la force de certaines règles empêchait les règles contraires de s'établir ou de se maintenir.

Tout ceci a été malheureusement obscurci dans l'avis de la Cour par la crainte d'analyser courageusement l'évolution dans le temps des résolutions de l'Assemblée générale qui seulement à partir d'une certaine époque (aux alentours des années soixante) ont provoqué l'apparition de clivages nets entre Etats nucléaires (et leurs alliés) et Etats menacés par la bombe.

Je répète. Le fait qu'une règle interdisant l'arme nucléaire ait commencé à se former au début de [illegible] des Nations Unies n'empêche pas que le développement de cette formation et, par conséquent, le développement de sa force propulsive, aient été arrêtés au moment où les deux principales puissances, toutes les deux dotées de l'arme nucléaire, sont entrées dans la guerre froide et ont développé tout un instrumentaire, même conventionnel, centré autour de l'idée de la dissuasion. Mais ceci a seulement empêché la mise en oeuvre de l'interdiction (qu'on est forcé d'obtenir par voie de négociation) alors que l'interdiction en tant que telle, l'interdiction «toute nue», si je peux m'exprimer ainsi, est demeurée en l'état et produit toujours ses effets, au moins au niveau du fardeau de la preuve, en rendant plus difficile aux puissances nucléaires de se justifier dans le cadre de maintes applications de la théorie de la dissuasion qui, je le répète, n'est pas une théorie juridique.

En d'autres termes, on doit, par un instrument juridique (l'accord) parer au danger d'une entité, l'arme nucléaire, qui, en soi, n'a rien de juridique sans qu'il soit possible, dans un cas d'espèce, de vérifier si les solutions esquissées tiennent ou ne tiennent pas. Une telle vérification demanderait l'explosion de la bombe. Mais, alors, la vérification aurait-elle encore un sens ?

Cet élément de déséquilibre normatif entre les raisons des Etats nucléaires et celles des Etats non nucléaires devait et pouvait être soigneusement enregistré par la Cour et non pas de la façon parfois contradictoire sous laquelle il est perçu dans l'avis consultatif.

OPINION INDIVIDUELLE DE M. GUILLAUME

1. L'avis consultatif donné par la Cour dans la présente affaire a fait l'objet de sérieuses réserves de la part de nombre de mes collègues et sera probablement accueilli par un concert de critiques. Je partage certaines de ces réserves, mais ne me joindrai pas à ce concert.

Certes l'avis souffre de nombreuses imperfections. Il traite de manière trop rapide de questions complexes qui auraient dû faire l'objet de développements plus complets et plus équilibrés, en ce qui concerne par exemple le droit de l'environnement, le droit des représailles, le droit humanitaire ou celui de la neutralité. Dans ces divers domaines, la Cour, en recherchant quelle était la coutume en vigueur, n'a, quoiqu'elle en dise, guère tenu compte de la pratique et de l'opinio juris des Etats et s'est trop souvent laissée guider par des considérations qui relèvent plus du droit naturel que du droit positif, de la lex ferenda que de la lex lata. Elle a en outre accordé une portée excessive aux résolutions de l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies. Cette confusion, aggravée par le paragraphe 104 de l'avis, n'a pas été sans conséquence sur les formulations retenues dans le dispositif. Bien plus, ce dernier, tout en statuant ultra petita en ce qui concerne le désarmement nucléaire, ne répond sur certains points que de manière implicite à la question posée. Il serait aisé en pareilles circonstances d'accabler la Cour. Je ne le ferai pas, car cette situation peu satisfaisante trouve son origine profonde moins dans les errements du juge que dans le droit applicable.

2. La Cour aurait pu songer dans ces conditions à ne pas donner suite à la demande d'avis dont elle était saisie. Cette solution aurait trouvé quelque justification dans les circonstances mêmes de la saisine. En effet, l'avis sollicité par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies (comme d'ailleurs celui demandé par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé) a trouvé son origine dans l'action menée par une Association dénommée "International Association of lawyers against nuclear arms" (IALANA) qui, de concert avec divers autres groupements, a lancé en 1992 un projet intitulé "World Court Project" afin de faire proclamer par la Cour l'illicéité de la menace ou de l'emploi des armes nucléaires. Ces associations ont fait preuve d'une intense activité en vue de faire voter les résolutions saisissant la Cour et de provoquer l'intervention devant cette dernière d'Etats hostiles aux armes nucléaires. Bien plus, la Cour et les juges ont reçu des milliers de lettres inspirées par ces groupements et faisant appel tant à leur conscience qu'à la conscience publique.

Je suis certain que les pressions ainsi exercées ont été sans influence sur les délibérations de la Cour, mais je me suis interrogé sur la question de savoir si, dans ces conditions, on pouvait encore regarder les demandes d'avis comme émanant des Assemblées qui les avaient adoptées, ou si, appliquant la théorie de l'apparence, la Cour ne devait pas les écarter comme irrecevables. J'ose cependant espérer que les gouvernements et les institutions intergouvernementales conservent encore une autonomie de décision suffisante par rapport aux puissants groupes de pression qui les investissent aujourd'hui avec le concours des moyens de communication de masse. Je constate en outre qu'aucun des Etats qui s'est présenté devant la Cour n'a soulevé une telle exception. Dans ces conditions, je n'ai pas cru devoir la retenir d'office.

3. Au fond, je partage l'opinion de la Cour telle qu'exprimée au paragraphe 2 B du dispositif, selon laquelle il n'existe ni en droit coutumier, ni en droit conventionnel, d'interdiction complète et universelle de recours aux armes nucléaires en tant que telles. Par contre, je comprends mal qu'au paragraphe 2 A du même dispositif, la Cour ait cru nécessaire de préciser que "ni le droit international coutumier, ni le droit international conventionnel n'autorisent spécifiquement la menace ou l'emploi d'armes nucl

Cette constatation n'est pas en soi inexacte, mais elle ne présente aucun intérêt pour l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies puisqu'il résulte de l'avis même de la Cour que "l'illicéité de l'emploi de certaines armes en tant que telles ne résulte pas d'une absence d'autorisation, mais se trouve au contraire formulée en termes de prohibition" (par. 52).

OPINION INDIVIDUELLE DE M. RANJEVA

J'ai voté pour l'ensemble du dispositif, en particulier le premier alinéa du paragraphe E, dans la mesure où le présent avis confirme le principe de l'illicéité de l'emploi ou de la menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires, bien que j'estime que le second alinéa du même paragraphe E soulève des problèmes d'interprétation susceptibles de porter atteinte à la clarté de la règle de droit.

L'illicéité de l'emploi ou de la menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires aura été, pour la première fois, affirmée dans la jurisprudence internationale inaugurée par le présent avis consultatif, sollicité par l'Assemblée générale de l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Une rédaction différente du premier alinéa du paragraphe E de la seconde partie du dispositif aurait entretenu le doute sur le bien-fondé de ce principe de droit positif, car une comparaison superficielle entre les deux paragraphes déclaratifs A et B aurait pu induire en erreur. Considérer comme équipollentes les constatations énoncées dans ces paragraphes aurait exclu, par hypothèse, une réponse soit affirmative soit négative à la question formulée dans la résolution introductive d'instance. La véritable réponse de la Cour est exprimée au paragraphe E et plus précisément au premier alinéa, tandis que le paragraphe 104 des motifs donne la clef de lecture des motifs et du dispositif dans le sens que ce paragraphe E ne peut être détaché des paragraphes A, C, D, F. A mon avis, l'adverbe «généralement» signifie : dans la majorité des hypothèses et de la doctrine; il a pour fonction grammaticale de déterminer avec insistance l'affirmation énoncée dans la proposition principale. En utilisant un adverbe de détermination, l'avis écarte toute autre interprétation qui aurait résulté de l'utilisation d'un adverbe dubitatif tel que «apparemment», «peut-être», «sans doute». Enfin, le mode conditionnel du verbe «être» employé pour énoncer l'affirmation exprime deux idées : d'une part une probabilité, c'est-à-dire un caractère dont la qualification peut être affirmée avec plus de facilité qu'une autre; et d'autre part une supposition pour l'avenir dont on ne souhaite nullement la survenance. Ces motifs, concluant à l'illicéité de l'emploi ou de la menace d'utilisation des armes nucléaires ne fait, à mon avis, que confirmer l'état du droit positif.

L'absence de référence directe et spécifique aux armes nucléaires ne peut être utilisée pour justifier une licéité, fût-elle indirecte, de l'emploi ou de la menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires. Le libellé du premier alinéa du paragraphe E du dispositif exclut toute restriction au principe général de l'illicéité. A supposer qu'on veuille attribuer une valeur dubitative à l'adverbe «généralement», une conclusion dans le sens d'une inflexion de la portée de l'illicéité ne saurait résister à l'analyse juridique. Lorsqu'on prend l'adverbe «généralement» comme un adverbe de quantité, la signification naturelle du terme exclut toute velléité d'inférer une idée de licéité, qui est contraire au principe fondamental énoncé. Le recours à l'adverbe «généralement» ne s'explique que par l'appel indirect que lance la Cour pour que les conséquences des analyses développées aux numéros 70, 71, 72 des motifs soient dégagées par les destinataires de l'avis. En d'autres termes, le droit actuel que l'avis a relevé, mérite d'être consolidé. L'absence de mention spécifique aux armes nucléaires relève en effet plus de considérations d'opportunité diplomatique, technique ou politique que juridique. Aussi apparaît-il utile d'analyser, en termes de droit, la pratique internationale pour confirmer cette interprétation.

Trois données méritent de retenir l'attention. En premier lieu, aucune réédition des précédents de Hiroshima et de Nagasaki n'est intervenue depuis 1945 même si le spectre de la menace nucléaire a été agité; en revanche, les effets du nucléaire, en général et des armes nucléaires, en particulier, son qu'ils remettent en cause les fondements mêmes du droit humanitaire et des conflits armés. En deuxième lieu, aucune déclaration favorable à la licéité de principe de l'arme nucléaire n'a été enregistrée; faut-il insister sur le fait que c'est à titre de justification d'une exception à un principe accepté comme étant de droit, en l'occurrence l'illicéité de l'emploi ou de la menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires, que les Etats dotés d'armes nucléaires tentent d'exposer les raisons de leur attitude. En troisième et dernier lieu, l'attitude constante de l'Assemblée générale réservée voire hostile à l'arme nucléaire et le développement continu de la conscience du nucléaire ont abouti à l'élaboration d'un maillage juridique de plus en plus serré du régime des armes nucléaires dont la maîtrise relève de moins en moins du pouvoir discrétionnaire de son détenteur pour arriver à des situations juridiques d'interdiction.

Deux observations se dégagent de ce rappel des données de fait. En premier lieu, le principe de l'illicéité de l'emploi ou de la menace d'utilisation des armes nucléaires a pris forme de manière progressive en droit positif. Le recensement, en fait exhaustif, des instruments juridiques et actes pertinents révèle l'effet de catalyse qu'a exercé le principe visant à consacrer l'illicéité des armes nucléaires. L'étude du droit positif ne peut se limiter, dès lors, à constater purement et simplement l'état contemporain du droit; ainsi que l'a souligné la Cour permanente internationale de Justice dans l'affaire des Décrets de nationalité promulgués en Tunisie et au Maroc, la question de la conformité au regard du droit international dépend de l'évolution des idées et des rapports internationaux. Le réalisme juridique amène à accepter que la conscience juridique des questions nucléaires dépend de l'évolution des idées et des connaissances tandis qu'une donnée reste permanente : l'objectif final à savoir le désarmement nucléaire. Le même effet de catalyse peut être observé dans l'évolution du droit de la Charte des Nations Unies. Les cas du droit de la décolonisation ainsi que de celui du paragraphe 4 de l'article 2 montrent qu'à l'origine, considérer les principes y afférents comme relevant du domaine des prolégomènes juridiques relevait de l'hérésie juridique, or peut-on encore soutenir ces mêmes thèses aujourd'hui ? Ne peut-on aussi s'interroger sur l'avènement d'un ordre écologique et environnemental qui tendrait à se superposer à l'ordre nucléaire et qui est en voie d'élaboration dans l'ordre du droit positif ? En matière d'emploi ou de menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires, aucun doute n'est plus permis quant à son illicéité. Mais pour certains Etats, la difficulté résulte de l'absence de consolidation conventionnelle de ce principe, question soulevée par la seconde observation.

En second lieu, le silence sur le cas spécifique des armes nucléaires en matière de régime juridique de l'utilisation des armes exclut-il vraisemblablement l'illicéité coutumière de l'emploi ou de la menace d'emploi des armes nucléaires ? Sans aucun doute, dans une matière aussi importante pour la paix et l'avenir de l'humanité, la solution conventionnelle reste la meilleure des méthodes en vue de réaliser un désarmement général en particulier nucléaire. Mais le consensualisme caractéristique du droit international ne saurait se limiter ni à une technique d'ingénierie contractuelle ou conventionnelle, ni à une formalisation par vote majoritaire des normes de droit international. Le droit des armes nucléaires représente une des branches du droit international qu'on ne saurait envisager sans un minimum d'exigences éthiques qui expriment des valeurs auxquelles participent les membres de la communauté dans leur ensemble. La survie de l'humanité et de la civilisation est une de ces valeurs. Il ne s'agit pas de substituer l'ordre moral à l'ordre juridique de droit positif au nom d'un ordre supérieur ou révélé quelconque. Les exigences morales ne sont pas des sources directes et positives de prescriptions ou d'obligations, mais elles représentent un cadre à l'aune duquel sont scrutées et interpellées les techniques et les règles d'ingénierie conventionnelle et consensuelle. Dans les grandes causes de l'humanité, les exigences du droit positif et de l'éthique font un et les armes nucléaires de par leurs effets destructeurs en sont. Dans ces conditions, l'illicéité relève-t-elle de l'opinio juris ? A cette question, la Cour donne une réponse que d'aucuns considéreraient dubitative alors qu'une réponse affirmative, à mon avis, ne fait pas de doute et prévaut.

entre le fait et le droit, le fait précède le droit : de l'analyse des faits se détermine l'application de [illegible] de droit. Mais peut-il en être de même da

COUR INTERNATIONALE DE JUSTICE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUDGE FLEISCHHAUER

I have voted in favour of all of the Court's Conclusions as contained in paragraph 105 of the Advisory Opinion, although these conclusions do not give a complete and clear-cut answer to the question asked of the Court by the General Assembly. In their incompleteness and vagueness the Court's Conclusions - and in particular their critical Point 2.E - rather reflect the terrible dilemma that confronts persons and institutions alike which have to deal with the question of the legality or otherwise of the threat or use of nuclear weapons in international law. At present, international law is still grappling with, and has not yet overcome, the dichotomy that exists between the international law applicable in armed conflict and, in particular, the rules and principles of humanitarian law, on the one side, with which principles and rules the use of nuclear weapons ‹ as the Court says in paragraph 95 of its Opinion - seems scarcely reconcilable; and, on the other side, the inherent right of self-defence which every State possesses as a matter of sovereign equality. That basic right would be severely curtailed if for a State, victim of an attack with nuclear, chemical or bacteriological weapons or otherwise constituting a deadly menace for its very survival, nuclear weapons were totally ruled out as an ultimate legal option in collective or individual self-defence.

1. In explaining my views more in detail, I would like to begin by stating that, in my view, the Court is right in its reasoning that the humanitarian rules and principles apply to nuclear weapons (para. 86) and in its conclusion that

> "A threat or use of nuclear weapons should also be compatible with the requirements of the international law applicable in armed conflict particularly those of the principles and rules of international humanitarian law..." (Point 2.D of the Conclusions.)

This is so, because of the intrinsically humanitarian character of those rules and principles and in spite of the fact that they essentially evolved much before nuclear weapons were invented. This finding is also not altered by the fact that the Geneva Conferences, which were held after the appearance on the international scene of nuclear weapons and which adopted the four Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the Protection of War Victims as well as the Protocol I of 8 June 1977 to those Conventions, did not address nuclear weapons specifically. The same is true for other principles of the law applicable in armed conflict, such as the principle of neutrality which likewise evolved much before the advent of nuclear weapons.

2. The rules and principles of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict are expression of the - as the Court puts it (para. 95) - "overriding consideration of humanity" which is at the basis of international law and which international law is expected to uphold and defend. The humanitarian rules and principles remind States that whatever the weaponry used, notwithstanding the regrettable inevitability of civilian losses in times of war, civilians might never be the object of an attack. So far as combatants are concerned, weapons may not be used that cause unnecessary suffering. Similarly, the respect for the neutrality of States not participating in an armed conflict is a key element of orderly relations between States. The nuclear weapon is, in many ways, the negation of the humanitarian considerations underlying the law applicable in armed conflict and of the principle of neutrality. The nuclear weapon cannot distinguish between civilian and military targets. It causes immeasurable suffering. The radiation released by it is unable to respect the territorial integrity of a neutral State.

I therefore agree with the Court's finding in the first paragraph of Point 2.E of the Conclusions, to the effect that

3. As the Court rightly sees it, the answer to the question asked of it by the General Assembly does not lie alone in a finding that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law. Through the use of the word "generally" in the first paragraph of Point 2.E of the Conclusions and through the addition of the second paragraph to that Point, the Court points to qualifications that apply or may apply to its findings regarding irreconcilability between the use of nuclear weapons and humanitarian law. The word "generally" limits the finding as such; and according to the second paragraph,

> "in view of the current state of international law, and the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake".

To end the matter with the simple statement that recourse to nuclear weapons would be contrary to international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law, would have meant that the law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the humanitarian law, was given precedence over the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence which every State possesses as a matter of sovereign equality and which is expressly preserved in Article 51 of the Charter. That would be so because if a State is the victim of an all out attack by another State, which threatens the very existence of the victimized State, recourse to the threat or use of nuclear weapons in individual (if the victimized State is a nuclear-weapon State) or collective (if the victim is a non-nuclear-weapon State allied to a nuclear-weapon State) self-defence could be for the victimized State the last and only alternative to giving itself up and surrender. That situation would in particular exist if the attack is made by nuclear, bacteriological or chemical weapons. It is true that the right of self-defence as protected by Article 51 of the Charter is not weapon-specific (para. 39 of the Considerations of the Opinion). Nevertheless, the denial of the recourse to the threat or use of nuclear weapons as a legal option in any circumstance could amount to a denial of self-defence itself if such recourse was the last available means by way of which the victimized State could exercise its right under Article 51 of the Charter.

A finding that amounted to such a denial therefore would not, in my view, have been a correct statement of the law; there is no rule in international law according to which one of the conflicting principles would prevail over the other. The fact that the attacking State itself would act in contravention of international law, would not alter the situation. Nor would recourse to the Security Council, as mandated by Article 51, guarantee by itself an immediate and effective relief.

4. It is true that the qualifying elements in Point 2.E of the Conclusions have been couched by the Court in hesitating, vague and halting terms. The first paragraph of Point 2.E does not explain what is to be understood by "generally ... contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict" (emphasis added), and the wording of the second paragraph of Point 2.E avoids to take a position when it says that,

> "in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would > be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake".

Nor is the reasoning of the Court in the considerations of its Opinion leading up to the qualifications of the main finding in Point 2.E very clear. As far as the term "generally" in the first paragraph of Point 2.E of the Conclusions is concerned, the Court's explanations in paragraph 95 of its Opinion are limited to the statement > "that it [i.e. the Court] does not have sufficient elements to enable it to conclude with certainty that the use of nuclear weapons would necessarily be at variance with the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict in any circumstance".

The considerations leading to the second paragraph of Point 2.E are contained in paragraph 96. They refer to Article 51 of the Charter, the State practice referred to as "policy of deterrence" and the reservations which certain nuclear-weapon States have appended to the undertakings they have given, notably under the Protocols to the Treaties of Tlatelolco and Rarotonga, and also under the declarations made by them in connection with the extension of the Treaty on the Non Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (para. 59 of the Opinion). The hesitating terms in which the Court has couched the qualifying elements in Point 2.E of the Conclusions witness, in my view, the legal and moral difficulties of the territory into which the Court has been led by the question asked of it by the General Assembly.

5. Nevertheless, the Court, by acknowledging in the considerations of its Opinion as well as in Point 2.E of the Conclusions the possibility of qualifying elements, made it possible for me to vote in favour of that particularly important point of its Conclusions. The Court could however ‹ and in my view should ‹ have gone further. My view on this is the following:

The Principles and rules of the humanitarian law and the other principles of law applicable in armed conflict, such as the principle of neutrality on the one side and the inherent right of self defence on the other, which are through the very existence of the nuclear weapon in sharp opposition to each other, are all principles and rules of law. None of these principles and rules is above the law, they are of equal rank in law and they can be altered by law. They are justiciable. Yet international law has so far not developed ‹ neither in conventional nor in customary law ‹ a norm on how these principles can be reconciled in the face of the nuclear weapon. As I stated above (para. 3 of this Separate Opinion), there is no rule giving prevalence of one over the other of these principles and rules. International politics have not yet produced a system of collective security of such perfection that it could take care of the dilemma, swiftly and efficiently.

In view of their equal ranking this means that, if the need arises, the smallest common denominator between the conflicting principles and rules has to be found. This means in turn that, although recourse to nuclear weapons is scarcely reconcilable with humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict as well as the principle of neutrality, recourse to such weapons could remain a justified legal option in an extreme situation of individual or collective self-defence in which the threat or use of nuclear weapons is the last resort against an attack with nuclear, chemical or bacteriological weapons or otherwise threatening the very existence of the victimized State.

The same result is reached if, in the absence of a conventional or a customary rule for the conciliation of the conflicting legal principles and rules, it is accepted that the third category of law which the Court has to apply by virtue of Article 38 of its Statute, i.e. the general principles of law recognized in all legal systems, contains a principle to the effect that no legal system is entitled to demand the self-abandonment, the suicide, of one of its subjects. Much can be said, in my view, in favour of the applicability of such a principle in all modern legal systems and consequently also in internatio

Whichever of the two lines of reasoning is followed, the result that the smallest common denominator, as I see it, is the guiding factor in the solution of the conflict created by the nuclear weapon between the law applicable in armed conflict and the right of self-defence, is confirmed by the important role played by the policy of deterrence during all the years of the Cold War in State practice of nuclear-weapon States as well as in the practice of non-nuclear-weapon States, supporting or tolerating that policy. Even after the end of the Cold War the policy of deterrence has not altogether been abandoned, if only in order to maintain the balance of power among nuclear-weapon States and in order to deter non-nuclear-weapon States from acquiring and threatening or using nuclear weapons. Nuclear-weapon States have found it necessary to continue beyond the end of the Cold War the reservations they have made to the undertakings they have given, notably to the Treaties of Tlatelolco and Rarotonga (para. 59 of the Opinion), and to add similar reservations under the declarations given by them in connection with the unlimited extension of the Non-Proliferation Treaty. These reservations are tolerated by the non-nuclear parties concerned as well as, in the case of the unlimited extension of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, by the Security Council. Of course, as the Court itself has stated (North Sea Continental Shelf, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 3 at p. 44), not every act habitually performed or every attitude taken over a prolonged period of time by a plurality of States is a practice relevant for the determination of the state of the law. In the words of the Court:

> "There are many international acts, e.g., in the field of ceremonial and protocol, which are performed almost invariably, but which are motivated only by considerations of courtesy, convenience or tradition, and not by any sense of legal duty." (Ibid.)

But the practice embodied in the policy of deterrence is based specifically on the right of individual or collective self-defence and so are the reservations to the guarantees of security. The States which support or which tolerate that policy and those reservations are aware of this. So was the Security Council when it adopted resolution 984 (1995). Therefore, the practice which finds expression in the policy of deterrence, in the reservations to the security guarantees and in their toleration, must be regarded as State practice in the legal sense.

6. For a recourse to nuclear weapons to be lawful, however, not only would the situation have to be an extreme one, but the conditions on which the lawfulness of the exercise of self defence generally depends would also always have to be met. These conditions comprise, as the Opinion states expressis verbis (para. 41) that there must be proportionality. The need to comply with the proportionality principle must not a priori rule out recourse to nuclear weapons; as the Opinion states (para. 42): "The proportionality principle may thus not in itself exclude the use of nuclear weapons in all circumstances." The margin that exists for considering that a particular threat or use of nuclear weapons could be lawful is therefore extremely narrow.

The present state of international law does not permit a more precise drawing of the border line between unlawfulness and lawfulness of recourse to nuclear weapons.

7. In the long run the answer to the conflict which the invention of the nuclear weapon entailed between highest values and most basic needs of the community of States, can only lie in effective reduction and control of nuclear armaments and an improved system of collective security. This is why I have supported Point 2.F of the Conclusions of the Opinion on the existence of a general obligation of States to pursue in good faith and bring to a conclusion negotiations leading to nuclear disarmament in all its aspects under strict and effective international control ‹ although this pronouncement goes, strictly speaking, beyond the question asked of the Court.

DISSENTING OPINION OF VICE-PRESIDENT SCHWEBEL

More than any case in the history of the Court, this proceeding presents a titanic tension between State practice and legal principle. It is accordingly the more important not to confuse the international law we have with the international law we need. In the main, the Court's Opinion meets that test. I am in essential though not entire agreement with much of it, and shall, in this opinion, set out my differences. Since however I profoundly disagree with the Court's principal and ultimate holding, I regret to be obliged to dissent.

The essence of the problem is this. Fifty years of the practice of States does not debar, and to that extent supports, the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons in certain circumstances. At the same time, principles of international humanitarian law which antedate that practice govern the use of all weapons including nuclear weapons, and it is extraordinarily difficult to reconcile the use - at any rate, some uses - of nuclear weapons with the application of those principles.

One way of surmounting the antinomy between practice and principle would be to put aside practice. That is what those who maintain that the threat or use of nuclear weapons is unlawful in all circumstances do. Another way is to put aside principle, to maintain that the principles of international humanitarian law do not govern nuclear weapons. That has not been done by States, including the nuclear-weapon States, in these proceedings nor should it be done. These principles - essentially proportionality in the degree of force applied, discrimination in the application of force as between combatants and civilians, and avoidance of unnecessary suffering of combatants - evolved in the pre-nuclear age. They do not easily fit the use of weaponry having the characteristics of nuclear weapons. At the same time, it is the fact that the nuclear Powers and their allies have successfully resisted applying further progressive development of humanitarian law to nuclear weapons; the record of the conferences that concluded the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and its Additional Protocols of 1977 establishes that. Nevertheless to hold that inventions in weaponry that post-date the formation of such fundamental principles are not governed by those principles would vitiate international humanitarian law. Nor is it believable that in fashioning these principles the international community meant to exclude their application to post-invented weaponry. The Martens Clause implies the contrary.

Before considering the extent to which the chasm between practice and principle may be bridged - and is bridged by the Court's Opinion - observations on their content are in order.

State Practice

State practice demonstrates that nuclear weapons have been manufactured and deployed by States for some 50 years; that in that deployment inheres a threat of possible use; and that the international community, by treaty and through action of the United Nations Security Council, has, far from proscribing the threat or use of nuclear weapons in all circumstances, recognized in effect or in terms that in certain circumstances nuclear weapons may be used or their use threatened.

Not only have the nuclear Powers avowedly and for decades, with vast effort and expense, manufactured, maintained and deployed nuclear weapons. They have affirmed that they are legally entitled to use nuclear weapons in certain circumstances and to threaten their use. They have threatened their use by the hard facts and inexorable implications of the possession and deployment of nuclear weapons; by a posture of readiness to launch nuclear weapons 365 days a year, 24 hours of every day; by the military plans, strategic and tactical, developed and sometimes publicly revealed by ther[illegible] a very few international crises, by threatening the use of nuclear weapons. In the very doctrine and practice of deterrence, the threat of the possible use of nuclear weapons inheres.

This nuclear practice is not a practice of a lone and secondary persistent objector. This is not a practice of a pariah Government crying out in the wilderness of otherwise adverse international opinion. This is the practice of five of the world's major Powers, of the permanent Members of the Security Council, significantly supported for almost 50 years by their allies and other States sheltering under their nuclear umbrellas. That is to say, it is the practice of States - and a practice supported by a large and weighty number of other States - that together represent the bulk of the world's military and economic and financial and technological power and a very large proportion of its population. This practice has been recognized, accommodated and in some measure accepted by the international community. That measure of acceptance is ambiguous but not meaningless. It is obvious that the alliance structures that have been predicated upon the deployment of nuclear weapons accept the legality of their use in certain circumstances. But what may be less obvious is the effect of the Non-Proliferation Treaty and the structure of negative and positive security assurances extended by the nuclear Powers and accepted by the Security Council in pursuance of that Treaty, as well as of reservations by nuclear Powers adhering to regional treaties that govern the possession, deployment and use of nuclear weapons.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty

The Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, concluded in 1968 and indefinitely extended by 175 States Parties in 1995, is of paramount importance. By the terms of Article I, "Each nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty undertakes not to transfer to any recipient whatsoever nuclear weapons . . . or control over such weapons" nor to assist "any non-nuclear weapon State to manufacture or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons . . .". By the terms of Article II, each non-nuclear weapon State undertakes not to receive nuclear weapons and not to manufacture them. Article III provides that each non-nuclear-weapon State shall accept safeguards to be negotiated with the International Atomic Energy Agency with a view to preventing diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons. Article IV preserves the right of all Parties to develop peaceful uses of nuclear energy, and Article V provides that potential benefits from peaceful applications of nuclear explosions will be made available to non-nuclear weapon States Party. Article VI provides:

> "Each of the Parties to the Treaty undertakes to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control."

Article VII provides:

> "Nothing in this Treaty affects the right of any group of States to conclude regional treaties in order to assure the total absence of nuclear weapons in their respective territories."

Article VIII is an amendment clause. Article IX provides that the Treaty shall be open to all States and that, for the purposes of the Treaty, "a nuclear-weapon State is one which has manufactured and exploded a nuclear weapon or other nuclear explosive device prior to 1 January 1967". Article X is an extraordinary withdrawal clause which also contains provision on the basis of which a conference of the Parties may be called to extend the Treaty.

The NPT is thus concerned with the possession rather than the use of nuclear weapons. It establis[illegible] fundamental distinction between States possessing, and States not possessing, nuclear weapons, and a balance of responsibilities between them. It recognizes the possibility of the presence of nuclear weapons in territories in which their total absence has not been prescribed. Nothing in the Treaty authorizes, or prohibits, the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. However, the Treaty recognizes the legitimacy of the possession of nuclear weapons by the five nuclear Powers, at any rate until the achievement of nuclear disarmament. In 1968, and in 1995, that possession was notoriously characterized by the development, refinement, maintenance and deployment of many thousands of nuclear weapons. If nuclear weapons were not maintained, they might be more dangerous than not; if they were not deployed, the utility of possession would be profoundly affected. Once a Power possesses, maintains and deploys nuclear weapons and the means of their delivery, it places itself in a posture of deterrence.

What does the practice of such possession of nuclear weapons thus import? Nuclear Powers do not possess nuclear arms to no possible purpose. They develop and maintain them at vast expense; they deploy them in their delivery vehicles; and they made and make known their willingness to use them in certain circumstances. They pursue a policy of deterrence, on which the world was on notice when the NPT was concluded and is on notice today. The policy of deterrence differs from that of the threat to use nuclear weapons by its generality. But if a threat of possible use did not inhere in deterrence, deterrence would not deter. If possession by the five nuclear Powers is lawful until the achievement of nuclear disarmament; if possession is the better part of deterrence; if deterrence is the better part of threat, then it follows that the practice of States - including their treaty practice - does not absolutely debar the threat or use of nuclear weapons.

Thus the regime of the Non-Proliferation Treaty constitutes more than acquiescence by the non-nuclear States in the reality of possession of nuclear weapons by the five nuclear Powers. As the representative of the United Kingdom put it in the oral hearings, "The entire structure of the Non Proliferation Treaty . . . presupposes that the parties did not regard the use of nuclear weapons as being proscribed in all circumstances." To be sure, the acquiescence of most non-nuclear weapon States in the fact of possession of nuclear weapons by the five nuclear Powers - and the ineluctable implications of that fact - have been accompanied by vehement protest and reservation of rights, as successive resolutions of the General Assembly show. It would be too much to say that acquiescence in this case gives rise to opinio juris establishing the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons. What it - and the State practice described - does do is to abort the birth or survival of opinio juris to the contrary. Moreover, there is more than the practice so far described and the implications of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to weigh.

Negative and Positive Security Assurances Endorsed by the Security Council

In connection with the conclusion of the Treaty in 1968 and its indefinite extension in 1995, three nuclear Powers in 1968 and five in 1995 extended negative and positive security assurances to the non-nuclear States Parties to the NPT. In resolution 984 (1995), co-sponsored by the five nuclear Powers, and adopted by the Security Council on 11 April 1995 by unanimous vote,

> "The Security Council,
> . . .
>
> Recognizing the legitimate interest of non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to receive security assurances,

Taking into consideration the legitimate concern of non-nuclear weapon States that, in conjunction with their adherence to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, further appropriate measures be undertaken to safeguard their security,

Considering further that, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, any aggression with the use of nuclear weapons would endanger international peace and security,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the statements made by each of the nuclear-weapon States . . ., in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear weapon States that are Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons;

2. Recognizes the legitimate interest of non-nuclear-weapon States Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons to receive assurances that the Security Council, and above all its nuclear-weapon State permanent members, will act immediately in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, in the event that such States are the victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used;

3. Recognizes further that, in case of aggression with nuclear weapons or the threat of such aggression against a non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, any State may bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Security Council to enable the Council to take urgent action to provide assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to the State victim of an act of, or object of a threat of, such aggression; and recognizes also that the nuclear-weapon State permanent members of the Security Council will bring the matter immediately to the attention of the Council and seek Council action to provide, in accordance with the Charter, the necessary assistance to the State victim;

7. Welcomes the intention expressed by certain States that they will provide or support immediate assistance, in accordance with the Charter, to any non-nuclear weapon State Party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used;

9. Reaffirms the inherent right, recognized under Article 51 of the Charter, of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security;

. . ."

It is plain - especially by the inclusion of operative paragraph 9 in its context - that the Security Council, in so taking note "with appreciation" in operative paragraph 1 of the negative security assurances of the nuclear Powers, and in so welcoming in operative paragraph 7 "the intention expressed" by the positive security assurances of the nuclear Powers, accepted the possibility of the threat or use of nuclear weapons, particularly to assist a non-nuclear-weapon State that, in the words of paragraph 7 - "is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used".

This is the plainer in view of the terms of the unilateral security assurances made by four of the nuclear-weapon States which are, with the exception of those of China, largely concordant. They expressly contemplate the use of nuclear weapons in specified circumstances. They implicitly do not debar the use of nuclear weapons against another nuclear Power (or State not party to the NPT), and explicitly do not debar their use against a nuclear-non-weapon State Party that acts in violation of its obligations under the NPT.

For example, the United States reaffirms that it will not use nuclear weapons against non nuclear weapon States Parties to the NPT

> "except in the case of an invasion or other attack on the United States . . . its armed forces, its allies, or on a State towards which it has a security commitment, carried out or sustained by such a non-nuclear-weapon State in association or alliance with a nuclear-weapon State".

The exception clearly contemplates the use of nuclear weapons in the specified exceptional circumstances. The United States assurances add: "parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons must be in compliance" with "their obligations under the Treaty" in order to be "eligible for any benefits of adherence to the Treaty". The United States further "affirms its intention to provide or support immediate assistance" to any non-nuclear-weapon State "that is a victim of an act of, or an object of a threat of, aggression in which nuclear weapons are used". It reaffirms the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter "if an armed attack, including a nuclear attack, occurs against a Member of the United Nations . . .". Such affirmations by it - and their unanimous acceptance by the Security Council - demonstrate that nuclear Powers have asserted the legality and that the Security Council has accepted the possibility of the threat or use of nuclear weapons in certain circumstances.

Other Nuclear Treaties

As the Court's Opinion recounts, a number of treaties in addition to the NPT limit the acquisition, manufacture, and possession of nuclear weapons; prohibit their deployment or use in specified areas; and regulate their testing. The negotiation and conclusion of these treaties only makes sense in the light of the fact that the international community has not comprehensively outlawed the possession, threat or use of nuclear weapons in all circumstances, whether by treaty or through customary international law. Why conclude these treaties if their essence is already international law, indeed, as some argue, jus cogens?

The fact that there is no comprehensive treaty proscribing the threat or use of nuclear weapons in all circumstances is obvious. Yet it is argued that the totality of this disparate treaty making activity demonstrates an emergent opinio juris in favour of the comprehensive outlawry of the threat or use of nuclear weapons; that, even if nuclear weapons were not outlawed decades ago, they are today, or are on the verge of so becoming, by the cumulation of such treaties as well as resolutions of the United Nations

General Assembly.

The looseness of that argument is no less obvious. Can it really be supposed that, in recent months, nuclear Powers have adhered to a protocol to the Treaty of Raratonga establishing a nuclear free zone in the South Pacific because they believe that the threat or use of nuclear weapons already is outlawed in all circumstances and places, there as elsewhere? Can it really be believed that as recently as 15 December 1995, at Bangkok, States signed a Treaty on the South-East Asia Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone, and on 11 April 1996 the States of Africa took the considerable trouble to conclude at Cairo a treaty for the creation of a nuclear-weapons-free zone in Africa, on the understanding that by dint of emergent opinio juris customary international law already requires that all zones of the world be nuclear-free?

On the contrary, the various treaties relating to nuclear weapons confirm what the practice described above imports: the threat or use of nuclear weapons is not - certainly, not yet - prohibited in all circumstances, whether by treaty or customary international law. This is the clearer in the light of the terms of the Treaty of Tlatelolco for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America of 14 February 1967 and the declarations that accompanied adherence to an Additional Protocol under the Treaty of the five nuclear-weapon States. All of the five nuclear-weapon States in so adhering undertook not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against the Contracting Parties to the Treaty. But they subjected their undertakings to the possibility of the use of nuclear weapons in certain circumstances, as recounted above in paragraph 59 of the Court's Opinion. None of the Contracting Parties to the Tlatelolco Treaty objected to the declarations of the five nuclear-weapon States, which is to say that the Contracting Parties to the Treaty recognized the legality of the use of nuclear weapons in certain circumstances.

Resolutions of the General Assembly

In its opinion, the Court concludes that the succession of resolutions of the General Assembly on nuclear weapons "still fall short of establishing the existence of an opinio juris on the illegality of the use of such weapons". In my view, they do not begin to do so. The seminal resolution, resolution 1653 (XVI) of 24 November 1961, declares that the use of nuclear weapons is "a direct violation of the Charter of the United Nations" and "is contrary to the rules of international law and to the laws of humanity", and that any State using nuclear weapons is to be considered "as committing a crime against mankind and civilization". It somewhat inconsistently concludes by requesting consultations to ascertain views on the possibility of convening a conference for signing a convention on the prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons for war purposes. Resolution 1653 (XVI) was adopted by a vote of 55 to 20, with 26 abstentions. Four of the five nuclear Powers voted against it. Succeeding resolutions providing, as in resolution 36/92 I, that "the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons should . . . be prohibited . . .", have been adopted by varying majorities, in the teeth of strong, sustained and qualitatively important opposition. Any increase in the majority for such resolutions is unimpressive, deriving in some measure from an increase in the membership of the Organization. The continuing opposition, consisting as it does of States that bring together much of the world's military and economic power and a significant percentage of its population, more than suffices to deprive the resolutions in question of legal authority.

The General Assembly has no authority to enact international law. None of the General Assembly's resolutions on nuclear weapons are declaratory of existing international law. The General Assembly can adopt resolutions declaratory of international law only if those resolutions truly reflect what international law is. If a resolution purports to be declaratory of international law, if it is adopted unanimously (or virtually so, qualitatively as well as quantitatively) or by consensus, and if it corresponds to State practice, it may be declaratory of international law. The resolutions of which resolution 1653 is the exemplar conspicuously fail to meet these criteria. While purporting to be declaratory of international law (yet calling for consultations about the possibility of concluding prohibition of what is so declared), they not only do not reflect State practice, they are in conflict with it, as shown above. Forty-six States voted against or abstained upon the resolution, including the majority of the nuclear Powers. It is wholly unconvincing to argue that a majority of the Members of the General Assembly can "declare" international law in opposition to such a body of State practice and over the opposition of such a body of States. Nor are these resolutions authentic interpretations of principles or provisions of the United Nations Charter. The Charter contains not a word about particular weapons, about nuclear weapons, about jus in bello. To declare the use of nuclear weapons a violation of the Charter is an innovative interpretation of it, which cannot be treated as an authentic interpretation of Charter principles or provisions giving rise to obligations binding on States under international law. Finally, the repetition of resolutions of the General Assembly in this vein, far from giving rise, in the words of the Court, to "the nascent opinio juris", rather demonstrates what the law is not. When faced with continuing and significant opposition, the repetition of General Assembly resolutions is a mark of ineffectuality in law formation as it is in practical effect.

Principles of International Humanitarian Law

While it is not difficult to conclude that the principles of international humanitarian law - above all, proportionality in the application of force, and discrimination between military and civilian targets - govern the use of nuclear weapons, it does not follow that the application of those principles to the threat or use of nuclear weapons "in any circumstance" is easy. Cases at the extremes are relatively clear; cases closer to the centre of the spectrum of possible uses are less so.

At one extreme is the use of strategic nuclear weapons in quantities against enemy cities and industries. This so-called "countervalue" use (as contrasted with "counterforce" uses directly only against enemy nuclear forces and installations) could cause an enormous number of deaths and injuries, running in some cases into the millions; and, in addition to those immediately affected by the heat and blast of those weapons, vast numbers could be affected, many fatally, by spreading radiation. Large-scale "exchanges" of such nuclear weaponry could destroy not only cities but countries, and render continents, perhaps the whole of the earth, uninhabitable, if not at once then through longer-range effects of nuclear fallout. It cannot be accepted that the use of nuclear weapons on a scale which would - or could - result in the deaths of many millions in indiscriminate inferno and by far-reaching fallout, have profoundly pernicious effects in space and time, and render uninhabitable much or all of the earth, could be lawful.

At the other extreme is the use of tactical nuclear weapons against discrete military or naval targets so situated that substantial civilian casualties would not ensue. For example, the use of a nuclear depth-charge to destroy a nuclear submarine that is about to fire nuclear missiles, or has fired one or more of a number of its nuclear missiles, might well be lawful. By the circumstance of its use, the nuclear depth-charge would not give rise to immediate civilian casualties. It would easily meet the test of proportionality; the damage that the submarine's missiles could inflict on the population and territory of the target State would infinitely outweigh that entailed in the destruction of the submarine and its crew. The submarine's destruction by a nuclear weapon would produce radiation in the sea, but far less than the radiation that firing of its missiles would produce on and over land. Nor is it as certain that the use of a conventional depth-charge would discharge the mission successfully; the far greater force of a nuclear weapon could ensure destruction of the submarine whereas a conventional depth-charge might not.

An intermediate case would be the use of nuclear weapons to destroy an enemy army situated in a desert. In certain circumstances, such a use of nuclear weapons might meet the tests of discrimination and proportionality; in others not. The argument that the use of nuclear weapons is inevitably disproportionate raises troubling questions, which the British Attorney General addressed in the Court's oral proceedings in these terms:

> "If one is to speak of 'disproportionality', the question arises: disproportionate to what? The answer must be 'to the threat posed to the victim State'. It is by reference to that threat that proportionality must be measured. So one has to look at all the circumstances, in particular the scale, kind and location of the threat. To assume that any defensive use of nuclear weapons must be disproportionate, no matter how serious the threat to the safety and the very survival of the State resorting to such use, is wholly unfounded. Moreover, it suggests an overbearing assumption by the critics of nuclear weapons that they can determine in advance that no threat, including a nuclear, chemical or biological threat, is ever worth the use of any nuclear weapon. It cannot be right to say that if an aggressor hits hard enough, his victim loses the right to take the only measure by which he can defend himself and reverse the aggression. That would not be the rule of law. It would be an aggressor's charter."

For its part, the body of the Court's Opinion is cautious in treating problems of the application of the principles of international humanitarian law to concrete cases. It evidences a measure of uncertainty in a case in which the tension between State practice and legal principle is unparalleled. It concludes, in Paragraph 2E of the dispositif, that,

> "It follows from the above-mentioned requirements that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of international humanitarian law."

That conclusion, while imprecise, is not unreasonable. The use of nuclear weapons is, for the reasons examined above, exceptionally difficult to reconcile with the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, particularly the principles and rules of international humanitarian law. But that is by no means to say that the use of nuclear weapons, in any and all circumstances, would necessarily and invariably conflict with those rules of international law. On the contrary, as the dispositif in effect acknowledges, while they might "generally" do so, in specific cases they might not. It all depends upon the facts of the case.

Extreme Circumstances of Self-Defence and State Survival

The just-quoted first paragraph of Paragraph 2E of the holdings is followed by the Court's ultimate, paramount - and sharply controverted - conclusion in the case, narrowly adopted by the President's casting vote:

> "However, in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake."

This is an astounding conclusion to be reached by the International Court of Justice. Despite the fact that its Statute "forms an integral part" of the United Nations Charter, and despite the comprehensive and categorical terms of Article 2, paragraph 4, and Article 51 of that Charter, the Court concludes on the supreme issue of the threat or use of force of our age that it has no opinion. In "an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake", the Court finds that international law and hence the Court have nothing to say. After many months of agonizing appraisal of the law, the Court discovers that there is none. When it comes to the supreme interests of State, the Court discards the legal progress of the Twentieth Century, puts aside the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations of which it is "the principal judicial organ", and proclaims, in terms redolent of Realpolitik, its ambivalence about the most important provisions of modern international law. If this was to be its ultimate holding, the Court would have done better to have drawn on its undoubted discretion not to render an Opinion at all.

Neither predominant legal theory (as most definitively developed by Lauterpacht in The Function of Law in the International Community, 1933) nor the precedent of this Court admit a holding of non liquet, still less a holding - or inability to hold - of such a fundamental character. Lauterpacht wrote most pertinently (and, as it has turned out, presciently):

> "There is not the slightest relation between the content of the right to self-defence and the claim that it is above the law and not amenable to evaluation by law. Such a claim is self-contradictory, inasmuch as it purports to be based on legal right, and as, at the same time, it dissociates itself from regulation and evaluation by the law. Like any other dispute involving important issues, so also the question of the right of recourse to war in self-defence is in itself capable of judicial decision . . ." (At p. 180.)

Indeed, the drafters of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice crafted the provisions of Article 38 of its Statute - provisions which Article 38 of the Statute of this Court maintains - in order, in the words of the President of the Advisory Committee of Jurists, to avoid "especially the blind alley of non liquet". To do so, they adopted the Root-Phillimore proposal to empower the Court to apply not only international conventions and international custom but "the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations". (Permanent Court of International Justice, Advisory Committee of Jurists, Procès-Verbaux of the Proceedings of the Committee, June 16th-July 24th, 1920, The Hague, 1920, pp. 332, 344. See also pp. 296 ("A rule must be established to meet this eventuality, to avoid the possibility of the Court declaring itself incompetent (non liquet) though lack of applicable rules"); 307-320, and 336 (the reference to general principles "was necessary to meet the possibility of a non-liquet").

Moreover, far from justifying the Court's inconclusiveness, contemporary events rather demonstrate the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons in extraordinary circumstances.

Desert Storm

The most recent and effective threat of the use of nuclear weapons took place on the eve of "Desert Storm". The circumstances merit exposition, for they constitute a striking illustration of a circumstance in which the perceived threat of the use of nuclear weapons was not only eminently lawful but intensely desirable.

Iraq, condemned by the Security Council for its invasion and annexation of Kuwait and for its attendant grave breaches of international humanitarian law, had demonstrated that it was prepared to use weapons of mass destruction. It had recently and repeatedly used gas in large quantities against the military formations of Iran, with substantial and perhaps decisive effect. It had even used gas against its own Kurdish citizens. There was no ground for believing that legal or humanitarian scruple would prevent it from using weapons of mass destruction - notably chemical, perhaps bacteriological or nuclear weapons - against the coalition forces arrayed against it. Moreover, it was engaged in extraordinary efforts to construct nuclear weapons in violation of its obligations as a Party to the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

General Norman Schwarzkopf stated on 10 January 1996 over national public television in the United States on "Frontline":

> "My nightmare scenario was that our forces would attack into Iraq and find themselves in such a great concentration that they became targeted by chemical weapons or some sort of rudimentary nuclear device that would cause mass casualties.
> That's exactly what the Iraqis did in the Iran-Iraq war. They would take the attacking masses of the Iranians, let them run up against their barrier system, and when there were thousands of people massed against the barrier system, they would drop chemical weapons on them and kill thousands of people." (Frontline, Show #1408, "The Gulf War," Transcript of Journal Graphics, Inc., Part II, p. 5.)

To exorcise that nightmare, the United States took action as described by then Secretary of State James A. Baker in the following terms, in which he recounts his climactic meeting of 9 January 1990 in Geneva with the then Foreign Minister of Iraq, Tariq Aziz:

> "I then made a point 'on the dark side of the issue' that Colin Powell had specifically asked me to deliver in the plainest possible terms. 'If the conflict involves your use of chemical or biological weapons against our forces,' I warned, 'the American people will demand vengeance. We have the means to exact it. With regard to this part of my presentation, that is not a threat, it is a promise. If there is any use of weapons like that, our objective won't just be the liberation of Kuwait, but the elimination of the current Iraqi regime, and anyone responsible for using those weapons would be held accountable.'
>
> "The President had decided, at Camp David in December, that the best deterrent of the use of weapons of mass destruction by Iraq would be a threat to go after the Ba'ath regime itself. He had also decided that U.S. forces would not retaliate with chemical or nuclear response if the Iraqis attacked with chemical munitions. There was obviously no reason to inform the Iraqis of this. In hope of persuading them to consider more soberly the folly of war, I purposely left the impression that the use of chemical or biological agents by Iraq could invite tactical nuclear retaliation. (We do not really know whether this was the reason there appears to have been no confirmed use by Iraq of chemical weapons during the war. My own view is that the calculated ambiguity how we might respond has to be part of the reason.)" (The Politics of Diplomacy - Revolution, War and Peace, 1989-1992 by James A. Baker III, 1995, p. 359.)

In "Frontline", Mr. Baker adds:

> "The president's letter to Saddam Hussein, which Tariq Aziz read in Geneva, made it very clear that if Iraq used weapons of mass destruction, chemical weapons, against United States forces that the American people would - would demand vengeance and that we had the means to achieve it." (Loc. cit., Part I, p. 13.)

Mr. Aziz is then portrayed on the screen immediately thereafter as saying:

> "I read it very carefully and then when I ended reading it, I told him, 'Look, Mr. Secretary, this is not the kind of correspondence between two heads of state. This is a letter of threat and I cannot receive from you a letter of threat to my president,' and I returned it to him." (Ibid.)

At another point in the programme, the following statements were made:

"NARRATOR: The Marines waited for a chemical attack. It never came.

TARIQ AZIZ: We didn't think that it was wise to use them. That's all what I can say. That was not - was not wise to use such kind of weapons in such kind of a war with - with such an enemy." (Loc. cit., Part II, p. 7.)

In The Washington Post of 26 August 1995, an article datelined United Nations, 25 August was published as follows:

"Iraq has released to the United Nations new evidence that it was prepared to use deadly toxins and bacteria against U.S. and allied forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf War that liberated Kuwait from its Iraqi occupiers, U.N. Ambassador Rolf Ekeus said today.

"Ekeus, the chief U.N. investigator of Iraq's weapons programs, said Iraqi officials admitted to him in Baghdad last week that in December 1990 they loaded three types of biological agents into roughly 200 missile warheads and aircraft bombs that were then distributed to air bases and a missile site.

"The Iraqis began this process the day after the U.N. Security Council voted to authorize using 'all necessary means' to liberate Kuwait, Ekeus said. He said the action was akin to playing 'Russian roulette' with extraordinarily dangerous weapons on the eve of war.

"U.S. and U.N. officials said the Iraqi weapons contained enough biological agents to have killed hundreds of thousands of people and spread horrible diseases in cities or military bases in Israel, Saudi Arabia or wherever Iraq aimed the medium range missiles or squeaked a bomb-laden aircraft through enemy air defenses.

"Ekeus said Iraqi officials claimed they decided not to use the weapons after receiving a strong but ambiguously worded warning from the Bush administration on Jan. 9, 1991, that any use of unconventional warfare would provoke a devastating response.

"Iraq's leadership assumed this meant Washington would retaliate with nuclear weapons, Ekeus said he was told. U.N. officials said they believe the statement by Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz is the first authoritative account for why Iraq did not employ the biological or chemical arms at its disposal.

"Iraqi officials said the documents were hidden by Hussein Kamel Hassan Majeed, the director of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction program who fled to Jordan on Aug. 7 and whose defection prompted Iraq to summon Ekeus to hear the new disclosures . . .

"Iraq admitted to filling a total of 150 aircraft bombs with botulinum toxin and bacteria capable of causing anthrax disease, each of which is among the most deadly substances known and can kill in extremely small quantities, Ekeus said. It also claimed to have put the two agents into 25 warheads to be carried by a medium range rocket.

"According to what Aziz told Ekeus on Aug. 4, then-Secretary of State James A. Baker III delivered the U.S. threat of grievous retaliation that caused Iraq to hold back during a tens four-hour meeting in Geneva about five weeks before the beginning of the U.S.-led Desert Storm military campaign. Baker hinted at a U.S. response that would set Iraq back years by reducing its industry to rubble.

"Ekeus said that Aziz told him Iraq 'translated' the warning into a threat that Washington would respond with nuclear arms. In fact, then-Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Colin L. Powell and other U.S. military leaders had decided early on that nuclear weapons were not needed and no such retaliatory plans existed." (The Washington Post, 26 August 1995, p. A1. See also the report in The New York Times, 26 August 1995, p. 3. For a contrasting contention by Iraq that "authority to launch biological and chemical war-heads was pre-delegated in the event that Baghdad was hit by nuclear weapons during the Gulf war", see the 8th Report to the Security Council by the Executive Chairman of the Special Commission (Ambassador Ekeus), U.N. document S/1995/864 of 11 October 1996, p. 11. That Report continues: "This pre-delegation does not exclude the alternative use of such capability and therefore does not constitute proof of only intentions concerning second use." (Ibid.)

Finally, there is the following answer by Ambassador Ekeus to a question in the course of testimony in hearings on global proliferation of weapons of mass destruction of 20 March 1996:

". . . I have had conversation with the Deputy Prime Minister of Iraq, Tariq Aziz, in which he made references to his meeting with Secretary of State James Baker in Geneva just before the outbreak of war. He, Tariq Aziz, says that Baker told him to the effect that if such [chemical or biological] weapons were applied there would be a very strong reaction from the United States.

"Tariq Aziz did not imply that Baker mentioned what type of reaction. But he told me that the Iraqi side took it for granted that it meant the use of maybe nuclear weapons against Baghdad, or something like that. And that threat was decisive for them not to use the weapons.

"But this is the story he, Aziz, tells. I think one should be very careful about buying it. I don't say that he must be wrong, but I believe there are strong reasons that this may be an explanation he offers of why Iraq lost the war in Kuwait. This is the story which they gladly tell everyone who talks to them. So I think one should be cautious at least about buying that story. I think still it is an open question." (Testimony of Ambassador Rolf Ekeus before the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the United States Senate, Hearings on the Global Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction, in press.)

Thus there is on record remarkable evidence indicating that an aggressor was or may have been deterred from using outlawed weapons of mass destruction against forces and countries arrayed against its aggression at the call of the United Nations by what the aggressor perceived to be a threat to use nuclear weapons against it should it first use weapons of mass destruction against the forces of the coalition. Can it seriously be maintained that Mr. Baker's calculated - and apparently successful - threat was unlawful? Surely the principles of the United Nations Charter were sustained rather than transgressed by the threat. "Desert Storm" and the resolutions of the Security Council that preceded and followed it may represent the greatest achievement of the principles of collective security since the founding of the League of Nations. The defeat of this supreme effort of the United Nations to overcome an act of aggression by the use of weapons of mass destruction against coalition forces and countries would have been catastrophic, not only for coalition forces and populations, but for those principles and for the United Nations. But the United Nations did triumph, and to that triumph what Iraq perceived as a threat to use nuclear weapons against it may have made a critical contribution. Nor is this a case of the end justifying the means. It rather demonstrates that, in some circumstances, the threat of the use of nuclear weapons - as long as they remain weapons unproscribed by international law - may be both lawful and rational.

Furthermore, had Iraq employed chemical or biological weapons - prohibited weapons of mass destruction - against coalition forces, that would have been a wrong in international law giving rise to the right of belligerent reprisal. Even if, arguendo, the use of nuclear weapons were to be treated as also prohibited, their proportionate use by way of belligerent reprisal in order to deter further use of chemical or biological weapons would have been lawful. At any rate, this would be so if the terms of a prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons did not debar use in reprisal or obligate States "never under any circumstances" to use nuclear weapons, as they will be debarred by those terms from using chemical weapons under Article I of the Convention on the Prohibition of the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and on Their Destruction of 1993, should it come into force. In paragraph 46 of its Opinion, the Court states that, on the question of belligerent reprisals, "any" right of such recourse would, "like self-defence, be governed inter alia by the principle of proportionality." The citation of that latter principle among others is correct, but any doubt that the Court's reference may raise about the existence of a right of belligerent reprisal is not. Such a doubt would be unsupported not only by the customary law of war and by military manuals of States issued in pursuance of it, which have long affirmed the principle and practice of belligerent reprisal, but by the terms of the Geneva Conventions and its Additional Protocols, which prohibit reprisals not generally but in specific cases (against prisoners-of-war, the wounded, civilians, certain objects and installations, etc.) The far-reaching additional restrictions on reprisals of Protocol I, which bind only its Parties, not only do not altogether prohibit belligerent reprisals; those restrictions as well as other innovations of Protocol I were understood at the time of their preparation and adoption not to govern nuclear weapons.

There is another lesson in this example, namely, that as long as what are sometimes styled as "rogue States" menace the world (whether they are or are not Parties to the NPT), it would be imprudent to set policy on the basis that the threat or use of nuclear weapons is unlawful "in any circumstance". Indeed, it may not only be rogue States but criminals or fanatics whose threats or acts of terrorism conceivably may require a nuclear deterrent or response.

Article VI of the NPT

Finally, I have my doubts about the Court's last operative conclusion in Paragraph 2F: "There exists an obligation to pursue in good faith and bring to a conclusion negotiations leading to nuclear disarmament in all its aspects under strict and effective international control." If this obligation is that only of "Each of the Parties to the Treaty" as Article VI of the Non-Proliferation Treaty states, this is another anodyne asseveration of the obvious, like those contained in operative Paragraphs 2A, 2B, 2C and 2D. If it applies to States not party to the NPT, it would be a dubious holding. It would not be a conclusion that was advanced in any quarter in these proceedings; it would have been subjected to no demonstration of authority, to no test of advocacy; and it would not be a conclusion that could easily be reconciled with the fundamentals of international law. In any event, since Paragraph 2F is not responsive to the question put to the Court by the General Assembly, it is to be treated as dictum.

I. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

MY OPPOSITION TO THE COURT'S DECISION TO RENDER AN OPINION IN RESPONSE TO THE REQUEST UNDER GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTION 49/75K IN THIS CASE

1. As the only Judge who voted against paragraph (1) of the operative part of the Court's Opinion, I would like to state my firm conviction that the Court, for reasons of judicial propriety and economy, should have exercised its discretionary power to refrain from rendering an opinion in response to the request for advisory opinion submitted by the United Nations General Assembly under its resolution 49/75K of 15 December 1994. I am sorry to have to say that the conclusions the Court has now reached do not appear to me to constitute substantive or substantial answers to the questions that the General Assembly wanted to raise by means of its resolution and occasion doubts about the credibility of the Court.

(1) The Inadequacy of the Question put by the General Assembly in the Resolution as the Request for Advisory Opinion

2. (The request laid down in resolution 49/75K) The question put to the Court by the General Assembly, under resolution 49/75K within the framework of the agenda item: "General and complete disarmament", reads strangely. It is worded as follows:

> "Is the threat or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance permitted under international law?"
> (the French text reads: "Est-il permis en droit international de recourir à la menace ou à l'emploi d'armes nucléaires en toute circonstance?")

The Court's Opinion points out the difference between the English and the French texts of the Request and states that "[t]he Court finds it unnecessary to pronounce on the possible divergences" (Court's Opinion, para. 20). We should, however, note that the resolution which originated in draft resolution A/C.1/49/L.36 (original: English), prepared and introduced by Indonesia (on behalf of the States Members of the United Nations that are members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries), was originally drafted in English and that, in the First Committee at the 49th Session (1994) which took up this draft resolution, the content of this original English text was not questioned by any delegate. Moreover, it would seem that the francophone delegates raised no question about the text of the French translation, as far as the verbatim records indicate. I shall therefore proceed with my analysis bas the English text.

3. (The request was presented to the Court, not so much in order to ascertain its opinion as to seek the endorsement of an alleged legal axiom) When putting this question to the Court, the General Assembly - or those States which took the initiative in drafting the Request - clearly never expected that it would give an answer in the affirmative stating that: "Yes, the threat or use of nuclear weapons is permitted under international law in any circumstance [or, in all circumstances]". If this is true, it follows that, in fact, the General Assembly only expected the Court to state that: "No, the threat or use of nuclear weapons is not permitted under international law in any circumstance". The General Assembly, by asking the question that it did, wished to obtain nothing more than the Court's endorsement of the latter conclusion.

Since the Court was simply asked in this instance to give an opinion endorsing what is, in the view of the General Assembly, a legal axiom to the effect that "the threat or use of nuclear weapons is not permitted under international law in any circumstance", I wonder if the Request really does fall within the category of a request for advisory opinion within the meaning of Article 96(1) of the Charter of the United Nations. In the history of the advisory function of the Court, a simple endorsement or approval of what either the General Assembly or the Security Council believed

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE SHAHABUDDEEN

The Charter was signed on 26 June 1945. A less troubled world was its promise. But the clash of arms could still be heard. A new weapon was yet to come. It must first be tested. The date was 12 July 1945; the place Alamogordo. The countdown began. The moment came: "The radiance of a thousand suns." That was the line which came to the mind of the leader of the scientific team. He remembered also the end of the ancient verse: "I am become death, The Shattered of Worlds".

By later standards, it was a small explosion. Bigger bombs have since been made. Five declared nuclear-weapon States possess them. The prospect of mankind being destroyed through a nuclear war exists. The books of some early peoples taught that the use of a super weapon which might lead to excessively destructive results was not allowed. What does contemporary international law have to say on the point?

That, in substance, is the General Assembly's question. The question raises the difficult issue as to whether, in the special circumstances of the use of nuclear weapons, it is possible to reconcile the imperative need of a State to defend itself with the no less imperative need to ensure that, in doing so, it does not imperil the survival of the human species. If a reconciliation is not possible, which side should give way? Is the problem thus posed one of law? If so, what lines of legal inquiry suggest themselves?

Overruling preliminary arguments, the Court, with near unanimity, decided to comply with the General Assembly's request for an advisory opinion on the question whether "the threat or use of nuclear weapons [is] in any circumstance permitted under international law". By a bare majority, it then proceeded to reply to the General Assembly's question by taking the position, on its own showing, that it cannot answer the substance of the question. I fear that the contradiction between promise and performance cannot, really, be concealed. With respect, I am of the view that the Court should and could have answered the General Assembly's question - one way or another.

From the point of view of the basic legal principles involved, the reply of the Court, such as it is, is set out in the first part of subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of its Advisory Opinion. Subject to a reservation about the use of the word "generally", I agree with the Court "that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law".

My difficulty is with the second part of subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion. If the use of nuclear weapons is lawful, the nature of the weapon, combined with the requirements of necessity and proportionality which condition the exercise of the inherent right of self-defence, would suggest that such weapons could only be lawfully used "in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake"; and this, I think, notwithstanding variations in formulation and flexible references to "vital security interests", is the general theme underlying the position taken by the nuclear weapon States. That in turn must be the main issue presented for consideration by the Court. But this is exactly the issue that the Court says it cannot decide, with the result that the General Assembly has not received an answer to the substance of its question.

I have the misfortune to be unable to subscribe to the conclusion so reached by the Court, and the more so for the reason that, when that conclusion is assessed by reference to the received view of the "Lotus" case, the inference could be that the Court is saying that there is a possibility that the use of nuclear weapons could be lawful in certain circumstances and that it is up to States to decide whether that possibility exists in particular circumstances, a result which would give me difficulty. In my respectful view, "the current state of international law, and ... the elements of fact at its disposal" permitted the Court to answer one way or another.

As the two parts of subparagraph E cannot be separated for the purpose of voting, I have been regretfully constrained to withhold support from this subparagraph. Further, as the point of disagreement goes to the heart of the case, I have elected to use the style "Dissenting Opinion", even though voting for most of the remaining items of the operative paragraph.

A second holding which I am unable to support is subparagraph B of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph. The specificity conveyed by the words "as such" enables me to recognize that "[t]here is in neither customary nor conventional international law any comprehensive and universal prohibition of the threat or use of nuclear weapons as such". But the words "as such" do not outweigh a general suggestion that there is no prohibition at all of the use of nuclear weapons. The circumstance that there is no "comprehensive and universal prohibition of the threat or use of nuclear weapons as such" in customary or conventional international law does not conclude the question whether the threat or use of such weapons is lawful; more general principles have to be consulted. Further, for reasons to be given later, the test of prohibition does not suffice to determine whether there is a right to do an act with the magnitude of global implications which would be involved in such use. Finally, the holding in this subparagraph is a step in the reasoning; it does not properly form part of the Court's reply to the General Assembly's question.

As remarked above, I have voted for the remaining items of the operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion. However, a word of explanation is appropriate. The Court's voting practice does not always allow for a precise statement of a judge's position on the elements of a dispositif to be indicated through his vote; how he votes would depend on his perception of the general direction taken by such an element and of any risk of his basic position being misunderstood. A declaration, separate opinion or dissenting opinion provides needed opportunity for explanation of subsidiary difficulties. This I now give below in respect of those parts of the operative paragraph for which I have voted.

As to subparagraph A of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph, I take the view, to some extent implicit in this subparagraph, that, at any rate in a case of this kind, the action of a State is unlawful unless it is authorized under international law; the mere absence of prohibition is not enough. In the case of nuclear weapons, there is no authorization, whether specific or otherwise. However, subparagraph A is also a step in the reasoning; it is not properly part of the Court's reply to the General Assembly's question.

As to subparagraph C of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph, there is an implication here that a "threat or use of force by means of nuclear weapons that is contrary to Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter" may nevertheless be capable of complying with some or all of the requirements of Article 51 and would in that event be lawful. I should have thought that something which was "contrary" to the former was ipso facto illegal and not capable of being redeemed by meeting any of the requirements of the latter. Thus, an act of aggression, being contrary to Article 2, paragraph 4, is wholly outside of the framework of Article 51, even if carried out with antiquated rifles and in strict conformity with humanitarian law. Further, it is difficult to see how the Court can allow itself to be suggesting here that there are circumstances in which the threat or use of nuclear weapons is lawful in view of the fact that in subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph it has not been able to come to a definitive conclusion on the main issue as to whether the threat or use of such weapons is lawful or unlawful in the circumstances stated there.

As to subparagraph D of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph, the statement that a "threat or use of nuclear weapons should also be compatible with the requirements of the international law applicable in armed conflict..." suggests the possibility of cases of compatibility and consequently of legality. As mentioned above, it is difficult to see how the Court can take this position in view of its inability to decide the real issue of legality. The word "should" is also out of place in a finding as to what is the true position in law.

As to subparagraph F of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph, I have voted for this as a general proposition having regard to the character of nuclear weapons. The particular question as to the legal implications of Article VI of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (" NPT") is not before the Court; it does not form part of the General Assembly's question. It could well be the subject of a separate question as to the effect of that Article of the NPT, were the General Assembly minded to present one.

Going beyond the operative paragraph, I have hesitations on certain aspects of the consideranda but do not regard it as convenient to list them all. I should however mention paragraph 104 of the Advisory Opinion. To the extent that this reproduces the standing jurisprudence of the Court, I do not see the point of the paragraph. If it ventures beyond, I do not agree. The operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion has to be left to be interpreted in accordance with the settled jurisprudence on the point.

Returning to subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion, I propose to set out below my reasons for agreeing with this holding in so far as I agree with it and for disagreeing with it in so far as I disagree. The limited objective will be to show that, contrary to the Court's major conclusion, "the current state of international law, and ... the elements of fact at its disposal" were sufficient to enable it to "conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake". With this end in view, I propose, after noticing some introductory and miscellaneous matters in Part I, to deal, in Part II, with the question whether States have a right to use nuclear weapons having regard to the general principles which determine when States are to be considered as having a power, and, in Part III, with the position under international humanitarian law. In Part IV, I consider whether a prohibitory rule, if it existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, was modified or rescinded by the emergence of a subsequent rule of customary international law. I pass on in Part V to consider denuclearization treaties and the NPT. The conclusion is reached in Part VI.

PART I. INTRODUCTORY AND MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS

1. The main issue

The commencement of the nuclear age represents a legal benchmark for the case in hand. One argument was that, at that point of time, the use of nuclear weapons was not prohibited under international law, but that a prohibitory rule later emerged, the necessary opinio juris developing under the twin influences of the general prohibition of the use of force laid down in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter and of growing appreciation of and sensitivity to the power of nuclear weapons. In view of the position taken by the proponents of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons ("proponents of legality") over the past five decades, it will be difficult to establish that the necessary opinio juris later crystallised, if none existed earlier. That argument was not followed by most of the proponents of the illegality of the use of nuclear weapons ("proponents of illegality").

The position generally taken by the proponents of illegality was that a prohibitory rule existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, and that subsequent developments merely evidenced the continuing existence of that rule. For their part, the proponents of legality took the position that such a prohibitory rule never existed, and that what subsequent developments did was to evidence the continuing non-existence of any such rule and a corresponding right to use nuclear weapons. There was no issue as to whether, supposing that a prohibitory rule existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, it might have been reversed or modified by the development of a later rule in the opposite direction [For the possibility of a rule of customary international law being modified by later inconsistent State practice, see Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 109, para. 207.] ; supposing that that had been argued, the position taken by the proponents of illegality would bar the development of the opinio juris necessary for the subsequent emergence of any such permissive rule, and more particularly so if the earlier prohibitory rule had the quality of ius cogens. This would have been the case if any humanitarian principles on which the earlier prohibitory rule was based themselves had the quality of ius cogens, a possibility left open by paragraph 83 of the Court's Advisory Opinion.

