7116. para. 2181: The Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused are liable under either Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute for any crimes committed in Bombali District during the period between 1 May 1998 and 30 November 1998.

(x) Freetown and Western Area

a. Crimes committed – Freetown and Western Area District

7117. para. 2182: The Prosecution alleges the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1), or alternatively Article 6(3), of the Statute for the crimes of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12), enslavement (Count 13) and pillage (Counts 14) between 6 January and 28 February 1999. The Chamber recalls its Legal Findings on Freetown and the Western Area, wherein we have enumerated the crimes committed in respect of the Counts charged.[3864]

b. Personal commission – Freetown and Western Area

7118. para. 2183: The Chamber finds that the three Accused did not personally commit any of the crimes in Freetown and the Western Area.

c. Commission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7119. para. 2184: The Chamber finds, in relation to the invasion of Freetown that the Prosecution has failed to prove that the three Accused and other senior RUF members, including Bockarie, were acting in concert with Gullit, Bazzy, Five-Five, SAJ Musa and other senior AFRC Commanders in order to take power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone. The Prosecution has neither established nor pleaded that there existed a new common plan between senior members of the RUF and AFRC.

i. The RUF plan – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7120. para. 2185: The Chamber recalls its findings that the RUF in Buedu planned a military operation to capture Freetown. The plan involved an attack by the RUF on Freetown from two flanks – one from the South, coming through Segbwema, Kenema Town and Bo Town, and the other from the North, to be led by Sesay, coming through Kono and Makeni.[3865] The Chamber has found that there is no evidence that a joint plan between the RUF and AFRC was discussed or authorised to the AFRC. Moreover, the relationship between Bockarie and the AFRC remained highly strained as the AFRC continued to operate independently.[3866] The Chamber considers that this lack of cooperation is consistent with SAJ Musa's refusal to work with the RUF and the distrust and animosity that existed between Gullit and the RUF in May 1998 when Gullit broke away from the RUF and took his fighters to Koinadugu District.

7121. para. 2186: According to their plan the RUF was able to capture Kono and Makeni by 24 December 1998. The Chamber notes that the Prosecution has not charged the Accused for any crime committed in Kono or Bombali District in December 1998, apart from the crimes alleged in Count 12 of the Indictment.

ii. The AFRC Plan – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7122. para. 2187: From the time that the AFRC forces moved out of Kono District and ceased to be part of the common plan, they contemplated their individual plan to capture Freetown and to "reinstate the army". This plan did not involve the RUF. SAJ Musa ordered Gullit to set up a base at Camp Rosos in Bombali District and met up with him there in November 1998. Soon after SAJ Musa's arrival with reinforcements the AFRC forces under his command advanced towards Freetown and arrived in Benguema on about 24 December 1998.

7123. para. 2188: Even though three RUF radio operators were part of the AFRC troops, they were prohibited by SAJ Musa from communicating with the RUF under the threat of death. However, they did send messages sporadically to Superman[3867] and Bockarie[3868] in contravention of this order. There is also some evidence of communication between O-Five and Superman during this period, and between Gullit and Bockarie,[3869] although this contact was contrary to SAJ Musa's direct orders.[3870] The Chamber notes that no evidence was adduced as to the specific content or nature of these communications.

7124. para. 2189: There was a small group of about twenty RUF fighters with the AFRC forces at this time, but they were not taking orders from the RUF command.[3871] They were under the effective command of Gullit at that point in time. In addition and compared to the large number of AFRC fighters of about 3000 men, the RUF contingent was ineffectual. The most senior RUF Commander amongst them was Major Alfred Brown, a radio operator.[3872]

7125. para. 2190: The Chamber therefore finds that it has not been established by Prosecution that a common purpose resurfaced or was newly contemplated between members of the AFRC and RUF before the advance on Freetown on 6 January 1999.

iii. The AFRC Advance on Freetown – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7126. para. 2191: The Chamber has found that after SAJ Musa's death Gullit contacted Bockarie to request reinforcements. Gullit told Bockarie that the AFRC lacked ammunition and logistical capabilities.[3873] Bockarie advised Gullit to await RUF reinforcements in Benguema before moving on to Freetown.[3874]

7127. para. 2192: The Chamber finds the evidence on whether Bockarie sent reinforcements to the AFRC troops to be inconclusive and conflicting. For instance, there is some evidence that Bockarie told Gullit that his plan to attack Freetown was foolish.[3875] Furthermore, evidence suggests that Bockarie did not trust Gullit, as he believed that SAJ Musa was still alive and thought that Gullit was trying to trap him.[3876] It appears that as a result of these suspicions, Bockarie did not send the promised reinforcements prior to Gullit's arrival in Freetown.

7128. para. 2193: However, there is also evidence that suggests that RUF Rambo arrived at Waterloo on 5 January 1999, shortly after the AFRC troops had entered Freetown. The evidence suggests that RUF Rambo was not able to reinforce the AFRC troops as ECOMOG troops were deployed at Kossoh Town, blocking the way.

7129. para. 2194: Yet again according to the account of TF1-184, Gullit attempted to slow the advance of the AFRC fighters to wait until the promised RUF assistance arrived, but was pushed onwards towards Freetown by a Kamajor attack at Lion Mountain, near Benguema.[3877] On the other hand, TF1-360 testified that the AFRC decided to enter Freetown without reinforcements, despite Bockarie's promise. TF1-360 suggested that Gullit was outvoted by his fellow fighters.

7130. para. 2195: Junior Lion, offering another version of events, testified that the AFRC moved on to Hastings, arriving about the 4 January 1999, then waited for three days for RUF reinforcements to arrive. When the reinforcements were not forthcoming, the AFRC proceeded on to Freetown alone.

7131. para. 2196: In addition the Chamber notes that the communication only refers to reinforcements for a military operation and does not refer to the commission of crimes.

7132. para. 2197: The Chamber is of the considered opinion that although some evidence suggests that there were communications between Bockarie and Gullit, the evidence does not demonstrate that their actions were coordinated. In fact, the weight of the evidence demonstrates that despite his promises to Gullit and his public claims to the contrary, Bockarie had no intention of sending reinforcements to assist Gullit prior to the latter's arrival in Freetown and did not do so. The Chamber, considering the totality of the evidence, is not satisfied that from late December 1998 until 6 January 1999, Bockarie and Gullit had agreed once again to work in concert to commit crimes under the Statute in order to take power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone.

iv. Attack on the Freetown and capture of State House – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7133. para. 2198: The Chamber has found that during the attack on Freetown beginning on 6 January 1999, horrendous crimes were committed by the fighters under Gullit's command.[3878] The AFRC fighters in Freetown, however, were encircled by ECOMOG forces within days of their arrival. Only at this point did Gullit contact Bockarie again, from the State House, for assistance. There is evidence that Bockarie terminated at least one communication received by Gullit at the State House after Bockarie had accused Gullit of not following his advice and failing to wait for reinforcements.[3879] We consider that once again this suggests that there was no genuine understanding and cooperation between the RUF and the AFRC. This incident further shows that Bockarie's announcement over the BBC that "his" troops had invaded Freetown was intended to overstate his actual role in the Freetown attack.[3880]

7134. para. 2199: There is also evidence that Bockarie instructed Gullit to burn strategic points, but Gullit informed Bockarie that these locations had already been burned.[3881] TF1-360 also testified that Bockarie advised Gullit to erect obstacles against ECOMOG. We observe that it generally appears that the communication would be more about military and strategic advice, but that Gullit had already taken actions before the advice was even received. We find that Gullit and the AFRC fighters had already contemplated the commission of the crimes which were committed by his troops in Freetown.

7135. para. 2200: In addition, the Chamber finds that Bockarie did not instigate any crimes committed by the AFRC under Gullit's command. The Chamber recalls that the AFRC troops from their movement through Koinadugu and Bombali Districts up to Freetown did commit and were notorious for the commission of the most brutal and horrendous crimes. Therefore, the Chamber finds that any communication did not prompt the commission of crimes as charged in the Indictment for Freetown and the Western Area.

7136. para. 2201: A small group of fighters from the main body of the RUF forces, led by AFRC member Rambo Red Goat, managed to link up with AFRC fighters in Freetown.[3882] There is evidence that Rambo Red Goat advanced into Freetown to assist his AFRC brothers in direct contravention of orders from Kallon.[3883] The weight of the evidence suggests that Bockarie only dispatched reinforcements once Gullit had reached Freetown.[3884] We note that there is no evidence that any of the Accused were part of these communications, nor that they were informed or acted pursuant to any agreement that could have been arrived at between Bockarie and Gullit with regard to the attack on Freetown and the Western Area.

v. Retreat from Freetown to Waterloo – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7137. para. 2202: We have found that the AFRC fighters began to pull out of Freetown on 9 January 1999.[3885] George Johnson testified that Gullit sent a communication stating that the AFRC had lost Freetown because no reinforcements had been sent by the RUF.[3886] There is also evidence that Bockarie instructed Gullit to withdraw from Freetown to Kossoh Town to meet RUF reinforcements.[3887] Junior Marvin was sent by Gullit to link up with the expected RUF fighters at the Foamex factory, but once more, Bockarie's promised reinforcements did not arrive.[3888]

7138. para. 2203: Gullit contacted Bockarie to complain. In this communication Bockarie instructed Gullit to pull out of Freetown and join the RUF at Waterloo.[3889] We recall our finding that the AFRC fighters, led by Gullit, Bazzy and Five-Five, then withdrew to Waterloo, all the while committing crimes on a massive scale.

7139. para. 2204: RUF fighters led by Rambo RUF were sent from Port Loko to the Western Area by Sesay on Bockarie's orders and arrived on 6 January 1999 in Waterloo but were never able to reach the AFRC fighters as ECOMOG forces blocked their way.[3890] Fighters led by Superman also arrived in Waterloo, with Bockarie's consent. These fighters were dispatched in order to open an escape route for the retreating AFRC fighters.[3891] The main body of the RUF reinforcements advanced no further than Waterloo.[3892] Some fighters managed to get as far as Kossoh Town on 15 January 1999 for a brief period, but again were unable to join the AFRC troops and had to retreat because of massive ECOMOG reinforcements. We note from the evidence that it was not the RUF that opened the escape route for the trapped AFRC troops, but that the brief removal of the ECOMOG troops eventually led to a corridor that allowed the AFRC troops to eventually retreat to Waterloo.[3893]

7140. para. 2205: Based on the foregoing, the Chamber is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a common purpose existed between Bockarie and Gullit and other members of the RUF and AFRC prior to the point when the AFRC began to retreat from Freetown to meet RUF reinforcements Moreover, even if a common criminal plan had existed between Bockarie and Gullit and other members of the RUF and AFRC after the AFRC retreat from Freetown began, we consider that the mere deployment of Rambo and RUF fighters in the direction of the Western Area does not amount to a significant contribution to crimes committed in Freetown. In addition, the Chamber finds that the communication between one high ranking member of the RUF giving advice that was not followed or that the action had already been carried out does not amount in the circumstances to a significant contribution to the commission of crimes in Freetown and the Western Area. The Chamber recalls again that the AFRC forces, under the command first of SAJ Musa and then Gullit, had displayed their brutality against the civilian population long before the attack on Freetown in January 1999.

7141. para. 2206: Moreover, we are not convinced that the only inference from the circumstantial evidence is that Bockarie and Sesay were working together with the AFRC fighters in pursuance of a renewed joint criminal enterprise after the retreat began and prior to the arrival of the AFRC fighters in Waterloo. Finally, the Chamber finds that there is no evidence to conclude that Sesay, Kallon or Gbao shared the intent of Gullit, Bazzy and Five-Five to commit crimes within the Statute during the AFRC retreat from Freetown in January 1999.

vi. The meeting of RUF and AFRC troops in Waterloo – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7142. para. 2207: In Waterloo, the retreating AFRC fighters, led by Gullit, Bazzy and Five-Five eventually met Kallon, Rambo RUF, Superman and other RUF fighters. Sesay arrived after the AFRC had retreated from Freetown.[3894] However, the Chamber finds that the relationship between the two groups of fighters was tense at that time. This is demonstrated by the fact that the RUF remained in their position at Waterloo and the AFRC established a position in nearby Benguema. In addition, RUF fighters started to search and confiscate looted goods and arms and ammunition from the retreating AFRC fighters and resulted in a great deal of animosity between the AFRC and the RUF.[3895]

7143. para. 2208: At that meeting a second attack on Freetown was discussed.[3896] However, there was a dispute with Superman who had incited AFRC fighters against Rambo RUF, in an attempt to provoke a breakdown in the command structure.[3897] Sesay and Kallon then tried to arrest Superman, but they failed because they were threatened at gunpoint by an AFRC Commander. Sesay and Kallon returned to Waterloo and Superman remained with the AFRC in Benguema.[3898]

7144. para. 2209: The Chamber finds that this evidence reinforces its conclusion that prior to the arrival of the AFRC fighters in Waterloo, Bockarie, Sesay, Superman and Kallon did not act in concert with Gullit, Bazzy and Five-Five, but rather that the RUF Commanders were acting independently in pursuance of their own objectives.

7145. para. 2210: Moreover, the Chamber has not found evidence of the commission of crimes after the retreat of the AFRC troops around the Waterloo and Benguema area.

7146. para. 2211: The AFRC retreated to Newton and stayed there for about a month. There, the senior Commanders including Sesay, Kallon, Gullit, Bazzy and Five-Five planned another counterattack. This counter-attack was never carried out, however, due to some discord between the RUF and the AFRC.[3899] Sesay, Kallon, Superman departed to Makeni.[3900]

vii. Finding – Comission through JCE – Freetown and Western Area

7147. para. 2212: The Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has not proved that the Accused are criminally responsible through a joint criminal enterprise for the commission of any of the crimes perpetrated in Freetown and the Western Area between 6 January 1999 and 28 February 1999.

d. Ordering, Planning, Instigating or Aiding and Abetting – Freetown and Western Area

i. Sesay – Ordering, Planning, Instigating or Aiding and Abetting – Freetown and Western Area

7148. para. 2213: The Chamber finds that there is no evidence that Sesay ordered, planned or instigated the commission of crimes by AFRC fighters in Freetown and the Western Area.