State practice is important. But it has to be considered within the framework of the issues raised. Within the framework of the issues raised in this case, State practice subsequent to the commencement of the nuclear age does not have the decisive importance suggested by the focus directed to it during the proceedings: it is not necessary to consider it in any detail beyond and above what is reasonably clear, namely, that the opposition shown by the proponents of legality would have prevented the development of a prohibitory rule if none previously existed, and that the opposition shown by the proponents of illegality would have prevented the development of a rescinding rule if a prohibitory rule previously existed. In either case, the legal situation as it existed at the commencement of the nuclear age would continue in force. The question is, what was that legal situation?

The real issue, then, is whether at the commencement of the nuclear age there was in existence a rule of international law which prohibited a State from creating effects of the kind which could later be produced by the use of nuclear weapons. If no such rule then existed, none has since come into being, and the case of the proponents of legality succeeds; if such a rule then existed, it has not since been rescinded, and the case of the proponents of illegality succeeds.

2. The Charter assumes that mankind and its civilisation will continue International law includes the principles of the law of armed conflict. These principles, with roots reaching into the past of different civilizations, were constructed on the unspoken premise that weapons, however destructive, would be limited in impact, both in space and in time. That assumption held good throughout the ages. New and deadlier weapons continued to appear, but none had the power to wage war on future generations or to threaten the survival of the human species. Until now.

Is a legal problem presented? I think there is; and this for the reason that, whatever may be the legal position of the individual in international law, if mankind in the broad is annihilated, States disappear and, with them, the basis on which rights and obligations exist within the international community. How might the problem be approached?
Courts, whether international or national, have not had to deal with the legal implications of actions which could annihilate mankind. Yet in neither system should there be difficulty in finding an answer; both systems must look to the juridical foundations on which they rest. What do these suggest?

In his critical study of history, Ibn Khaldûn referred to "the explanation that laws have their reason in the purposes they are to serve". Continuing, he noted that "the jurists mention that ... injustice invites the destruction of civilization with the necessary consequence that the species will be destroyed", and that the laws "are based upon the effort to preserve civilization" [Ibn Kaldûn, The Muqaddimah, An Introduction to History, trans. Franz Rosenthal, edited and abridged by N.J. Dawood, 1981, p. 40.]. Thus, the preservation of the human species and of civilization constitutes the ultimate purpose of a legal system. In my opinion, that purpose also belongs to international law, as this is understood today.

This conclusion is not at variance with the Charter of the United Nations and the Statute of the Court, by which the Court is bound. The first preambular paragraph of the Charter recorded that "the Peoples of the United Nations" were "[d]etermined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind...". A world free of conflict was not guaranteed; but, read in the light of that and other statements in the Charter, Article 9 of the Statute shows that the Court was intended to serve a civilized society. A civilized society is not one that knowingly destroys itself, or knowingly allows itself to be destroyed. A world without people is a world without States. The Charter did not stipulate that mankind would continue, but it at least assumed that it would; and the assumption was not the less fundamental for being implicit.

3. The use of nuclear weapons is unacceptable to the international community

It is necessary to consider the character of nuclear weapons. It was said on the part of the proponents of legality that there are "tactical", "battlefield", "theatre" or "clean" nuclear weapons which are no more destructive than certain conventional weapons. Supposing that this is so, then ex hypothesi the use of nuclear weapons of this kind would be as lawful as the use of conventional weapons. It was in issue, however, whether the material before the Court justified that hypothesis, the argument of the proponents of illegality being that the use of any nuclear weapon, even if directed against a lone nuclear submarine at sea or against an isolated military target in the desert, results in the emission of radiation and nuclear fall-out and carries the risk of triggering a chain of events which could lead to the annihilation of the human species. The eleventh preambular paragraph of the 1968 NPT, which was extended "indefinitely" in 1995, records that the States parties desired "the liquidation of all their existing stockpiles, and the elimination from national arsenals of nuclear weapons...". Presumably the elimination so foreshadowed comprehended all "nuclear weapons" and, therefore, "tactical", "battlefield", "theatre" or "clean" nuclear weapons also. The parties to the NPT drew no distinction. On the material before it, the Court could feel less than satisfied that the suggested exceptions exist.

The basic facts underlying the resolutions of the General Assembly as to the nature of a nuclear war, at least a full-scale one, are difficult to controvert. Since 1983 the technology has advanced, but the position even at that stage was put thus by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Javier Pérez de Cuéllar:

> "The world's stockpile of nuclear weapons today is equivalent to 16 billion tons of TNT. As against this, the entire devastation of the Second World War was caused by the expenditure of no more than 3 million tons of munitions. In other words, we possess a destructive capacity of more than 5,000 times what caused 40 to 50 million deaths not too long ago. It should suffice to kill every man, woman and child 10 times over." [Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, Statement at the University of Pennsylvania, 24 March 1983, in Disarmament, Vol. VI, No. 1, p. 91.]

Thus, nuclear weapons are not just another type of explosive weapons, only occupying a higher position on the same scale: their destructive power is exponentially greater. Apart from blast and heat, the radiation effects over time are devastating. To classify these effects as being merely a byproduct is not to the point; they can be just as extensive as, if not more so than, those immediately produced by blast and heat. They cause unspeakable sickness followed by painful death, affect the genetic code, damage the unborn, and can render the earth uninhabitable. These extended effects may not have military value for the user, but this does not lessen their gravity or the fact that they result from the use of nuclear weapons. This being the case, it is not relevant for present purposes to consider whether the injury produced is a byproduct or secondary effect of such use.

Nor is it always a case of the effects being immediately inflicted but manifesting their consequences in later ailments; nuclear fall-out may exert an impact on people long after the explosion, causing fresh injury to them in the course of time, including injury to future generations. The weapon continues to strike for years after the initial blow, thus presenting the disturbing and unique portrait of war being waged by a present generation on future ones - on future ones with which its successors could well be at peace.

The first and only military use of nuclear weapons which has so far been made took place at Hiroshima on 6 August 1945 and at Nagasaki on 9 August 1945. A month later, the International Committee of the Red Cross ("ICRC") considered the implications of the use of newly developed weapons. In a circular letter to national Red Cross committees, dated 5 September 1945 and signed by Mr. Max Huber as acting President, the ICRC wrote this:

> "La guerre totalitaire a fait naître de nouvelles techniques. Faut-il en conséquence admettre que l'individu cessera d'être juridiquement protégé et ne sera plus considéré que comme un simple élément de collectivités en lutte? Ce serait là l'écroulement des principes sur lesquels repose le droit international qui tend à la protection physique et spirituelle de la personne. Même en temps de guerre un droit strictement égoïste et utilitaire et qui ne s'inspirerait que d'intérêts occasionnels, ne saurait jamais offrir une sécurité durable. Si elle refuse à la personne humaine sa valeur et sa dignité, la guerre ira irrésistiblement à des destructions sans limite, puisque l'esprit des hommes, qui s'empare des forces de l'univers, semble, par ses créations, accélérer cet élan dévastateur."

Do the rules stand set aside? Or do they still apply to protect the individual? If they do not, the seizure by man of the forces of the universe propels war irresistibly and progressively in the direction of destruction without limit, including the extinction of the human species. In time, the nuclear-weapon States ("NWS") and most of the non-nuclear-weapon States ("NNWS") would subscribe to statements acknowledging the substance of this result.

The concerns raised by the ICRC did not go unechoed. As was pointed out by several States, four months later the General Assembly unanimously adopted a resolution by which it established a commission charged with the responsibility of making "specific proposals ...(c) for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction" (G.A. res. 0101, para. 5 of 24 January 1946). It is too limited a view to restrict the significance of the resolution to the mere establishment of the commission; the bases on which the commission was established are also important.

In line with this, on 20 September 1961 an agreement, known as "The McCloy-Zorin Accords", was signed by representatives of the United States of America and the Soviet Union, the two leading NWS. The Accords recommended eight principles as guidance for disarmament negotiations. The fifth principle read: "Elimination of all stockpiles of nuclear, chemical, bacteriological, and other weapons of mass destruction, and cessation of the production of such weapons." On 20 December 1961 that agreement was unanimously welcomed by the General Assembly on the joint proposition of those two States (General Assembly resolution 1722 (XVI) of 20 December 1961).

The first preamble to the 1968 NPT refers to "the devastation that would be visited upon all mankind by a nuclear war ...". The preamble to the NPT (inclusive of that statement) was reaffirmed in the first paragraph of the preamble to Decision No. 2 adopted by the 1995 Review and Extension Conference of the Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons. The overwhelming majority of States are parties to these instruments.

The Final Document adopted by consensus in 1978 by the Tenth Special Session of the General Assembly (on the subject of disarmament) opened with these words: "Alarmed by the threat to the very survival of mankind posed by the existence of nuclear weapons and the continuing arms race...". Paragraph 11 stated:

> "Mankind today is confronted with an unprecedented threat of self-extinction arising from the massive and competitive accumulation of the most destructive weapons ever produced. Existing arsenals of nuclear weapons alone are more than sufficient to destroy all life on earth..."

Paragraph 47 of the Final Document noted that "[n]uclear weapons pose the greatest danger to mankind and to the survival of civilization". All of these words, having been adopted by consensus, may be regarded as having been uttered with the united voice of the international community.

Important regional agreements also testify to the character of nuclear weapons. See the Agreement of Paris of 23 October 1954 on the entry of the Federal Republic of Germany into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Article 1*(a)* of Annex II to Protocol No. III on the Control of Armaments, indicating that nuclear weapons are weapons of mass destruction. The preamble to the 1967 Treaty of Tlatelolco, Additional Protocol II of which was signed and ratified by the five NWS, declared that the Parties were convinced > "That the incalculable destructive power of nuclear weapons has made it imperative that the legal prohibition of war should be strictly observed in practice if the survival of civilization and of mankind itself is to be assured.

> That nuclear weapons, whose terrible effects are suffered, indiscriminately and inexorably, by military forces and civilian population alike, constitute, through the persistence of the radioactivity they release, an attack on the integrity of the human species and ultimately may even render the whole earth uninhabitable."

The first two preambular paragraphs of the 1985 South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone Treaty (the Treaty of Rarotonga), Protocol 2 of which has been signed and ratified by two of the five NWS and signed by the remaining three, likewise recorded that the Parties were

> "Gravely concerned that the continuing nuclear arms race presents the risk of nuclear war which would have devastating consequences for all people;
> Convinced that all countries have an obligation to make every effort to achieve the goal of eliminating nuclear weapons, the terror which they hold for humankind and the threat which they pose to life on earth."

The Court has also referred to the more recently signed treaties on nuclear-free zones relating to South-East Asia and Africa. 5288

A position similar in principle to those mentioned above was taken in agreements between two of the NWS. In the preamble to a 1971 Agreement on Measures to Reduce the Risk of Outbreak of Nuclear War, the United States of America and the Soviet Union stated that they were "[t]aking into account the devastating consequences that nuclear war would have for all mankind". The substance of that statement was repeated in later agreements between those States, namely, in the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, in a 1973 Agreement on the Prevention of Nuclear War, in a 1979 Treaty on the Limitation of Strategic Offensive Arms, and in the 1987 Intermediate-Range and Shorter-Range Missiles Treaty.

It was argued by some States that the purpose of possessing nuclear weapons is, paradoxically, to ensure that they are never used, and that this is shown by the circumstance that it has been possible to keep the peace, as among the NWS, during the last fifty years through policies of nuclear deterrence. Other States doubted the existence of the suggested link of causation, attributing that result to luck or chance, pointing to occasions when such weapons were nearly used, and adverting to a number of wars and other situations of armed conflict which have in fact occurred outside of the territories of the NWS. Assuming, however, that such a link of causation can be shown, a question which remains is why should policies of nuclear deterrence have kept the peace as among the NWS. A reasonable answer is that each NWS itself recognized that it faced the risk of national destruction. The record before the Court indicates that that destruction will not stop at the frontiers of warring States, but can extend to encompass the obliteration of the human species.

Other weapons are also members of the category of weapons of mass destruction to which nuclear weapons belong. However, nuclear weapons are distinguishable in important ways from all other weapons, including other members of that category. In the words of the Court:

> "[N]uclear weapons are explosive devices whose energy results from the fusion or fission of the atom. By its very nature, that process, in nuclear weapons as they exist today, releases not only immense quantities of heat and energy, but also powerful and prolonged radiation. According to the material before the Court, the first two causes of damage are vastly more powerful than the damage caused by other weapons, while the phenomenon of radiation is said to be peculiar to nuclear weapons. These characteristics render the nuclear weapon potentially catastrophic. The destructive power of nuclear weapons cannot be contained in space or time. They have the potential to destroy all civilisation and the entire ecosystem of the planet." (Advisory Opinion, para. 35.)

And a little later:

> "[I]t is imperative for the Court to take account of the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons, and in particular their destructive capacity, their capacity to cause untold human suffering, and their ability to cause damage to generations to come." (Advisory Opinion, para. 36.)

Even if it is possible that, scientifically considered, other weapons of mass destruction, such as biological and chemical weapons, can also annihilate mankind, the question is not merely whether a weapon can do so, but whether the evidence shows that the international community considers that it can. The evidence was not specifically directed to this purpose in the case of other weapons; in the case nuclear weapons, it was, however, directed to that purpose and, the Court could find, successfully so directed. Similar remarks would apply to other weapons, such as flame-throwers and napalm, which, though not capable of annihilating mankind, can undoubtedly cause shocking harm. Unlike the case of nuclear weapons, there was no material before the Court to suggest that, however appalling may be the effects produced by the use of such other weapons, the international community was on record as considering their use to be repugnant to its conscience.

It may be added that, once it is shown that the use of a weapon could annihilate mankind, its repugnance to the conscience of the international community is not materially diminished by showing that it need not have that result in every case; it is not reasonable to expect that the conscience of the international community will, both strangely and impossibly, wait on the event to see if the result of any particular use is the destruction of the human species. The operative consideration is the risk of annihilation. That result may not ensue in all cases, but the risk that it can inheres in every case. The risk may be greater in some cases, less in others; but it is always present in sufficient measure to render the use of nuclear weapons unacceptable to the international community in all cases. In my view, the answer to the question of repugnance to the conscience of the international community governs throughout.

In sum, the Court could conclude, in accordance with its findings in paragraph 35 of its Advisory Opinion, that the international community as a whole considers that nuclear weapons are not merely weapons of mass destruction, but that there is a clear and palpable risk that their use could accomplish the destruction of mankind, with the result that any such use would be repugnant to the conscience of the community. What legal consequences follow will be examined later.

4. Neutrality

A question was raised as to whether damage resulting to a neutral State from use of nuclear weapons in the territory of a belligerent State is a violation of the former's neutrality. I accept the affirmative answer suggested in Nauru's statement in the parallel case brought by the World Health Organization, as set out in paragraph 88 of the Court's Advisory Opinion. A number of incidents collected in the books does not persuade me to take a different view [See, for example, Roberto Ago, Addendum to the Eighth Report on State Responsibility, Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1980, Vol. II, Part I, pp. 35-36, para. 50.].

The principle, as stated in Article 1 of Hague Convention No. 5 of 1907 Regarding the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers and Persons in Case of War on Land, is that "[t]he territory of neutral powers is inviolable". The principle has not been understood to guarantee neutral States absolute immunity from the effects of armed conflict; the original purpose, it is said, was to preclude military invasion or bombardment of neutral territory, and otherwise to define complementary rights and obligations of neutrals and belligerents.

It is difficult, however, to appreciate how these considerations can operate to justify the use of nuclear weapons where the radiation effects which they emit extend to the inhabitants of neutral States and cause damage to them, their off-spring, their natural resources, and possibly put them under the necessity to leave their traditional homelands. The statement of an inhabitant of the Marshall Islands left little to be imagined. Considered in relation to the more dramatic catastrophe immediately produced and the military value to the user State, these effects may be spoken of as by-products of the main event; but, as argued above, that classification is without legal pertinence. The "by-products" are not remote economic or social consequences. Whether direct or indirect effects, they result from the use of nuclear weapons, for it is a property of such weapons that they emit radiation; their destructive effect on the enemy is largely due to their radiation effects. Such radiation has a high probability of transboundary penetration.

To say that these and other transboundary effects of the use of nuclear weapons do not violate the neutrality of third States in the absence of belligerent incursion or transboundary bombardment is to cast too heavy a burden on the proposition that neutrality is not an absolute guarantee of immunity to third States against all possible effects of the conduct of hostilities. The Fifth Hague Convention of 1907 does not define inviolability; nor does it say that the territory of a neutral State is violated only by belligerent incursion or bombardment. Accepting nevertheless that the object of the architects of the provision was to preclude military incursion or bombardment of neutral territory, it seems to me that that purpose, which was related to the then state of warfare, does not conclude the question whether, in terms of the principle, "the territory of neutral powers" is violated where that territory and its inhabitants are physically harmed by the effects of the use elsewhere of nuclear weapons in the ways in which it is possible for such harm to occur. The causes of the consequential suffering and the suffering itself are the same as those occurring in the zone of battle.

It was said, no doubt correctly, that no case was known in which a belligerent State had been held responsible for collateral damage in neutral territory for lawful acts of war committed outside of that territory. It may be recalled, however, that the possibilities of damage by nuclear fall-out did not previously exist; because of technological limitations, damage on neutral territory, as a practical matter, could only be committed by incursion or bombardment, in which cases there would be acts of war committed on the neutral territory itself. To the extent that the Trail Smelter type of situation was likely to be a significant consequence of acts of war, the occurrence of concrete situations in the pre-nuclear period has not been shown to the Court. Thus, while no case may have occurred in which a belligerent State has been held responsible for collateral damage in neutral territory for lawful acts of war committed outside of that territory, that is decisive of the present case only if it can be shown that there is no responsibility even where substantial physical effects of acts of war carried out elsewhere demonstrably extend to neutral territory. That cannot be persuasively shown; principle is against it. The causative act of war would have had the consequence of physically violating the territory of the neutral State. The 1907 Hague principle that the territory of a neutral State is inviolable would lose much of its meaning if in such a case it was not considered to be breached.

5. Belligerent reprisal

The question was argued whether, assuming that the use of nuclear weapons was otherwise unlawful, such use might nevertheless be lawful for the exceptional purposes of belligerent reprisal (i.e., as distinguished from reprisals in situations other than those of armed conflict). It seems to me, however, that there is not any necessity to examine this aspect in an opinion devoted to showing that "the current state of international law, and ... the elements of fact at its disposal" did not prevent the Court from concluding "definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake". The use of nuclear weapons in belligerent reprisal, if lawful, would be equally open to an aggressor State and to a State acting in self-defence. This being so, an inquiry into the lawfulness of the use of such weapons in belligerent reprisal would not materially promote analysis of the question whether they may be lawfully used in self-defence, this being the question presented by the Court's holding.

6. There is no non liquet

The commentators suggest that some decisions of the Court could be understood as implying a non liquet. It is possible that the second part of subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion will be similarly interpreted. If that is the correct interpretation, I respectfully differ from the position taken by the Court.

To attract the idea of a non liquet in this case, it would have to be shown that there is a gap in the applicability of whatever may be the correct principles regulating the question as to the circumstances in which a State may be considered as having or as not having a right to act.

If, as it is said, international law has nothing to say on the subject of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons, this necessarily means that international law does not include a rule prohibiting such use. On the received view of the "Lotus" decision, absent such a prohibitory rule, States have a right to use nuclear weapons.
On the other hand, if that view of "Lotus" is incorrect or inadequate in the light of subsequent changes in the international legal structure, then the position is that States have no right to use such weapons unless international law authorises such use. If international law has nothing to say on the subject of the use of nuclear weapons, this necessarily means that international law does not include a rule authorising such use. Absent such authorisation, States do not have a right to use nuclear weapons.

It follows that, so far as this case at any rate is concerned, the principle on which the Court acts, be it one of prohibition or one of authorization, leaves no room unoccupied by law and consequently no space available to be filled by the non liquet doctrine or by arguments traceable to it. The fact that these are advisory proceedings and not contentious ones makes no difference; the law to be applied is the same in both cases.

7. The General Assembly's call for a convention

Putting aside the question of the possible law-making effect or influence of General Assembly resolutions, did its resolutions on this matter really take the position that the use of nuclear weapons was contrary to existing law? Arguing that that was not the position taken, some States point to the fact that the resolutions also called for the conclusion of a convention on the subject.

However, as the case of the Genocide Convention shows, the General Assembly could well consider that certain conduct would be a crime under existing law and yet call for the conclusion of a convention on the subject. Its resolution 96 (I) of 11 December 1946, which called for the preparation of "a draft convention on the crime of genocide", also affirmed "that genocide is a crime under international law..." It was likewise that, in its resolution of 14 December 1978, the General Assembly declared "that

> (a) The use of nuclear weapons will be a violation of the Charter of the United Nations and a crime against humanity;
> (b) The use of nuclear weapons should therefore be prohibited, pending nuclear disarmament."

It was on this basis that the resolution then passed on to mention the future discussion of an international convention on the subject.

A convention may be useful in focusing the attention of national bodies on the subject, particularly in respect of any action which may have to be taken by them; it may also be helpful in clarifying and settling details required to implement the main principle, or more generally for the purpose of laying down a regime for dealing with the illegality in question. A call for a convention to prohibit a particular kind of conduct does not necessarily imply that the conduct was not already forbidden.

A further argument is that some of the later General Assembly resolutions adopted a more qualified formulation than that of earlier ones (see paragraph 71 of the Advisory Opinion). I do not assign much weight to this as indicative of a resiling from the position taken in earlier General Assembly resolutions to the effect that such use was contrary to existing international law. The later resolutions proceeded on the basis that that position had already and sufficiently been taken; they therefore contented themselves with simply recalling the primary resolution on the subject, namely, resolution 1653 (XVI) of 1961. Thus, while the language employed in the resolutions has varied from time to time, it is to be observed that in resolution 47/53 of 9 December 1992 the General Assembly reaffirmed "that the use of nuclear weapons would be a violation of the Charter of the United Nations and a crime against humanity, as declared in its resolutions 1653 (XVI) of 24 November 1961," and other cited resolutions.

The General Assembly's resolutions may reasonably be interpreted as taking the position that the threat or use of nuclear weapons was forbidden under pre-existing international law. The question is whether there is a sufficiency of fact and law to enable the Court to decide whether the position so taken by the General Assembly was correct. To the giving of an answer I proceed below.

PART II. WHETHER THE COURT COULD HOLD THAT STATES HAVE A RIGHT TO USE NUCLEAR WEAPONS HAVING REGARD TO THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES WHICH DETERMINE WHEN A STATE IS TO BE CONSIDERED AS HAVING A POWER

The General Assembly's question presents the Court, as a World Court, with a dilemma: to hold that States have a right to use nuclear weapons is to affirm that they have a right to embark on a course of conduct which could result in the extinction of civilization, and indeed in the dissolution of all forms of life on the planet, both flora and fauna. On the other hand, to deny the existence of that right may seem to contradict the "Lotus" principle, relied on by some States, to the effect that States have a sovereign right to do whatever is not prohibited under international law, in this respect it being said that there is no principle of international law which prohibits the use of such weapons. The dilemma was the subject of close debate. In my view, it was open to the Court to consider four possible solutions. [The dilemma recalls that which confronted the learned judges of Persia when, asked by King Cambyses whether he could marry his sister, they made the prudent answer "that though they could discover no law which allowed brother to marry sister, there was undoubtedly a law which permitted the king of Persia to do what he pleased". See Herodotus, The Histories, trans. Aubrey de Sélincourt, Penguin Books, 1959, p. 187. So here, an affirmative answer to the General Assembly's question would mean that, while the Court could discover no law allowing a State to put the planet to death, there is undoubtably a law which permits the State to accomplish the same result through an exercise of its sovereign powers.]

*

The first possible solution proceeds on the basis of the "Lotus" principle that a State has a right to do whatever is not prohibited, but it argues that an act which could lead to the extinction of mankind would necessarily involve the destruction of neutral States. This being so, the act cannot be justified under the rubric of self-defence. Therefore, even if, quod non, it is otherwise admissible under the ius in bello, the Court could hold that it is not covered by the ius ad bellum and is prohibited under Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter. The question of neutrality is dealt with in Part I, section 4, above.

*

The second possible solution also proceeds on the basis of the "Lotus" principle. However, it argues that, due effect being given to the Charter and the Statute of the Court thereto annexed, by both of which the Court is bound, these instruments are not consistent with a State having a right to do an act which would defeat their fundamental assumption that civilization and mankind would continue: the Court could hold that, by operation of law, any such inconsistent act stands prohibited by the Charter.

The third possible solution also proceeds on the basis of the "Lotus" principle that a State has a right to do whatever is not prohibited under international law, but (as anticipated in Part I, section 2, above) it argues that, even in the absence of a prohibition, that residual right does not extend to the doing of things which, by reason of their essential nature, cannot form the subject of a right, such as actions which could destroy mankind and civilization and thus bring to an end the basis on which States exist and in turn the basis on which rights and obligations exist within the international community.

There is not any convincing ground for the view that the "Lotus" Court moved off on a supposition that States have an absolute sovereignty which would entitle them to do anything however horrid or repugnant to the sense of the international community, provided that the doing of it could not be shown to be prohibited under international law. The idea of internal supremacy associated with the concept of sovereignty in municipal law is not neatly applicable when that concept is transposed to the international plane. The existence of a number of sovereignties side by side places limits on the freedom of each State to act as if the others did not exist. These limits define an objective structural framework within which sovereignty must necessarily exist [The idea is evoked by the following remark of one writer: "For some authors, the existence of a corpus juris governing a decentralized, 'classless' society partakes of a miracle. I would rather say that it partakes of necessity. It is not in spite of, but on account of the heterogeneity of Sates in a society of juxtaposition that international law was brought into being and has developed. If international law did not exist, it would have to be invented." [Translation by the Registry.] Prosper Weil, "Le droit international en quête de son identité. Cours général de droit international public", Recueil des cours de l'Académie de droit international de La Haye, Vol. 237 (1992-VI), p. 36.]; the framework, and its defining limits, are implicit in the reference in "Lotus" to "co-existing independent communities" (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, p. 18), an idea subsequently improved on by the Charter, a noticeable emphasis on cooperation having been added.

Thus, however far-reaching may be the rights conferred by sovereignty, those rights cannot extend beyond the framework within which sovereignty itself exists; in particular, they cannot violate the framework. The framework shuts out the right of a State to embark on a course of action which would dismantle the basis of the framework by putting an end to civilization and annihilating mankind. It is not that a State is prohibited from exercising a right which, but for the prohibition, it would have; a State can have no such right to begin with.

So a prior question in this case is this: even if there is no prohibition, is there anything in the sovereignty of a State which would entitle it to embark on a course of action which could effectively wipe out the existence of all States by ending civilization and annihilating mankind? An affirmative answer is not reasonable; that sovereignty could not include such a right is suggested by the fact that the acting State would be one of what the Permanent Court of International Justice, in the language of the times, referred to as "co-existing independent communities", with a consequential duty to respect the sovereignty of other States. It is difficult for the Court to uphold a proposition that, absent a prohibition, a State has a right in law to act in ways which could deprive the sovereignty of all other States of meaning.

The fourth possible solution is this: if the "Lotus" principle leaves a State free to embark on any action whatsoever provided it is not prohibited - a proposition strongly supported by some States and as strenuously opposed by others - then, for the purposes of these proceedings at any rate, that case may be distinguished. The case did not relate to any act which could bring civilization to an end and annihilate mankind. It does not preclude a holding that there is no right to do such an act unless the act is one which is authorized under international law.

This fourth solution calls for fuller consideration than the others. It will be necessary to take account of three developments which bear on the extent to which modes of legal thought originating in an earlier age are applicable in today's world.

First, as set out in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter, and following on earlier developments, the right of recourse to force has come under a major restriction. This is a significant movement away from the heavy emphasis on individual sovereignty which marked international society as it earlier existed. The point was stressed by the Philippines and Samoa.

Second, there have been important developments concerning the character of the international community and of inter-State relations. While the number of States has increased, international relations have thickened; the world has grown closer. In the process, there has been a discernible movement from a select society of States to a universal international community. Thus it was that in 1984 a Chamber of the Court could speak of "the co-existence and vital co operation of the members of the international community" (Maritime Delimitation of the Gulf of Maine Area, I.C.J.Reports 1984, p. 299, para. 111). The earlier legal outlook has not lost all relevance. It is reasonably clear, however, that the previous stress on the individual sovereignty of each State considered as hortus conclusus has been inclining before a new awareness of the responsibility of each State as a member of a more cohesive and comprehensive system based on cooperation and interdependence.

These new developments have in part been consecrated by the Charter, in part set in motion by it. Their effect and direction were noticed by Judge Alvarez (Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of the Charter), I.C.J. Reports 1947-1948, p. 68, separate opinion). Doubts about his plea for a new international law did not obscure the fact that he was not alone in his central theme. Other judges observed that it was > "an undeniable fact that the tendency of all international activities in recent times has been towards the promotion of the common welfare of the international community with a corresponding restriction of the sovereign power of individual States" (Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 46, joint dissenting opinion of Judges Guerrero, McNair, Read and Hsu Mo).

Though elsewhere critical of "the theory which reduces the rights of States to competences assigned and portioned by international law" [Charles De Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public International Law, revised edition, trans. P.E. Corbett, 1968, p. 104.], Judge De Visscher, for his part, observed that "[t]he Charter has created an international system", and added:

> "[I]n the interpretation of a great international constitutional instrument, like the United Nations Charter, the individualistic concepts which are generally adequate in the interpretation of ordinary treaties, do not suffice." (International Status of South West Africa, I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 189, dissenting opinion.)

The Charter did not, of course, establish anything like world government; but it did organise international relations on the basis of an "international system"; and fundamental to that system was an assumption that the human species and its civilization would continue.

But, third, there have been developments working in the opposite direction, in the sense that it now, and for the first time, lies within the power of some States to destroy the entire system, and all mankind with it.

What lesson is to be drawn from these developments, the third being opposed to the first and the second?

The notions of sovereignty and independence which the "Lotus" Court had in mind did not evolve in a context which visualised the possibility that a single State could possess the capability of wiping out the practical existence both of itself and of all other States. The Court was dealing with a case of collision at sea and the criminal jurisdiction of States in relation thereto - scarcely an earth-shaking issue. Had its mind been directed to the possibility of the planet being destroyed by a minority of warring States, it is not likely that it would have left the position which it took without qualification. No more than this Court would have done when in 1986 it said that

> "in international law there are no rules, other than such rules as may be accepted by the State concerned, by treaty or otherwise, whereby the level of armaments of a sovereign State can be limited, and this principle is valid for all States without exception" (Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua, I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 135, para. 269).

The situation did not relate to the use of nuclear weapons; the Court's statement was directed to the right of a State to possess a level of armaments about the use of which no issue of legality had been raised. Caution needs to be exercised in extending the meaning of a judicial dictum to a field which was not in contemplation. The fact that he was dissenting does not diminish the value of Judge Badawi Pasha's reminder of problems which could arise "when a rule is removed from the framework in which it was formed, to another of different dimensions, to which it cannot adapt itself as easily as it did to its proper setting" (Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations I.C.J.Reports 1949, p. 215).

It is worth remembering, too, that, in his dissenting opinion in "Lotus", Judge Finlay understood the compromis to present an issue not as to whether there was "a rule forbidding" the prosecution, but as to "whether the principles of international law authorize" it. (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, p. 52.) In the early post-Charter period, Judge Alvarez specifically challenged the principle that States have "the right ... to do everything which is not expressly forbidden by international law". In his view, "This principle, formerly correct, in the days of absolute sovereignty, is no longer so at the present day." (Fisheries, I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 152, separate opinion.)

I do not consider now whether so general a challenge is maintainable. This is because it appears to me that there is a particular area in which "Lotus" is distinguishable. On what point does this limited distinction turn? It is this. Whichever way the issue in "Lotus" was determined, the Court's determination could be accommodated within the framework of an international society consisting of "co-existing independent communities". Not so as regards the issue whether there is a right to use nuclear weapons. Were the Court to uphold such a right, it would be upholding a right which could be used to destroy that framework and which could not therefore be accommodated within it. However extensive might be the powers available to a State, there is not any basis for supposing that the Permanent Court of International Justice considered that, in the absence of a prohibition, they included powers the exercise of which could extinguish civilization and annihilate mankind and thus destroy the framework of the international community; powers of this kind were not in issue. To the extent that a course of action could be followed by so apocalyptic a consequence, the case is distinguishable; it does not stand in the way of this Court holding that States do not have a right to embark on such a course of action unless, which is improbable, it can be shown that the action is authorized under international law.

It is the case that the formulations (and in particular the title) employed in various draft conventions appended to a number of General Assembly resolutions on the subject of nuclear weapons were cast in the terminology of prohibition. However, assuming that the correct theory is that authorisation under international law has to be shown for the use of nuclear weapons, this would not prevent States from concluding a formal prohibitory treaty; the fact that the draft conventions were directed to achieving a prohibition does not invalidate the view that authorisation has to be shown.

The terminology of prohibition is also to be found in the reasoning of the Tokyo District Court in Shimoda v. The State [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No. 8, 1964, p.235]. I do not consider that much can be made of this. The Tokyo District Court, being satisfied that the dropping of the bombs was prohibited under international law, was not called upon to consider whether, if there was no prohibition, it was necessary or an authorisation to be shown; the received statement of the law being, in its view, sufficient for a holding of unlawfulness, a sense of judicial economy could make it unnecessary for the Court to inquire whether the same holding could be sustained on another basis.

Can the required authorisation be shown in this case? It seems not. The Court is a creature of the Charter and the Statute. If it finds, as it should, that both the Charter and the Statute posit the continued existence of civilization and of mankind, it is difficult to see how it can avoid a holding that international law does not authorise a State to embark on a course of action which could ensue in the destruction of civilization and the annihilation of mankind.

PART III. WHETHER THE COURT COULD HOLD THAT THE USE OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS IS PROHIBITED BY HUMANITARIAN LAW

I propose now to consider the question of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons from the standpoint of some of the leading principles of humanitarian law (a term now generally used) which were in force at the commencement of the nuclear age. These principles relate to the right to choose means of warfare, the unnecessary suffering principle, and the Martens Clause.

1. The methods or means of warfare

This customary international law principle is restated in Article 35, paragraph 1, of Protocol Additional I of 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 as follows: "In any armed conflict, the right of the Parties to the conflict to choose methods or means of warfare is not unlimited." The principle has come under pressure from the continuing emergence of weapons with increasing destructive power, the tendency being to accept higher levels of destructiveness with growing powers of destruction. Its value would be further eroded if, as it is sometimes argued, all it does is to leave open the possibility that a weapon may be banned under some law other than that setting out the principle itself; but that argument cannot be right since, if it is, the principle would not be laying down a norm of State conduct and could not therefore be called a principle of international law. Paragraph 77 of the Court's Advisory Opinion recognizes that the principle is one of international law; it is not meaningless. Nor is it spent; its continuing existence was attested to by General Assembly resolution 2444 (XXIII), adopted unanimously on 19 December 1968. By that resolution the General Assembly affirmed

> "resolution XXVIII of the XXth International Conference of the Red Cross held at Vienna in 1965, which laid down, inter alia, the following principles for observance by all governmental and other authorities responsible for action in armed conflicts:
> (a) That the right of the parties to a conflict to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited;

5297

(b) That it is prohibited to launch attacks against the civilian populations as such;

(c) That distinction must be made at all times between persons taking part in the hostilities and members of the civilian population to the effect that the latter be spared as much as possible."

As is suggested by subparagraph (a), the principle limiting the right to choose means of warfare subsists. Notwithstanding an impression of non-use, it is capable of operation. In what way? The principle may be interpreted as intended to exclude the right to choose some weapons. What these might be was not specified, and understandably so. Yet, if, as it seems, the principle can apply to bar the use of some weapons, it is difficult to imagine how it could fail to bar the use of nuclear weapons; difficulties which may exist in applying the rule in less obvious cases disappear as more manifest ones appear. But, of course, imagination is not enough; a juridical course of reasoning has to be shown. How?

A useful beginning is to note that what is in issue is not the existence of the principle, but its application in a particular case. Its application does not require proof of the coming into being of an opinio juris prohibiting the use of the particular weapon; if that were so, one would be in the strange presence of a principle which could not be applied without proof of an opinio juris to support each application.

But how can the principle apply in the absence of a stated criterion? If the principle can operate to prohibit the use of some means of warfare, it necessarily implies that there is a criterion on the basis of which it can be determined whether a particular means is prohibited. What can that implied criterion be? As seems to be recognised by the Court, humanitarian considerations are admissible in the interpretation of the law of armed conflict (see paras. 86 and 92 of the Court's Advisory Opinion). Drawing on those considerations, and taking an approach based on the principle of effectiveness, it is reasonable to conclude that the criterion implied by the principle in question is set by considering whether the use of the particular weapon is acceptable to the sense of the international community; it is difficult to see how there could be a right to choose a means of warfare the use of which is repugnant to the sense of the international community.

In relation to some weapons, it may be difficult to establish, with evidential completeness, what is the sense of the international community. But the use of nuclear weapons falls, as it were, at the broad end of a range of possibilities, where difficulties of that kind evaporate. Unlike the case of conventional weapons, the use of nuclear weapons can result in the annihilation of mankind and of civilization. As it has been remarked, if all the explosive devices used throughout the world since the invention of gunpowder were to detonate at the same time, they could not result in the destruction of civilization; this could happen if recourse were made to the use of nuclear weapons, and with many to spare. The principle limiting the right to choose means of warfare assumed that, whatever might be the means of warfare lawfully used, it would continue to be possible for war to be waged on a civilized basis in future. Thus, however free a State may be in its choice of means, that freedom encounters a limiting factor when the use of a particular type of weapon could ensue in the destruction of civilization.

It may be added that, in judging of the admissibility of a particular means of warfare, it is necessary, in my opinion, to consider what the means can do in the ordinary course of warfare, even if it may not do it in all circumstances. A conclusion as to what nuclear weapons can do in the ordinary course of warfare is not speculative; it is a finding of fact. In advisory proceedings, the Court can make necessary determinations of fact (Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970), I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 27). For the reasons given, there is no difficulty in making one in this case.

In making a finding as to what is the sense of the international community, it is of course essential for the Court to consider the views held by States, provided that, for the reasons given above, there is no slippage into an assumption that, so far as concerns the particular principle in question, it is necessary to establish an opinio juris supportive of the existence of a specific rule prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons.

The views of States are available. The first General Assembly resolution, which was unanimously adopted on 24 January 1946, bears the interpretation that the General Assembly considered that the use of nuclear weapons is unacceptable to the international community; it is referred to above. Also there are the 1968 NPT and associated arrangements, dealt with more fully below. The Court may interpret these as amounting to a statement made both by the NWS and the NNWS to the effect that the actual use of nuclear weapons would be unacceptable to the international community, and that it is for this reason that efforts should be made to contain their spread under arrangements which committed all parties to work, in good faith, towards their final elimination. If the actual use of nuclear weapons is acceptable to the international community, it is difficult to perceive any credible basis for an arrangement which would limit the right to use them to some States, and more particularly if the latter could in some circumstances exercise that right against States not enjoying that exclusive right.

In the year following the conclusion of the NPT, the Institute of International Law, at its 1969 session in Edinburgh, had occasion to note that "existing international law prohibits the use of all weapons" (nuclear weapons being understood to be included) "which, by their nature, affect indiscriminately both military objectives and non-military objects, or both armed forces and civilian population". Whatever may be said of other such weapons, that view, expressed with near unanimity, is helpful not only for its high professional value, but also for its independent assessment of the unacceptability to the international community of the use of nuclear weapons. That assessment accurately reflected the basis on which the NPT arrangements had been concluded in the preceding year.

Other weapons share with nuclear weapons membership of the category of weapons of mass destruction. As mentioned above, however, it is open to the Court to take the view that the juridical criterion is not simply how destructive a weapon is, but whether its destructiveness is such as to cause the weapon to be considered by the international community to be unacceptable to it. The material before the Court (some of which was examined in Part I, section 3, above) is sufficient to enable the Court to conclude that, in the case of nuclear weapons, the revulsion of the international community is an established fact. Thus, the legal consequences in the specific case of nuclear weapons need not be the same for other weapons of mass destruction not already banned by treaty.

In Shimoda v. The State the plaintiffs' claims were dismissed on grounds not now material; the case remains the only judicial decision, national or international, in the field. It was decided by the Tokyo District Court on 7 December 1963. Though not of course binding, it ranks as a judicial decision under Article 38, paragraph 1*(d)*, of the Statute of the Court; it qualifies for consideration. A judicial conclusion different from that reached by the Tokyo District Court would need to explain why the reasoning of that Court was not acceptable.

The Tokyo District Court was deliberating over the proposition (based on expert legal opinion) "that the means which give unnecessary pain in war and inhumane means are prohibited as means of injuring the enemy" (The Japanese Annual of International Law, Vol. 8, 1964, p. 240). The proposition reflected two grounds invoked by Japan in its Note of protest of 10 August 1945 [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 240], in which it said:

> "It is a fundamental principle of international law in time of war that a belligerent has not an unlimited right in choosing the means of injuring the enemy, and should not use such > weapons, projectiles, and other material as cause unnecessary pain; and these are each expressly stipulated in the annex of the Convention respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land and articles 22 and 23(e) of the Regulations respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land." [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 252]

Article 22 of those Regulations concerned the right to adopt means of injuring the enemy, while Article 23 (e) concerned the unnecessary suffering principle.

The Tokyo District Court's reasoning dealt with both branches of the proposition before it, on an inter-related basis. It accepted that "international law respecting war is not formed only by humane feelings, but it has as its basis both military necessity and efficiency and humane feelings, and is formed by weighing these two factors" [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 240]. Consequently, "however great the inhumane result of a weapon may be, the use of the weapon is not prohibited by international law, if it has a great military efficiency" [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 241]. Nevertheless, the Tokyo District Court thought that it could "safely see that besides poison, poison gas and bacterium the use of the means of injuring the enemy which causes at least the same or more injury is prohibited by international law" [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 241].

The Tokyo District Court confined itself to the issue whether the particular use of atomic weapons at Hiroshima and Nagasaki was lawful, noticing but not deciding "an important and very difficult question", namely, "whether or not an atomic bomb having such a character and effect is a weapon which is permitted in international law as a so-called nuclear weapon..." [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No.8, 1964, p. 234]. Nevertheless, it is clear that in deciding the former issue, relating to the particular use, the Court's reasoning flowed from its consideration of the latter issue, relating to the legal status of such weapons. Thus, although the Tokyo District Court did not so decide, it followed from its reasoning that nuclear weapons would not be an admissible means of warfare. It is the reasoning of the Tokyo District Court that this Court is concerned with.

The material before this Court is sufficient to enable it to make a finding of fact that the actual use of nuclear weapons is not acceptable to the sense of the international community; on the basis of such a finding of fact, it would lie within its judicial mission to hold that such weapons are not admissible "means of warfare" within the meaning of the law.

2. Unnecessary suffering

Then as to the customary international law prohibition of superfluous and unnecessary suffering. As restated in Article 35, paragraph 2, of the 1977 Protocol Additional I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions, the principle reads:

> "It is prohibited to employ weapons, projectiles and material and methods of warfare of a nature to cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering".

The case of a weapon, such as the "dum-dum" bullet ["[T]he projectile known under the name of 'dum-dum' was made in the arsenal of that name near Calcutta." See The Proceedings of the Hague Peace Conferences, The Conference of 1899, p. 277, per General Sir John Ardagh.], which is deliberately crafted so as to cause unnecessary suffering, does not exhaust the interpretation and application of the prohibition. That may be regarded as a particular instance of the working of a broader underlying idea that suffering is superfluous or unnecessary if it is materially in excess of the degree of suffering which is justified by the military advantage sought to be achieved. A mechanical or absolute test is excluded: a balance has to be struck between the degree of suffering inflicted and the military advantage in view. The greater the military advantage, the greater will be the willingness to tolerate higher levels of suffering. And, of course, the balance has to be struck by States. The Court cannot usurp their judgment; but, in this case, it has a duty to find what that judgment is. In appreciating what is the judgment of States as to where the balance is to be struck, the Court may properly consider that, in striking the balance, States themselves are guided by the public conscience. The Court has correctly held that "the intrinsically humanitarian character of the legal principles in question ... permeates the entire law of armed conflict and applies to all forms of warfare and to all kinds of weapons..." (Advisory Opinion, para. 86). It is not possible to ascertain the humanitarian character of those principles without taking account of the public conscience.

It was thus open to the Court to take the view that the public conscience could consider that no conceivable military advantage could justify the degree of suffering caused by a particular type of weapon. Poison gas was, arguably, a more efficient way of deactivating the enemy in certain circumstances than other means in use during the First World War. That did not suffice to legitimize its use; the prohibition rested on an appreciation, as set out in the first preamble to the 1925 Geneva Gas Protocol, that "the use in war of asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases has been justly condemned by the general opinion of the civilized world". In effect, the use of a weapon which caused the kind of suffering that poison gas caused was simply repugnant to the public conscience, and so unacceptable to States whatever might be the military advantage sought to be achieved. That reasoning has not given birth to a comprehensive and universal prohibitory treaty provision in this case; it is nonetheless helpful in estimating the acceptability to the public conscience of the suffering that could be inflicted by the use of nuclear weapons on both combatants and civilians, on distant peoples, and on generations yet unborn.

On the material before it, the Court could reasonably find that the public conscience considers that the use of nuclear weapons causes suffering which is unacceptable whatever might be the military advantage derivable from such use. On the basis of such a finding, the Court would be entitled, in determining what in turn is the judgment of States on the point, to proceed on the basis of a presumption that the judgment of States would not differ from that made by the public conscience.

The "unnecessary suffering" principle falls within the framework of principles designed for the protection of combatants. If the use of nuclear weapons would violate the principle in relation to them, that is sufficient to establish the illegality of such use. However, is it possible that the principle, when construed in the light of developing military technology and newer methods of waging war, has now come to be regarded as capable of providing protection for civilians also?

In the "expanding" bullet phase in which the principle made its appearance in the second half of the nineteenth century, it was no doubt visualised that "unnecessary suffering" would only be inflicted on soldiers in the battlefield; the effects of the use of weapons which could then cause such suffering would not extend to civilians. But the framework of military operations is now different: if nuclear weapons can cause unnecessary suffering to soldiers, they can obviously have the same effect on civilians within their reach. The preamble to the Treaty of Tlatelolco correctly declared that the "terrible effects [of nuclear weapons] are suffered, indiscriminately and inexorably, by military forces and civilian population alike..."

It may be said that the substance of the principle of unnecessary suffering operates for the benefit of civilians through the medium of other principles, such as that which prohibits indiscriminate attacks, but that the principle itself does not operate in relation to them. What, however, is the position where it is contended that an apparently indiscriminate attack on civilians is validated by recourse to the collateral damage argument? In a case in which the collateral damage principle (whatever its true scope) would justify injury to civilians, the contradictory result of confining the unnecessary suffering principle to combatants would be that such injury may be prohibited by that principle in respect of combatants but not in respect of civilians who are equally affected; thus, an act which causes injury to combatants and non-combatants equally may be unlawful in relation to the former but lawful in relation to the latter. If combatants and non combatants are both victims of the same act, it is difficult to see why the act should be unlawful in the former case but lawful in the latter.

In Shimoda, the Tokyo District Court said, "[I]t is not too much to say that the pain brought by the atomic bombs is severer than that from poison and poison-gas, and ... that the act of dropping such a cruel bomb is contrary to the fundamental principle of the laws of war that unnecessary pain must not be given" [The Japanese Annual of International Law, No. 8, 1964, pp. 241-242]. So, in this part of its reasoning, the Tokyo District Court relied on the "fundamental principle" of "unnecessary pain"; it did so in relation to injuries caused to civilians. Assisted by three experts who were professors of international law, as well as by a full team of advocates for the parties in a closely contested case, the Court did not seem to be aware of a view that the principle of unnecessary suffering was restricted to injuries caused to combatants. And yet that view, if correct, should have been central to a case which concerned injury to civilians.
However, even if the unnecessary suffering principle is restricted to combatants, the question remains whether the principle is breached in so far as combatants are affected by the use of nuclear weapons. For the reasons given above, the Court could hold that it is.

3. The Martens Clause

Some States argued that the Martens Clause depends on proof of the separate existence of a rule of customary international law prohibiting the use of a particular weapon, and that there is no such prohibitory rule in the case of nuclear weapons. The proposition is attractive.

However, an initial difficulty is this. As is recognized in paragraphs 78 and 84 of the Court's Advisory Opinion, it is accepted that the Martens Clause is a rule of customary international law. That means that it has a normative character - that it lays down some norm of State conduct. It is difficult to see what norm of State conduct it lays down if all it does is to remind States of norms of conduct which exist wholly dehors the Clause. The argument in question would be directed not to ascertaining the field of application of an acknowledged rule, but to denying the existence of any rule. Would an argument which produces this infirmity be right?

As set out in the 1899 Hague Convention Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, the Martens Clause came at the end of a preambular passage reading as follows:

> "According to the view of the high contracting Parties, these provisions, the wording of which has been inspired by the desire to diminish the evils of war, so far as military requirements permit, are intended to serve as a general rule of conduct for the belligerents in their mutual relations and in their relations with the inhabitants.
>
> It has not, however, been found possible at present to concert regulations covering all the circumstances which arise in practice.
>
> On the other hand, the high contracting Parties clearly do not intend that unforeseen cases should, in the absence of a written undertaking, be left to the arbitrary judgment of military commanders.
>
> Until a more complete code of the laws of war has been issued, the High Contracting Parties > deem it expedient to declare that, in cases not included in the Regulations adopted by them, the inhabitants and the belligerents remain under the protection and the rule of the principles of the law of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity, and the dictates of the public conscience."

These statements support an impression that the Martens Clause was intended to fill gaps left by conventional international law and to do so in a practical way. How?

The Martens Clause bears the marks of its period; it is not easy of interpretation. One acknowledges the distinction between usages and law [For "usages of war" maturing into rules of customary international law, see L. Oppenheim, International Law, A Treatise, Vol II, 7th ed. by H. Lauterpacht, 1952, p. 226, para. 69).]. However, as the word "remain" shows, the provision implied that there were already in existence certain principles of the law of nations which operated to provide practical protection to "the inhabitants and the belligerents" in the event of protection not being available under conventional texts. In view of the implications of that word, the Clause could not be confined to principles of the law of nations waiting, uncertainly, to be born in future. The reference to the principles of the law of nations derived from the mentioned sources was descriptive of the character of existing principles of the law of nations and not merely a condition of the future emergence of such principles. It may be added that, in its 1977 formulation, the relevant phrase now reads, "derived from established custom, from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience". Since "established custom" alone would suffice to identify a rule of customary international law, a cumulative reading is not probable. It should follow that "the principles of international law" (the new wording) could also be sufficiently derived "from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience"; as mentioned above, those "principles of international law" could be regarded as including principles of international law already derived "from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience".

In effect, the Martens Clause provided authority for treating the principles of humanity and the dictates of public conscience as principles of international law, leaving the precise content of the standard implied by these principles of international law to be ascertained in the light of changing conditions, inclusive of changes in the means and methods of warfare and the outlook and tolerance levels of the international community. The principles would remain constant, but their practical effect would vary from time to time: they could justify a method of warfare in one age and prohibit it in another. In this respect, M. Jean Pictet was right in emphasising, according to Mr. Sean Mc Bride,

> "that the Declarations in the Hague Conventions ... by virtue of the de Martens Clause, imported into humanitarian law principles that went much further than the written convention; it thus gave them a dynamic dimension that was not limited by time". [Sean McBride, "The Legality of Weapons for Societal Destruction", in Christophe Swinarski (ed.), Studies and Essays on International Humanitarian Law and Red Cross Principles in Honour of Jean Pictet, 1984, p. 402.]

Nor should this be strange. Dealing with the subject of "Considerations of Humanity" as a source of law, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice remarked that > "all the implications of this view - i.e. in exactly what circumstances and to what extent considerations of humanity give rise in themselves to obligations of a legal character - remain to be worked out". [Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice, Vol. 1, 1986, p. 17, note 4, emphasis as in the original; and see ibid., p. 4].

The reservation does not neutralise the main proposition that "considerations of humanity give rise in themselves to obligations of a legal character". The substance of the proposition seems present in the judgment given in 1948 in Krupp's case, in which the United States Military Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg said:

> "The Preamble [of Hague Convention No. IV of 1907] is much more than a pious declaration. It is a general clause, making the usages established among civilized nations, the laws of humanity and the dictates of public conscience into the legal yardstick to be applied if and when the specific provisions of the Convention and the Regulations annexed to it do not cover specific cases occurring in warfare, or concomitant to warfare." [Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, 1948, p. 622.]

A similar view of the role of considerations of humanity appears in the Corfu Channel case. There Judge Alvarez stated that the "characteristics of an international delinquency are that it is an act contrary to the sentiments of humanity" (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 45, separate opinion); and the Court itself said that Albania's "obligations are based, not on the Hague Convention of 1907, No. VIII, which is applicable in time of war, but on certain general and well-recognised principles, namely: elementary considerations of humanity, even more exacting in peace than in war; ..." (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22). Thus, Albania's obligations were "based ... on ... elementary considerations of humanity ...", with the necessary implication that those considerations can themselves exert legal force. In 1986 the Court considered that "the conduct of the United States may be judged according to the fundamental general principles of humanitarian law"; and it expressed the view that certain rules stated in common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions were "rules which, in the Court's opinion, reflect what the Court in 1949 called □elementary considerations of humanity' (Corfu Channel, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22)" (Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua, Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1986, pp. 113-114, para. 218). Consistent with the foregoing is the earlier observation by the Naulilaa Tribunal that the right of reprisals "est limitée par les expériences de l'humanité..." [Reports of International Arbitral Awards, Vol. 2, p. 1026].

I am not persuaded that the purpose of the Martens Clause was confined to supplying a humanitarian standard by which to interpret separately existing rules of conventional or customary international law on the subject of the conduct of hostilities; the Clause was not needed for that purpose, for considerations of humanity, which underlie humanitarian law, would in any event have supplied that service (see para. 86 of the Court's Advisory Opinion). It is also difficult to accept that all that the Martens Clause did was to remind States of their obligations under separately existing rules of customary international law. No doubt, the focus of the Clause in the particular form in which it was reproduced in the 1949 Geneva Conventions was on reminding States parties that denunciation of these humanitarian treaties would not relieve them of the obligations visualised by the Clause; but the Clause in its more usual form was not intended to be a mere reminder [For differences between the 1949 Martens Clause and its classical formulation, see Georges Abi-Saab, "The Specificities of Humanitarian Law", in Christophe Swinarski (ed.), Studies and Essays on International Humanitarian Law and Red Cross Principles in Honour of Jean Pictet, 1984, p. 275]. The basic function of the Clause was to put beyond challenge the existence of principles of international law which residually served, with current effect, to govern military conduct by reference to "the principles of humanity and ... the dictates of public conscience". It was in this sense that "civilians and combatants (would) remain under the protection and authority of the principles of international law derived ... from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience". The word "remain" would be inappropriate in relation to "the principles of humanity and ... the dictates of public conscience" unless these were conceived of as presently capable of exerting normative force to control military conduct.

Thus, the Martens Clause provided its own self-sufficient and conclusive authority for the proposition that there were already in existence principles of international law under which considerations of humanity could themselves exert legal force to govern military conduct in cases in which no relevant rule was provided by conventional law. Accordingly, it was not necessary to locate elsewhere the independent existence of such principles of international law; the source of the principles lay in the Clause itself.

This was probably how the matter was understood at the Hague Peace Conference of 1899. After Mr. Martens's famous declaration was adopted, the "senior delegate from Belgium, Mr. Beernaert, who had previously objected to the adoption of Articles 9 and 10 (1 and 2 of the new draft), immediately announced that he could because of this declaration vote for them" [The Proceedings of the Hague Peace Conferences, The Conference of 1899, 1920, pp. 54 and 419.]. The senior Belgian delegate, as were other delegates, was not satisfied with the protection guaranteed by the particular provisions of the draft. [See the Krupp case, supra, p. 622]. Eventually, he found himself able to vote for the provisions. Why? Not because the required additional protection was available under independently existing customary international law; such protection would be available in any case. The reason he was able to vote for the provisions was because he took the view, not dissented from by other delegates, that the Martens Clause would itself be capable of exerting normative force to provide the required additional protection by appropriately controlling military behaviour.

"One is entitled to test the soundness of a principle by the consequences which would flow from its application" (Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Co. Ltd., I.C.J. Reports 1970, p. 220, para. 106, Judge Jessup, separate opinion). Hence, it is useful to consider the implications of the view that the Martens Clause is not by itself relevant to the issue of legality of the use of nuclear weapons. It is clear that the use of nuclear weapons could result, even in the case of neutral countries, in destruction of the living, in sickness and forced migration of survivors, and in injury to future generations to the point of causing serious illness, deformities and death, with the possible extinction of all life. If nothing in conventional or customary international law forbids that, on the view taken by the proponents of legality of the meaning of the "Lotus" case, States would be legally entitled to bring about such cataclysmic consequences. It is at least conceivable that the public conscience may think otherwise. But the "dictates of public conscience" could not translate themselves into a normative prohibition unless this was possible through the Martens Clause.

It is not, I think, a question of the Court essaying to transform public opinion into law: that would lead to "government by judges", which, as Judge Gros rightly observed, "no State would easily accept" (Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area, I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 385, para. 41, dissenting opinion) [But see I.C.J. Pleadings, Northern Cameroons, p. 352, M. Weil, "to exorcise demons, it is sometimes a good idea to call them by name", i.e. "the spectre of government by judges". [Translation by the Registry.]]. Existing international law, in the form of the Martens Clause, has already established the necessary legal norm. The Court does not have to find whether there is an opinio juris. Its task is that of evaluating a standard embodied in an existing principle by way of making a finding as to what it is that the "principles of humanity and... the dictates of public conscience" require of military conduct in a given situation. In the last analysis, the answer will depend on what are the views of States themselves; but, so far as the Martens Clause is concerned, the views of States are relevant only for their value in indicating the state of the public conscience, not for the purpose of determining whether an opinio juris exists as to the legality of the use of a particular weapon.

The task of determining the effect of a standard may be difficult, but it is not impossible of performance; nor is it one which a court of justice may flinch from undertaking where necessary. The law is familiar with instances in which a court has to do exactly that, namely, to apply a rule of law which embodies a standard through which the rule exerts its force in particular circumstances [See I.C.J. Pleadings, South West Africa, Vol. VIII, p. 258, argument of Mr. Gross; Fisheries Jurisdiction, I.C.J. Reports 1974, pp.

56-57, footnote 1, separate opinion of Judge Dillard; and Julius Stone, Legal System and Lawyers' Reasonings, 1964, pp. 59, 68, 263-264, 299, 305-306, 320 and 346.]. Some appreciation of a factual nature may be required. The standard being one which is set by the public conscience, a number of pertinent matters in the public domain may be judicially noticed. This is apart from the fact that the Court is not bound by the technical rules of evidence found in municipal systems; it employs a flexible procedure. That, of course, does not mean that it may go on a roving expedition; it must confine its attention to sources which speak with authority. Among these there is the General Assembly. Reference has already been made to its very first resolution of 24 January 1946. That resolution, unanimously adopted, may fairly be construed by the Court as expressive of the conscience of the international community as to the unacceptability of the use of nuclear weapons. So too with the Final Document adopted by consensus in 1978 by the Tenth Special Session of the General Assembly on the subject of disarmament. A number of related General Assembly resolutions preceded and followed that Final Document. In one, adopted in 1983, the General Assembly stated that it "[r]esolutely, unconditionally and for all time condemns nuclear war as being contrary to human conscience and reason..." (G.A. res. 38/75 of 15 December 1983). Though not unanimously adopted, the resolution was validly passed by the General Assembly, acting within its proper province in the field of disarmament. Whatever may be the position as regards the possible law-making effects or influence of General Assembly resolutions, the Court would be correct in giving weight to the Assembly's finding on the point of fact as to the state of "human conscience and reason" on the subject of the acceptability of the use of nuclear weapons, and more particularly in view of the fact that that finding accords with the general tendency of other material before the Court.

The Court may look to another source of evidence of the state of the public conscience on the question of the acceptability of the use of nuclear weapons. It may interpret the NPT to mean that the public conscience, as demonstrated in the positions taken by all parties to that treaty, considers that the use of nuclear weapons would involve grave risks, and that these risks would make such use unacceptable in all circumstances. The better view, I think, is that the Court cannot correctly interpret the treaty to mean that it was agreed by all parties that those risks may be both effectively and responsibly managed by five States but not by others. Nor could it be the case that the public conscience, as manifested in the positions taken by the parties to that treaty, now says that, after final elimination has been achieved, nuclear weapons could not be used, while now also saying that they could be acceptably used until final elimination has been achieved. On a matter touching the survival of mankind, the public conscience could not at one and the same time be content to apply one standard of acceptability as of now and another as of a later time. That would involve a contradiction in its views as to the fundamental unacceptability of the weapon as a means of warfare which could destroy civilization. No basis appears for ascribing such a contradiction to the public conscience; there is not much merit in prohibiting civilization from being destroyed in the future, while at the same time accepting that it may, with impeccable legality, be destroyed now.

If the above is correct, the Martens Clause helps to meet the objection, raised by the proponents of legality, that the General Assembly's question would require the Court to speculate on a number of matters. The Court could not say in advance what would be the exact effect of any particular use of nuclear weapons. Examples of possible situations relate to proportionality, the duty to discriminate between combatants and civilians, escalation of conflict, neutrality, genocide and the environment. The Court could however find, and find as a fact, that the use of nuclear weapons involves real risks in each of these areas. It could then look to the public conscience for its view as to whether, in the light of those risks, the use of such weapons is acceptable in any circumstances; the view of the public conscience could in turn be found to be that, in the light of those risks, such use is unacceptable in all circumstances. The public conscience thus has a mediating role through which it enjoys a latitude of evaluation not available to the Court.

In the result, on the basis of what the Court finds to be the state of the public conscience, it will be able to say whether the Martens Clause operates to prohibit the use of nuclear weapons in all circumstances. On the available material, it would be open to the Court to hold that the Clause operates to impose such a prohibition.

PART IV. WHETHER A PRIOR PROHIBITORY RULE, IF IT EXISTED, WAS MODIFIED OR RESCINDED BY THE EMERGENCE OF A SUBSEQUENT RULE

1. The position as at the commencement of the nuclear age

Underlying the Court's holding in the second part of subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of its Advisory Opinion that it "cannot conclude definitively" on the issue there referred to, is a contention by some States that the Court was being invited by the General Assembly's question to speculate on possible "scenarios". If that means that the Court could not decide on the basis of conjectures, I would uphold the contention. But I would not feel able to go the further step of accepting (if this other proposition was also intended) that there are no circumstances in which the Court may properly have recourse to the use of hypotheses. It would not, I think, be correct to say, as it is sometimes said, that the interpretation and application of the law always abjures hypotheses. Within reasonable limits, a hypothesis, as in other fields of intellectual endeavour, may be essential to test the limits of a theory or to bring out the true meaning of a rule. When, in a famous statement, it was said "hypotheses non fingo", that only excluded propositions going beyond actual data ["For whatever is not deduc'd from the phaenomena, is to be called an hypothesis." See Sir Isaac Newton, The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy, Book III, Vol. II, trans. Andrew Motte, 1968, p. 392; and Derek Gjertsen, The Newton Handbook, 1986, p. 266.]. The actual data may themselves suggest possibilities which need to be explored if the correct inference is to be drawn from the data.

The position as it stood immediately before the commencement of the nuclear age was that, since nuclear weapons did not exist, ex hypotshesi there was, and could have been, no rule in conventional or customary international law which prohibited the use of nuclear weapons "as such". But it cannot be a serious contention that the effects produced by the use of nuclear weapons, when they were later invented, were beyond the reach of the pre-existing law of armed conflict (see paragraphs 85-86 of the Advisory Opinion and Shimoda, supra, pp. 235-236); the "novelty of a weapon does not by itself convey with it a legitimate claim to a change in the existing rules of war" [L. Oppenheim, International Law, A Treatise, Vol. II, 7th ed. by H. Lauterpacht, p. 469, para. 181a].

Thus, if, immediately before the commencement of the nuclear age, the question was asked whether effects of the kind that would be later produced by the use of nuclear weapons would constitute a breach of the law of armed conflict, the Court could well hold that the answer would inevitably have been in the affirmative. If the effects so produced would have been forbidden by that law, it follows that nuclear weapons, when they later materialised, could not be used without violating that law - not, that is to say, unless that law was modified by the subsequent evolution of a law operating in the opposite direction, a point considered below.

12. The position subsequent to the commencement of the nuclear age

A "froward retention of custom is as turbulent a thing as an innovation", says Bacon ["Of Innovations", in J. Spedding, R.L. Ellis and D.D. Heath (eds.), The Works of Francis Bacon, 1890, Vol. VI, p. 43.]. So, on the assumption that a prohibitory rule existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, it would remain to consider whether that rule was later modified or reversed by the emergence of a new rule operating in the opposite direction: would the "froward retention" of the previous prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons have been judged a "turbulent" thing?

It is necessary to have regard to the structure of the debate. The argument of some States is that there is not and never was a rule prohibitory of the use of nuclear weapons. In determining the issue so raised, a useful benchmark is the commencement of the nuclear age. The position as at that time has to be determined by reference to the law as it then stood. Subsequent developments do not form part of any process creative of any rule on the subject as at that time. If a correct finding is that, on the law as it existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, a prohibitory rule then existed, evidence of subsequent State practice cannot serve to contradict that finding by showing that, contrary to that finding, no prohibitory rule then existed. What subsequent State practice can do is to create an opinio juris supportive of the emergence of a new rule modifying or reversing the old rule. But it has not been suggested that, if a prohibitory rule existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, it was modified or reversed by the emergence of a later rule operating in the opposite direction. This being the case, it follows that if a prohibitory rule existed at the commencement of the nuclear age, that rule continues in force.

The same conclusion is reached even if it were in fact argued that any prior prohibitory rule was reversed by the emergence of a later rule operating in the opposite direction. The substantial and long standing opposition within the ranks of the NNWS to the proposition that there is a right in law to use nuclear weapons would have sufficed to prevent the evolution of the opinio juris required to support the birth of any such new rule, and more particularly so if the earlier rule had the status of ius cogens. This would have been the case if the humanitarian principles on which the earlier rule was based had that status, a possibility left open by paragraph 83 of the Advisory Opinion.

One last point. Argument was made that the NWS were "States whose interests are specially affected" within the meaning of the principle relating to the creation of customary international law, as enunciated by the Court in 1969 (North Sea Continental Shelf Cases, I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 43, para. 74), and that, indeed, "in the present case, a practice involving the threat or use of nuclear weapons could proceed only from States recognized as possessing the status of nuclear weapon States" (C.R. 95/24, p. 3, translation). The argument is interesting, but not persuasive. Where what is in issue is the lawfulness of the use of a weapon which could annihilate mankind and so destroy all States, the test of which States are specially affected turns not on the ownership of the weapon, but on the consequences of its use. From this point of view, all States are equally affected, for, like the people who inhabit them, they all have an equal right to exist.

For these reasons, granted the prior existence of a prohibitory rule, it was open to the Court to hold that the position taken by a considerable number of the NNWS, if not the majority, would have operated to bar the development of the opinio juris necessary to support the creation of a new rule rescinding the old. The old prohibitory rule would therefore have continued up to the present time.

PART V. THE DENUCLEARIZATION TREATIES AND THE NPT

Some States rely on regional denuclearization treaties and on the NPT and associated arrangements as State practice evidencing the non-existence of a prohibitory rule. Those arrangements, they argue, are only explicable on the assumption that the use of nuclear weapons was regarded by the negotiating States as lawful. They emphasize that for fifty years the NWS have been openly possessing and deploying nuclear weapons under one form or another of a policy of nuclear deterrence; that it is well known that several NNWS have been sheltering under the nuclear umbrella of a NWS; that the NWS and other States sheltering under a nuclear umbrella constitute a substantial and important part of the international community; that elements of the negative and positive security assurances given by the NWS necessarily imply recognition by the NNWS that nuclear weapons may be lawfully used; that Security Council resolution 984 (1995) expressed the Council's appreciation of the statements through which the NWS gave those assurances; and that no NNWS protested against those assurances or with the appreciation thus expressed. How should these matters be evaluated?

The position as at the beginning of the nuclear age was either that there was no rule prohibiting States from producing effects of the kind which could later be produced by nuclear weapons, or that there was such a prohibitory rule. If there was no such prohibitory rule, it is not necessary to consider in detail whether subsequent State practice introduced one, for the known position of the NWS and those of the NNWS sheltering under a nuclear umbrella, representing a substantial and important part of the international community, would have prevented the crystallisation of the opinio juris required to create such a rule: the non-existence of a prohibitory rule would continue to this day, and the case of the proponents of legality succeeds.

On the opposite view that there was a prior prohibitory rule, there is equally no need to consider subsequent State practice in any detail. As has been argued, if, on the basis of the law as it stood at the commencement of the nuclear age, it is found that there then existed a prohibitory rule, that finding as to what was the then state of the law cannot be contradicted by later developments. Later developments may only be considered for the purpose of determining whether they represented a State practice which brought into being a new rule modifying or rescinding the prior prohibitory rule. But then the known position of the majority of the NNWS, also representing a substantial and important part of the international community, would have barred the development of the opinio juris required for the creation of a modifying or rescinding rule: the prior prohibitory rule would thus continue to this day, and the case of the proponents of illegality succeeds.

On either view, it is accordingly not necessary to consider later developments in any detail. As there has been much debate over regional denuclearization treaties and the NPT, I shall nevertheless say something about these. In my opinion, the Court could hold that they do not show that the proponents of illegality accepted the legality of the use of nuclear weapons.

* *

First, as to the regional denuclearization treaties. It will be convenient to deal with one only, namely, the Treaty of Tlatelolco of 1967. The preamble to this treaty stated that "the proliferation of nuclear weapons" seemed "inevitable unless States, in the exercise of their sovereign rights, impose restrictions on themselves in order to prevent it". The treaty being concerned with both possession and use, there is force in the argument that that statement recognized that there was a sovereign right in law to use such weapons. That inference does not however necessarily follow when regard is had to the fact that the preamble also said that the use of such a weapon could result in "an attack on the integrity of the human species and ultimately may even render the whole earth uninhabitable". The better interpretation of the treaty is that it was, objectively, directed to the establishment of a regime to ensure that Latin America would be nuclear-free, given that nuclear weapons in fact existed and might in fact be used; the treaty did not rest on an assumption that there existed a right in law to use weapons which could "render the whole earth uninhabitable." Reservations or declarations made by the NWS on signing or ratifying Protocol II to the treaty did rest on an assumption that there was a right of use; but it is risky to infer that, by remaining silent, States parties to the treaty acquiesced in that assumption in the light of the fact that, both before and after the conclusion of the treaty, many of them were on record as affirming through the General Assembly and otherwise that the use of such weapons would be a crime.

Next as to the NPT. This calls for fuller discussion; the arguments were more intense. Some States, or one or another of them, argued that a right to use nuclear weapons formed part of the inherent right of self-defence; that the inherent right of self-defence was inalienable; that it had a fundamental and overriding character; that it was the most fundamental right of all; but that it could be restricted by express treaty provisions. It followed that some States could retain their right to use nuclear weapons, while others could competently agree to forego it. The argument adds that acceptance of a right to possess such weapons under the NPT implies acknowledgment of a right of use.

These arguments are weighty; they demand careful consideration. A difficulty lies, however, in the characterization of a right to use nuclear weapons as being a part of the right of self-defence. If the characterization is correct, it is not easy to appreciate how the proponents of illegality, which were parties to the NPT, would have intended voluntarily to forego an important part of their inherent right of self-defence whilst agreeing that the right would be retained in full by the NWS. The third preambular paragraph of the NPT showed that the treaty was concluded in "conformity with resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly calling for the conclusion of an agreement on the prevention of wider dissemination of nuclear weapons". Those resolutions would include General Assembly resolution 2028 (XX) of 19 November 1965, paragraph 2 (b) of which laid it down that a non-proliferation treaty "should embody an acceptable balance of mutual responsibilities and obligations of the nuclear and non-nuclear Powers". It is hard to see how that prescription could find an acceptable reflection in an asymmetrical enjoyment of so fundamental a right as the inherent right of self-defence.

There would be difficulty also in following how it is that what is inalienable for some States is alienable for others. It is an attribute of sovereignty that a State may by agreement restrain the exercise of its competence; yet how far it may do so without losing its status as a State is another question [See argument of M. Yasseen in I.C.J. Pleadings, Interpretation of the Agreement of 25 March 1951 between the WHO and Egypt, pp. 298-299.]. Since the right of self-defence is "inherent" in a State, it is not possible to conceive of statehood which lacks that characteristic. See the illustration in General Assembly resolution 49/10 of 3 November 1994,

> "[r]eaffirming... that as the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina is a sovereign, independent State and a Member of the United Nations, it is entitled to all rights provided for in the Charter of the United Nations, including the right to self-defence under Article 51 thereof".

Arrangements for the exercise of the right of self-defence are a different matter. But, so far as the right itself is concerned, if the right includes a right to use nuclear weapons, the latter is not a small part of the former. It was no doubt for this reason that, in the parallel case brought by the World Health Organization, it was argued that to "deny the victim of aggression the right to use the only weapons which might save it would be to make a mockery of the inherent right of self-defence" [Statement of the Government of the United Kingdom (para. 24), in the case concerning Legality of the Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict (Request for Advisory Opinion).]. The argument is understandable, granted the premise that the right to use nuclear weapons is part of the inherent right of self-defence. The question is whether the premise is correct. For, if it is correct, then, by the same token, there is difficulty in seeing how the NNWS which were parties to the NPT could have wished to part with so crucially important a part of their inherent right of self-defence.

It is possible to see the NNWS agreeing that, because of the dangers represented by nuclear weapons, they would not acquire such weapons, on the basis that the NWS, which already had such weapons, would take steps to eliminate them. It is less easy to see how the NNWS would, on the ground of such dangers, agree to deprive themselves of the opportunity of using such weapons in exercise of their inherent right of self-defence whilst nevertheless agreeing that such weapons, notwithstanding the same dangers, could be legally used by the NWS in exercise of their own inherent right of self-defence and used in some circumstances against the NNWS. The Court could not uphold so unbalanced a view of the scheme of the NPT without endorsing the controversial thesis that its real thrust was not so much to prevent the spread of a dangerous weapon, as to ensure that enjoyment of its use was limited to a minority of States. The difference in perceived objectives is material to the correctness of the interpretation to be placed on the treaty.

A further area of nuclear weapon discrepancy could arise as between non-NPT States and the NNWS which are parties to the NPT. On the argument for legality, the former would have a right in law to use nuclear weapons in self-defence, whereas the latter would have foregone the exercise of that right even in relation to the former. For, since a NNWS, which is a party to the NPT, cannot possess nuclear weapons without breaching the treaty, it follows that it cannot threaten or use nuclear weapons even in relation to non-parties to the treaty, although the latter, not being bound by the treaty, may have gone on to develop, acquire and possess such weapons. In the result, a NNWS which is a party to the NPT would be prevented by the treaty from exercising the full measure of its inherent right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter, notwithstanding that the non-party to the treaty would be entitled to use such weapons in exercise of its own inherent right of self-defence under that Article.

These difficulties suggest that it is necessary to distinguish between the inherent right of self-defence and the means by which the right is exercisable. A State using force in self-defence is acting legally under the ius ad bellum. But, whether a State is acting legally or illegally under the ius ad bellum, if it is in fact using force it must always do so in the manner prescribed by the ius in bello. It is the ius in bello which lays down whether or not a particular means of warfare is permissible. Thus, where the use of a particular weapon is proscribed by the ius in bello, the denial of the use of that weapon is not a denial of the right of self-defence of the attacked State: the inherent right of self-defence spoken of in Article 51 of the Charter simply does not comprehend the use of the weapon in question. The legal answer to the possible plight of the victim State is given by the principle, as enunciated by the United States Military Tribunal at Nuremburg on 19 February 1948, that "the rules of international law must be followed even if it results in the loss of a battle or even a war. Expediency or necessity cannot warrant their violation..." [The List case, Trials of War Criminals before the Nurenberg Military Tribunals under Control Council Law No. 10, Vol. XI, 1950, p. 1272; and see, ibid., pp. 1236 and 1254. See also the remarks of the United States Military Tribunal at Nuremberg in Krupp's case, Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases, 1948, p. 628.].

A reasonable view is that the proponents of illegality which were parties to the NPT did not consider that they were contracting away an important part of their inherent right of self-defence, but that they acted on the view that a State's inherent right of self-defence did not include a right to use nuclear weapons. If they considered that a right to use nuclear weapons was an integral part of so fundamental a right as the inherent right of self-defence, it is difficult to see why they should have intended to agree that such weapons could be used only by some, and not by all. On the other hand, if they acted on the basis that a right to use such weapons was not part of the inherent right of self-defence, this governs, or at any rate qualifies and explains, the NPT arrangements, inclusive of the 1995 extension, the positive and negative assurances, and the Security Council statements set out in its resolution 984 (1995). As was pointed out by Solomon Islands, all of these arrangements formed part of a declared process for eliminating nuclear weapons; it is not persuasive to interpret them as implying acceptance by the NNWS of the legality of the use of such weapons. Answering an argument that, through the NPT, the "nuclear-weapon States were being given a legal basis for the maintenance of their nuclear arsenals", New Zealand submitted, correctly in my view, that

> "the very raison d'être of the Treaty... is based on a recognition that nuclear weapons are different. The judgment made was that, in view of the uniquely destructive potential of such weapons, and human nature being what it is, the only option for humanity was to rid itself of these weapons entirely. The threat that the weapons represent hangs over the security of the whole international community. They also constitute a threat, and a challenge, to the international legal order." (CR 95/28, p. 36.)

In the light of the foregoing, the Court could read the NPT this way. As stated in the preamble, all parties, both the NWS and the NNWS, recognized "the devastation that would be visited upon all mankind by a nuclear war ...". The spread of nuclear weapons should therefore be halted, and States which, by their own declarations, already possessed them should eliminate them. As this would take time, the NWS would of necessity continue in possession until final elimination. This was recognition of a fact which could not suddenly be wished away, and tolerance of that fact transitionally; it was not acquiescence in a right of use. Such an acknowledgment would have been at variance with the repeated affirmation by many NNWS, through General Assembly resolutions and otherwise, and made both before and after the conclusion of the NPT, that the use of such weapons would be contrary to the Charter, to the rules of international law and the laws of humanity, and a crime against mankind and civilization.

It remains to consider whether this conclusion is impaired by the security assurances given by the NWS to the NNWS. In contrast with the reservations made by four of the five NWS in their negative assurances of a right to use nuclear weapons against the NNWS in certain circumstances, the positive assurances did not include a commitment to use nuclear weapons in defence of a NNWS attacked with nuclear weapons and therefore did not imply a claim to a right to use nuclear weapons. A claim to a right to use nuclear weapons is however clearly implied in the negative assurances; that need not be discussed. The question is whether the claim to such a right has been accepted by the international community.

It will be convenient to take, first, the reaction of the Security Council. Paragraph 1 of its resolution 984 (1995), adopted unanimously, recorded that the Council

> "[t]akes note with appreciation of the statements made by each of the nuclear-weapon States (S/1995/261, S/1995/262, S/1995/263, S/1995/264, S/1995/265), in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear weapon States that are Parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons".

It is argued that the "appreciation" with which the Security Council noted the statements made by each of the NWS implied an acknowledgment by it of a right in law to use nuclear weapons, and more particularly in the light of a reaffirmation in paragraph 9 of the resolution of the inherent right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. The argument, which is a forceful one, makes it necessary to consider what it was that the Council's "appreciation" referred to.

Viewed in context and in particular in the light of the preamble to the resolution, the focus of paragraph 1 of the resolution was directed to the objective fact that negative security assurances had been given in the cited statements; the paragraph referred to the statements of the NWS as statements "in which they give security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non nuclear-weapon States...". The resolution did not refer to the statements as statements in which the NWS "reserved a right to use nuclear weapons against the NNWS in certain circumstances", as it could have done had the Council intended to indicate that its expression of appreciation extended thus far. The Council could not say so in respect of all five of the NWS because one of them, namely, China, did not reserve such a right (see paragraph 59 (c) of the Court's Advisory Opinion). On the contrary, in paragraph 2 of its statement, China said, "China undertakes not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against non-nuclear-weapon States or nuclear weapon-free zones at any time or under any circumstances"; this was the opposite of the reservation of such a right. It may be argued that the statement nonetheless implied the existence of a right to use nuclear weapons. The question, however, is how was the Security Council's expression of "appreciation" to be understood. The Court could not reasonably say that the Council's "appreciation" was to be understood as extending to the reservations made by four of the five NWS of a right to use nuclear weapons against the NNWS without also saying that it extended to China's undertaking, to the opposite effect, not to use nuclear weapons against the NNWS "at any time or under any circumstances".

In the result, the proponents of illegality, reading the text of the resolution, would not have thought that the "appreciation" expressed by the Security Council extended to those aspects of the statements in which four of the five NWS reserved a right to use nuclear weapons against the NNWS in certain circumstances, which included a situation in which there was no prior use of nuclear weapons against the NWS reserving and exercising such a right. On its part, the Court could not understand the "appreciation" expressed by the Security Council as intended to affirm the existence of such a right without also understanding it to be affirming that, in the view of the Security Council, there were two groups of States legally differentiated in the important sense that one group was entitled in law to use nuclear weapons against the other in certain circumstances, without the latter being correspondingly entitled in law to use such weapons against the former in any circumstances. The Court would need to pause before imputing such a view to the Security Council. In circumstances in which it was known that the existence of a right to use nuclear weapons was in contest, the "appreciation" expressed by the Security Council in its resolution can reasonably be understood as directed to the fact that the NWS had given "security assurances against the use of nuclear weapons to non-nuclear-weapon States...", as stated in the resolution itself, without being intended to give recognition to the existence of a legal right of use by indirectly passing on the debated issue as to whether there was such a right.

An argument of some strength is based on the fact that, in paragraph 9 of its resolution, the Security Council reaffirmed "the inherent right, recognized under Article 51 of the Charter, of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security". Although this statement did not refer to a right to use nuclear weapons, the argument is that, in the context in which it was made, it implied that, in the view of the Security Council, the inherent right of self-defence included a right to use nuclear weapons. It would not appear, however, that the correctness of any such implication of paragraph 9 of the resolution was accepted by those of the NNWS who spoke before the Security Council. What Malaysia said was that that "paragraph sidesteps the question of the legality of the use of nuclear weapons because it justifies the use or threat of nuclear weapons in cases of □self-defence'" (S/PV. 3514, 11 April 1995, p. 15). Thus, however much paragraph 9 may be understood as seeking to justify the threat or use of nuclear weapons in cases of self-defence, in the view of Malaysia the paragraph did not succeed in doing so but only side-stepped the question. Egypt associated itself with Indonesia as "speaking ... on behalf of the non-aligned States"; the statement made by Indonesia does not suggest an intention to abandon the known position of that group of States on the subject of legality. India specifically recalled that at "the forty-ninth session of the General Assembly, the international community decided to seek an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice on whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons is permissible under international law in any circumstances". (Ibid., p. 6). India added: "One would hope that by offering a draft resolution of this kind, the nuclear-weapon States are not telling the non-members of the NPT that they, the nuclear-weapon States, are free to use nuclear weapons against them, because this would have implications which are too frightening to contemplate". (Ibid.) Hence, even if the resolution of the Security Council contained any implication that the Council considered the use of nuclear weapons to be lawful, the argument that the proponents of illegality accepted the correctness of that implication is not well founded.

Next, the matter may be looked at from the more general standpoint of the conduct of the proponents of illegality in relation to the security assurances. Did that conduct manifest acquiescence in the claim by the NWS to the existence of a right in law to use of nuclear weapons? In particular, was such an acquiescence demonstrated by the fact that the NNWS thought it necessary to obtain such assurances?

A reasonable appreciation of the position seems to be the following. The continuing, if temporary, possession of nuclear weapons by the NWS obviously presented risks to the NNWS. The sensible thing would be to obtain assurances against any threat or use. Malaysia and Zimbabwe submitted that, in like manner, non-aggression pacts "were the common currency of international relations well after the illegality of aggression had entered the body of customary law" (Joint answers by Malaysia and Zimbabwe to questions asked by Vice-President Schwebel on 3 November 1995, response to the second question). Realities may need to be dealt with in a practical way; but not every arrangement designed to deal with them accepts their legality. Especially is this so in international relations. When regard is also had to the power of the weapons concerned, the Court could find that there is not any contradiction between the position taken by the NNWS in the General Assembly that the use of nuclear weapons is a crime, and the assurances which they accepted from States which nevertheless possessed such weapons that these would not be used against them. It is useful to remember Judge Alvarez's observation that "[r]eason, pushed to extremes, may easily result in absurdity" (Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 126, dissenting opinion). The practice of putting aside a legal problem in order to make progress towards a desirable goal is a familiar one in international relations. My understanding of the position taken by some of the NWS is that it was on this basis that they participated in certain negotiations in the field of humanitarian law.

It is also important to have in mind that bare proof of acts or omissions allegedly constituting State practice does not remove the need to interpret such acts or omissions. The fact that States may feel that realities leave them no choice but to do what they do does not suffice to exclude what they do from being classified as part of State practice, provided, however, that what they do is done in the belief that they were acting out of a sense of legal obligation. "The need for such a belief, i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implied in the very notion of the opinio juris sive necessitatis." (North Sea Continental Shelf Cases, I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 44.) Speaking of actions which could evidence an opinio necessitatis juris, Lauterpacht excepts conduct which "was not accompanied by any such intention" [Sir Hersch Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court, 1958, p. 380]. So intention is material. Whether it exists is to be determined not on a microscopic inspection of disjointed features of a large and shifting picture, but by looking at the picture as a whole. When the whole of the picture is regarded in the circumstances of this case, the Court could find that the matters relied on to evidence an acknowledgment by the proponents of illegality that there is a right in law to use nuclear weapons fall short of demonstrating an intention to make that acknowledgement.

*

I should add that I am not persuaded that Security Council resolution 255 (1968) of 19 June 1968, to which reference is made in paragraphs 59 and 61 of the Court's Advisory Opinion, takes the matter any further. The question remains whether the resolution was dealing with the objective fact that nuclear weapons existed and could in fact be used, or whether it was affirming, directly or indirectly, the existence of a legal right of use.

To sum up, putting at the highest all of the matters relied on by the proponents of legality, the Court could find that those matters do not suffice to cancel out the continuing assertion of the proponents of illegality that the threat or use of nuclear weapons is illegal. It would follow that the basic difficulties noticed above would remain. If, as I consider, a correct finding is that, on the law as it stood at the commencement of the nuclear age, a prohibitory rule then existed, that finding, as to what was the then law, cannot be contradicted by subsequent inconsistent State practice; the most that subsequent inconsistent State practice could do would be to generate a new rule rescinding or modifying the old rule. But the position taken by most of the NNWS would make it impossible to establish that the necessary opinio juris emerged to support the creation of a new rule having the effect of reversing the old, and more particularly if the latter had the status of ius cogens. The prior prohibitory rule would thus continue to the present time.

PART VI. CONCLUSION

A holding that there is a right in law to use nuclear weapons would bear a difficult relationship to the Court's finding that the "destructive power of nuclear weapons cannot be contained in either space or time. They have the potential to destroy all civilization and the entire ecosystem of the planet" (Advisory Opinion, para. 35). The affirmation of the existence of a right the exercise of which could yield such grim results would come as near as might be to a literal application of the maxim fiat justitia ruat coelum. Judge Carneiro's view was "that no judge nowadays can blindly follow the obsolete rule fiat justitia, pereat mundus" (The Minquiers and Ecrehos case, I.C.J. Reports 1953, p. 109, separate opinion). It would, at any rate, seem curious that a World Court should consider itself compelled by the law to reach the conclusion that a State has the legal right, even in limited circumstances, to put the planet to death. May it be that the maxim more properly attracted by its high mission is fiat justitia ne pereat mundus?

The danger of the maxim last referred to is that it could seduce the Court into acting as a legislator. In the course of the proceedings, the Court was rightly reminded that it cannot do that. To use the words of the United States Military Tribunal in the List case, "... it is not our province to write international law as we would have it; we must apply it as we find it" [List case, supra, footnote 33, p. 1249]. And thus, as Judge Lauterpacht remarked, "Reluctance to encroach upon the province of the legislature is a proper manifestation of judicial caution". However, as he added, "If exaggerated, it may amount to unwillingness to fulfil a task which is within the orbit of the functions of the Court as defined by its Statute" (Admissibility of Hearings of Petitioners by the Committee on South West Africa, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 57, separate opinion). The danger of legislating arises not only where a court essays to make law where there is none, but also where it fails to apply such law as exists; the failure may well be regarded as amounting to judicial legislation directed to repealing the existing law.

International law does indeed concern relations between sovereign States. However, as it has been remarked, sovereignty does not mean that those relations are between billiard balls which collide but do not cooperate. There is at work a process of cohesion-building. It is not, and possibly never will be, sufficiently advanced to attract the full force of Cicero's observation that "the solidity of a State is very largely bound up with its judicial decisions" [Cicero, Selected Works, trans. Michael Grant, 1960, p. 36.]. Nevertheless, the broad import of the statement is not altogether amiss: the role of the Court need not be overestimated; neither should its responsibility be misunderstood. There is disciplined room for recalling the obligations of international lawyers. As it was put by Jenks, "We are not dealing with the routine of the established certainties of life but must frequently come to grips with the great unsettled issues on which the future of the world depends" [C.W. Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind, 1958, p.

416.]. The case at bar is the supreme illustration of this truth.

To recall what was said at the beginning of this opinion, the great unsettled issue on which the future of the world depends is how to reconcile the imperative need of a State to defend itself with the no less imperative need to ensure that, in doing so, it does not imperil the survival of the human species. Humanitarian law, it is said, must be read as being subject to an exception which allows a State to use nuclear weapons in self-defence when its survival is at stake, that is to say, even if such use would otherwise breach that law, and this for the reason that no system of law obliges those subject to it to commit suicide. That is the argument which underlies the second part of subparagraph E of paragraph (2) of the operative paragraph of the Court's Advisory Opinion.

The implication of that part of the Court's holding is that, in the view of the Court, it is possible that the use of nuclear weapons could be lawful "in an extreme circumstance of self defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake", and hence even if humanitarian law would otherwise be violated. What the Court so sought to leave on the basis of a possibility takes on a firmer aspect in the light of the "Lotus" case, as generally understood. In saying that it cannot definitively decide, the Court is saying that it cannot definitively say whether or not a prohibitory rule exists. If the Court is in a position in which it cannot definitively say whether or not a prohibitory rule exists, the argument can be made that, on the basis of that case, the presumption is in favour of the right of States to act unrestrained by any such rule. Accordingly, the meaning of the Court's position would be that States have a right in law to use nuclear weapons. If this was not the intended result, the Court's holding was not well conceived.

Thus, however gross or excessive the suffering, the presence of the stated circumstances could create an exception to the application of humanitarian law, as indeed is visualised by the word "generally" in the first part of that subparagraph of the Court's holding. A law may, of course, provide for exceptions to its application. At the moment, however, there is nothing to suggest that humanitarian law provides for an exception to accommodate the circumstances visualized by the Court. It seems to me that to take the position that humanitarian law can be set aside in the stated circumstances would sit oddly with the repeated and correct submissions on the part of both sides to the argument that the Court should apply the law and not make new law.

One further point. Despite variations in formulation and references to the concept of "vital security interests", an "extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake", as defined by the Court, is the main circumstance in which the proponents of legality advance a claim to a right to use nuclear weapons. This is so for the reason that, assuming that the use of nuclear weapons is lawful, the nature of the weapons, combined with the limitations imposed by the requirements of necessity and proportionality which condition the exercise of the right of self-defence, will serve to confine their lawful use to that "extreme circumstance". It follows that to hold that humanitarian law does not apply to the use of nuclear weapons in the main circumstance in which a claim to a right of use is advanced is to uphold the substance of the thesis that humanitarian law does not apply at all to the use of nuclear weapons. That view has long been discarded; as the Court itself recalls, the NWS themselves do not advocate it. I am not persuaded that that disfavoured thesis can be brought back through an exception based on self defence.

And thus I return to the real meaning of the General Assembly's question. The essence of the question is whether the exercise of the right of self-defence can be taken to the point of endangering the survival of mankind. To this the Court responds that "in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake". That is the material holding on which this opinion hinges. In so far as that holding suggests that there is a deficiency in the law, I do not think there is; in so far as it suggests that the facts are not sufficient to attract an application of the law, I am not able to agree. In my opinion, there was a sufficient legal and factual basis on which the Court could have proceeded to answer the General Assembly's question - one way or another. And hence my respectful dissent from its conclusion that it cannot.

APPENDIX (demonstrating danger to neutral States)

Preliminary Observations on the Opinion of the Court

(a) Reasons for dissent

My considered opinion is that the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons is illegal in any circumstances whatsoever. It violates the fundamental principles of international law, and represents the very negation of the humanitarian concerns which underlie the structure of humanitarian law. It offends conventional law and, in particular, the Geneva Gas Protocol of 1925, and Article 23*(a)* of the Hague Regulations of 1907. It contradicts the fundamental principle of the dignity and worth of the human person on which all law depends. It endangers the human environment in a manner which threatens the entirety of life on the planet.

I regret that the Court has not held directly and categorically that the use or threat of use of the weapon is unlawful in all circumstances without exception. The Court should have so stated in a vigorous and forthright manner which would have settled this legal question now and forever.

Instead, the Court has moved in the direction of illegality with some far-reaching pronouncements that strongly point in that direction, while making other pronouncements that are both less than clear and clearly wrong.

I have therefore been obliged to title this a Dissenting Opinion, although there are some parts of the Court's Opinion with which I agree, and which may still afford a substantial basis for a conclusion of illegality. Those aspects of the Court's Opinion are discussed below. They do take the law far on the road towards total prohibition. In this sense, the Court's Opinion contains positive pronouncements of significant value.

There are two of the six operative sections of the second part of the Opinion with which I profoundly disagree. I believe those two paragraphs state the law wrongly and incompletely, and I have felt compelled to vote against them.

However, I have voted in favour of paragraph 1 of the dispositif, and in favour of four out of the six items in paragraph 2.

(b) The positive aspects of the Court's Opinion

This Opinion represents the first decision of this Court, and indeed of any international tribunal, that clearly formulates limitations on nuclear weapons in terms of the United Nations Charter. It is the first such decision which expressly addresses the contradiction between nuclear weapons and the laws of armed conflict and international humanitarian law. It is the first such decision which expresses the view that the use of nuclear weapons is hemmed in and limited by a variety of treaty obligations.

In the environmental field, it is the first Opinion which expressly embodies, in the context of nuclear weapons, a principle of "prohibition of methods of warfare which not only are intended, but may also be expected to cause" widespread, long-term and severe environmental damage, and "the prohibition of attacks against the natural environment by way of reprisals" (para. 31).

In the field of nuclear disarmament, it also reminds all nations of their obligation to bring these negotiations to their conclusion in all their aspects, thereby ending the coninuance of this threat to the integrity of international law.

Once these propositions are established, one needs only to examine the effects of the use of nuclear weapons to conclude that there is no possibility whatsoever of a use or threat of use that does not offend these principles. This Opinion examines at some length the numerous unique qualities of the nuclear weapon which stand in flagrant contradiction of the basic values underlying the United Nations Charter, international law, and international humanitarian law. In the light of that information, it becomes demonstrably impossible for the weapon to comply with the basic postulates laid down by the Court, thus rendering them illegal in terms of the unanimous finding of the Court.

In particular, I would mention the requirement, in Article 2(4) of the Charter, of compliance with the Purposes of the United Nations. Those Purposes involve respect for human rights, and the dignity and worth of the human person. They also involve friendly relations among nations, and good neighbourliness (see Art. 1 (Purposes and Principles) read with the Preamble). The linkage of legality with compliance with these principles has now been judicially established. Weapons of warfare which can kill a million or a billion human beings (according to the estimates placed before the Court) show scant regard for the dignity and worth of the human person, or for the principle of good neighbourliness. They stand condemned upon the principles laid down by the Court.

Even though I do not agree with the entirety of the Court's Opinion, strong indicators of illegality necessarily flow from the unanimous parts of that Opinion. Further details of the total incompatibility of the weapons with the principles laid down by the Court appear in the body of this Opinion.

It may be that further clarification will be possible in the future.

I proceed now to make some comments on the individual paragraphs of Part 2 of the dispositif. I shall deal first with the two paragraphs with which I disagree.

(c) Particular comments on the final paragraph

(i) Paragraph 2(B) - (11 votes to 3)

Regarding paragraph 2(B), I am of the view that there are comprehensive and universal limitations imposed by treaty upon the use of nuclear weapons. Environmental treaties and, in particular, the Geneva Gas Protocol and Article 23*(a)* of the Hague Regulations, are among these. These are dealt with in my Opinion. I do not think it is correct to say that there are no conventional prohibitions upon the use of the weapon.

(ii) Paragraph 2(E) - (7 votes to 7. Casting vote in favour by the President)

I am in fundamental disagreement with both sentences contained within this paragraph.

I strongly oppose the presence of the word "generally" in the first sentence. The word is too uncertain in content for use in an Advisory Opinion, and I cannot assent to a proposition which, even by remotest implication, leaves open any possibility that the use of nuclear weapons would not be contrary to law in any circumstances whatsoever. I regret the presence of this word in a sentence which otherwise states the law correctly. It would also appear that the word "generally" introduces an element of internal contradiction into the Court's Opinion, for in paragraphs 2(C) and 2(D) of the Court's Opinion, the Court concludes that nuclear weapons must be consistent with the United Nations Charter, the principles of international law, and the principles of humanitarian law, and, such consistency being impossible, the weapon becomes illegal.

The word "generally" admits of many meanings, ranging through various gradations, from "as a general rule; commonly", to "universally; with respect to all or nearly all"1. Even with the latter meaning, the word opens a window of permissibility, however narrow, which does not truly reflect the law. There should be no niche in the legal principle, within which a nation may seek refuge, constituting itself the sole judge in its own cause on so important a matter.

The main purpose of this Opinion is to show that, not generally but always, the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be contrary to the rules of international law and, in particular, to the principles and rules of humanitarian law. Paragraph 2(E) should have been in those terms, and the Opinion need have stated no more.

The second paragraph of 2(E) states that the current state of international law is such that the Court cannot conclude definitely whether the threat or use of the weapon would or would not be lawful in extreme circumstances of self defence. It seems self-evident to me that once nuclear weapons are resorted to, the laws of war (the ius in bello) take over, and that there are many principles of the laws of war, as recounted in this Opinion, which totally forbid the use of such a weapon. The existing law is sufficiently clear on this matter to have enabled the Court to make a definite pronouncement without leaving this vital question, as though sufficient principles are not already in existence to determine it. All the more should this uncertainty have been eliminated in view of the Court's very definite findings as set out earlier.

(iii) Paragraph 2(A) - (Unanimous)

Speaking for myself, I would have viewed this unquestionable proposition as a preliminary recital, rather than as part of the dispositif.

(iv) Paragraph 2(C) - (Unanimous)

The positive features of this paragraph have already been noted. The Court, in this paragraph, has unanimously endorsed Charter-based pre-conditions to the legality of nuclear weapons, which are diametrically opposed to the results of the use of the weapon. I thus read paragraph 1(C) of the dispositif as rendering the use of the nuclear weapon illegal without regard the circumstances in which the weapon is used - whether in aggression or in self defence, whether internationally or internally, whether by individual decision or in concert with other nations. A unanimous endorsement of this principle by all the judges of this Court takes the principle of illegality of use of nuclear weapons a long way forward from the stage when there was no prior judicial consideration of legality of nuclear weapons by any international tribunal.

Those contending that the use of nuclear weapons was within the law argued strongly that what is not expressly prohibited to a state is permitted. On this basis, the use of the nuclear weapon was said to be a matter on which the state's freedom was not limited. I see the limitations laid down in paragraph 1(C) as laying that argument to rest.

(v) Paragraph 2(D) - (Unanimous)

This paragraph, also unanimously endorsed by the Court, lays down the further limitation of compatibility with the requirements of international law applicable in armed conflict, and particularly with the rules of international humanitarian law and specific treaty obligations.

There is a large array of prohibitions laid down here.

My Opinion will show what these rules and principles are, and how it is impossible, in the light of the nature and effects of nuclear weapons, for these to be satisfied.

If the weapon is demonstrably contrary to these principles, it is unlawful in accordance with this paragraph of the Court's Opinion.

(vi) Paragraph 2(F) - (Unanimous)

This paragraph is strictly outside the terms of reference of the question. Yet, in the overall context of the nuclear weapons problem, it is a useful reminder of state obligations, and I have accordingly voted in favour of it.

The ensuing Opinion sets out my views on the question before the Court. Since the question posed to the Court relates only to use and threat of use, this Opinion does not deal with the legality of other important aspects of nuclear weapons, such as possession, vertical or horizontal proliferation, assembling or testing.

I should also add that I have some reservations in regard to some of the reasoning in the body of the Court's Opinion. Those reservations will appear in the course of this Opinion. In particular, while agreeing with the Court in the reasoning by which it rejects the various objections raised to admissibility and jurisdiction, I would register my disagreement with the statement in paragraph 14 of the Opinion (lines 23-25) that the refusal to give the World Health Organization the Advisory Opinion requested by it was justified by the Court's lack of jurisdiction in that case. My disagreement with that proposition is the subject of my Dissenting Opinion in that case.

I am of the view that in dealing with the question of reprisals (para. 46), the Court should have affirmatively pronounced on the question of the unlawfulness of belligerent reprisals. I do not agree also with its treatment of the question of intent towards a group as such in relation to genocide, and with its treatment of nuclear deterrence. These aspects are considered in this Opinion.

(vii) Paragraph 1 - (13 votes to 1)

One other matter needs to be mentioned before I commence the substantive part of this Dissenting Opinion. I have voted in favour of the first finding of the Court, recorded in item 1 of the dispositif, which follows from the Court's rejection of the various objections to admissibility and jurisdiction which were taken by the States arguing in favour of the legality of nuclear weapons. I strongly support the views expressed by the Court in the course of its reasoning on these matters, but I have some further thoughts upon these objections, which I have set out in my Dissenting Opinion in relation to the WHO Request, where also similar objections were taken. There is no need to repeat those observations in this Opinion, in view of the Court's conclusions. However, what I have stated on these matters in that Dissenting Opinion should be read as supplementary to this Opinion as well.

* * *

I INTRODUCTION

1. Fundamental importance of issue before the Court

I now begin the substantive part of this Opinion.

This case has from its commencement been the subject of a wave of global interest unparalleled in the annals of this Court. Thirty-five states have filed written statements before the Court and twenty-four have made oral submissions. A multitude of organizations, including several NGO's, have also sent communications to the Court and submitted materials to it; and nearly two million signatures have been actually received by the Court from various organizations and individuals from around 25 countries. In addition, there have been other shipments of signatures so voluminous that the Court could not physically receive them and they have been lodged in various other depositories. If these are also taken into account, the total number of signatures has been estimated by the Court's Archivist at over three million2. The overall number of signatures, all of which could not be deposited in the Court, is well in excess of this figure. The largest number of signatures has been received from Japan, the only nation that has suffered a nuclear attack3. Though these organizations and individuals have not made formal submissions to the Court, they evidence a groundswell of global public opinion which is not without legal relevance, as indicated later in this Opinion.

The notion that nuclear weapons are inherently illegal, and that a knowledge of such illegality is of great practical value in obtaining a nuclear-free world, is not new. Albert Schweitzer referred to it, in a letter to Pablo Casals, as early as 1958 in terms of:

> "the most elementary and most obvious argument: namely, that international law prohibits weapons with an unlimitable effect, which cause unlimited damage to people outside the battle zone. This is the case with atomic and nuclear weapons. ... The argument that these weapons are contrary to international law contains everything that we can reproach them with. It has the advantage of being a legal argument. ... No government can deny that these weapons violate international law ... and international law cannot be swept aside!"4

Though lay opinion has thus long expressed itself on the need for attention to the legal aspects, the matter has not thus far been the subject of any authoritative judicial pronouncement by an international tribunal. It was considered by the courts in Japan in the Shimoda case5 but, until the two current requests for Advisory Opinions from this Court, there has been no international judicial consideration of the question. The responsibility placed upon the Court is thus of an extraordinarily onerous nature, and its pronouncements must carry extraordinary significance.

This matter has been strenuously argued before the Court from opposing points of view. The Court has had the advantage of being addressed by a number of the most distinguished practitioners in the field of international law. In their submissions before the Court, they have referred to the historic nature of this Request by the General Assembly and the Request of the World Health Organization, which has been heard along with it. In the words of one of them, these Requests:

> "will constitute milestones in the history of the Court, if not in history per se. It is probable that these requests concern the most important legal issue which has ever been submitted to the Court." (Salmon, Solomon Islands, CR 95/32, p. 38.).

> In the words of another,

> "It is not every day that the opportunity of pleading for the survival of humanity in such an august forum is offered" (David, Solomon Islands, CR 95/32, p. 49).

It is thus the grave possible issues which confronts the Court in this Advisory Opinion. It requires the Court to scrutinize every available source of international law, quarrying deep, if necessary, into its very bedrock. Seams of untold strength and richness lie therein, waiting to be quarried. Do these sources contain principles mightier than might alone, wherewith to govern the mightiest weapon of destruction yet devised?

It needs no emphasis that the function of the Court is to state the law as it now is, and not as it is envisaged in the future. Is the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons illegal under presently existing principles of law, rather than under aspirational expectations of what the law should be? The Court's concern in answering this Request for an Opinion is with lex lata not with lex ferenda.

At the most basic level, three alternative possibilities could offer themselves to the Court as it reaches its decision amidst the clash of opposing arguments. If indeed the principles of international law decree that the use of the nuclear weapon is legal, it must so pronounce. The anti-nuclear forces in the world are immensely influential, but that circumstance does not swerve the Court from its duty of pronouncing the use of the weapons legal if that indeed be the law. A second alternative conclusion is that the law gives no definite indication one way or the other. If so, that neutral fact needs to be declared, and a new stimulus may then emerge for the development of the law. Thirdly, if legal rules or principles dictate that the nuclear weapon is illegal, the Court will so pronounce, undeterred again by the immense forces ranged on the side of the legality of the weapon. As stated at the very commencement, this last represents my considered view. The forces ranged against the view of illegality are truly colossal.

However, collisions with the colossal have not deterred the law on its upward course towards the concept of the rule of law. It has not flinched from the task of imposing constraints upon physical power when legal principle so demands. It has been by a determined stand against forces that seemed colossal or irresistible that the rule of law has been won. Once the Court determines what the law is, and ploughs its furrow in that direction, it cannot pause to look over its shoulder at the immense global forces ranged on either side of the debate.

2. Submissions to the Court

Apart from submissions relating to the competence of the General Assembly to request this Opinion, a large number of submissions on the substantive law have been made on both sides by the numerous states who have appeared before the Court or tendered written submissions.

Though there is necessarily an element of overlap among some of these submissions, they constitute in their totality a vast mass of material, probing the laws of war to their conceptual foundations. Extensive factual material has also been placed before the Court in regard to the many ways in which the nuclear weapon stands alone, even among weapons of mass destruction, for its unique potential of damaging humanity and its environment for generations to come.

On the other hand, those opposing the submission of illegality have argued that, despite a large number of treaties dealing with nuclear weapons, no single clause in any treaty declares nuclear weapons to be illegal in specific terms. They submit that, on the contrary, the various treaties on nuclear weapons entered into by the international community, including the NPT in particular, carry a clear implication of the current legality of nuclear weapons in so far as concerns the nuclear powers. Their position is that the principle of the illegality of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons still lies in the future, although considerable progress has been made along the road leading to that result. It is lex ferenda in their submission, and not yet of the status of lex lata. Much to be desired, but not yet achieved, it is a principle waiting to be born.

This Opinion cannot possibly do justice to all of the formal submissions made to the Court, but will attempt to deal with some of the more important among them.

3. Some Preliminary Observations on the United Nations Charter

It was only a few weeks before the world was plunged into the age of the atom that the United Nations Charter was signed. The subscribing nations adopted this document at San Francisco on 26 June 1945. The bomb was dropped on Hiroshima on 6 August 1945. Only forty days intervened between the two events, each so pregnant with meaning for the human future. The United Nations Charter opened a new vista of hope. The bomb opened new vistas of destruction.

Accustomed as it was to the destructiveness of traditional war, the world was shaken and awe-struck at the power of the nuclear bomb - a small bomb by modern standards. The horrors of war, such as were known to those who drafted the Charter, were thus only the comparatively milder horrors of World War II, as they had been experienced thus far. Yet these horrors, seared into the conscience of humanity by the most devastating conflict thus far in human history, were sufficient to galvanize the world community into action, for, in the words of the United Nations Charter, they had "brought untold sorrow to mankind". The potential to bring untold sorrow to mankind was within weeks to be multiplied several-fold by the bomb. Did that document, drafted in total unawareness of this escalation in the weaponry of war, have anything to say of relevance to the nuclear age which lay round the corner?

There are six keynote concepts in the opening words of the Charter which have intense relevance to the matter before the Court.

The Charter's very first words are "We, the peoples of the United Nations" - thereby showing that all that ensues is the will of the peoples of the world. Their collective will and desire is the very source of the United Nations Charter and that truth should never be permitted to recede from view. In the matter before the Court, the peoples of the world have a vital interest, and global public opinion has an important influence on the development of the principles of public international law. As will be observed later in this Opinion, the law applicable depends heavily upon "the principles of humanity" and "the dictates of public conscience", in relation to the means and methods of warfare that are permissible.

The Charter's next words refer to the determination of those peoples to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war. The only war they knew was war with non-nuclear weapons. That resolve would presumably have been steeled even further had the destructiveness and the intergenerational effects of nuclear war been known.

The Charter immediately follows those two key concepts with a third - the dignity and worth of the human person. This is recognized as the cardinal unit of value in the global society of the future. A means was about to reveal itself of snuffing it out by the million with the use of a single nuclear weapon.

The fourth observation in the Charter, succeeding hard on the heels of the first three, is the equal rights of nations large and small. This is an ideal which is heavily eroded by the concept of nuclear power.

The next observation refers to the maintenance of obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law (emphasis added). The argument against the legality of nuclear weapons rests principally not upon treaties, but upon such "other sources of international law" (mainly humanitarian law), whose principles are universally accepted.

The sixth relevant observation in the preamble to the Charter is its object of promoting social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom. Far from moving towards this Charter ideal, the weapon we are considering is one which has the potential to send humanity back to the stone age if it survives at all.

It is indeed as though, with remarkable prescience, the founding fathers had picked out the principal areas of relevance to human progress and welfare which could be shattered by the appearance only six weeks away of a weapon which for ever would alter the contours of war - a weapon which was to be described by one of its creators, in the words of ancient oriental wisdom, as a "shatterer of worlds"6.

The Court is now faced with the duty of rendering an Opinion in regard to the legality of this weapon. The six cardinal considerations set out at the very commencement of the Charter need to be kept in constant view, for each of them offers guidelines not to be lightly ignored.

4.The law relevant to nuclear weapons

As Oscar Schachter observes, the law relevant to nuclear weapons is "much more comprehensive than one might infer from the discussions of nuclear strategists and political scientists"7, and the range of applicable law could be considered in the following five categories:

1. The international law applicable generally to armed conflicts - the jus in bello, sometimes referred to as the "humanitarian law of war".

2. The ius ad bellum - the law governing the right of states to go to war. This law is expressed in the United Nations Charter and related customary law.

3. The lex specialis - the international legal obligations that relate specifically to nuclear arms and weapons of mass destruction.

4. The whole corpus of international law that governs state obligations and rights generally, which may affect nuclear weapons policy in particular circumstances.

5. National law, constitutional and statutory, that may apply to decisions on nuclear weapons by national authorities.

All of these will be touched upon in the ensuing Opinion, but the main focus of attention will be on the first category mentioned above.

This examination will also show that each one of the sources of international law, as set out in Article 38 (1) of the Court's Statute, supports the conclusion that the use of nuclear weapons in any circumstances is illegal.

5. Introductory observations on Humanitarian Law

It is in the department of humanitarian law that the most specific and relevant rules relating to this problem can be found.

Humanitarian law and custom have a very ancient lineage. They reach back thousands of years. They were worked out in many civilizations - Chinese, Indian, Greek, Roman, Japanese, Islamic, modern European, among others. Through the ages many religious and philosophical ideas have been poured into the mould in which modern humanitarian law has been formed. They represented the effort of the human conscience to mitigate in some measure the brutalities and dreadful sufferings of war. In the language of a notable declaration in this regard (the St. Petersburg Declaration of 1868), international humanitarian law is designed to "conciliate the necessities of war with the laws of humanity". In recent times, with the increasing slaughter and devastation made possible by modern weaponry, the dictates of conscience have prompted ever more comprehensive formulations.

It is today a substantial body of law, consisting of general principles flexible enough to accommodate unprecedented developments in weaponry, and firm enough to command the allegiance of all members of the community of nations. This body of general principles exists in addition to over 600 special provisions in the Geneva Conventions and their Additional Protocols, apart from numerous other conventions on special matters such as chemical and bacteriological weapons. It is thus an important body of law in its own right, and this case in a sense puts it to the test.

Humanitarian law is ever in continuous development. It has a vitality of its own. As observed by the 1945 Nuremberg Tribunal, which dealt with undefined "crimes against humanity" and other crimes, "[the law of war] is not static, but by continual adaptation follows the needs of a changing world"8. Humanitarian law grows as the sufferings of war keep escalating. With the nuclear weapon, those sufferings reach a limit situation, beyond which all else is academic. Humanitarian law, as a living discipline, must respond sensitively, appropriately and meaningfully.

By their very nature, problems in humanitarian law are not abstract, intellectual inquiries which can be pursued in ivory-tower detachment from the sad realities which are their stuff and substance. Not being mere exercises in logic and black-letter law, they cannot be logically or intellectually disentangled from their terrible context. Distasteful though it be to contemplate the brutalities surrounding these legal questions, the legal questions can only be squarely addressed when those brutalities are brought into vivid focus.

The brutalities tend often to be hidden behind a veil of generalities and platitudes - such as that all war is brutal or that nuclear weapons are the most devastating weapons of mass destruction yet devised. It is necessary to examine more closely what this means in all its stark reality. A close and unvarnished picture is required of the actual human sufferings involved, and of the multifarious threats to the human condition posed by these weapons. Then only can humanitarian law respond appropriately. Indeed, it is by turning the spotlight on the agonies of the battlefield that modern humanitarian law began. This Opinion will therefore examine the factual effects of nuclear weapons in that degree of minimum detail which is necessary to attract to these considerations the matching principles of humanitarian law.

6. Linkage between humanitarian law and the realities of war

The 19th century tended to view war emotionally, as a glorious enterprise, and practically, as a natural extension of diplomacy. Legitimized by some philosophers, respected by nearly all statesmen, and glorified by many a poet and artist, its brutalities tended to be concealed behind screens of legitimacy, respectability and honour.

Henri Dunant's Memory of Solferino, written after a visit to the battlefield of Solferino in 1859, dragged the brutalities of war into public view in a manner which shook contemporary civilization out of its complacency and triggered off the development of modern humanitarian law. That spirit of realism needs to be constantly rekindled if the law is not to stray too far from its subject matter, and thus become sterile.

Dunant's historic account touched the conscience of his age to the extent that a legal response seemed imperative. Here is his description of the raw realities of war as practiced in his time:

> "Here is a hand-to-hand struggle in all its horror and frightfulness: Austrians and Allies trampling each other under foot, killing one another on piles of bleeding corpses, felling their enemies with their rifle butts, crushing skulls, ripping bellies open with sabre and bayonet. No quarter is given. It is a sheer butchery ...
>
> A little further on, it is the same picture, only made the more ghastly by the approach of a squadron of cavalry, which gallops by, crushing dead and dying beneath its horses' hoofs. One poor man has his jaw carried away; another his head shattered; a third, who could have been saved, has his chest beaten in.
>
> Here comes the artillery, following the cavalry and going at full gallop. The guns crash over the dead and wounded, strewn pell-mell on the ground. Brains spurt under the wheels, limbs are broken and torn, bodies mutilated past recognition - the soil is literally puddled with blood, and the plain littered with human remains."

His description of the aftermath is no less powerful:

> "The stillness of the night was broken by groans, by stifled sighs of anguish and suffering.

> Heart-rending voices kept calling for help. Who could ever describe the agonies of that fearful night?
> When the sun came up on the twenty-fifth, it disclosed the most dreadful sights imaginable. Bodies of men and horses covered the battlefield: corpses were strewn over roads, ditches, ravines, thickets and fields: the approaches of Solferino were literally thick with dead."

Such were the realities of war, to which humanitarian law was the response of the legal conscience of the time. The nuclear weapon has increased the savagery a thousandfold since Dunant wrote his famous words. The conscience of our time has accordingly responded in appropriate measure, as amply demonstrated by the global protests, the General Assembly resolutions, and the universal desire to eliminate nuclear weapons altogether. It does not sit back in a spirit of scholarly detachment, drawing its conclusions from refined exercises in legal logic.

Just as it is through close contact with the raw facts of artillery and cavalry warfare that modern humanitarian law emerged, it is through a consideration of the raw facts of nuclear war that an appropriate legal response can emerge.

While we have moved from the cruelties of cavalry and artillery to the exponentially greater cruelties of the atom, we now enjoy a dual advantage, not present in Dunant's time - the established discipline of humanitarian law and ample documentation of the human suffering involved. Realities infinitely more awful than those which confronted Dunant's age of simpler warfare cannot fail to touch the legal conscience of our age.

Here is an eyewitness description from the first use of the weapon in the nuclear age - one of hundreds of such scenes which no doubt occurred simultaneously, and many of which have been recorded in contemporary documentation. The victims were not combatants, as was the case at Solferino:

> "It was a horrible sight. Hundreds of injured people who were trying to escape to the hills passed our house. The sight of them was almost unbearable. Their faces and hands were burnt and swollen; and great sheets of skin had peeled away from their tissues to hang down like rags on a scarecrow. They moved like a line of ants. All through the night they went past our house, but this morning they had stopped. I found them lying on both sides of the road, so thick that it was impossible to pass without stepping on them.
> "And they had no faces! Their eyes, noses and mouths had been burned away, and it looked like their ears had been melted off. It was hard to tell front from back. One soldier, whose features had been destroyed and was left with his white teeth sticking out, asked me for some water but I didn't have any. [I clasped my hands and prayed for him. He didn't say anything more.] His plea for water must have been his last words."9

Multiply this a thousand-fold or even a million-fold and we have a picture of just one of the many possible effects of nuclear war.

Massive documentation details the sufferings caused by nuclear weapons - from the immediate charring and mutilation for miles from the site of the explosion, to the lingering after-effects - the cancers and the leukaemias which imperil human health, the genetic mutations which threaten human integrity, the environmental devastation which endangers the human habitat, the disruption of all organization, which undermines human society.

The Hiroshima and Nagasaki experience were two isolated incidents three days apart. They tell us very little of the effects of multiple explosions that would almost inevitably follow in quick succession in the event of a nuclear war today (see section II.6 below). Moreover, fifty years of development have intervened, with bombs being available now which carry seventy or even seven hundred times the explosive power of the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombs. The devastation of Hiroshima and Nagasaki could be magnified several-fold by just one bomb today, leave alone a succession of bombs.

7. The limit situation created by nuclear weapons

Apart from human suffering, nuclear weapons, as observed earlier, take us into a limit situation. They have the potential to destroy all civilization - all that thousands of years of effort in all cultures have produced. It is true "the dreary story of sickened survivors lapsing into stone-age brutality is not an assignment that any sensitive person undertakes willingly"10, but it is necessary to "contemplate the likely outcome of mankind's present course clearsightedly" (ibid.). Since nuclear weapons can destroy all life on the planet, they imperil all that humanity has ever stood for, and humanity itself.

An analogy may here be drawn between the law relating to the environment and the law relating to war.

At one time it was thought that the atmosphere, the seas and the land surface of the planet were vast enough to absorb any degree of pollution and yet rehabilitate themselves. The law was consequently very lax in its attitude towards pollution. However, with the realization that a limit situation would soon be reached, beyond which the environment could absorb no further pollution without danger of collapse, the law found itself compelled to reorientate its attitude towards the environment.

With the law of war, it is no different. Until the advent of nuclear war, it was thought that however massive the scale of a war, humanity could survive and reorder its affairs. With the nuclear weapon, a limit situation was reached, in that the grim prospect opened out that humanity may well fail to survive the next nuclear war, or that all civilization may be destroyed. That limit situation has compelled the law of war to reorientate its attitudes and face this new reality.

8. Possession and Use

Although it is the use of nuclear weapons, and not possession, that is the subject of this reference, many arguments have been addressed to the Court which deal with possession and which therefore are not pertinent to the issues before the Court.

For example, the Court was referred, in support of the position that nuclear weapons are a matter within the sovereign authority of each state, to the following passage in Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua:

> "in international law, there are no rules, other than such rules as may be accepted by the State concerned, by treaty or otherwise, whereby the level of armaments of a sovereign State can be limited" (France, CR 95/23, p. 79; I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 135; emphasis added).

This passage clearly relates to possession, not use.

Much was made also of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, as permitting nuclear weapons to the nuclear weapons states. Here again such permission, if any, as may be inferred from that treaty relates to possession and not use, for nowhere does the NPT contemplate or deal with the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons. On questions of use or threat of use, the NPT is irrelevant.

9. Differing Attitudes of States supporting Legality

There are some significant differences between the positions adopted by States supporting the legality of the use of nuclear weapons. Indeed, in relation to some very basic matters, there are divergent approaches among the nuclear States themselves.

Thus the French position is that

> "This criterion of proportionality does not itself rule out in principle the utilization, whether in response or as a matter of first use, of any particular weapon whatsoever, including a nuclear weapon, provided that such use is intended to withstand an attack and appears to be the most appropriate means of doing so." (French Written Statement, tr. p. 15, emphasis added.)

According to this view, the factors referred to could, in a given case, even outweigh the principle of proportionality. It suggests that the governing criterion determining the permissibility of the weapon is whether it is the most appropriate means of withstanding the attack. The United States position is that:

> "Whether an attack with nuclear weapons would be disproportionate depends entirely on the circumstances, including the nature of the enemy threat, the importance of destroying the objective, the character, size and likely effects of the device, and the magnitude of the risk to civilians." (United States Written Statement, p. 23.)

The United States position thus carefully takes into account such circumstances as the character, size and effects of the device and the magnitude of risk to civil

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE KOROMA

It is a matter of profound regret to me that I have been compelled to append this Dissenting Opinion to the Advisory Opinion rendered by the Court, as I fundamentally disagree with its finding - secured by the President's casting vote - that:

> "in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake".

This finding, in my considered opinion, is not only unsustainable on the basis of existing international law, but, as I shall demonstrate later, is totally at variance with the weight and abundance of material presented to the Court. The finding is all the more regrettable in view of the fact that the Court had itself reached a conclusion that:

> "the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law".

A finding with which I concur, save for the word "generally". It is my considered opinion based on the existing law and the available evidence that the use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance would be unlawful under international law. That use would at the very least result in the violation of the principles and rules of international humanitarian law, and would therefore be contrary to that law.

I am also unable to agree with various aspects of the reasoning which motivates the Advisory Opinion. Some of it, in my view, is not only untenable in law, but may even have the effect of potentially destabilizing the existing international legal order.

According to the material before the Court, it is estimated that more than 40,000 nuclear warheads exist in the world today with a total destructive capacity around a million times greater than that of the bomb which devastated Hiroshima. A single nuclear bomb detonated over a large city is said to be capable of killing more than 1 million people. These weapons, if used massively, could result in the annihilation of the human race and the extinction of human civilization. Nuclear weapons are thus not just another kind of weapon, they are considered the absolute weapon and are far more pervasive in terms of their destructive effects than any conventional weapon. A request for an advisory opinion asking for a determination about the lawfulness or otherwise of the use of such weapons is a matter which, in my considered opinion, this Court as a court of law and the guardian of legality in the United Nations system should be capable of making.

While it is admitted that the views of States are divided on the question of nuclear weapons, as well as about their possible consequences, views are also divided as to whether the Court should have been asked to render an opinion on the matter at all. However, the Court, having found that the General Assembly was competent to ask the question and in the absence of any "compelling reason" relating to propriety or to any issue that would compromise its judicial character, should have performed its judicial function in accordance with Article 38 of its Statute and determined the question, "in accordance with international law", by simultaneously applying international conventions, international custom as established rules recognized by States or as evidence of general practice accepted as law or the general principles of law recognized by all States, the judicial decisions of the Court and resolutions of international organizations, at a minimum as evidence of the law.

In my view, the prevention of war, by the use of nuclear weapons, is a matter for international law and, if the Court is requested to determine such an issue, it falls within its competence to do so. Its decision can contribute to the prevention of war by ensuring respect for the law. The Court in the Corfu Channel case described as its function "the need to ensure respect for international law of which it is the organ" (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 35). The late Judge Nagendra Singh, a former Member and President of this Court, commenting on that statement, observed that it was made by the Court without reference to the United Nations Charter or to its own Statute. He observed that "the Court has thus to be conscious of this fact, as something inherent to its existence in relation to the law which it administers" ("The Role and Record of the International Court of Justice", p. 173). Today a system of war prevention exists in international law, and comprises the prohibition of the use of force, the collective security provisions of the United Nations Charter for the maintenance of international peace, the obligation to resort to peaceful means for the settlement of international disputes and the regulations on weapons prohibition, arms limitation and disarmament. The Court's Advisory Opinion in this case could have strengthened this regime by serving as a shield of humanity.

In my view, it is wholly incoherent in the light of the material before the Court to say that it cannot rule definitively on the matter now before it in view of the current state of the law and because of the elements of facts at its disposal, for neither the law nor the facts are so imprecise or inadequate as to prevent the Court from reaching a definitive conclusion on the matter. On the other hand, the Court's findings could be construed as suggesting either that there is a gap, a lacuna, in the existing law or that the Court is unable to reach a definitive conclusion on the matter because the law is imprecise or its content insufficient or that it simply does not exist. It does not appear to me any new principles are needed for a determination of the matter to be made. All that was requested of the Court was to apply the existing law. A finding of non liquet is wholly unfounded in the present case. The Court has always taken the view that the burden of establishing the law is on the Court and not on the Parties. The Court has stated that:

> "there is no incompatibility with its judicial function in making a pronouncement on the rights and duties of the Parties under existing international law which would clearly be capable of having a forward reach ... The possibility of the law changing is ever present: but that cannot relieve the Court from its obligation to render a judgment on the basis of the law as it exists at the time of its decision ..." (Fisheries Jurisdiction Case, I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 20.)

The corpus juris on the matter is not only considerable, but is sufficiently clear and precise for the Court to have been able to make a definitive finding. If the Court had applied the whole spectrum of the law, including international conventions, rules of customary international law, general principles of international law, judicial decisions, as well as resolutions of international organizations, there would have been no room for a purported finding of non liquet.

Furthermore, all States - both the nuclear-weapon and non-nuclear-weapon States - are agreed that the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, particularly international humanitarian law, apply to the use of nuclear weapons. This law, which has been formulated and codified to restrict the use of various weapons and methods of warfare, is intended to limit the terrible effects of war. Central to it is the principle of humanity which above all aims to mitigate the effects of war on civilians and combatants alike. It is this law which also establishes a regime on the basis of which the methods and means of warfare are to be judged. Accordingly, it would seem apposite and justifiable for the effects of a conflict involving nuclear weapons - regarded as the ultimate weapon of mass destruction - to be judged against the standards of such a regime.

Despite its findings, the Court has itself recognized that the law of armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law - would apply to a conflict involving the use of nuclear weapons. It follows that the Court's finding that it cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake, is a contradiction and can at best be described as the identification of two principles, namely, the obligation to comply with the principles and rules of international law applicable in armed conflict and the right of a State to self-defence including when it considers its very survival to be at stake. It these principles are not mutually exclusive and are recognized in international law. However, it has been argued that when the Court is faced with two competing principles or rights, it should jurisprudentially assign a priority to one of them and cause it to prevail. In the opinion of Sir Hersch Lauterpacht, even though the margin of preference for giving a priority to one principle over another may be small, yet, however tenuous, that margin must be decisive. He admits that judicial action along this line may in some respects be indistinguishable from judicial legislation. However, he argues, the Court "may have to effect a compromise - which is not a diplomatic but a legitimate judicial compromise - between competing principles of law", and concludes that:

> "there is no decisive reason why the Court should avoid at all cost some such outcome. It is in accordance with the true function of the Court that the dispute submitted to it should be determined by its own decision and not by the contingent operation of an attitude of accommodation on the part of the disputants. There is an embarrassing anticlimax, which is not legally irrelevant, in a situation in which the Court, after prolonged written and oral pleadings, is impelled to leave the settlement of the actual issue to ... the parties." (The Development of International Law by the International Court, p. 146.)

The suggestion that it should be left to individual States to determine whether or not it may be lawful to have recourse to nuclear weapons, is not only an option fraught with serious danger, both for the States that may be directly involved in conflict, and for those nations not involved, but may also suggest that such an option is not legally reprehensible. Accordingly, the Court, instead of leaving it to each State to decide whether or not it would be lawful or unlawful to use nuclear weapons in an extreme circumstance of "State survival", should have determined whether or not it is permissible to use nuclear weapons even in a case involving the survival of the state. The question put to the Court is whether it is lawful to use nuclear weapons and is not about the survival of the state, which is what the Court's reply turned on. If the Court had correctly interpreted the question this would not only have had the effect of declaring the law regarding the use of nuclear weapons but could well have deterred the use of such weapons. Regrettably, the Court refrained not only from performing its judicial function, but, by its "non-finding", appears to have made serious inroads into the present legal restraints relating to the use of nuclear weapons, while throwing the regime of self-defence into doubt by creating a new category called the "survival of the State", seen as constituting an exception to Articles 2, paragraph 4, and 51of the United Nations Charter and to the principles and rules of humanitarian law. In effect, this kind of restraint would seem to be tantamount to judicial legislation at a time when the Court has itself - rightly in my view - recognized that it "cannot legislate", and, that > "in the circumstances of the present case, it is not called upon to do so. Rather its task is to engage in its normal judicial function of ascertaining the existence or otherwise of legal principles and rules applicable to the threat or use of nuclear weapons." (Advisory Opinion, para. 18.)

However, just after reaffirming this self-denying ordinance, the Court went on to do just that by proclaiming that it cannot conclude definitively whether or not the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be "lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake", given the current state of international law and the elements of fact at its disposal. This finding, with respect, is not only untenable in law but legally superfluous. The right of self-defence is inherent and fundamental to all States. It exists within and not outside or above the law. To suggest that it exists outside or above the law is to render it probable that force may be used unilaterally by a State when it by itself considers its survival to be at stake. The right of self-defence is not a licence to use force; it is regulated by law and was never intended to threaten the security of other states.

Thus the Court's finding does not only appear tantamount to judicial legislation which undermines the regime of the non-use of force as enshrined in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter, and that of self-defence as embodied in Article 51, but the doctrine of the survival of the State represents a throwback to the law before the adoption of the United Nations Charter and is even redolent of a period long before that. Grotius, writing in the seventeenth century, stated that: "[t]he right of self-defence ... has its origin directly, and chiefly, in the fact that nature commits to each his own protection" (Grotius, De Jure Belli Ac Pacis, bk. II, ch. I, pt. III, at 172 (Carnegie Endowment trans. 1925) (1646)). Thus, the Court's finding would appear to be tantamount to according to each State the exclusive right to decide for itself to use nuclear weapons when its survival is at stake as that State perceives it - a decision subjected neither to the law nor to third party adjudication. When Lauterpacht had to consider a similar situation following the conclusion of the Briand-Kellog Pact of 1928, according to which the participating States declared that a State claiming the right of self-defence "alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defence", he found such a claim to be "self-contradictory in as much as it purports to be based on legal right and at the same time, it dissociates itself from regulations and evaluation of the law". While he acknowledged the right of self-defence as "absolute" in the sense that no law could disregard it, Lauterpacht however maintained that the right is "relative" in as much as it is presumably regulated by law. "It is regulated to the extent that it is the business of the Courts to determine whether, how far, and for how long, there was a necessity to have recourse to it". ("The Function of Law in the International Community", pp. 179-180).

As already stated, the Court's present finding represents a challenge to some of the fundamental precepts of existing international law including the proscription of the use of force in international relations and the exercise of the right of self-defence. That the Court cannot decide definitively whether the use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful when the survival of the State is at stake is a confirmation of the assertion that the survival of that State is not only not a matter for the law but that a State, in order to ensure its survival, can wipe out the rest of humanity by having recourse to nuclear weapons. In its historical garb "of the fundamental right of self-preservation", such a right was used in the past as a pretext for the violation of the sovereignty of other States. Such acts are now considered unlawful under contemporary international law. The International Military Tribunal at Nuremburg in 1946 rejected the argument that the State involved had acted in self-defence and that every State must be the judge of whether, in a given case, it is entitled to decide whether to exercise the right of self-defence. The Tribunal held that "whether action taken under the claim of self-defence was in fact aggressive or defensive must ultimately be subject to investigation or adjudication if international law is ever to be enforced" (Judgment of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremburg, 1946, Trial of German Major War Criminals before the International Military Tribunal, (1947), Vol. I, p. 208).

Similarly, this Court, in the Nicaragua case, rejected the assertion that the right of self-defence is not subject to international law. While noting that Article 51 of the United Nations Charter recognizes a "natural" or "inherent" right of self-defence, it stated that "it is hard to see how this can be other than of a customary nature, even if its present content has been confirmed by the Charter" (I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 94). By its present findings, the Court would appear to be departing from its own jurisprudence by saying that it cannot determine conclusively whether or not it would be lawful for a State to use nuclear weapons.

Be that as it may, it is not as if the Court was compelled to reach such a conclusion, for the law is clear. The use of force is firmly and peremptorily prohibited by Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter. The regime of self-defence or the doctrine of "self-survival", as the Court would prefer to have it, is likewise regulated and subjected to that law. The right of self-defence by a State is clearly stipulated in Article 51 of the Charter, as follows:

> "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defence shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security."

Thus, the Article permits the exercise of that right subject to the conditions stipulated therein. Firstly, in order to exercise the right, a State must have been the victim of an armed attack and, while exercising such a right, it must observe the principle of proportionality. Secondly, the measure or measures taken in exercise of such a right must be reported to the Security Council and are to be discontinued as soon as the Security Council itself has taken measures necessary for the maintenance of international peace. Article 51 therefore envisages the ability of a State lawfully to defend itself against armed attack. The Court emphasized this when it stated that the right of self-defence under Article 51 is conditioned by necessity and proportionality and that these conditions would apply whatever the means of force employed. Moreover, self-defence must also meet the requirements of the law applicable in armed conflict, particularly the principles and rules of international humanitarian law.

The question therefore is not whether a State is entitled to exercise its right of self-defence in an extreme circumstance in which the very survival of that State would be at stake, but rather whether the use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful under any circumstance including an extreme circumstance in which its very survival was at stake - or, in other words, whether it is possible to conceive of consequences of the use of such weapons which do not entail an infringement of international law applicable in armed conflict, particularly international humanitarian law. As stated above, in terms of the law, the right of self-defence is restricted to the repulse of an armed attack and does not permit of retaliatory or punitive action. Nor is it an exception to the jus in bello (conduct of hostilities). Since, in the light of the law and the facts, it is inconceivable that the use of nuclear weapons would not entail an infringement of, at the very least, the law applicable in armed conflict, particularly humanitarian law, it follows that the use of such weapons would be unlawful. Nuclear weapons do not constitute an exception to humanitarian law.

Given these considerations, it is not legally sustainable to find, as the Court has done, that, in view of the present state of the law, it cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-survival, for as it stated in the Nicaragua case:

> "the conduct of States should, in general, be consistent with ... rules, and that instances of State conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule, not as indications of the recognition of that rule" (I.C.J. Report 1986, p. 98).

Judge Mosler, a former member of this Court has in another context, stated > "that law cannot recognise any act either of one member or of several members in concert, as being legally valid if it is directed against the very foundation of law". (H. Mosler, The International Society as a Legal Community, (1980), p. 18).

The Court's finding is also untenable, for, and as already mentioned, the corpus juris on which it should have reached its conclusion does indeed exist, and in an ample and substantial form. The Court had itself taken cognizance of this when it noted that the "laws and customs of war" applicable to the matter before it had been codified in The Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907, based upon the 1868 Declaration of St. Petersburg as well as the results of the Brussels Conference of 1874. The Court also recognized that "The Hague Law" and, more particularly, the Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, do regulate the rights and duties of belligerent States in the conduct of their hostilities and limit the choice of methods and means of injuring the enemy in wartime. It found that the "Geneva Law" (the Conventions of 1864, 1906, 1929 and 1949), which protects the victims of war and aims to provide safeguards for disabled armed forces personnel and persons not taking part in the hostilities, is equally applicable to the issue before it. It noted that these two branches of law today constitute international humanitarian law which was codified in the 1977 Additional Protocols to the Geneva Conventions of 1949.

It observed that, since the turn of the century, certain weapons, such as explosive projectiles under 400 g, dum-dum bullets and asphyxiating gases, have been specifically prohibited, and that chemical and bacteriological weapons were also prohibited by the 1925 Geneva Gas Protocol. More recently, the Court found, the use of weapons producing "non-detectable fragments", of other types of mines, booby traps and other devices, and of incendiary weapons, was either prohibited or limited depending on the case by the Convention of 10 October 1980 on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects. Such prohibition, it stated, was in line with the rule that "the right of belligerents to adopt means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited" as stated in Article 22 of the 1907 Hague Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land. The Court further noted that the St. Petersburg Declaration had already condemned the use of weapons "which uselessly aggravate the suffering of disabled men or make their death inevitable" and that the aforementioned Regulations annexed to the Hague Convention IV of 1907, prohibit the use of "arms, projectiles, or material calculated to cause unnecessary suffering" (Article 23).

The Court also identified the cardinal principles constituting the fabric of international humanitarian law, the first of which is aimed at the protection of the civilian population and civilian objects and establishes the distinction between combatants and non-combatants. According to those principles, States are obliged not to make civilians the object of attack and must consequently not use weapons that are incapable of distinguishing between civilian and military targets. Secondly, it is prohibited to cause unnecessary suffering to combatants and, accordingly, it is prohibited to use weapons causing them needless harm or that uselessly aggravate their suffering. In this regard, the Court noted that States do not have unlimited freedom of choice in the weapons they can use.

The Court also considered applicable to the matter the Martens Clause, first enunciated in the Hague Convention of 1899 with respect to the laws and customs of war on land, a modern version of which has been codified in Article 1, paragraph 2, of Additional Protocol I of 1977, and reads as follows:

> "In cases not covered by this Protocol or by other international agreements, civilians and combatants remain under the protection and authority of the principles of international law derived from established custom, from the principles of humanity and from the dictates of public conscience."

The Court noted that the principles embodied in the Clause are principles and rules of humanitarian law and, together with the principle of neutrality, apply to nuclear weapons.

It was in the light of the foregoing that the Court recognized that humanitarian law does prohibit the use of certain types of weapons either because of their indiscriminate effect on combatants and civilians or because of the unnecessary and superfluous harm caused to combatants. The Court accordingly held that the principles and rules of international humanitarian law are obligatory and binding on all States as they also constitute intransgressible principles of customary international law.

With regard to the applicability of Additional Protocol I of 1977 to nuclear weapons, the Court recalled that even if not all States are parties to the Protocol, they are nevertheless bound by those rules in the Protocol which, when adopted, constituted an expression of the pre-existing customary law, such as, in particular, the Martens Clause, which is enshrined in Article I of the Protocol.