7149. para. 2214: The Chamber has found that Sesay ordered the deployment of RUF troops to Freetown but that these troops became mired in battle against ECOMOG forces and did not advance beyond Waterloo. The Chamber therefore finds that the deployment of the RUF troops did not render material assistance to the AFRC troops in the perpetration of the crimes committed in Freetown. The Chamber further finds that there is insufficient evidence on which to conclude that Sesay's conduct in implementing Bockarie's order constituted encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crimes. The evidence indicates that in fact many fighters among the retreating AFRC forces believed the RUF had failed to provide reinforcements and were disgruntled on this account.

7150. para. 2125: The Chamber accordingly finds that Sesay is not liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes in Freetown and the Western Area.

ii. Kallon and Gbao – Ordering, Planning, Instigating or Aiding and Abetting – Freetown and Western Area

7151. para. 2126: The Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kallon or Gbao ordered, planned, instigated or aided and abetted the commission of crimes in Freetown.

(xi) Port Loko District

7152. para. 2218: The Prosecution alleges that the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, and/or alternatively Article 6(3) of the Statute, for the crimes/acts of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12) and enslavement (Count 13) committed in Port Loko District between about February 1999 and April 1999.

7153. para. 2219: The Chamber heard evidence of criminal acts committed in Port Loko District within the Indictment period. However, the Chamber recalls its finding that the renegade AFRC fighters in Port Loko District were not at any time during the Indictment period acting in concert with or under the control of any of the Accused.[3901] The Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has failed to prove that the Accused are liable under either Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Port Loko District.

(xii) Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

a. Crimes committed

7154. para. 2220: The Chamber has found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts.

b. Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

i. Personal commission – Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

7155. para. 2221: Although there is evidence that Sesay used child soldiers as bodyguards and in combat and that Kallon may have personally conscripted children by bringing them for training at Bunumbu, the Prosecution failed to plead these material particulars in the Indictment. Although the Prosecution disclosed to the Defence documents containing allegations that the Accused were seen with SBUs or used SBUs as bodyguards at various times throughout the Indictment period,[3902] we hold that this does not constitute clear, timely and consistent notice of the material facts pertaining to alleged personal commission of these crimes by the Accused. We are of the view that this failure to provide adequate and sufficient notice occasioned material prejudice to the Sesay and Kallon Defence in the preparation of their respective cases.

7156. para. 2222: We therefore find that none of the Accused are liable under Article 6(1) for the personal commission of the use of persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities.

ii. Sesay – Planning – Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

7157. para. 2223: The Chamber has found that the RUF practice of conscripting persons under the age of 15 into their armed group between 1997 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts was conducted on a large scale and in an organised fashion.[3903]

7158. para. 2224: The Chamber has found that the RUF operated a well-run system of training bases, with the base at Bayama in 1997 being subsequently moved to Bunumbu and then to Yengema. The Chamber notes the evidence that one of the reasons for the move from Bayama to

Bunumbu was so that the base would be closer to RUF Headquarters. At these RUF training bases, persons under the age of 15 were assigned into SBUs and undertook an organized training programme. The number of trainees, including SBUs, was reported to RUF High Command.[3904] There is documentary evidence of orders from the RUF Chief-of-Staff, Bockarie and other RUF Staff Commanders pertaining to the operation of the Camp Lion base at Bunumbu.[3905]

7159. para. 2225: We therefore find that the execution of this system of conscription required a substantial degree of planning and that this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organisation.

7160. para. 2226: The Chamber is satisfied that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of this system of conscription. We have found that in June 1998, Sesay gave orders that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and that he received reports on training at Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema. Sesay also visited Camp Lion and addressed the recruits. Sesay told the trainees that they would be sent to the battlefield and that if they failed to comply with orders, they would be executed.

7161. para. 2227: The Chamber recalls that in December 1998, Sesay visited RUF fighters including children under the age of 15 who were preparing to conduct an attack on Daru. Sesay distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters. The Chamber has further found that Sesay's bodyguards, including persons under the age of 15, participated with Sesay in the attack on Koidu in December 1998 and accompanied Sesay as his security at Yengema in May 2000.

7162. para. 2228: The Chamber accordingly finds that Sesay directly participated in and made a substantial contribution to the planning and execution of the use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities.

7164. para. 2230: The Chamber therefore finds Sesay liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000, as charged in Count 12.

iii. Kallon – Planning – Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers 7165. para. 2231: The Chamber reiterates its finding that the pattern of conscription and use of child soldiers within the RUF throughout the Indictment period required substantial planning. The Chamber finds that Kallon participated in the design and maintenance of this system of forced recruitment and use and that his contribution in this regard was substantial.

7167. para. 2233: We further find, given the imperative of using children within the RUF organization and Kallon's participation as a senior Commander, that he intended that this crime be committed.

7168. para. 2234: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds Kallon liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the use of children under the age of 15 by the RUF to actively participate in hostilities in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000.

iv. Gbao – Planning – Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers 7169. para. 2235: The Chamber has found that Gbao loaded former child fighters onto a truck and removed them from the Interim Care Centre in Makeni in May 2000.[3906] We find this insufficient to constitute a substantial contribution to the widespread system of child conscription or the consistent pattern of using children to actively participate in hostilities. We further find that there is no other evidence that Gbao participated in the design of these crimes.

7170. para. 2236: The Chamber therefore finds Gbao not liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for the conscription of persons under the age of 15 into the RUF or the use of children under the age of 15 by the RUF to actively participate in hostilities.

(xiii) Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel

a. Crimes committed

7171. para. 2238: The Chamber has found that the following crimes were committed in Bombali, Port Loko and Tonkolili Districts[3907] in relation to Counts 15 and 17:

(i) One UNAMSIL peacekeeper was assaulted and one UNAMSIL peacekeeper was abducted at Makump DDR camp on 1 May 2000 (Count 15);

(ii) Three groups of UNAMSIL peacekeepers were abducted in Makeni and one group of UNAMSIL peacekeepers was abducted in Magburaka on 1 May 2000 (Count 15);

(iii) Three UNAMSIL camps in Makump and Magburaka were attacked on 2 May 2000, resulting in the death of four peacekeepers (Counts 15 and 17);

(iv) Two groups of UNAMSIL peacekeepers were abducted near Moria village on 3 May 2000 (Count 15);

(v) UNAMSIL peacekeepers in Lunsar were attacked on 4 May 2000 (Count 15);

(vi) UNAMSIL personnel in Makeni were attacked on 7 May 2000 (Count 15); and

(vii) UNAMSIL personnel were attacked between Mile 91 and Magburaka on 9 May 2000 (Count 15).

b. Responsibilty of the Accused - Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel

i. Sesay - Responsibilty of the Accused - Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel

ii. Kallon - Responsibilty of the Accused - Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel

7173. Regarding Kallon's responsibility for Attacks on UNAMSIL, see: RUF Trial Judgment, paras. 2242, 2243, 2244, 2245, 2246, 2247, 2248, 2249, 2250, 2251, 2252, 2253, 2254, 2255, 2256, 2257, 2258, 2259, 2260.

iii. Gbao – Responsibility of the Accused – Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel

7174. Regarding Gbao's responsibility for Attacks on UNAMSIL, see: RUF Trial Judgment, paras. 2261, 2262, 2263, 2264, 2265, 2266.

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, 26 October 2009

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Pleading liability

a. Personal commission – Pleading liability

7175. para. 125: The Appeals Chamber only considers Kallon's submissions to the extent they challenge his conviction for personally committing the attack on the UNAMSIL peacekeeper Salaheudin at the Makump DDR camp on 1 May 2000 since this was his only conviction pursuant to this mode of liability.[237]

7176. para. 126: In relation to this allegation, the Trial Chamber considered that a witness statement disclosed on 26 May 2003 indicated that the witness would testify to the "direct participation of Kallon in physically assaulting a peacekeeper."[238] Notably, Kallon does not challenge this interpretation of the disclosure. In part, Kallon asserts that the Trial Chamber could not find cure based on the "mere service of statements";[239] however this assertion, even if it were correct, does not accurately describe the Trial Chamber's findings, which expressly stated that "[t]he Chamber is satisfied that the Prosecution's Motion constituted sufficient notice to the Defence of the material elements."[240] In the referenced motion the Prosecution petitioned the Chamber to add two witnesses for the purpose of testifying about Kallon's involvement in the attack on and abduction of peacekeepers.[241] The Trial Chamber's cautious approach, evidenced by the fact that it only found cure of defects in limited instances, and only examined witness statements for notice they might provide is consistent with the approaches followed at the ICTY and ICTR.[242] The Appeals Chamber has also previously recognised that it is possible for an accused to gain sufficient notice of a material fact through the disclosure of witness statements and testimony.[243]

7177. para. 139: When alleging forms of liability pursuant to Article 6(1) other than personal commission, international criminal tribunals have required the Prosecution "to identify the 'particular acts' or 'the particular course of conduct' on the part of the accused which forms the basis for the charges in question."[274] Where possible, the Prosecution should specify "the form of participation, such as 'planning' or 'instigating' or 'ordering' etc."[275] Thus, it is required that the Indictment expressly alleges that Kallon incur liability for "planning" the crime under Count 12, and that the Indictment specify the material facts of his conduct relied upon to establish that liability.

b. JCE - Pleading liability

7178. para. 99: The Special Court's jurisprudence and that of the other international criminal tribunals establishes that the following four elements must be present in an indictment charging an accused with JCE liability: (i) the nature or purpose of the JCE; (ii) the time at which or the period over which the enterprise is said to have existed; (iii) the identity of those engaged in the enterprise, so far as their identity is known, but at least by reference to their category or as a group; and (iv) the nature of the participation by the accused in that enterprise.[191] The Trial Chamber's statement of the law with respect to pleading requirements is consistent with the Appeals Chamber's jurisprudence and the case law of other international tribunals, and is not contested on appeal.[192]

7179. para. 100: In relation to the pleading of the common purpose, the Trial Chamber found that the Indictment, the Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief, the Opening Statement, the Rule 98 Skeleton Response and the Prosecution Final Trial Brief "all articulate the purpose of the joint criminal enterprise as a plan to take control of the Republic of Sierra Leone, and particularly the diamond mining activities, by any means, including unlawful means."[193]

7180. para. 101: Following the Brima et al. Trial Judgment, the Prosecution filed a Notice Concerning JCE, which stated in part:

> The Accused and others agreed upon and participated in a joint criminal enterprise to carry out a campaign of terror and collective punishments, as charged in the Corrected Amended Consolidated Indictment, in order to pillage the resources in Sierra Leone, particularly diamonds, and to control forcibly the population and territory of Sierra Leone.
> The crimes charged in Counts 1 through 14 of the Corrected Amended Consolidated Indictment were within the joint criminal enterprise. The Accused and the other participants intended the commission of the charged crimes.
> Alternatively, from 30 November 1996 through about 18 January 2002, the following crimes were within the joint criminal enterprise: collective punishments, acts of terrorism, the conscription or enlistment or use in active hostilities of children under the age of 15 years, enslavement and pillage. The crimes charged in Counts 3 through 11 of this indictment were the foreseeable consequences of the crimes agreed upon in the joint criminal enterprise.[194]

7181. para. 102: According to the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE "specified a two-fold purpose of the common plan: (1) to conduct a campaign of terror and collective punishments in order to pillage the resources of Sierra Leone, particularly diamonds, and (2) to control forcibly the population."[195] In the Trial Judgment, the Trial Chamber found that the "formulation of the common purpose in the [Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE] differs from that originally pleaded in the Indictment."[196] At trial, only Gbao filed a motion seeking leave to challenge the form of the Indictment in light of the Brima et al. Trial Judgment and the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE.[197] In its decision on Gbao's motion, the Trial Chamber considered "that in all the circumstances it would be more appropriate for the Trial Chamber to address any objections to the form of the Indictment at the end of the case rather than during the course of the trial."[198]

7182. para. 103: In the Trial Judgment, the Trial Chamber held that the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE "made the conduct of a campaign of terror and collective punishment one of the explicit purposes of the joint criminal enterprise, rather than the means by which the objective of gaining control of Sierra Leone was to be achieved."[199] The Trial Chamber considered this amounted to a unilateral attempt to alter a material fact in the Indictment contrary to the procedure allowed under the Rules, and stated that it would not consider the filing for the purposes of adjudicating the common purpose of the JCE.[200] The Trial Chamber concluded:

> The Chamber, however, finds that the Indictment adequately put the Accused on notice that the purpose of the alleged joint criminal enterprise was to take control of Sierra Leone through criminal means, including through a campaign of terror and collective punishments. Throughout the trial, the Accused were on notice that they were alleged to have committed the crimes of collective punishment and acts of terrorism through their participation in a joint criminal enterprise. They were > also notified of the fact that one of the alleged goals of their armed struggle was to gain control of Sierra Leone, and in particular, of the diamond mining areas. The Chamber does not consider that the ability of the Accused to present their defence was materially prejudiced by the alteration to the purpose of the common plan as alleged in the Prosecution Notice Concerning Joint Criminal Enterprise. The Chamber therefore dismisses this objection in its entirety.[201]

7183. para. 104: On appeal, Sesay submits that the shifting notice provided by the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE prejudiced his defence because whereas originally "Counts 3-14 were within the criminal purpose or were a foreseeable consequence of it," the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE "changed the agreement alleged and limited the crimes to those contained within counts 1, 2, 12, 13 and 14. [Thus, the] crimes charged in Counts 3 through 11 were newly alleged to be the foreseeable consequences" of the agreed crimes of the JCE, and "it was no longer being alleged that [Sesay] intended the crimes in Counts 3-11."[202]

7184. para. 105: In other words, Sesay's position is that, although the Trial Chamber in its judgment chose to rely on the Indictment instead of on the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE, the fact that it did not inform Sesay of this choice until it rendered the Trial Judgment prejudiced Sesay because, in the period between the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE and the Trial Judgment, he relied on the pleading of JCE in the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE. The questions before the Appeals Chamber are, therefore, whether Sesay succeeds in showing a discrepancy between the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE and the Indictment, and whether this discrepancy in notice, if found, prejudiced him to the extent that his trial was rendered unfair.

7185. para. 106: Contrary to Sesay's submissions, the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE expressly stated that "[t]he crimes charged in Counts 1 through 14 of the [Indictment] were within the joint criminal enterprise" and that Sesay "intended the commission of the charged crimes."[203] The Appeals Chamber has previously ruled that the "purpose of the enterprise" comprises both the objective of the JCE and the means contemplated to achieve that objective.[204] Notice to the accused does not require the objective and the means to be separately pleaded in the indictment as long as the alleged criminality of the enterprise is made clear.[205] Regardless of whether a crime is the objective or the means, it is within the JCE. Here, the crimes charged in Counts 1 through 14 were consistently alleged to be within the JCE, and therefore the alleged criminality of the enterprise was clear.

7186. para. 107: Paragraph 37 of the Indictment stated in part:

> The crimes alleged in this Indictment, including unlawful killings, abductions, forced labour, physical and sexual violence, use of child soldiers, looting and burning of civilian structures, were either actions within the joint criminal > enterprise or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise.

7187. para. 108: Paragraph 7 of the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE stated:

> The crimes charged in Counts 1 through 14 of the Corrected Amended Consolidated Indictment were within the joint criminal enterprise. The Accused and the other participants intended the commission of the charged crimes.

7188. para. 109: The Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE also stated in the alternative that the crimes charged under Counts 1, 2, 12, 13 and 14 were within the JCE and the crimes charged in Counts 3-11 were foreseeable consequences.[206] Accordingly, the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE maintained notice to the accused that the crimes charged under Counts 3-11 were either within the JCE or a foreseeable consequence of the crimes that were within the JCE. This notice reflects the formulation of the JCE as provided in paragraph 37 of the Indictment, quoted above. The Appeals Chamber has previously endorsed the finding that pleading the basic and extended forms of JCE in the alternative is a well-established practice in the international criminal tribunals.[207]

7189. para. 110: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds that Sesay has failed to establish any prejudice that could have resulted from the Trial Chamber's disregard of the Prosecution Notice Concerning JCE and its reliance on the pleading of the common purpose in the Indictment. Having come to this conclusion, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the remainder of Sesay's submissions.

7190. para. 116: Kallon's arguments are two-fold: first, that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding the "divisibility" of the JCE as alleged; and second, that the Trial Chamber erred in considering the pleading of his leadership roles as sufficient notice of his participation in the JCE.

applied the law to those material facts it accepted beyond reasonable doubt, all the elements of the crime charged and of the mode of responsibility are established by those facts.[222] As a general matter, such an approach would not result in prejudice to the accused because he is on notice of all of the material facts that result in his conviction. Kallon, in fact, does not show what prejudice resulted, or could have resulted, from the Trial Chamber's findings on the divisibility of the pleading of JCE. His submission is therefore rejected.

7192. para. 118: Concerning the pleading of Kallon's participation in the JCE, the Appeals Chamber notes that Kallon does not allege which of his acts found by the Trial Chamber to constitute participation in the JCE should have been pleaded in the Indictment, nor does he allege that he lacked notice that the Prosecution would rely upon the proof of those acts to establish his liability pursuant to a JCE. He, therefore, fails to argue how the alleged error invalidates the decision. It would appear that he only challenges the pleading of his role in the RUF as part of his participation in the JCE. As the Trial Chamber observed, the Indictment pleads Kallon's positions in the RUF and in the joint AFRC/RUF forces at paragraphs 19 to 33, and in paragraph 34 it states that "in [his] respective positions referred to above" Kallon "exercised authority, command and control over all RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces." The Indictment, therefore, provided sufficient notice that Kallon exercised authority while in command positions in the RUF and AFRC/RUF forces. The fact that the Indictment did not expressly state that he did so in furtherance of the alleged JCE does not evince a defect, since the material facts regarding his participation now at issue were nonetheless pleaded. The Appeals Chamber has already ruled on the permissibility of alleging the same acts for liability under both Article 6(3) and, command responsibility, and Article 6(1), JCE.[223]

7193. para. 178: An indictment alleging JCE liability must plead, inter alia, the nature of the participation by the accused in that enterprise.[360] The relevant question in this sub-ground of appeal is whether the Indictment may be considered as having put Gbao on notice of the case he had to meet in regard to his role in the implementation and instruction of the RUF ideology and whether he was in a position to prepare adequately for trial.[361] This question in turn relies on a determination of whether the Trial Chamber found that Gbao's role as an ideology instructor constituted his participation in the JCE, and whether, as such, it was a material fact which had to be pleaded in the Indictment.

7194. para. 179: The Prosecution conceded at the Appeal Hearing that it was not its case that Gbao contributed to the JCE as an ideology instructor, and that this allegation was therefore not contained in the Indictment,[362] and the Prosecution did not attempt to cure such defect.[363] Whether this omission rendered the Indictment defective turns on whether the ideology and Gbao's role in its implementation were material facts with respect to Gbao's participation in the JCE. The Trial Chamber's findings demonstrate that they were. In effect, it found that the ideology defined the "RUF movement":

> [the] ideology played a significant role in the RUF movement as it ensured not only the fighters' submission and compliance with the orders and instructions of the RUF leadership but also hardened their determination, their resolve and their commitment to fight to ensure the success and achievement of the ideology of the movement. It was in this spirit that the crimes alleged in the Indictment and for which the Accused are charged, were committed. Given this consideration, it is undeniable therefore, that the ideology played a central role in the objectives of the RUF.[364]

7195. para. 180: Further, it determined that although Gbao did not "directly participate in any of the crimes" committed in Bo, Kenema, and Kono,[365] Gbao nonetheless participated in the JCE through his connection to the RUF ideology:

> In making a determination on the participation of Gbao, the RUF ideology expert and instructor[,] under the rubric of the JCE, the Chamber deems it necessary to address, inter alia, issues relating to the ideology of the RUF and how its content and philosophy impacted on its Commanders and fighters in their operational activities vis-à-vis their relationship with the civilian population.[366]

The Trial Chamber therefore found it necessary to assess the significance of the RUF ideology to the RUF, and Gbao's role in implementing the ideology in order to find that Gbao participated in the JCE. The Trial Chamber devoted six pages of its discussion on Gbao's participation in the JCE to a detailed discussion of the RUF ideology and its impact on the conflict in general and the crimes charged in particular.[367] It concluded that "without the ideology there would have been no joint criminal enterprise" and "the revolution was the ideology in action."[368]

7196. para. 181: The ICTR Appeals Chamber has found that, before holding that an alleged fact is not material or that differences between the wording of the indictment and the evidence adduced are minor, a trial chamber should generally ensure that such a finding is not prejudicial to the accused.[369] An example of such prejudice would be vagueness capable of misleading the accused as to the nature of the criminal conduct with which he is charged.[370] In this case, no notice was provided to Gbao that he participated in the JCE by instructing others in the ideology or causing its implementation. Yet, these facts were found to be necessary to the determination of Gbao's participation in the JCE. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, considers that Gbao was denied notice of the material fact of his role in implementing and instructing the RUF ideology.

7197. para. 182: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, disallows the findings of Gbao's significant contribution to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor.

7198. para. 492: The Appeals Chamber holds that so long as Gbao agreed to the Common Criminal Purpose and was, therefore, a member of the JCE as the Trial Chamber found,[1256] he is responsible for all crimes that he either intended, or were naturally foreseeable would be committed by members of the JCE or persons under their control. This is consistent with the pleading of the crimes in the Indictment (which must be read in its entirety) and which pleaded each of the crimes in Counts 1 to 14 as either within the JCE or as a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the JCE.[1257]

7199. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 11 (p. 498): The offences committed were charged in the Counts. Each of the Counts was preceded by what can be regarded as particulars of the offence grouped by Districts according to location of the events. However, the structure of the Indictment should not be construed as indicating that there were as many joint enterprises as there were Districts or as there were locations of the crimes. Presumably, the form of the Indictment was intended to be a response to and improve on the specificity requirement. Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber approached the case in its consideration of the criminal responsibility of the respective accused in respect of each of the Districts where the events took place, on the footing that the "Prosecution alleges that the Accused are criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, or alternatively Article 6(3) of the Statute, for the crimes committed [in the mentioned District] between 1 June 1997 and 30 June 1997."[15]

7200. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 12 (p.498): I opine that the assessment by the Trial Chamber of the criminal responsibility of each of the Accused persons in relation to the events in the Districts cannot determine the limits of his criminal responsibility as a member of the JCE; nor does the assessment of the extent of the participation of a member of the JCE by reference to the location or locations in which the JCE was executed, necessarily, determine such member's overall criminal responsibility for the offence charged in each of the Counts in respect of which a single verdict of 'guilty' or 'not guilty' is expected to be and has been pronounced.

c. Planning – Pleading liability

participation, such as 'planning' or 'instigating' or 'ordering' etc."[275] Thus, it is required that the Indictment expressly alleges that Kallon incur liability for "planning" the crime under Count 12, and that the Indictment specify the material facts of his conduct relied upon to establish that liability.

7202. para. 140: Paragraph 38 of the Indictment states that "Morris Kallon ..., by [his] acts or omissions, [is] individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6.1. of the Statute for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute as alleged in this Indictment, which crimes [he] planned." By operation of paragraph 40 of the Indictment, this allegation is incorporated into each of the Counts, including Count 12. The Indictment, therefore, expressly alleges that Kallon planned the crime under Count 12.

7203. para. 141: Kallon objects that the Indictment nonetheless provides no specific details regarding his role.[276] The Trial Chamber relied upon the following particular acts to find that Kallon planned the offence under Count 12:

(i) Kallon was a senior RUF Commander during the attack on Koidu Town in February 1998 in which children were abducted in large numbers to be sent to RUF camps;

(ii) he was the senior RUF Commander on 3 May 2000 at Moria near Makeni where child soldiers were used in the ambush of UNAMSIL forces;

(iii) he brought a group of children to Bunumbu for training in 1998; and [277]

(iv) he issued orders that "young boys" should be trained to become soldiers and handle weapons at Bunumbu on or about 9 June 1998.[278]

7204. para. 142: The Appeals Chamber must determine whether the Prosecution provided adequate notice of the "particular acts" or "the particular course of conduct" which formed the basis for Kallon's liability for planning the offence under Count 12 in relation to events in Kenema, Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts. The Indictment provides notice that Kallon incurred liability pursuant to each mode of liability, in part, as a result of his acts as a "senior officer and commander in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces,"[279] his role "[b]etween about May 1996 and about April 1998, [as] a Deputy Area Commander,"[280] and that as a function of these positions "Kallon ... exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces."[281] Kallon's conduct in these positions entailed the acts described in (i) and (ii) above, and thus the Indictment provided sufficient notice in respect of those acts.

7205. para. 143: In respect of (iii) and (iv) above, the Appeals Chamber recalls that a distinction is drawn between the material facts upon which the Prosecution relies and the evidence by which those material facts will be proved. Only the former must be pleaded.[282] In this case, Kallon, while acting in his capacity as a commander personally brought children to a training camp, and issued orders that children should be trained as combatants. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, these two facts constituted evidence of Kallon's conduct as an RUF Commander and his involvement in the execution of the plan to recruit and use child soldiers. The Trial Chamber did not find that this conduct amounted to planning itself, but it inferred Kallon's role in planning from this evidence. As such, these facts were evidence of his role in planning and they need not have been pleaded in the Indictment.

7206. para. 144: Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber found that the defective pleading of Count 12 was cured through the mere service of witness statements is misconceived. Kallon was convicted of planning the use of children under the age of 15 years to participate actively in hostilities. The Trial Chamber did not find that the pleading of planning liability was defective; it needed no cure.

d. Instigation – Pleading liability

7207. para. 139: When alleging forms of liability pursuant to Article 6(1) other than personal commission, international criminal tribunals have required the Prosecution "to identify the 'particular acts' or 'the particular course of conduct' on the part of the accused which forms the basis for the charges in question."[274] Where possible, the Prosecution should specify "the form of participation, such as 'planning' or 'instigating' or 'ordering' etc."[275] Thus, it is required that the Indictment expressly alleges that Kallon incur liability for "planning" the crime under Count 12, and that the Indictment specify the material facts of his conduct relied upon to establish that liability.

7208. para. 826: The Trial Chamber found that Waiyoh, a Nigerian female who resided in the civilian camp at Wendedu and had lived in Kono District for twenty years was killed on the orders of Rocky, an RUF Commander in May 1998.[2169] It found that this crime constituted an unlawful killing as charged in Counts 4 and 5 of the Indictment.[2170] It further found that Kallon was liable under Article 6 (1) of the Statute for its instigation.[2171] The Trial Chamber found that although Wendedu was not named as a location of murder in the Indictment, the pleading of locations in Counts 4 and 5 was nonexhaustive and sufficiently specific in light of the cataclysmic nature of the alleged crimes.[2172]

> About mid February 1998, AFRC/RUF fleeing from Freetown arrived in Kono District. Between about 14 February 1998 and 30 June 1998, members of AFRC/RUF unlawfully killed several hundred civilians in various locations in Kono District, including Koidu, Tombodu, Foindu, Willifeh, Mortema and Biaya.[2175]

7210. para. 829: The relevant question on appeal is whether the pleading of locations of murder in Kono District as "various locations in Kono District, including Koidu, Tombodu, Foindu, Willifeh, Mortema and Biaya" without naming Wendedu, is sufficiently specific to allow Kallon to prepare his defence to the charge of instigating murder in Wendedu.

7211. para. 830: As a general matter, the location of the crimes alleged to have been committed should be specified in an indictment.[2176] However, the degree of specificity required will depend on the nature of the Prosecution's case.[2177] The specificity required for the pleading of the location of an alleged crime will depend on factors such as: the form of accused's participation in the crime;[2178] the proximity of the accused person to the events at the location for which he is alleged to be criminally responsible;[2179] the nature of the crime itself, such as whether the crime is characterized by the movement of the victim; whether the victim's identity provides specificity; and whether the crime was committed at numerous locations within a defined geographic area that was pleaded.

7212. para. 831: As the form of the accused's participation in the crime is relevant to the specificity required, the material facts to be pleaded will vary according to the particular form of Article 6(1) liability averred. For example, the Appeals Chamber has indicated that the material facts for pleading personal commission are distinct from those pleaded for JCE liability.[2180] As stated by the ICTR Appeals Chamber, there may well be "situations in which the specific location of criminal activities cannot be listed, such as where the accused is charged as having effective control over several armed groups that committed crimes in numerous locations. In cases concerning physical acts of violence perpetrated by the accused personally, however, location can be very important."[2181]

specificity and they therefore declined to find the accused liable for crimes committed at unnamed locations. Similar to Kallon's present conviction, the accused in Brima et al. were not convicted pursuant to their participation in a JCE, but rather they were convicted of more direct forms of participation, such as, inter alia, personal commission and instigation.