The Court observed that the fact that certain types of weapons were not specifically mentioned in the Convention does not permit the drawing of any legal conclusions relating to the substantive issues raised by the use of such weapons. It took the view that there can be no doubt that the principles and rules of humanitarian law, which are enshrined in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocols of 1977, are applicable to nuclear weapons. Even when it observed that the Conferences of 1949 and 1977 did not specifically address the question of nuclear weapons, the Court stated that it cannot be concluded from this that the established principles and rules of humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict do not apply to nuclear weapons, as such a conclusion would be incompatible with the intrinsically humanitarian character of the legal principles in question which permeate the entire law of armed conflict and apply to all forms of warfare and to all kinds of weapons.

The Court agreed with the submission that:

> "In general, international humanitarian law bears on the threat or use of nuclear weapons as it does of other weapons.
> International humanitarian law has evolved to meet contemporary circumstances, and is not limited in its application to weaponry of an earlier time. The fundamental principles of this law endure: to mitigate and circumscribe the cruelty of war for humanitarian reasons." (New Zealand, Written Statement, p. 15.)

The Court also observed that none of the States advocating the legality of the use of nuclear weapons under certain circumstances, including the "clean" use of smaller, low-yield, tactical nuclear weapons, had indicated that the principles of humanitarian law do not apply to nuclear weapons, noting that, for instance, the Russian Federation had recognized that "restrictions set by the rules applicable to armed conflicts in respect of means and methods of warfare definitely also extend to nuclear weapons"; that for the United States, "the United States has long shared the view that the law of armed conflict governs the use of nuclear weapons - just as it governs the use of conventional weapons"; while for the United Kingdom, "so far as the customary law of war is concerned, the United Kingdom has always accepted that the use of nuclear weapons is subject to the principles of the jus in bello".

With regard to the elements of fact advanced in its findings, the Court noted the definitions of nuclear weapons contained in various treaties and instruments, including those according to which nuclear explosions are "capable of causing massive destruction, generalized damage or massive poisoning" (Paris Accords of 1954), or the preamble of the Tlatelolco Treaty of 1967 which described nuclear weapons "whose terrible effects are suffered, indiscriminately and inexorably, by military forces and civilian population alike, [and which] constitute through the persistence of the radioactivity they release, an attack on the integrity of the human species and ultimately may even render the whole earth uninhabitable". It also took note of the fact that nuclear weapons release not only immense quantities of heat and energy, but also powerful and prolonged radiation; that the first two causes of damage are vastly more powerful than such causes of damage in other weapons of mass destruction, and that the phenomenon of radiation is said to be peculiar to nuclear weapons. These characteristics, the Court concluded, render nuclear weapons potentially catastrophic; their destructive power cannot be contained in either space or time, and they have the potential to destroy all civilization and the entire ecosystem of the planet.

With regard to the elements of fact, the Court noted that the radiation released by a nuclear explosion would affect health, agriculture, natural resources and demography over a wide area and that such weapons would be a serious danger to future generations. It further noted that ionizing radiation has the potential to damage the future environment, food and marine ecosystems, and to cause genetic defects and illness in future generations.

Also in this regard, the Government of Japan told the Court that the yields of the atomic bombs detonated in Hiroshima on 6 August 1945 and in Nagasaki on 9 August 1945 were the equivalent of 15 kilotons and 22 kilotons of TNT respectively. The bomb blast produced a big fireball, followed by extremely high temperatures of some several million degrees centigrade, and extremely high pressures of several hundred thousand atmospheres. It also emitted a great deal of radiation. According to the delegation, the fireball, which lasted for about 10 seconds, raised the ground temperature at the hypocentre to somewhere between 3,000šC and 4,000šC, and the heat caused the scorching of wood buildings over a radius of approximately 3 kilometres from the hypocentre. The number of houses damaged by the atomic bombs was 70,147 in Hiroshima and 18,409 in Nagasaki. People who were within 1,000 m of the hypocentre were exposed to the initial radiation of more than 3.93 Grays. It is estimated that 50 per cent of people who were exposed to more than 3 Grays die of marrow disorder within two months. Induced radiation was emitted from the ground and buildings charged with radioactivity. In addition, soot and dust contaminated by induced radiation was dispersed into the air and whirled up into the stratosphere by the force of the explosion, and this caused radioactive fallout back to the ground over several months.

According to the delegation, the exact number of fatalities was not known, since documents were scarce. It was estimated, however, that the number of people who had died by the end of 1945 amounted to approximately 140,000 in Hiroshima and 74,000 in Nagasaki. The population of the cities at that time was estimated at 350,000 in Hiroshima and 240,000 in Nagasaki. The number of people who died of thermal radiation immediately after the bomb blast, on the same day or within a few days, was not clear. However, 90 to 100 per cent of the people who were exposed to thermal radiation without any shield within 1 k of the hypocentre, died within a week. The early mortality rates for the people who were within 1.5 k to 2 k of the hypocentre were 14 per cent for people with a shield and 83 per cent for the people without a shield. In addition to direct injury from the bomb blast, death was caused by several interrelated factors such as being crushed or buried under buildings, injuries caused by splinters of glass, radiation damage, food shortages or a shortage of doctors and medicines.

Over 320,000 people who survived but were affected by radiation still suffer from various malignant tumours caused by radiation, including leukaemia, thyroid cancer, breast cancer, lung cancer, gastric cancer, cataracts and a variety of other after-effects. More than half a century after the disaster, they are still said to be undergoing medical examinations and treatment.

According to the Mayor of Hiroshima who made a statement before the Court, the atomic bomb which was detonated in Hiroshima produced an enormous destructive power and reduced innocent civilian populations to ashes. Women, the elderly and the newborn were said to have been bathed in deadly radiation. The Court was told that the dropping of the bomb unleashed a mushroom cloud and human skin was burned raw while other victims died in desperate agony. The Mayor further told the Court that when the bomb exploded, enormous pillars of flame leaped up towards the sky and a majority of the buildings crumbled, causing a large number of casualties, many of them fatal.

Later in his statement he described the unique characteristic of the atomic bombing as one whose enormous destruction was instantaneous and universal. Old, young, male, female, soldiers, civilians were all killed indiscriminately. The entire city of Hiroshima, he said, had been exposed to thermal rays, shock-wave blast and radiation. The bomb purportedly generated heat that reached several million degrees centigrade. The fireball was about 280 metres in diameter, the thermal rays emanating from it were thought to have instantly charred any human being who was outdoors near the hypocentre. The witness further disclosed that according to documented cases, clothing had burst into flames at a distance of 2 kilometres from the hypocentre of the bomb; many fires were ignited simultaneously throughout the city; the entire city was carbonized and reduced to ashes. Yet another phenomenon was a shock-wave which inflicted even greater damage when it ricocheted off the ground and buildings. The blast wind which resulted had, he said, lifted and carried people through the air. All wooden buildings within a radius of 2 kilometres collapsed, while many well beyond that distance were damaged.

The blast and thermal rays combined to burn to ashes or cause the collapse of approximately 70 per cent of the 76,327 dwellings in Hiroshima at the time. The rest were partially destroyed, half-bombed or damaged. The entire city was said to have been instantly devastated by the dropping of the bomb.

On the day the bomb was dropped, the witness further disclosed that there were approximately 350,000 people in Hiroshima, but it was later estimated that some 140,000 had died by the end of December 1945. Hospitals were said to be in ruins with medical staff dead or injured and with no medicines or equipment, and an incredible number of victims died, unable to receive sufficient treatment. Survivors developed fever, diarrhoea, haemorrhaging, and extreme fatigue, many died abruptly. Such was said to be the pattern of the acute symptoms of the atomic bomb disease. Other consequences were a widespread destruction of cells, loss of blood-producing tissue, and organ damage. The immune systems of survivors were weakened and such symptoms as hair loss were conspicuous. Other experiences recorded were an increase in leukaemia, cataracts, thyroid cancer, breast cancer, lung cancer and other cancers. As a result of the bombing, children exposed to radiation suffered mental and physical retardation. Nothing could be done for these children medically and even unborn babies, the Mayor stated, had been affected. He concluded by saying that exposure to high levels of radiation continues in Hiroshima to this day.

The Mayor of Nagasaki, in his testimony, described effects on his city that were similar to those experienced by Hiroshima as a result of the atomic bombing which had taken place during the war. According to the witness,

> "The explosion of the atomic bomb generated an enormous fireball, 200 metres in radius, almost as though a small sun had appeared in the sky. The next instant, a ferocious blast and wave of heat assailed the ground with a thunderous roar. The surface temperature of the fireball was about 7,000šC, and the heat rays that reached the ground were over 3,000šC. The explosion instantly killed or injured people within a two-kilometre radius of the hypocentre, leaving innumerable corpses charred like clumps of charcoal and scattered in the ruins near the hypocentre. In some cases not even a trace of the person's remains could be found. The blast wind of over 300 metres per second slapped down trees and demolished most buildings. Even iron reinforced concrete structures were so badly damaged that they seemed to have been smashed by a giant hammer. The fierce flash of heat meanwhile melted glass and left metal objects contorted like strands of taffy, and the subsequent fires burned the ruins of the city to ashes. Nagasaki became a city of death where not even the sounds of insects could be heard. After a while, countless men, women and children began to gather for a drink of water at the banks of nearby Urakami River, their hair and clothing scorched and their burnt skin hanging off in sheets like rags. Begging for help, they died one after another in the water or in heaps on the banks. Then radiation began to take its toll, killing people like a scourge of death expanding in concentric circles from the hypocentre. Four months after the atomic bombing, 74,000 were dead and 75,000 had suffered injuries, that is, two-third of the city population had fallen victim to this calamity that came upon Nagasaki like a preview of the Apocalypse." (CR 95/27.)

The witness went on to state that even people who were lucky enough to survive continued to this day to suffer from the late effects unique to nuclear weapons. Nuclear weapons, he concluded, bring in their wake the indiscriminate devastation of civilian populations.

Testimony was also given by the delegation of the Marshall Islands which was the site of 67 nuclear weapons tests from 30 June to 18 August 1958, during the period of the United Nations Pacific Islands territories trusteeship. The total yield of those weapons was said to be equivalent to more than 7,000 bombs of the size of that which destroyed Hiroshima. Those nuclear weapon tests were said to have caused extensive radiation, induced illnesses, deaths and birth defects. Further on in the testimony, it was disclosed that human suffering and damage to the environment occurred at great distances, both in time and in geography, from the sites of detonations even when an effort was made to avoid or mitigate harm. The delegation went on to inform the Court that the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons are that they cause unnecessary suffering and include not only widespread, extensive, radioactive contamination with cumulative adverse effects, but also locally intense radiation with severe, immediate and long-term adverse effects, far-reaching blasts, heat, and light resulting in acute injuries and chronic ailments. Permanent, as well as temporary, blindness from intense light and reduced immunity from radiation exposures were said to be common and unavoidable consequences of the use of nuclear weapons, but which were uncommon or absent from the use of other destructive devices.

The delegation further disclosed that birth defects and extraordinarily prolonged and painful illnesses caused by the radioactive fallout inevitably and profoundly affected the civilian population long after the nuclear weapons tests had been carried out. Such suffering had affected generations born long after the testing of such weapons. It went on to say that, apart from the immediate damage at and near ground zero (where the detonation took place), the area experienced contamination of animals and plants and the poisoning of soil and water. As a consequence, some of the islands were still abandoned and in those that had recently been resettled, the presence of caesium in plants from the radioactive fallout rendered them inedible. Women on some of the other atolls in the islands who had been assured that their atolls were not affected by radiation, were said to have given birth to "monster babies". A young girl on one of these atolls was said to have no knees, three toes on each foot and a missing arm; her mother had not been born by 1954 when the tests started but had been raised on a contaminated atoll.

In the light of the foregoing the Court, as well as taking cognizance of the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons when used, reached the following conclusions; that nuclear weapons have a destructive capacity unmatched by any conventional weapon; that a single nuclear weapon has the capacity to kill thousands if not millions of human beings; that such weapons cause unnecessary suffering and superfluous injury to combatants and non-combatants alike; and that they are unable to distinguish between civilians and combatants. When recourse is had to such weapons, it can cause damage to generations unborn and produce widespread and long-term effects on the environment, particularly in respect of resources necessary for human survival. In this connection, it should be noted that the radioactive effects of such weapons are not only similar to the effects produced by the use of poison gas which would be in violation of the 1925 Geneva Gas Protocol, but are considered even more harmful.

The above findings by the Court should have led it inexorably to conclude that any use of nuclear weapons is unlawful under international law, in particular the law applicable in armed conflict including humanitarian law. However, instead of this, the Court found that:

> "in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake".

This finding that would appear to suggest that nuclear weapons when used in circumstances of a threat to "State survival" - a concept invented by the Court - would constitute an exception to the corpus of humanitarian law which applies in all armed conflicts and makes no exception for nuclear weapons. In my considered opinion, the unlawfulness of the use of nuclear weapons is not predicated on the circumstances in which the use takes place, but rather on the unique and established characteristics of those weapons which under any circumstance would violate international law by their use. It is therefore most inappropriate for the Court's finding to have turned on the question of State survival when what is in issue is the lawfulness of nuclear weapons. Such a misconception of the question deprives the Court's finding of any legal basis.

On the other hand, if the Court had properly perceived the question and intended to give an appropriate reply, it would have found that an overwhelming justification exists on the basis of the law and the facts, which would have enabled it to reach a finding that the use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance would be unlawful. The Court's failure to reach this inevitable conclusion has compelled me to enter a vigorous dissent to its main finding.

I am likewise constrained to mention various other, more general, misgivings with regard to the Advisory Opinion on the whole. While the purpose of the Court's advisory jurisdiction is to provide an authoritative legal opinion and to enlighten the requesting body on certain legal aspects of an issue with which it has to deal when discharging its functions, the device has also been used to secure authoritative interpretations of the provisions of the Charter or the constitutive instruments of specialized agencies, or to provide guidance to various organs of the United Nations in relation to their functions. Furthermore, although the Advisory Opinions of the Court are not legally binding and impose no legal obligations either upon the requesting body or upon States, such Opinions are nonetheless not devoid of effect as they remain the law "recognized by the United Nations" (Admissibility of Hearings of Petitioners by the Committee on South West Africa, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 23, Sep. Op. Judge Lauterpacht at p. 46). Accordingly, this Court has, on various occasions, used its advisory jurisdiction as a medium of participation in the work of the United Nations, helping the Organization to achieve its objectives. Advisory opinions have enabled the Court to contribute meaningfully to the development and crystallization of the law. For example, in the Namibia Advisory Opinion, the Court referred to the development "of international law in regard to the non-self-governing territories, as enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations" (I.C.J. Reports 1971, p. 31), which made the principle of self-determination applicable to such territories.

In its Advisory Opinion on the Western Sahara, the Court, citing the Namibia Opinion in relation to the principle of self-determination, stated that when questions are asked with reference to that principle, the Court > "must take into consideration the changes which have occurred in the supervening half-century, and its interpretation cannot remain unaffected by the subsequent development of law, through the Charter of the United Nations and by way of customary law.

>
> In this domain, as elsewhere, the corpus juris gentium has been considerably enriched, and this the Court, if it is faithfully to discharge its functions, may not ignore." (I.C.J. Reports 1975, p. 32).

The Court's Opinion in the case accordingly referred to Article 1 of the United Nations Charter and to the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples which, it said, "confirm and emphasize that the application of the right of self-determination requires a free and genuine expression of the will of the peoples concerned" (I.C.J. Reports 1975, p. 32). Moreover, the Court insisted that "the validity of the principle of self-determination, defined as the need to pay regard to the freely expressed will of peoples is not affected by the fact that in certain cases the General Assembly has dispensed with the requirement of consulting the inhabitants of a given territory" (ibid., p. 33). It can therefore be observed that through the medium of its Advisory Opinions, the Court has rendered normative decisions which have enabled the United Nations to achieve its objectives, in some cases even leading to the peaceful settlement of disputes, and has either contributed to the crystallisation and development of the law or, with its imprimatur, affirmed the emergence of the law..

It is therefore to be regretted that, on this occasion, the Court would seem not only to have retreated from this practice of making its contribution to the development of the law on a matter of such vital importance to the General Assembly and to the international community as a whole but may, albeit unintentionally, have cast doubt on established or emerging rules of international law. Indeed, much of the approach of the Court in this Opinion is indicative of this attitude. When not looking for specific treaties or customary law rules supposed to regulate or prohibit the use of nuclear weapons, the Court has tended to declare either that it is not called upon to make a finding on the matter or that it is not necessary for it to take a position. For instance, regarding the matter of whether the principles and rules of humanitarian law are part of jus cogens as defined in Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969, the Court stated that there is no need for it to pronounce on the matter even though there is almost universal adherence to the fact that the Geneva Conventions of 1949 are declaratory of customary international law, and there is community interest and consensus in the observance of and respect for their provisions. A pronouncement of the Court emphasizing their humanitarian underpinnings and the fact that they are deeply rooted in the traditions and values of member States of the international community and deserve universal respect and protection, and not to be derogated from by States would assist in strengthening their legal observance especially in an era which has so often witnessed the most serious and egregious violation of humanitarian principles and rules and whose very raison d'être is irreconcilable with the use of nuclear weapons. This has been part of the judicial function of the Court - the establishment of international legal standards for the community of States and, in particular, for those that appear before it or are parties to its Statute. In the establishment of such legal standards, the Court, in the Reservations case, referred to the principles underlying the Convention on the Prohibition of Genocide as principles which are recognized by civilized nations "as binding on States, even without any conventional obligation" (I.C.J. Reports 1951, p. 23). It also recognized the co-operation required by the Convention "in order to liberate mankind from such an odious scourge ..." (ibid.). The Court noted that the Convention was adopted for a purely humanitarian and civilizing purpose, "to safeguard the very existence of certain human groups and, ... to confirm and endorse the most elementary principles of humanity" (ibid.). In the Corfu Channel case, the Court referred to "certain general and well-recognized principles, namely: elementary considerations of humanity, even more exacting in peace than in war" (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 22). Such pronouncements would undoubtedly have helped to foster a proper sense of restraint within the international community. In the Barcelona Traction case, the Court in discussing the obligations of States towards the international community stated that such obligations are ergo omnes and

> "derive, for example, in contemporary international law, from the outlawing of acts of aggression, and of genocide, as also from the principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person, including protection from slavery and racial discrimination. Some of the corresponding rights of protection have entered into the body of general international law..." (I.C.J. Reports 1970, p. 32).

In the case under consideration, the Court would appear to have been all too reluctant to take any position of principle on a question involving what the late Judge Nagendra Singh described as the most important aspect of international law facing humanity today (Nagendra Singh, Nuclear Weapons and International Law, p. 17) . Instead, the Court resolved the issue about the jus cogens character of some of the principles and rules of humanitarian law by saying that the request transmitted to it "does not raise the question of the character of the humanitarian law which would apply to the use of nuclear weapons". With respect they do. A pronouncement by the Court about the character of such rules while not guaranteeing their observance at all times, would nonetheless as they are related to human values already protected by positive legal principles which, taken together, reveal certain criteria of public policy. (See I. Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (1990), p. 29.) H. Lauterpacht has also stated that among other reasons, that many of the provisions of the Geneva Conventions following as they do from "compelling considerations of humanity, are declaratory of universally binding international custom". (E. Lauterpacht, International Law, being the Collected Papers of Hersch Lauterpacht, p. 115 (E. Lauterpacht ed., 1970)). The International Law Commission pointed out in its commentary on Article 50 (now 53) of the Vienna Convention of the Law of Treaties, that "it is not the form of a general rule of international law, but the particular nature of the subject-matter with which it deals that may ... give it a character of ius cogens". Already in 1980, the Commission observed that "some of the rules of humanitarian law are, in the opinion of the Commission, rules which impose obligations of jus cogens".

The Court also adopted the judicial policy of "non-pronouncement" on the question of belligerent reprisals - an issue most pertinent to the question before it - "save to observe that should the possibility to make such reprisals exist, it would, like self-defence, be governed inter alia by the principle of proportionality" (paras. 41-42). It is to say the least strange that the Court should refrain from pronouncing on the lawfulness or otherwise of belligerent reprisals, particularly if it would involve the use of nuclear weapons. Under contemporary international law, belligerent reprisals, if carried out with nuclear weapons, would grossly violate humanitarian law in any circumstance and international law in general. More specifically the Geneva Conventions prohibit such reprisals against a range of protected persons and objects as reaffirmed in Additional Protocol I of 1977. According to the Protocol, all belligerent parties are prohibited from carrying out belligerent reprisals. If nuclear weapons were used and given the characteristics of those weapons, their inability to discriminate between civilians and combatants and between civilian and military objectives, together with the likelihood of violations of the prohibition of unnecessary suffering and superfluous injuries to belligerents, such reprisals would at a minimum be contrary to established humanitarian law and would therefore be unlawful. The Court's "judicial restraint" on an issue of such crucial importance to the question before it contributes neither to the clarification of the law, let alone to its observance.

The Court's reluctance to take a legal position on some of the important issues which pertain to the question before it could also be discerned from what may be described as a "judicial odyssey" in search of a specific conventional or customary rule specifically authorizing or prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons, which only led to the discovery that no such specific rule exists. Indeed, if such a specific rule did exist, it is more than unlikely that the question would have been brought before the Court in its present form, if at all. On the other hand, the absence of a specific convention prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons should not have suggested to the Court that the use of such weapons might be lawful, as it is generally recognized by States that customary international law embodies principles which are applicable to the use of such weapons. Hence the futile quest for specific legal prohibition can only be attributable to an extreme form of positivism, which is out of keeping with the international jurisprudence - including that of this Court. The futility of such an enterprise was recognized by the British-American Claims Arbitral Tribunal in the Eastern Extension, Australia and China Telegraph Company case, where it was held that even if there were no specific rule of international law applicable to a case, it could not be said that there was no rule of international law to which resort might be had.

> "International law, as well as domestic law, may not contain, and generally does not contain, express rules decisive of particular cases; but the function of jurisprudence is to resolve the conflict of opposing rights and interests by applying, in default of any specific provision of law, the corollaries of general principles, and so to find - exactly as in the mathematical sciences - the solution of the problem. This is the method of jurisprudence; it is the method by which the law has been gradually evolved in every country, resulting in the definition and settlement of legal relations as well between States as between private individuals." (United Nations Arbitral Reports, Vol. VI, p. 114.)

Such then has been the jurisprudential approach to issues before the Court. The Court has applied legal principles and rules to resolve the conflict of opposing rights and interests where no specific provision of the law exists, and has relied on the corollaries of general principles in order to find a solution to the problem. The Court's approach has not been restricted to a search for a specific treaty or rule of customary law specifically regulating or applying to a matter before it and, in the absence of such a specific rule or treaty, it has not declared that it cannot definitively conclude or that it is unable to reach a decision or make a determination on that matter. The Court has in the past - rightly in my view - not imposed such restrictions upon itself when discharging its judicial function to decide disputes in accordance with international law, but has referred to the principles of international law, to equity and to its own jurisprudence in order to define and settle the legal issues referred to it.

On the other hand, the search for specific rules led the Court to overlook or not fully to apply the principles of the United Nations Charter when considering the question before it. One such principle that does not appear to have been given its due weight in the Judgment of the Court is Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations, which provides that "The Organization is based on the principle of sovereign equality of all of its Members". The principle of sovereign equality of States is of general application. It presupposes respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States. International law recognizes the sovereignty of each State over its territory as well as the physical integrity of the civilian population. By virtue of this principle, a State is prohibited from inflicting injury or harm on another State. The principle is bound to be violated if nuclear weapons are used in a given conflict, because of their established and well-known characteristics. The use of such weapons would not only result in the violation of the territorial integrity of non-belligerent States by radioactive contamination, but would involve the death of thousands, if not millions, of the inhabitants of territories not parties to the conflict. This would be in violation of the principle as enshrined in the Charter, an aspect of the matter that would appear not to have been taken fully into consideration by the Court when making its findings.

I am likewise constrained to express my apprehension over some of the other findings in the Advisory Opinion with regard to respect for human rights and genocide, the protection of the natural environment and the policy of deterrence. With regard to genocide, it is stated that genocide would be considered to have been committed if a recourse to nuclear weapons resulted from an intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such. This reflects the text of the Genocide Convention. However, one must be mindful of the special characteristics of the Convention, its object and purpose, to which the Court itself referred in the Reservations case as being to condemn and punish

> "a crime under international law involving a denial of the right of existence of entire human groups, a denial which shocks the conscience of mankind and results in great losses to humanity and which is contrary to moral law and the spirit and aims of the United Nations";

while further pointing out

> "that the principles underlying the Convention are recognized by civilized nations as binding on States, even without any conventional obligation".

It further emphasized the co-operation required in order "to liberate mankind from such an odious scourge" and, given the humanitarian and civilizing purpose of the Convention, it referred to it as intended "to safeguard the very existence of certain human groups", and "to confirm and endorse the most elementary principles of morality". The Court cannot therefore view with equanimity the killing of thousands, if not millions, of innocent civilians which the use of nuclear weapons would make inevitable, and conclude that genocide has not been committed because the State using such weapons has not manifested any intent to kill so many thousands or millions of people. Indeed, under the Convention, the quantum of the people killed is comprehended as well. It does not appear to me that judicial detachment requires the Court from expressing itself on the abhorrent shocking consequences that a whole population could be wiped out by the use of nuclear weapons during an armed conflict, and the fact that this could tantamount to genocide, if the consequences of the act could have been foreseen. Such expression of concern may even have a preventive effect on the weapons being used at all.

As to whether recourse to nuclear weapons would violate human rights, in particular the right to human life, the Court found that it was never envisaged that the lawfulness or otherwise of such weapons would be regulated by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. While this is accepted as a legal position, it does seem to me that too narrow a view has been taken of the matter. It should be recalled that both human rights law and international humanitarian law have as their raison d'être the protection of the individual as well as the worth and dignity of the human person, both during peacetime or in an armed conflict. It is for this reason, to my mind, that the United Nations Charter, which was adopted immediately after the end of the Second World War in the course of which serious and grave violations of human rights had occurred, undertook to protect the rights of individual human beings whatever their race, colour or creed, emphasizing that such rights were to be protected and respected even during an armed conflict. It should not be forgotten that the Second World War had witnessed the use of the atomic weapon in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, resulting in the deaths of thousands of human beings. The Second World War therefore came to be regarded as the period epitomizing gross violations of human rights. The possibility that the human rights of citizens, in particular their right to life, would be violated during a nuclear conflagration, is a matter which falls within the purview of the Charter and other relevant international legal instruments. Any activity which involves a terrible violation of the principles of the Charter deserves to be considered in the context of both the Charter and the other applicable rules. It is evidently in this context that the Human Rights Committee under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights adopted, in November 1984, a "general comment" on Article 6 of the Covenant (Right to Life), according to which the production, testing, possession, deployment and use of nuclear weapons ought to be prohibited and recognized as crimes against humanity. It is to be recalled that Article 6 of the Charter of the Nuremburg Tribunal defined crimes against humanity as "murder, extermination ..., and other inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during war ...". It follows that the Nuremburg principles are likewise pertinent to the matter just considered by the Court.

With regard to the protection and safeguarding of the natural environment, the Court reached the conclusion that existing international law does not prohibit the use of nuclear weapons, but that important environmental factors are to be taken into account in the context of the implementation of the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict. The Court also found that relevant treaties in relation to the protection of the natural environment could not have intended to deprive a State of the exercise of its right to self-defence under international law. In my view, what is at issue is not whether a State might be denied its right to self-defence under the relevant treaties intended for the protection of the natural environment, but rather that, given the known qualities of nuclear weapons when exploded as well as their radioactive effects which not only contaminate human beings but the natural environment as well including agriculture, food, drinking water and the marine ecosystem over a wide area, it follows that the use of such weapons would not only cause severe and widespread damage to the natural environment, but would deprive human beings of drinking water and other resources needed for survival. In recognition of this, the First Additional Protocol of 1977 makes provision for the preservation of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population, such as foodstuffs, agricultural produce, drinking water installations, etc. The Advisory Opinion should have considered the question posed in relation to the protection of the natural environment from this perspective, rather than giving the impression that the argument advanced was about denying a State its legitimate right of self-defence.

The Advisory Opinion considered that the fact of nuclear weapons not having been used for 50 years cannot be regarded as an expression of an opinio juris. The legal basis for such a recognition was not elaborated; it was more in the nature of an assertion. However, the Court was unable to find that the conviction of the overwhelming majority of States that the fact that nuclear weapons have not been used for the last 50 years has established an opinio juris in favour of the prohibition of such use, was such as to have a bearing on its Opinion. In this connection, the Court should have given due consideration and weight to the statements of the overwhelming majority of States together with the resolutions adopted by various international organizations on the use of nuclear weapons, as evidence of the emergence of an opinio juris.

In my view, it was injudicious for the Court to have appeared to give legal recognition to the doctrine of deterrence as a principle of international law. While it is legitimate for judicial notice should be taken of that policy, the Court should have realised that it has the potential of being declared illegal if implemented, as it would involve a nuclear conflict between belligerents with catastrophic consequences for the civilian population not only of the belligerent parties but those of States not involved in such a conflict, and could result in the violation of international law in general and humanitarian law in particular. It would therefore have been prudent for the Court to have refrained from taking a position on this matter, which is essentially non-legal.

Be that as it may, the Advisory Opinion cannot be considered as entirely without legal merit or significance. The positive findings it contains should be regarded as a step forward in the historic process of imposing legal restraints in armed conflicts. Some of those restraints as they relate to nuclear weapons have now found expression in the opinion of the Court. For the first time in its history, indeed in the history of any tribunal of similar standing, the Court has declared and confirmed that nuclear weapons are subject to international law; that a threat or use of force by means of nuclear weapons that is contrary to Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter, and that fails to meet the requirements of Article 51 is unlawful. The Court has also held that any threat or use of nuclear weapons that is incompatible with the requirements of international law applicable in armed conflict, particularly those of the principles of humanitarian law as well as specific obligations under the treaties or other undertakings, dealing expressly with nuclear weapons, would be unlawful. Inferentially, it is because recourse to nuclear weapons could not meet the aforementioned requirements that the Court has found "that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and the rules of humanitarian law". This finding, though qualified, should be regarded as of normative importance, when taken together with the other conclusions reached by the Court. Among other things, it is a rejection of the argument that since humanitarian law pre-dated the invention of nuclear weapons, it could not therefore be applicable to those weapons. On the contrary, the Court has found that given the intrinsic character of the established principles and rules of humanitarian law, it does apply to them.

It is in the response to these juridical findings of both historic and normative importance that I have voted in favour of paragraphs 2A, 2C, 2D and 2F of the dispositif, but not without reservations with respect to paragraph 2C.

However, I have voted against paragraph B according to which the Court finds that there is in neither customary nor conventional international law any comprehensive and universal prohibition of the threat of nuclear weapons as such. Such a finding, in my view, is not in accordance with the law . At the very least, the use of nuclear weapons would violate the prohibition of the use of poison weapons as embodied in Article 23 (a) of the Hague Convention of 1899 and 1907 as well as the Geneva Gas Protocol of 1925 which prohibits the use of poison gas and/or bacteriological weapons. Because of its universal adherence, the Protocol is considered binding on the international community as a whole. Furthermore, the prohibition of the use of poison gas is now regarded as a part of customary international law binding on all States, and, the finding by the Court in Paragraph B cannot be sustained in the face of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the 1977 Additional Protocols thereto either. With regard to the Conventions, they are as of today binding on at least 186 states and their universal acceptance is said to be even greater than that of the United Nations Charter. Accordingly, those treaties are now recognized as a part of customary international law binding on all States. The Court in its Judgment in the Nicaragua case confirmed that the Conventions are a part of customary international law, when it stated that:

> "there is an obligation ... in the terms of Article I of the Geneva Conventions, to 'respect' the Conventions and even 'to ensure respect' for them 'in all circumstances', since such an obligation does not derive only from the Conventions themselves, but from the general principles of humanitarian law to which the Conventions merely give specific expression" (I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 114).

By reference to the humanitarian principles of international law, the Court recognized that the Conventions themselves are reflective of customary law and as such universally binding. The same reasoning applies to Additional Protocol I in particular,which constitutes a restatement and a reaffirmation of customary law rules based on the earlier Geneva and Hague Conventions. To date, 143 states have become parties to the Protocol, and the customary force of the provisions of the Protocol are not based on the formal status of the Protocol itself.

In the light of the foregoing conclusion, it cannot be maintained as the Court has done - that there is in neither customary nor conventional international law any comprehensive and universal prohibition of the threat or use of nuclear weapons as such. Such a finding is not consistent with its jurisprudence either as alluded to above.

I have however voted in favour of Paragraph F of the dispositif which stresses the obligation to pursue in good faith and bring to a conclusion negotiations leading to nuclear disarmament in all its aspects under strict and effective international control. I am of the view that the parties to the 1968 Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, realising the danger posed to all States by the proliferation of nuclear weapons, entered into a binding commitment to end the nuclear arms race at an early date and to embark on nuclear disarmament. The dangers that those weapons posed for humanity in 1968 are still current today, as is evident from the decision taken in 1995 by the States parties to the Treaty, to make it permanent. The obligation to eliminate those weapons remain binding on those States so as to remove the threat such weapons pose to violate the Charter or the principles and rules of humanitarian law. There is accordingly a correlation between the obligation of nuclear disarmament assumed by those States Parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty and the obligations assumed by States under the United Nations Charter and under the law applicable in armed conflict, in particular international humanitarian law.

Despite this and some of the other normative conclusions reached by the Court in its Advisory Opinion, it is a matter of profound regret that on the actual question put to it, that is, whether it is permitted under international law to use nuclear weapons in any circumstances, the Court flinched and failed to reach the only and inescapable finding, namely, that in view of the established facts of the use of such weapons, it is inconceivable that there is any circumstance in which their use would not violate the principles and rules of international law applicable in armed conflict and, in particular, the principles and rules of humanitarian law. By not answering the question and leaving it to States to decide the matter, the Court declined to the challenge to reaffirm the applicability of the rules of law and of humanitarian law in particular to nuclear weapons and to ensure the protection of human beings, of generations unborn and of the natural environment against the use of such weapons whose destructive power we have seen, is unable to discriminate between combatants and non-combatants, cannot spare hospitals or prisoner-of-war camps and can cause suffering out of all proportion to military necessity leaving their victims to die as a result of burns after weeks of agony, or to be afflicted for life with painful infirmities. The request by the General Assembly was for the Court, as the guarantor of legality, to affirm that because of these consequences, the use of nuclear weapons is unlawful under international law. A determination that this Court as a court of law should have been able to make.

In the absence of such a categoric and inescapable finding, I am left with no alternative but with deep regret to dissent from the Advisory Opinion.

(Signed) Abdul G. KOROMA.

DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE HIGGINS

1. I agree with all that the Court has to say as to why it must render this Opinion and much that it has to say on the substance of the question put to it. I have also voted in favour of paragraphs 2A, 2B, 2C, 2D and 2F of the dispositif. The first four of these findings are in a sense stepping stones to the heart of the matter, which is to be found in paragraph 2E. I have, with regret, been unable to vote for what the Court there determines.

2. In the first part of its Opinion the Court has rejected suggestions that it should in its discretion decline to give the Opinion on the grounds that the question is not legal, or is too vague, or would require the Court to make scenarios, or would require it to "legislate". But at paragraph 96 of its Opinion, and in paragraph 2E of its dispositif, the Court effectively pronounces a non liquet on the key issue on the grounds of uncertainty in the present state of the law, and of facts. I find this approach inconsistent.

3. I agree with most of the legal reasoning that sustains paragraphs 2A, 2B, 2C and 2D. Although paragraph C is negatively formulated, it is clear from the Court's analysis that neither the Charter provisions, nor customary international law, nor treaty law, make the threat or use of nuclear weapons unlawful per se.

4. In its Judgment on Military and Paramilitary Activities the Court confirmed the existence of a rule of proportionality in the exercise of self-defence under customary international law. It there noted that the Charter "does not contain any specific rule whereby self-defence would warrant only measures which are proportional to the armed attack and necessary to respond to it" (I.C.J. Reports 1986, para. 176). Importantly, in the present Opinion the Court makes clear (paras. 40-41) that notwithstanding the absence of specific mention of proportionality in Article 51, this requirement applies equally to the exercise of self-defence under the Charter.

5. In the Military and Paramilitary Activities case the terms used by the Court already made clear that the concept of proportionality in self-defence limits a response to what is needed to reply to an attack. This is consistent with the approach of Professor Ago (as he then was), who had made clear in the Addendum to his Eighth Report on State Responsibility that the concept of proportionality referred to was that which was proportionate to repelling the attack, and not a requirement of symmetry between the mode of the initial attack and the mode of response (A/CN.4/318/Adds.5-7, para. 121, YBILC (1980), Vol. II, Part One, p. 69.)

6. Paragraph 2E states in its first part that the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law; and in its second part that the Court cannot conclude whether a threat or use of nuclear weapons in extremis in self-defence, where a State's very survival was at stake, would be lawful or unlawful.

7. I have not been able to vote for these findings for several reasons. It is an essential requirement of the judicial process that a court should show the steps by which it reaches its conclusions. I believe the Court has not done so in respect of the first part of paragraph 2E. The findings in a judicial dispositif should be clear. I believe paragraph 2E is unclear in its meaning (and one may suspect that this lack of clarity is perhaps regarded as a virtue). I greatly regret the non liquet offered in the second part of paragraph 2E. And I believe that in that second sentence the Court is declining to answer a question that was in fact never put to it.

8. After finding that the threat or use of nuclear weapons is not prohibited per se by reference to the Charter or treaty law, the Court moves to see if it is prohibited per se by reference to the law of armed conflict (and especially humanitarian law).

9. It is not sufficient, to answer the question put to it, for the Court merely briefly to state the requirements of the law of armed conflict (including humanitarian law) and then simply to move to the conclusion that the threat or use of nuclear weapons is generally unlawful by reference to these principles and norms. The Court limits itself to affirming that the principles and rules of humanitarian law apply to nuclear weapons. It finds in paragraph 95, by reference to "the unique characteristics of nuclear weapons" that their use is "scarcely reconcilable" with the requirements of humanitarian law and "would generally be contrary" to humanitarian law (dispositif, para. 2E). At no point in its Opinion does the Court engage in the task that is surely at the heart of the question asked: the systematic application of the relevant law to the use or threat of nuclear weapons. It reaches its conclusions without the benefit of detailed analysis. An essential step in the judicial process - that of legal reasoning - has been omitted.

10. What in my view the Court should have done is to explain, elaborate and apply the key elements of humanitarian law that it identifies. I agree with the Court that certain general principles emanating from the treaties on the law of armed conflict and on humanitarian law are binding, either as continuing treaty obligations or as prescriptions of customary international law. These principles stem from a variety of uncontested sources (by which I mean they are in no way dependent upon the provisions of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 nor upon any views held as to the application of those provisions to nuclear weapons). Particular reference may be made to the St. Petersburg Declaration of 11 December 1868 and to the Regulations, annexed to the Hague Convention IV, 1907, Articles 22 and 23 (e). The Court recalls that the Regulations annexed to Hague Convention IV were in 1946 held by the Nuremberg Military Tribunal to have become part of customary international law by 1939. (Opinion, para. 80.)

11. The legal principle by which parties to an armed conflict do not have an unlimited choice of weapons or of methods of warfare cannot of itself give the answer to the question before the Court. Its purpose is to ensure that weapons, both in the context of their use, and in the methods of warfare, must comply with the other substantive rules.

12. It is not permitted in the choice of weapons to cause unnecessary suffering to enemy combatants, nor to render their death inevitable, nor to aggravate their sufferings when disabled. Equally, the Report of the International Military Commission in St. Petersburg of 1868 made clear that harm to civilians as a means of securing victory over the enemy was not a legitimate right of war; and that even in seeking to disable the military not every method was lawful. There has been, in many of the written and oral submissions made to the Court, a conflation of these two elements. But the Court itself makes clear, in paragraph 78 of its Opinion, that the prohibitions against means of conflict that cause unnecessary suffering is directed towards the fulfilment of the second, progressive, limb - namely, that even in seeking to disable the military forces of the enemy, there is a limitation upon the means that may be employed. These provisions are not directed at the protection of civilians, - other provisions serve that purpose. It is in any event absolutely prohibited to attack civilians, whether by nuclear or other weapons. Attack upon civilians does not depend for its illegality upon a prohibition against "superfluous injury" or aggravating the sufferings of men already disabled.

13. If then the "unnecessary suffering" provision does not operate as a generalized prohibition, but is rather directed at the protection of combatants, we must ask whether it still does not follow that the appalling primary effects of a nuclear weapon - blast waves, fires, radiation or radioactive fallout - cause extensive unnecessary suffering? These effects indeed cause horrendous suffering. But that is not necessarily "unnecessary suffering" as this term is to be understood within the context of the 1868 and 1907 law, which is directed at the limitation of means against a legitimate target, military personnel.

14. The background to Article 23 (a) of the Hague Regulations was the celebrated provision in Article 22 (which opens a Chapter on the means of injuring the enemy) that the means of injuring the enemy is not unlimited. A certain level of violence is necessarily permissible in the exercise of self-defence; humanitarian law attempts to contain that force (and illegal uses of force too), by providing a "balancing" set of norms. It is thus unlawful to cause suffering and devastation which is in excess of what is required to achieve these legitimate aims. Application of this proposition requires a balancing of necessity and humanity. This approach to the proper understanding of "unnecessary suffering" has been supported, inter alia, by the Netherlands (Request for an Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the use by a State of Nuclear Weapons, Written Statement (Art. 66, para. 2, of the Statute), para. 27; United Kingdom, ibid., paras. 36 ff. and Oral Statement (CR 95/34); United States, ibid., para. 25; and New Zealand, Request for an Advisory Opinion on the Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear Weapons, Written Statement, para. 69).

15. Subsequent diplomatic practice confirms this understanding of "unnecessary suffering" as established in the 1907 Regulations. In the Lucerne Conference of Governmental Experts on the use of Certain Conventional Weapons of 1974, the Experts were agreed both what was meant by "suffering" and by "unnecessary". As to the latter:

> "This involved some sort of equation between, on the one hand, the degree of injury or suffering inflicted (the humanitarian aspect) and, on the other, the degree of necessity underlying the choice of a particular weapon (the military aspect)." (Conference Report, published by ICRC, 1975, para. 23.)

They were in accord that the concept entailed a "balancing" or "equation" rather than a prohibition against a significant degree or even a vast amount of suffering. Any disagreement rather lay in whether, on the military necessity side of the equation, all that was permitted was to put enemy personnel hors de combat, or whether it was permitted also to attack enemy material, lines of communication and resources (ibid., para. 25).

16. It is this understanding of the principle that explains why States have been able to move to a specific prohibition of dum-dum bullets, whereas certain weapons that cause vastly greater suffering have neither been the subject of specific prohibitions, nor, in general State practice, been regarded as clearly prohibited by application of the "unnecessary suffering" principle. The status of incendiary projectiles, flame-throwers, napalm, high velocity weapons - all especially repugnant means of conducting hostilities - have thus remained contested.

17. The prohibition against unnecessary suffering and superfluous injury is a protection for the benefit of military personnel that is to be assessed by reference to the necessity of attacking the particular military target. The principle does not stipulate that a legitimate target is not to be attacked if it would cause great suffering.

18. There remains unanswered the crucial question: what military necessity is so great that the sort of suffering that would be inflicted on military personnel by the use of nuclear weapons would ever be justified? That question, in turn, requires knowing the dimensions of the suffering of which we speak and the circumstances which occasion it. It has been suggested that suffering could be relatively limited in the tactical theatre of war. The Court rightly regards that evidence as uncertain. If the suffering is of the sort traditionally associated with the use of nuclear weapons - blast, radiation, shock, together with risk of escalation, risk of spread through space and time - then only the most extreme circumstances (defence against untold suffering or the obliteration of a State or peoples) could conceivably "balance" the equation between necessity and humanity.

19. To show how it reached its findings in paragraph 2E of the dispositif, the Court should, after analysing the provisions of humanitarian law concerning the protection of combatants, then systematically have applied the humanitarian rules and principles as they apply to the protection of civilians. The major legal issues in this context which it might have been expected the Court would address are these: does the prohibition against civilians being the object of attack preclude attack upon a military target if it is realized that collateral civilian casualties will be unavoidable? And in the light of the answer to the above question, what then is meant by the requirements that a weapon must be able to discriminate between civilian and military targets and how will this apply to nuclear weapons?

20. For some States making submissions to the Court, the large number of civilian victims was said itself to show that the collateral damage is excessive. But the law of armed conflict has been articulated in terms of a broad prohibition - that civilians may not be the object of armed attack - and the question of numbers or suffering (provided always that this primary obligation is met) falls to be considered as part of the "balancing" or "equation" between the necessities of war and the requirements of humanity. Articles 23 (g), 25 and 27 of the Annex to the Fourth Hague Convention have relevance here. The principle of proportionality, even if finding no specific mention, is reflected in many provisions of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949. Thus even a legitimate target may not be attacked if the collateral civilian casualties would be disproportionate to the specific military gain from the attack. One is inevitably led to the question of whether, if a target is legitimate and the use of a nuclear weapon is the only way of destroying that target, any need can ever be so necessary as to occasion massive collateral damage upon civilians.

21. It must be that, in order to meet the legal requirement that a military target may not be attacked if collateral civilian casualties would be excessive in relation to the military advantage, the "military advantage" must indeed be one related to the very survival of a State or the avoidance of infliction (whether by nuclear or other weapons of mass destruction) of vast and severe suffering on its own population; and that no other method of eliminating this military target be available.

22. It is said that collateral damage to civilians, even if proportionate to the importance of the military target,must never be intended. "One's intent is defined by what one chooses to do, or seeks to achieve through what one chooses to do." (Finnis, Boyle and Grisez, Nuclear Deterrence, Morality and Idealism (1987), at pp. 92-3.) This closely approximates to the legal doctrine of foreseeability, by which one is assumed to intend the consequences of one's actions. Does it follow that knowledge that in concrete circumstances civilians will be killed by the use of a nuclear weapon is tantamount to an intention to attack civilians? In law, analysis must always be contextual and the philosophical question here put is no different for nuclear weapons than for other weapons. The duty not to attack civilians as such applies to conventional weapons also. Collateral injury in respect of these weapons has always been accepted as not constituting "intent", provided always that the requirements of proportionality are met.

23. Very important also in the present context is the requirement of humanitarian law that weapons may not be used which are incapable of discriminating between civilian and military targets.

24. The requirement that a weapon be capable of differentiating between military and civilian targets is not a general principle of humanitarian law specified in the 1899, 1907 or 1949 law, but flows from the basic rule that civilians may not be the target of attack. There has been considerable debate, as yet unresolved, as to whether this principle refers to weapons which, because of the way they are commonly used, strike civilians and combatants indiscriminately (Weapons that May Cause Unnecessary Suffering or have Indiscriminate Effects, Report of the Work of Experts, published by the ICRC, 1973) or whether it refers to whether a weapon "having regard to [its] effects in time and space" can "be employed with sufficient or with predictable accuracy against the chosen target" (Conference of Government Experts on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons (Lucerne, 1974), Report published by the ICRC, 1975, pp. 10-11, para. 31; see also Kalshoven "Arms, Armaments and Interpretation of Law", Receuil des Cours, 1985, II, at p. 236). For this concept to have a separate existence, distinct from that of collateral harm (with which it overlaps to an extent), and whichever interpretation of the term is chosen, it may be concluded that a weapon will be unlawful per se if it is incapable of being targeted at a military objective only, even if collateral harm occurs. Notwithstanding the unique and profoundly destructive characteristics of all nuclear weapons, that very term covers a variety of weapons which are not monolithic in all their effects. To the extent that a specific nuclear weapon would be incapable of this distinction, its use would be unlawful.

25. I do not consider it juridically meaningful to say that the use of nuclear weapons is "generally contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law". What does the term "generally" mean? Is it a numerical allusion, or is it a reference to different types of nuclear weapons, or is it a suggestion that the rules of humanitarian law cannot be met save for exceptions? If so, where is the Court's analysis of these rules, properly understood, and their application to nuclear weapons? And what are any exceptions to be read into the term "generally"? Are they to be linked to an exceptional ability to comply with humanitarian law? Or does the term "generally", especially in the light of paragraph 96, suggest that if a use of nuclear weapons in extreme circumstances of self-defence were lawful, that might of itself exceptionally make such a use compatible with the humanitarian law? The phraseology of paragraph 2E of the dispositif raises all these questions and answers none of them.

26. There is a further reason why I have been unable to vote for paragraph 2E of the dispositif. It states a negative consequence of humanitarian law and (unspecified) possible exceptions. The role of humanitarian law (in contrast to treaties of specific weapon prohibition) is to prescribe legal requirements of conduct rather than to give "generalized" answers about particular weapons. I do not, however, exclude the possibility that such a weapon could be unlawful by reference to the humanitarian law, if its use could never comply with its requirements - no matter what specific type within that class of weapon was being used and no matter where it might be used. We may believe that, in the present stage of weapon development, there may be very limited prospects of a State being able to comply with the requirements of humanitarian law. But that is different from finding the use of nuclear weapons "generally unlawful".

27. The meaning of the second sentence of paragraph 2E of the dispositif, and thus what the two sentences of paragraph 2E of the dispositif mean when taken together, is unclear. The second sentence is presumably not referring to self-defence in those exceptional circumstances, implied by the word "generally", that might allow a threat or use of nuclear weapons to be compatible with humanitarian law. If, as the Court has indicated in paragraph 42 (and operative paragraph 2C), the Charter law does not per se make a use of nuclear weapons illegal, and if a specific use complied with the provisions of Article 51 and was also compatible with humanitarian law, the Court can hardly be saying in the second sentence of paragraph 2E that it knows not whether such a use would be lawful or unlawful.

28. Therefore it seems the Court is addressing the "general" circumstances that it envisages - namely that a threat or use of nuclear weapons violates humanitarian law - and that it is addressing whether in those circumstances a use of force in extremis and in conformity with Article 51 of the Charter, might nonetheless be regarded as be lawful, or not. The Court answers that it does not know.

29. What the Court has done is reach a conclusion of "incompatibility in general" with humanitarian law; and then effectively pronounce a non liquet on whether a use of nuclear weapons in self-defence when the survival of a State is at issue might still be lawful, even were the particular use to be contrary to humanitarian law. Through this formula of non-pronouncement the Court necessarily leaves open the possibility that a use of nuclear weapons contrary to humanitarian law might nonetheless be lawful. This goes beyond anything that was claimed by the nuclear weapons States appearing before the Court, who fully accepted that any lawful threat or use of nuclear weapons would have to comply with both the jus ad bellum and the jus in bello (see para. 86).

30. That the formula chosen is a non liquet cannot be doubted, because the Court does not restrict itself to the inadequacy of facts and argument concerning the so-called "clean" and "precise" weapons. I share the Court's view that it has not been persuasively explained in what circumstances it might be essential to use any such weaponry. Nor indeed may it be assumed that such types of weapons (perhaps to be used against submarines, or in deserts) can suffice to represent for a nuclear weapon State all that is required for an effective policy of deterrence.

31. The formula in the second part of paragraph 2E refers also to "the current state of international law" as the basis for the Court's non liquet. I find it very hard to understand this reference. Paragraph F of the dispositif, and the final paragraphs of the Court's Opinion, indicate that the Court hopes for a negotiated and verified total disarmament, including nuclear disarmament. But it cannot be the absence of this goal which means that international law has no answer to give on the use of nuclear weapons in self-defence. International law does not simply consist of total prohibitions. Nor can it be that there is no substantive law of self-defence upon which the Court may offer advice - this, all said and done, is one of the most well developed areas of international law.

32. Can the reference to "the current state of international law" possibly refer to humanitarian law? This is one of the many elements that is unclear. This aspect appears to have been disposed of already in the first part of paragraph E. In any event, humanitarian law too is very well-developed. The fact that its principles are broadly stated and often raise further questions that require a response can be no ground for a non liquet. It is exactly the judicial function to take principles of general application, to elaborate their meaning and to apply them to specific situations. This is precisely the role of the International Court, whether in contentious proceedings or in its advisory function.

33. Perhaps the reference to "the current state of international law" is a reference to perceived tensions between the widespread acceptance of the possession of nuclear weapons (and thus, it may be presumed, of the legality of their use in certain circumstances) as mentioned by the Court in paragraphs 67 and 96 on the one hand, and the requirements of humanitarian law on the other. If so, I believe this to be a false dichotomy. The pursuit of deterrence, the shielding under the nuclear umbrella, the silent acceptance of reservations and declarations by the nuclear powers to treaties prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons in certain regions, the seeking of possible security assurances - all this points to a significant international practice which is surely relevant not only to the law of self-defence but also to humanitarian law. If a substantial number of States in the international community believe that the use of nuclear weapons might in extremis be compatible with their duties under the Charter (whether as nuclear powers or as beneficiaries of "the umbrella" or security assurances) they presumably also believe that they would not be violating their duties under humanitarian law.

34. Nothing in relevant statements made suggests that those States giving nuclear assurances or receiving them believed that they would be violating humanitarian law, - but decided nonetheless to act in disregard of such violation. In sum, such weight as may be given to the State practice just referred to has a relevance for our understanding of the complex provisions of humanitarian law as much as for the provisions of the Charter law of self-defence.

35. For all of these reasons, I am unable to see why the Court resorts to the answer it does in the second part of paragraph 2E of the dispositif.

36. It is also, I think, an important and well-established principle that the concept of non liquet - for that is what we have here - is no part of the Court's jurisprudence.

37. The Court has, of course, on several occasions, declined to answer a question even after it has established its jurisdiction. Reasons of propriety (Art. 65 of the Statute; and the Monetary Gold, and Northern Cameroons cases) or important defects in procedure (the Asylum case, the Haya de la Torre case) have been given. But "[in] none of these cases is the non-liquet due ... to deficiencies in the law" (Rosenne, The Law and Practice of the International Court, 2nd rev. ed., p. 100).

38. This unwelcome formulation ignores sixty-five years of proud judicial history and also the convictions of those who went before us. Former President of the International Court, Judge Elias, reminds us that there are what he terms "useful devices" to assist if there are difficulties in applying the usual sources of international law. In his view these "preclude the Court from pleading non liquet in any given case" (Elias, The International Court of Justice and Some Contemporary Problems, 1983, p. 14).

39. The learned editors of the 9th Edition of Oppenheim's International Law remind us:

> "there is [not] always a clear and specific legal rule readily applicable to every international situation, but that every international situation is capable of being determined as a matter of law" (Jennings and Watts, Vol. I, p. 13).

40. Nor is the situation changed by any suggestion that the problem is as much one as "antimony" or clashes between various elements in the law as much as alleged "vagueness" in the law. Even were there such an "antimony" (which, as I have indicated above, I doubt), the judge's role is precisely to decide which of two or more competing norms is applicable in the particular circumstances. The corpus of international law is frequently made up of norms that, taken in isolation, appear to pull in different directions - for example, States may not use force/States may use force in self-defence; pacta sunt servanda/States may terminate or suspend treaties on specified grounds. It is the role of the judge to resolve, in context, and on grounds that should be articulated, why the application of one norm rather than another is to be preferred in the particular case. As these norms indubitably exist, and the difficulties that face the Court relate to their application, there can be no question of judicial legislation.

41. One cannot be unaffected by the knowledge of the unbearable suffering and vast destruction that nuclear weapons can cause. And one can well understand that it is expected of those who care about such suffering and devastation that they should declare its cause illegal. It may well be asked of a judge whether, in engaging in legal analysis of such concepts as "unnecessary suffering", "collateral damage" and "entitlement to self-defence", one has not lost sight of the real human circumstances involved. The judicial lodestar, whether in difficult questions of interpretation of humanitarian law, or in resolving claimed tensions between competing norms, must be those values that international law seeks to promote and protect. In the present case, it is the physical survival of peoples that we must constantly have in view. We live in a decentralized world order, in which some States are known to possess nuclear weapons but choose to remain outside of the non-proliferation treaty system; while other such non-parties have declared their intention to obtain nuclear weapons; and yet other States are believed clandestinely to possess, or to be working shortly to possess nuclear weapons (some of whom indeed may be party to the NPT). It is not clear to me that either a pronouncement of illegality in all circumstances of the use of nuclear weapons or the answers formulated by the Court in paragraph 2E best serve to protect mankind against that unimaginable suffering that we all fear.

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1. The International Tribunal

1. This judgment is rendered by Trial Chamber I of the International Tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January and 31 December 1994 (the "Tribunal"). The judgment follows the indictment and trial of Jean Paul Akayesu, a Rwandan citizen who was bourgmestre of Taba commune, Prefecture of Gitarama, in Rwanda, at the time the crimes alleged in the indictment were perpetrated.

2. The Tribunal was established by the United Nations Security Council by its resolution 955 of 8 November 1994.1 After having reviewed various official United Nations reports2 which indicated that acts of genocide and other systematic, widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law had been committed in Rwanda, the Security Council concluded that the situation in Rwanda in 1994 constituted a threat to international peace and security within the meaning of Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. Determined to put an end to such crimes and " convinced that...the prosecution of persons responsible for such acts and violations ... would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace", the Security Council, acting under the said Chapter VII established the Tribunal.3 Resolution 955 charges all States with a duty to cooperate fully with the Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the Statute of the Tribunal (the "Statute"), and to take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the Statute, including compliance with requests for assistance or orders issued by the Tribunal . Subsequently, by its resolution 978 of 27 February 1995, the Security Council "urge[d] the States to arrest and detain, in accordance with their national law and relevant standards of international law, pending prosecution by the International Tribunal for Rwanda or by the appropriate national authorities, persons found within their territory against whom there is sufficient evidence that they were responsible for acts within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda".4

3. The Tribunal is governed by its Statute, annexed to the Security Council Resolution 955, and by its Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the "Rules"), adopted by the Judges on 5 July 1995 and amended subsequently.5 The two Trial Chambers and the Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal are composed of eleven Judges in all, three sitting in each Trial Chamber and five in the Appeals Chamber. They are elected by the United Nations General Assembly and represent, in accordance with Article 12(3) (c) of the Statute, the principal legal systems of the world. The Statute stipulates that the members of the Appeals Chamber of the other special internatinal criminal tribunal, namely the Tribunal for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia"), shall also serve as members of the Appeals Chamber of the Tribunal for Rwanda.

4. Under the Statute, the Tribunal has the power to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international human law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens responsible for genocide and other such violations committed in the territory of neighbouring States, between 1 January and 31 December 1994. According to Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute relating to its ratione materiae jurisdiction, the Tribunal has the power to prosecute persons who committed genocide as defined in Article 2 of the Statute, persons responsible for crimes against humanity as defined in Article 3 of the Statute and persons responsible for serious violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 on the protection of victims of war6, and of Additional Protocol II thereto of 8 June 1977, a crime defined in Article 4 of the Statute 7. Article 8 of the Statute provides that the Tribunal has concurrent jurisdiction with national courts over which it, however, has primacy.

5. The Statute stipulates that the Prosecutor, who acts as a separate organ of the Tribunal, is responsible for the investigation and prosecution of the perpetrators of such violations. Upon determination that a prima facie case exists to proceed against a suspect, the Prosecutor shall prepare an indictment containing a concise statement of the facts and the crime or crimes with which the accused is charged. Thereafter, he or she shall transmit the indictment to a Trial Judge for review and, if need be, confirmation. Under the Statute, the Prosecutor of the Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia shall also serve as the Prosecutor of the Tribunal for Rwanda. However, the two Tribunals maintain separate Offices of the Prosecutor and Deputy Prosecutors. The Prosecutor of the Tribunal for Rwanda is assisted by a team of investigators, trial attorneys and senior trial attorneys, who are based in Kigali, Rwanda. These officials travel to Arusha whenever they are expected to plead a case before the Tribunal.

1.2. The Indictment

6. The Indictment against Jean-Paul Akayesu was submitted by the Prosecutor on 13 February 1996 and was confirmed on 16 February 1996. It was amended during the trial, in June 1997, with the addition of three counts (13 to 15) and three paragraphs (10A, 12A and 12B). The Amended Indictment is here set out in full:

> "The Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, pursuant to his authority under Article 17 of the Statute of the Tribunal, charges:
> JEAN PAUL AKAYESU
>
> with GENOCIDE, CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY and VIOLATIONS OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS, as set forth below:
>
> Background
>
> 1. On April 6, 1994, a plane carrying President Juvénal Habyarimana of Rwanda and President Cyprien Ntaryamira of Burundi crashed at Kigali airport, killing all on board. Following the deaths of the two Presidents, widespread killings, having both political and ethnic dimensions, began in Kigali and spread to other parts of Rwanda.
>
> 2. Rwanda is divided into 11 prefectures, each of which is governed by a prefect. The prefectures are further subdivided into communes which are placed under the authority of bourgmestres. The bourgmestre of each commune is appointed by the President of the Republic, upon the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior. In Rwanda, the bourgmestre is the most powerful figure in the commune. His de facto authority in the area is significantly greater than that which is conferred upon him de jure.
>
>
> 3. Jean Paul AKAYESU, born in 1953 in Murehe sector, Taba commune, served as bourgmestre of that commune from April 1993 until June 1994. Prior to his appointment as bourgmestre, he was a teacher and school inspector in Taba.
>
> 4. As bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU was charged with the performance of executive functions and the maintenance of public order within his commune, subject to the authority of the prefect. He had exclusive control over the communal police, as well as any gendarmes put at the disposition of the commune. He was responsible for the execution of laws and regulations and the administration of justice, also subject only to the prefect's authority.

5364

General Allegations

5. Unless otherwise specified, all acts and omissions set forth in this indictment took place between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, in the commune of Taba, prefecture of Gitarama, territory of Rwanda.

6. In each paragraph charging genocide, a crime recognized by Article 2 of the Statute of the Tribunal, the alleged acts or omissions were committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic or racial group.

7. The victims in each paragraph charging genocide were members of a national, ethnic, racial or religious group.

8. In each paragraph charging crimes against humanity, crimes recognized by Article 3 of the Tribunal Statute, the alleged acts or omissions were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on national, political, ethnic or racial grounds.

9. At all times relevant to this indictment, a state of internal armed conflict existed in Rwanda.

10. The victims referred to in this indictment were, at all relevant times, persons not taking an active part in the hostilities.

11. The accused is individually responsible for the crimes alleged in this indictment. Under Article 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal, individual criminal responsibility is attributable to one who plans, instigates, orders, commits or otherwise aids and abets in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal.

Charges

12. As bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU was responsible for maintaining law and public order in his commune. At least 2000 Tutsis were killed in Taba between April 7 and the end of June, 1994, while he was still in power. The killings in Taba were openly committed and so widespread that, as bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU must have known about them. Although he had the authority and responsibility to do so, Jean Paul AKAYESU never attempted to prevent the killing of Tutsis in the commune in any way or called for assistance from regional or national authorities to quell the violence.

12A. Between April 7 and the end of June, 1994, hundreds of civilians (hereinafter "displaced civilians") sought refuge at the bureau communal. The majority of these displaced civilians were Tutsi. While seeking refuge at the bureau communal, female displaced civilians were regularly taken by armed local militia and/or communal police and subjected to sexual violence, and/or beaten on or near the bureau communal premises. Displaced civilians were also murdered frequently on or near the bureau communal premises. Many women were forced to endure multiple acts of sexual violence which were at times committed by more than one assailant. These acts of sexual violence were generally accompanied by explicit threats of death or bodily harm. The female displaced civilians lived in constant fear and their physical and psychological health deteriorated as a result of the sexual violence and beatings and killings.

12B. Jean Paul AKAYESU knew that the acts of sexual violence, beatings and murders were being committed and was at times present during their commission. Jean Paul AKAYESU facilitated the commission of the sexual violence, beatings and murders by allowing the sexual violence and beatings and murders to occur on or near the bureau communal premises. By virtue of his presence during the commission of the sexual violence, beatings and murders and by failing to prevent the sexual violence, beatings and murders, Jean Paul AKAYESU encouraged these activities.

13. On or about 19 April 1994, before dawn, in Gishyeshye sector, Taba commune, a group of men, one of whom was named Francois Ndimubanzi, killed a local teacher, Sylvere Karera, because he was accused of associating with the Rwandan Patriotic Front ("RPF") and plotting to kill Hutus. Even though at least one of the perpetrators was turned over to Jean Paul AKAYESU, he failed to take measures to have him arrested.

14. The morning of April 19, 1994, following the murder of Sylvere Karera, Jean Paul AKAYESU led a meeting in Gishyeshye sector at which he sanctioned the death of Sylvere Karera and urged the population to eliminate accomplices of the RPF, which was understood by those present to mean Tutsis. Over 100 people were present at the meeting. The killing of Tutsis in Taba began shortly after the meeting.

15. At the same meeting in Gishyeshye sector on April 19, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU named at least three prominent Tutsis -- Ephrem Karangwa, Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa -- who had to be killed because of their alleged relationships with the RPF. Later that day, Juvénal Rukundakuvuga was killed in Kanyinya. Within the next few days, Emmanuel Sempabwa was clubbed to death in front of the Taba bureau communal.

16. Jean Paul AKAYESU, on or about April 19, 1994, conducted house-to-house searches in Taba. During these searches, residents, including Victim V, were interrogated and beaten with rifles and sticks in the presence of Jean Paul AKAYESU. Jean Paul AKAYESU personally threatened to kill the husband and child of Victim U if she did not provide him with information about the activities of the Tutsis he was seeking.

17. On or about April 19, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU ordered the interrogation and beating of Victim X in an effort to learn the whereabouts of Ephrem Karangwa. During the beating, Victim X's fingers were broken as he tried to shield himself from blows with a metal stick.

18. On or about April 19, 1994, the men who, on Jean Paul AKAYESU's instructions, were searching for Ephrem Karangwa destroyed Ephrem Karangwa's house and burned down his mother's house. They then went to search the house of Ephrem Karangwa's brother-in-law in Musambira commune and found Ephrem Karangwa's three brothers there. The three brothers -- Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligira and Jean Chrysostome Gakuba -- tried to escape, but Jean Paul AKAYESU blew his whistle to alert local residents to the attempted escape and ordered the people to capture the brothers. After the brothers were captured, Jean Paul AKAYESU ordered and participated in the killings of the three brothers.

19. On or about April 19, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU took 8 detained men from the Taba bureau communal and ordered militia members to kill them. The militia killed them with clubs, machetes, small axes and sticks. The victims had fled from Runda commune and had been held by Jean Paul AKAYESU.

20. On or about April 19, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU ordered the local people and militia to kill intellectual and influential people. Five teachers from the secondary school of Taba were killed on his instructions. The victims were Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiance (whose name is unknown), Tharcisse Twizeyumuremye and Samuel. The local people and militia killed them with machetes and agricultural tools in front of the Taba bureau communal.

21. On or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU and some communal police went to the house of Victim Y, a 68 year old woman. Jean Paul AKAYESU interrogated her about the whereabouts of the wife of a university teacher. During the questioning, under Jean Paul AKAYESU's supervision, the communal police hit Victim Y with a gun and sticks. They bound her arms and legs and repeatedly kicked her in the chest. Jean Paul AKAYESU threatened to kill her if she failed to provide the information he sought.

22. Later that night, on or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU picked up Victim W in Taba and interrogated her also about the whereabouts of the wife of the university teacher. When she stated she did not know, he forced her to lay on the road in front of his car and threatened to drive over her.

23. Thereafter, on or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul AKAYESU picked up Victim Z in Taba and interrogated him. During the interrogation, men under Jean Paul AKAYESU's authority forced Victims Z and Y to beat each other and used a piece of Victim Y's dress to strangle Victim Z.

1.3. Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

7. The subject-matter jurisdiction of the ICTR is set out in Articles 2,3 and 4 of the Statute:

Article 2: Genocide

other acts enumerated in paragraph 3 of this article.

2. Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

a) Killing members of the group;

b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

3. The following acts shall be punishable:

a) Genocide;

b) Conspiracy to commit genocide;

d) Deportation;

e) Imprisonment;

f) Torture;

g) Rape;

5370

h) Persecutions on political, racial and religious grounds;

i) Other inhumane acts.

Article 4: Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

8. In addition, Article 6 states the principle of individual criminal responsibility:

Article 6: Individual Criminal Responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2. The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible Government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the International Tribunal for Rwanda determines that justice so requires.

1.4. The Trial

1.4.1. Procedural Background

9. Jean-Paul Akayesu was arrested in Zambia on 10 October 1995. On 22 November 1995, the Prosecutor of the Tribunal, pursuant to Rule 40 of the Rules, requested the Zambian authorities to keep Akayesu in detention for a period of 90 days, while awaiting the completion of the investigation.

10. On 13 February 1996, the then Prosecutor, Richard Goldstone8, submitted an Indictment against Akayesu, which was subsequently amended on 17 June 1997. It contains a total of 15 counts covering genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of Article 3 Common to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol II of 1977 thereto. More specifically, Akayesu was individually charged with genocide, complicity in genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, extermination, murder, torture, cruel treatment, rape, other inhumane acts and outrages upon personal dignity, which he allegedly committed in Taba commune of which he was the bourgmestre at the time of the alleged acts.

11. The Indictment was confirmed and an arrest warrant, accompanied by an order for continued detention, was issued by Judge William H. Sekule on 16 February 1996. The following week, the Indictment was submitted by the Registrar to the Zambian authorities, to be served upon the Accused. Akayesu was transferred to the Detention Facilities of the Tribunal in Arusha on 26 May 1996, where he is still detained awaiting judgment.

12. The initial appearance of the Accused, pursuant to Rule 62 of the Rules, took place on 30 May 1996 in the presence of his counsel before Trial Chamber I, composed of Judge Laʿty Kama, presiding, Judge Lennart Aspegren and Judge Navanethem Pillay. The prosecution team, led by Honoré Rakotomanana9, Deputy Prosecutor of the Tribunal, was composed of Yacob Haile-Mariam, Mohamed Chande Othman and Pierre-Richard Prosper10. The Accused pleaded not guilty to all the counts against him. On the same date, the Chamber ordered the continued detention of the Accused while awaiting his trial11. Simultaneous interpretation in French and English, and where necessary Kinyarwanda, was provided at the hearings.