7215. para. 834: In view of the mode of Kallon's liability for the crime and that his culpable conduct occurred at the location, the location of the murder as having occurred at Wendedu was a material fact that must have been pleaded in the Indictment to inform Kallon clearly of the charges against him so that he could prepare a defence.[2186]

7216. para. 835: The Prosecution's failure to plead Wendedu as a location in the Indictment rendered the Indictment defective with respect to the pleading of Kallon's instigation of murder at Wendedu. As Kallon objected at trial to the pleading of a nonexhaustive list of locations,[2187] the Prosecution bears the burden of showing on appeal that the defect in the Indictment did not prejudice Kallon's ability to prepare his defence. The Prosecution has not offered any submissions that Kallon had notice of the charge as a result of timely, clear and consistent information detailing the factual underpinnings of the charge.[2188]

7217. para. 836: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds that Kallon was not put on notice of the charge that he instigated murder at Wendedu. The trial against Kallon was thereby rendered unfair, and as a result he should not have been found responsible for the killing of Waiyoh.

(ii) Pleading liability – Dissents

a. JCE – Pleading liability - Dissents

7218. Justice Fisher, para. 20 (p.517): The primary justification suggested by the Majority for its radical departure from customary international law is that its conflation of JCE 1 and JCE 3 mens rea standards "is consistent with the pleading of the crimes in the Indictment."[33] That an Indictment may plead in the alternative does not establish that there is no distinction between the forms of liability so pled. Also, whether the Indictment permissibly pleaded JCE is irrelevant as an evidentiary matter.

(iii) JCE

a. JCE – Common Criminal Purpose

7219. para. 282: All three Appellants allege that the Trial Chamber erred in defining the common purpose of the JCE. Sesay in Ground 24, and Kallon in Ground 2, submit that the Trial Chamber found that the common purpose was not criminal and that various errors arise from this finding.[618] Gbao submits under Sub-Ground 8(f) that the Trial Chamber erroneously found multifarious common purposes and confused the common purpose with the criminal means to achieve it.[619] The present section addresses these submissions together.

7220. para. 283: The Trial Chamber found that following the 25 May 1997 coup, high ranking AFRC members and the RUF leadership agreed to form a joint government in order "to control the territory of Sierra Leone."[620] The Trial Chamber considered that "such an objective in and of itself is not criminal and therefore does not amount to a common purpose within the meaning of the law of [JCE]."[621] However, it held that "where the taking of power and control over State territory is intended to be implemented through the commission of crimes within the Statute, this may amount to a common criminal purpose."[622] The Trial Chamber concluded that "the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 were within the [JCE] and intended by the participants to further the common purpose to take power and control over Sierra Leone."[623]

7221. para. 294: The Appellants' present submissions essentially turn on whether the Trial Chamber found the common purpose of the JCE to be criminal or non-criminal. At the outset, the Appeals Chamber recalls its holding in the Brima et al. Appeal Judgment that "the common purpose" of a JCE comprises both the objective of the JCE and the means contemplated to achieve that objective.[659] In order to determine the present submissions within the proper legal framework, it is appropriate to address, as a preliminary matter, Sesay's submissions regarding the interpretation of Brima et al. and the relationship between the objective and the means in cases where the objective itself does not amount to a crime within the Statute.

7222. para. 295: In the Brima et al. Appeal Judgment, the Appeals Chamber held that "[t]he objective and the means to achieve the objective constitute the common design or plan."[660] Contrary to Sesay's claim, this holding neither "conflate[s] objective and means" nor sets out a legal requirement that they be "inextricably and necessarily" linked.[661] Rather, as the Appeals Chamber clarified, it signifies that the criminal nature of a common purpose can derive from the means contemplated to achieve the objective of the common purpose.[662] That was also the basis for the holding of Brima et al. that the Trial Chamber relied on,[663] which stated that a common purpose can be inherently criminal where it "contemplate[s] crimes within the Statute as the means of achieving its objective."[664] In such cases, the objective and the means to achieve the objective constitute the common criminal purpose.

7223. para. 296: Sesay's reference to the Martić case does not sustain his claim.[665] While in that case the implementation of the non-criminal objective of creating a united Serb state "necessitated" the forcible removal of non-Serb population,[666] nowhere did the Martić Appeals Chamber suggest that such necessity was a legal requirement for a common criminal purpose to exist. Rather, the Martić Trial Chamber found that, as a factual matter, the necessary relationship arose from "the prevailing circumstances" of the case, and was buttressed by the employment of criminal means to further the non-criminal objective.[667] As to the law, the Martić Appeals Chamber was content to observe that, while the objective itself did not constitute a common criminal purpose, it may still amount to such where it "is intended to be implemented through the commission of crimes within the Statute."[668] This is consistent with the Kvočka et al., Krajišnik and Tadić Appeal Judgments, all of which require as a matter of law only that the common purpose "amounts to or involves" the commission of a crime provided for in the ICTY Statute.[669] It is also consistent with Brima et al., which, rather than stipulating a necessary relationship between the objective of a common purpose and its criminal means, only requires that the latter are "contemplated to achieve" the former.[670]

7225. para. 298: The Trial Chamber's findings that the objective of the JCE was "to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas" and that this objective in and of itself was not criminal under the Statute are undisputed.[672] Rather, Sesay and Kallon posit that the error of the Trial Chamber lies in finding that the non-criminal objective constituted the common purpose of the JCE, [673] whereas Gbao contends that the definition of the common purpose is unclear.

7226. para. 299: The position of Sesay and Kallon is directly contradicted by the Trial Chamber's finding that the objective to control the territory of Sierra Leone "does not amount to a common purpose within the meaning of the law of [JCE]."[675] Beyond their references to the finding that the objective was not criminal,[676] and a finding regarding Gbao's participation in the JCE,[677] neither Sesay nor Kallon points to other findings of the Trial Chamber to support their claim. Sesay refers to the statement in the Dissenting Opinion of Justice Boutet that "the purpose is such that it is not even reflective of a crime … under the jurisdiction of this Court."[678] Reference to the Dissenting Opinion is misguided since it does not underpin any of the findings that resulted in Sesay's conviction.

7228. para. 301: The Trial Chamber proceeded to find in paragraph 1980 of the Trial Judgment that the Junta aimed "to subject the civilian population to AFRC/RUF rule by violent means", which "entailed massive human rights abuses and violence against and mistreatment of the civilian population", and in paragraph 1981 that the "AFRC/RUF alliance intended through the spread of extreme fear and punishment to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over captured territory." Contrary to Gbao's argument,[682] these two findings do not characterise the means differently; both are general findings showing that the means to achieve the objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone included the commission of crimes against the civilian population.

7229. para. 302: Paragraph 1982 of the Trial Judgment specifies what those criminal means were. Its wording leaves no room for Gbao's claim that the Trial Chamber wavered in its definition of the common purpose by finding that terrorism (Count 1) might have been the objective of the common purpose, rather than a means.[683] The statement that "[t]he means to terrorise the civilian population" included the crimes under Counts 3 to 11 refers to the fact that the underlying acts of terrorism partly comprised conduct also charged under Counts 3 to 11.[684] Furthermore, the statement is immediately followed by the finding that "[a]dditional means to achieve the common purpose" included the crimes charged under Counts 2 and 12 to 14, which clarifies that the acts of terrorism (and the underlying conduct) were found to be among the means to achieve the common purpose. Against this background, the conclusive finding in paragraph 1982, partly repeated in paragraph 1985, that "the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 were within the [JCE] and intended by the participants to further the common purpose" makes it abundantly clear that all those crimes were found to constitute means.[685]

7230. para. 303: Contrary to Sesay's submission, the Trial Chamber considered whether these crimes were committed in a "random and un-orchestrated manner."[686] It found that the "AFRC/RUF forces cooperated on armed operations in which crimes against civilians were committed" and that the "conduct of the operations" demonstrated the wholly disproportionate means by which the Junta intended to suppress all opposition.[687] It further took into account "the entirety of the evidence and in particular the widespread and systematic nature of the crimes committed" and found the existence of a common criminal purpose and that its participants used the perpetrators to commit crimes in furtherance of it.[688] Sesay's claim that the Trial Chamber failed to assess whether there was a "discernable pattern" to the crimes indicative of a common criminal purpose, and Kallon's present argument that the Trial Chamber allowed for JCE liability regardless of the affiliation between the accused and the perpetrator, thus lack merit.[689]

7231. para. 304: Gbao argues that the common purpose in actual fact consisted of the RUF ideology.[690] The Appeals Chamber disagrees. The paragraphs Gbao invokes concern his intent and participation in the JCE, which the Trial Chamber examined only after it had reached its findings on the existence and nature of the common purpose.[691] Indeed, the mention in paragraph 2013 of "a criminal nexus between such an ideology and the crimes charged" was immediately followed by reference to an ICTY case in which the accused's participation in a JCE consisted of providing the legal, political and social framework in which the participants of the JCE worked and from which they profited.[692] The end of paragraph 2013 sets out the legal requirements necessary to establish the mens rea of Gbao in particular. Similarly, the findings that the crimes "were in application and furtherance of the goals stipulated in the ideology of taking power and control of Sierra Leone" and that "the revolution was the ideology in action", in paragraphs 2029 and 2032, respectively, signify that the ideology imparted by Gbao[693] "played a key and central role in pursuing the objectives of the RUF" and was a "propelling dynamic behind the commission" of the crimes.[694] As such, the RUF ideology was in the Trial Chamber's view conducive to the commission of crimes and furthered the means of the common purpose. However, it was not itself found to have constituted the common purpose. Instead, Gbao's connection to the ideology was one factor that evidenced his participation and intent. This is reconcilable with the finding that the criminal purpose of the JCE was common to both the RUF and AFRC.[695]

7232. para. 305: For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber found a common criminal purpose. It consisted of the objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as means of achieving that objective ("Common Criminal Purpose").[696] Gbao's Sub-Ground 8(f) is therefore dismissed in its entirety.

7233. para. 306: The remaining submissions of Sesay and Kallon are premised on the assertion that the Trial Chamber found the common purpose to be non-criminal.[697] Because the Appeals Chamber has dismissed this assertion above, holding that the Trial Chamber properly found a common criminal purpose, there is no basis for these remaining submissions.

7234. para. 308: The Appellants submit that the Trial Chamber erred in various regards in finding that a common criminal purpose existed. At the outset, Kallon makes two legal challenges to the Trial Chamber's application of the JCE theory. Along with Sesay, he then challenges the Trial Chamber's factual findings that the leaders of the AFRC and RUF acted in concert. Finally, Sesay and Gbao impugn the Trial Chamber's findings on the criminal means to achieve the objective of the JCE. These submissions are addressed in turn below.

7235. para. 312: The Appeals Chamber has previously noted that "the foundation of criminal responsibility is the principle of personal culpability: nobody may be held criminally responsible for acts or transactions in which he has not personally engaged or in some other way participated (nulla poena sine culpa)."[705] Kallon relies on the Trial Chamber's legal findings as to the plurality of persons, the nature of the common purpose and the accused's participation to support his claim that this principle was breached.

7236. para. 313: The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that these findings, as a general matter, expanded JCE beyond the limits of personal culpability. Whereas the Trial Chamber noted that the plurality of persons "may change" as participants enter or withdraw from the JCE, it firmly required that the accused be a participant of the JCE in order to be held criminally responsible under this form of liability.[706] As regards the nature of the common purpose, the Trial Chamber held that a JCE may be "fluid" in its criminal means, but only to the extent its participants so accept.[707] It did not allow for JCE liability pursuant to a non-criminal common purpose.[708] As to the accused's participation, the Trial Chamber held that it may be geographically more limited than the JCE itself provided he had knowledge of the wider purpose of the common design.[709] Yet it required that the accused's participation "made a significant contribution to the crimes for which he is held responsible."[710] While it is not necessarily correct that "knowledge of the wider purpose of the common design" would suffice to establish the intent requirement for JCE liability[711] nothing in the Trial Judgment otherwise suggests that the Trial Chamber departed from its unambiguous holding that JCE liability requires that the accused intended to participate in a common criminal purpose.[712]

7237. para. 314: The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Kallon fails to demonstrate a violation of the principle nulla poene sine culpa based on the Trial Chamber's findings on the law of JCE. In remaining parts, Kallon's submission hinges on the success of his Grounds 8 and 15 and, as such, do not provide independent support for his present challenge.

7238. para. 316: Contrary to Kallon's submission, the Appeals Chambers observes that his JCE liability is not of an "unprecedented" scope. The Trial Chamber found that Kallon incurred JCE liability for crimes committed in Bo, Kono, Kenema and Kailahun Districts between 25 May 1997 and April 1998.[713] The scope of this liability is no broader than that pronounced in certain post-World War II cases, from which the contemporary notion of JCE is partly derived,[714] which concerned liability for participation in a criminal plan amounting to a "nation wide government-organized system of cruelty and injustice."[715] Likewise, in the Brđanin case, the ICTY concluded that JCE liability could apply to crimes committed in the entire Autonomous Region of Krajina,[716] and the accused in the Krajišnik case incurred JCE liability for crimes committed throughout the Bosnian Serb Republic.[717] Importantly, adjudicating a challenge similar to that of Kallon, the Krajišnik Appeals Chamber held that it is "wrong to speak about an 'expansion' of JCE to cases such as the one of Krajišnik" because "although Tadić concerned a relatively low-level accused, the legal elements of JCE set out in that case remain the same in a case where JCE is applied to a high-level accused."[718]

7239. para. 317: Against this backdrop, the Appeals Chamber agrees with the ICTR Appeals Chamber that "an accused's liability under a 'common purpose' mode of commission may be as narrow or as broad as the plan in which he willingly participated."[719] This does not imply, however, that JCE liability lapses into guilt by association. As persuasively explained by the Brđanin Appeals Chamber:

> Where all [the] requirements for JCE liability are met beyond a reasonable doubt, the accused has done far more than merely associate with criminal persons. He has the intent to commit a crime, he has joined with others to achieve this goal, and he has made a significant contribution to the crime's commission.[720]

7240. para. 318: On this basis, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that "JCE is not an open-ended concept that permits convictions based on guilt by association."[721] As Kallon's submission can be satisfactorily determined based on these sources of international criminal law, there is no need to resort to the specific domestic jurisprudence of the United States on the inchoate offence of conspiracy, which is legally distinct from the mode of liability of JCE.[722]

7241. para. 485: The Trial Chamber defined the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE as consisting of the objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as the means of achieving that objective.[1252] The Trial Chamber further found that Gbao was "a participant" in the JCE.[1253] The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, considers that in consequence Gbao, as with the other participants of the JCE, would be liable for all crimes which were a natural and foreseeable consequence of putting into effect that criminal purpose.

7243. Justice Fisher – Dissent, para. 22 (p. 518): Finally, in a perplexingly contradictory and unexplained pronouncement, the Majority expresses its agreement with the Prosecution's position at the Appeal Hearing that Gbao "shared the intent for the crimes to be committed in Kailahun District, so he was a participant in the joint criminal enterprise."[37] As an initial matter, this position is contrary to the Majority's own reasoning, as it envisages a common criminal purpose different from that found by the Trial Chamber and confirmed unanimously on appeal. That different "subsidiary" common criminal purpose is limited solely to Kailahun District and excludes acts of pillage (Count 14), as no such crimes were committed there.

7244. Justice Fisher – Dissent, para. 23 (p. 518): If in fact the Majority accepts the position of the Prosecution that the shared intent for commission of the crimes committed in Kailahun describes the common criminal purpose of the JCE, then Gbao would presumably have been liable under JCE 1 for the crimes in Kailahun District, and liable under JCE 3 for the crimes in other Districts. However, such a limited, "subsidiary" JCE was neither sufficiently pleaded in the Indictment nor found by the Trial Chamber. Nor did the Trial Chamber make any findings that the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono were reasonably foreseeable by Gbao as a consequence of the implementation of that "subsidiary" JCE, (as opposed to the country-wide JCE found by the Trial Chamber.) This theory therefore finds no support in the pleadings or the evidence.

7246. Justice Fisher – Dissent, para. 25 (p. 519): It remains unclear what common criminal purpose, in the Majority's mind, Gbao did share. It purports to hold that Gbao shared the Common Criminal Purpose that the Trial Chamber found established on the evidence.[39] But as explained, that was a legal impossibility, given that the evidence showed that he did not share the intent of the other "participants" in the JCE. The Majority has not articulated, any alternative common criminal purpose which Gbao shared. Yet it convicts him pursuant to JCE liability. That conviction was neither in accordance with the law nor the facts as found by the Trial Chamber and upheld on appeal.

7247. para. 621: Sesay contests the finding that he participated in the JCE through his involvement in the planning and organising of the forced mining in Kenema District. His first argument, that this involvement was not carried out with the intent to cause terror,[1544] is dismissed because it is based on the erroneous premise that the common criminal purpose of the JCE was to cause terror.[1545]

b. JCE – AFRC-RUF acting in concert

7248. para. 320: The Trial Chamber found that following the 25 May 1997 coup, high ranking AFRC members and the RUF leadership agreed to form a joint "government" in order to control the territory of Sierra Leone.723 The highest decision-making body in the Junta regime was the Supreme Council,724 which included, among others, Johnny Paul Koroma as Chairman, Foday Sankoh as Deputy Chairman, Gullit, Bazzy, Bockarie, Sesay and Kallon.[725] The Trial Chamber further found that despite the change of circumstances following the 14 February 1998 ECOMOG Intervention, the leading members of the AFRC and RUF maintained the purpose to take power and control over Sierra Leone, until late April 1998.[726]

7249. para. 321: Sesay, in his Ground 24, and Kallon, in his Ground 2, both submit that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that during the JCE period, senior members of the AFRC and RUF shared a common criminal purpose and acted in concert.

7250. para. 327: Contrary to Sesay's claim, the Trial Judgment is not at all silent on the acts of Johnny Paul Koroma, Eldred Collins or Gibril Massaquoi in the first months of the Junta.[750] Sesay further points to the finding that he and Kallon only attended Supreme Council meetings from August 1997 onwards.[751] However, they were nonetheless both found to have been members of this body with other senior RUF and AFRC members.[752] Moreover, Sesay travelled to Freetown to join the Junta already in the second week of June 1997.[753] The Trial Chamber did not, as asserted by Sesay, ignore the testimony of TF1-371 regarding Sesay's power to vote in the Supreme Council[754] and Sesay fails to explain how its assessment was an error. Whether the Supreme Council controlled the military[755] neither renders unreasonable the findings on the Council's membership nor the finding that it was the highest decision-making body in the Junta regime and the sole executive and legislative authority in Sierra Leone during the Junta period.[756]

7251. para. 328: It is true, as Kallon argues, that the unification of the AFRC's and RUF's military organisations led to conflicts and that orders between the two groups were not always obeyed.[757] Yet, the Trial Chamber found, members of the two groups managed together to control much of Kailahun District,[758] parts of Bo District,[759] and to set up a joint administration in Kenema Town.[760] Kallon does not challenge these findings. Similarly, he refers to the finding that the AFRC received the more senior positions in the Junta government,[761] without accounting for the finding that the appointments of RUF members to deputy positions were approved by Bockarie and Sesay as part of a proposal to integrate the RUF into the AFRC regime.[762]

7252. para. 329: Kallon also selectively refers to the findings that SAJ Musa withdrew from the JCE in February 1998 and that by September 1997 Bockarie, who had become disillusioned with the RUF's limited role in the government and feared assassination, relocated from Freetown to Kenema.[763] However, he does not mention the findings that the majority of AFRC leaders and troops elected to remain allied with the RUF when SAJ Musa broke away[764] and that Bockarie by radio communication from Kenema ensured that the AFRC/RUF cooperation continued.[765]

7253. para. 330: Kallon's reliance on the findings in paragraph 2067 of the Trial Judgment as to the consequences for the AFRC/RUF alliance of the 14 February 1998 ECOMOG intervention is similarly unavailing.[766] He disregards the findings on subsequent joint AFRC/RUF military action in and control over Kono District under the direction of, inter alia, Koroma, Sesay, Superman, Bazzy and Five-Five.[767] The findings on Kallon's own conduct of executing two AFRC soldiers and preventing AFRC muster parades in Kono in April 1998 are immaterial for present purposes as they formed part of the basis on which the Trial Chamber found that the JCE ended.[768] Kallon further fails to explain how the fact that the Trial Chamber was unable to ascertain with certainty the date on which the split between the AFRC and RUF occurred[769] sustain that members of the two groups were not acting in concert.

7254. para. 331: In light of the above, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber's findings on Gbao's lack of communication with the Junta leaders and lack of intent[770] do not render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that senior leaders of the AFRC and RUF acted in concert. Sesay's and Kallon's present challenges to that conclusion are dismissed.

7256. para. 1033: The Trial Chamber found as a general matter that "the three Accused ... and the other listed individuals were all acting in concert."[2819] Gbao does not contest this finding generally, nor does he contest that other AFRC and RUF members of the JCE were acting in concert. Rather, Gbao only contests the Trial Chamber's failure to find that he acted in concert with the AFRC.[2820] In particular, Gbao's arguments are centred on the Trial Chamber's failure to find that he acted in concert with the AFRC in a direct or physical manner.[2821]

7257. para. 1034: The Trial Chamber found that it must be established that the "plurality of persons acted in concert with each other."[2822] The Trial Chamber considered that "[a] common objective in itself is not enough to demonstrate that the plurality of persons acted in concert with each other as different and independent groups may happen to share the same objectives."[2823] The Appeals Chamber considers that these statements accurately reflect the law. However, contrary to Gbao's suggestion, the Trial Chamber did not introduce an additional element to JCE liability. The Trial Chamber properly understood the law as requiring that the accused participated in the common purpose shared by the members of the JCE.[2824] In contrast, the concept of "acting in concert" advanced by the Trial Chamber serves to clarify the required relationship between the persons said to be a plurality sharing a common purpose. This makes clear that the plurality of persons must have a common purpose, and not merely the same purpose, in the sense that persons act together in the pursuit of that purpose, creating a relationship of inter-dependence and cooperation.[2825] Alternatively, persons with identical purposes who do not share that purpose in common, as evidenced by the absence of joint action between them, do not constitute a plurality of persons having a common criminal purpose within the meaning of JCE liability. Thus, the requirement that the "plurality of persons acted in concert with each other in the implementation of a common purpose"[2826] merely clarifies and restates the first two elements of JCE liability, namely the existence of a plurality of persons sharing a common criminal purpose.

7258. para. 1035: Gbao then errs in proposing an additional legal element of concerted action to establish his participation in the JCE. To establish Gbao's liability under JCE, the Trial Chamber was not required to make findings on Gbao's concerted action with the AFRC beyond finding that his acts established his contribution to the Common Criminal Purpose. In this regard, however, the Appeals Chamber notes that the accused's "joint action" with other members of the JCE, as an evidentiary matter, can be relevant to assessing the accused's participation in the JCE. Simply, the character, quality and quantity of the accused's joint action with other members of the JCE may be relevant evidentiary considerations when analysing the intent and contribution of the accused relative to the common purpose of the JCE. The Appeals Chamber considers that this evaluation must be made on a case-by-case basis, but does note that the manner in which the members of the JCE interact and cooperate can take as many forms as conceived by the participants to pursue the realisation of their shared common criminal purpose. What matters is that they are all "the cog[s] in the wheel of events leading up to the result which in fact occurred."[2827] Nonetheless, the manner in and degree to which the accused and the members of the JCE interact, coordinate and mutually rely on one another's contributions can indicate whether the accused shared the common purpose and significantly contributed to realising it.[2828]

7259. para. 1036: For the reasons outlined above, the Appeals Chamber also rejects Gbao's suggestion that it was necessary for the Trial Chamber to find that he worked in concert with the AFRC, once it found that the JCE was composed of senior leaders of the AFRC and RUF and that he was a senior leader of the RUF.[2829]

c. JCE – AFRC-RUF contemplating criminal means to achieve objective 7260. para. 332: This section deals with Gbao's claim that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasoned opinion for its conclusion that the AFRC and RUF contemplated crimes to achieve its objective and Sesay's related claim that certain crimes could not form part of the Common Criminal Purpose because they were not found to be committed with certain intent. This analysis is confined to an interpretation of the Trial Chamber's findings, assuming that they are factually correct. Where these claims fail, the Appeals Chamber will proceed to address Gbao's and Sesay's factual challenges to the Trial Chamber's conclusion that senior members of the AFRC/RUF contemplated crimes to achieve their objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone.

7261. para. 333: The Trial Chamber held that the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 constituted the criminal means of furthering the Common Criminal Purpose.[771] The crimes to maintain power over the territory of Sierra Leone commenced "soon after the coup in May 1997."[772]

7262. para. 343: Gbao's key argument—under both Ground 8(e) and consolidated Grounds 8(g)/(h)—is that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a sufficiently reasoned opinion for its conclusion that the Common Criminal Purpose involved the commission of the crimes charged. Sesay's submission under his Ground 24 that certain crimes could not form part of the Common Criminal Purpose because the Trial Chamber found that they were not committed with the intent to take control of Sierra Leone or to terrorise and collectively punish civilians similarly turns on the Trial Chamber's own reasoning.

7263. para. 344: The fair trial requirements of the Statute include the right of the accused to a reasoned opinion by the Trial Chamber under Article 18 of the Statute and Rule 88(C) of the Rules. The Appeals Chamber finds the well-established jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR which interpret their identical provisions[798] persuasive as to the law in this regard.[799] As recently held by the ICTY Appeals Chamber:

> A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his or her right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 25 to review these appeals. The reasoned opinion requirement, however, relates to a Trial Chamber's Judgment rather than to each and every submission made at trial.[800]

7266. para. 347: The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that the findings now at issue fall short of this threshold. Contrary to Gbao's claim, the Trial Chamber did not "merely state" that the Junta intended crimes to reach its objective without reference to any "explicit or implicit agreement" nor did it fail to consider whether the crimes were simply "committed in the midst of the conflict."[808] In particular, the Trial Chamber specified what the criminal means of the JCE were, and how they actually furthered the AFRC/RUF's objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone. The "spread of extreme fear"—that is, acts of terrorism—was intended to "subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over captured territory."[809] These acts included unlawful killings, sexual violence and physical violence.[810] Collective punishments were employed to subdue the civilian population to the same end.[811] Recruitment of child soldiers served to re-enforce the AFRC/RUF military forces in order to assist in specific military operations.[812] Enslavement of civilians was perpetrated to perform farming, logistical chores or diamond mining.[813] Pillage served as compensation to satisfy the fighters and ensure their willingness to fight.[814]

7267. para. 348: Sesay submits that some of these crimes could not be part of the Common Criminal Purpose because they were not found to have been committed with intent to (i) take control over Sierra Leone;[815] or (ii) to spread terror or collectively punish.[816] His first argument fails, because the Trial Chamber found that the JCE participants, in particular Sesay,[817] contemplated all the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 as the means to achieve the objective of gaining and exercising political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas.[818] It was not required that the persons who perpetrated the crimes shared the same intent.[819] Sesay's second argument is wrong insofar as it states that the means to achieve the objective were limited to acts of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2).[820] As explained, the means also included the crimes charged under Counts 3 to 14. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not explicitly find that those acts of unlawful killing (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9) and physical violence (Counts 10 and 11) which did not amount to terrorism were also means to achieve the objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone. However, it is evident that these acts were also found to be means to that end, given the Trial Chamber's conclusion that "the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 were within the [JCE] and intended to further the common purpose."[821]

7268. para. 349: Gbao posits that the Trial Chamber equated JCE liability with collective responsibility because it found, without explanation, that all members of the RUF must have intended to commit the above crimes to control Sierra Leone.[822] This contention is not true.[823] The Appeals Chamber therefore need not consider Gbao's argument that the Majority's holding, made in respect of his participation in the JCE, that "resorting to arms to secure a total redemption … necessarily implies the resolve and determination to … commit the crimes" charged was insufficiently reasoned.[824]

7269. para. 350: The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber provided a sufficiently reasoned opinion for its conclusion that the Common Criminal Purpose involved the commission of the crimes charged. Sesay's Ground 24 and Gbao's Grounds 8(e) and 8(g)/(h) are dismissed in present parts.