13. The Accused having been found indigent by the Tribunal, in accordance with the provisions of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel12, the Registrar of the Tribunal assigned Johan Scheers as defence counsel for the Accused and counsel's fees were paid by the Tribunal. By a decision of 31 October 1996, the Chamber directed the Registrar of the Tribunal to withdraw the assignment of Johan Scheers as defence counsel for Akayesu, pursuant to Article 19 of the Directive on Assignment of Defence Counsel, and to immediately assign Michael Karnavas as the new defence counsel for the Accused. In the same decision, the Chamber postponed the trial until 9 January 1997, at the request of the Accused13. On 20 November 1996, the Chamber granted a request for a further change of defence counsel filed by the Accused on 11 November 1996, pursuant to Article 19 of the Directive. On 9 January 1997, the Registrar assigned Nicolas Tiangaye and Patrice Monthé, who served as defence counsel for the Accused until the end of the trial. On 16 January 1997, the Chamber rejected a third motion for change of defence counsel filed by the Accused on 9 January 199714. The decision of 16 January 1997 also put an end to the interim measures adopted by the Chamber on 13 January 1997, temporarily authorizing the Accused to cross-examine the witnesses himself, along with his two counsel.

14. On 27 May 1996, the then counsel for the Accused, Johan Scheers, filed a preliminary motion under Rule 73 of the Rules15, requesting the Chamber to (i) rule that the criminal proceedings were inadmissible for reasons of flagrant violations of the rights of Defence; (ii) order the hearing of witnesses and that Defence investigations be conducted; (iii) exclude from the proceedings, all indirect witnesses to the acts for which the Accused is charged; and (iv) order the release of the Accused pending the trial on the merits. During the oral presentation of the motion at the hearing of 26 September 1996, however, the Defence raised issues beyond the framework of the said motion by advancing complaints regarding, on the one hand, the detention conditions of the Accused during his imprisonment in Zambia and, on the other hand, the delay by the Prosecutor in disclosing the Indictment and supporting material. In its decision of 27 September 199616, the Chamber rejected the entire motion on the grounds that the objections raised by the Defence and the manner in which they were presented, did not provide sufficient basis for the Chamber to rule on the merits under Rule 73 of the Rules. That same day, the Chamber adjourned the trial at the request of the Defence and set 31 October 199617 as the official opening date of the trial on the merits.

15. On 29 October 1996, the Chamber granted the Prosecutor's motion of 23 October 1996 for the transfer of a witness detained in Rwanda in order for him to testify before the Tribunal. A similar motion by the Defence, filed on 30 October 1997, was granted by the Chamber, it being ordered that three witnesses then detained in Rwanda be transferred to the Tribunal's Detention Facilities for a period of not more than two months so as to testify in the trial18. However, two subsequent requests by the Defence for the transfer and appearance in court of five and thirteen witnesses detained in Rwanda respectively were rejected, on the basis, inter alia, that the Defence was unable to demonstrate how the appearance of each witness was undoubtedly material in the discovery of the truth or that the conditions stipulated in Rule 90*bis* (b) of the Rules had been met19.

16. Besides the above-mentioned motions, several pre-trial motions were filed by the Defence, including a motion for the defendant to sit at counsel table during trial, a motion for an expedited in camera hearing regarding Prosecutorial misconduct and a motion to compel the Prosecutor to conduct a fair and just investigation. These motions were not granted.

17. The trial of the Accused on the merits opened on 9 January 1997 before Trial Chamber I, composed of Judge La‹ty Kama, presiding, Judge Lennart Aspegren and Judge Navanethem Pillay. Pursuant to Rule 84 of the Rules, Honoré Rakotomanana and Yacob Haile-Mariam made the opening statement for the Prosecutor, which was followed by the opening statement for the Defence, made by Nicolas Tiangaye and Patrice Monthé. During the initial phase of the trial which took place over 26 trial days until 24 May 1997, 22 witnesses, including five expert witnesses, testified for the Prosecutor. Subsequent to the presentation of the Prosecutor's evidence, an in camera status conference was held after which the Chamber, at the request of the Defence, adjourned the trial until 29 September 1997.

18. All Prosecutor and Defence eye-witnesses requiring protection benefited from measures guaranteeing the confidentiality of their testimony 20. No information which could in any way identify the witnesses was given. During the hearings, letters of the alphabet were used as pseudonyms to refer to protected witnesses and screens isolated the said witnesses from the public, but not from the Accused and his counsel. One Defence witness was heard in camera.

19. On 13 January 1997, as an interim measure pending a Chamber decision on a request by the Accused for the replacement of his counsel, Akayesu was authorized by the Chamber to cross-examine, along with his assigned counsel, prosecution witnesses. The pertinent decision was rendered on 16 January 199721, whereby the request for replacement of Counsel was dismissed and the interim measure terminated.

20. Most of the Rwandan witnesses spoke in Kinyarwanda and their testimonies were interpreted into the two working languages of the Tribunal (French and English). By Decision of 9 March 1998, the Chamber dismissed a Defence motion, based on Rule 91 of the Rules, to direct the Prosecutor to investigate an alleged false testimony by prosecution witness "R". The Chamber found that for the Defence to raise doubts as to the reliability of statements made by a witness, was not by itself sufficient to establish strong grounds for believing that the witness may have knowingly and wilfully given false testimony 22.

21. During the hearing of 23 January 1997, the Chamber requested the Prosecutor, in view of the exceptional nature of the offences, to submit all written witness statements already made available by her to the Defence. The Prosecutor objected to the request; hence the Chamber, by a decision rendered on 28 January 1997, pursuant to Rules 89(A), 89(C) and 98 of the Rules, ordered the Prosecutor to submit all available written witness statements to the Chamber in the case and that all such statements to which reference had been made by either the Prosecutor or the Defence shall be admitted as evidence and form part of the record. However, this was subject to the caveat that disclosure of all the written statements did not necessarily entail their admissibility as evidence23.

22. On 4 February 1997, the Prosecutor, who had not yet complied with the order of 28 January 1997, filed a motion requesting the Chamber to reconsider and rescind the said order. The Prosecutor submitted, inter alia, that the order of 28 January 1997 represented an unjustified change in the established order for production of evidence and thus did not satisfy the provisions of Rule 85, that Rule 98 simply allows the Chamber to order the production of specific additional evidence and not the disclosure of all the evidence, that it involves the Chamber in the process of disclosure and, in actual fact, circumvents Rule 66 (A), and that the order is prejudicial to the parties. On 6 march 1997, the Chamber declared the Prosecutor's motion groundless, and expressed surprise, in the circumstances, at receiving a motion asking it to reconsider and rescind its order, instead of a motion for clarification. The Chamber specified in its decision that the order of 28 January 1997 could only be interpreted with respect to the witness statements already communicated to the Defence24. On 16 April 1997, the Prosecutor filed a notice of intent to comply with the Chamber's order to submit witness statements.

23. As stated above, 24 May 1997 marked the end of the first part of the trial of the Accused with the testimony of the last prosecution witness. However, on 16 June 1997, the Prosecutor submitted a request to bring an expedited oral motion before the Chamber seeking an amendment of the Indictment. During the hearing held to that end on 17 June 1997, the Prosecutor sought leave to add three further Counts, namely, Count 13: rape, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 3 (g) of the Statute, Count 14: inhumane acts, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 3 (i) of the Statute, and Count 15: outrages on personal dignity, notably rape, degrading and humiliating treatment and indecent assault, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Article 4(2)(e) of Additional Protocol II, as incorporated in Article 4(e) of the Statute. The Chamber granted leave to the Prosecutor to amend the Indictment and postponed the date for resumption of the trial to 23 October 199725

24. The second phase of the trial started on 23 October 1997 with the initial appearance of Akayesu for the new counts in a public session before the Chamber. The Accused pleaded not guilty to each of the new counts. The Prosecutor then proceeded to present six new witnesses, including an investigator with the Office of the Prosecutor. In all, the Prosecutor put 28 witnesses on the stand over 31 trial days. The Defence, for its part, presented its evidence over the course of 12 trial days between 4 November 1997 and 13 March 1998. It called 13 witnesses, including the Accused, to the stand. A total of 155 exhibits were submitted during the trial.

25. During the second phase of the trial, the Defence requested and obtained the issuance of a subpoena for Major-General Roméo Dallaire, former force Commander of UNAMIR (United Nations Assistance Mission in Rwanda), whose immunity had been partially lifted by the UN Secretary-General, to appear as a witness for the Defence 26. The Chamber also granted leave to a representative of the United Nations Secretariat to appear as an Amicus Curiae to make a statement on the lifting of the immunity Major-General Roméo Dallaire enjoys by virtue of his position as former force Commander of UNAMIR27

26. However, the Chamber did not grant the Defence motion for the issuance of a subpoena for two persons accused before the Tribunal to appear as Defence witnesses, on the grounds that their fundamental rights, as recognized by Article 20(4)(g) of the Statute, would perhaps be violated, and that there would be a risk that their appearance as witnesses in the case could cause prejudice to them28. A further Defence motion for the appearance of another accused as an expert witness was similarly dismissed29. The Chamber held therein that the impartiality of the potential expert witness, who is accused by the Tribunal for crimes related to those with which Akayesu is charged, could not be assured and consequently that he did not fulfil the requisite conditions for appearing as an expert witness. Furthermore, the Chamber found that for this particular Accused to be compelled to appear as an expert witness in the case would be prejudicial to him and could possibly violate his fundamental rights, as recognized by the provisions of Article 20(4)(g) of the Statute and Article 14(3)(g) of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights of 1966.

27. The Chamber dismissed a Defence motion for a site visit and the conduct of a forensic analysis of the remains of three alleged victims. The Chamber found that a new forensic analysis would not be appropriate nor, in any case, instrumental in the discovery of the truth, on the basis, inter alia, that a number of the purported mass graves, including, without a doubt, those supposedly in the vicinity of the Taba bureau communal' had been subject of previous exhumations. Moreover, the Chamber felt that the arguments of the Defence Counsel in support of the motion were pertinent mainly to evaluating the credibility of certain witness statements and not to showing the necessity for an exhumation and forensic analysis, as requested30

28. None of the parties presented witnesses for rebuttal purposes. The Accused testified in his own defence on 12 March 1998 and was cross-examined the next day by the Prosecutor. The latter presented her final arguments on 19 and 23 March, and the Defence presented its closing arguments on 26 March 1998. The trial on the merits was held over a period of 60 days of hearings, since 9 January 1997. The case was adjourned on 26 March 1998 for deliberation on the Judgment by the Chamber.

1.4.2. The Accused's line of defence

29. The Accused has pleaded not guilty to all counts of the Indictment, both at his initial appearance, held on 30 May 1996, and at the hearing of 23 October 1997 when he pleaded not guilty to each of the new counts which had been added to the Indictment when it was amended on 17 June 1997.

30. In essence, the Defence case - insofar as the Chamber has been able to establish it - is that the Accused did not commit, order or participate in any of the killings, beatings or acts of sexual violence alleged in the Indictment. The Defence concedes that a genocide occurred in Rwanda and that massacres of Tutsi took place in Taba Commune, but it argues that the Accused was helpless to prevent them, being outnumbered and overpowered by one Silas Kubwimana and the Interahamwe. The Defence pointed out that, according to prosecution witness R, Akayesu had been so harassed by the Interahamwe that at one point he had had to flee Taba commune. Once the massacres had become widespread, the Accused was denuded of all authority and lacked the means to stop the killings.

31. The Defence claims that the Chamber should not require the Accused to be a hero, to have laid down his life - as, for example, did the bourgmestre of Mugina - in a futile attempt to prevent killings and beatings. The Defence alluded to the fact that General Dallaire, in charge of UNAMIR and 2,500 troops, was unable to prevent the genocide. How, then, was Akayesu, with 10 communal policemen at his disposal, to fare any better? Moreover, the Defence argue, no bourgmestre in the whole of Rwanda was able to prevent the massacres in his Commune, no matter how willing he was to do so.

32. As for acts of sexual violence, the Defence case is somewhat different from that for killings and beatings, in that, whereas for the latter the Defence does not contest that there were killings and beatings, it does deny that there were acts of sexual violence committed, at least at the Bureau Communal. During his testimony the Accused emphatically denied that any rapes had taken place at the Bureau Communal, even when he was not there. The Chamber notes the Accused's emphatic denial of facts which are not entirely within his knowledge.

33. As general remarks, the Defence alluded to the fragility of human testimony as opposed to documentary evidence, and specifically referred to the evidence of Dr. Mathias Ruzindana, who had testified about problems in relying on eye-witness accounts of Rwandans31. The Defence also raised problems associated with alleged "syndicates of informers", in which groups of Rwandans supposedly collaborated to concoct testimony against a person for revenge or other motives. This allegation is specifically dealt with below.

34. As regards the Accused, the Defence pointed out that, though the Prosecutor admitted that the Accused had opposed massacres before 18 April 1994, the Prosecutor could not demonstrate that he was a "genocidal ideologue", since one did not adopt the ideology of genocide overnight. Hence, the Defence argued, he could not be convicted of genocide.

35. In general, the Defence argued that the Accused was a "scapegoat", who found himself Accused before the Chamber only because he was a Hutu and a bourgmestre at the time of the massacres.

36. Turning to the specific allegations contained in the Indictment, the Defence case is that there was no change in Akayesu's attitude or behaviour before and after the Murambi meeting of 18 April 1998. Both before and after, he attempted to save Tutsi lives. Witness DBB testified that the Accused gave a Tutsi woman (witness DEEX) a laissez-passer, although he could not say whether the accused knew at the time that the woman was a Tutsi or not. Witness DEEX confirmed that she was given a laissez-passer by the accused. Witnesses DIX and DJX also heard that Akayesu had saved Tutsi lives.

37. The Defence also challenged the premise that the Murambi meeting of 18 April 1994 was the key event which led to a complete change in the accused's behaviour. Since, the Defence argued, it had not been shown that orders for the extermination of the Tutsi were given at the Murambi meeting by the interim government, it follows that the accused could not have returned to his Commune a changed man because of those non-existent orders. The Defence pointed out that only one prosecution witness and one Defence witness had attended the Murambi meeting, and that neither testified that an explicit message to kill the Tutsi had been given.

38. Regarding the Gishyeshye meeting of 19 April 1994, the Defence argued that the accused was forced by the Interahamwe to read a document which allegedly mentioned the names of RPF accomplices, but that the accused tried to dissuade the population from being incited by the document, arguing that the mere appearance of names on a list did not mean that the persons named were accomplices of the RPF. The Defence also noted further "contradictions" in the accounts given by witnesses of the Gishyeshye meeting.

39. As regards the killings of the eight Runda refugees and the five teachers, the Defence pointed out that the only witness to these killings was witness K, and that the accused had, at the time of his interview by the OTP in Zambia, cited witness K as a possible Defence witness. It begged credulity that the accused would contemplate calling as a Defence witness a person whom he knew had seen him order such killings.

40. Concerning the killings of the Karangwa brothers, the Defence argued that there was such uncertainty as to how they were killed, and by what instruments, that a conviction could not stand in the absence of these material averments. It was because of these inconsistencies and uncertainties that the Defence had asked for an exhumation of the bodies, which had not been granted.

41. The charges of beatings the Defence contested on the grounds that no medical examination had been conducted on the alleged victims to verify that the injuries which they claimed were sustained as a result of the accused's actions could genuinely be so attributed.

42. The charges of offences of sexual violence, the Defence argued, were added under the pressure of public opinion and were not credibly supported by the evidence. Witness J's account, for example, of living in a tree for one week after her family were killed and her sister raped, while several months pregnant, was simply not credible but rather the product of fantasy the Defence claimed - "of interest to psychiatrists, but not justice".32

43. The Chamber has considered the Defence case extremely carefully and it will be treated here in the course of making the various factual and legal findings. There is one aspect which, however, should be dealt with here.

Putting the case to a witness

44. In the Defence closing argument, Mr. Nicholas Tiangaye, made the suggestion that some, if not all, of the Prosecution witnesses who had testified against Jean-Paul Akayesu did so because they were colluding in a "syndicate of informers" which would denounce a particular individual for political reasons or in order to take over his property. In this connection, Mr. Tiangaye quoted Rene Degni-Segui, the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on Rwanda, who recounted a story of a demonstrably innocent Rwandan who had been denounced by 15 witnesses as a participant in the genocide. Mr. Tiangaye concluded thus:

> "... there were cases of calumny which existed and which enabled people to denounce others regarding their participation in genocide in order to be able to take over their property."

Mr. Tiangaye then went on to say:

> "So, what do we do, Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, when witnesses come to tell lies before the Chamber, what do we do?" 33

45. To the extent that Defence counsel invites the Chamber to disbelieve the testimony of Prosecution witnesses because they may belong to a syndicate of informers or that they may be denouncing Akayesu in order to take over his property, and that they have therefore lied before the Chamber, it is to be noted this is a very serious allegation of false testimony or perjury, which is a criminal offence. Indeed, Defence counsel during the course of the trial made a motion for a certain prosecution witness to be investigated for false testimony; which motion was rejected in a Decision of this Trial Chamber in which it gave its reasons.34. That matter does not concern the Chamber here. What is of concern is whether the Chamber should give any weight, in its deliberations, to the possibility raised by Defence counsel that prosecution witnesses may have been lying for one of the above-mentioned motives.

46. The Chamber holds that, as a blanket allegation to undermine the credibility of prosecution witnesses, this allegation can carry no weight, for two reasons. First, an attack on credibility which is not particularised with respect to individual witnesses is no attack at all on those witnesses' credibility; it is merely a generalised and unsubstantiated suspicion. Doubt can only arise where the criteria for doubt are fulfilled. To state that all prosecution witnesses should be disbelieved because some Rwandan witnesses elsewhere have lied is similar to saying, "some money is counterfeit, therefore all money might be counterfeit". If, and this is the second point, the Defence wish to challenge prosecution witnesses as members of an informer's syndicate, or to allege that they are lying in order to be able to confiscate the accused's property, then the Defence must lay the foundations for that challenge and put the challenge to the witness in question during cross-examination. This is both a matter of practicality and of principle. The practical matter is this: if the Defence does put to a witness the allegation that he is lying because he wishes to take the accused's property, then this may elicit a convincing admission or rebuttal. The witness may break down and reveal, by his words or demeanour, that he has indeed been lying for that purpose; alternatively, he may offer a convincing rebuttal, for example, by pointing out that the accused has no property which the witness could wish to misappropriate. Either way, the matter might be resolved. To never put the crucial question to the witness is to deprive the Chamber of such a possible resolution. As a matter of principle, it is only fair to a witness, whom the Defence wishes to accuse of lying, to give him or her an opportunity to hear that allegation and to respond to it. This is a rule in Common law, 35 but it is also simply a matter of justice and fairness to victims and witnesses, principles recognised in all legal systems throughout the world.

47. It is to be noted that during the trial the Defence did not put, nor even suggest, to a single prosecution witness that he or she was lying because he or she had been drawn into a syndicate of informers and instructed as to how to testify against the accused, or that the witness was lying because he or she wished to take the accused's property. In these circumstances, Defence counsel's attempt in his closing arguments to tar all prosecution witnesses with the same broad brush of suspicion cannot be accepted by the Chamber. Thus the credibility of each witness must be assessed on its merits, taking into account the witness's demeanour and the consistency and credibility or otherwise of the answers given by him or her under oath.

1.5. The Accused and his functions in Taba (paragraphs 3-4 of the Indictment)

48. Paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Indictment appear under the heading, "the Accused". Taking these paragraphs in turn, paragraph 3 reads as follows:

> The Accused
>
> 3. Jean Paul AKAYESU, born in 1953 in Murehe sector, Taba commune, served as bourgmestre of that commune from April 1993 until June 1994. Prior to his appointment as bourgmestre, he was a teacher and school inspector in Taba.

49. The Chamber confirms paragraph 3, which is common cause between the Prosecution and the Defence. On the basis of the evidence presented at trial, the Chamber finds the following facts have been established with regard to the Accused generally.

50. The Accused, Akayesu was born in 1953 in Murehe sector, Taba commune in Rwanda, where he also grew up. He was an active athlete in Taba and a member of the local football team. In 1978 he married a local woman from the same commune, whom he had then known for ten years. They are still married and have five children together.

51. Before being appointed bourgmestre in 1993, the Accused served as a teacher and was later promoted to Primary School Inspector in Taba. In this capacity he was in charge of inspecting the education in the commune and acted as head of the teachers. He would occasionally fill in as a substitute teacher and was popular among pupils and students of different educational levels in the commune. Generally speaking, the Accused was a well known and popular figure in the local community.

52. Akayesu became politically active within the commune in 1991 and on 1 July of the same year, following the transition into multipartyism, he was one of the signatories to the statute and a founding member of the new political party R called,Mouvement Démocratique Républicain MDR Politically the goal of the MDR was not to be an extension of the traditional MDR Parmehutu, but rather an updated version thereof, diametrically opposed to the MRND. The MDR focused on pointing out the errors of the MRND such as delays in the provision of infrastructure, roads, schools, health facilities, lack of electricity, etc.. Eventually, Akayesu was elected local president of the MDR in Taba commune. A sizeable proportion of the population in Taba became members of the MDR, and as the party grew, a certain animosity between members of the MDR and the MRND began to appear, resulting in several acts of violence. The other parties within the Commune, the Parti Social Démocratique, PSD and the Parti Libéral, PL cooperated with the MDR but, like the MDR, both parties experienced similar difficulties in cooperating with the MRND.

53. On a personal level, Akayesu was considered a man of high morals, intelligence and integrity, possessing the qualities of a leader, who appeared to have the trust of the local community. These abilities were in all likelihood the main reasons why different groups in the commune, among others the leaders of the MDR, communal representatives and religious leaders, considered Akayesu a suitable candidate for bourgmestre in Taba for the 1993 elections. The Accused himself admits to having been reluctant to run for the post of bourgmestre, but was pressured into candidacy by the aforementioned groups, according to several witnesses, including Akayesu himself.

54. In April 1993, Akayesu was elected bourgmestre after an election contested by four candidates. He then served as bourgmestre of Taba Commune from April 1993 until June 1994. According to the Accused, the duties of a bourgmestre were diverse. In short, he was in charge of the total life of the commune in terms of the economy, infrastructure, markets, medical care and the overall social life.Traditionally the role of the bourgmestre had always been to act as the representative of the President in the commune. Therefore the arrival of multipartyism did not particularly change the considerable amount of unofficial powers conferred upon the bourgmestre by the people in the commune. The bourgmestre was the leader of the commune and commonly treated with great respect and deference by the population.

55. In Taba Commune, Akayesu played a major role in leading the people. He would give advice on various matters concerning security, economics or on the social well-being of the citizens. His advice would generally be followed and he was considered a father-figure or parent of the commune, to whom people would also come for informal advice. After a period of economic difficulties in Taba Commune due to corruption under the previous administration, a clear difference could be detected when Akayesu took office, as people would now settle their debts trusting the new administration. According to those of his colleagues appearing as witnesses before the Chamber, Akayesu was performing his task as bourgmestre well, prior to the period which is the subject of the Indictment.

56. Paragraph 4 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> 4. As bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU was charged with the performance of executive functions and the maintenance of public order within his commune, subject to the authority of the prefect. He had exclusive control over the communal police, as well as any gendarmes put at the disposition of the commune. He was responsible for the execution of laws and regulations and the administration of justice, also subject only to the prefect's authority.

57. The Chamber finds it necessary to explore in some detail the powers of the bourgmestre and, in particular, to distinguish between the de facto and de jure powers of a bourgmestre. In so doing, the Chamber will also deal with the allegation in paragraph 2 of the Indictment which reads, "In Rwanda, the bourgmestre is the most powerful figure in the commune. His de facto authority in the area is significantly greater than that which is conferred upon him de jure".

Background

58. A commune is governed by a bourgmestre in conjunction with the communal council which is composed of representatives of the different sectors in the commune. Below the sectors are the cellules and at the lowest level are the units of ten households. The latter two are really party structures, rather than administrative subdivisions.

59. Before the advent of multi-partyism, appointment and removal of a bourgmestre was the prerogative of the State President, political loyalty being the criterion. The bourgmestre was the representative of the central government in the commune but embodied at the same time the commune as a semi-autonomous unit. In that capacity, he would, for example, arrange contracts or represent the commune in court. He also had the authority to allocate the resources of the commune, including the land. He had the sole responsibility and authority over the communal police and could call upon the national gendarmerie to restore order. In addition, he was a judicial officer. Moreover, as the trusted representative of the President, he had a series of unofficial powers and duties, to such an extent that he was the central person in the daily life of the ordinary people. Citizens needed his protection in order to function in society. The bourgmestre held considerable sway over the communal council. Although an elected body, the council was less a representative body of the interest of the population than it was simply a channel for passing orders down to the people.

60. The introduction of multipartyism in 1991 had its effect on the local and national power structures from 1992 onwards. The MRND had to sacrifice the advantages which it enjoyed when it was the Siamese twin of the administration. A number of bourgmestres were removed on the advice of a pluralistic evaluation commission. The subsequent local elections were a clear victory for the opposition. Other bourgmestres were simply ousted by militia of an opposition party. Since then, the bourgmestres were no longer necessarily the representatives of the State President or of the central authority. Instead, they became primarily the representatives of their political party at the local level. But in any case, they would still remain the most important local representatives of power at the centre.

De jure* powers

61. The office of bourgmestre in Rwanda is similar to the office of maire in France or bourgmestre in Belgium36. It is an executive civilian position in the territorial administrative subdivision of commune. The primary function of the bourgmestre is to execute the laws adopted by the communal legislature, i.e., the elected communal council37. He "embodies the communal authority"38

The communal administration

62. The relationship between a bourgmestre and the communal workforce is spelt out in the body of law which is called administrative law in Civil Law countries (as opposed to labour law which regulates employment in the private sector). The bourgmestre has the power to hire (appoint) and fire (remove) communal employees after advice from the communal council39. The President of the Republic decrees by law the legal status (rights and duties) of the communal personnel. Although the legal situation (administrative law) may be very different from the private sector (labour law), it is very much a relationship of employer and employee and, therefore, strictly limited to the scope of the employment.

The communal police

63. The bourgmestre, without being a part of the communal police, has ultimate authority over it and is entirely responsible for its organisation, functioning and control.40

64. The communal police is a civilian police whose members do not fall under the military penal code. Sanctions and procedures for sanctions are the subject of administrative law. A bourgmestre has only disciplinary jurisdiction (e.g. blame, suspension) over his communal police.

65. Although the law states that only the bourgmestre has authority over the police41, he is, however, not its commander. Article 108 of the Loi sur l'organisation communale states, "Le commandement de la Police communale est assuré par un brigadier placé sous l'autorité du bourgmestre". Therefore, the relationship between the bourgmestre and the communal police is comparable to the relationship between a Minister of Defence and the High Command of the armed forces.

66. In case of public disturbances, the prefect can assume direct control over the communal police.42

Gendarmerie Nationale

67. Paragraph 4 of the Indictment states that Akayesu as a bourgmestre had exclusive control over the communal police as well as any gendarmes put at the disposal of the commune.

68. The Gendarmerie Nationale is a military force whose task it is to maintain public order when it is requested to do so43.

69. It is the prefect, not the bourgmestre who can request the intervention of the Gendarmerie44. The Gendarmes put at the disposal of the commune at the request of the prefect operate under the bourgmestre's authority45. It is far from clear, however, that in such circumstances a bourgmestre would have command authority over a military force.46

Powers of a bourgmestre in times of war or national emergency

70. Apart from asking the prefect to request the Gendarmerie to intervene (supra), there are few legal provisions on the powers of a bourgmestre in times of war or national emergency.

71. A decree of 20 October 1959 (by the Belgian authorities) on the state of emergency is apparently still on the books. It gives the bourgmestre the power, once the the state of emergency has been declared, to order the evacuation, removal and internment of persons.47

De facto* powers

72. A number of witnesses testified before the Chamber as to the de facto powers of the bourgmestre and there is indeed evidence to support the Prosecutor's assertion that the bourgmestre enjoyed significant de facto authority.

73. The expert witness, Alison DesForges, testified that the bourgmestre was the most important authority for the ordinary citizens of a Commune, who in some sense exercised the powers of a chief in pre-colonial times.

74. Witness E said that the bourgmestre was considered as the "parent" of all the population whose every order would be respected. Witness S went further and stated that the people would normally follow the orders of the administrative authority, i.e. the bourgmestre, even if those orders were illegal or wrongful. Witness V said that the people could not disobey the orders of the bourgmestre.

75. On the other hand, Witness DAAX, who was the prefect of the Gitarama prefecture in which the accused was bourgmestre - and hence the Accused's hierarchical superior - testified that the bourgmestre had to work within the ambit of the law and could not exceed his de jure powers, and that if he did so, the prefect would intervene.

76. Witness R, himself a former bourgmestre, said that the duties and responsibilities of the bourgmestre were those prescribed and decreed by law, which the bourgmestre had to respect. The witness conceded, however, that the popularity of a bourgmestre might affect the extent to which his orders and advice were obeyed within the Commune. Witness R also admitted that, at least during the transitional period, certain bourgmestres exceeded their de jure powers with impunity, for example imprisoning their political rivals or embezzling from communal resources.

77. In light of the above, the Chamber finds it proved beyond a reasonable doubt that, as paragraph 4 of the Indictment states, "As bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU was charged with the performance of executive functions and the maintenance of public order within his commune, subject to the authority of the prefect". The Chamber does find it proved that "[the bourgmestre] had exclusive control over the communal police, [...][and authority over] any gendarmes put at the disposal of the commune". The Chamber does find it proved that "[the bourgmestre] was responsible for the execution of laws and regulations and the administration of justice, also subject only to the prefect's authority". The Chamber does find it proved that, "In Rwanda, the bourgmestre is the most powerful figure in the commune. His de facto authority in the area is significantly greater than that which is conferred upon him de jure".

2. HISTORICAL CONTEXT OF THE EVENTS IN RWANDA IN 1994

78. It is the opinion of the Chamber that , in order to understand the events alleged in the Indictment, it is necessary to say, however briefly, something about the history of Rwanda, beginning from the pre-colonial period up to 1994.

79. Rwanda is a small, very hilly country in the Great Lakes region of Central Africa. Before the events of 1994, it was the most densely populated country of the African continent (7.1 million inhabitants, 26,338 square kilometres). Ninety per cent of the population lives on agriculture. Its per capita income is among the lowest in the world, mainly because of a very high population pressure on land.

80. Prior to and during colonial rule, first, under Germany, from about 1897, and then under Belgium which, after driving out Germany in 1917, was given a mandate by the League of Nations to administer it, Rwanda was a complex and an advanced monarchy. The monarch ruled the country through his official representatives drawn from the Tutsi nobility. Thus, there emerged a highly sophisticated political culture which enabled the king to communicate with the people.

81. Rwanda then, admittedly, had some eighteen clans defined primarily along lines of kinship. The terms Hutu and Tutsi were already in use but referred to individuals rather than to groups. In those days, the distinction between the Hutu and Tutsi was based on lineage rather than ethnicity. Indeed, the demarcation line was blurred: one could move from one status to another, as one became rich or poor, or even through marriage.

82. Both German and Belgian colonial authorities, if only at the outset as far as the latter are concerned, relied on an elite essentially composed of people who referred to themselves as Tutsi, a choice which, according to Dr. Alison Desforges, was born of racial or even racist considerations. In the minds of the colonizers, the Tutsi looked more like them, because of their height and colour, and were, therefore, more intelligent and better equipped to govern.

83. In the early 1930s, Belgian authorities introduced a permanent distinction by dividing the population into three groups which they called ethnic groups, with the Hutu representing about 84% of the population, while the Tutsi (about 15%) and Twa (about 1%) accounted for the rest. In line with this division, it became mandatory for every Rwandan to carry an identity card mentioning his or her ethnicity. The Chamber notes that the reference to ethnic background on identity cards was maintained, even after Rwanda's independence and was, at last, abolished only after the tragic events the country experienced in 1994.

84. According to the testimony of Dr. Alison Desforges, while the Catholic Church which arrived in the wake of European colonizers gave the monarch, his notables and the Tutsi population privileged access to education and training, it tried to convert them. However, in the face of some resistance, the missionaries for a while undertook to convert the Hutu instead. Yet, when the Belgians included being Christian among the criteria for determining the suitability of a candidate for employment in the civil service, the Tutsi, hitherto opposed to their conversion, became more willing to be converted to Christianity. Thus, they carried along most Hutu. Quoting a witness from whom she asked for an explanation for the massive conversion of Hutu to Christianity, Dr. Desforges testified that the reasons for the conversion were to be found in the cult of obedience to the chiefs which is highly developed in the Rwandan society. According to that witness, "you could not remain standing while your superiors were on their knees praying". For these reasons, therefore, it can be understood why at the time, that is, in the late 1920s and early 1930s, the church, like the colonizers, supported the Tutsi monopoly of power.

85. From the late 1940s, at the dawn of the decolonization process, the Tutsi became aware of the benefits they could derive from the privileged status conferred on them by the Belgian colonizers and the Catholic church. They then attempted to free themselves somehow from Belgian political stewardship and to emancipate the Rwandan society from the grip of the Catholic church. The desire for independence shown by the Tutsi elite certainly caused both the Belgians and the church to shift their alliances from the Tutsi to the Hutu, a shift rendered more radical by the change in the church's philosophy after the second world war, with the arrival of young priests from a more democratic a egalitarian trend of Christianity, who sought to develop political awareness among the Tutsi- do Hutu majority.

86. Under pressure from the United Nations Trusteeship Council and following the shift in alliances just mentioned, Belgium changed its policy by granting more opportunities to the Hutu to acquire education and to hold senior positions in government services. This turn-about particularly angered the Tutsi, especially because, on the renewal of its mandate over Rwanda by the United Nations, Belgium was requested to establish representative organs in the Trust territory, so as to groom the natives for administration and, ultimately, grant independence to the country. The Tutsi therefore began the move to end Belgian domination, while the Hutu elite, for tactical reasons, favoured the continuation of the domination, hoping to make the Hutu masses aware of their political weight in Rwanda, in a bid to arrive at independence, which was unavoidable, at least on the basis of equality with the Tutsi. Belgium particularly appreciated this attitude as it gave it reason to believe that with the Hutu, independence would not spell a severance of ties.

87. In 1956, in accordance with the directives of the United Nations Trusteeship Council, Belgium organized elections on the basis of universal suffrage in order to choose new members of local organs, such as the grassroots representative Councils. With the electorate voting on strictly ethnic lines, the Hutu of course obtained an overwhelming majority and thereby became aware of their political strength. The Tutsi, who were hoping to achieve independence while still holding the reins of power, came to the realization that universal suffrage meant the end of their supremacy; hence, confrontation with the Hutu became inevitable.

88. Around 1957, the first political parties were formed and, as could be expected, they were ethnically rather than ideologically based. There were four political parties, namely the Mouvement démocratique répubicain, Parmehutu ("MDR Parmehutu"), which clearly defined itself as the Hutu grassroots movement; the Union Nationale Rwandaise ("UNAR"), the party of Tutsi monarchists; and, between the two extremes, the two others, Aprosoma, predominantly Hutu, and the Rassemblement démocratique rwandais ("RADER"), which brought together moderates from the Tutsi and Hutu elite.

89. The dreaded political unrest broke out in November 1959, with increased bloody incidents, the first victims of which were the Hutu. In reprisal, the Hutu burnt down and looted Tutsi houses. Thus became embedded a cycle of violence which ended with the establishment on 18 October 1960, by the Belgian authorities, of an autonomous provisional Government headed by Grégoire Kayibanda, President of MDR Parmehutu, following the June 1960 communal elections that gave an overwhelming majority to Hutu parties. After the Tutsi monarch fled abroad, the Hutu opposition declared the Republic of Gitarama, on 28 January 1961, and set up a legislative assembly. On 6 February 1961, Belgium granted self-government to Rwanda. Independence was declared on 1 July 1962, with Grégoire Kayibanda at the helm of the new State, and, thus, President of the First Republic.

90. The victory of Hutu parties increased the departure of Tutsi to neighbouring countries from where Tutsi exiles made incursions into Rwanda. The word Inyenzi, meaning cockroach, came to be used to refer to these assailants. Each attack was followed by reprisals against the Tutsi within the country and in 1963, such attacks caused the death of at least ten thousand of them, further increasing the number of those who went into exile. Concurrently, at the domestic level, the Hutu regime seized this opportunity to allocate to the Hutu the lands abandoned by Tutsi in exile and to redistribute posts within the Government and the civil service, in favour of the Hutu, on the basis of a quota system linked to the proportion of each ethnic group in the population.

91. The dissensions that soon surfaced among the ruling Hutu led the regime to strengthen the primacy of the MDR Parmehutu party over all sectors of public life and institutions, thereby making it the de facto sole party. This consolidated the authority of President Grégoire Kayibanda as well as the influence of his entourage, most of who came from the same region as he, that is the Gitarama region in the centre of the country. The drift towards ethnic and regional power became obvious. From then onwards, a rift took root within the Hutu political Establishment, between its key figures from the Centre and those from the North and South who showed great frustration. Increasingly isolated, President Kayibanda could not control the ethnic and regional dissensions. The disagreements within the regime resulted into anarchy, which enabled General Juvénal Habyarimana, Army Chief of Staff, to seize power through a coup on 5 July 1973. General Habyarimana dissolved the First Republic and established the Second Republic. Scores of political leaders were imprisoned and, later, executed or starved to death, as was the case with the former President, Grégoire Kayibanda.

92. Following a trend then common in Africa, President Habyarimana, in 1975, instituted the one-party system with the creation of the Mouvement révolutionnaire national pour le développement (MRND), of which every Rwandan was a member ipso facto, including the newborn. Since the party encompassed everyone, there was no room for political pluralism. A law passed in 1978 made Rwanda officially a one-party State with the consequence that the MRND became a "State-party", as it formed one and the same entity with the Government. According to Dr. Desforges, the local administrative authority was, at the same time, the representative of the party within his administrative unit. There was therefore a single centralized organization , both for the State and the party, which stretched from the Head of State down to basic units known as cellules, with even smaller local organs , each comprising ten households, below the cellules. The cellules and local organs were, indeed, more of party organs, than administrative units. They were the agencies for the implementation of Umuganda, the mobilization programme which required people to allocate half a day's labour per week to some communal project, such as the construction of schools or road repairs.

93. According to testimonies given before the Chamber, particularly that of Dr. Desforges, Habyarimana's accession to power aroused a great deal of enthusiasm and hope, both inside and outside the country, and also among members of the Tutsi ethnic group. Indeed, the regime at the outset did guard against pursuing a clearly anti-Tutsi policy. Many Tutsi were then prepared to reach a compromise. However, as the years went by, power took its toll and Habyarimana's policies became clearly anti-Tutsi. Like his predecessor, Grégoire Kayibanda, Habyarimana strengthened the policy of discrimination against the Tutsi by applying the same quota system in universities and government services. A policy of systematic discrimination was pursued even among the Hutu themselves, in favour of Hutu from Habyarimana's native region, namely Gisenyi and Ruhengeri in the north-west, to the detriment of Hutu from other regions. This last aspect of Habyarimana's policy, considerably weakened his power: henceforth, he faced opposition not only from the Tutsi but also from the Hutu, who felt discriminated against and most of whom came from the central and southern regions. In the face of this situation, Habyarimana chose to relentlessly pursue the same policy like his predecessor who favoured his region, Gitarama. Like Kayibanda, he became increasingly isolated and the base of his regime narrowed down to a small intimate circle dubbed "Akazu", meaning the "President's household". This further radicalized the opposition whose ranks swelled more and more. On 1 October 1990, an attack was launched from Uganda by the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) whose forebear, the Alliance rwandaise pour l'unité nationale ("ARUN"), was formed in 1979 by Tutsi exiles based in Uganda. The attack provided a pretext for the arrest of thousands of opposition members in Rwanda considered as supporters of the RPF.

94. Faced with the worsening internal situation that attracted a growing number of Rwandans to the multi-party system, and pressured by foreign donors demanding not only economic but also political reforms in the form of much greater participation of the people in the country's management, President Habyarimana was compelled to accept the multi-party system in principle. On 28 December 1990, the preliminary draft of a political charter to establish a multi-party system was published. On 10 June 199[illegible] the new constitution introducing the multi-party system was adopted, followed on 18 June by the promulgation of the law on political parties and the formation of the first parties, namely :

- the Mouvement démocratique républicain (MDR), considered to be the biggest party in terms of membership and claiming historical links with the MDR-Parmehutu of Grégoire Kayibanda; its power-base was mainly the centre of the country, around Gitarama;

- the Parti social démocrate (PSD), whose membership included a good number of intellectuals, recruited its members mostly in the South, in Butare;

- the Parti libéral(PL); and

- the Parti démocrate chrétien (PDC).

95. At the same time, Tutsi exiles, particularly those in Uganda organized themselves not only to launch incursions into Rwandan territory but also to form a political organization, the Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF), with a military wing called the Rwandan Patriotic Army (RPA). The first objective of the exiles was to return to Rwanda. But they met with objection from the Rwandan authorities and President Habyarimana, who is alleged to have said that land in Rwanda would not be enough to feed all those who wanted to return. On these grounds, the exiles broadened their objectives to include the overthrow of Habyarimana.

96. The above-mentioned RPF attack on 1 October 1991 sent shock waves throughout Rwanda. Members of the opposition parties formed in 1991, saw this as an opportunity to have an informal alliance with the RPF so as to further destabilize an already weakened regime. The regime finally accepted to share power between the MRND and the other political parties and, around March 1992, the Government and the opposition signed an agreement to set up a transitional coalition government headed by a Prime Minister from the MDR. Out of the nineteen ministries, the MRND obtained only nine. Pressured by the opposition, the MRND accepted that negotiations with the RPF be started. The negotiations led to the first cease-fire in July 1992 and the first part of the Arusha Accords48. The July 1992 cease-fire tacitly recognized RPF control over a portion of Rwandan territory in the north-east. The protocols signed following these accords included the October 1992 protocol establishing a transitional government and a transitional assembly and the participation of the RPF in both institutions. The political scene was now widened to comprise three blocs: the Habyarimana bloc, the internal opposition and the RPF. Experience showed that President Habyarimana accepted these accords only because he was compelled to do so, but had no intention of complying with what he himself referred to as "un chiffon de papier", meaning a scrap of paper.

97. Yet, the RPF did not drop its objective of seizing power. It therefore increased its military attacks. The massive attack of 8 February 1993 seriously undermined the relations between the RPF and the Hutu opposition parties, making it easy for Habyarimana supporters to convene an assembly of all Hutu. Thus, the bond built on Hutu kinship once again began to prevail over political differences. The three blocs mentioned earlier gave way to two ethnic- based opposing camps: on the one hand, the RPF, the supposed canopy of all Tutsi and, on the other hand, the other parties said to be composed essentially of the Hutu.

98. In March 1992, a group of Hutu hard-liners founded a new radical political party, the Coalition pour la défense de la republique (CDR), or Coalition for the Defence of the Republic, which was more extremist than Habyarimana himself and opposed him on several occasions.

99. To make the economic, social and political conflict look more like an ethnic conflict, the President's entourage, in particular, the army, persistently launched propaganda campaigns which often consisted in fabricating events. Dr. Alison Desforges in her testimony referred to this as "mirror politics", whereby a person accuses others of what he or she does or wants to do. In this regard, in the morning hours of 5 October 1990, the Rwandan army simulated an attack on Kigali and, immediately thereafter, the Government claimed that the city had just been infiltrated by the RPF, with the help of local Tutsi accomplices. Some eight thousand Tutsi and members of the Hutu opposition were arrested the next morning. Several dozens of them died in jail. Another example of mirror politics is the March 1992 killings in Bugesera which began a week after a propaganda agent working for the Habyarimana government distributed a tract claiming that the Tutsi of that region were preparing to kill many Hutu. The MRND militia, known as Interahamwe, participated in the Bugesera killings. It was the first time that this party's militia participated in killings of this scale. They were later joined by the militia of other parties or wings of Hutu extremist parties, including, in particular, the CDR militia known as the Impuzamugambi.

100. Mirror politics was also used in Kibulira, in the north-west, and in the Bagoguye region. In both cases, the population was goaded on to defend itself against fabricated attacks supposed to have been perpetrated by RPF infiltrators and to attack and kill their Tutsi neighbours. In passing, mention should be made of the role that Radio Rwanda and, later, the RTLM, founded in 1993 by people close to President Habyarimana, played in this anti-Tutsi propaganda. Besides the radio stations, there were other propaganda agents, the most notorious of whom was a certain Léon Mugesera, vice-president of the MRND in Gisenyi Préfecture and lecturer at the National University of Rwanda, who published two pamphlets accusing the Tutsi of planning a genocide of the Hutu49. During an MRND meeting in November 1992, the same Léon Mugesera called for the extermination of the Tutsi and the assassination of Hutu opposed to the President. He made reference to the idea that the Tutsi allegedly came from Ethiopia and, hence, that after they had been killed, they should be thrown into the Rwandan tributaries of the Nile, so that they should return to where they are supposed to have come from50. He exhorted his listeners to avoid the error of earlier massacres during which some Tutsi, particularly children, were spared.

101. On the political front, a split was noticed in almost all the opposition parties on the issue of the proposed signing of a final peace agreement. This schismatic trend began with the MDR party, the main rival of the MRND, whose radical faction, later known as MDR Power, affiliated with the CDR and the MRND.

102. On 4 August 1993, the Government of Rwanda and the RPF signed the final Arusha Accords and ended the war which started on 1 October 1990. The Accords provided, inter alia, for the establishment of a transitional government to include the RPF, the partial demobilization and integration of the two opposing armies (13,000 RPF and 35,000 FAR troops), the creation of a demilitarized zone between the RPF-controlled area in the north and the rest of the country, the stationing of an RPF battalion in the city of Kigali, and the deployment, in four phases, of a UN peace-keeping force, the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR), with a two-year mandate.

103. On 23 October 1993, the President of Burundi, Melchior Ndadaye, a Hutu, was assassinated in the course of an attempted coup by Burundi Tutsi soldiers. Dr. Alison Desforges testified that in Rwanda, Hutu extremists exploited this assassination to prove that it was impossible to agree with the Tutsi, since they would always turn against their Hutu partners to kill them. A meeting held at the Kigali stadium at the end of October 1993 was entirely devoted to the discussion of the assassination of President Ndadaye, and in a very virulent speech, Froduald Karamira, senior national vice-President of the Interahamwe, is alleged to have called for unreserved solidarity among all the Hutu, solidarity transcending the divide of political parties. He reportedly concluded his speech with a call for "Hutu-Power".

104. The assassination of President Ndadaye gave President Habyarimana and the CDR the opportunity to denounce, in a joint MRND - CDR statement issued at the end of 1993, the Arusha Accords, calling them treason. However, a few days later, pursuing his policy of prevarication towards the international community, Habyarimana signed another part of the peace accords. Indeed, the Arusha Accords no longer existed, except on paper. The President certainly did take the oath of office, but the installation of a transitional government was delayed, mainly by divisions within the political parties and the ensuing infightings.

105. The leaders of the CDR and the PSD were assassinated in February 1994. In Kigali, in the days that followed, the Interahamwe and the Impuzamugambi massacred Tutsi as well as Habyarimana's Hutu opponents. The Belgian Foreign Minister informed his representative at the UN of the worsening situation which "could result in an irreversible explosion of violence"51 . At the same time, as he stated in his testimony before the Tribunal, UNAMIR commander, Major-General Dallaire, alerted the United Nations in New York of the discovery of arms caches and requested a change in UNAMIR's engagement rules to enable him to seize the arms; but the request was turned down. Meanwhile, anti-Tutsi propaganda on the media intensified. The RTLM constantly stepped up its attacks which became increasingly targeted and violent.

106. At the end of March 1994, the transitional government was still not set up and Rwanda was on the brink of bankruptcy. International donors and neighbouring countries put pressure on the Habyarimana government to implement the Arusha Accords.
On 6 April 1994, President Habyarimana and other heads of State of the region met in Dar-es-Salaam (Tanzania) to discuss the implementation of the peace accords. The aircraft carrying President Habyarimana and the Burundian President, Ntaryamirai, who were returning from the meeting, crashed around 8:30 pm near Kigali airport. All aboard were killed.

107. The Rwandan army and the militia immediately erected roadblocks around the city of Kigali. Before dawn on April 7 1994, in various parts of the country, the Presidential Guard and the militia started killing the Tutsi as well as Hutu known to be in favour of the Arusha Accords and power-sharing between the Tutsi and the Hutu. Among the first victims, were a number of ministers of the coalition government, including its Prime Minister, Agathe Uwilingiyimana (MDR), the president of the Supreme Court and virtually the entire leadership of the parti social démocrate (PSD). The constitutional vacuum thus created cleared the way for the establishment of the self-proclaimed Hutu-power interim government, mainly under the aegis of retired Colonel Théoneste Bagosora.

108. Soldiers of the Rwandan Armed Forces (FAR) executed ten Belgian blue helmets, thereby provoking the withdrawal of the Belgian contingent which formed the core of UNAMIR. On April 21 1994, the UN Security Council decided to reduce the peace-keeping force to 450 troops.

109. In the afternoon of 7 April 1994, RPF troops left their quarters in Kigali and their zone in the north, to resume open war against the Rwandan Armed Forces. Its troops from the north moved south, crossing the demilitarized zone, and entered the city of Kigali on April 12 1994, thus forcing the interim government to flee to Gitarama.

110. On April 12 1994, after public authorities announced over Radio Rwanda that "we need to unite against the enemy , the only enemy and this is the enemy that we have always known...it's the enemy who wants to reinstate the former feudal monarchy", it became clear that the Tutsi were the primary targets. During the week of 14 to 21 April 1994, the killing campaign reached its peak. The President of the interim government, the Prime Minister and some key ministers travelled to Butare and Gikongoro and that marked the beginning of killings in these regions which had hitherto been peaceful. Thousands of people, sometimes encouraged or directed by local administrative officials, on the promise of safety, gathered unsuspectingly in churches, schools, hospitals and local government buildings. In reality, this was a trap intended to lead to the rapid extermination of a large number of people.

111. The killing of Tutsi which henceforth spared neither women nor children, continued up to 18 July 1994, when the RPF triumphantly entered Kigali. The estimated total number of victims in the conflict varies from 500,000 to 1,000,000 or more.

3. GENOCIDE IN RWANDA IN 1994?

112. As regards the massacres which took place in Rwanda between April and July 1994, as detailed above in the chapter on the historical background to the Rwandan tragedy, the question before this Chamber is whether they constitute genocide. Indeed, it was felt in some quarters52 that the tragic events which took place in Rwanda were only part of the war between the Rwandan Armed Forces (the RAF) and the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF). The answer to this question would allow a better understanding of the context within which the crimes with which the accused is charged are alleged to have been committed.

113. According to paragraph 2 of Article 2 of the Statute of the Tribunal, which reflects verbatim the definition of genocide as contained in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (hereinafter, "the Convention on Genocide")53, genocide means any of the following acts referred to in said paragraph, committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group as such, namely, inter alia: killing members of the group; causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group.

114. Even though the number of victims is yet to be known with accuracy, no one can reasonably refute the fact that widespread killings were perpetrated throughout Rwanda in 1994.

115. Indeed, this is confirmed by the many testimonies heard by this Chamber. The testimony of Dr. Zachariah who appeared before this Chamber on 16 and 17 January 1997 is enlightening in this regard. Dr. Zachariah was a physician who at the time of the events was working for a non-governmental organisation, "Médecins sans frontières." In 1994 he was based in Butare and travelled over a good part of Rwanda upto its border with Burundi. He described in great detail the heaps of bodies which he saw everywhere, on the roads, on the footpaths and in rivers and, particularly, the manner in which all these people had been killed. At the church in Butare, at the Gahidi mission, he saw many wounded persons in the hospital who, according to him, were all Tutsi and who, apparently, had sustained wounds inflicted with machetes to the face, the neck, and also to the ankle, at the Achilles' tendon, to prevent them from fleeing. The testimony given by Major-General Dallaire, former Commander of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda (UNAMIR) at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, who was called by the defence, is of a similar vein. Major-General Dallaire spoke of troops of the Rwandan Armed Forces and of the Presidential Guard going into houses in Kigali that had been previously identified in order to kill. He also talked about the terrible murders in Kabgayi, very near Gitarama, where the interim Government was based and of the reports he received from observers throughout the country which mentioned killings in Gisenyi, Cyangugu and Kibongo.

116. The British cameraman, Simon Cox, took photographs of bodies in many churches in Remera, Biambi, Shangi, between Cyangugu and Kibuye, and in Bisesero. He mentioned identity cards strewn on the ground, all of which were marked "Tutsi". Consequently, in view of these widespread killings the victims of which were mainly Tutsi, the Chamber is of the opinion that the first requirement for there be genocide has been met, the killing and causing serious bodily harm to members of a group.

117. The second requirement is that these killings and serious bodily harm, as is the case in this instance, be committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a particular group targeted as such.

118. In the opinion of the Chamber, there is no doubt that considering their undeniable scale, their systematic nature and their atrociousness, the massacres were aimed at exterminating the group that was targeted. Many facts show that the intention of the perpetrators of these killings was to cause the complete disappearance of the Tutsi. In this connection, Alison Desforges, an expert witness, in her testimony before this Chamber on 25 February 1997, stated as follows: "on the basis of the statements made by certain political leaders, on the basis of songs and slogans popular among the Interahamwe, I believe that these people had the intention of completely wiping out the Tutsi from Rwanda so that-as they said on certain occasions - their children , later on , would not know what a Tutsi looked like, unless they referred to history books". Moreover, this testimony given by Dr. Desforges was confirmed by two prosecution witnesses, witness KK and witness OO, who testified separately before the Tribunal that one Silas Kubwimana had said during a public meeting chaired by the accused himself that all the Tutsi had to be killed so that someday Hutu children would not know what a Tutsi looked like.

119. Furthermore, as mentioned above, Dr. Zachariah also testified that the Achilles' tendons of many wounded persons were cut to prevent them from fleeing. In the opinion of the Chamber, this demonstrates the resolve of the perpetrators of these massacres not to spare any Tutsi. Their plan called for doing whatever was possible to prevent any Tutsi from escaping and, thus, to destroy the whole group. Witness OO further told the Chamber that during the same meeting, a certain Ruvugama, who was then a Member of Parliament, had stated that he would rest only when no single Tutsi is left in Rwanda".

120. Dr. Alison Desforges testified that many Tutsi bodies were often systematically thrown into the Nyabarongo river, a tributary of the Nile. Indeed, this has been corroborated by several images shown to the Chamber throughout the trial. She explained that the underlying intention of this act was to "send the Tutsi back to their place of origin", to "make them return to Abyssinia", in keeping with the allegation that the Tutsi are foreigners in Rwanda, where they are supposed to have settled following their arrival from the Nilotic regions.54

121. Other testimonies heard, especially that of Major-General Dallaire, also show that there was an intention to wipe out the Tutsi group in its entirety, since even newborn babies were not spared. Even pregnant women, including those of Hutu origin, were killed on the grounds that the foetuses in their wombs were fathered by Tutsi men, for in a patrilineal society like Rwanda, the child belongs to the father's group of origin. In this regard, it is worthwhile noting the testimony of witness PP, heard by the Chamber on 11 April 1997, who mentioned a statement made publicly by the accused to the effect that if a Hutu woman were impregnated by a Tutsi man, the Hutu woman had to be found in order "for the pregnancy to be aborted". According to prosecution witnesses KK, PP and OO, the accused expressed this opinion on other occasions in the form of a Rwandese proverb according to which if a snake wraps itself round a calabash, there is nothing that can be done, except to break the calabash' (" Iyo inzoka yiziritse ku gisabo, nta kundi bigenda barakimena)55. In the context of the period in question, this proverb meant that if a Hutu woman married to a Tutsi man was impregnated by him, the foetus had to be destroyed so that the Tutsi child which it would become should not survive. It should be noted in this regard that in Rwandese culture, breaking the "gisabo", which is a big calabash used as a churn was considered taboo. Yet, if a snake wraps itself round a gisabo, obviously, one has no choice but to ignore this taboo in order to kill the snake.

122. In light of the foregoing, it is now appropriate for the Chamber to consider the issue of specific intent that is required for genocide (mens rea or dolus specialis). In other words, it should be established that the above-mentioned acts were targeted at a particular group as such. In this respect also, many consistent and reliable testimonies , especially those of Major-General Dallaire, Dr. Zachariah, victim V, prosecution witness PP, defence witness DAAX, and particularly that of the accused himself unanimously agree on the fact that it was the Tutsi as members of an ethnic group which they formed in the context of the period56 in question, who were targeted during the massacres57.

123. Two facts, in particular, which suggest that it was indeed the Tutsi who were targeted should be highlighted: Firstly, at the roadblocks which were erected in Kigali immediately after the crash of the President's plane on 6 April 1994 and, later on, in most of the country's localities, members of the Tutsi population were sorted out. Indeed, at these roadblocks which were manned, depending on the situation, either by soldiers, troops of the Presidential Guard and/or militiamen, the systematic checking of identity cards indicating the ethnic group of their holders, allowed the separation of Hutu from Tutsi, with the latter being immediately apprehended and killed, sometimes on the spot. Secondly, the propaganda campaign conducted before and during the tragedy by the audiovisual media, for example, "Radio Television des Milles Collines"(RTLM), or the print media, like the Kangura58 newspaper. These various news media overtly called for the killing of Tutsi, who were considered as the accomplices of the RPF and accused of plotting to take over the power lost during the revolution of 1959. Some articles and cartoons carried in the Kangura newspaper, entered in evidence, are unambiguous in this respect. In fact, even exhibit 25A could be added to this lot. Exhibit 25A is a letter from the "GZ" staff headquarters dated 21 September 1992 and signed by Deofratas Nsabimana, Colonel, BEM, to which is annexed a document prepared by a committee of ten officers and which deals with the definition of the term enemy. According to that document, which was intended for the widest possible dissemination, the enemy fell into two categories, namely:" the primary enemy" and the "enemy supporter". The primary enemy was defined as "the extremist Tutsi within the country or abroad who are nostalgic for power and who have NEVER acknowledged and STILL DO NOT acknowledge the realities of the Social Revolution of 1959, and who wish to regain power in RWANDA by all possible means, including the use of weapons". On the other hand, the primary enemy supporter was "anyone who lent support in whatever form to the primary enemy". This document also stated that the primary enemy and their supporters came mostly from social groups comprising, in particular, "Tutsi refugees", "Tutsi within the country", "Hutu dissatisfied with the current regime", "Foreigners married to Tutsi women" and the "Nilotic-hamitic tribes in the region".

124. In the opinion of the Chamber, all this proves that it was indeed a particular group, the Tutsi ethnic group, which was targeted. Clearly, the victims were not chosen as individuals but, indeed, because they belonged to said group; and hence the victims were members of this group selected as such. According to Alison Desforges's testimony, the Tutsi were killed solely on account of having been born Tutsi.

125. Clearly therefore, the massacres which occurred in Rwanda in 1994 had a specific objective, namely the extermination of the Tutsi, who were targeted especially because of their Tutsi origin and not because they were RPF fighters. In any case, the Tutsi children and pregnant women would, naturally, not have been among the fighters.

126. Consequently, the Chamber concludes from all the foregoing that genocide was, indeed, committed in Rwanda in 1994 against the Tutsi as a group. Furthermore, in the opinion of the Chamber, this genocide appears to have been meticulously organized. In fact, Dr. Alison Desforges testifying before the Chamber on 24 May 1997, talked of "centrally organized and supervised massacres". Indeed, some evidence supports this view that the genocide had been planned. First, the existence of lists of Tutsi to be eliminated is corroborated by many testimonies. In this respect, Dr. Zachariah mentioned the case of patients and nurses killed in a hospital because a soldier had a list including their names. There are also the arms caches in Kigali which Major-General Dallaire mentioned and regarding whose destruction he had sought the UN's authorization in vain. Lastly, there is the training of militiamen by the Rwandan Armed Forces and of course, the psychological preparation of the population to attack the Tutsi, which preparation was masterminded by some news media, with the RTLM at the forefront.

127. Finally, in response to the question posed earlier in this chapter as to whether the tragic events that took place in Rwanda in 1994 occurred solely within the context of the conflict between the RAF and the RPF, the Chamber replies in the negative, since it holds that the genocide did indeed take place against the Tutsi group, alongside the conflict. The execution of this genocide was probably facilitated by the conflict, in the sense that the fighting against the RPF forces was used as a pretext for the propaganda inciting genocide against the Tutsi, by branding RPF fighters and Tutsi civilians together, through dissemination via the media of the idea that every Tutsi was allegedly an accomplice of the Inkotanyi. Very clearly, once the genocide got under way, the crime became one of the stakes in the conflict between the RPF and the RAF. In 1994, General Kagame, speaking on behalf of the RPF, declared that a cease fire could possibly not be implemented until the massacre of civilians by the government forces59 had stopped.

128. In conclusion, it should be stressed that although the genocide against the Tutsi occurred concomitantly with the above-mentioned conflict, it was, evidently, fundamentally different from the conflict. The accused himself stated during his initial appearance before the Chamber, when recounting a conversation he had with one RAF officer and Silas Kubwimana, a leader of the Interahamwe, that the acts perpetrated by the Interahamwe against Tutsi civilians were not considered by the RAF officer to be of a nature to help the government armed forces in the conflict with the RPF60. Note is also taken of the testimony of witness KK which is in the same vein. This witness told the Chamber that while she and the children were taken away, an RAF soldier allegedly told persons who were persecuting her that "instead of going to confront the Inkotanyi at the war front, you are killing children, although children know nothing; they have never done politics". The Chamber's opinion is that the genocide was organized and planned not only by members of the RAF, but also by the political forces who were behind the "Hutu-power", that it was executed essentially by civilians including the armed militia and even ordinary citizens, and above all, that the majority of the Tutsi victims were non-combatants, including thousands of women and children, even foetuses. The fact that the genocide took place while the RAF was in conflict with the RPF, can in no way be considered as an extenuating circumstance for it.

129. This being the case, the Chamber holds that the fact that genocide was indeed committed in Rwanda in 1994 and more particularly in Taba, cannot influence it in its decisions in the present case. Its sole task is to assess the individual criminal responsibility of the accused for the crimes with which he is charged, the burden of proof being on the Prosecutor61. In spite of the irrefutable atrocities of the crimes committed in Rwanda, the judges must examine the facts adduced in a most dispassionate manner, bearing in mind that the accused is presumed innocent Moreover, the seriousness of the charges brought against the accused makes it all the more necessary to examine scrupulously and meticulously all the inculpatory and exonerating evidence, in the context of a fair trial and in full resect of all the rights of the Accused.

4. EVIDENTIARY MATTERS

130. The Chamber will address certain general evidentiary matters of concern which arose in relation to the evidence produced by the parties during this trial. These matters include the assessment of evidence, the impact of trauma on witnesses, questions of interpretation from Kinyarwanda into French and English, and cultural factors which might affect an understanding of the evidence presented.

Assessment of Evidence

131. In its assessment of the evidence, as a general principle, the Chamber has attached probative value to each testimony and each exhibit individually according to its credibility and relevance to the allegations at issue. As commonly provided for in most national criminal proceedings, the Chamber has considered the charges against the accused on the basis of the testimony and exhibits offered by the parties to support or challenge the allegations made in the Indictment. In seeking to establish the truth in its judgment, the Chamber has relied as well on indisputable facts and on other elements relevant to the case, such as constitutive documents pertaining to the establishment and jurisdiction of the Tribunal, even if these were not specifically tendered in evidence by the parties during trial. The Chamber notes that it is not restricted under the Statute of the Tribunal to apply any particular legal system and is not bound by any national rules of evidence. In accordance with Rule 89 of its Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the Chamber has applied the rules of evidence which in its view best favour a fair determination of the matter before it and are consonant with the spirit and general principles of law.

Unus Testis, Nullus Testis

132. The Chamber notes that during trial, only one testimony was presented in support of certain facts alleged in the Indictment; hence the question arises as to the principle found in Civil Law systems: unus testis, nullus testis (one witness is no witness) whereby corroboration of evidence is required if it is to be admitted.

133. Without wishing to delve into a debate on the applicability of the rule of corroboration of evidence in this judgment, the Chamber recalls that the proceedings before it are conducted in accordance solely with the Statute of the Tribunal and its Rules and, as provided for by Rule 89(A), it shall not be bound by national rules of evidence. Furthermore, where evidentiary matters are concerned, the Chamber is bound only to the application of the provisions of its Statute and Rules, in particular Rule 89 of the Rules which sets out the general principle of the admissibility of any relevant evidence which has probative value, provided that it is in accordance with the requisites of a fair trial.

134. Rule 96(i) of the Rules alone specifically deals with the issue of corroboration of testimony required by the Chamber. The provisions of this Rule, which apply only to cases of testimony by victims of sexual assault, stipulate that no corroboration shall be required. In the Tadic judgment rendered by the ICTY, the Trial Chamber ruled that this "Sub-rule accords to the testimony of a victim of sexual assault the same presumption of reliability as the testimony of victims of other crimes, something which had long been denied to victims of sexual assault in common law [which] certainly does not [...] justify any inference that in cases of crimes other than sexual assault, corroboration is required. The proper inference is, in fact, directly to the contrary"62.

135. In view of the above, the Chamber can rule on the basis of a single testimony provided such testimony is, in its opinion, relevant and credible.

136. The Chamber can freely assess the probative value of all relevant evidence. The Chamber had thus determined that in accordance with Rule 89, any relevant evidence having probative value may be admitted into evidence, provided that it is being in accordance with the requisites of a fair trial. The Chamber finds that hearsay evidence is not inadmissible per se and has considered such evidence, with caution, in accordance with Rule 89.

Witness statements

137. During the trial, the Prosecutor and the Defence relied on pre-trial statements from witnesses for the purpose of cross-examination. The Chamber ordered that any such statements to which reference was made in the proceedings be submitted in evidence for consideration63. In many instances, the Defence has alleged inconsistencies and contradictions between the pre-trial statements of witnesses and their evidence at trial. The Chamber notes that these pre-trial statements were composed following interviews with witnesses by investigators of the Office of the Prosecution. These interviews were mostly conducted in Kinyarwanda, and the Chamber did not have access to transcripts of the interviews, but only translations thereof. It was therefore unable to consider the nature and form of the questions put to the witnesses, or the accuracy of interpretation at the time. The Chamber has considered inconsistencies and contradictions between these statements and testimony at trial with caution for these reasons, and in the light of the time lapse between the statements and the presentation of evidence at trial, the difficulties of recollecting precise details several years after the occurrence of the events, the difficulties of translation, and the fact that several witnesses were illiterate and stated that they had not read their written statements. Moreover, the statements were not made under solemn declaration and were not taken by judicial officers. In the circumstances, the probative value attached to the statements is, in the Chamber's view, considerably less than direct sworn testimony before the Chamber, the truth of which has been subjected to the test of cross-examination.

False testimony

138. Rule 91 of the Rules (False Testimony under Solemn Declaration) provides for, inter alia, the investigation and possible prosecution of a witness whom the Chamber believes may have knowingly and wilfully given false testimony. As held by the Chamber in its decision rendered thereon in relation to a Defence motion requesting the Chamber to direct the Prosecutor to investigate the alleged false testimony by a witness 64, Rule 91(B) provides:

> Either the Chamber establishes proprio motu that strong grounds exist for believing that a witness has knowingly and wilfully given false testimony, and thence directs the Prosecutor to investigate the matter with a view to the preparation and submission of an Indictment for false testimony;
> Or, at the request of a party, it invites the Prosecutor to investigate the matter with a view to the preparation and submission of an Indictment for false testimony; and in this case, the onus is on the party to convince the Chamber that there exist strong grounds for believing that a witness has knowingly and wilfully given false testimony;

139. Further, the Chamber held in the decision, that the onus is on the party pleading a case of false testimony to prove the falsehoods of the witness statements, that they were made with harmful intent, or at least that they were made by a witness who was fully aware that they were false, and their possible bearing upon the judge's decisions. The Chamber found that for the Defence to raise only doubts as to the credibility of the statements made by the witness was not sufficient to establish strong grounds for believing that the witness may have knowingly and wilfully given false testimony, and that the assessment of credibility pertains to the rendering of the final judgment.

140. The majority of the witnesses who appeared before the Chamber were eye-witnesses, whose testimonies were based on events they had seen or heard in relation to the acts alleged in the Indictment. The Chamber noted that during the trial, for a number of these witnesses, there appeared to be contradictions or inaccuracies between, on the one hand, the content of their testimonies under solemn declaration to the Chamber, and on the other, their earlier statements to the Prosecutor and the Defence. This alone is not a ground for believing that the witnesses gave false testimony. Indeed, an often levied criticism of testimony is its fallibility. Since testimony is based mainly on memory and sight, two human characteristics which often deceive the individual, this criticism is to be expected. Hence, testim[illegible] rarely exact at to the events experienced. To deduce from any resultant contradictions and inacc[illegible] that there was false testimony, would be akin to criminalising frailties in human perceptions. Moreover, inaccuracies and contradictions between the said statements and the testimony given before the Court are also the result of the time lapse between the two. Memory over time naturally degenerates, hence it would be wrong and unjust for the Chamber to treat forgetfulness as being synonymous with giving false testimony. Moreover, false testimony requires the necessary mens rea and not a mere wrongful statement.

141. Were the Chamber to have strong grounds for believing that the witness had knowingly and wilfully given false testimony, with the intent to impede the due process of Justice, then Rule 91 of the Rules would be applied accordingly.

The impact of trauma on the testimony of witnesses

142. Many of the eye-witnesses who testified before the Chamber in this case have seen atrocities committed against their family members or close friends, and/or have themselves been the victims of such atrocities. The possible traumatism of these witnesses caused by their painful experience of violence during the conflict in Rwanda is a matter of particular concern to the Chamber. The recounting of this traumatic experience is likely to evoke memories of the fear and the pain once inflicted on the witness and thereby affect his or her ability fully or adequately to recount the sequence of events in a judicial context. The Chamber has considered the testimony of those witnesses in this light.

143. The Chamber is unable to exclude the possibility that some or all of these witnesses did actually suffer from post traumatic or extreme stress disorders, and has therefore carefully perused the testimonies of these witnesses, those of the Prosecutor as well as those of the Defence, on the assumption that this might possibly have been the case. Inconsistencies or imprecisions in the testimonies, accordingly, have been assessed in the light of this assumption, personal background and the atrocities they have experienced or have been subjected to. Much as the Witness Protection Programme and the orders for protection of witnesses issued by the Chamber during this trial were designed primarily to reduce the danger for witnesses in coming to the Tribunal to testify, these measures may also have provided for some alleviation of stress. Reducing the physical danger to the witnesses in Rwanda, and ordering the non-disclosure of their identities to the media and the public, as well as accommodating them during their presence at the seat of the Tribunal in safe houses where medical and psychiatric assistance was available, are, in any event, measures conducive to easing the level of stress.