7271. para. 352: First, Sesay challenges three specific findings of the Trial Chamber, namely, that (i) the strategy of the Junta from its establishment was "to maintain its power over Sierra Leone and to subject the civilian population to AFRC/RUF rule by violent means;"[826] (ii) the "AFRC/RUF forces cooperated on armed operations in which crimes against civilians were committed";[827] and (iii) "these operations demonstrate that the Junta intended, through wholly disproportionate means, to suppress all opposition to their regime."[828] Sesay submits that the sources cited by the Trial Chamber in support—Exhibit 181,[829] the testimony of George Johnson, and its previous findings concerning "Operation Pay Yourself" and the re-mobilisation to Sierra Leone of AFRC troops—constitute an insufficient basis for these findings.[830] The Appeals Chamber notes that the cited part of George Johnson's testimony does not directly sustain the entirety of the three impugned findings because it is confined to the identity of the participants in the May 1997 coup.[831] The findings regarding "Operation Pay Yourself" and the mobilisation of AFRC troops concern events following the Intervention in February 1998,[832] which took place almost nine months after the date the Trial Chamber found that the JCE came into existence.[833] As such, they also provide limited support for the impugned findings.

7272. para. 353: Notwithstanding the above, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that a miscarriage of justice resulted. It was still open to the Trial Chamber to arrive at the three impugned findings on the basis of the evidence as a whole. The Trial Chamber considered that Exhibit 181, the credibility of which Sesay does not challenge as such,[834] showed that the "AFRC/RUF soon began suppressing political dissent" in Freetown including torturing, killing or detaining demonstrators and journalists.[835] Also, the Trial Chamber found the existence of a "joint AFRC/RUF campaign to strengthen their 'government' through brutal suppression of perceived opposition by killing and beating civilians"[836] and a "concerted campaign against civilians" by AFRC/RUF rebels.[837] Furthermore, the vast majority of the perpetrators of the crimes found to have been committed were "AFRC/RUF" fighters.[838] Sesay's present submissions do not address these findings.[839]

7273. para. 354: Second, Sesay submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the Supreme Council was involved in crimes.[840] In support, he refers to selected findings on particular law-abiding conduct of certain Supreme Council members.[841] The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber's findings that these individuals acted legally in some respects do not necessarily render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's findings that they acted illegally in others. First, that Kallon's participation in concerted joint action between the AFRC and RUF (including his cooperation with the AFRC at Teko Barracks in Bo District) "did not directly involve the commission of crimes" is legally irrelevant to and does not detract from his contribution to the JCE, which he lent both through his involvement in the Supreme Council and through direct involvement in other crimes.[842] Second, Isaac Mongor's position in the Junta Government of being responsible for preventing looting in Freetown[843] does not contradict his membership in the Supreme Council[844] nor does it render unreasonable the inference that the Supreme Council initiated crimes.[845] Third, given that SAJ Musa was also a member of the Supreme Council,[846] it is not determinative for present purposes whether the forced mining, for which he was responsible in the Junta government,[847] commenced in August 1997.

7274. para. 355: Sesay also disputes that the Supreme Council itself was involved in crime. The Appeals Chamber notes that, while the Supreme Council "discussed … the security of the Junta; revenue generation; the resolution of conflicts between the AFRC and the RUF; and harassment of civilians,"[848] the Trial Chamber also inferred from the "widespread and systematic nature of the crimes, in particular the attacks on Bo and the forced labour in Kenema District" that such conduct "was a deliberate policy of the ARFC/RUF" that must have been "initiated by the Supreme Council."[849] Contrary to Sesay's claim,[850] the basis for that inference was sufficiently supported by evidence.[851]

7275. para. 356: Indeed, Sesay himself recognises the finding that the Supreme Council was involved in the planning and organisation of the enslavement at Tongo Fields in Kenema from August 1997. However, he argues, the only crimes committed before that point in time were the terror attacks in Bo in June 1997, and so there were no crimes on the basis of which the Trial Chamber could infer the existence of a JCE.[852] However, although the enslavement at Tongo Fields commenced in August 1997,[853] it is evident from the Trial Chamber's findings that the "planned and … systematic policy of the Junta" which devised the large scale enslavement and implemented it "pursuant to a centralised system" must have started much earlier.[854] Indeed, "[w]ithin a week of the coup of 25 May 1997, RUF rebels and the military Junta were in full control of" Kenema Town.[855] Moreover, whether or not it amounted to acts of terrorism,[856] sexual violence in Kailahun was a means to achieve the AFRC/RUF objective throughout the Junta period.[857] The fact that the victims of the forced marriages were initially captured before the Indictment period does not detract from the finding that these crimes were "for the benefit … of the Junta" throughout their continuous commission.[858]

7276. para. 357: Third, Sesay invokes parts of the testimonies of TF1-371, TF1-045 and TF1-334 to argue that the Junta was involved in anti-crime measures and good governance.[859] The Appeals Chamber recalls that evidence indicating that the members of the Junta acted within the law in some respects does not necessarily render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's findings that they acted illegally in others. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence Sesay invokes renders unreasonable the Trial Chamber's conclusion that the AFRC/RUF alliance involved crimes.[860] In relevant parts,[861] TF1-371 testified that Johnny Paul Koroma sought to impose decrees preventing raping, looting and harassment of civilians, but also that "obviously" not everyone obeyed them.[862] TF1-371 further stated that Koroma had some SLA soldiers executed for murder and robbery,[863] but this was in order to stop the negative international publicity resulting from the particular incident when the Iranian Embassy was looted.[864] The relevant parts of TF1-334's testimony concern the witness's knowledge of the investigation of a specific fight between two police officers.[865] TF1-045 testified in cross-examination that two Supreme Council meetings gave "piece of advice" that commanders should control their men so as to stop harassment of civilians, which the commanders present agreed on, and that the witness heard that the Supreme Council set up nightly security patrols in Freetown to stop looting and harassment.[866] However, this hearsay evidence only refers to "piece of advice" by the Supreme Council, limits the security patrols to Freetown, and does not speak to their efficiency. As such, it does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-045's testimony-in-chief to find that the Supreme Council merely "discussed" the harassment of civilians.[867] In any event, Sesay does not address the other evidence the Trial Chamber relied on to make that finding.

7277. para. 358: For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that the above parts of Sesay's Ground 24 fail to show an error in the Trial Chamber's finding that the AFRC/RUF Common Criminal Purpose involved crimes.

7278. para. 359: Turning to the errors of fact alleged by Gbao, the Appeals Chamber notes that his argument that no evidence was adduced as to the relationship between the AFRC/RUF's ultimate goal and the crimes committed is based on his erroneous position that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a sufficient reasoning regarding that relationship.[868] As such it is unfounded and dismissed. The Appeals Chamber similarly dismisses Gbao's bare assertion that the Trial Chamber failed to provide evidence in support of its finding that senior members of the AFRC and RUF intended to use violent means against the civilian population.[869] As already noted in relation to Sesay's challenge to the same finding, the Trial Chamber did not err in making this finding.[870]

d. JCE – crimes as means to achieve the objective

7279. para. 360: In this section, the Appeals Chamber will consider Sesay's related claims that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the crimes committed were in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose. For each District where the Trial Chamber found crimes were committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose, Sesay submits various arguments challenging that conclusion.

i. Bo District – JCE – crimes as means to achieve the objective

7280. para. 361: The Trial Chamber found that the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE was furthered in Bo District through (i) forced mining activity; (ii) the use by the AFRC and RUF of the levers of State power in an attempt to destroy any support within the civilian population for the Kamajors; and (iii) attacks in June 1997 on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun.[871]

7281. para. 364: The forced mining found by the Trial Chamber to have furthered the Common Criminal Purpose in Bo District consisted of the alluvial diamond mining in Kenema and Kono Districts.[879] Sesay does not dispute that this activity, once it commenced, did further the Common Criminal Purpose in Bo. His position is that it could not have done so before August 1997. However, the Trial Chamber did not find otherwise. In particular, no conviction was entered against Sesay based on these forced mining activities before August 1997.[880] On its own, the finding that diamond mining in Tongo Field in Kenema District did not commence until August 1997 does not render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's conclusion that the JCE included Kenema District from the inception of the JCE.[881] Sesay thus fails to show an error.

7283. para. 366: Turning to the attacks on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun in June 1997, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not explicitly find that they were planned by members of the JCE. However, the basis on which the Trial Chamber found that crimes committed during these attacks were committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose is clear from other parts of the Trial Judgment, for instance, the following finding:

> The temporal and geographic proximity of the various attacks [including those on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun], and their similar modus operandi, with civilians raped and killed, houses razed to the ground and property looted, establishes that these were not isolated incidents but rather a central feature of a concerted campaign against civilians.[884]

7284. para. 367: Although made in relation to the chapeau requirements of crimes against humanity, these findings are equally important to the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the JCE. Indeed, in those latter findings, it held that "the conduct of [AFRC/RUF joint] operations demonstrates that the Junta intended, through wholly disproportionate means, to suppress all opposition to their regime"[885] and that the "widespread and systematic nature of the crimes, in particular the attacks on Bo and the forced labour in Kenema District, in which the RUF was engaged indicate that such conduct was a deliberate policy of the AFRC/RUF."[886] Moreover, "the AFRC/RUF alliance intended through the spread of extreme fear … to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over captured territory."[887] The attacks on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun in June 1997, all of which included acts intended to spread extreme fear among the civilian population, [888] fall squarely within this finding. The parts of Witness TF1-054's testimony Sesay invokes for his claim to the contrary neither support his allegation that a delegation was sent to Gerihun before the attack,[889] nor render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's reliance on other parts of TF1-054's testimony for its findings on this attack.[890]

7285. para. 368: In addition, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie, himself a JCE member,[891] led the attack on Sembehun.[892] Sesay's assertion that Bockarie acted on his own volition in this regard is unpersuasive.[893] First, while claiming an absence of findings on Bockarie's interaction with other JCE members at this time, Sesay fails to account for the Trial Chamber's holdings that it was Bockarie who instructed Superman to move with his troops to Freetown after Sankoh's public order to unite with the AFRC after the coup[894] and that Bockarie became a member of the Supreme Council, the highest decision-making body in the Junta regime.[895] Second, Sesay refers to TF1-008's testimony that Bockarie "said that he was the one who has captured this place, that this place was under his control."[896] Simply citing this evidence, Sesay fails to show how the Trial Chamber's assessment thereof was erroneous,[897] in particular given that Bockarie when entering Sembehun "identified himself as a member of the RUF."[898] Third, the fact that Bockarie pillaged Le 800,000 in Sembehun[899] supports rather than refutes that such conduct was contemplated as a means by the JCE members to further the Common Criminal Purpose.[900] Bockarie himself being a JCE member, it is not determinative whether the money stayed with him. Lastly, because pillage (Count 14) constituted a means to further the Common Criminal Purpose notwithstanding whether it amounted to terrorism, Sesay's argument that this incident fell beyond the Common Criminal Purpose fails.

7286. para. 369: The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Sesay's Ground 26 fails to demonstrate an error in the Trial Chamber's findings on the means employed to achieve the objective of the JCE in Bo District. Sesay's Ground 26 is dismissed in its entirety.

ii. Kenema District – JCE – crimes as means to achieve the objective

7287. para. 370: The Trial Chamber found that acts of unlawful killings, physical violence and enslavement were committed in Kenema District, some of which amounted to terror and collective punishment.[901] It found that these crimes fell within time period of the Junta and that the common plan and plurality of person remained the same.[902]

7288. para. 374: In his first argument, Sesay essentially submits that the low number of crimes committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose in Kenema District between 25 May 1997 and 11 August 1997 and in Kenema Town between 25 May 1997 and late January 1998 negates the existence of a JCE covering these areas.[909]

7289. para. 375: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber could not determine the specific dates of each crime committed in Kenema Town during the Junta period.[910] It therefore remains unclear whether Sesay is correct that a low number of crimes were committed in Kenema from the onset of the Junta on 25 May 1997 until the commencement of the forced mining activities in August 1997. However, even assuming that Sesay is correct in that regard, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that this renders unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that a JCE existed which encompassed "the territory of Sierra Leone", i.e. also Kenema District.[911] While evidence of the number of crimes committed in a certain area may be relevant to the assessment of whether a JCE existed, it is not determinative thereof. The Trial Chamber was entitled to consider, as it did, factors such as the geographic proximity of various crimes, including those in Kenema, their similar modus operandi[912] and their widespread and systematic nature[913] in its assessment of that question. Sesay's present submission does not challenge this assessment. In addition, the Appeals Chamber recalls that although the forced mining in Tongo Fields did not commence until August 1997,[914] it is clear from the Trial Chamber's findings that the planned and systematic policy of the Junta and the centralised system pursuant to which this large scale enslavement was implemented must have been devised much earlier.[915] Indeed, "[w]ithin a week of the coup of 25 May 1997, RUF rebels and the military Junta were in full control of" Kenema Town.[916]

7290. para. 376: The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Sesay fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the JCE extended to Kenema District from the onset of the Junta.

7291. para. 377: Sesay argues that "Bockarie's actions in Kenema Town" were erroneously found to be in pursuance of the Common Criminal Purpose.[917] Sesay's submission primarily concerns the period of time after early September 1997, when Bockarie left Freetown for Kenema.[918]

departure, in support he merely restates evidence already assessed by the Trial Chamber without explaining why such assessment was unreasonable.[921] Sesay invokes[922] evidence suggesting that Bockarie became an "outlaw," refused to take orders from Koroma[923] and, due to his dissatisfaction with the AFRC, felt that the RUF should withdraw from Freetown.[924] However, he fails to acknowledge that the same evidence also shows that the AFRC and RUF "fought together on all the battlefronts until [they] pulled out of Freetown"[925] and that the RUF remained in Freetown until February 1998.[926]

7293. para. 379: This evidence therefore does not render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's balanced conclusion that, even though Bockarie was "disillusioned with the RUF's limited role in the AFRC government" and left for Kenema, and even though "this strained the relationship between the two factions," the cooperation between the ARFC and RUF leadership continued.[927] As to Bockarie's own continued cooperation with members of the JCE, the Trial Chamber found that he was involved in the diamond mining in Tongo Field in Kenema, where the AFRC/RUF Secretariat, headed by Gullit and Sergeant Junior, reported directly to him.[928] Gullit was SAJ Musa's representative at the mines.[929] The proceeds from the diamonds, one of the AFRC/RUF regime's major sources of income, were delivered to Bockarie.[930] Sesay's challenges to these findings have been dismissed elsewhere.[931] His additional reference to temporally unspecific and vague evidence that "things were going beyond control" as a result of unequal weapons distribution between the AFRC and RUF fails to support his claim that Bockarie withdrew cooperation with the AFRC for that reason.[932]

7295. para. 381: Sesay challenges the finding that "Bockarie communicated over radio with RUF forces throughout the country and ensured that the AFRC/RUF cooperation continued."[936] Sesay's assertions that this communication was limited to the RUF and that the AFRC and RUF had separate radio systems, even if accepted, do not make it unreasonable to conclude that Bockarie, using the available channels of radio communication, ensured that the cooperation between the two groups continued. Indeed, the Trial Chamber found that Sesay, himself a member of the Supreme Council together with leaders of the AFRC, received orders from Bockarie over the radio after Bockarie's departure.[937] Sesay further invokes evidence suggesting that Bockarie ordered the RUF not to take up ministerial positions,[938] yet fails to address the finding and evidence that both Bockarie and Sesay approved appointments of RUF members to the Junta government "as part of a proposal to integrate the RUF into the AFRC regime."[939]

7297. para. 383: Sesay submits that the AFRC and RUF operated separate forced mining operations in Tongo Field and therefore that these operations do not evidence a common criminal purpose between the two groups.[942] In support of this submission Sesay relies on the evidence given by TF1-045 and TF1-371, but, save for one exception, he either merely offers an alternative reading of this evidence without explaining why the Trial Chamber's assessment thereof was unreasonable, or ignores other evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber.

7298. para. 384: The one exception concerns the Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-371's testimony to find that the Supreme Council decided to appoint senior members to supervise alluvial mining in Kono and Kenema.[943] Sesay argues that TF1-371 testified that Koroma, and not the Supreme Council, took this decision.[944] The Appeals Chamber notes that, while TF1-371 did testify as argued,[945] this evidence is not necessarily inconsistent with the impugned finding, because Koroma was the Chairman of the Supreme Council and significant decisions were made by himself, SAJ Musa and certain "other Honourables."[946] More importantly, the fact that Koroma made the decision in question does not detract from other evidence, for example, that the forced mining in Kenema was planned and organised in the Supreme Council,[947] on which the Trial Chamber relied to find that the RUF and the AFRC cooperated in respect of Tongo Fields.[948] Because Sesay's present argument does not address this evidence he fails to demonstrate an error.

7299. para. 385: The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Sesay does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the criminal means employed to achieve the objective in Kenema District.

iii. Kailahun District – JCE – crimes as means to achieve the objective

7300. para. 386: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF sustained a widespread and systematic pattern of conduct in Kailahun which included military training, child recruitment, enslavement of civilians and sexual slavery.[949] These crimes were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone.[950]

7301. para. 387: Sesay submits that the evidence concerning Kailahun District supports that no common criminal purpose existed during the Junta period.[951] He argues that paragraph 2047 of the Trial Judgment appeared to conclude that the RUF and AFRC forces did not act jointly in Kailahun.[952] Furthermore, there was no evidence that AFRC/RUF commanders were involved in Kailahun or that any RUF member committed or used others to commit acts of terror and collective punishment there during the Junta period.[953] No additional arguments are offered, either in response or reply.

7302. para. 388: The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by Sesay's submission. The Trial Chamber made extensive findings on RUF members and Commanders, including Superman,[954] committing acts of sexual slavery and forced marriage955 as well as enslavement[956] in Kailahun District. Whereas only the former two crimes also amounted to acts of terrorism,[957] the Appeals Chamber recalls that it was not required that the crimes constituted either such acts or collective punishment in order to fall within the Common Criminal Purpose.[958]

7303. para. 389: As to whether the AFRC and RUF acted in concert in Kailahun, the Appeals Chamber notes that the relevant part of paragraph 2047 of the Trial Judgment reads:

> The Junta Government exercised control over most of Sierra Leone, and the RUF forces acted jointly with the AFRC forces in relation to other locations [than Kailahun] in the country during the period in question.

This finding by a Majority of the Trial Chamber neither affirms nor rejects that the AFRC and RUF acted jointly in Kailahun.

7304. para. 390: However, whether the leaders of the AFRC and RUF acted in concert in the specific geographical area of Kailahun District was not determinative for the Trial Chamber's conclusion that they shared a common criminal purpose which encompassed that District. Rather, what mattered for the Trial Chamber was whether the two groups acted in concert on a country-wide level:

> The widespread and systematic crimes [by the RUF in Kailahun[959]] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.[960]

7305. para. 391: Sesay does not argue that these findings are erroneous, either in law or in fact. His submission is therefore rejected.

e. JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

7306. para. 393: All Appellants submit that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that they incurred JCE liability for crimes committed by persons who were found not to be members of the JCE, but who were used as "tools" by one or more JCE members to commit crimes in furtherance of the JCE. They argue that the Trial Chamber failed to make the necessary findings, or made erroneous findings, to arrive at this conclusion. Kallon additionally avers that the "tool" theory is wrong in law. The Appeals Chamber will address this preliminary legal challenge before proceeding to the remainder of the submissions.

7307. para. 394: The Trial Chamber held that to establish the liability of JCE members, the principal perpetrator of the crime need not be a member of the JCE, but may be used as a tool by one of the JCE members.[961]

> Whilst conspiracy requires a showing that several individuals have agreed to commit a certain crime or set of crimes, a joint criminal enterprise requires, in addition to such a showing, proof that the parties to that agreement took action in furtherance of that agreement. In other words, while mere agreement is sufficient in the case of conspiracy, the liability of a member of a joint criminal enterprise will depend on the commission of criminal acts in furtherance of that enterprise.[968]

7309. para. 398: In Brđanin, the ICTY Appeals Chamber examined both post-World War II jurisprudence[969] and ICTY case-law[970] which it found persuasive as to the ascertainment of the contours of JCE liability in customary international law.[971] On that basis it concluded that:

> [W]hat matters in a first category JCE is not whether the person who carried out the actus reus of a particular crime is a member of the JCE, but whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose. In cases where the principal perpetrator of a particular crime is not a member of the JCE, this essential requirement may be inferred from various circumstances, including the fact that the accused or any other member of the JCE closely cooperated with the principal perpetrator in order to further the common criminal purpose. In this respect, when a member of the JCE uses a person outside the JCE to carry out the actus reus of a crime, the fact that the person in question knows of the existence of the JCE – without it being established that he or she shares the mens rea necessary to become a member of the JCE – may be a factor to be taken into account when determining whether the crime forms part of the common criminal purpose.

However, this is not a sine qua non for imputing liability for the crime to that member of the JCE.[972]

With respect to the third category of JCE, the ICTY Appeals Chamber held:

> When the accused, or any other member of the JCE, in order to further the common criminal purpose, uses persons who, in addition to (or instead of) carrying out the actus reus of the crimes forming part of the common purpose, commit crimes going beyond that purpose, the accused may be found responsible for such crimes provided that he participated in the common criminal purpose with the requisite intent and that, in the circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or more of the persons used by him (or by any other member of the JCE) in order to carry out the actus reus of the crimes forming part of the common purpose; and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk – that is the accused, with the awareness that such a crime was a possible consequence of the implementation of that enterprise, decided to participate in that enterprise.[973]

7310. para. 399: The ICTY Appeals Chamber went on to find that:

7311. para. 400: Based on the legal authorities and reasoning provided for these holdings, and considering that they have been consistently affirmed by the subsequent jurisprudence of both the ICTY and the ICTR,[975] the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the holdings reflect customary international law at the time the crimes in the present case were committed, and on that basis endorses them. Kallon's submission that JCE liability cannot attach for crimes committed by principal perpetrators who are not proven to be members of the JCE is therefore dismissed.

7313. para. 402: Lastly, Kallon's submission that the Brđanin holdings are inapplicable in the present case is based on the premise that the Common Criminal Purpose found by the Trial Chamber was not inherently criminal. As that premise is erroneous, this submission fails.[980]

7314. para. 403: The Trial Chamber found there was insufficient evidence to conclude that between 25 May 1997 and 14 February 1998, mid- and low-level RUF and AFRC Commanders as well as rank-and-file fighters were themselves members of the JCE.[981] However, taking into account the entirety of the evidence, in particular the widespread and systematic nature of the crimes committed, it was satisfied that these individuals were used by the JCE members to commit crimes that were either within or a natural and foreseeable consequence of the implementation of the Common Criminal Purpose.[982] The Trial Chamber found that the non-JCE members who committed the crimes were sufficiently closely connected to one or more JCE members acting in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose that such crimes could be imputed to all members of teh JCE.[983]

7315. para. 404: In the period between 14 February 1998 and the beginning of May 1998, the Trial Chamber found that CO Rocky, Rambo RUF, AFRC Commander Savage and his deputy, Staff Sergeant Alhaji, were not members of the JCE, but that they were directly subordinate to and used by JCE members to commit crimes that were either within or a natural and foreseeable consequence of the Common Criminal Purpose.[984]

also be relevant whether the crimes at issue were committed by forces under the control of JCE members,[1021] or acting in coordination with forces under the control of JCE members.[1022] The Appeals Chamber notes, then, that Kallon's claim that the link requires evidence that a JCE member had "control and influence" as to each incident and group of non-JCE members at issue[1023] does not accurately reflect the law. Similarly, Sesay is incorrect to imply that a trier of fact is prevented, as a matter of law, from taking into account the widespread or systematic nature of the crimes in inferring whether non-members of the JCE were used by the JCE members.[1024] The Appeals Chamber observes, however, that the term "widespread or systematic" as employed in this context may denote facts different from those meeting the chapeau requirements of crimes against humanity.

7317. para. 415: The assessment of whether the Trial Chamber failed to make the findings as alleged must be made on a reading of the Trial Judgment as a whole,[1025] and allow for the fact that the Trial Chamber was required only to make findings on those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count.[1026] The Trial Chamber was not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it made.[1027] Therefore, while Sesay and Gbao are correct that the Trial Chamber had to be satisfied that all the perpetrators whose crimes were imputed to the JCE members were used by the latter in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose, it was not obliged to set out in detail every step of its reasoning which led it to that conclusion.[1028]

i. Bo District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

7319. para.417: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber gave some indication as to how the perpetrators of the crimes during the Tikonko and Gerihun attacks were used by JCE members, by finding that they were "AFRC/RUF fighters."[1030] This finding must moreover be read together with the holdings regarding the context in which the attacks occurred. In that regard, the Trial Chamber found that "the Junta regime did not enjoy consolidated territorial power over Bo District from the outset"[1031] and that "[a]t the end of May 1997, rumours abounded that the AFRC/RUF Junta suspected that Kamajors were hiding in Tikonko and that the AFRC/RUF were planning to attack the town and its civilians.[1032] the town and its civilians." In June 1997 that attack was carried out.[1033] Shortly thereafter AFRC/RUF fighters also attacked Sembehun and Gerihun.[1034] All three attacks followed the same modus operandi as other attacks in terms of the crimes committed in their midst, which, the Trial Chamber reasoned, showed that they "were not isolated incidents but rather a central feature of a concerted campaign against civilians."[1035] Indeed, among the perpetrators in the Gerihun attack were the heads of the AFRC Secretariat in Bo Town, Secretary of State AF Kamara and Brigade Commander Boysie Palmer.[1036]

7320. para.418: The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that these findings provide sufficient reasoning as to how the unlawful killings in Tikonko and Gerihun fitted into the "widespread and systematic nature of the crimes" and how the perpetrators "were sufficiently closely connected" to JCE members acting in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose, which was the Trial Chamber's basis for imputing these crimes to one or more JCE members.[1037] Gbao's submission is therefore untenable.

ii. Kenema District – JCE - use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

7321. para. 419: Both Sesay and Gbao submit that the Trial Chamber made insufficient findings on the links between the principal perpetrators of certain crimes in Kenema and the JCE members.[1038] In order to assess their submissions on the proper factual basis, it is necessary to first address another argument by Sesay relating to the Trial Chamber's crime-base findings regarding Kenema

7322. para. 420: Sesay argues that the finding in paragraph 1100 of the Trial Judgment created a presumption that the crimes in Kenema were committed for personal reasons rather than in pursuance of a common criminal purpose.[1039] The relevant part of paragraph 1100 reads:

> The Chamber is further satisfied that a nexus existed between the killing and the armed conflict, as the control exercised by the AFRC and RUF over Kenema Town during the Junta period created a permissive environment in which the fighters could commit crimes with impunity.

This finding is silent on the fighters' own reasons for committing crimes in Kenema Town. It only says that the permissive environment created by the AFRC and RUF there permitted them to do so with impunity. The presumption that Sesay reads into this finding is thus his own, and not one the Trial Chamber made. This argument fails.

7323. para. 421: The Appeals Chamber now turns to the alleged failures to make sufficient findings. Sesay and Gbao first submit that no link was shown between the JCE members and the persons who carried out the actus reus of the following crimes in Kenema Town: (i) the beating of TF1-122; (ii) the killing of Mr. Dowi; and (iii) the killing of an alleged Kamajor boss. TF1-122 was beaten by AFRC/RUF rebels at the Junta Secretariat in Kenema Town for having requested them to cease removing property from a woman.[1040] This incident was part of the so-called "flag trick:" It was common practice for those near the Junta Secretariat in Kenema Town to stand still during the raising and lowering of the Sierra Leonean flag; AFRC/RUF fighters would raise and lower the flag at irregular times and harass individuals who did not stand still and seise whatever property the latter were carrying.[1041] As to Mr. Dowi, he was killed by AFRC/RUF rebels when trying to prevent them from looting his freezer at his home in Kenema Town.[1042] Both crimes were found to have taken place in the context of the permissive environment created by the control exercised by the AFRC and RUF over Kenema Town wherein their fighters could commit crimes with impunity.[1043]

7324. para. 422: The fact, as noted, that this finding is silent on the perpetrators' own reasons for beating TF1-122 and killing Mr. Dowi is not determinative for whether the Trial Chamber found that they were used by the JCE members to commit these crimes in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose. Of greater relevance for that issue is the finding that the "control exercised" by the AFRC/RUF over Kenema Town "created" an environment which permitted the beating and the killing.[1045] That control, the Trial Chamber found, was exercised by the Junta: "Within one week of the coup of 25 May 1997, RUF rebels and the military Junta were in full control of [Kenema] town."[1046] Indeed, the beating of TF1-122 was found to have taken place while he was in custody at the Junta's own Secretariat building in Kenema Town.[1047] At the head of the Junta were most of the JCE members, who shared the intent to employ beatings and killings, such as those now at issue, as a means to control the territory of Sierra Leone, including Kenema Town.[1048] The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that these findings suffice to show how the perpetrators of the crimes in question were used by JCE members acting in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.[1049] Sesay's and Gbao's submissions to the contrary fail.