144. The Chamber has thanked each witness for his or her testimony during the trial proceedings and wishes to acknowledge in its judgment the strength and courage of survivors who have recounted their traumatic experiences, often reliving extremely painful emotions. Their testimony has been invaluable to the Chamber in its pursuit of truth regarding the events which took place in the commune of Taba in 1994.

Interpretation from Kinyarwanda into French and English

145. The majority of the witnesses in this trial testified in Kinyarwanda. The Chamber notes that the interpretation of oral testimony of witnesses from Kinyarwanda into one of the official languages of the Tribunal has been a particularly great challenge due to the fact that the syntax and everyday modes of expression in the Kinyarwanda language are complex and difficult to translate into French or English. These difficulties affected the pre-trial interviews carried out by investigators in the field, as well as the interpretation of examination and cross-examination during proceedings in Court. Most of the testimony of witnesses at trial was given in the language, Kinyarwanda, first interpreted into French, and then from French into English. This process entailed obvious risks of misunderstandings in the English version of words spoken in the source language by the witness in Kinyarwanda. For this reason, in cases where the transcripts differ in English and French, the Chamber has relied on the French transcript for accuracy. In some cases, where the words spoken are central to the factual and legal findings of the Chamber, the words have been reproduced in this judgment in the original Kinyarwanda.

146. The words Inkotanyi, Inyenzi, Icyitso/Ibyitso, Interahamwe and the expressions used in Kinyarwanda for "rape", because of their significance to the findings of the Chamber, are considered particularly, as follows: The Chamber has relied substantially on the testimony of Dr. Mathias Ruzindana, an expert witness on linguistics, for its understanding of these terms. The Chamber notes that Dr. Ruzindana stated in his testimony that in ascertaining the specific meaning of certain words and expressions in Kinyarwanda, it is necessary to place them contextually, both in time and in space.

147. The origin of the term Inkotanyi can be traced back to the 19th Century, at which time it was the name of one of the warrior groups of a Rwandese king, King Rwabugiris. There is no evidence to suggest that this warrior group was monoethnic. Dr. Ruzindana suggested that the name Inkotanyi was borne with pride by these warriors. At the start of the war between the RPF and the Government of Rwanda, the RPF army wing was called Inkotanyi. As such, it should be assumed that the basic meaning of the term Inkotanyi is the RPF army. Based on the analysis of a number of Rwandan newspapers and RTLM cassettes, as well as his personal experiences during the conflict, Dr. Ruzindana believed the term Inkotanyi had a number of extended meanings, including RPF sympathizer or supporter, and, in some instances, it even seemed to make reference to Tutsi as an ethnic group.

148. The basic everyday meaning of the term Inyenzi is cockroach. Other meanings of the term stem from the history of Rwanda. During the revolution' of 1959, refugees, mainly Tutsi, fled the country. Throughout the 1960's incursions on Rwandan soil were carried out by some of these refugees, who would enter and leave the country under the cover of the night, only rarely to be seen in the morning. This activity was likened to that of cockroaches, which are rarely seen during the day but often discovered at night, and accordingly these attackers were called Inyenzi. A similar comparison, between insurgent Tutsi refugees and cockroaches, was made when the RPF army carried out a number of attacks in Rwanda in 1990. It was thought that the Inyenzi of 1990 were the children of the Inyenzi of the 1960's. "The cockroach begets another cockroach and not a butterfly" was an article heading in the magazine Kangura. Another article in this publication made the reference even more explicitly, saying "The war between us and the Inyenzi-Inkotanyi has lasted for too long. It is time we told the truth. The present war is a war between Hutu and Tutsi. It has not started today, it is an old one."65

149. Unlike the term Inkotanyi, the term Inyenzi had a negative, even abusive, connotation. The radio station RTLM broadcast on 20 April 1994, "They are a gang of Tutsi extremists who called themselves Inkotanyi while they are no more than Inyenzi," and in a speech on 22 November 1992, Léon Mugesera said "Don't call them Inkotanyi, they are true Inyenzi". The term Inyenzi was widely used by extremist media, by those who had refused to accept the Arusha Peace Accords and those who wanted to exterminate the Tutsi, in whole or in part. It was often contained in RTLM broadcasts, a radio which, in the opinion of Dr. Ruzindana, was anti-Tutsi in its broadcastings.66

150. The term Icyitso, or Ibyitso in the plural, has been in usage in Kinyarwanda for quite some time. It is a common term which means accomplice. In ancient Rwandan history, a king wanting to launch an attack on neighbouring countries would send spies to the targeted country. These spies would recruit collaborators who would be known as Ibyitso. In Rwanda, the term has a negative connotation. Thus it should not be seen as being synonymous with supporter', a term which can be viewed both positively and negatively, but perhaps rather "collaborator". The term evolved, as early as 1991, to include not only collaborators, but all Tutsi. The editor of Kangura stated in 1993, "When the war started, Hutu ta openly about the Tutsi, or they referred to them, indirectly, calling them Ibyitso"67.

151. The term Interahamwe derives from two words put together to make a noun, intera and hamwe. Intera comes from the verb gutera' which can mean both to attack and to work. It was documented that in 1994, besides meaning to work or to attack, the word gutera could also mean to kill. Hamwe means together. Therefore Interahamwe could mean to attack or to work together, and, depending on the context, to kill together. The Interahamwe were the youth movement of the MRND. During the war, the term also covered anyone who had anti-Tutsi tendencies, irrespective of their political background, and who collaborated with the MRND youth.

152. The terms gusambanya, kurungora, kuryamana and gufata ku ngufu were used interchangeably by witnesses and translated by the interpreters as "rape". The Chamber has consulted its official trial interpreters to gain a precise understanding of these words and how they have been interpreted. The word gusambanya means "to bring (a person) to commit adultery or fornication". The word kurungora means "to have sexual intercourse with a woman". This term is used regardless of whether the woman is married or not, and regardless of whether she gives consent or not. The word kuryamana means "to share a bed" or "to have sexual intercourse", depending on the context. It seems similar to the colloquial usage in English and in French of the term "to sleep with". The term gufata ku ngufu means "to take (anything) by force" and also "to rape".

153. The context in which these terms are used is critical to an understanding of their meaning and their translation. The dictionary entry for kurungora 68, the most generic term for sexual intercourse, includes as an example of usage of this word, the sentence "Mukantwali yahuye n'abasore batatu baramwambura baramurongora," for which the dictionary translation into French is "Mukantwali a recontré trois jeunes gens qui l'ont dévalisée et violée" (in English "Mukantwali met three young men who robbed her of her belongings and raped her.")

154. The Chamber notes that the accused objected on one occasion to the translation of the words stated by Witness JJ ("Batangira kujya babafata ku ngufu babakoresha ibyo bashaka") as "They began to rape them." It was clarified that the witness said "they had their way with them." The Chamber notes that in this instance the term used, babafata ku ngufu, is the term which of the four terms identified in the paragraph above is the term most closely connected to the concept of force. Having reviewed in detail with the official trial interpreters the references to "rape" in the transcript, the Chamber is satisfied that the Kinyarwanda expressions have been accurately translated.

Cultural Factors Affecting the Evidence of Witnesses

155. Dr. Mathias Ruzindana noted that most Rwandans live in an oral tradition in which facts are reported as they are perceived by the witness, often irrespective of whether the facts were personally witnessed or recounted by someone else. Since not many people are literate or own a radio, much of the information disseminated by the press in 1994 was transmitted to a larger number of secondary listeners by word of mouth, which inevitably carries the hazard of distortion of the information each time it is passed on to a new listener. Similarly, with regard to events in Taba, the Chamber noted that on examination it was at times clarified that evidence which had been reported as an eyewitness account was in fact a second-hand account of what was witnessed. Dr. Ruzindana explained this as a common phenomenon within the culture, but also confirmed that the Rwandan community was like any other and that a clear distinction could be articulated by the witnesses between what they had heard and what they had seen. The Chamber made a consistent effort to ensure that this distinction was drawn throughout the trial proceedings.

156. According to the testimony of Dr. Ruzindana, it is a particular feature of the Rwandan culture that people are not always direct in answering questions, especially if the question is delicate. In such cases the answers given will very often have to be "decoded" in order to be understood correctly. This interpretation will rely on the context, the particular speech community, the identity of and the relation between the orator and the listener, and the subject matter of the question. The Chamber noted this in the proceedings. For example, many witnesses when asked the ordinary meaning of the term Inyenzi were reluctant or unwilling to state that the word meant cockroach, although it became clear to the Chamber during the course of the proceedings that any Rwandan would know the ordinary meaning of the word. Similar cultural constraints were evident in their difficulty to be specific as to dates, times, distances and locations. The Chamber also noted the inexperience of witnesses with maps, film and graphic representations of localities, in the light of this understanding, the Chamber did not draw any adverse conclusions regarding the credibility of witnesses based only on their reticence and their sometimes circuitous responses to questions.

5. FACTUAL FINDINGS

5.1. General allegations (Paragraphs 5-11 of the Indictment)

Events Alleged

157. Paragraphs 5 to 11 of the indictment appear under the heading, "General Allegations". These general allegations are, for the most part, mixed questions of fact and law relating to the general elements of genocide, crimes against humanity, and violations of international humanitarian law, the crimes set forth in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute of the Tribunal, under which the Accused is charged. Several witnesses testified before the Chamber with regard to historical background and the general situation in Rwanda prior to and during 1994. The Chamber has substantially relied on the testimonies of Dr. Ronie Zachariah, Ms. Lindsey Hilson, Mr. Simon Cox, Dr. Alison Desforges, who testified as an expert witness, and General Romeo Dallaire, the force commander of UNAMIR at the time of these events as well as United Nations reports of which it takes judicial notice, for its general findings on the factual allegations set forth in paragraphs 5-11 of the indictment.

158. Dr. Zachariah, the Chief Medical and Field Coordinator for Medecins sans frontieres ("MSF"), based in the Butare region, testified that he witnessed widespread massacres of civilians in Rwanda from 13 to 24 April 1994. He stated that he travelled from Butare to Gitarama on 13 April 1994 in order to provide medical supplies to a hospital in Gitarama which had received 40 to 50 injured people. From 25 kilometres outside Gitarama, Dr. Zachariah said he and his team began to see refugees on the road, who reported the killings of civilians at roadblocks. At one of these barriers, Dr. Zachariah stated that his driver was treated aggressively by a guard manning the roadblock, because the driver was Tutsi and the Tutsi were accused of helping the RPF. Dr. Zachariah testified that it soon became apparent upon arrival at Gitarama Hospital that Tutsi civilians were being targeted for attack on a massive scale. Subsequently, Dr. Zachariah witnessed attacks on civilian populations, and killings of civilians. He recounted visiting Kibeho Church on 16 April 1994, where two to four thousand Tutsi civilians were apparently killed, and Butare on 17 April 1994, where a Burundian Tutsi was apparently beaten to death at a checkpoint, and where his purchase officer reported seeing the bodies of 5-10 dead civilians at every checkpoint on the road from Kigali. These checkpoints were apparently manned by well-armed, drunken soldiers and civilians. On the road from Butare to Burundi on 19 April 1994, Dr. Zachariah sated that saw civilians being massacred in villages throughout the countryside and at roadblocks. In his words:

> "All the way through we could see on the [...] hillside, where there were communities, people [...] being pulled out by people with machetes, and we could see piles of bodies. In fact the entire landscape was becoming spotted with corpses, with bodies, all the way from there until almost Burundi's border".

(Hearing of 16 January 1997, pp 98-99)

159. At the Rwanda-Burundi border, on the same day, Dr. Zachariah testified that he saw a group of 60 to 80 civilians fleeing towards the Burundian border, from men armed with machetes. He stated that most of these civilians were hacked to death before they reached the border. Returning from the Burundian border, on 21 April 1994, Dr Zachariah stated that he had spoken to eye-witnesses who had informed him of the killings of approximately 40 Tutsi MSF personnel, in the Saga camps in Butare. He stated that his driver's entire family had been killed on the outskirts of Butare by Interahamwe and he had been informed of these killings by his driver who had managed to escape death. Dr. Zachariah testified that he had witnessed, on 22 April 1994, the aftermath of the massacre of the family of a moderate Hutu, Mr. Souphene, the sub-Prefect of Butare, by the Presidential Guard, and, on the same day, the killings of children in the Hotel Pascal in Butare and the executions of tens of Tutsi patients and nurses in Butare Hospital, including a Hutu nurse who was pregnant by a Tutsi man and whose child would therefore be Tutsi. Dr. Zachariah stated that he then decided to evacuate his team from Rwanda and he arrived at the Burundian border on 24 April 1994. On the way to the border and at the border, he stated that he had crossed streams and rivers in which the mutilated corpses of men, women and children floated by at an estimated rate of five bodies every minute. Dr. Zachariah stated under cross-examination that in his opinion the attacks were both "organised and systematic".

160. Lindsey Hilson, a journalist, testified that she was in Kigali from 7 February 1994 to mid-April 1994. Following the aeroplane crash of 6 April 1994 in which the Presidents of Rwanda and Burundi were killed, she said she heard from others and saw for herself the ensuing killings of Tutsi in the capital. On the third day after the aeroplane crash, she toured Kigali with aid workers and saw victims suffering from machete and gunshot wounds. In Kigali central hospital, where she described the situation as "absolutely terrible", wounded men, women and children of all ages were packed into the wards, and hospital gutters were "running red with blood". At the morgue she saw "a big pile like a mountain of bodies outside and these were bodies with slash wounds, with heads smashed in, many of them naked, men and women". She estimated that the pile outside the morgue contained about five hundred bodies, with more bodies being brought in all the time by pickup trucks. She stated that she also saw teams of convicts around Kigali collecting bodies in the backs of trucks for mass burial, as well as groups of armed men roaming the city with machetes, clubs and sticks.

161. Simon Cox, a cameraman and photographer, testified that he was on an assignment in Rwanda during the time of the events set forth in the indictment. He said he entered Rwanda from Uganda, arriving in the border town of Mulindi, in the third week of April 1994. Thence he headed south with an RPF escort and found evidence of massacres of civilian men, women and children, whom it appeared from their identity cards were mostly Tutsi, in church compounds. En route to Rusumo, in the south-east of the country, he visited hospitals where Tutsi civilians suffering from machete wounds were being treated, some of whom he interviewed. At the Tanzanian border, near Rusumo, by the Kagera river which flows towards Lake Victoria, Mr. Cox saw and filmed corpses floating by at the rate of several corpses per minute. Later, at the beginning of May, he was in Kigali and saw more bodies of dead civilians on the roads. The Chamber viewed film footage taken by Mr. Cox.

162. On a second trip, in June 1994, Mr. Cox visited the western part of Rwanda, arriving in Cyangugu from Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo) and travelling north towards Kibuye. On that journey, he visited orphanages populated by Tutsi children whose parents had been massacred or disappeared. He visited a church in Shangi where a Priest described how the whole of his congregation who had been Tutsi had been hiding inside the church, because they had heard disturbances, and they were eventually all killed by large armed gangs of people, some of whom were equipped with hand grenades. The church had previously survived five repeated attacks. Mr. Cox himself examined the church and outbuildings and found graves, much blood and other evidence of killings. On the road to Kibuye, he saw further evidence of freshly dug mass graves in churchyards. Later, in the hills of Bisesero, he saw some 800 Tutsi civilians "in a desperate, desperate state", many apparently starving and with severe machete and bullet wounds, and with a great many corpses strewn all over the hills.

163. The testimony of an expert witness, Alison Desforges, which has been referred to and summarised above in the "Context of the conflict" section, also indicates that Tutsi and so-called moderate Hutu civilians were targeted for attacks on a massive scale in Rwanda at the time of the events which are the subject of this indictment.

164. In addition, the Chamber heard the testimony of General Romeo Dallaire, who was the force commander of UNAMIR in April 1994. General Dallaire described before the Chamber the massacres of civilian Tutsi which took place in Rwanda in 1994. He also testified in relation to the armed conflict which took place between the RPF and the FAR at the same time as the massacres. This conflict appeared to be a civil war between two well-organised armies. In this context, General Dallaire referred to the FAR and the RPF as "two armies", "two belligerents" or "two sides to the conflict." He noted that the mandate of the UNAMIR was to assist these two parties in implementing the Arusha Peace Accords which were signed on 4 October 1993. Subsequently, other military agreements were signed between the parties, including cease-fire agreements and agreements for arms-free zones. General Dallaire testified that the FAR was under the control of the government of Rwanda and that the RPF was under the control of Paul Kagame. The FAR and RPF occupied different sides of a clearly demarcated demilitarised zone, and according to General Dallaire, the RPF comprised 12,000-13,000 soldiers deployed in three groups: two groups for reaction in the western flank of the demilitarised zone and another group in the eastern flank with six independent battalions. The RPF headquartered in Mulundi, and had a lightweight battalion stationed in Kigali. General Dallaire testified that the RPF troops were disciplined and possessed a well-structured leadership which was answerable to authority and which respected instruction.

165. In addition to the testimony of these witnesses, the Chamber takes judicial notice of the following United Nations reports, which extensively document the massacres which took place in Rwanda in 1994: notably, the Final Report of the Commission of Experts Established Pursuant to Security Council Resolution 935 (1994), U.N. Doc. S/1994/1405 (1994); Report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions, Bacre Waly Ndiaye, on his mission to Rwanda from 8-17 April 1993, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1994/7/Add.1 (1993); Special Report of the Secretary-General on UNAMIR, containing a summary of the developing crisis in Rwanda and proposing three options for the role of the United Nations in Rwanda, S/1994/470, 20 April 1994; Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mr. José Ayala Lasso, on his mission to Rwanda 11-12 May 1994, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/S-3/3 (1994). See also, generally, the collection of United Nations documents in The United Nations and Rwanda, 1993-1996, The United Nations Blue Books Series, Volume X, Department of Public Information, United Nations, New York.

166. The Chamber notes that witnesses from Taba also attested to the mass killings which took place around the country.

Factual Findings

167. Paragraph 5 of the indictment alleges, "Unless otherwise specified, all acts and omissions set forth in this indictment took place between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994, in the commune of Taba, prefecture of Gitarama, territory of Rwanda". This allegation, which supports the legal finding that the Chamber has territorial and temporal jurisdiction over the crimes charged, is not contested, and the Chamber finds that it has been established by the evidence presented.

5400

168. Paragraph 6 of the indictment alleges that the acts set forth in each paragraph of the indictment charging genocide, i.e. paragraphs 12-24, "were committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic or racial group". That acts of violence committed in Rwanda during this time were committed with the intent to destroy the Tutsi population is evident not only from the testimony cited above of Dr. Zachariah, Ms. Hilson, Mr. Cox, Dr. Desforges and General Dallaire, but also from the witnesses who testified with regard to events in the commune of Taba. Witness JJ testified that she was driven away from her home, which was destroyed after a man came to the hill near where she lived and said that the bourgmestre had sent him so that no Tutsi would remain on the hill that night. At the meeting which was held on the morning of 19 April 1994, at which the Accused spoke, Witness OO testified that it was said by another speaker that all the Tutsi should be killed so that some day a child could be born who would have to ask what a Tutsi had looked like. She also quoted this speaker as saying "I will have peace when there will be no longer a Tutsi in Rwanda.". Witness V testified that Tutsi were thrown into the Nyabarongo river, which flows towards the Nile, and told to "meet their parents in Abyssinia", signifying that the Tutsi came from Abyssinia (Ethiopia) and that they "should go back to where they came from" (hearing of 24 January 1997, p.7)

169. In light of this evidence, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the acts of violence which took place in Rwanda during this time were committed with the intent to destroy the Tutsi population, and that the acts of violence which took place in Taba during this time were a part of this effort.

170. Paragraph 7 of the indictment alleges that the victims in each paragraph charging genocide were members of a national, ethnic, racial or religious group. The Chamber notes that the Tutsi population does not have its own language or a distinct culture from the rest of the Rwandan population. However, the Chamber finds that there are a number of objective indicators of the group as a group with a distinct identity. Every Rwandan citizen was required before 1994 to carry an identity card which included an entry for ethnic group (ubwoko in Kinyarawanda and ethnie in French), the ethnic group being Hutu, Tutsi or Twa. The Rwandan Constitution and laws in force in 1994 also identified Rwandans by reference to their ethnic group. Article 16 of the Constitution of the Rwandan Republic, of 10 June 1991, reads, "All citizens are equal before the law, without any discrimination, notably, on grounds of race, colour, origin, ethnicity, clan, sex, opinion, religion or social position". Article 57 of the Civil Code of 1988 provided that a person would be identified by "sex, ethnic group, name, residence and domicile." Article 118 of the Civil Code provided that birth certificates would include "the year, month, date and place of birth, the sex, the ethnic group, the first and last name of the infant." The Arusha Accords of 4 August 1993 in fact provided for the suppression of the mention of ethnicity on official documents (see Article 16 of the Protocol on diverse questions and final dispositions).

171. Moreover, customary rules existed in Rwanda governing the determination of ethnic group, which followed patrilineal lines of heredity. The identification of persons as belonging to the group of Hutu or Tutsi (or Twa) had thus become embedded in Rwandan culture. The Rwandan witnesses who testified before the Chamber identified themselves by ethnic group, and generally knew the ethnic group to which their friends and neighbours belonged. Moreover, the Tutsi were conceived of as an ethnic group by those who targeted them for killing.

172. As the expert witness, Alison Desforges, summarised:

> "The primary criterion for [defining] an ethnic group is the sense of belonging to that ethnic group. It is a sense which can shift over time. In other words, the group, the definition of the group to which one feels allied may change over time. But, if you fix any given moment in time, and you say, how does this population divide itself, then you will see which ethnic groups are in existence in the minds of the participants at that time. The Rwandans currently, and for the last generation at least, have defined themselves in terms of these three ethnic groups. In addition reality is an interplay between the actual conditions and peoples' subjective perception of those conditions. In Rwanda, the reality was shaped by the colonial experience which imposed a categorisation which was probably more fixed, and not completely appropriate to the scene. But, the Belgians did impose this classification in the early 1930's when they required the population to be registered according to ethnic group. The categorisation imposed at that time is what people of the current generation have grown up with. They have always thought in terms of these categories, even if they did not, in their daily lives have to take cognizance of that. This practice was continued after independence by the First Republic and the Second Republic in Rwanda to such an extent that this division into three ethnic groups became an absolute reality".

173. Paragraph 8 of the indictment alleges that the acts set forth in each paragraph of the indictment charging crimes against humanity, i.e. paragraphs 12-24, "were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population on national, political, ethnic or racial grounds". As set forth in the evidence, the scale of the attack was extraordinary. Defence counsel called the events which took place in Rwanda in 1994 "the greatest human tragedy" at the end of this century. Around the country, a massive number of killings took place within a very short time frame. Tutsi were clearly the target of the attack - at roadblocks, in shelters, and in their own homes. Hutu sympathetic to or supportive of Tutsi were also massacred. That the attack was systematic is evidenced by the unusually large shipments of machetes into the country shortly before it occurred. It is also evidenced by the structured manner in which the attack took place. Teachers and intellectuals were targeted first, in Taba as well as the rest of the country. Through the media and other propaganda, Hutu were encouraged systematically to attack Tutsi. For these reasons, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that a widespread and systematic attack began in April 1994 in Rwanda, targeting the civilian Tutsi population and that the acts referred to in paragraphs 12-24 of the indictment were acts which formed part of this widespread and systematic attack.

174. Paragraph 9 of the indictment states, "At all times relevant to this indictment, a state of internal armed conflict existed in Rwanda". The Chamber notes the testimony of General Dallaire, a witness called by the Defence, that the FAR was and the RPF were "two armies" engaged in hostilities, that the RPF had soldiers systematically deployed under a command structure headed by Paul Kagame, and that FAR and RPF forces occupied different sides of a clearly demarcated demilitarised zone. Based on the evidence presented, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that armed conflict existed in Rwanda during the events alleged in the indictment, and that the RPF was an organised armed group, under responsible command, which exercised control over territory in Rwanda and was able to carry out sustained and concerted military operations.

175. Paragraph 10 of the indictment reads, "The victims referred to in this indictment were, at all relevant times, persons not taking an active part in the hostilities". The victims referred to in the indictment, several of whom testified before the Chamber, were farmers, teachers and refugees. The Chamber notes that the Defence did not challenge the civilian status of the victims by making any submissions or leading any evidence connecting any of the victims to the RPF or the hostilities that prevailed in 1994.Since the allegations in Paragraphs 13, 17 and those pertaining to Juvenal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa in paragraph 15 of the indictment have not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the Chamber finds that it is futile to determine whether these alleged victims were in fact civilians, taking no active part in the hostilities that prevailed in 1994. In light of the evidence presented by the Prosecutor, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that all the other victims referred to in the indictment were civilians, not taking any active part in the hostilities that prevailed in 1994.

176. Paragraph 10A was added to the indictment when it was amended to include charges of sexual violence, set forth in Paragraphs 12A and 12B of the indictment. It is not an allegation of fact, rather it appears to be a definition of sexual violence proposed by the Prosecutor.

177. Paragraph 11 of the indictment sets forth the definition of individual criminal responsibility in Article 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal and alleges that the Accused is individually responsible for the crimes alleged in the indictment. The Chamber does not consider this to be a factual allegation but rather a matter of legal issue, which is addressed in the legal findings on each count. The Chamber notes that no general allegation has been made by the Prosecution in connection with Counts 13, 14 and 15, under which the Accused is charged with individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(3), as well as Article 6(1) of the Tribunal's Statute.

5.2 Killings (Paragraphs 12, 13, 18, 19 & 20 of the Indictment)

5.2.1. Paragraph 12 of the Indictment

178. The Chamber now considers paragraph 12 of the Indictment, which alleges the responsibility of the Accused, his knowledge of the killings which took place in Taba between 7 April and the end of June 1994, and his failure to attempt to prevent these killings or to call for assistance from regional or national authorities.

179. Paragraph 12 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> 12. As bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU was responsible for maintaining law and public order in his commune. At least 2000 Tutsi were killed in Taba between April 7 and the end of June, 1994, while he was still in power. The killings in Taba were openly committed and so widespread that, as bourgmestre, Jean Paul AKAYESU must have known about them. Although he had the authority and responsibility to do so, Jean Paul AKAYESU never attempted to prevent the killing of Tutsi in the commune in any way or called for assistance from regional or national authorities to quell the violence.

180. Many witnesses testified regarding the responsibilities of the bourgmestre. Witness DZZ, a former police officer, testified that as bourgmestre, the Accused was responsible for maintaining law and public order in the commune. Witness R, a former bourgmestre, confirmed this testimony, as did Witness V and expert witness Alison DesForges. The responsibilities of the bourgmestre are set forth in Rwandese law, which provides in Article 108 of the Law on the Organization of the Commune that the brigadier has command of the communal police, under the authority of the bourgmestre. Moreover, according to the testimony of witness NN and others, the accused's authority over the communal police continued, and he continued to issue them orders, throughout the period in question. Many witnesses testified as to their perception of the authority of the bourgmestre. Witness K and Witness NN both stated that as bourgmestre, the Accused was the leader of the commune, and Witness S, Witness V and Ephrem Karangwa, the current bourgmestre of Taba, all testified that the people of the commune respected and followed every order of the Accused, as bourgmestre. The bourgmestre was the most important person in the Commune and its "parent" according to Ephrem Karangwa. He was "paramount for the life of the whole commune" and the representative of the executive power in the commune, according to Witness R, himself a former bourgmestre The Accused himself acknowledged that he was responsible for the maintenance of law and order in the commune. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that this proposition has been established.

181. With regard to the allegation that at least 2000 Tutsi were killed in Taba from 7 April to the end of June 1994, the Chamber notes that while many witnesses testified to widespread killings in Taba, few witnesses were able to estimate numbers of people killed. Ephrem Karangwa, the present bourgmestre of Taba, testified that the population of Taba has decreased by 7,000 persons since April 1994, and he described mass graves in each sector of the commune. While some part of the population decrease may be attributed to refugees leaving the commune, it is clear from the testimony of many witnesses that a substantial number of people were killed in Taba. The number 2000 has not been contested by the Defence, and it seems to the Chamber, based on the evidence of killing and mass graves, a modest estimate of the number of people killed in Taba during this period. The testimony also uniformly establishes that virtually all of these people were Tutsi. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that at least 2000 Tutsi were killed in Taba from 7 April to the end of June 1994. It has also been established that the accused remained bourgmestre throughout this period.

182. The Indictment alleges that the killings in Taba were openly committed and so widespread that the Accused must have known about them. A number of witnesses, including Witness PP and Witness V, testified that they informed the Accused of the killings which were taking place in Taba. Others, such as Witness NN, testified that the Accused was present at the bureau communal and elsewhere when killings took place, and that he witnessed these killings. Others, including Witness KK, Witness NN, Witness G, Witness W, Witness J, Witness C, Witness JJ and Witness V, have testified that the Accused supervised and actively participated in the killings. The Accused himself acknowledged that he knew such killings were taking place. He testified that he was told that there were killings everywhere in Taba, and that it was the Tutsi who were being killed. He stated that on 19 April 1994, killings spread to most of the commune of Taba. The issue is not contested, and it has been established that the Accused knew that killings were taking place and were widespread in Taba during the period in question.

183. The final allegation of paragraph 12 is that although he had the authority and responsibility to do so, Jean Paul Akayesu never attempted to prevent the killing of Tutsi in the commune in any way or called for assistance from regional or national authorities to quell the violence. The Accused contends that he did not have the power necessary to prevent the killings from taking place. The Chamber notes that the issue to be addressed is whether he ever attempted to do so. In the light of the evidence, the Chamber considers that it is necessary to distinguish between the period before 18 April 1994, when the key meeting between members of the interim government and the bourgmestres took place in Murambi, in Gitarama, and the period after 18 April 1994. Indeed, on the Prosecution's own case, a marked change in the accused's personality and behaviour took place after 18 April 1994.

184. There is a substantial amount of evidence establishing that before 18 April 1994 the Accused did attempt to prevent violence from taking place in the commune of Taba. Many witnesses testified to the efforts of the Accused to maintain peace in the commune and that he opposed by force the Interahamwe's attempted incursions into the commune to ensure that the killings which had started in Kigali on 7 April 1994 did not spread to Taba. Witness W testified that on the order of the Accused to the population that they must resist these incursions, members of the Interahamwe were killed. Witness K testified that Taba commune was calm during the period when Akayesu wanted that there be calm. She said he would gather the population in a meeting and tell them that they had to be against the acts of violence in the commune. Witness A testified that when the Interahamwe tried to enter the commune of Taba, the bourgmestre did everything to fight against them, and called on the residents to go to the borders of the commune to chase them away. The Accused testified that he intervened when refugees from Kigali were being shot at by the Interahamwe. The police returned fire and three Interahamwe were killed. The Accused testified that he confiscated their weapons and their vehicle.

185. The Accused testified that he asked for three gendarmes at the meeting with the Prime Minister in Gitarama on 18 April 1994, to help him maintain order and security and to stop the killing of Tu[illegible] The only witnesses to attend the Murambi meeting were prosecution witness R, an MDR bourgmestre Gitarama prefecture like the accused, and Defence witness DAAX, the former prefect of Gitarama. Witness R recalled three meetings of the bourgmestres in Gitarama prefecture convened by the prefect after 6 April 1994, and in his statement to the Office of the Prosecutor he said that the accused did ask for gendarmes at one of those meetings. When testifying before the Chamber, Witness R did not remember the accused having spoken at the Murambi meeting of 18 April 1994, although in his earlier statement to the Office of the Prosecutor, he stated that the accused had spoken at that meeting. Because of these inconsistencies, Defence counsel submitted a motion requesting the Chamber to consider a prosecution for false testimony, which this Chamber rejected in a Decision of 9 March 1998. As the Chamber stated in that Decision, it did not deem the matter appropriate for an investigation into false testimony, but rather it was a matter for the evaluation of the credibility of the witness in question. In this case, the Chamber considers that, despite discrepancies between Witness R's testimony and his prior statement to the Prosecutor relating to the sequence of the meetings addressed by the accused, if taken in the light most favourable to the accused, it corroborates the accused's account that at some point after 6 April 1994, and in all likelihood at the Murambi meeting of 18 April 1994, the accused asked for gendarmes to assist with the problems of security in his commune. Given the accused's testimony on this point, and its corroboration in part by the sole prosecution witness who was present at the Murambi meeting, the accused's version of events - that he did call for assistance from the national and regional authorities - must be credited.

186. Moreover, Defence witness DAAX, the former prefect of Gitarama supports the accused's account. Witness DAAX testified that he convened three meetings of bourgmestres between 6 April 1994 and 18 April 1994 - all of which were attended by the accused - the third meeting being the one which was moved from Gitarama to Murambi at the last minute at the request of the Prime Minister so that the Prime Minister and other Ministers could address the prefect and bourgmestres. At this third meeting, the prefect testified, the accused took the floor and complained of the problems of security in his commune, in common with the Prefect and other bourgmestres. Witness DAAX's testimony agrees with that of the accused that the Prime Minister did not reply directly to the bourgmestre's expressions of concern about security in their Communes, but that he rather read parts of a prepared policy speech and threatened the complaining bourgmestres with dismissal. Witness DAAX further testified that at least one bourgmestre, the bourgmestre of Mugina, was killed shortly after the meeting as a result. Witness DAAX also testified that the accused had to flee his commune due to pressure from the Interahamwe at some point between 6 April 1994 and 18 April 1994, and in any event after the first two meetings referred to above but before the third meeting. Witness DAAX said the Accused never officially requested gendarmes from him, unlike the bourgmestre of Mugina. Witness DAAX lost contact with the Accused after 18 April 1994. The Chamber notes that the Accused does not assert that he requested assistance from the prefect of Gitarama but rather from the Prime Minister, during the course of the meeting.

187. A substantial amount of evidence has been presented indicating that the conduct of the Accused did, however, change significantly after the meeting on 18 April 1994, and many witnesses, including Witnesses E, W, PP, V and G, testified to the collaboration of the Accused with the Interahamwe in Taba after this date. Witness A testified that he was surprised to see that the Accused had become a friend of the Interahamwe. The Accused contends that he was overwhelmed. Witness DAX and Witness DBB, both witnesses for the Defence, testified that the Interahamwe threatened to kill the Accused if he did not cooperate with them. The Accused testified that he was coerced by the Interahamwe and particularly by Silas Kubwimana, the head of the Interahamwe with whom he was seen quite frequently during this time. The Chamber notes that in his pre-trial written statement, the Accused gave a very different account of Silas Kubwimana, describing his mandate in the commune as that of a "peace-maker".

188. The Chamber recognises the difficulties a bourgmestre encountered in attempting to save lives of Tutsi in the period in question. Prosecution witness R, who was the bourgmestre of another commune in Gitarama prefecture, testified that there was very little he or other bourgmestres could do to prevent massacres in his commune once killings became widespread after 18 April 1994. He averred that a bourgmestre could do nothing openly to combat the killings after that date or he would risk being killed; what little he could do had to be done clandestinely. The Defence case is that this is precisely what the accused did.

189. Defence witnesses, DAAX, DAX, DCX, DBB and DCC confirm that the accused failed to prevent killings after 18 April 1994 and expressed the opinion that it was not possible for him to do anything with ten communal policemen at his disposal against more than a hundred Interahamwe.

190. The Defence contends that, despite pressure from the Interahamwe, the Accused continued to save lives after 18 April 1994. There is some evidence on this matter, referred to in the section on "the accused's line of Defence".

191. There is also evidence indicating that after 18 April 1994, there were people that came to the Accused for help, and he turned them away, and there is evidence that the Accused witnessed, participated in, supervised, and even ordered killings in Taba. Witness JJ testified that after her arrival at the bureau communal, where she came to seek refuge, she went to the Accused on behalf of a group of refugees, begging him to kill them with bullets so that they would not be hacked to death with machetes. She said he asked his police officers to chase them away and said that even if there were bullets he would not waste them on the refugees.

192. The Chamber finds that the allegations set forth in paragraph 12 cannot be fully established. The Accused did take action between 7 April and 18 April to protect the citizens of his commune. It appears that he did also request assistance from national authorities at the meeting on 18 April 1994. Accordingly, the Accused did attempt to prevent the killing of Tutsi in his Commune, and it cannot be said that he never did so.

193. Nevertheless, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the conduct of the Accused changed after 18 April 1994 and that after this date the Accused did not attempt to prevent the killing of Tutsi in the commune of Taba. In fact, there is evidence that he not only knew of and witnessed killings, but that he participated in and even ordered killings. The fact that on one occasion he helped one Hutu woman protect her Tutsi children does not alter the Chamber's assessment that the Accused did not generally attempt to prevent the killings at all after 18 April. The Accused contends that he was subject to coercion, but the Chamber finds this contention greatly inconsistent with a substantial amount of concordant testimony from other witnesses. It is also inconsistent with his own pre-trial written statement. Witness C testified to having heard the accused say to an Interahamwe " I do not think that what we are doing is proper. We are going to have to pay for this blood that is being shed..",a statement which indicates the Accused's knowledge of the wrongfulness of his acts and his awareness of the consequences of his deeds. For these reasons, the Chamber does not accept the testimony of the Accused regarding his conduct after 18 April, and finds beyond a reasonable doubt that he did not attempt to prevent killings of Tutsi after this date. Whether he had the power to do so is not at issue, as he never even tried and as there is evidence establishing beyond a reasonable doubt that he consciously chose the course of collaboration with violence against Tutsi rather than shielding them from it.

5.2.2. Paragraph 13 of the Indictment

Alleged facts:

5406

194. Paragraph 13 of the Indictment is worded as follows:

> "On or about 19 April 1994, before dawn, in Gishyeshye sector, Taba commune, a group of men, one of whom was named François Ndimubanzi, killed a local teacher, Sylvère Karera, because he was accused of associating with the Rwandan Patriotic Front ("RPF") and plotting to kill Hutu. Even though at least one of the perpetrators was turned over to Jean-Paul Akayesu, he failed to take measures to have him arrested".

195. It is alleged that, by the acts with which he is charged in this paragraph, Akayesu is guilty of the offences which form the subject of three counts:

> Count 1 of the Indictment charges him with the crime of genocide, punishable under Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute;
>
> Count 2 charges him with the crime of complicity in genocide, punishable under Article 2 (3)(e) of the Statute; and
> Count 3 charges him with the crime of extermination which is a Crime against Humanity, punishable under Article 3(b) of the Statute.

196. In order to prove the acts alleged against Akayesu under paragraph 13 of the Indictment, it is necessary to first establish that Sylvère Karera, a teacher, was killed in the Gishyeshye sector, Taba commune, on 19 April 1994, before dawn, by a group of men, one of whom was named François Ndimubanzi and that he was killed because he was accused of associating with the RPF and plotting to kill Hutu. The Chamber must then be satisfied that at least one of the perpetrators of this killing was indeed turned over to Jean-Paul Akayesu, and that he failed to take measures to have him arrested.

With regard to the killing of Sylvère Karera in the Gishyeshye sector, Taba commune, on or about 19 April 1994, before dawn:

197. Several Prosecution witnesses, particularly, those who appeared under the pseudonyms A, W, E and U, as well as Ephrem Karangwa, provided information on the killing of teacher Sylvère Karera in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994.

198. Witness A, a Hutu man, testified that, during the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, he heard people shouting that thieves had killed people at Remera school and calling on the population to stop them. Witness A affirmed that, on 19 April 1994, he had gone to Remera school. There he learnt from the headmaster that the prefect of studies, who turned out to be Sylvère Karera, had been killed. The witness saw the body of the teacher before it was covered with a pink sheet at the request of the headmaster.

199. Ephrem Karangwa, a Tutsi man, called by the Prosecutor as a witness who, at the material time, performed the functions of Inspecteur de police judiciaire of the Taba commune, stated before the Chamber that Sylvère Karera, a teacher at the Remera Rukoma school complex, was killed in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994 by members of the Interahamwe.

200. Witness W, a Tutsi, who resided in Taba, where he worked as a teacher, testified that on returning from night patrols in which he had participated during the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, he learnt that the prefect of studies at the public primary school, Rukoma, had just been killed.

201. Questioned on the death of Sylvère Karera, witness E stated that he had gone, in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, to the entrance of Remera school. He did not directly see Karera's body, but had heard that the body was in the school premises. No one stopped him from entering the school, but he h... preferred to go to the place from where the noise came which had brought him out of his home.

202. Prosecution witness U also heard that a teacher, named Karera, had been killed. She stated that throughout the night, she had heard people shouting in the streets and announcing, particularly, that Karera had been killed.

203. The Defence has never disputed the killing of Sylvère Karera in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994. The accused has himself confirmed, during his appearance as witness before the Chamber, that the teacher Sylvère Karera had been killed in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994.

Concerning the allegation that Sylvère Karera was killed by a group of men, one of whom was named François Ndimubanzi, and that he was killed because he was accused of associating with the RPF and plotting to kill Hutu:

204. The Chamber notes that though the Indictment alleges that Sylvère Karera was killed by a group of men, one of whom was named François Ndimubanzi, the Prosecutor has adduced no evidence to show number and identity of the perpetrators of the killing.

205. As for the reasons alleged by the Prosecutor for the killing of Sylvère Karera, that is, associating with the RPF and plotting to kill Hutu, the Defence stated, in its concluding arguments, that they should be dismissed on the ground that Sylvère Karera was, according to the Defence, Hutu and that the Prosecutor's allegations that this teacher was killed because he was accused of plotting to kill Hutu were therefore without merit.

Concerning the allegation that at least one of the perpetrators of the killing of Sylvère Karera was turned over to Jean-Paul Akayesu and that he failed to take measures to have him arrested:

206. Though the Indictment alleges that at least one of the perpetrators of the killing of Sylvère Karera was turned over to Akayesu, the Prosecutor has adduced no evidence to support this allegation.

207. Witness E stated that, in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, after going to the school entrance where Sylvère Karera had been killed, he went to the place from where camethe noise which had brought him out of his home. At Gishyeshye, from where came the noise, near a roadblock, he saw the body of another person who had been killed. A crowd gathered. It was said that teacher Karera was killed and that the remains near the roadblock were those of the Interahamwe who had just killed Karera. Apart from that dead Interahamwe, no other person was held responsible for killing Karera. Witness E specified that he had heard that Sylvère Karera had been killed by that Interahamwe alone.

208. The witness called by the Prosecutor under the pseudonym Z, a Tutsi man, stated that, on or about 19 April 1994, in the early hours of the day following the killing of a Tutsi teacher in Remera and that of his murderer, who was killed by persons in charge of maintaining security, he and other persons stood near the body of the teacher's murderer. Akayesu, who was armed, separated members of the Interahamwe from the population. According to witness Z, Akayesu, in referring to the body on the spot, reportedly deplored the killing of this person.

209. Prosecution witness A testified that, in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, an Interahamwe was killed. No investigation was conducted. He was simply buried immediately.

210. Prosecution witness U stated that some men told him, on 19 April 1994, that a person had been killed and that Akayesu had gone to where the body was and held a meeting there.

211. Several other witnesses indicated to the Chamber that a crowd had formed early in the morning of 19 April 1994, in Gishyeshye, around the body of a young member of the Interahamwe. That meeting is at the root of the allegations brought by the Prosecutor against Akayesu under paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment. The factual findings of the Chamber on the holding of the said meeting are elaborated upon below.

212. The Prosecutor accepted this version of facts in her concluding arguments. She had then told the Chamber that, following the killing of the Tutsi teacher, Sylvère Karera, in the middle of the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, in Remera, by some members of the Interahamwe, the people of the commune had gone out into the streets to find out what was happening, wondering why a teacher had been killed. Later, according to the Prosecutor's statement, they caught one member of the Interahamwe in Gishyeshye and killed him.

213. In her concluding arguments, the Prosecutor did not mention any fact designed to show that one of the possible killers of Sylvère Karera was turned over to Jean-Paul Akayesu alive, contrary to what is alleged in paragraph 13 of the Indictment.

214. During cross-examination of the accused appearing as witness in his own trial, the Prosecutor had him confirm that Sylvère Karera was killed in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994 and that later, one member of the Interahamwe, the person who had killed Karera, was also killed. The Prosecutor added that Prosecution witnesses had indeed testified to that.

215. During his appearance before the Chamber as witness, the accused argued that during the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, he was sleeping in the Bureau Communal, when towards 4 a.m., a certain Augustin Sebazungu, MDR treasurer at Taba, residing in the Gishyeshye sector, came to inform him that the situation in the sector was tense, following the killing of a young man, a member of the Interahamwe. The Bourgmestre then immediately alerted the police and went to the scene, accompanied by two policemen. There he found a body stretched out on the ground, covered with traces of blood, as if it had been hit. The accused affirmed before the Chamber that he seized the opportunity of this gathering which formed as people came to see what was happening, to address the population. He noted that members of the region's Interahamwe had rushed and surrounded the body of their young member. Akayesu told the Chamber that he had condemned the killing of the young man because he felt that it was not in that manner that law and order would be maintained, and that he had indicated that his arrest would simply have been enough.

Factual findings

216. Prosecution witnesses appearing under the pseudonyms A, W, E and U, as well as Ephrem Karangwa, provided information which confirmed the Prosecutor's allegations as to the killing of teacher Sylvère Karera in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994. On the basis of such corroborative evidence, which was not substantially disputed by the Defence, the Chamber is satisfied that Sylvère Karera was actually killed, in Gishyeshye, in the night of 18 to 19 April 1994.

217. The Chamber notes however that the Prosecutor has not adduced conclusive evidence to support her allegations relating to the number and identity of the perpetrators of the killing of Sylvère Karera as well as the reasons for this murder.

218. With regard to the allegation that at least one of the perpetrators of the killing of Sylvère Karera had been turned over to Jean-Paul Akayesu and that he failed to take any measures to have him arrested, for the reasons explained above and in the absence of pertinent evidence, the Chamber finds that the Prosecutor has not established beyond reasonable doubt that at least one of the perpetrators of the killing of Sylvère Karera was turned over alive to Akayesu, and that he failed to take any measures to have him arrested.

5.2.3. Paragraph 18 of the Indictment

219. Paragraph 18 of the Indictment reads as follows:

> 18. On or about April 19, 1994, the men who, on Jean Paul AKAYESU's instructions, were searching for Ephrem Karangwa destroyed Ephrem Karangwa's house and burned down his mother's house. They then went to search the house of Ephrem Karangwa's brother-in-law in Musambira commune and found Ephrem Karangwa's three brothers there. The three brothers -- Simon Mutijima, Thaddée Uwanyiligira and Jean Chrysostome Gakuba -- tried to escape, but Jean Paul AKAYESU blew his whistle to alert local residents to the attempted escape and ordered the people to capture the brothers. After the brothers were captured, Jean Paul AKAYESU ordered and participated in the killing of the three brothers.

Events alleged

Testimony Of Ephrem Karangwa (Witness d)

220. Ephrem Karangwa was assigned the pseudonym D and placed under the Tribunal's Witness Protection Unit, pursuant to an order of 26 September 1996, but he waived witness protection and elected to testify under his own name.

221. Karangwa testified that he resided in Taba and in April 1994 he was the Inspecteur de Police Judiciaire (IPJ) in the Ministry of Justice for the Prosecutor in Taba commune having taken office in August 1984. As IPJ he investigated criminal complaints and transmitted case files to the Prosecutor. The witness's office was situated in the bureau communal in Taba. The witness testified that the head of any commune was the bourgmestre. The Accused who was the bourgmestre of Taba during the events of April 1994. The witness had known the Accused for about twenty years. The witness did not belong to any political party and he was not allowed to do so by the Minister of Justice. He testified that there was never any tension between him and the Accused and they had a good working relationship.

222. Karangwa testified that in his role as IPJ he became aware that there were problems of a political nature between the political parties in Taba, especially the MDR and the MRND. The MDR had a greater following in Taba and this party was led by the Accused. On one occasion in 1992 there was a demonstration by the MDR which led to violence when the demonstrators tried to forcibly enter the bureau communal. The MDR wanted the bourgmestre at that time removed from office. The matter was investigated by the witness and referred to the Prosecutor for prosecution. The witness did not have any knowledge of the eventual out come of this matter, at the time of testifying. The witness said that he knew of Silas Kubwimana and that he often complained about the Accused and the MDR officials. He said that there existed a file on this complaint at the Prosecutor's office. The witness said that he had become aware of the existence of this file in his official capacity as IPJ.

223. Karangwa testified that on the morning of 7 April 1994, while preparing to go to work he heard an announcement on the radio that the President had been killed. He also heard an announcement calling on people to remain wherever they were and he therefore decided not to go to work.

224. Karangwa testified that he had spoken to many people about the security situation in Taba. On 14 April 1994, he saw a blue Toyota Minibus pass him. He was informed that this motor vehicle and a white "pick up" were confiscated from the Interahamwe by the people of Kamembe. He was further informed that a police officer was killed and an Interahamwe wounded in this process.

225. Karangwa testified that on the night of 18 April 1994 he was outside his house because he had heard that Tutsi in Runda commune were being killed and since he was a tutsi he was afraid. He stated that Runda and Taba were neighbouring communes. At approximately 1 am on 19 April 1994, a person came to the witness's house and informed him that he had just attended a meeting led by the Accused where plans were being made to kill the witness and to commence killings in Taba in a similar manner to killings that were happening in Runda. This person advised the witness to flee with his family. The witness and his family hid on a hill and at dawn the witness's sisters, mother and wife went on foot to his wife's sisters house in Musambira and he and his brothers stayed behind because they wanted to verify the information that had been given to him. The witness said that he wondered why someone would want to kill him and his family, since they had no problem with anyone.

226. Karangwa testified that from his hiding place on the hill, he could see his house on the opposite hill about 150 metres away. The witness stated that he saw three vehicles drive up to his house between the hours of eight and nine o'clock in the morning. The Accused came in a blue Toyota mini bus, the one that the people had taken away from the Interahamwe. The witness was uncertain as to whether the Accused was driving the blue Toyota Hiace minibus. The witness described the other two vehicles as a white Toyota and a red Toyota. The witness could not see what the Accused had in his hands, but he did see the Accused wearing a military jacket. The Accused and the other people alighted from the motor vehicles and went down to the witness's house. The witness's dogs barked and someone in this group of people fired a round from a firearm and the dogs ran away. The witness stated that he saw this group of people then destroy his house and his mother's house. The witness stated that the houses were looted and burnt. The witness identified prosecution exhibits 50 and 51 as being photographs of the remains of these houses.

227. Karangwa testified that this event confirmed the information that he had received and he then decided to join his family in Musambira. He arrived at Musambira at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. He saw his family at the house of his brother in law, Laurent Kamondo and they immediately left for Kabgayi, whilst he awaited the arrival of his younger brothers. He stated that he could not stay in the house because he was afraid that the Accused would look for him there. Instead, he hid in an eucalyptus bush on the side of a hill approximately eighty metres from the house.

228. Karangwa testified that he saw two motor vehicles, a blue Toyota Hiace minibus and a red Toyota Hilux approach the house. These vehicles stopped approximately twenty five metres away from the house. This was the same minibus that was taken away from the Interahamwe and the Accused was using it at that time. Many people alighted from the vehicles and walked towards Laurent Kamondo's house. The witness recognised some of these people as the bourgmestre of Musambira, the Accused, a police officer named Emanuel Mushumba from the Taba commune, Mutiji Masivere, Winima Boniface and Munir Yarangaclaude who was the secretary of the MDR party in the commune of Taba (phonetic spelling). The Accused was wearing a military jacket and he had a gun in his hand.

229. Karangwa testified that he heard shouts and whistles as this group of people approached Laurent Kamondo's house. He saw people running and, thereafter, he saw his younger brothers in the court yard with these people. The witness stated that it was then that he realised that his brothers were in Musambira. The witness continued to hear shouts from these people and then he heard the Accused say that his brothers must be shot. The witness heard gun shots and concluded that his brothers were killed and that the Accused had fired the gun. When asked by the Prosecutor whether he saw the gun that used to kill his brothers, the witness replied that he saw the Accused carrying a gun when he arrived and that he heard the shots.

230. Karangwa testified that after the killing of his brothers, he fled to Kabgayi, and on arrival at the cathedral, the witness stated that he saw the Accused in a pick up' drive up to the cathedral. The Accused was in the company of two police officers from the Taba commune named Emanuel Mushumba (phonetic spelling) and Ooli Musakarani (phonetic spelling) and a group of people. The witness said that he saw the Accused and these other people alight from the vehicle and look around the courtyard of the cathedral but they did not go inside. They then got back into the motor vehicle and left. The witness was informed by Witness V that the Accused was making enquiries about his whereabouts and he was advised to hide. The witness stayed in the seminary until the end of the war.

231. Karangwa testified that he was not able to leave the seminary but that he heard from many people that the Accused was outside the seminary on many occasions. The Accused was able to come into the compound of the seminary from 30 May 1994. The witness recalled that he remembered that day clearly, because it was on that day that the Accused came to take him away, and he was saved by someone.

232. Karangwa testified that he stayed in Kabgayi from 21 April 1994 to 2 June 1994. At the beginning of 1995 the witness went to work as IPJ in the public prosecutor's office in Gitarama and on 3 January 1996 became the bourgmestre of Taba. The witness said that at that time Tutsi were killed and the only reason the Accused looked for him was because he had worked in the commune and he was Tutsi.

233. In response to a question from the bench, Karangwa stated that the fact that the Accused was present made him responsible for the death of his brothers. When asked for clarification as to whether the Accused ordered the shooting, the witness reaffirmed that the Accused ordered their shooting.

234. Under cross examination, Karangwa testified that he had a very good working relationship with the Accused. The witness stated that the Accused dealt with civil disputes and he referred all criminal matters to the witness. The witness stated that he was generally invited to meetings pertaining to security in Taba. He testified that he saw the Accused between 6 and 10 April 1994 in Kamembe. The Accused was there assessing the security situation, since there was an influx of people that were fleeing Kigali. The Accused sent commune police officers to ensure the security of these people. The Accused at this stage was opposed to any killing.

235. In clarification of an averment in his written statement made to the Office of the Prosecutor (exhibit 105), the witness testified that the Accused held meetings on 18 and 19 April 1994 with a view to planning the genocide. The witness stated that he had not attended any of these meetings but he heard of them. The witness stated that at these meetings a decision was taken that the MDR and the MRND should not fight the Interahamwe and the CDR but they should fight the tutsi. This decision according to the witness, was taken at communal level by the bourgmestre. Although the bourgmestre belonged to the MDR all the political parties at communal level were under his authority. The witness did not go to work from 7 April 1994. The witness stated that he knew that there were major security problems in the commune and expressed the view that if the bourgmestre believed that the witness was competent to resolve these problems, the bourgmestre would have provided the witness with transport to go to work.

236. The witness acknowledged the fact that the Accused fought against the Interahamwe after 6 April 1994 and went on to say that if the Accused had not done so the killing in Taba would have started much earlier. The Defence Counsel pointed out that in his written statement to the Office of the Prosecutor, the witness stated that he was about a kilometre away from his house when he saw the Accused come to his house with a group of people. The witness denied this and reaffirmed his testimony that he was 150 metres away from his house, on the opposite hill. According to the witness, he was able to identify the Accused by the way that he walked and the clothes that he was wearing. The witness could also hear what was spoken by the Accused and the group of people when they were at his house, although he was 150 metres away. The witness identified the people with the Accused as assistant bourgmestre Civil Mootijima (phonetic spelling), assistant bourgmestre Wimina Boniface (phonetic spelling), manager of a popular bank Aloyce Kubunda (phonetic spelling), businessman Daniel Gasiba (phonetic spelling) and some communal police officers.

237. Karangwa testified under cross-examination, that when the Accused arrived at Laurent Kamondo's house at Musambira he immediately searched the house and found his three brothers. The Accused then killed the witness's three brothers by shooting them. The Defence Counsel pointed out that, in his written statement, the witness had stated that the Accused killed his brother, Jean Kististan (phonetic spelling), by shooting him and when his other two brothers tried to escape they were attacked and killed with machetes by the men who were with the Accused. The Defence Counsel requested an explanation from the witness in respect of this discrepancy. The witness denied that he stated this and maintained that all three of his brothers were shot.

238. Karangwa testified under cross examination, that he left Musambira immediately after his brothers were killed and when he was asked whether he buried is brothers, his response was that he did not have the time to do so. The Defence Counsel pointed out that the witness had stated in his written statement that he had buried his brothers near the house of Laurent Kamondo and requested the witness to explain this discrepancy. The witness denied this and maintained that his brothers were buried by Laurent Kamondo.

Testimony of Witness S

239. Witness S testified that he is a Hutu farmer. In April 1994, he lived in the commune of Musambira. There was safety and security in Musumbira even after 6 April 1994 when the President's plane had crashed but this had changed on 19 April 1994. Witness S was in his house on 19 April 1994. In the morning of the same day, between 9am and 10 am, Ephrem Karangwa's wife, sisters and mother went to Witness S's home. Witness S spoke to these people on their arrival and they had informed him that killings had begun in the Taba commune and many people were leaving their homes and fleeing.

240. Witness S testified that Ephrem Karangwa arrived at his home between 11 am and 12 noon on the same day. On his arrival, his wife, mother and sisters immediately left for Kabgayi. Witness S spoke to Ephrem Karangwa who also informed him that killings had began in Taba. Witness S stepped out of his house and he stated that when he looked in the direction of Taba he could see columns of smoke. Witness S stated that Karangwa left saying that he was waiting for his brothers and on their arrival they would set off for Kabgayi to join the rest of their family.

241. Witness S testified that Ephrem Karangwa's three brothers arrived at his house between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon of 19 April 1994. The three brothers went into the witness's home and asked for their mother and sisters. Witness S informed them that they had already left. He also informed them that Ephrem Karangwa was waiting for them but that he did not know where. The witness said that the three brothers were wearing civilian clothes and they did not have any weapons in their possession. The three brothers together with Witness S went into the house. Whilst in the house, the witness heard the sound of cars. The three brothers went behind the house. Witness S went into the front court yard and he saw the motor vehicle that belonged to the commune of Musumbira. The witness described this motor vehicle as a red dual cab Hilux "pickup". Witness S then saw the bourgmestre of Musumbira, Justin Nyangwe and the assistant bourgmestre, Martin Kalisa, on the path that led to his house. He also saw the Accused with the assistant bourgmestre of Taba and a few police officers. Witness S did not know all the police officers that were in the group but he recognised them as police officers by the fact that they were wearing police uniforms and they were in possession of firearms. The witness recognised two of these police officers as being from the commune of Musambira. He did not know or recognise the other people in the group. These people were wearing civilian clothes.

242. Witness S testified that he had known the Accused before the events of April 1994. When the witness visited Ephrem Karangwa at his office in the bureau communal, he often saw the Accused. According to Witness S, the Accused was wearing a long military jacket and he had a grenade in his hand. Witness S's father was also in the group of people that came to his house and the witness noticed that his father was injured in his face and he was bleeding. By this time this group of people had arrived and were standing about three metres away from the house. Witness S's father said to him if Ephrem Karangwa was in the house he should hand him over or else they will be killed by this group of people. The Accused at this time was standing next to the bourgmestre of Musambira. The bourgmestre of Musambira asked Witness S if Ephrem Karangwa was in the house. According to the witness he responded by saying that he was not in the house and invited the bourgmestre to search the house if he so wished. The assistant bourgmestre of Musumbira, Martin Kalisa, together with two police officers from Taba searched the house. Witness S was not allowed into the house whilst the search was being conducted and he stood outside. The Accused during this search ordered the police officers to surround the house, to prevent Ephrem Karangwa from running away. By this time many people from the general population of Musambira had gathered to see what was going on and they also acted on the Accused's instruction and surrounded the house.

243. Witness S testified that the people searching the house did not find Ephrem Karangwa. Instead they came out with some cans of sardines and Accused the witness and his family of being "Inyenzi". At this time Ephrem Karangwa's brothers were behind the house with the witness's sister. The witness said he did not see this but he was informed by his sister that the brothers fled. The police officers blew their whistles and said stop these "Inyenzi" from running away and a group of people pursued the three brothers.

244. Witness S testified that he heard people shouting "...stop that Inyenzi..." About ten minutes later, the mob of people returned with the three Karangwa brothers. According to Witness S, they had been beaten and although he did not see the beatings he saw the injuries sustained as a result of the beating. The brothers had certain open wounds that were bleeding and their clothes were torn. The three brothers were made to sit on the lawn about two metres from the entrance to the court yard, in the presence of the Accused. The bourgmestre of Musambira, Justin Nyangwe asked the Accused if he knew these three brothers. The Accused replied that they were from his commune. Justin Nyangwe then asked the Accused what must be done with them and the Accused responded by saying "we need to finish these people off..." and he confirmed this response by saying, they need to be shot. The police officers from Musambira made the three brothers lie on their stomachs. There was a crowd of people that had now gathered and they were asked to step back. All three brothers were shot at close range behind their heads, by two police officers from Musambira. Monzatina (phonetic spelling) shot two of the brothers and Albert shot one of the brothers.

245. Witness S testified that he and his family were told by Justin Nyangwe, the bourgmestre of Musambira, to get into the commune motor vehicle. Whilst they were being taken, Witness S heard people say that they were going to destroy his home because he and his family were "Inyenzi". The Accused and a group of people got into their motor vehicle and drove in the direction of Taba. The motor vehicle that Witness S was in started to move first and as it passed the motor vehicle of the Accused, the witness could see a person tied in the Accused's motor vehicle. Witness S and his family were taken to the bureau communal of Musambira where they were detained. He later managed to escape, but his three sisters were killed.

246. Under cross-examination, Witness S testified that he met the Accused when he went to the bureau communal in Taba to visit Ephrem Karangwa who worked as an IPJ in the commune. He often visited Ephrem Karangwa at the bureau communal. Witness S also met the assistant bourgmestre of Taba, although he did not know his name.

247. Witness S testified that before the Accused came to his house he went to his grand father's house and that was where he found Witness S's father. On arrival at Witness S's house, the Accused parked his motor vehicle on the tarred road and the bourgmestre of Musumbira parked his motor vehicle outside Witness S's house. Witness S was sitting inside his house at this time and he heard the sound of the engine of this motor vehicle the bourgmestre of Musambira travelled in, which was approximately 25 metres away from the house. The motor vehicle the Accused travelled in was approximately three to four hundred metres away on the tarred road. Witness S reiterated that he did not hear the sound of the engine of the Accused's motor vehicle but rather that of the motor vehicle the bourgmestre of Musumbira travelled in. Witness S realised that the Accused was looking for Ephrem Karangwa when the bourgmestre of Musumbira asked if Ephrem Karangwa was there and also when his father asked him to hand over Ephrem Karangwa to the Accused if he was in the house.

248. Under cross-examination Witness S confirmed that he had made a statement to the Prosecutor of Gitarama. This statement was tendered into evidence by the Defence as part of exhibit 104. Witness S stated that this statement did not pertain to the Accused but rather to the former bourgmestre of Musumbira, who was now in prison as a result of his conduct as mentioned in this statement. Witness S stated that he was asked specific questions about the bourgmestre of Musumbira. The Defence Counsel pointed out to Witness S that this statement mentioned that the Accused was with Kalisa Martin, the bourgmestre of Musambira and Justin Nyandwi. Witness S recalled that he had mentioned the Accused's involvement in respect of the killing of the Karangwa brothers to the Prosecutor of Gitarama but this was omitted from this statement.

249. Witness S testified under cross-examination that he saw the Accused with a grenade in his hand. He recognised this item in the Accused's hand as being a grenade because he saw soldiers with it before the war. Defence Counsel pointed out to Witness S that in his statement to the investigators at the Office of the Prosecutor he stated that the Accused came to his house with a gun and a grenade, whilst in his evidence in chief before the Chamber the witness testified that the Accused only had a grenade. Witness S denied making this statement to the investigators and maintained that he had only seen the Accused with a grenade.

250. Witness S testified that police officers in Musambira normally used whistles to indicate that the market was closing. Whistles were also used when there was a security problem in the region. He stated that the Karangwa brothers were chased by the people because at that time there was a search of homes for hidden people. The Police Officers blew their whistles and shouted "catch these Inyenzi, don't let them get away". The people immediately chased after the Karangwa brothers. The witness stated that the people acted in this manner because it was an order from the authorities. The people generally followed orders given by the authorities even if the order leads to any wrongful conduct. Defence Counsel pointed out that the Karangwa brothers were not armed and they did not pose any threat to the people of Musambira and despite this they were assaulted by the mob of people chasing them, even though they were not ordered to do so. This illustrated that the people committed wrongful acts even if they were not ordered to do so. Witness S did not tender an explanation in response to this issue raised by Defence Counsel.

The Testimony of Witness DAX

251. Witness DAX testified on behalf of the Defence. He stated that he knew Ephrem Karangwa and they are friends. He also knew Ephrem Karangwa's family. He stated that he did not hear anybody say that Ephrem Karangwa was to be killed or that someone was attempting to kill Ephrem Karangwa. Witness DAX testified that he had heard of the destruction of Ephrem Karangwa's house and the killing of his brothers. The witness had heard that Ephrem Karangwa's brothers were making their way to Kabgayi when they were killed in Kivumu in the Nyakabunda Commune (phonetic spelling). The witness stated that the Interahamwe were responsible for the deaths of the Karangwa brothers. The witness stated that he had since met Ephrem Karangwa several times in Kigali and although they did not discuss the details of his brothers death, the witness offered his condolences to Ephrem Karangwa.

252. Witness DAX testified that on 19 April 1994, Ephrem Karangwa's house was destroyed by neighbours. He stated that in a poor country like Rwanda it is difficult for a rich person to stay with poor neighbours. It was the Abaghi family, more specifically a person called Gahibi who destroyed the Karangwa house. A person named Gasimba Daniels, who was an enemy of Ephrem Karanga also participated in destroying the Karangwa house. Gasimba Daniels had purchased and distributed the petrol to the neighbours of Ephrem Karangwa, for the purpose of destroying Ephrem Karangwa's house. This petrol was used to set Ephrem Karangwa's house on fire. A certain person known as Usuri (phonetic spelling) also participated in destroying Ephrem Karangwa's house. The witness stated that he knew all the people responsible for the destruction of Ephrem Karangwa's house and the Accused was not involved.

253. Witness DAX admitted under cross-examination that he did not see Ephrem Karangwa's house being destroyed but he had spoken to the people responsible for such destruction immediately after the house was set on fire. He observed that they were carrying doors that they had removed from Ephrem Karangwa's house and they were boasting about their actions.

The Testimony of the Accused

254. The Accused testified that on 19 April 1994 at about 4 o' clock in the afternoon, he went to Musambira. He stated that the bourgmestre of Musambira promised to give him some fabric that he had intended to use to make a uniform for the new police officer he had employed. The Accused also stated that on 20 April 1994 he went to Kabgayi. He said that his reason for going to Kabgayi was to see one Kayibanda Alfred to ask him for shelter because he thought about fleeing. The Accused said that he saw Ephrem Karangwa's sister at Kabgayi. She greeted the Accused and he did the same. The Accused said that when he saw Karangwa's sister he realised that Karangwa was in Kabgayi. The Accused said that Karangwa abandoned him during the events of 1994. He stated that he had written to Karangwa on two occasions during the events of April 1994 and Karangwa had failed to respond. The Accused also stated that during the events of 1994 he saw Karangwa at Kamonyi. On this occasion he had spoken to Karangwa and asked Karangwa why he had abandoned him. That was all the Accused said in his testimony that was relevant to the allegations in paragraph 18 of the Indictment.

Factual Findings

255. The Chamber finds that on 19 April 1994, the Accused was searching for Ephrem Karangwa. At approximately 1am, on that day, Karangwa received a report that at a meeting led by the Accused, plans were made to kill him and other Tutsi. Karangwa's evidence that the Accused was in pursuit of him and his family, is corroborated by many witnesses. Witnesses V, E and Z were present at the meeting in the morning of 19 April 1994 at Gishyeshye, addressed by the Accused, when Karangwa's name was mentioned as being on a list of people to be killed; and the Accused named the IPJ as working with the RPF and told the people to look for him. Witness V reported this meeting to Karangwa, later in Witness V saw the Accused in Kabgayi twice and on one of these times, on 20 April 1994, the Accused asked him to find Karangwa and bring Karangwa to him. Witness K, in the morning of 19 April 1994, saw the Accused get into his vehicle at the Bureau Communal and instruct others to also get in so that Ephrem Karangwa would not escape them. Witness KK also heard the Accused refer to Tutsi and Ephrem Karangwa and say, "we now have to hunt them and kill all of them". Defence witness DCC confirmed under cross-examination that the Accused had wasted no time in pursuing Ephrem Karangwa

256. Karangwa and his family left their house and went into hiding. His sisters, mother and wife went to his wife's sister's house in Musambira and he and his brothers hid on a hill opposite his house. Karangwa saw the Accused arrive at his house on the morning of 19 April 1994 in a blue Toyota Hiace mini bus, accompanied by men in two other Toyota vehicles, one red and the other white. The Accused was wearing a military jacket. A gun was fired which frightened the dogs away. The houses of Karangwa and his mother were burnt and looted. The Accused and the group of people then left. The fact that the Accused was wearing a military jacket during this time is corroborated by other witnesses. Witness S saw him in that military jacket later that day; Witness V saw him at Kabgayi on 20 April 1994 in the military uniform of the Rwandan army; defence Witness DAAX saw the Accused in a military jacket and warned him against it's use. Defence witness DFX confirmed that the Accused wore a soldier's shirt. The Accused testified that he wore a military jacket in May, given to him by a colonel of the Rwandan army.

257. Karangwa hid on a hill approximately 80 metres from the house of witness S in Musambira, to await his brothers. The Accused, together with the bourgmestre of Musambira, a police officer named Emanuel Musumba and others arrived in two motor vehicles that were blue and red in colour. Karangwa heard shouts and whistles, and thereafter saw his brothers in the courtyard with these people. He heard the Accused say that his brothers must be shot and he heard gun-shots. His three brothers whom he names in his written statement to the prosecutor as; Simon Mutijima, Thadée Uwanyiligira, and Jean Chrysostome were shot dead.

258. Karangwa fled to Kabgayi where the Accused continued to look for him. Witness V told Karangwa that the Accused was looking for him in Kabgayi and he himself saw the Accused on two occasions and evaded arrest. Karangwa remained in Kabgayi from 21 April to 21 June 1994. In cross-examination the witness denied various statements attributed to him in his written statement to the prosecutor and adhered to his testimony before the Chamber. He re-affirmed that he had not seen the shooting of his brothers but heard the Accused give the order that they be shot, and the fact that he was there made him responsible for their deaths.

259. The Defence Counsel submitted that because of the uncertainties and inconsistencies in the evidence before the Chamber on how the Karangwa brothers were killed and more specifically what weapons were used, material averments in respect of this allegation were not proved.

260. The Defence Counsel cross-examined Karangwa on the discrepancy between his evidence that his brothers were shot and his prior statement to the Office of the Prosecutor that two of his brothers died from injuries sustained from machete blows. Karangwa denied stating this to the Office of the Prosecutor and reaffirmed his testimony that all three of his brothers were shot. This explanation was not subjected to further cross-examination by Defence Counsel.

261. As noted else where, the Chamber places greater reliance on direct testimony rather than untested prior statements made under variable circumstances. The Chamber accepts Karangwa's explanation for the inconsistent prior statement and notes that his evidence that his brothers died of injuries inflicted by gun shots is consistent throughout his testimony and is corroborated by the testimony of witness S.

262. The Chamber finds that Karangwa gave a truthful account of events actually witnessed by him and that he did so without exaggeration or hostility. The Chamber is satisfied that the witness could reasonably have seen and heard the matters to which he testified. Witness S confirmed Karangwa's evidence in all material respects. Karangwa's three brothers came to Witness S's house on the afternoon of 19 April 1994. They were not armed and wore civilian clothes. They heard vehicles and the brothers hid behind the house. A red Hilux "pick-up" belonging to the commune of Musambira was outside his house. A group of people came to his house; among them was the bourgmestre and assistant bourgmestre of Musambira, the Accused, whom he knew as the bourgmestre of Taba, the assistant bourgmestre of Taba, men in police uniforms carrying firearms, two of whom he knew as police from Musambira, and civilians.

263. The Accused held a grenade in his hand. The Chamber notes that this is in contradiction to Karangwa's observation that the Accused carried a gun. While it is clear from both their testimony that the Accused held a weapon in his hand, Witness S's identification thereof is more reliable, as he was in close proximity to the Accused in the courtyard of his house.

264. Witness S's house was searched by the assistant bourgmestre of Musambira and two policemen from Taba. During the search, the Accused ordered the police to surround the house to prevent Karangwa escaping. People from Musambira also acted on this instruction.

265. The brothers of Karangwa tried to flee, and the police officers blew their whistles and said stop those "Inyenzi" from running away. A mob of people took up the call, chased after the brothers and brought them back. The brothers were bleeding from open wounds and their clothing was torn. They were made to sit on the ground about 2 metres from the entrance to the courtyard. The bourgmestre of Musambira asked the Accused if he knew the men and what should be done with them. The Accused said they came from his commune and said we need to finish these people off-they need to be shot. All three brothers were then shot dead at close range in the back of their heads by two policemen from Musambira, in the Accused's presence.

266. After the killing, the Accused and his group drove off in the direction of Taba. Witness S saw a person tied up in the Accused's vehicle. Witness S and his family were detained at the bureau communal in Musambira, from where he later escaped. In cross-examination, the witness confirmed his direct testimony and he explained that he had omitted to give an account of the Accused's's involvement , in his statement to the prosecutor of Gitarama because he was asked specific questions related to the bourgmestre of Musambira. The chamber finds this to be a reasonable explanation and accepts the direct, eye-witness testimony of Witness S on these events and rejects the hearsay evidence of defence witness DXX.

267. The Accused confirmed his presence in Musambira on the afternoon of 19 April 1994 and in Kabgayi on 20 April 1994 ,but offered explanations for his appearance that are beyond belief, in the light of overwhelming testimony to the effect that he was at that time in hot pursuit of Karangwa. The defence did not specifically address allegations, and failed to challenge the evidence of witnesses S, Karangwa and others on material issues, such as his hunt for Karangwa, orders to look for Karangwa and other tutsi to be killed, his presence at the houses of Karangwa and witness S, his carrying of a grenade and his participation in the killing of the Karangwa's brothers by ordering their deaths and being present when they were killed.

268. The Chamber has not found any evidence that the Accused blew the whistle to alert local residents to the attempted escape of the brothers but finds as proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was present at both houses, that he was searching for Karangwa, that the houses of Karangwa and his mother were destroyed in his presence by men under his control, that he went to search the house of Karangwa's brother-in-law in Musimbira and found Karangwa's brothers at this house, that he participated in the killings of the three brothers, named, Simon Mutijima, Thadee Uwanyiligira, and Jean Chrysostome Gakuba, by ordering their deaths and being present when they were killed by policemen, under the immediate authority of the Accused as bourgmestre of Taba commune and in response to his order made to the bourgmestre of Musambira.

The Events Alleged

269. Paragraphs 19 and 20 of the Indictment read as follows:

> 19. On or about April 19, 1994, Jean Paul Akayesu took 8 detained men from the Taba bureau communal and ordered militia members to kill them. The local people and militia killed them with machetes and agricultural tools in front of the Taba bureau communal.

270. For his alleged participation in the acts described in paragraphs 19 and 20, Akayesu is charged under seven counts, namely:

> Count 1, Genocide, punishable by Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute of the Tribunal;

>
> Count 9, Crimes against Humanity (murder) punishable by Article 3(a) of the Statute of the Tribunal; and
>
> Count 10, Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions, as incorporated by Article 4(a)(murder) of the Statute of the Tribunal.

271. The Chamber noted, during the presentation of evidence in this case, that the events alleged occurred during a distinct period on or about 19 April 1994 at the bureau communal. Consequently, paragraphs will be treated together.

272. A number of specific acts can be identified in the events set out in paragraphs 19 and 20. It is alleged, as pertains to paragraph 19, firstly, that Akayesu took eight refugees from the bureau communal, secondly, that he ordered militia members to kill them, thirdly, that the refugees were consequently killed with clubs, machetes, small axes and sticks, and fourthly, that the victims had fled from Runda commune and had been held by Akayesu. As regards paragraph 20, firstly, Akayesu is accused of having ordered local people and militia to kill intellectual and influential people, and secondly, five teachers, named in the Indictment, from the secondary school of Taba were killed on his instructions by the local people and militia with machetes and agricultural tools in front of Taba bureau communal. With these specific allegations in mind, the Chamber shall proceed in determining whether the participation of the accused in the events enunciated in paragraphs 19 and 20 of the Indictment has been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

273. The first witness to appear for the Prosecutor to testify in relation to the events alleged in paragraphs 19 and 20 was Witness K, a Tutsi woman, married to a Hutu, who was an accountant/cashier at the bureau communal in Taba from 1990 until 1994. She had worked under the authority of Akayesu whilst he was bourgmestre of the commune at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment. Witness K testified as follows.

274. On 19 April 1994, between 9h00 and 10h00, she had gone to the bureau communal following a demand from Akayesu who requested her services as the accountant/cashier of the commune. On arriving that morning, she encountered the accused, whose mood appeared to have changed, outside the bureau communal. She said he spoke to her harshly, asking her why she was no longer coming to work. Witness K told him she was scared, and that she had come to the bureau communal on this occasion only because he had asked her. She said Akayesu then told her that she would know why she had come.

275. After this exchange, witness K, who was still standing next to the accused, testified that Akayesu called over a certain Etienne, and instructed him to bring the youths'. She saw Etienne drive off in the direction of Remera, and return with a number of youths' who were armed with traditional weapons, such as machetes and small axes69. Witness K said they all gathered close to Akayesu who told them "Messieurs, if you knew what the Tutsi who live with you are doing, I inform you that what I heard during the meeting is sufficient. Right now, I can no longer have pity for the Tutsi, especially the intellectuals. Even those who are with us, those we have kept here, I want to deliver them to you so that you can render a judgment unto them"70. The witness said Akayesu then proceeded to release the refugees from Runda held in the communal prison, and handed them - with the words here they are' - to the Interahamwe, whom she also called the killers'.

276. Witness K affirmed that there were eight refugees, all men, three of whom she personally knew to be Tutsi. She explained that they did not have their hands tied and that they all looked fine. She said the Interahamwe escorted the eight refugees to the fence of the bureau communal, where they were made to sit on the ground, in a line, their backs to the fence and their legs straight out in front of them. According to the witness, the refugees pleaded for mercy as the Interahamwe prepared to kill them. Witness K testified that Akayesu then said "Do it quickly", at which point they were killed rapidly by a large group of people who used whatever weapon they had on them.

277. After the eight refugees had been killed, witness K said she heard Akayesu instruct a communal policeman to open the communal prison and release the persons who had been imprisoned for Common law offences so that they could bury the dead refugees. She said the persons who had been released from the prison by Akayesu put the bloody bodies of the victims onto a wheelbarrow and took them away to be buried.

278. Witness K testified she heard Akayesu tell those present to fetch the one who remained. She said this person was a professor by the name of Samuel. Witness K said that they fetched him and she saw him being killed with a machete blow to the neck.

279. According to the witness, Akayesu then gave instructions for the release of all those who had broken the law, and told them to go into the hills with their whistles so as to sensitize the youth. Witness K understood this to mean go to your sectors, increase public awareness of the population and kill with them. Witness K testified she heard the accused tell the killers' that she would be killed after she had been interrogated about the Inkotanyi secrets. She said Akayesu put her into her office, took her keys and locked her up. The witness said she saw Akayesu get into a car, instructing others to also get in so that Ephrem Karangwa wouldn't escape them

280. Witness K said she had other keys on her person, thus enabling her to access the meeting room in the bureau communal from where she was able to see the events occurring outside. She testified she saw many people being brought to the bureau communal and killed, some of the victims only making it as far as the front of the entrance of the bureau communal before being killed. According to the witness, amongst those killed were professors from Remera school. She said the bodies of the victims, even those still alive, were put into wheelbarrows and taken for burial.

281. When questioned about the use of whistles, Witness K said she saw persons go behind the bureau communal to get a professor who lived there. She said that these persons used whistles so as to terrorize this professor, and to attract the attention of others nearby.

282. Pursuant to a question from the Chamber as to the killing of teachers, witness K stated she was unsure how many were killed, but that she knew the names of some of them, Theogene, Tharcisse, a woman called Phoebe (the gérante of Remera secondary school), and her fiancé whose name she didn't know. She explained that the woman was killed because it was alleged a radio for communicating with the Inkotanyi had been found at her house. She further stated that the true reason for the killings of the teachers and the refugees was because they were Tutsi.

283. Under cross-examination, questioned about where the teachers she saw being killed had come from, witness K stated that some of the teachers had been brought from the direction of Remera and another from behind the bureau communal. Asked if Akayesu was then still present, she stated that she had explained that Akayesu wasn't present when the actual killings of the professors took place. She reasserted being next to Akayesu when he gave the order to kill the teachers.

284. Under cross-examination, witness K further testified she had heard the refugees had been locked up in the prison of the bureau communal by Akayesu at the request of the bourgmestre of Runda, but that she hadn't heard whether this bourgmestre had asked for these refugees to be killed. She said she had found out the refugees were from Runda by speaking to at least two other individuals from Runda whom she knew. The witness testified not knowing why exactly the refugees had been locked up in the communal prison, but was adamant they had been killed because of their Tutsi ethnicity. Witness K also confirmed that she was next to Akayesu at the bureau communal when he gave the instructions to fetch the youths/Interahamwe and that she heard Akayesu order the killing of the refugees from Runda.

285. Witness KK for the Prosecutor, a Hutu woman married to a Tutsi and residing in Taba commune in 1994, also testified in relation to the events alleged in paragraphs 19 and 20. She said that shortly after April 6 1994, the houses of Tutsi including her own were pillaged, and that she sought refuge at the bureau communal with her Tutsi husband and nine children. She said many refugees came to the bureau communal, but that they were treated differently depending on their ethnicity. According to the witness, the atmosphere changed a few days later with the arrival of a number of Interahamwe from Remera. She said the Interahamwe addressed the refugees in the presence of Akayesu in front of the bureau communal. According to witness KK, the Interahamwe stated that they had uncovered a Tutsi plan to kill the Hutu, but as their God was never far, and because they had discovered the plan, they were going to put the Tutsi where the Tutsi had planned to put the Hutu.

286. According to the testimony of witness KK, Akayesu then went to his office. On his return, she asserted he was angry and brandished a document which he read to the refugees, by saying "We lived with Tutsi, there was a hatred between us. The IPJ, Karangwa Ephrem had planned to kill me so that he could replace me in my function as bourgmestre. We now have to hunt them and find all of them"71. The witness testified Akayesu continued by talking of a landmine planted by the Tutsi that had exploded at the primary school. This landmine, she heard the accused state, was the beginning of the planned killings of Hutu. She said the accused then stated that as schoolchildren of all ethnicities were in this school, when the explosion happened, it was aimed at all Rwandans.

287. Witness KK testified Akayesu said further "there are many accomplices in our commune. There is an accomplice who is to be found behind the bureau communal, who is called Tharcisse. He was a professor"72. She said Akayesu then told the policemen and Interahamwe to fetch him. The witness saw Tharcisse and his wife being made to sit in the mud. She said the wife was undressed and told to go and die elsewhere. She also heard Akayesu ask Tharcisse for information on the Inkotanyi.She said Tharcisse replied "do what you will because I know no secrets". She testified Tharcisse was killed by the Interahamwe on the road outside the bureau communal. She testified Akayesu was standing near to where the victim was sitting.

288. Witness KK said she also heard Akayesu order the Interahamwe to bring the teachers who taught in Remera, and say that the intellectuals were the source of all of the misery. She testified that she saw the Interahamwe return very angry with the teachers. She saw the teachers, the number of which she was unsure of being made to sit in the mud on the road outside the bureau communal, where Tharcisse had been killed. According to the witness, it was alleged that these teachers had communicated by radio with Inkotanyi. Witness KK said a young couple who were soon to be married was killed first. She said that all the teachers were killed on the road in front of the bureau communal with little hoes and clubs and that she had heard it being stated that to kill them with a bullet or grenade would be inflicting a less atrocious death. The witness added that no one could ask for help because Tutsi were not allowed to live in Taba commune. She said the bodies of the teachers were then taken to makeshift ditches, and covered in earth and grass. According to witness KK, some of the teachers were still breathing when buried.

289. Under cross-examination, witness KK asserted that no teachers had taken up refuge at the bureau communal, but that the massacres had started with the killing of the teachers. The Defence attempted to discredit the witness by raising doubts as to the various dates she spoke of during her testimony, however she explained that considering all that happened to her in April 1994, it was very difficult for her to remember with certainty the specific dates. She also confirmed never having seen Akayesu kill anyone himself, save that it was he who ordered the killings which took place before his eyes.

The case for the Defence

290. Witness DCC for the Defence, detained in Rwanda at the time of his appearance before the Chamber, was a driver at the Taba bureau communal from 1 July 1993 until the events in 1994. During his examination-in-chief, he stated that he had not heard of Akayesu being an anti-Tutsi in the month of April, 1994. He also testified he came every day to the bureau communal during the massacres. During cross-examination, he added he had seen a substantial number of persons being killed at the bureau communal. According to the witness, the bodies of those killed were taken next to the primary school, however he said he never personally witnessed any burials of cadavers because he was not part of the people who took the bodies away. He maintained this statement even though he testified that he walked past the school every day on his way home. The Chamber notes thereupon, that in answer to questions put to him by the Chamber, pertaining to there being mass graves in the vicinity of the bureau communal, the witness said that he rarely went to the bureau communal during 1994 and that he had never seen any mass graves.

291. Witness DCC testified that after 6 April 1994, refugees from Runda and Shyorongi started arriving at the bureau communal of Taba, where they were welcomed by the authorities and lodged in various premises. He said the refugees were all free and none were locked up in the prison. Witness DCC testified he saw Interahamwe on two occasions come to the bureau communal and kill people. On the first of these occasions, he said the Interahamwe were from Taba but that he did not personally see Akayesu. On the second of these occasions, he saw the Interahamwe from Runda with military personnel search the office of Akayesu after having forced him out of the bureau communal. He said the Interahamwe terrorised the people at the bureau communal and asked for identity cards. According to witness DCC, the Interahamwe took the Tutsi away to be killed. He also said that Akayesu did not have a good understanding with the Interahamwe who accused him at times of being an Inkotanyi as he was welcoming refugees at the bureau communal.

292. Reference was also made by the Defence to the statement given by witness DCC to the Prosecutor[73], in which he stated "What I know, Akayesu was only present at the commune office one time when four people were killed at the entrance of the office. Akayesu did not do anything about it. Akayesu knew that the killings of Tutsi took place in the commune. The killers were Interahamwe". According to the witness, Akayesu did nothing to stop the Interahamwe because he was powerless to do so.

293. During cross-examination, the witness asserted that he was 34 years old, that in 1994, he did not flee Taba or go to Uganda, and that he did not have knowledge of and never saw Akayesu searching for Karangwa. Witness DCC said he was arrested in Rwanda on 30 April 1996. The Prosecutor produced a report, "Witness to Genocide", of an interview given by witness DCC to an NGO named Africa Rights[74]. Witness DCC confirmed speaking to a Human Rights Organization in 1996. The Prosecutor summarized extracts of the said document which stated that at the time of the interview, Witness DCC was 33 years old, that he had been recruited as the driver of the commune on 1 July 1993, that he had returned to Rwanda and was arrested on 30 April 1996. The Prosecutor read out another extract: "According to Akayesu's driver, [...] Akayesu lost no time in pursuing Ephrem. On 19 April, Akayesu, assistant bourgmestre Mutijima and a communal policeman, Mushumba, went to Kamonyi to look for the IPJ of the commune, Ephrem Karangwa, saying that he was a great accomplice of the RPF. Akayesu and his team came back in the afternoon'". Witness DCC confirmed that Akayesu had not wasted any time in pursuing Karangwa, but denied having spoken of Kamonyi, of Akayesu's return or that Akayesu had called Karangwa an accomplice of the RPF.

294. Witness DZZ for the Defence, a Hutu policeman in 1994 detained in Rwanda at the time of his appearance before the Chamber, testified manning barriers in the commune of Taba and guarding the bureau communal at the time of the events alleged. He said massacres had become widespread in the commune of Taba after 18 April 1994 and that he had heard of massacres at the bureau communal. He said he went to the bureau communal on a regular basis and manned a barrier nearby, but asserted that he did not personally witness any crimes at the bureau communal. He testified that he had not heard of Akayesu participating in the massacres, and that the accused had preached peace amongst the refugees.

The witness said that Akayesu saved certain Tutsi, namely witness K and Karangwa, during the massacres. In his mind, they had been saved because, had Akayesu supported the killings, Akayes would also have targeted Karangwa and witness K.

295. Akayesu testified going to the bureau communal on 19 April 1994. On his arrival within the vicinity of the bureau communal, he said he saw the refugees running everywhere. In the courtyard of the bureau communal, according to Akayesu, the Interahamwe were killing the refugees who had fled from Runda and Shyorongi. He said he parked the car and saw the cashier, witness K. Akayesu said he was perplexed at seeing her and wondered from where she had come. He testified that he called out to her, ordering her to go into her office. He said he had to stop someone with a machete from attacking her and subsequently escorted her personally into the office of the bureau communal. According to Akayesu, he went back into the courtyard and saw refugees who had been killed, and noted that others had managed to escape. However, at a later stage during his examination-in-chief, when asked whether anyone had ever been killed in the courtyard of the bureau communal, Akayesu stated that when he was at the bureau communal or when there had been Interahamwe attacks during his absence, no one had been killed in the courtyard. After these events, Akayesu said he departed with the communal police in the direction of Mbizi, consequent upon receiving information that some of the killers had gone to Mbizi.

296. During cross-examination, the Prosecutor presented tape recordings of interviews of Akayesu carried out by the Office of the Prosecutor on 10 and 11 April 1996 in Zambia75. The Prosecutor questioned the credibility of Akayesu's testimony before the Chamber regarding answers he had given about the refugees at the bureau communal on 18, 19 and 20 April 1994. During his testimony, Akayesu stated he was unable to distinguish intellectuals from the rest of the refugees on the basis that there was no criteria to make it possible to tell an intellectual apart from other persons. However, in the said interviews, the accused said he was surprised not to have seen intellectuals of the commune amongst the refugees who, in his opinion, appeared to be farmers, old women, children, and old people. The Chamber questioned Akayesu as to the differences in the answers given in court, on the one hand, and before the Office of the Prosecutor, on the other. Akayesu said he had not seen anyone who could be categorized as an intellectual/teacher, but that he was able to find out by speaking with the refugees whether or not there were any intellectuals/teachers amongst them.

297. Furthermore the accused confirmed that in the context of the events in 1994, had he told the population to fight the enemy, this would have been understood as meaning fight the Tutsi. He also asserted not having control of the population after 18 April 1994. He said witness KK was at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994. Questioned as to the killings at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994, Akayesu said he did not see anyone killed with a machete because he was in the courtyard of the bureau communal attending to witness K. Akayesu added that he never saw any bodies either outside or inside the perimeter of the bureau communal and never went behind the primary school. Further, Akayesu testified never personally seeing cadavers save for the bodies of two dead children in his sector. In answer to questions on the fate of the schoolteachers whom he said he knew, Akayesu stated only hearing of their killings near the bureau communal three days after their deaths.

298. In support of its case, the Defence recalled that at least 19 witnesses in this case had never seen Akayesu either personally kill or order killings, and that only one witness, witness K, had been called to testify in relation to the events in paragraphs 19 and 20 of the Indictment. The Defence questioned the credibility of witness K on the grounds that Akayesu, during the said interviews of 1996, had cited this particular witness as a potential defence witness. If witness K had really lived through all the events she testified on, argued the Defence, why would Akayesu have named her as a defence witness.

299. The testimonies of witnesses K and KK evidenced, on the one hand, events which both K and KK witnessed, and on the other hand, events that only one of the two had witnessed. The Chamber recalls that the requirement of corroboration of a witness' testimony unique to certain events, i.e. the principle of unus testis nullus testis, is not applicable under the Rules of the Tribunal76. The Chamber found both witness K and witness KK to be credible. Their testimonies were not marked by hostility and were confirmed under cross-examination. The Defence attempted to discredit witness KK on the basis of her inability to remember specific dates and times. However, the Chamber considers that these lapses of memory were not significant and an inability to recall dates and times with specificity - particularly in the light of the traumatic experience of this witness - is not by itself a basis for discrediting the witness77.

300. Further, the Defence contested the credibility of witness K on the premise that Akayesu had indicated to the Prosecutor in April 1996 that she was a potential defence witness. The Chamber finds this to be a mere affirmation by Akayesu of his intent to call a certain witness, and that it does not constitute a defence per se as to the allegations contained in paragraphs 19 and 20 of the Indictment. Further the Defence claimed the Prosecutor had called only one witness in respect of the events alleged in the said paragraphs. In light of the testimonies of two witnesses, namely K and KK, the Chamber finds the latter to be an erroneous submission by the Defence.

301. In view of the aforementioned, the Chamber finds the testimonies of witnesses K and KK both to be credible on their own, and that when dealt with together they offer sufficient correlation as to events, dates and locations for the Chamber to base its findings thereon.

302. During their respective testimonies before the Chamber, both witnesses DCC and DZZ were evasive in answering questions in relation to the events alleged in paragraphs 19 and 20 of the Indictment. However, the Chamber notes that the reluctance of these witnesses in answering certain questions was limited either to their individual participation in the acts, or to events they had personally seen. The Chamber recalls that both witnesses DCC and DZZ were at the time of their testimonies, detained in prisons in Rwanda, hence it is understandable that neither wished to present self-incriminating evidence. The Chamber has considered the probative value of their testimonies in light of the above, and finds that the evasiveness and reluctance which punctuated their oral testimony reduced their credibility.

303. Witnesses K and KK for the Prosecution, testified that they witnessed massacres at the bureau communal. Witness K specified seeing the massacres on 19 April 1994 at the bureau communal, and witness KK testified that the massacres started with the killing of teachers.

304. Both witnesses presented by the Defence, witness DCC and DZZ, also testified that killings took place at the bureau communal. Witness DCC went to the bureau communal everyday during the events. He saw people, mainly Tutsi, being massacred by the Interahamwe and taken to be buried behind the primary school. Furthermore, the Defence presented as evidence the statement given by witness DCC to the Prosecutor78. The section quoted by the Defence clearly indicates that Akayesu was at the bureau communal when four people were killed at the entrance of the office and that he knew the killing of Tutsi was taking place in the commune. Questioned as to why Akayesu did nothing to stop these acts perpetrated by the Interahamwe, witness DCC said Akayesu was powerless to do so. The Chamber notes that the testimony of witness DCC supports the prosecution's evidence that people were killed at the bureau communal, in the presence of the accused; and conflicts with Akayesu's testimony that no killings took place at the bureau communal and that the only dead bodies he saw were those of two children

305. Witness DZZ testified that he went regularly to the bureau communal but that he never personally saw any massacres or crimes he had heard of being perpetrated. He added that Akayesu never participated in the massacres and even preached peace amongst the refugees. He also affirmed t massacres in Taba had become widespread after 18 April 1994. However, the Chamber notes that for witness DZZ to stipulate on the occasions he went to the bureau communal he did not see any of the massacres, and further that he had not heard of Akayesu's participation in massacres, does not refute the specific allegations in paragraphs 19 and 20. Indeed, it is alleged killings occurred at the bureau communal in the presence and under the instructions of Akayesu. DZZ had heard there were massacres at the bureau communal but never personally witnessed any. The Chamber notes thereon that the defence presented by the testimony of witness DZZ supports the fact that there were massacres at the bureau communal but that it does not specifically address the events in the said paragraphs, as the witness was not present when the killings he had heard of took place.

306. Akayesu admitted during his examination-in-chief that he saw massacres of refugees at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994. This is corroborated by the testimonies of witnesses DZZ, DCC, K and KK in relation to there being massacres at the bureau communal. The Chamber finds it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that, firstly, there were refugees at the bureau communal and, secondly, that massacres did occur at the bureau communal on or about 19 April 1994.

307. Akayesu confirmed under cross-examination that he was able to identify intellectuals, teachers being an example he put to the Chamber, from the rest of the refugees. Witnesses K and KK both stated that Akayesu ordered the killing of certain intellectuals and other refugees. The Defence did not specifically address these allegations. Under cross-examination, questioned as to these allegations, Akayesu said he never saw anyone killed in the courtyard with a machete because he was attending to witness K, that he never saw any bodies inside or outside the courtyard of the bureau communal and that he heard of the deaths of the teachers three days after their killings. The Chamber finds that the veracity of these answers can be doubted. Indeed, Akayesu affirmed himself during his examination-in-chief that, on 19 April 1994, he saw refugees being attacked at the bureau communal, and that he saw some killed and others escape. Further, the Chamber finds implausible the assertion that he heard of the deaths of the Remera teachers three days later. Witnesses, including himself, have placed Akayesu at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994. Akayesu testified to seeing and hearing of searches of various intellectuals in Taba throughout the day of 19 April 1994, yet he somehow did not hear of killings that took place at the bureau communal the same day. The Chamber cannot accept Akayesu's assertion with regard to the killing of teachers. Further, the Chamber notes that Akayesu did not specifically contest the allegations that he ordered the militia and local population to kill intellectuals and influential people.

Paragraph 19

308. As pertains to the allegations in paragraph 19, evidence set out above has demonstrated that refugees from Runda had been held at the bureau communal by Akayesu. Evidence has established that Akayesu told the Interahamwe he had sent for that "[...] he could no longer have pity for the Tutsi. Even those who we have kept here, I want to deliver them to you so that you can render a judgment unto them". It has been demonstrated that he then ordered the release of the refugees and handed them over to the Interahamwe with the words here they are'. Evidence has demonstrated that these refugees were made to sit next to the fence of the bureau communal and that when they begged for mercy, Akayesu said to the Interahamwe do it quickly'. It has been established that immediately after Akayesu had said this, the refugees were killed in his presence, by persons nearby who used whatever weapons they had on them. It has been established that the refugees were killed because they were Tutsi.

309. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu released eight detained men of Runda commune whom he was holding in the bureau communal and handed them over to the Interahamwe. It has also been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu ordered the local militia to kill them. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the eight refugees were killed by the Interahamwe in the presence of Akayesu. The Chamber also finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that traditional weapons, including machetes and small axes, were used in the killings, though it is has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that sticks and clubs were used in the killings. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the eight refugees were killed because they were Tutsi.

Paragraph 20

310. Evidence has demonstrated that after the killing of the refugees, Akayesu instructed people near him to fetch the one who remained', and that consequent to this instruction, a certain professor by the name of Samuel was brought to the bureau communal. It has been established that Samuel was then killed with a machete blow to the neck.

311. Evidence has demonstrated that on or about 19 April 1994, Akayesu addressed refugees and Interahamwe in front of the bureau communal, calling for all Tutsi within the commune to be hunted and found. It has been established that Akayesu stated that there were accomplices in the commune, one of whom lived behind the bureau communal. It has been established that Akayesu cited a professor by the name of Tharcisse as the accomplice and ordered the Interahamwe and communal policemen to fetch him. Evidence has established that persons using whistles fetched Tharcisse and his wife from behind the bureau communal. Tharcisse and his wife were made to sit in the mud on the road outside the bureau communal, whereupon his wife was undressed and told to leave. It has been established that Akayesu asked Tharcisse for information on the Inkotanyi, after which the Interahamwe killed Tharcisse in the presence of Akayesu.

312. Evidence has shown that Akayesu said to the Interahamwe that the intellectuals were the source of all the misery, and that he ordered the Interahamwe to bring the teachers from Remera. It has been demonstrated that a number of teachers from Remera school were brought to the road outside the bureau communal and killed with traditional weapons, including hoes and clubs. Evidence identified the victims to be Theogene and Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé.

313. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that on or about 19 April 1994, Akayesu ordered the local people and Interahamwe to kill intellectual people'. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that, after the killing of the refugees, Akayesu instructed the local people and Interahamwe near him at the bureau communal to fetch the one who remains', a professor by the name of Samuel, and that consequent to this instruction, a certain professor by the name of Samuel was brought to the bureau communal. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Samuel was then killed by the local people and Interahamwe with a machete blow to the neck. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that teachers from the commune of Taba were killed pursuant to the instructions of Akayesu. The Chamber finds it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that amongst the teachers who were killed were Tharcisse, Theogene, Phoebe Uwineze and her fiancé. It has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Tharcisse was killed in the presence of Akayesu. The Chamber finds it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were all killed by local people and Interahamwe using machetes and agricultural tools on the road in front of the bureau communal. The Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu ordered the killing of influential people, nor that the victims were teachers from the secondary school of Taba.

314. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the teachers were killed because they were Tutsi.

5.3 Meeting

5.3.1. Paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Indictment

315. Paragraph 14 of the Indictment reads as follows: "The morning of April 19, 1994, following the murder of Sylvère Karera, Jean Paul Akayesu led a meeting in Gishyeshye sector at which he sanctioned the death of Sylvère Karera and urged the population to eliminate accomplices of the RPF, which was understood by those present to mean Tutsi. Over 100 people were present at the meeting. The killing of Tutsi in Taba began shortly after the meeting".

316. It is alleged that by the acts with which he is charged in this paragraph, the Accused is guilty of offences covered under four counts:

> Count 1 of the Indictment charges him with the crime of genocide, punishable under Article 2 (3)(a) of the Statute;
>
> Count 2 charges him with the crime of complicity in genocide, punishable under Article 2 (3)(e) of the Statute;
>
> Count 3 charges him with the crime of extermination which constitutes a crime against humanity, punishable under Article 3 (b) of the Statute; and
> Count 4 charges him with the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide, punishable under Article 2 (3)(c) of the Statute.

317. The Chamber deems that, in order to derive clear and articulate factual findings regarding the acts alleged in paragraph 14 of the Indictment, it is necessary to consider, separately, the facts relating to:

> firstly, the holding on the morning of 19 April 1994 of a meeting in Gishyeshye sector, alleged to have been attended by over 100 people and led by the Accused alone following the death of Mr. Karera;
>
> secondly, the fact during that meeting, the Accused is alleged to have sanctioned the death of Sylvère Karera;
>
> thirdly, the fact during that meeting, the Accused is alleged to have urged the population to eliminate the accomplices of the RPF, which was understood by those present to mean Tutsi; and
>
> Fourthly, the killing of Tutsi in Taba is alleged to have begun shortly after the said meeting.

318. With regard to the facts in paragraph 14 of the Indictment detailed as follows:

> "The morning of April 19, 1994, following the murder of Sylvère Karera, Jean Paul Akayesu led a meeting in Gishyeshye sector. (.....) Over 100 people were present at the meeting."

319. The Chamber finds a substantial disparity between the French and English versions of paragraph 14 of the Indictment. While in the French version it is said that " Jean Paul Akayesu alone led a meeting," the English version only indicates that "Jean Paul Akayesu led a meeting,' without specifying whether he led the meeting alone. The Chamber is of the opinion that the French version should be accepted in this particular case, because the Indictment was read to the Accused in French at his initial appearance because the Accused and his counsel spoke French during the hearings and, above all, because the general principles of law stipulate that, in criminal matters, the version favourable to the Accused should be selected. In the present case and in accordance with the French version of the Indictment, the Prosecution must not only establish that the Accused led the meeting, but also that he led it alone.

320. The murder of Sylvère Karera, a teacher killed on the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, and the subsequent events, alleged under paragraph 13 of the Indictment, have already been discussed supra.

321. Prosecution witness A testified that after he saw the remains of Sylvère Karera at the Remera school, he went to Gishyeshye on 19 April 1994, towards 6 or 7 o'clock in the morning, where he found a large gathering of 300 to 400 people at a crossroads. The witness stated that no one had convened the meeting but that it was rather a gathering of people attracted by the events. The crowd stood near to the body of a person identified as an Interahamwe from Gishyeshye, who was alleged to have killed Sylvère Karera. A small group of people, including the bourgmestre , the Accused, sector council members and four armed members of the Interahamwe, who could be identified by the MRND coat of arms on their caps, faced the crowd in such a way that enabled them to address it. The sector councillors called on the crowd to pay attention to the speech by the . Witness A pointed out that the Interahamwe stood near a blue minibus in which the Accused had arrived, and that they seemed to have been escorting the latter, which was a surprise to the crowd.

322. A Tutsi man, appearing as a Prosecution witness under the pseudonym Z, testified that on or about 19 April 1994, in the early hours of the day following the murder of a Tutsi teacher in Remera, the murderer of this teacher was killed by persons responsible for maintaining law and order. Witness Z and other people gathered around the body of the teacher's murderer. The crowd Accused the Interahamwe present of having caused the death of the teacher. The Accused, who was armed, separated the rest of the population from members of the Interahamwe and then addressed the crowd.

323. Prosecution witness V, a teacher in Taba for nearly 30 years, went to Gishyeshye sector where he attended a meeting, at the place where the body of a Hutu man lay. He confirmed that a meeting was then held on the road in Gishyeshye, in the presence of the Accused, who was carrying a gun, and who organized the said meeting. The witness estimated that it was attended by some 500 people. The people were standing in front of a house. The Accused himself stood in the middle of the road with the Interahamwe next to him, across the road from the people.

324. Ephrem Karangwa, a Tutsi man, called as witness for the Prosecution, who, at the time of the acts alleged in the Indictment, was the Inspecteur de police judiciaire (Senior law enforcement Officer, criminal investigation department) of the Taba commune, testified before the Chamber that on 19 April, the Accused held a meeting in Gishyeshye sector.

325. Men, who had gone to inquire after Sylvère Karera, told witness U that a person had been killed following the murder of Karera and that the Accused himself had gone to where the body was and held a meeting there.

326. The holding of the said meeting was confirmed by the Accused himself, who told the Chamber during his testimony as witness, that at about 4 a.m., on the night of 18 to 19 April 1994, a certain Augustin Sebazungu, treasurer of the MDR in Taba and a resident of Gishyeshye sector, came to see him at the Bureau communal, where he had been sleeping, to inform him that the situation in Gishyeshye sector was tense, following the murder of a young man who was a member of the Interahamwe. The bourgmestre immediately alerted the police and went to the scene with two policemen, in a blue minibus. In Gishyeshye, he found a body stretched out on the ground, covered traces of blood, as if it had been hit. The Accused affirmed before the Chamber that since people were coming to see what was happening, he took advantage of the fact that a crowd had gathered there to address the population. He noted that the Interahamwe of the region had flocked around the body of their young member. The Accused puts the crowd at the meeting at about 100 to 200 people, including Hutu and Tutsi, members of the Interahamwe, members of the MDR and probably other political parties. The Accused admitted before the Chamber that he asked the crowd to draw closer, and then addressed the crowd, while the two policemen accompanying him stood behind him.

327. In his closing arguments, the Defence counsel underscored that the Accused never convened the Gishyeshye meeting, but that a crowd had spontaneously gathered after a man had been killed. The Accused, as bourgmestre, reportedly found himself among the crowd thus assembled which included members of the Interahamwe.

328. With regard to the facts in paragraph 14 of the Indictment detailed as follows:

> " Jean Paul Akayesu (...) sanctioned the death of Sylvère Karera"

329. According to Prosecution witness V, the Accused stated that Sylvère Karera died because he was working with the Inkotanyi. The bourgmestre further stated that the person whose body lay at the meeting place had been wrongly killed, but that Sylvère Karera had been justly killed. Under cross-examination by the Defence, witness V reiterated that the Accused stated that Karera had been killed because he was working with the Inkotanyi.

330. Witness Z, a Tutsi man, testified that at the meeting which followed the murder of the Remera teacher, the Accused, who was armed, separated the rest of the population from the members of the Interahamwe and, speaking of the body on the ground, he reportedly deplored the murder of the person and stated that this person was dead and yet the enemy was still alive. According to witness Z, the Accused told the crowd that papers detailing Tutsi plans to exterminate the Hutu had been seized at the home of the teacher.

331. The Accused told the Chamber, during his testimony, that he had inquired of the crowd standing around the body of the young Interahamwe, why the young man had been killed. The people gathered there, answered that he had looted and that he had been justly punished. The bourgmestre then stayed on to speak to the people, trying to explain to them that killing as a habit must stop and making them aware of the consequences. He condemned the murder of the young man because he felt that such was not a way of maintaining law and order, and explained that it would have been enough to arrest the young man. The Accused told the Chamber that he had asked Augustin Sebazungu why he, as a prominent figure and an educated man, had failed to stop the population from killing the young man, to which Sebazungu reportedly replied that there was nothing he could do.

332. With regard to the facts in paragraph 14 of the Indictment detailed as follows:

> " Jean Paul Akayesu (...) urged the population to eliminate the accomplices of the RPF, which was understood by those present to mean Tutsi."

333. Prosecution witness A testified that, during the said meeting, the Accused held papers which he allegedly showed to the crowd saying that the papers had been seized at the home of an Inkotanyi accomplice. He also said the papers detailed what the Inkotanyi accomplices were to do. The Accused showed the papers to the public. He stated that things had changed and that the Inkotanyi and their accomplices wanted to seize power. According to witness A, the bourgmestre stated that everyone should do everything possible to fight against those people because they were seeking to restore the former regime. He said that he was personally going to search for some of the people. A teacher then told the Accused that he knew of an accomplice to which the Accused replied: "Go fetch this person". Witness A also stated that the Interahamwe allegedly told the Accused he was to put the people of the commune at their disposal. The bourgmestre then told the crowd to fight against the Inkotanyi and their accomplices. The witness stated that the crowd remained rather calm even though it was stunned by the unusual statement made by the Accused. Witness A was personally surprised, just as, in his words, the rest of the people present, to see that the bourgmestre had changed and that he seemed, among other things, to have become friends with the Interahamwe.

334. Prosecution witness V told the Chamber that at the Gishyeshye meeting of 19 April 1994, the Accused asked the population to collaborate with the Interahamwe in the fight against the Tutsi, the sole enemy of the Hutus. According to witness V, the Accused brandished documents which he said contained a list of names of Hutu that the Tutsi wanted to kill. He read the papers and said that the Tutsi were holding meetings to exterminate the Hutu. Witness V felt that the bourgmestre wanted to make the population understand that the Tutsi were their enemies. The Accused said the Tutsi, the real and only enemies of the Hutu, must be killed. He called on the population to work with the Interahamwe to search for the sole enemy. He also said that there were well-known Tutsi people living in the commune, who were working with the RPF. Witness V stated that apart from the Accused, only a certain François took the floor, to state that a list of receipts for contributions, allegedly made by the Tutsi to the Inkotanyi, had been seized.

335. According to Prosecution witness C, during that meeting, showed the Accused the crowd documents which included a list of the names of Hutu whom the Inkotanyi and the Tutsi inhabitants of Taba wanted to kill and a list of the names of Tutsi who had paid their contributions to the RPF. The witness noted that, while the Interahamwe seemed to be happy, the crowd was stunned by the change in the behaviour of the bourgmestre. Witness C stated that the Accused said during the meeting that the Tutsi was the sole enemy of the Hutu. He confirmed that he did hear the Accused say the Tutsi must be killed.

336. Witness Z, a Tutsi man, testified that at the meeting which followed the murder of the Remera teacher, the Accused, who was armed, called on all those present to bury their political differences and unite to fight the enemy, the enemy being the Tutsi, the accomplices of the Inkotanyi. Witness Z stated that the Accused, speaking of the body of the young Interahamwe believed to have killed Sylvère Karera, deplored the murder of the person and said that he was dead whereas the enemy was still alive. Witness Z further testified that, at the meeting, the Accused had in his possession papers which included a list of names. The Accused read the papers and stated that the Tutsi were holding meetings to exterminate the Hutu. In addition to the Accused, a member of the Interahamwe, named François, also took the floor, holding papers his hands. He showed the papers and said they had been seized at the home of the teacher killed in Remera. The documents included a list of the names of Tutsi who had paid their contributions to the Inkotanyi. The crowd was surprised to see that the Accused then seemed to be cooperating with the Interahamwe. Witness Z felt that, during the said meeting, the Accused was addressing the Hutu and telling them to kill the Tutsi.

337. A certain Ephrem Karangwa, who was the Inspecteur de police judiciaire of Taba Commune at the time of the events, testified before the Chamber that at the Gishyeshye meeting, the Accused told the population to kill the Tutsi in Taba. The bourgmestre told the people that whether they supported the MDR, MRND or the PSD, they should unite and understand that there was only one enemy, namely the Tutsi. The Accused told the people not to fear the Interahamwe. According to the witness the people who attended the said meeting affirmed to him that, during the meeting, the Accused showed a list of people to be killed, which included the name of Ephrem Karangwa. Allegations that the Accused, inter alia, named Ephrem Karangwa during the said meeting, are included in paragraph 13 of the Indictment and elaborated upon here infra.

338. Men reportedly told Prosecution witness U that, at the meeting held by the Accused near the body of Sylvère Karera's murderer, it was said that the only enemy was the Tutsi and that all Tutsi must be killed. According to witness U, the crowd then allegedly said that the "plane" had been shot by the Inkotanyi, and that the Inkotanyi were the Tutsi.

339. Several Prosecution witnesses confirmed the Prosecution allegation that, when the Accused called on the people to fight against the enemy, the people present took it to mean that the Tutsi must be killed. Witness C, a male Hutu farmer like witness N, a female Hutu farmer, told the Chamber that, at the time of the alleged events, the "Inkotanyi" and the "Inyenzi" meant the Tutsi. Witness N specified that the Accused himself, as a leader, took the Tutsi to mean the Inkotanyi and the Inyenzi. Witness V also pointed out that, at the time of the events, the words Inkotanyi and Tutsi, were interchangeable in the countryside. He specified that, while all Inkotanyi were not Tutsi, everyone understood at the time that all Tutsi were Inkotanyi. Witness V also confirmed that the words Tutsi and Inkotanyi were synonymous and stated that the Tutsi had been pursued with such shouts as " There they are, those Inkotanyi, those Tutsi." He explained that the Tutsi were assimilated to the Inkotanyi.

340. Dr. Mathias Ruzindana, Professor of Linguistics at the University of Rwanda, appearing as expert witness for the Prosecution, explained to the Chamber that, based on his own analyses of Rwandan publications and broadcasts by the RTLM and on his personal experience, he was of the opinion that, at the time of the events alleged in the Indictment, the term Inkotanyi had several extended meanings, from an RPF sympathizer to members of the Tutsi group, depending on the context.

341. According to witness DIX, a Hutu woman, appearing as a Defence witness, explained that in her opinion, the Interahamwe started to kill people because they thought that their neighbours had in their midst accomplices of enemies from outside the country.

342. A certain Joseph Matata, a Defence witness, testified before the Chamber that the contention that when the Accused called on the people to fight against the enemy, those present took it to mean that the Tutsi must be killed, had to rebutted. According to him, the latter's speech must be interpreted with two factors in mind, namely the context of RPF incursions into the Rwandan territory and the fact that people who knew the bourgmestre could not have construed his speech as a call to kill the Tutsi.

343. A Defence witness appearing under the pseudonym DZZ, denied that the Accused ever held a meeting in Taba commune at the time of the alleged acts.

344. During his testimony before the Chamber, the Accused stated that the Interahamwe began to shout when the crowd had gathered at Gishyeshye. He called on them to calm down, stating that it was necessary to work in an orderly fashion. The Interahamwe then reportedly informed the bourgmestre that soldiers, the Inkotanyi, were allegedly infiltrating the commune. The Accused maintained before the Chamber that he had replied that if they knew of a family harbouring an RPF militant, they could reveal such information to a councillor, an officer of the Cellule, a policeman or the bourgmestre , who would then take up the case and follow it up. The Accused denied that he himself told the crowd that people, the accomplices of the Inkotanyi, should be flushed out, but admitted that it was said in the crowd that certain families were harbouring RPF soldiers.

345. In response to Prosecution questions regarding the lists of names mentioned by several Prosecution witnesses, the Accused stated under cross-examination, that a certain François had given him papers to rapidly read through silently for his personal edification. Those papers included the names of people and their functions. The Accused testified that the Interahamwe ordered him twice to read out the list and he refused to do so. According to him, members of the Interahamwe then said that the list, which included the names of RPF soldiers and their supporters, had been seized in the office of an "Inspecteur de police judiciaire" in Runda, a member of the RPF, who had been killed while he was shooting at the soldiers and the communal police.

346. The Accused testified before the Chamber that he refused to read the list aloud to the crowd because he had had time to recognize certain names on the list such as those of Karangwa, Charlotte, Rukundakuvuga and Mutabazi. According to the Accused, he allegedly explained to the assembled population that the list contained names which included that of Ephrem Karangwa, and that such a list constituted a real danger since anyone could someday find their name on such a list. Thus, he reportedly cautioned the people against such documents.

347. The Accused then specifically admitted before the Chamber that mentioning a name on such a list was seriously damaging to the person thus named and jeopardized their life. He also confirmed that made by a public official, such as the bourgmestre , such a statement would have so much more impact on the people, who would understand that the person was thus being denounced and that they would certainly be killed.
The position of the Defence as stated, particularly, during the closing arguments, regarding the documents read by the Accused, is that overexcited members of the Interahamwe allegedly forced the bourgmestre to read a document in their possession, which included the names of a certain number of people considered to be accomplices of the RPF. The Accused allegedly tried to dissuade the demonstrators from denouncing anyone in such a manner, by explaining that there was no proof that the people whose names appeared on the list were indeed RPF supporters.

348. With regard to the facts in paragraph 14 of the Indictment detailed as follows:

> " The killing of Tutsi in Taba began shortly after the meeting."

349. With regard to the allegation made in paragraph 14 of the Indictment, the Chamber feels that it is not sufficient to simply establish a possible coincidence between the Gishyeshye meeting and the beginning of the killing of Tutsi in Taba, but that there must be proof of a possible causal link between the statement made by the Accused during the said meeting and the beginning of the killings.

350. Witness Ephrem Karangwa, who was the "Inspecteur de police judiciaire" of Taba commune, at the time of the events testified that until 18 April 1994, the people of Taba were united and there were no killings in Taba at that time.

351. According to Prosecution witness C, the Taba population followed the instructions given by the bourgmestre at the Gishyeshye meeting and began thereafter to destroy houses and to kill. The witness recalled that the people once again complied with the instructions of the Accused as they always had.

352. Prosecution witness W, a Tutsi, clearly stated that the attacks began on 19 April 1994. The first attack he witnessed took place on 19 April 1994 at about 2:00 p.m. Just before that, his younger brother, who had gone to find out what had happened in Rukoma, told him that a list of "Collaborators" had allegedly been discovered in the home of Sylvère Karera, and that the name of witness W was allegedly on the list. The witness then immediately went into hiding and later sought refuge in Kayenzi commune.

353. Prosecution witness A, a Tutsi man, testified before the Chamber that five Tutsi were killed on the day of the meeting. From that date, witness A personally observed that the people were destroying houses, taking away corrugated iron sheets, doors and anything they could carry, and killing cows which they ate. Some of the people tried to run away when the killings began. Most of the victims were Tutsi. Witness A said that in his opinion when the Accused began to have good relations with the Interahamwe, the latter did whatever they wanted with the commune. He felt that the people were thus subjected to propaganda designed to make one part of the population hate the other. The people were believed to have changed because of repeated statements and promises made to them and that, as a result, they allegedly began to kill.

354. Witness N, a 69-year old female Hutu farmer, also explained that the destruction of houses, the killing of cows and even the killings, began following said meeting. She attributed the scale of the killings to the Accused's fiery mood during said meeting and his urging to wage war against the Inkotanyi and the Tutsi. She felt that had the Accused not held the meeting in question, the killings would never have started at that very moment, even if the Interahamwe were more powerful than the bourgmestre .

355. The Accused himself confirmed to the Chamber that killings started in Taba on 19 April 1994. He said that, on that day, after addressing the crowd at Gishyeshye, he went to the Bureau communal where he noted that the Interahamwe had killed a good number of people, who had sought refuge there, including elderly people, women and children.

356. During its closing arguments, the Defence pointed out that Prosecution witness V had testified before the Chamber that many Tutsi had sought refuge at the Bureau communal on the night of 19 April 1994. It therefore expressed doubt as to the reliability of Prosecution Witness V who had also stated, during his testimony, that on the morning of the same 19 April 1994, the Accused had ordered the Tutsi to be killed.

357. A certain Joseph Matata, called as a Defence witness, explained to the Chamber that, in his opinion and according to testimonies he had allegedly collected in Taba, the militia began to neutralize the Accused as from 19 April 1994. He therefore concluded that the beginning of the massacres was not linked to the Gishyeshye meeting, but that it was an unfortunate coincidence.

358. Factual findings:

359. On the basis of consistent evidence and the facts confirmed by the Accused himself, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was present in Gishyeshye, during the early hours of 19 April 1994, that he joined the crowd gathered around the body of a young member of the Interahamwe militia, and that he took that opportunity to address the people. The Chamber finds that the Accused did not convene the meeting, but that he joined an already formed gathering. Furthermore, on the basis of consistent evidence, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that on that occasion, the Accused, by virtue of his functions as bourgmestre and the authority he held over the population, did lead the crowd and the ensuing proceedings.

360. With regard to the Prosecution allegation that the Accused sanctioned the death of Sylvère Karera, the Chamber finds that the Accused himself admitted to having condemned the death of a young Interahamwe who had allegedly killed Karera, but failing to mention that he also condemned the death of Karera. The Chamber nevertheless points out that failure to condemn is not tantamount to approval in this case. However, on the basis of testimonies by witnesses V and Z, the Chamber finds that the Accused could very well have attributed the death of Sylvère Karera to his alleged complicity with the Inkotanyi and may have added that Karera had been justly killed. The Chamber however finds that no other evidence corroborated the testimony of witness V, whereas some ten witnesses had been questioned about facts relating to the murder of Sylvestre Karera and the ensuing meeting at which the Accused spoke. Consequently, the Chamber holds that in the absence of conclusive evidence, the Prosecution has failed to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused publicly sanctioned the death of Sylvère Karera at the Gishyeshye gathering.

361. With regard to the allegation that the Accused urged the population, during the said gathering, to eliminate the accomplices of the RPF, after considering the weight of all supporting and corroborative evidence, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused clearly called on the population to unite and eliminate the sole enemy: accomplices of the Inkotanyi. On the basis of consistent evidence heard throughout the trial and the information provided by Dr. Ruzindana, appearing as an expert witness on linguistic issues, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the population construed the Accused's call as a call to kill the Tutsi. The Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused was himself fully aware of the impact of his statement on the crowd and of the fact that his call to wage war against Inkotanyi accomplices could be construed as one to kill the Tutsi in general.

362. Finally, relying on substantial evidence which was not essentially called into question by the Defence, and as it was confirmed by the Accused, the Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that there was a causal link between the statement of the Accused at the 19 April 1994 gathering and the ensuing widespread killings in Taba.

The events alleged

363. Paragraph 15 reads as follows:

> At the same meeting in Gishyeshye sector on April 19, 1994, Jean Paul Akayesu named at least three prominent Tutsis -- Ephrem Karangwa, Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa -- who had to be killed because of their alleged relationships with the RPF. Later that day, Juvénal Rukundakuvuga was killed in Kanyiya. Within the next few days, Emmanuel Sempabwa was clubbed to death in front of Taba bureau communal.
>
> It is the alleged that by his participation in relation to these acts the accused committed offences charged in six counts:
>
> > Count 1, Genocide, punishable by Article 2(3)(a) of the Statute of the Tribunal;
> >
> > Count 2, Complicity in Genocide, punishable by Article 2(3)(e) of the Statute of the Tribunal;
> >
> > Count 3, Crimes against Humanity (extermination), punishable by Article 3(b) of the Statute of the Tribunal;
> >
> > Count 4, Direct and Public Incitement to Commit Genocide, punishable by virtue of Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute of the Tribunal;
> >
> > Count 5, Crimes against Humanity (murder), punishable by Article 3(a) of the Statute of the Tribunal; and

5435

Count 6, Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, as incorporated by Article 4(a)(murder) of the Statute of the Tribunal.

364. Paragraph 15 of the Indictment alleges that, at a meeting held on 19 April 1994 in Gishyeshye sector, the accused called for the killing of three prominent Tutsi due to their alleged relationships with the RPF. As a supposed consequence of being named, at least two of them, namely Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa, were subsequently killed. The acts which were allegedly further perpetrated as regards to Ephrem Karangwa are the subject of paragraphs 16, 17 and 18 of the Indictment.

365. It has already been established beyond reasonable doubt, as alleged in paragraph 14 of the Indictment, that Akayesu was present at an early morning gathering in Gishyeshye sector on April 19 1994. The Chamber found that Akayesu urged those present to unite to eliminate the only enemy, the accomplice of the Inkotanyi. The Chamber also found the terms Inkotanyi and accomplice during the said meeting to refer to Tutsi and that the accused was conscious that his utterances to the crowd would be understood as calls to kill the Tutsi in general.

366. It now needs to be established whether during this gathering, Akayesu specifically named Ephrem Karangwa, Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa who had to be killed because of their alleged relationships with the RPF. If it is proved beyond a reasonable that Akayesu named the said three, the Chamber will consider evidence presented in relation to their subsequent fates as alleged in the second and third sentences of paragraph 15 of the Indictment.

The Role, if any, of the Accused

367. A number of the witnesses, namely witnesses V, C, A, Z and Akayesu, who testified in relation to the events alleged in paragraph 14 of the Indictment, also testified in relation to the specific allegations contained in paragraph 15 of the Indictment. Hence, the Chamber will limit itself to recalling the testimonies of these witnesses only as pertains to the paragraph 15 of the Indictment, i.e. the naming of three individuals and their subsequent fates, factual findings having already been made above to there having been a gathering in Gishyeshye and the pertinent general allegations.

368. Witness Z, a Tutsi man, testified that on or about 19 April 1994, in the early hours of the morning, he was present at the Gishyeshye sector gathering, which was attended by Akayesu. He said Akayesu separated the crowd from the Interahamwe and called for all those present to forget their political differences until the enemy had been eliminated, the enemy being the Tutsi, the accomplices of the Inkotanyi.

369. Witness Z said Akayesu, who was holding documents, cited Ephrem Karangwa as someone wanting to kill him and replace him as bourgmestre. He said the accused did not name anyone else in particular. According to witness Z, Akayesu said that he didn't want to give the names of the other persons because they lived nearby and someone might warn and help them escape. The witness said an Interahamwe by the name of François spoke about papers. According to the witness, the Interahamwe said the papers had been seized from the dead professor's house (see factual findings on paragraphs 13 and 14 of the Indictment) and contained details of monies paid by the Tutsi to the Inkotanyi.

370. Witness Z testified Akayesu announced on leaving that he was going so that those persons who are to be found between Taba and Kayenzi did not escape him. He said the accused left in a vehicle with the Interahamwe. Once back at his house which was on a neighboring hill, the witness said he observed the persons who had been in the vehicle with Akayesu break down the door of Rukundakuvuga's house. He later heard that Rukundakuvuga was arrested. Under cross-examination, witness Z confirmed that Akayesu had not named Rukundakuvuga but added that Akayesu read from documents at the gatl.

371. Witness V, a Tutsi teacher in Taba in Taba commune for nearly 28 years, testified he was present at the gathering at the Gishyeshye sector. He said that, during this gathering, Akayesu asked the population to collaborate with the Interahamwe in the fight against the only enemy of the Hutu, namely the Tutsi. The witness said Akayesu brandished documents on which there was a list of names of Hutu who were to be killed by the Inkotanyi and the Tutsi, and a list of RPF collaborators. The witness affirmed Akayesu said he knew of a number of people in the commune, namely three teachers, to be RPF collaborators who lived in Kanyenzi, and a fourth person, the "inspecteur de police judiciaire" who worked at the office of the commune. Witness V said the accused told the crowd that these people had to be sought to prevent them from escaping. The witness testified the accused named Ephrem Karangwa during the meeting, and by reference to where they lived also implicitly spoke of Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa, who were both Tutsi. According to the witness, the crowd understood that Akayesu was looking for these people as they were supposedly RPF accomplices.

372. Witness V testified that of the four individuals spoken of by the accused, he saw two of the bodies at the bureau communal, and the body of Rukundakuvuga on the Kanyiya road as he fled the commune of Taba. The fourth person named at the meeting was able to escape.

373. Under cross-examination, witness V asserted that Akayesu brandished three documents during the gathering. He said there was a list of people who were financing the RPF, a list of Hutu who had to be killed by the Tutsi, and a list of Tutsi RPF collaborators. The witness testified that Akayesu only named Karangwa. Questioned as to the identification of other individuals, witness V said they weren't expressly cited, but Akayesu pointed to where they lived and said that they were teachers. According to witness V, as people immediately went to search for them it had been possible for individuals at the gathering to guess about whom Akayesu was speaking.

374. Witness E, a Hutu man from Taba testified that he was present at the Gishyeshye gathering on the morning of 19 April 1994. He said Akayesu arrived in a car and addressed the crowd. According to the witness, Akayesu, who was armed with a rifle, pointed to the Interahamwe who were alongside him and told the crowd that the Interahamwe and the MRND, the party to which belonged the Interahamwe, meant them no harm. Witness E said Akayesu told the crowd that all of the political parties were at present one and the same, and that the only enemy was the accomplice of the Inkotanyi. The witness said a certain François gave Akayesu some documents which had allegedly been found at the residence of a RPF accomplice. He said Akayesu told the crowd that all of the Inkotanyi accomplices had to be sought. Questioned as to any names being cited by Akayesu, the witness said only that of Ephrem Karangwa was mentioned.

375. Witness A, a Hutu man who worked with Akayesu from April 1993 up until 7 April 1994, testified that he attended the Gishyeshye gathering in the early hours of 19 April 1994. He said that on arriving, around 06h00 and 07h00 in the morning, he saw a crowd gathered around a body. According to the witness, amongst the people present were the bourgmestre, conseillers, the local population who had heard the noise the night before and Interahamwe. The witness said the members of the cellules and the conseillers asked the crowd to listen to the bourgmestre. Witness A declared Akayesu showed a number of documents to the people, and told the crowd that things had changed, that the Inkotanyi and their accomplices wanted to take power. Questioned as to the citing of names, the witness stated that Akayesu mentioned only Ephrem Karangwa, the "inspecteur de police judiciaire", as someone who had a plan to replace him. The witness added that Akayesu told the crowd that everyone had to do whatever they could to fight these people so as not to return to the previous regime, and that he too would personally search for these people. Witness A testified that a teacher in the crowd informed Akayesu that he knew of another accomplice, in response to which Akayesu ordered that this person be found.

376. Under cross-examination, witness A affirmed that during the gathering in Gishyeshye, Akayesu named only Ephrem Karangwa, and mentioned no other names.

377. Witness C, a Hutu farmer, testified that he attended the Gishyeshye gathering. He said Akayesu addressed the crowd. According to the witness, the accused took documents from his jacket and stated that he was going to read the contents of the documents found at the Professor's house who had been killed in Remera. He said that Akayesu called for the crowd to listen attentively and to put into practice the contents of the documents. Witness C declared that thereafter Akayesu read out the documents.

378. Akayesu testified that on the morning of 19 April 1994 in Gishyeshye sector, a number of people, including Interahamwe, had assembled around the cadaver of an Interahamwe. Akayesu explained that during his discussions on commune security with the crowd at this gathering, a certain François, who had arrived with the Interahamwe, gave him a number of documents on which there figured names and occupations of supposed RPF accomplices and told him to read them. Though François told him to read out the names on the lists, the accused asserted that he did not do so, save for citing, reluctantly so, that of Ephrem Karangwa. In so doing he said he explained to those present at the gathering "there is on this list Ephrem Karangwa, tomorrow you may find yourselves on the list; will it then be said that you too are housing elements of the RPF, a soldier of the RPF?".

379. Under cross-examination, Akayesu declared that he did not read out any names but that he did cite that of Ephrem Karangwa. He added that he had summarized the contents of the documents in his possession by saying there was a list of names on which figured Ephrem Karangwa, tomorrow others could appear on the list, would it then be said that they too are hiding RPF soldiers. Akayesu said the Rukundakuvuga was also on the list, but denied having read it out. Akayesu stated it would be dangerous to publicly designate an individual as an accomplice of the RPF

380. The Defence argued that Akayesu never convened the gathering at Gishyeshye. Instead, the accused was amongst a group of people who had gathered there after a man had been killed. The Defence submitted that Interahamwe were angry, and forced Akayesu to read a document, which contained the names of persons they believed to be accomplices of the RPF. The Defence averred that Akayesu tried to dissuade the Interahamwe from denouncing people in this manner as there was nothing to prove on the list that these people were accomplices of the RPF.

Findings of fact

381. The Chamber has already found beyond a reasonable doubt that Akayesu was present and did speak at the gathering in Gishyeshye sector on the morning of 19 April 1994. This has been developed in the factual findings pertaining to paragraph 14 of the Indictment.

382. Akayesu admitted to having been given a number of documents by the Interahamwe François, and that he did cite the name of Ephrem Karangwa during this gathering, as a forewarning to those present that they too could be deemed RPF accomplices if their names figured on the list. Akayesu also admitted it would be dangerous to cite the name of an individual as an RPF accomplice. However, he was adamant that at he did not read out the documents as such, but summarized them for the crowd. Akayesu confirmed names, save that of Ephrem Karangwa, also appeared on the list. Further, the Defence submitted in its closing arguments that Akayesu had been forced to read out the documents given to him by the Interahamwe.

383. Akayesu's testimony, as regards the naming of Ephrem Karangwa, is supported by the evidence presented by witnesses Z, V, E and A in this matter. All four affirmed that only the name of Ephrer Karangwa had been cited during the Gishyeshye gathering. Witnesses V and Z added that in their opinions it was possible to infer, from Akayesu's gestures and subsequent conduct, reference to Sempabwa and Rukundakuvuga.

384. The Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu did cite Ephrem Karangwa during the Gishyeshye meeting. It has also been established beyond a reasonable doubt he did so knowing of the consequences of naming someone as an RPF accomplice in the temporal context of the events alleged in the Indictment.

385. However, the Chamber is of the opinion that the evidence presented in this matter does not support the specific allegations that Akayesu named Juvénal Rukundakuvuga and Emmanuel Sempabwa. The evidence presented shows only an implicit, yet remote, allusion by Akayesu during the Gishyeshye gathering to these two individuals, and does not demonstrate that Akayesu expressly named them. Hence, the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Akayesu named Juvénal Rukundakuvuga or Emmanuel Sempabwa during the Gishyeshye gathering on 19 April 1994, and that their fates were consequent upon the utterances of Akayesu at the Gishyeshye gathering.

5.4 Beatings (Torture/Cruel Treatment) (Paragraphs 16, 17, 21, 22 & 23 of the Indictment)

Charges Set Forth in the Indictment

> 16. Jean Paul Akayesu, on or about April 19, 1994, conducted house-to-house searches in Taba. During these searches, residents, including Victim V, were interrogated and beaten with rifles and sticks in the presence of Jean Paul Akayesu. Jean Paul Akayesu personally threatened to kill the husband and child of Victim U if she did not provide him with information about the activities of the Tutsi he was seeking.
>
> 17. On or about April 19,1994, Jean Paul Akayesu ordered the interrogation and beating of Victim X in an effort to learn the whereabouts of Ephrem Karangwa. During the beating, Victim X's fingers were broken as he tried to shield himself from blows with a metal stick.
>
> 21. On or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul Akayesu and some communal police went to the house of Victim Y, a 68 year old woman. Jean Paul Akayesu interrogated her about the whereabouts of the wife of a university teacher. During the questioning, under Jean Paul Akayesu's supervision, the communal police hit Victim Y with a gun and sticks. They bound her arms and legs and repeatedly kicked her in the chest. Jean Paul Akayesu threatened to kill her if she failed to provide the information he sought.
>
> 22. Later that night, on or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul Akayesu picked up Victim W in Taba and interrogated her also about the whereabouts of the wife of the university teacher. When she stated she did not know, he forced her to lay on the road in front of his car and threatened to drive over her.
>
> 23. Thereafter, on or about April 20, 1994, Jean Paul Akayesu picked up Victim Z in Taba and interrogated him. During the interrogation, men under Jean Paul Akayesu's authority forced Victims Z and Y to beat each other and used a piece of Victim Y's dress to strangle Victim Z.

5439.

Events Alleged

386. The Chamber notes that paragraph 16 of the Indictment includes allegations with respect to Victim V and Victim U. As the evidence which was given by and about Victim V (Witness A) relates to events which are described in paragraphs 21, 22 and 23 of the Indictment, the Chamber will consider this component of paragraph 16 together with the allegations set forth in paragraphs 21, 22 and 23.

387. Witness K (Victim U), a Tutsi woman married to a Hutu man, was an accountant who worked for the Accused in the office of the bureau communal in Taba, during the events of April 1994. Witness K testified that on the morning of 19 April 1994 she went to the bureau communal at the request of the Accused and that she found him there outside the office with many people, changed in mood and in temper. She said he asked her why she had not been coming to work and sh e told him that she was afraid and had come only at his request. After then witnessing the killing of Tutsi at the bureau communal, which she said was ordered by the Accused, Witness K said the killers asked the Accused why she had not been killed as well. She said he told them that they were going to kill her after questioning her about the secrets of the Inkotanyi. According to Witness K, the Accused then took her keys, locked her in her office and left, saying he was going to search for Ephrem Karangwa, the Inspector of Judicial Police.

388. The Accused returned, said Witness K, with other men whom she referred to as "killers", and they questioned her. She said they asked her to explain how she was cooperating with the Inkotanyi, which she denied. She said the Accused insisted and said that if she did not tell them how she worked with the Inkotanyi, they would kill her. After further discussion, she said the Accused again threatened her, saying she should tell them what she knew or they would kill her, and then left. At this time she estimated it was about three o'clock in the afternoon. Witness K testified that the Accused returned at around midnight with a police officer and asked her whether she had decided to tell them what she knew. When she said she knew nothing, she said he told her, "I wash my hands of your blood." She said he then told her to leave the office and go home and when she expressed concern about the late hour, he asked the driver and the police to accompany her home.

389. Under cross-examination, Witness K stated that her husband was a friend of the Accused. When asked why she was not killed, she said that Tutsi women married to Hutu men were not killed. In his testimony, the Accused confirmed that he saw Witness K at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994 and said that he had wondered why she was there. He said that he saw a man behind her with a machete and that he came between them and escorted her to the office, and told her to keep the door closed.

390. Witness Q (Victim X), a Tutsi man who lived in Musambira, testified that on the same day, 19 April 1994, while he was there visiting, the Accused came to the home of his parents, looking for Ephrem Karangwa, the Inspector of Judicial Police for the commune of Taba. Witness Q told the Chamber that the four people who came - one of whom was a policeman armed with a gun, another armed with grenades and another with a small hatchet - made him, his brother, his sister and his brother-in-law sit down in the courtyard at the entrance of the house. He said they asked where Ephrem Karangwa was, and after a discussion in French, entered the house to search, leaving the policeman with them in the courtyard, his gun charged and ready to shoot. Witness Q said he recognized the policeman, who told his brother-in-law that it was Akayesu, the bourgmestre of Taba, who had come to his house. He said that Akayesu was wearing a long military jacket. Witness Q had not previously met the Accused but was able to identify him in court. He said the Accused and two other people came out of the house with boxes, papers and photographs, which they scattered in the courtyard, saying the photographs of family members in Uganda had been sent by Inkotanyis. Witness Q said he and his relatives were then beaten and kicked by the two men who were with the Accused, and he was hit with a small axe on his right hand. He said his brother-in-law was hit and wounded in the head. The witness displayed in c[illegible] his right hand with a bent index finger, which he said had been broken from the beating when he raised his hand to ward off the blows. Witness Q testified that the Accused was present during this beating and watched it. He said the Accused was the one apparently responsible.

391. The other house-to-house searches referred to in the relevant paragraphs of the Indictment appear to have taken place on the next day and relate to the search by the Accused for Alexia, the wife of Pierre Ntereye, a university teacher. Witness N (Victim Y), a Hutu farmer, testified that she knew where Alexia was hiding. She said the Accused, whom she had known for two years, came to her house with three Interahamwe - Mugenzi, Francois and Singuranayo - at nine o'clock in the evening, the day after the meeting in the commune (i.e. 20 April), looking for Alexia. She said the Accused stayed in his vehicle, near the entrance of her home. The others broke down the door and pointed their guns at her, ordering her to show them the Inkotanyi hiding in her house. She said she told them to search the house, and one of them went to search while the other one stayed at the door. Witness N testified that Mugenzi, who was a communal police officer, took her by the arm to the door and hit her on her head with the barrel of his rifle. She said Francois, who had gone into the house, found a young girl whom he told to open her mouth. According to Witness N, Singuranayo then forced open her mouth and struck her with the barrel of the gun.

392. Witness N said that when she told them that she did not know where Alexia was, she was lifted by her arms and legs by the three men and taken outside to the Accused. She said the Accused told her to lie down, which she did. She said Mugenzi then stepped on her neck and pushed the butt of his rifle into her neck. She said he stomped on her with a lot of force, and that the Accused then hit her with a club on her back. When she shouted, she said the Accused told her to be quiet, calling her the mother-in-law of the Inkotanyi and a "poisonous woman." Witness N testified that they then took her in the vehicle to a partially opened mine at a place called Buguli. She said the Accused ordered her to lie down in front of the vehicle, got into the driver's seat and told her that he was going to run her over. Mugenzi told her to tell them where the people she was hiding were or they would kill her. She said she told them that she did not know and that they should kill her if they wanted. Witness N said Mugenzi then bound her arms and legs with a piece of cloth, pushed her to the ground and stomped on her with his foot. She said the others also joined in and stomped on her.

393. Witness N said she was then put in the vehicle and taken to the house of Ntereye's sisters. When they arrived, she said Francois called for Ntereye's niece Tabita (Victim W) and they questioned her. According to Witness N, the Accused remained in the vehicle and called Tabita from there. He asked her where Alexia was, and she said she did not know. Witness N testified that Tabita was then taken in the vehicle back to the mine. There, she said, they made her get out and told her to get in front of the vehicle. The Accused threatened to run her over and again asked her for the whereabouts of the people in question. She said Tabita was afraid and said that they had hidden in a sorghum field but that she did not know where they were. According to her testimony, Witness N was then told by the Accused that she was a "poisonous woman" and that she had hidden these people. She said they then began to strike her with their gun[s].

394. Witness N said that she and Tabita were then taken in the vehicle to a roadblock, where they picked up Victim Z, and they were then taken to Gishyeshye Sector. Witness N testified that she was at this time "almost dead" from the beating she had suffered. When they arrived, Witness N said she was thrown on the road, next to Victim Z, and they began to beat him with a club. She said the Accused then instructed Victim Z to beat her. She said Victim Z stood up and began to beat her, and that he beat her several times on her leg with a club. During this time, she testified that the Accused was standing next to them near the vehicle. Witness N said her hands were then tied in the back with a piece of cloth, the other end of which was used to strangle Victim Z. She said they tightened the cloth, and his eyes almost came out of their sockets. Victim Z then said that he thought he knew who had hidden Alexia. Sh[e] [they] then started hitting him again, very hard, and the Accused asked [him] to hit her hard, to make her talk. Witness N said she threatened to bite [him] if [he] continued to hit her.

395. Witness N testified that she was then taken in the vehicle with Victim Z to a roadblock and there they picked up a person identified as Victim V(Witness A). She said they were taken to Victim V's house, where they were taken out of the vehicle and thrown on the ground. According to the testimony, they started beating Victim Z again with the club and they also beat Victim V and told him to bring out the person he was hiding. Victim V said he was not hiding anybody. On direct examination, Witness N said the Accused told Victim V to raise his arms so that they could shoot him. On cross-examination, Witness N testified that Mugenzi told Victim V to raise his arms so that they could shoot him. She said they did not shoot him, and that the Accused told Victim V that they would continue searching for Alexia and that if they did not find her he would have to die.

396. Witness N testified that as a result of the beatings she received, her arm is limp. She said that she can no longer walk as she did before and that she needs help to get dressed. She testified that she can no longer work on the farm. The Trial Chamber notes that Witness N walked with difficulty, aided by a walking stick.

397. Witness C (Victim Z), a Hutu farmer, testified that he knew Alexia, that she was a Tutsi teacher and the wife of Ntereye. He said that she hid in his house during April 1994 and that she had come to his house because she realized that he had not participated in the killings. Witness C testified that some Interahamwe came to his house while he was out harvesting coffee. He said one of his children came to look for him after the child had been beaten and asked where Alexia was. Witness C returned to his house and found the Interahamwe at the entrance, carrying machetes and clubs. He said some also had grenades. According to the testimony, the Interahamwe surrounded Witness C and accused him of hiding Alexia. Witness C said that Alexia was not in his house, and one of them started beating him on his back with the blunt side of a machete. He said he then told them that Alexia sometimes hid in his house and sometimes in another person's house. They continued to beat him, and Witness C testified that when he realized that he was about to be killed he said that Alexia was in another [room]. He said the Interahamwe took him to Victim Y's house, and when they arrived they continued beating him. He said they asked Victim Y where Alexia was, and she said that Alexia had gone to her husband's relatives. Witness C said that the Interahamwe then left the house, taking him with them, and after a distance released him, saying that they had from him what they needed.

398. Witness C (Victim Z) testified that one week after this incident, while participating in a night patrol, he saw the Accused, whom he had known for a long time, with three Interahamwes, Victim Y (Witness N) and Tabita, the niece of Ntereye, in a white twin cab. He said the Accused was driving and stopped at the roadblock, got out of his car and told the Interahamwe that they should bring Witness C to him. He said the Accused told him to get into the vehicle, which he did, and they drove to the forest. In the middle of the forest, Witness C said they stopped and asked him to get out and lie down in front of the vehicle. He said the Accused then stepped on his face, causing his lips to bleed, and kept his foot on Witness C's face while two of the Interahamwe - Francois and Mugenzi - began to beat him with the butt of their guns. During this time, he said he was asked repeatedly where Alexia was hiding.

399. Witness C said that during the beating, Victim Y(Witness N), who was in the vehicle, urged him to tell them where Alexia was, and when he realized that they were going to kill him, he told them that she was at his home. Concerned that they would find her there, Witness C said he then told them she was somewhere else and Victim Y told them that Victim V could advise them of her whereabouts. Witness C testified that he was then made to sit next to Victim Y and they were bound together, side by side, with a rope by the Interahamwe Mugenzi. He said the rope was put around his neck. Under cross-examination, Witness C clarified that the rope was in fact a piece of cloth that he had been wearing. When he vomit, Witness C said they were untied and the Accused then told them to get back into the vehicle. Witness C also testified on examination that he was asked by Francois to hit Victim Y and given a cudgel, with which he struck her once on the leg. He said he was told to tell Victim Y to tell them where Alexia was hiding. After this, Witness C testified that the Accused told them to get back into the vehicle and they were taken to the roadblock.

400. At the roadblock, Witness C testified that they picked up Victim V and the Accused drove them to Victim V's house. When they arrived, he said the Accused asked his Interahamwes to search the house. He said two of them went in and came back, saying that Alexia was not in the house. According to Witness C, the Accused then told Victim V twice to step aside and raise his arms in the air so that they could shoot at him. One of the Interahamwe told him a third time to raise his arms so that they could shoot him. Witness C said they did not shoot at Victim V, but they again beat him, Witness C, on the back with the blunt side of a machete. He said they were then asked to get back in the vehicle and went near the home of Victim Y, who was dropped off. They continued, he said, dropping one Interahamwe off at a roadblock and stopping at another roadblock, where the members of Ntereye's family had been arrested. Witness C testified that the Accused asked them to get in the vehicle - a woman, three children and three men. He said they then went to a commercial center near Remera Rukoma, and the people were taken to a prison there. Witness C and Victim V were left to wait in the vehicle while the Accused, Francois and Mugenzi went to drink beer at a place about fifteen feet from the vehicle. From the vehicle, Witness C testified that he heard the Accused say to the Interahamwe "I do not think that what we are doing is proper. We are going to have to pay for this blood that is being shed." After the Accused and the Interahamwe drank beer and returned to the vehicle, Witness C said they were taken near the school of Remera Rukoma, dropped off there and told to be at the office the next morning at 7:00.

401. Witness C showed the Trial Chamber the scars he said he had from this beating, on the left side of his back. He said that he did not have scars on his lips but that he did have wounds on his head and a scar on his nose. He testified that he has continuing health problems such as a bleeding nose and pains in his head, and that his body is no longer what it was before.

402. Witness A (Victim V), a Hutu man, testified that he knew Alexia and that he was the person who had found the hiding place for her. He said he saw the Accused, whom he had known for ten years and worked with, one night while he was on patrol, sometime between 7:00 and 9:00. He said the Accused was alone in a white pickup truck, and while they were talking, he saw people, including the Interahamwe Francois and a commune police officer, coming from the house of an elderly woman, who lived near him. He said they put this woman in the vehicle and took her to the forest, and shouts were heard as they beat her. Later, he said the Accused came back and took away another of his neighbours who was doing the night patrol, and he also heard this person crying out as he was being beaten. Witness A said they came back and picked him up and went to his house. He said the Accused was driving the vehicle. He said they came into his house and searched for people they said were hiding there, in particular Alexia. Witness A said they had guns, and that after they searched the house they took him and the others to the gate of the house, and the commune police officer and Francois began to beat them with the butt of a rifle and a stick, asking them where Alexia was. At this time, he said the Accused was standing next to them and watching. He said when they discovered that Alexia was not in the house, they stopped the beating and put them in the vehicle. He said they released the elderly woman and sent her back to her house, and they continued to detain him and Victim Z.

403. Witness A testified that near his house, they found nine people from families who had been stopped by night patrols. He said these people were presented to the Accused who put them in the vehicle and took them to a prison near Remera Hospital. He said the Accused and Francois went to have drinks and he was left in the vehicle with Victim Z and a young girl, guarded by the commune police officer. Afterwards, he said they went back to the bureau communal and on the way the Accused told them home but come back to the bureau communal early the next morning. At this time, he said it was approximately 2:00 in the morning. On cross-examination, Witness A said that he did not sustain serious injuries from the beatings apart from a broken rib which was treated.

404. The Accused testified that after Ntereye was killed on 10 May 1994, people were saying that they still did not know where his wife was. The Accused said he knew that she was being sought, and he said he was determined to save her. He said that Ntereye had told him that she was going from house to house. He said he found an Interahamwe called Francois and told him that he had someone to save. He said he asked Francois to help him for a price and gave him twenty thousand. He said he then went to Ntereye's sister's house and found his niece who told him that Alexia was living in the house of an elderly woman. He said he knew her to be a tough old lady and asked the niece to come with him to reassure her. He said they left - himself, a police officer and Francois. He said they called for the lady and she came, and he spoke to her. He said she told him that Alexia had been there but left and gone to Kayenzi. He said when he asked her whether she was telling the truth, she told him "I cannot lie because you are going to do good for Alexia and then I have also heard that you tried to save Ntereye." He said he left with the niece and drove to Buguli and that he spoke to her and her sisters, warning them not to let the children go outside because they would be killed. In his testimony, the Accused then moved on to other events. The Accused later testified that when he went to look for Alexia, there were two or three people at the roadblock near the home of the old lady, but that neither Victim V nor Victim Z was there, and he did not see them on this occasion. He testified that Victim Y, Victim Z and Victim V were known to him. He also said there were no mines in Buguli.

Factual Findings

405. The Chamber finds that on 19 April 1994, Victim U (Witness K) was threatened by the Accused at the bureau communal. She went to the bureau communal because she had been summoned there by the Accused. She was questioned by the Accused in the presence of men whom she had just seen killing Tutsi at the bureau communal. In response to a question from the killers, Victim U heard the Accused tell them that she would be killed after she was questioned about the secrets of the Inkotanyi. The Accused then questioned Victim U and threatened that she would be killed if she did not divulge information about her cooperation with the Inkotanyi. The Accused then locked Victim U in her office and left. When he returned in the afternoon, he resumed questioning Victim U and again threatened that she would be killed if she did not provide information about the Inkotanyi. He left again and returned at midnight with a police officer. The Accused asked her whether she would tell them what she knew and when she said she knew nothing, he said, "I wash my hands of your blood." He then asked the driver and the police to accompany her home.

406. The Chamber found Victim U to be a very credible witness whose testimony was not marked by anger or hostility and whose testimony was confirmed under cross-examination. The Chamber notes that the Accused in his testimony confirmed the presence of Victim U at the bureau communal on 19 April 1994. The Chamber does not accept his explanation of her presence there or his actions. If he intended to protect her, as he suggested, why did he take her key from her, why did he question her about the Inkotanyi, and why did he leave her there until midnight? The Accused did not address any of these questions or specifically deny that he did any of these things. He did not even deny specifically that he told the others in her presence that she would be killed after questioning or that he threatened her when he questioned her. The Chamber notes that there is no evidence to suggest that the Accused threatened the husband or child of Victim U.

407. With regard to the allegations set forth in paragraph 17 of the Indictment, the Chamber is unable to find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Accused ordered the interrogation and beating of Victim X (Witness U) on 19 April 1994. The evidence presented in support of the allegation relies entirely on a single witness, the credibility of whom the Defence has successfully challenged. In cross-examination, the Defence questioned Witness Q regarding the details of the incident at his father's home, as they had been described by him in his pre-trial written statement. When asked about his prior statement that the Accused had been accompanied by two policemen rather than one, Witness Q explained that one of the policeman was from Taba and the other from Musambira. He said the second policeman had remained on the main road, and he had not actually seen this policeman which is why he did not mention him in his testimony. When asked about his prior statement that the Accused was armed rather than unarmed, Witness Q said that he had said that the Accused was wearing a military jacket and that he had heard that another policeman had a gun. When asked about his prior statement that he had been beaten by a policeman with a metal bar, Witness Q said that he was beaten by a man in civilian clothes, whom he assumed was a policeman because he was carrying a grenade. He said he was beaten with a metal instrument which had a pointed end. When asked about his prior statement that the Accused arrived in a red Toyota and that he saw a man lying in the rear seat of the vehicle with his hands tied, Witness Q said that he did not see the man in the back seat but that he heard about him. He said he did not see the vehicle as it was 500 meters away, but that he had heard that it was red.

408. While the Chamber has been cautious in allowing the contents of pre-trial written statements to impeach the testimony of witnesses before it, in this case the inconsistencies between the testimony and the written statement of Victim X are many and too significant to justify a finding of credibility without corroboration of other testimony. The Chamber notes that even if it were to accept the testimony of Victim X in full, it would not be able to find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the Accused ordered the interrogation and beating of Victim X. The witness testified that the Accused was present and watched the beatings, but there is no evidence that he gave any orders. There is only evidence that words were spoken in French. No evidence has been presented as to what was said and by whom.

409. With regard to the search for Alexia, wife of Ntereye, the Chamber finds that at on the evening of 20 April 1994, the Accused went with two Interahamwe named Francois and Singuranayo and one communal police officer named Mugenzi to the house of Victim Y (Witness N), a [68] year old woman at the time. Mugenzi took her by the arm to the door and hit her on the head with the barrel of his rifle. Victim Y was then forcibly taken to the Accused, who ordered her to lie down. In the presence of the Accused, Victim Y was beaten by the communal police officer Mugenzi who stepped on her neck, pushed the butt of his rifle into her neck, and stomped on her. Victim Y was also beaten by the Accused, who hit her with a club on her back. She was interrogated by Mugenzi and the Accused about the whereabouts of Alexia, the wife of Ntereye, a university professor. She was then taken to Buguli, where the Accused made her lie down in front of the vehicle and threatened to run her over. At the mine, in the presence of the Accused, she was also threatened and interrogated by Mugenzi, who bound her arms and legs and stomped on her with his foot. The others stomped on her as well.

410. Later that night, the Accused picked up Tabita (Victim W) and interrogated her also about the whereabouts of Alexia, the wife of Ntereye. She was then taken in the vehicle back to the mine. She was asked to get in front of the vehicle, and the Accused threatened to run her over and again interrogated her about the whereabouts of Alexia.

411. Thereafter, on the same evening, the Accused picked up Victim Z (Witness C) and took him to a forest in Gishyeshye Sector, where the Accused stepped on his face, causing his lips to bleed, and kept his foot on Victim Z's face while the Interahamwe Francois and the commune police officer Mugenzi beat him with the butt of their guns. Victim Z was tied to Victim Y with a piece of cloth by Mugenzi, which was used to choke him. Victim Z was also forced by Francois to beat Victim Y with a cudgel he was given. During this time, Victim Z was interrogated, but it is unclear who actually did the interrogation.

412. Following the interrogation of Victim Y and Victim Z, the Accused picked up Victim V at a roadblock and took him, with Victim Y and Victim Z, to his house, which was searched by Interahamwe at the direction of the Accused. The Accused then told Victim V to raise his arms in the air and threatened to shoot him. In the presence of the Accused, Victim V was then beaten under interrogation by the Interahamwe Francois and the commune police officer Mugenzi with the butt of a rifle and a stick. Victim Z was beaten on the back with the blunt side of a machete. Victim Y, Victim Z and Victim V were then taken away in the vehicle and, after Victim Y was released near her home, Victim Z and Victim V were kept in the vehicle while the Accused and the others drank beer. Victim Z and Victim V were released at approximately 2:00 in the morning.

413. As a result of the beatings, Victim Y has trouble walking. Victim Z has scars on his back and continuing health problems. Victim V sustained a broken rib from the beatings.

414. The Chamber notes that the testimony of Witness N, Witness C and Witness A closely correlate in all material respects and even with regard to minor details. There were very few inconsistencies, of an extremely minor nature. Witness N said, for example, that Victim Z (Witness C) was beaten with a club. Victim Z testified that he was beaten with the butt of a gun. It is clear that there was a club, as it was used by Victim Z to hit Victim Y (Witness N) when he was forced to do so. It is understandable that Victim Y may have therefore mistaken the instrument used on Victim Z. Victim Z initially testified that he was tied to Victim Y with a rope, whereas Victim Y testified that it was a piece of cloth. On cross-examination, however, Victim Z clarified that in fact it was a piece of cloth that was used.

415. The Chamber finds these facts have been established beyond a reasonable doubt. In making its factual findings, the Chamber has carefully considered the cross-examination by the Defence of Prosecution witnesses and the evidence presented by the Defence in the form of testimony by the Accused. With regard to cross-examination, the Chamber notes that the Prosecution witnesses substantially confirmed their direct testimony. In his testimony, the Accused confirmed that he picked up the niece of Ntereye, with the Interahamwe Francois and his police officer, and went with her to the house of Victim Y. He confirmed that he drove with Ntereye's niece to Buguli, stating only that there were no mines in Buguli. The Accused also confirmed that he was looking for Alexia, the wife of Ntereye, but he maintained that he was determined to save her. He said that he paid Francois to help him in this effort. The Accused testified that he did not see Victim Z or Victim V at the roadblock near the home of Victim Y, although they all testified that they saw him and each other. According to the testimony of the Accused, the search for Alexia took place after the death of Ntereye on 10 May 1994. All the prosecution witnesses, however, date this search to 20 April 1994. The Defence in its cross-examination did not question the evidence given by the Prosecution witnesses about the date. The Accused also testified that when he spoke to Victim Y, she said "I cannot lie because you are going to do good for Alexia and then I have also heard that you tried to save Ntereye." Having heard Victim Y's (Witness N's) testimony, the Chamber finds it highly unlikely that she would have made such a statement and notes that the statement was not put to her by the Defence on cross-examination, in which the Accused himself participated. Moreover, the Accused's account of his efforts to find and save Alexia simply tapered off in his testimony, without any explanation as to whether he continued the search or gave it up and if so, why. The Chamber also notes the testimony of Witness PP, which it has accepted as credible, that when Alexia and her nieces were brought to the bureau communal, the Accused said to the Interahamwe, "Take them to Kinihira. Don't you know where killings take place, where the others have been killed?" The actions of the Accused were incompatible with a desire to save Alexia, and the Chamber does not accept the testimony of the Accused on these events as credible.

5.5 Sexual Violence (Paragraphs 12A & 12B of the Indictment)

5744b

Charges Set Forth in the Indictment

12A. Between April 7 and the end of June, 1994, hundreds of civilians (hereinafter "displaced civilians") sought refuge at the bureau communal. The majority of these displaced civilians were Tutsi. While seeking refuge at the bureau communal, female displaced civilians were regularly taken by armed local militia and/or communal police and subjected to sexual violence, and/or beaten on or near the bureau communal premises. Displaced civilians were also murdered frequently on or near the bureau communal premises. Many women were forced to endure multiple acts of sexual violence which were at times committed by more than one assailant. These acts of sexual violence were generally accompanied by explicit threats of death or bodily harm. The female displaced civilians lived in constant fear and their physical and psychological health deteriorated as a result of the sexual violence and beatings and killings.
12B. Jean Paul Akayesu knew that the acts of sexual violence, beatings and murders were being committed and was at times present during their commission. Jean Paul Akayesu facilitated the commission of the sexual violence, beatings and murders by allowing the sexual violence and beatings and murders to occur on or near the bureau communal premises. By virtue of his presence during the commission of the sexual violence, beatings and murders and by failing to prevent the sexual violence, beatings and murders, Jean Paul Akayesu encouraged these activities.

Events Alleged

416. Allegations of sexual violence first came to the attention of the Chamber through the testimony of Witness J, a Tutsi woman, who stated that her six year-old daughter had been raped by three Interahamwe when they came to kill her father. On examination by the Chamber, Witness J also testified that she had heard that young girls were raped at the bureau communal. Subsequently, Witness H, a Tutsi woman, testified that she herself was raped in a sorghum field and that, just outside the compound of the bureau communal, she personally saw other Tutsi women being raped and knew of at least three such cases of rape by Interahamwe. Witness H testified initially that the Accused, as well as commune police officers, were present while this was happening and did nothing to prevent the rapes. However, on examination by the Chamber as to whether Akayesu was aware that the rapes were going on, she responded that she didn't know, but that it happened at the bureau communal and he knew that the women were there. Witness H stated that some of the rapes occurred in the bush area nearby but that some of them occurred "on site". On examination by the Chamber, she said that the Accused was present during one of the rapes, but she could not confirm that he saw what was happening. While Witness H expressed the view that the Interahamwe acted with impunity and should have been prevented by the commune police and the Accused from committing abuses, she testified that no orders were given to the Interahamwe to rape. She also testified that she herself was beaten but not raped at the bureau communal.

417. On 17 June 1997, the Indictment was amended to include allegations of sexual violence and additional charges against the Accused under Article 3(g),Article 3(i) and Article 4(2)(e) of the ICTR Statute. In introducing this amendment, the Prosecution stated that the testimony of Witness H motivated them to renew their investigation of sexual violence in connection with events which took place in Taba at the bureau communal. The Prosecution stated that evidence previously available was not sufficient to link the Accused to acts of sexual violence and acknowledged that factors to explain this lack of evidence might include the shame that accompanies acts of sexual violence as well as insensitivity in the investigation of sexual violence. The Chamber notes that the Defence in its closing statement questioned whether the Indictment was amended in response to public pressure concerning the prosecution of sexual violence. The Chamber understands that the amendment of the Indictment resulted from the spontaneous testimony of sexual violence by Witness J and Witness H during the course of this trial and the subsequent investigation of the Prosecution, rather than from public pressure. Never the Chamber takes note of the interest shown in this issue by non-governmental organizations, which it considers as indicative of public concern over the historical exclusion of rape and other forms of sexual violence from the investigation and prosecution of war crimes. The investigation and presentation of evidence relating to sexual violence is in the interest of justice.

418. Following the amendment of the Indictment, Witness JJ, a Tutsi woman, testified about the events which took place in Taba after the plane crash. She that she was driven away from her home, which was destroyed by her Hutu neighbours who attacked her and her family after a man came to the hill near where she lived and said that the bourgmestre had sent him so that no Tutsi would remain on the hill that night. Witness JJ saw her Tutsi neighbours killed and she fled, seeking refuge in a nearby forest with her baby on her back and her younger sister, who had been wounded in the attack by a blow with an axe and two machete cuts. As she was being chased everywhere she went, Witness JJ said she went to the bureau communal. There she found more than sixty refugees down the road and on the field nearby. She testified that most of the refugees were women and children.

419. Witness JJ testified that the refugees at the bureau communal had been beaten by the Interahamwe and were lying on the ground when she arrived. Witness JJ encountered four Interahamwe outside the bureau communal, armed with knives, clubs, small axes and small hoes. That afternoon, she said, approximately forty more Interahamwe came and beat the refugees, including Witness JJ. At this time she said she saw the Accused, standing in the courtyard of the communal office, with two communal police officers who were armed with guns, one of whom was called Mushumba. Witness JJ said she was beaten on the head, the ribs and the right leg, which left her disabled. That evening, she said, the Accused came with a policeman to look for refugees and ordered the Interahamwe to beat them up, calling them "wicked, wicked people" and saying they "no longer had a right to shelter." The refugees were then beaten and chased away. Witness JJ said she was beaten by the policeman Mushumna, who hit her with the butt of his gun just behind her ear.

420. Witness JJ testified that she spent the night in the rain in a field. The next day she said she returned to the bureau communal and went to the Accused, in a group of ten people representing the refugees, who asked that they be killed as the others had been because they were so tired of it all. She said the Accused told them that there were no more bullets and that he had gone to look for more in Gitarama but they had not yet been made available. He asked his police officers to chase them away and said that even if there were bullets they would not waste them on the refugees. As the refugees saw that death would be waiting for them anywhere else, Witness JJ testified they stayed at the bureau communal.

421. Witness JJ testified that often the Interahamwe came to beat the refugees during the day, and that the policemen came to beat them at night. She also testified that the Interahamwe took young girls and women from their site of refuge near the bureau communal into a forest in the area and raped them. Witness JJ testified that this happened to her - that she was stripped of her clothing and raped in front of other people. At the request of the Prosecutor and with great embarrassment, she explicitly specified that the rapist, a young man armed with an axe and a long knife, penetrated her vagina with his penis. She stated that on this occasion she was raped twice. Subsequently, she told the Chamber, on a day when it was raining, she was taken by force from near the bureau communal into the cultural center within the compound of the bureau communal, in a group of approximately fifteen girls and women. In the cultural center, according to Witness JJ, they were raped. She was raped twice by one man. Then another man came to where she was lying and he also raped her. A third man then raped her, she said, at which point she described herself as feeling near dead. Witness JJ testified that she was at a later time dragged back to the cultural center in a group of approximately ten girls and women and they were raped. She was raped again, two times. Witness JJ testified that she could not count the total number of times she was raped. She said, "each time you encountered attackers they would rape you," - in the forest, in the sorghum fields. Witness JJ related to the Chamber the experience of finding her sister before sh having been raped and cut with a machete.

422. Witness JJ testified that when they arrived at the bureau communal the women were hoping the authorities would defend them but she was surprised to the contrary. In her testimony she recalled lying in the cultural center, having been raped repeatedly by Interahamwe, and hearing the cries of young girls around her, girls as young as twelve or thirteen years old. On the way to the cultural center the first time she was raped there, Witness JJ said that she and the others were taken past the Accused and that he was looking at them. The second time she was taken to the cultural center to be raped, Witness JJ recalled seeing the Accused standing at the entrance of the cultural center and hearing him say loudly to the Interahamwe, "Never ask me again what a Tutsi woman tastes like," and "Tomorrow they will be killed" (Ntihazagire umbaza uko umututsikazi yari ameze, ngo kandi mumenye ko ejo ngo nibabica nta kintu muzambaza. Ngo ejo bazabica). According to Witness JJ, most of the girls and women were subsequently killed, either brought to the river and killed there, after having returned to their houses, or killed at the bureau communal. Witness JJ testified that she never saw the Accused rape anyone, but she, like Witness H, believed that he had the means to prevent the rapes from taking place and never even tried to do so. In describing the Accused and the statement he made regarding the taste of Tutsi women, she said he was "talking as if someone were encouraging a player" (Yavugaga nk'ubwiriza umukinnyi) and suggested that he was the one "supervising" the acts of rape. Witness JJ said she did not witness any killings at the bureau communal, although she saw dead bodies there.

423. When Witness JJ fled from the bureau communal, she left her one year-old child with a Hutu man and woman, who said they had milk for the child and subsequently killed him. Witness JJ spoke of the heavy sorrow the war had caused her. She testified to the humiliation she felt as a mother, by the public nudity and being raped in the presence of children by young men. She said that just thinking about it made the war come alive inside of her. Witness JJ told the Chamber that she had remarried but that her life had never been the same because of the beatings and rapes she suffered. She said the pain in her ribs prevents her from farming because she can no longer use a hoe, and she used to live on the food that she could grow.

424. Witness OO, a young Tutsi woman, testified that she and her family sought refuge at the bureau communal in April 1994 and encountered many other Tutsi refugees there, on the road outside the compound. While she was there, she said, some Interahamwe arrived and started killing people with machetes. She and two other girls tried to flee but were stopped by the Interahamwe who went back and told the Accused that they were taking the girls away to "sleep with" them. Witness OO told the Chamber that standing five meters away from the Accused, she heard him say in reply, "take them". She said she was then separated from the other girls and taken to a field by one Interahamwe called Antoine. When she refused to sit down, he pushed her to the ground and put his "sex" into hers, clarifying on examination that he penetrated her vagina with his penis. When she started to cry, she said he warned her that if she cried or shouted, others might come and kill her.

425. According to Witness OO, Antoine left her in the field and returned that night to take her to the house of a woman called Zimba, where she spent three nights. On the fourth night, she said Antoine returned and took her to another Interahamwe called Emanuel. She said that Antoine did the same thing he had done before to her, and that Emanuel followed him in turn. Witness OO told the Chamber she spent three days and nights at the house of Emanuel where every day she was sexually violated by both Antoine and Emanuel. Afterwards, she said she was chased away by them.

426. Witness OO returned to the bureau communal when she heard that an order had been given to stop the killing of women and children, but after hearing the Accused, Kubwimana and Ruvugama all call for the killing of Tutsi, she left and went back into hiding. Subsequently, she and her seven year-old sister were apprehended by Interahamwe and taken to a roadblock. Her sister and two other people were imprisoned overnight and killed in the morning. At the time of these events, Witness OO was fifteen years old. When asked how it was that the Accused had the authority to protect her from rape, Witness OO replied that if he had told the Interahamwe not to take her from the bureau communal, they would have listened to him because he was the bourgmestre. Witness OO was unable to identify the Accused in the courtroom. She told the Chamber that someone had pointed him out to her at the bureau communal as the bourgmestre but that she had not looked at him closely and that it had been a long time ago.

427. Witness KK, a Hutu woman married to a Tutsi man, also sought refuge at the bureau communal in Taba after her home was destroyed. She testified that the Tutsi refugees there were beaten often by the police and the Accused, whom she described as "supervising." She recalled the Accused publicly name a teacher called Tharcisse as an accomplice and send the police to find him. They brought Tharcisse and his wife and made them sit in the mud. With the Accused standing nearby they then killed Tharcisse. They took off his wife's clothing and told her to go and die somewhere else. Witness KK testified that on the same day, on the orders of the Accused, the Interahamwe brought teachers from Remera, who were also forced to sit in the mud. She said they started by clubbing a young teacher who had been brought with his fiancee, and that during this time the Accused was walking around and supervising the police, who were beating refugees. The teachers were critically wounded with small hoes and taken in a wheelbarrow to a mass grave, many still breathing, left to die a slow death.

428. Witness KK testified that her husband was beaten at the bureau communal and injured on the head. After escaping, he was captured by Interahamwe, and Witness KK received a message from him requesting to speak to her before he died. She found him behind the bureau communal with Interahamwes armed with clubs and spears, who then took him away between the two buildings of the bureau communal. She learned later that he was killed. Witness KK later went to the Accused and asked him for an attestation to help her keep her children alive. She said he replied that it was not he who had made them be born Tutsi and that "when rats are killed you don't spare rats that are still in the form of fetus." Witness KK testified that she had been pregnant and miscarried after being beaten by police and Interahamwe. Of her nine children, only two survived the events of this period.

429. Witness KK also recalled seeing women and girls selected and taken away to the cultural center at the bureau communal by Interahamwes who said they were going to "sleep with" these women and girls. Witness KK testified regarding an incident in which the Accused told the Interahamwe to undress a young girl named Chantal, whom he knew to be a gymnast, so that she could do gymnastics naked. The Accused told Chantal, who said she was Hutu, that she must be a Tutsi because he knew her father to be a Tutsi. As Chantal was forced to march around naked in front of many people, Witness KK testified that the Accused was laughing and happy with this. Afterwards, she said he told the Interahamwes to take her away and said "you should first of all make sure that you sleep with this girl." (Ngo kandi nababwiye ko muzajya mubanza mukirwanaho mukarongora abo bakobwa.) Witness KK also testified regarding the rape of Tutsi women married to Hutu men. She described, after leaving the bureau communal, encountering on the road a man and woman who had been killed. She said the woman, whom she knew to be a Tutsi married to a Hutu, was "not exactly dead" and still in agony. She described the Interahamwes forcing a piece of wood into the woman's sexual organs while she was still breathing, before she died. In most cases, Witness KK said that Tutsi women married to Hutu men "were left alone because it was said that these women deliver Hutu children." She said that there were Hutu men who married Tutsi women to save them, but that these women were sought, taken away forcibly and killed. She said that she never saw the Accused rape a woman.

430. Witness NN, a Tutsi woman and the younger sister of JJ, described being raped along with another sister by two men in the courtyard of their home, just after it was destroyed by their Hutu neighbours and her brother and father had been killed. Witness NN said one of the men told her that the girls had been spared so that they could be raped. She said her mother begged the men, who were armed w. bludgeons and machetes, to kill her daughters rather than rape them in front of her, and the man replied that the "principle was to make them suffer" and the girls were then raped. Witness NN confirmed on examination that the man who raped her penetrated her vagina with his penis, saying he did it in an "atrocious" manner, mocking and taunting them. She said her sister was raped by the other man at the same time, near her, so that they could each see what was happening to the other. Afterwards, she said she begged for death.

431. According to the testimony of Witness NN, after these men left, two other men who were neighbours came and one of them raped her, while the other took her sister a little further away and raped her sister. She recalled that the neighbour said that marriage had been refused to them, but now they were going to sleep with the girls without penalty (peine). She said the men left afterwards, warning the girls that they would kill them if they did not stay where they were. That evening, she said two other younger men, around the age of 15 or 16, came and asked them to "teach them because they didn't know how it was done". After these two men raped the girls, Witness NN said their mother asked her daughters to leave rather than continue to be tortured in front of her. The girls left and went into hiding with a relative.

432. After hiding for a week and one half, Witness NN said she heard that Akayesu had stopped the killings, and she went with her sister towards the bureau communal. On the way, having taken a different route from her sister, Witness NN said she met two men who said they would accompany her to the bureau communal and that they had been given orders by the bourgmestre. She said the two men then took her a short distance away and raped her, each of them in turn, leaving her there afterwards lying naked. Subsequently, she said four men herding cattle came upon her, and two of them raped her. These incidents took place in the countryside, not very far from the bureau communal, according to Witness NN. After the rapes, Witness NN said she could not move - she was unable to get up and unable to dress herself. She said her sister found her and brought her some ghee to put in her lower parts to relieve the muscles. When she was able to get up, Witness NN said she continued on her way to the bureau communal with her sister.

433. Witness NN estimated that she arrived at the bureau communal some time in the beginning of May, and she said she found about three hundred refugees there, mostly women and children. The morning after she arrived, she said she saw the Accused with a towel around his neck, moving to the place where two Interahamwes were driving a woman to rape her, between the bureau communal and the cultural center. She said she saw the Accused standing watching the men drag the woman and later on he entered the office. She said she saw the Interahamwe circle this woman and saw them on top of her but did not see them penetrate her. She also said there were many refugees watching while this was happening. During the rape, she said there were two commune policemen who were in front of the office of the bourgmestre, one called Mushumba and one called Nsengiyumva who was in plain clothes. She said they did nothing to prevent the rape from happening and that the Accused did nothing as well - only watched and entered his office. She said after the rape she saw that the naked woman was hungry and cold, and the woman was pregnant. She said she was told by an Interahamwe that the woman died at the bureau communal. Witness NN said she did not see anyone raped inside the cultural center but that the Interahamwe did come at night and take some girls away.

434. Two days after arriving at the bureau communal, Witness NN recounted seeing an Interahamwe called Rafiki, whom she had known previously and who had previously told her that he wanted to live with her. When he saw her at the bureau communal, she said he told her that he was going to rape her and not marry her. She said Rafiki took her to his home not far from the bureau communal and locked her up there for two days, during which time he raped her repeatedly day and night, a total of approximately six times. She said often when he came to rape her, he had been smoking herbs or drinking alcohol. When she returned to the bureau communal, Witness NN said she found her sis who told her that she also had been raped again, at the bureau communal. Witness NN testified that her sister was hungry and cold, and could not move. Her sister died and when they went to bury her, they found her body had been eaten by dogs.

435. Witness NN said she saw the Accused often at the bureau communal and that she heard him tell police to remove the refugees, citing one occasion where a policeman named Mushuba beat and chased them away after receiving such an order from the Accused. She also recalled seeing the Accused when Ntereye was taken from the prison and killed. She did not witness this killing but heard a gunshot and later saw the corpse of Nteyere, his head crushed as if by a hammer. Subsequently, Witness NN said on two consecutive days she was taken with a group of several hundred people, mostly women and children, to a hole near the bureau communal where the Interahamwe were intending to kill them with a grenade. The first day they were apparently unable to find a grenade. On the second day, they were beaten and brought back to the hole. At that time Witness NN said Rafiki, the Interahamwe who had locked her in his house, took her out of the group and said that she was his wife. According to her testimony, the Interahamwe then started stabbing the group of people, beating them with machetes and throwing them into the hole while she was standing by. Witness NN said she closed her eyes but could hear people crying and shouting. She estimated that the killing of the group took twenty minutes, and recalled feeling as if she were dead, apart from the fact that she was still breathing.

436. Witness NN said she was then taken by the younger brother of Rafiki back to his home where she stayed for one week. While she was there, she said she was locked up by Rafiki, who gave the key to other young men who came and "slept with" her, which she explained meant that they took their "sex" and put it into hers. She did not recall how many times this happened, stating that they came every day but that sometimes they did not rape her. After a week, Witness NN told the Chamber that she ran away and hid in the bush. Witness NN expressed the opinion in her testimony that the Accused had the power to oppose the killings and rapes and that by not giving refuge to anybody at the bureau communal, he authorized the rapes which took place. She testified that as a result of the rapes she has had recurring vaginal discharge and pain which require treatment in hospital.

437. Witness PP, a Tutsi woman married to a Hutu man, lived very near the bureau communal. Witness PP testified that she saw three women - Alexia, the wife of Ntereye, and her two nieces Nishimwe and Louise - raped and killed at Kinihira, a basin near the bureau communal. Witness PP said that the women were brought by the Interahamwe, at the direction of the Accused, in a vehicle of the bureau communal driven by Mutabaruka, the driver of the commune of Taba. She said she first saw the women in the vehicle at the bureau communal, where she heard the Accused say to the Interahamwe, "Take them to Kinihira. Don't you know where killings take place, where the others have been killed?" According to Witness PP, who then went to Kinihira herself, the three women were forced by the Interahamwe to undress and told to walk, run and perform exercises "so that they could display the thighs of Tutsi women." All this took place, she said, in front of approximately two hundred people. After this, she said the women were raped. She described in particular detail the rape of Alexia by Interahamwe who threw her to the ground and climbed on top of her saying "Now, let's see what the vagina of a Tutsi woman feels like." According to Witness PP, Alexia gave the Interahamwe named Pierre her Bible before he raped her and told him, "Take this Bible because it's our memory, because you do not know what you're doing." Then one person held her neck, others took her by the shoulders and others held her thighs apart as numerous Interahamwe continued to rape her - Bongo after Pierre, and Habarurena after Bongo. According to the testimony, Alexia was pregnant. When she became weak she was turned over and lying on her stomach, she went into premature delivery during the rapes. Witness PP testified that the Interahamwe then went on to rape Nishimwe, a young girl, and recalled lots of blood coming from her private parts after several men raped her. Louise was then raped by several Interahamwe while others held her down, and after the rapes, according to the testimony, all three women were placed on their stomachs and hit with sticks and killed.

438. Witness PP said that no one tried to rape her because they did not know which ethnic group she belonged to. She also said she was protected from rape by an Interahamwe named Bongo because she had given him a sandwich and tea, and he told the other Interahamwe not to harm her. Witness PP testified that some women and children were able to escape from the bureau communal in April 1994 but that they had to "sacrifice themselves" in order to survive. By sacrifice she said she meant that they submitted to rape and she said that she helped to care for one of these women who subsequently came to her house for a week. On cross-examination, Witness PP described her encounter with a woman called Vestine, whom she had rescued from the pit at Kinihira where people were being thrown and where Vestine had just given birth. Witness PP said she brought Vestine to stay in the house of Emmanuel, a man she knew, and when she went back two days later, he told her that Vestine had been taken by an Interahamwe called Habarurena to a sorghum field in a place known as Kanyinya. According to Witness PP, Habarurena kept Vestine in the sorghum field for a week and raped her repeatedly. When she next saw Vestine there was a liquid flowing from her private parts and Vestine told her, "I think it would be better to go Kinihira to be killed." The next day Witness PP said she saw Vestine being raped, together with other women, and there was nothing she could do. On the following day, from the church where she went to pray, Witness PP said she saw Vestine being killed with a machete, by an Interahamwe called Bongo, and thrown into the pit, having been brought back there by the Interahamwe Habarurena.

439. Defence Witness DBB, a former student of the Accused currently in detention in Rwanda, testified that he went to the bureau communal on the 17 April 1994. Thereafter he went into hiding during the massacres and did not go to the bureau communal at all. Witness DBB testified that he never heard of or saw violence perpetrated against women during the events which took place in 1994, and that no women in his sector were raped. Subsequently he did say that he heard people saying that women were being raped in the commune of Taba, outside of his sector, but he said he did not witness this. Witness DBB said he did not hear the name of the Accused mentioned in connection with sexual violence and that it was being attributed to the people who were participating in the massacres and looting. Witness DBB expressed the view that these incidents were being done out of sight of the Accused. On cross-examination he said he did not know anything about the Accused allowing women to be taken away and raped at the bureau communal.

440. Defence Witness DCC, the driver of Taba commune, testified that he never heard about violence perpetrated against women in Taba commune, that the Accused perpetrated violence against women in the commune or that the Accused gave orders for women to be raped. He said that during the period he was at the bureau communal, in April and throughout May, there were refugees there and he was there every day. He said nothing happened to the women refugees, and that he did not witness any of them being beaten or taken away to be raped. He said he did not know Alexia, Ntereye's wife, and denied going to look for her, finding her, and driving her in the communal vehicle to the bureau communal and then to Kinihira. He said the bureau communal vehicle had broken down before the massacres started

441. Defence Witness DZZ , a former Taba communal policeman currently in detention in Rwanda, testified that he went to the bureau communal every day and that incidents of sexual violence did not take place there. Witness DZZ also testified that he saw no crimes of any type being committed at the bureau communal. Witness DZZ was quite insistent that he heard of no cases of rape in the entire commune of Taba during this period. Defence Witness DCX in a similar statement said that when he was in Taba he heard no mention of sexual violence. He stated categorically that there was no rape. Defence Witness DAX when asked whether he had heard that the Interahamwe had committed crimes of sexual violence against women stated that nobody talked about such things where he was. He said he could not affirm that elsewhere maybe such things were heard or took place.

442. Defence Witness Matata, called as an expert witness, noted only one case he had heard of in Taba an attempted rape of two girls aged fourteen and fifteen. He expressed his opinion that the bourgmestre would not have been aware of this case as it was in a region, Buguri sector, which the bourgmestre had never gone to. Witness Matata noted that there is a cultural factor which prevented people from talking about rape, but also suggested that the phenomenon of rape was introduced afterwards for purposes of blackmail. He said he had come across incidents of rape in other parts of the country but suggested that cases of rape were not frequent and not related to an ethnic group. Witness Matata expressed the opinion that rapists were more interested in satisfying their physical needs, that there were spontaneous acts of desire even in the context of killing. He noted that Tutsi women, in general, are quite beautiful and that raping them is not necessarily intended to destroy an ethnic group, but rather to have a beautiful woman.

443. Defence Witness DIX testified that her father lent his vehicle to the Accused and helped him ensure security in the commune during this period. Witness DIX testified that she was at home in Taba and heard all the news but that she did not hear anything about rape or sexual violence during the killings which took place. However, she said that she received all her information from her parents and neighbours and did not once go to the bureau communal after the killings started. She said that she herself saw the Accused just one time, in April. According to her testimony, she did not speak to him at that time, and has never spoken to him at any other time. Nevertheless, Witness DIX expressed the opinion that the Accused had committed no crime, and she was surprised that he was in prison. Defence Witness DJX, a minor and the brother of Witness DIX, also testified that he did not hear anything about rape and he did not see any cases of rape. The Chamber notes that the written statements of these two witnesses, prepared and submitted by the Defence, are identical. Witness DJX was twelve years old at the time of the events, and like Witness DIX, he testified that he did not go to the bureau communal during this period. He said he saw the Accused two times.

444. Witness DFX testified that she was never a witness to acts of rape or sexual violence in Taba and that she never even heard anyone talk about them. The Chamber notes that this witness, who is a protected witness, has a close personal relationship to the Defendant. She testified, on examination by the Chamber, that the Accused did not tell her what was happening at the bureau communal, that she did not ask him, and that her source of information was from other people. On cross-examination by the Prosecution, she testified that she herself never went to the bureau communal during this period for security reasons. On examination by the Chamber, the Witness acknowledged that in her written statement submitted by the Defence she had mentioned reports that the Interahamwe were abducting beautiful Tutsi girls and taking them home as mistresses. She conceded that such conduct could be considered sexual violence as it was not consensual.

445. Defence Witness DEEX, a Tutsi woman, testified that before killing women the Interahamwes raped them. Asked whether the Accused encouraged or authorized them in this sexual violence, she said she did not know. On cross-examination, she said that she did not personally witness sexual violence, although she heard that the girls at the house of the family where she had taken refuge were raped by the Interahamwe. Witness DEEX testified that she was given a laissez-passer by the Accused, which helped her to move around safely.

446. The Accused himself testified that he was completely surprised by the allegations of rape in Taba during the events which took place. He asserted that anyone saying that even a single woman was raped at the bureau communal was lying. While he acknowledged that some witnesses had testified that they were raped at the bureau communal, he swore, in the name of God, that the charge was made up. He said he never saw, and never heard from his policemen, that any woman was raped at the bureau communal. He said that he heard about rape accusations over Radio Rwanda and that women's associations had organized demonstrations and a march from Kigali to Taba. He suggested that perhaps this was intended to make the Chamber understand that in Taba women were raped at the bureau communal, but he insisted that women were never raped within the premises of the bureau communal or on land belonging to the bureau communal or the commune.

447. In his testimony, the Accused recalled the allegation that he had forced a young girl, Chantal, to march naked. He said he did not know her and that it never took place. He said he would not do something like that. He referred to the account of a woman raped with a wooden stick as "savagery", questioning how a woman could witness such a thing, and he referred to the statement he had been accused of making at the entrance to the cultural center as "too much". He also testified that the cultural center building is such that it would be difficult to see what was going on inside from the door and that it would be difficult for a woman lying down inside to know who is at the door. The Accused testified that there were women taking refuge all over and outside the bureau communal and that there were women in the cultural center. He denied that the Interahamwe brought women to the cultural center. He said that some of the women who took refuge at the bureau communal were killed and others escaped.

448. On examination by the Chamber, the Accused stated that he did hear about rapes in Kigali but only after he was out of the country. When asked by the Chamber for a reaction to the testimony of sexual violence, the Accused noted that rape was not mentioned in the pre-trial statements of Witness J and Witness H, although Witness H said on examination by the Chamber that she had mentioned her rape to investigators. The Accused suggested that his Indictment was amended because of pressure from the women's movement and women in Rwanda, whom he described as "worked up to agree that they have been raped." On examination by the Chamber, the Accused acknowledged that it was possible that rape might have taken place in the commune of Taba, but he insisted that no rape took place at the bureau communal. He said he first learned of the rape allegations in Taba at the Chamber and maintained that the charges were an "invented accusation.

Factual Findings

449. Having carefully reviewed the testimony of the Prosecution witnesses regarding sexual violence, the Chamber finds that there is sufficient credible evidence to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that during the events of 1994, Tutsi girls and women were subjected to sexual violence, beaten and killed on or near the bureau communal premises, as well as elsewhere in the commune of Taba. Witness H, Witness JJ, Witness OO, and Witness NN all testified that they themselves were raped, and all, with the exception of Witness OO, testified that they witnessed other girls and women being raped. Witness J, Witness KK and Witness PP also testified that they witnessed other girls and women being raped in the commune of Taba. Hundreds of Tutsi, mostly women and children, sought refuge at the bureau communal during this period and many rapes took place on or near the premises of the bureau communal - Witness JJ was taken by Interahamwe from the refuge site near the bureau communal to a nearby forest area and raped there. She testified that this happened often to other young girls and women at the refuge site. Witness JJ was also raped repeatedly on two separate occasions in the cultural center on the premises of the bureau communal, once in a group of fifteen girls and women and once in a group of ten girls and women. Witness KK saw women and girls being selected and taken by the Interahamwe to the cultural center to be raped. Witness H saw women being raped outside the compound of the bureau communal, and Witness NN saw two Interahamwes take a woman and rape her between the bureau communal and the cultural center. Witness OO was taken from the bureau communal and raped in a nearby field. Witness PP saw three women being raped at Kinihira, the killing site near the bureau communal, and Witness NN found her younger sister, dying, after she had been raped at the bureau communal. Many other instances of rape in Taba outside the bureau communal - in fields, on the road, and in or just outside houses - were described by Witness J, Witness H, Witness OO, Witness KK, Witness NN and Witness PP. Witness KK and Witness PP also described other acts of sexual violence which took place on or near the premises of the bureau communal - the forced undressing and public humiliation of girls and women. The Chamber notes that much of the sexual violence took place in front of large numbers of people, and that all of it was directed against Tutsi women.

450. With a few exceptions, most of the rapes and all of the other acts of sexual violence described by the Prosecution witnesses were committed by Interahamwe. It has not been established that the perpetrator of the rape of Witness H in a sorghum field and six of the men who raped Witness NN were Interahamwe. In the case of Witness NN, two of her rapists were neighbours, two were teenage boys and two were herdsmen, and there is no evidence that any of these people were Interahamwe. Nevertheless, with regard to all evidence of rape and sexual violence which took place on or near the premises of the bureau communal, the perpetrators were all identified as Interahamwe. Interahamwe are also identified as the perpetrators of many rapes which took place outside the bureau communal, including the rapes of Witness H, Witness OO, Witness NN, Witness J's daughter, a woman near death seen by Witness KK and a woman called Vestine, seen by Witness PP. There is no suggestion in any of the evidence that the Accused or any communal policemen perpetrated rape, and both Witness JJ and Witness KK affirmed that they never saw the Accused rape anyone.

451. In considering the role of the Accused in the sexual violence which took place and the extent of his direct knowledge of incidents of sexual violence, the Chamber has taken into account only evidence which is direct and unequivocal. Witness H testified that the Accused was present during the rape of Tutsi women outside the compound of the bureau communal, but as she could not confirm that he was aware that the rapes were taking place, the Chamber discounts this testimony in its assessment of the evidence. Witness PP recalled the Accused directing the Interahamwe to take Alexia and her two nieces to Kinihira, saying "Don't you know where killings take place, where the others have been killed?" The three women were raped before they were killed, but the statement of the Accused does not refer to sexual violence and there is no evidence that the Accused was present at Kinihira. For this reason, the Chamber also discounts this testimony in its assessment of the evidence.

452. On the basis of the evidence set forth herein, the Chamber finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused had reason to know and in fact knew that sexual violence was taking place on or near the premises of the bureau communal, and that women were being taken away from the bureau communal and sexually violated. There is no evidence that the Accused took any measures to prevent acts of sexual violence or to punish the perpetrators of sexual violence. In fact there is evidence that the Accused ordered, instigated and otherwise aided and abetted sexual violence. The Accused watched two Interahamwe drag a woman to be raped between the bureau communal and the cultural center. The two commune policemen in front of his office witnessed the rape but did nothing to prevent it. On the two occasions Witness JJ was brought to the cultural center of the bureau communal to be raped, she and the group of girls and women with her were taken past the Accused, on the way. On the first occasion he was looking at them, and on the second occasion he was standing at the entrance to the cultural center. On this second occasion, he said, "Never ask me again what a Tutsi woman tastes like." Witness JJ described the Accused in making these statements as "talking as if someone were encouraging a player." More generally she stated that the Accused was the one "supervising" the acts of rape. When Witness OO and two other girls were apprehended by Interahamwe in flight from the bureau communal, the Interahamwe went to the Accused and told him that they were taking the girls away to sleep with them. The Accused said "take them." The Accused told the Interahamwe to undress Chantal and march her around. He was laughing and happy to be watching and afterwards told the Interahamwe to take her away and said "you should first of all make sure that you sleep with this girl." The Chamber considers this statement as evidence that the Accused ordered and instigated sexual violence, although insufficient evidence was presented to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that Chantal was in fact raped.

453. In making its factual findings, the Chamber has carefully considered the cross-examination by the Defence of Prosecution witnesses and the evidence presented by the Defence. With regard to cross-examination, the Chamber notes that the Defence did not question the testimony of Witness J or Witness

H on rape at all, although the Chamber itself questioned both witnesses on this testimony. Witness JJ, OO, KK, NN and PP were questioned by the Defence with regard to their testimony of sexual violence, but the testimony itself was never challenged. Details such as where the rapes took place, how many rapists there were, how old they were, whether the Accused participated in the rapes, who was raped and which rapists used condoms were all elicited by the Defence, but at no point did the Defence suggest to the witnesses that the rapes had not taken place. The main line of questioning by the Defence with regard to the rapes and other sexual violence, other than to confirm the details of the testimony, related to whether the Accused had the authority to stop them. In cross-examination of the evidence presented by the Prosecution, specific incidents of sexual violence were never challenged by the Defence.

454. The Defence has raised discrepancies between the pre-trial written statements made by witnesses to the Office of the Prosecutor and their testimony before this Chamber, to challenge the credibility of these witnesses. The Chamber has considered the discrepancies which have been alleged with regard to the witnesses who testified on sexual violence and finds them to be unfounded or immaterial. For example, the Defence challenged Witness PP, quoting from her pre-trial statement that she stayed home during the genocide and recalling her testimony that she went out often as a contradiction. The Chamber pointed out to the Defence that elsewhere in her pre-trial statement, Witness PP had also said "I went out of my house often." The Chamber established that during this period, Witness PP stayed, generally speaking, in the Taba commune, but that she went out of her house often. Selectively quoting from the pre-trial statements, the Defence often suggested inconsistencies which, upon examination or with further explanation, were found not to be inconsistencies.

455. With regard to the inconsistencies which were established by the Defence, the Chamber finds them to be immaterial. For example, Witness OO said in her pre-trial statement that she went to the bureau communal four days after the plane crash which killed President Habyarimana. In her testimony, she said she went to the bureau communal one week after the plane crash. Witness PP said in her pre-trial statement that when she rescued Vestine, Vestine was thereafter taken from her by Habarurena. In her testimony, Witness PP said she left Vestine at the house of Emmanuel, from which Vestine was taken by Habarurena. Whether Tutsi women were stripped on the way to or at Kinihira is the core of another discrepancy between the pre-trial statement and testimony of Witness PP. The Chamber considers that these inconsistencies are not of material consequence and that they are not substantial enough to impeach the credibility of the witnesses. The Chamber is of the view that the inconsistencies between pre-trial statements and witness testimony can be explained by the difficulties of recollecting precise details several years after the occurrence of the events, the trauma experienced by the witnesses to these events, the difficulties of translation, and the fact that several witnesses were illiterate and stated that they had not read their written statements.

456. The Defence in its closing argument used the example of Witness J to demonstrate the dishonesty of Prosecution witnesses. He recalled that Witness J testified that she was six months pregnant, and that when her brother was killed she climbed up a tree and stayed there for an entire week in her condition, without any food. In fact, the Defence is misrepresenting Witness J's testimony. She did not say that she stayed in a tree for a whole week without food. Witness J testified that when she got hungry she came down and went to a neighbour's house for food and that subsequently her neighbour brought food to her and then she would spend the night in the tree. Under cross-examination, Witness J testified that she came down from the tree every night. What the Defence characterized as the "fantasy" of this witness, which may be "of interest to psychologists and not justice", the witness characterized as desperation, answering his challenge with the suggestion, "If somebody was chasing you, you would be able to climb a tree."

457. Of the twelve witnesses presented by the Defence, other than the Accused only two - DZZ and DCC - testified that they went regularly to the bureau communal after the killings began in Taba. These two witnesses contradicted each other on what they saw and heard. Witness DZZ, a former communal policeman currently in detention in Rwanda, testified that he heard of no cases of rape in the entire commune during this period. He testified that he was at the bureau communal every day and that no sexual violence took place there. He also testified that no crimes of any sort took place at the bureau communal - a categorical statement which, in the light of all the other witnesses who have testified that killings took place at the bureau communal, is highly implausible. The Accused himself testified that killings took place at the bureau communal. Witness DCC, who is currently in detention in Rwanda, also testified that killings took place at the bureau communal. Witness DCC was the driver of the commune during this time, and he testified that he never heard that violence was perpetrated against women in Taba. He denied bringing Alexia, the wife of Ntereye, in the communal vehicle to the bureau communal and then to Kinihira, and he testified that this vehicle had broken down before the massacres started Yet Defence Witness DAX testified that the communal vehicle was in use between April and June. Witness PP also testified that she saw the driver in this vehicle within this time frame. For these reasons the Chamber does not accept the testimony of Witness DZZ and DCC with regard to sexual violence.

458. Most of the Defence witnesses did not go to the bureau communal during the period from 7 April 1994 to the end of June 1994. Witness DCX , who testified that he did not hear any mention of sexual violence, only went to the bureau communal two times during this period, for personal reasons, and passed by the bureau several times. Witness DEEX, a Tutsi woman, who testified that she went once to the bureau communal, did hear that women were being raped by the Interahamwe before they were killed. The other Defence witnesses who testified that they had not heard any mention of sexual violence stated that they did not go to the bureau communal at any time after the killings started. Witness DBB, Witness DAX, Witness DAAX, Witness DIX, Witness DJX, Witness DFX and Witness Matata never went to the bureau communal during this period. Witness DAAX and Witness Matata, who was called as an expert, were not in the commune of Taba during this period, and Witness DBB was in hiding after 17 April 1994. The Chamber considers that these witnesses were not in a position to know what occurred at the bureau communal. By their own accounts none of them, with the exception of Witness DAAX, had any conversation with the Accused regarding what was happening there. Witness DAAX, a prefet, testified that he lost contact with the Accused after 18 April 1994, before the killings began. The testimony of these witnesses therefore does not discredit the evidence presented by the Prosecution witnesses.

459. With regard to the testimony of the Accused, the Chamber finds very little concrete evidence or argument on sexual violence other than his bare denial that it occurred. The only specific incident referred to by the Accused on direct examination was the forced undressing and parading of Chantal, which he denied. On examination by the Chamber, the Accused subsequently referred to other incidents and a statement he was said to have made outside the cultural center, suggesting that it would be difficult for a person standing at the entrance to see what was happening inside, and that it would be difficult for a person inside lying down to see who was at the entrance. The Accused did not assert that this was impossible, and these comments were made in an offhand manner rather than as a serious defence. The Accused simply stated that there was very little to say about the allegations of sexual violence, that unlike the killings this was impossible and not even for discussion.

460. Faced with first-hand personal accounts from women who experienced and witnessed sexual violence in Taba and at the bureau communal, and who swore under oath that the Accused was present and saw what was happening, the Chamber does not accept the statement made by the Accused. The Accused insists that the charges are fabricated, but the Defence has offered the Chamber no evidence to support this assertion. There is overwhelming evidence to the contrary, and the Chamber does not accept the testimony of the Accused. The findings of the Chamber are based on the evidence which has been presented in this trial. As the Accused flatly denies the occurrence of sexual violence at the bureau communal, he does not allow for the possibility that the sexual violence may have occurred but that he was unaware of it.

6. THE LAW

6.1 Cumulative Charges

461. In the amended Indictment, the accused is charged cumulatively with more than one crime in relation to the same sets of facts, in all but count 4. For example the events described in paragraphs 12 to 23 of the Indictment are the subject of three counts of the Indictment - genocide (count 1), complicity in genocide (count 2) and crimes against humanity/extermination (count 3). Likewise, counts 5 and 6 of the Indictment charge murder as a crime against humanity and murder as a violation of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, respectively, in relation to the same set of facts; the same is true of counts 7 and 8, and of counts 9 and 10, of the Indictment. Equally, counts 11 (crime against humanity/torture) and 12 (violation of common article 3/cruel treatment) relate to the same events. So do counts 13 (crime against humanity/rape), 14 (crimes against humanity/other inhumane acts) and 15 (violation of common article 3 and additional protocol II/rape).

462. The question which arises at this stage is whether, if the Chamber is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that a given factual allegation set out in the Indictment has been established, it may find the accused guilty of all of the crimes charged in relation to those facts or only one. The reason for posing this question is that it might be argued that the accumulation of criminal charges offends against the principle of double jeopardy or a substantive non bis in idem principle in criminal law. Thus an accused who is found guilty of both genocide and crimes against humanity in relation to the same set of facts may argue that he has been twice judged for the same offence, which is generally considered impermissible in criminal law.

463. The Chamber notes that this question has been posed, and answered, by the Trial Chamber of the ICTY in the first case before that Tribunal, The Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic. Trial Chamber II, confronted with this issue, stated:

> "In any event, since this is a matter that will only be relevant insofar as it might affect penalty, it can best be dealt with if and when matters of penalty fall for consideration. What can, however, be said with certainty is that penalty cannot be made to depend upon whether offences arising from the same conduct are alleged cumulatively or in the alternative. What is to be punished by penalty is proven criminal conduct and that will not depend upon technicalities of pleading". (Prosecutor v. Tadic , Decision on Defence Motion on Form of the Indictment at p.10 (No. IT-94-1-T, T.Ch.II, 14 Nov, 1995)

464. In that case, when the matter reached the sentencing stage, the Trial Chamber dealt with the matter of cumulative criminal charges by imposing concurrent sentences for each cumulative charge. Thus, for example, in relation to one particular beating, the accused received 7 years' imprisonment for the beating as a crime against humanity, and a 6 year concurrent sentence for the same beating as a violation of the laws or customs of war.

465. The Chamber takes due note of the practice of the ICTY. This practice was also followed in the Barbie case, where the French Cour de Cassation held that a single event could be qualified both as a crime against humanity and as a war crime. 79

466. It is clear that the practice of concurrent sentencing ensures that the accused is not twice punished for the same acts. Notwithstanding this absence of prejudice to the accused, it is still necessary to justify the prosecutorial practice of accumulating criminal charges. 5459

467. The Chamber notes that in Civil Law systems, including that of Rwanda, there exists a principle known as concours ideal d'infractions which permits multiple convictions for the same act under certain circumstances. Rwandan law allows multiple convictions in the following circumstances:

> Code pénal du Rwanda: Chapitre VI - Du concours d'infractions:
>
> > Article 92.- Il y a concours d'infractions lorsque plusieurs infractions ont été commises par le mˆme auteur sans qu'une condamnation soit intervenue entre ces infractions.
> >
> > Article 93.- Il y concours idéal:
> > 1) lorsque le fait unique au point de vue matériel est susceptible de plusieurs qualifications;
> > 2) lorsque l'action comprend des faits qui, constituant des infractions distinctes, sont unis entre eux comme procédant d'une intention délictueuse unique ou comme étant les uns des circonstances aggravantes des autres.
> > Seront seules prononcées dans le premier cas les peines déterminées par la qualification la plus sévère, dans le second cas les peines prévues pour la répression de l'infraction la plus grave, mais dont le maximum pourra ˆtre alors élevé de moitié.

468. On the basis of national and international law and jurisprudence, the Chamber concludes that it is acceptable to convict the accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts in the following circumstances: (1) where the offences have different elements; or (2) where the provisions creating the offences protect different interests; or (3) where it is necessary to record a conviction for both offences in order fully to describe what the accused did. However, the Chamber finds that it is not justifiable to convict an accused of two offences in relation to the same set of facts where (a) one offence is a lesser included offence of the other, for example, murder and grievous bodily harm, robbery and theft, or rape and indecent assault; or (b) where one offence charges accomplice liability and the other offence charges liability as a principal, e.g. genocide and complicity in genocide.

469. Having regard to its Statute, the Chamber believes that the offences under the Statute - genocide, crimes against humanity, and violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II - have different elements and, moreover, are intended to protect different interests. The crime of genocide exists to protect certain groups from extermination or attempted extermination. The concept of crimes against humanity exists to protect civilian populations from persecution. The idea of violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II is to protect non-combatants from war crimes in civil war. These crimes have different purposes and are, therefore, never co-extensive. Thus it is legitimate to charge these crimes in relation to the same set of facts. It may, additionally, depending on the case, be necessary to record a conviction for more than one of these offences in order to reflect what crimes an accused committed. If, for example, a general ordered that all prisoners of war belonging to a particular ethnic group should be killed, with the intent thereby to eliminate the group, this would be both genocide and a violation of common article 3, although not necessarily a crime against humanity. Convictions for genocide and violations of common article 3 would accurately reflect the accused general's course of conduct.

470. Conversely, the Chamber does not consider that any of genocide, crimes against humanity, and violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II are lesser included forms of each other. The ICTR Statute does not establish a hierarchy of norms, but rather all three offences are presented on an equal footing. While genocide may be considered the gravest crime, there is no justification in the Statute for finding that crimes against humanity or violations of common article 3 and additional protocol II are in all cricumstances alternative charges to genocide and thus lesser included offences. As stated, and it is a related point, these offences have different constituent elements. Again, this consideration renders multiple convictions for these offences in relation to the same set of facts permissible.

6.2. Individual criminal responsibility (Article 6 of the Statute)

471. The Accused is charged under Article 6(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal with individual criminal responsibility for the crimes alleged in the Indictment. With regard to Counts 13, 14 and 15 on sexual violence, the Accused is charged additionally, or alternatively, under Article 6(3) of the Statute. In the opinion of the Tribunal, Articles 6(1) and 6(3) address distinct principles of criminal liability and should, therefore, be considered separately. Article 6(1) sets forth the basic principles of individual criminal liability, which are undoubtedly common to most national criminal jurisdictions. Article 6(3), by contrast, constitutes something of an exception to the principles articulated in Article 6(1), as it derives from military law, namely the principle of the liability of a commander for the acts of his subordinates or "command responsibility".

472. Article 6(1) provides that:

> "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime".

Thus, in addition to responsibility as principal perpetrator, the Accused can be held responsible for the criminal acts of others where he plans with them, instigates them, orders them or aids and abets them to commit those acts.

473. Thus, Article 6(1) covers various stages of the commission of a crime, ranging from its initial planning to its execution, through its organization. However, the principle of individual criminal responsibility as provided for in Article 6(1) implies that the planning or preparation of the crime actually leads to its commission. Indeed, the principle of individual criminal responsibility for an attempt to commit a crime obtained only in case of genocide80. Conversely, this would mean that with respect to any other form of criminal participation and, in particular, those referred to in Article 6(1), the perpetrator would incur criminal responsibility only if the offence were completed.

474. Article 6 (1) thus appears to be in accord with the Judgments of the Nuremberg Tribunal which held that persons other than those who committed the crime, especially those who ordered it, could incur individual criminal responsibility.

475. The International Law Commission, in Article 2 (3) of the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, reaffirmed the principle of individual responsibility for the five forms of participation deemed criminal referred to in Article 6 (1) and consistently included the phrase "which in fact occurs", with the exception of aiding and abetting, which is akin to complicity and therefore implies a principal offence.

476. The elements of the offences or, more specifically, the forms of participation in the commission of one of the crimes under Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, as stipulated in Article 6 (1) of the said Statute, their elements are inherent in the forms of participation per se which render the perpetrators thereof individually responsible for such crimes. The moral element is reflected in the desire of the Accused that the crime be in fact committed.

477. In this respect, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia found in the Tadic case that:

> "a person may only be criminally responsible for conduct where it is determined that he knowingly participated in the commission of an offence" and that "his participation directly and substantially affected the commission of that offence through supporting the actual commission before, during, or after the incident."81

478. This intent can be inferred from a certain number of facts, as concerns genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, for instance, from their massive and/or systematic nature or their atrocity, to be considered infra in the judgment, in the Tribunal's findings on the law applicable to each of the three crimes which constitute its ratione materiae jurisdiction.

479. Therefore, as can be seen, the forms of participation referred to in Article 6 (1), cannot render their perpetrator criminally liable where he did not act knowingly, and even where he should have had such knowledge. This greatly differs from Article 6 (3) analyzed here below, which does not necessarily require that the superior acted knowingly to render him criminally liable; it suffices that he had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit or had committed a crime and failed to take the necessary or reasonable measures to prevent such acts or punish the perpetrators thereof. In a way, this is liability by omission or abstention.

480. The first form of liability set forth in Article 6 (1) is planning of a crime. Such planning is similar to the notion of complicity in Civil law, or conspiracy under Common law, as stipulated in Article 2 (3) of the Statute. But the difference is that planning, unlike complicity or plotting, can be an act committed by one person. Planning can thus be defined as implying that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases.

481. The second form of liability is 'incitation' (in the french version of the Statute) to commit a crime, reflected in the English version of Article 6 (1) by the word instigated. In English, it seems the words incitement and instigation are synonymous82. Furthermore, the word "instigated" or "instigation" is used to refer to incitation in several other instruments83. However, in certain legal systems and, under Civil law, in particular, the two concepts are very different84. Furthermore, and even assuming that the two words were synonymous, the question would be to know whether instigation under Article 6 (1) must include the direct and public elements, required for incitement, particularly, incitement to commit genocide (Article 2 (3)(c) of the Statute) which, in this instance, translates incitation into English as "incitement" and no longer "instigation". Some people are of that opinion85. The Chamber also accepts this interpretation 86.

482. That said, the form of participation through instigation stipulated in Article 6 (1) of the Statute, involves prompting another to commit an offence; but this is different from incitement in that it is punishable only where it leads to the actual commission of an offence desired by the instigator87.

483. By ordering the commission of one of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, a person also incurs individual criminal responsibility. Ordering implies a superior- subordinate relationship between the person giving the order and the one executing it. In other words, the person in a position of authority uses it to convince another to commit an offence. In certain legal systems, including that of Rwanda 88, ordering is a form of complicity through instructions given to the direct perpetrator of an offence. Regarding the position of authority, the Chamber considers that sometimes it can be just a question of fact.