7325. para. 423: The alleged Kamajor boss was killed by AFRC/RUF fighters during "Operation No Living Thing," which had been launched by the RUF and AFRC as a pre-emptive measure due to rumours of an impending Kamajor attack.[1050] "Operation No Living Thing" did not refer to a particular military campaign, but it "described a set of brutal and merciless tactics which AFRC/RUF fighters were encouraged to adopt in combat."[1051] The killing also formed part of the AFRC/RUF's "deliberate strategy to terrorise the civilian population and prevent any support for their opponents."[1052] Seen against the background that the AFRC/RUF Junta, headed by most JCE members, controlled Kenema Town,[1053] the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that these findings suffice to explain the Trial Chamber's reasons why the killing was imputed to the JCE members. Sesay's and Gbao's claims to the contrary fail.

7326. para. 424: Next, Sesay and Gbao allege a lack of findings on the links between the JCE members and the perpetrators of the killings in Tongo Field of (i) a civilian at Lamin Street;[1054] and (ii) a Limba man.[1055] The Trial Chamber found that the killing at Lamin Street was perpetrated by AFRC/RUF fighters in a crowd of civilians publicly protesting against the fighters' raping women.[1056] It found that "the perpetrators intended to impart a clear public message that such protests would be met with violence."[1057] This conduct falls squarely within the finding that the "Junta 'government' brutally suppressed opposition", including through public executions, in order to control captured territory.[1058] These findings explain how the Trial Chamber found that the killing at Lamin Street, among others, evidenced a "systematic nature" of the crimes, which lead it to conclude that the peretrators were used by one or more JCE members acting in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.[1059] Sesay's and Gbao's claims of insufficient reasoning as regards this incident fail.

7327. para. 425: The Trial Chamber found that the Limba man was killed in Tongo Field by an AFRC/RUF fighter for refusing to give him palm wine.[1060] This crime was neither related to the AFRC/RUF forced mining activities in Tongo Field nor was it committed within the "permissive environment," which was limited to Kenema Town. In fact, the Trial Chamber held that the killing was "apparently [an] isolated crime."[1061] The proposition that the perpetrator was used in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose is further contradicted by the finding that "Captain Yamao Kati ordered that as the fighter had used his hand to fire a gun at a civilian, the fighter should also be shot in the hand."[1062] In view of these findings, the mere fact that the perpetrator was an "AFRC/RUF fighter" is insufficient reason for imputing this killing to a JCE member. The Trial Chamber therefore erred in law in so doing. Absent a valid conclusion in this regard, the Appellants' convictions under JCE for the killing of a Limba man in Tongo Field fall. Gbao's submissions are granted insofar they relate to the killing of a Limba man in Tongo Field.

7328. para. 426: As a result, none of the Appellants could be held liable under the JCE mode of liability for crime. The Appellants' remaining challenges to the Trial Chamber's findings on the links between the perpetrators of the crimes in Kenema District and the JCE members fail.

iii. Kono District – JCE - use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

iv. Unlawful killings – Kono District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

7329. para. 429: Sesay and Gbao allege that the Trial Chamber erred in imputing to members of the JCE1069 the killings between February and March 1998 in Tombodu ordered by Savage and Staff Alhaji,1070 the six killings in Yardu (and the subsequent amputation of TF1-197),[1071] and the killings of at least 29 civilians in Penduma on orders of Staff Alhaji in April 1998.[1072] Sesay further argues that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in imputing the killings of 30 to 40 captive civilians by Rocky in Koidu in April 1998,[1073] and the killing of Sata Sesay's family in Wendedu.[1074] In addition, Gbao contends that the Trial Chamber failed to explain why it imputed the killing of Chief Sogbeh in Tombodu at sometime between February/March 1998 to the JCE members.[1075]

7331. para. 431: Kallon challenges this finding.[1077] However, he does not address the evidence the Trial Chamber relied on to make it.He also fails to point to any parts of the record in support for his assertion that Rocky, Rambo, Savage and Staff Alhaji were not under [1078] the control of the Appellants. For his part, Sesay argues that the crimes of Savage, Staff Alhaji and their men did not fall within the Common Criminal Purpose because the finding that the rapes, killings and amputations in Penduma in April 1998 were committed "in a bid to disempower President Kabbah and to 'topple' his 'selfish and corrupt' regime" was "insufficient" to make such a finding.[1079] However, Sesay neither explains why that finding is insufficient, nor does he attempt to support his assertion with any reference to the evidence. Due to these flaws, Kallon's and Sesay's arguments are dismissed. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the specific killing incidents.

7332. para. 432: As to the killings by Rocky, Sesay argues that they were not part of the Common Criminal Purpose because Bockarie recalled Superman, Kallon and Rocky to Buedu for punishment when he heard of them.[1080] However, the finding he relies on does not sustain his claim that Superman, Kallon and Rocky were recalled "for punishment", as the Trial Chamber only found that they were summoned.[1081] Moreover, contrary to Sesay's claim, the fact that Rambo was not happy that one of the captive civilians (TF1-015) was still alive does not refute that the killings were committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.[1082] To the contrary, Rocky's own admonition to the captives before the massacre suggests that it was committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> Those of you who were clapping today, let me tell you now … We are Junta rebels … As you see in Kono now, we are now in control. We own this place now … We are coming to send you to Tejan Kabbah for you to tell him that we own here.[1083]

In addition, the Trial Chamber found that in March 1998 members of the JCE had ordered the commission of crimes against civilians, including killings in Koidu Town, to punish them for being traitors and for failing to support the Junta.[1084] Sesay points to no part of the record in support for his additional claim that Rocky acted for personal reasons or pursuant to a "localised order from Rambo," nor is that claim borne out by the Trial Chamber findings he refers to, in particular seeing as Kallon was one of the fifteen Commanders assembled after the massacre who voted that TF1-015 should be killed.[1085] This submission fails.

7333. para. 433: With respect to the killings ordered by Savage and Staff Alhaji in Tombodu between February and March 1998, Sesay submits that they were committed for twisted self-gratification independently from the AFRC/RUF, but he neither points to any evidence in support nor does he address the evidence the Trial Chamber relied on for its findings on these killings.[1086] In particular, he does not challenge the findings that the execution of about 200 civilians on Savage's orders was committed because the victims were cheering for ECOMOG troops[1087] and that the "scale and gruesome nature" of the killings in Tombodu during this period "guaranteed their notoriety, as reflected by the evidence of several witnesses that the killings were reported to and discussed by Commanders in other locations."[1088] These submissions therefore fail as well.

7334. para. 434: Regarding the six killings in Yardu, Sesay submits that TF1-197 was unable to identify the perpetrators, or even their grouping.[1089] However, in the parts of TF1-197's testimony he invokes, the witness testified that the "RUF and AFRC" amputated his hand and that "those two groups … were the only two groups that were in Kono."[1090] Consequently, in the witness's mind, the "rebels" who captured him and the other six civilians, and who killed those six civilians before proceeding to amputate his hand, belonged to the AFRC/RUF.[1091] [1092] The Trial Chamber therefore did not err in finding that the perpetrators were "AFRC/RUF rebels."Because the witness's alleged failure to identify the perpetrators is the only basis for Sesay's submission that the killings were wrongly imputed, his submission is rejected. The Appeals Chamber is further satisfied that the Trial Chamber sufficiently explained how the JCE members availed themselves of the perpetrators of the killings. It held that the killings were part of a "polic[y] that promoted violence [and] targeted civilians"[1093] and that the "widespread commission by RUF and AFRC fighters"[1094] of unlawful killings such as the ones at issue demonstrated that the Common Criminal Purpose contemplated the commission of crimes as a means to control the territory of Sierra Leone. Sesay's and Gbao's allegations of a failure to provide a reasoned opinion in respect of this incident lack substance.

7335. para. 435: Sesay and Gbao submit that the Trial Chamber provided insufficient reasons as to why it imputed the killings of at least 29 civilians in Penduma in April 1998 to the JCE members. It is undisputed that these killings were carried out on orders of Staff Alhaji. The Appeals Chamber has already found that the Trial Chamber provided sufficient reasoning as to why Staff Alhaji's crimes were imputed to the JCE members. As Sesay and Gbao do not allege any error of fact in that reasoning, let alone with respect to the specific killings now at issue, their arguments are dismissed.

7337. para. 437: Lastly, with respect to the killing of Sata Sesay's family, Sesay fails to explain how the alleged error in imputing this crime to the JCE led to a miscarriage of justice,[1099] seeing as the Trial Chamber did not enter a conviction under JCE for this crime.[1100] This submission is accordingly dismissed.

7338. para. 438: For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the Appellants' submissions that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to provide sufficient reasons for its conclusion that the unlawful killings in Kono District could be imputed to the members of the JCE. The Appeals Chamber also dismisses the Appellants' submissions that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in so concluding.

v. Sexual violence – Kono District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes 7339. para. 439: Sesay and Gbao submit that the Trial Chamber failed to explain how it imputed to the JCE members the following crimes of sexual violence committed in Kono District:[1101] (i) the rapes and outrages on personal dignity in Bumpeh on or about March 1998;[1102] (ii) the rape of a woman in Tombodu by Staff Alhaji in April 1998;[1103] (iii) the rapes of TF1-127's wife and of an unknown number of women in Penduma in April 1998;[1104] (iv) the rapes and genital mutilations in Bomboafuidu;[1105] (v) the rapes of TF1-195 and of five other women in Sawao between February and April 1998;[1106] [1107] and (vi) the forcible marriage of an unknown number of women in the civilian camp at Wendedu on or about April 1998.

7340. para. 440: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber's finding that the rapes in Kono District "were not intended merely for personal satisfaction or [as] a means of sexual gratification for the fighter."[1108] Rather, these acts were committed "in order to break the will of the population and ensure their submission to AFRC/RUF control."[1109] The Trial Chamber further found that the rebel forces "systematically engage[ed] in sexual violence in order to demonstrate that the communities were unable to protect their on wives, daughters, mothers and sisters."[1110] It also held that "countless women of all ages were routinely" subjected to the practice of forced marriage and sexual slavery.[1111] "[T]he pattern of sexual enslavement employed by the RUF was a deliberate system."[1112] These findings are reflected in the Trial Chamber's findings on the JCE in Kono District, where it held that the "widespread commission by RUF and AFRC fighters of [inter alia] rapes, sexual slavery, 'forced marriages'… demonstrates that the common purpose agreed to by the AFRC and RUF leadership continued to contemplate the commission of crimes within the Statute as a means of increasing its exercise of power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone."[1113]

7341. para. 441: In other words, the AFRC/RUF leadership, which included most of the JCE members,[1114] availed themselves[1115] of their fighters to commit sexual violence, including forced marriages, in Kono District in order to achieve the objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone. Although not expressed in those exact terms, the Trial Chamber's reasons why it imputed these crimes to the JCE members are nonetheless clear. Sesay's and Gbao's submissions that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasoned opinion in this regard are therefore dismissed.

7342. para. 442: Sesay also challenges the imputation of the rapes and genital mutilations in Bomboafuidu on the basis that the perpetrators were unidentified.[1116] However, as he does not point to the evidence to contest the Trial Chamber's finding that the perpetrators were "AFRC/RUF rebels,"[1117] his argument is rejected.

vi. Physical violence – Kono District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes 7343. para.4 43: Sesay and Gbao submit that the Trial Chamber provided insufficient reasoning to impute the following crimes of physical violence in Kono District to the JCE members:[1118] (i) the beating of TF1-197 on one occasion between February and March 1998 near Tombodu (including the pillaging of property from him);[1119] (ii) the act of knocking TF1-015's teeth out in the Wendedu camp;[1120] (iii) the amputation of the hands of three civilians by rebels led by Staff Alhaji in Tombodu in April 1998;[1121] (iv) the amputations of the hands of at least three men in Penduma in April 1998;[1122] (v) the amputation of the hands of five civilian men in Sawao between February and April 1998;[1123] (vi) the flogging of TF1-197 and his brother by rebels under the command of Staff Alhaji;[1124] (vii) the beating of an unknown number of civilian men with sticks and the butts of guns in Sawao between February and April 1998;[1125] and (viii) the carving of "AFRC" and/or "RUF" on the bodies of 18 civilians in Kayima between February and April 1998.[1126] Sesay also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in imputing these crimes to the JCE members. The Appeals Chamber will consider each crime incident in turn and, in so doing, address the alleged errors of fact and the alleged failure to provide a reasoned opinion together.

7346. para. 446: Sesay argues that there is "no evidence" to support that the rebels, led by Staff Alhaji, who (i) amputated the hands of three civilians in Tombodu in April 1998; and (ii) flogged TF1-197 and his brother were used by members of the JCE.[1139] [1140] However, Sesay fails to demonstrate an error as he does not challenge the Trial Chamber's explicit finding that Staff Alhaji was "directly subordinated to and used by" JCE members to commit crimes in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.That finding also sufficiently explains how the Trial Chamber imputed these crimes to the JCE members. Sesay's and Gbao's submissions therefore fail.

7347. para. 447: Sesay submits that there is "no evidence" that the perpetrators of the following crimes were used by members of the JCE: (i) the amputation of the hands of five civilian men in Sawao between February and April 1998; (ii) the beating of an unknown number of civilian men with sticks and the butts of guns in Sawao between February and April 1998; and (iii) the carving of "AFRC" and/or "RUF" on the bodies of 18 civilians in Kayima between February and April 1998.[1141] Sesay and Gbao also argue that the Trial Chamber gave insufficient reasons for imputing the amputations of the hands of at least three men in Penduma in April 1998 to the JCE members.

7348. para. 448: However, neither Sesay nor Gbao addresses the Trial Chamber's finding, made in respect of these very crimes, that "[t]he amputations and carvings practised by the AFRC/RUF were notorious. These crimes served as a permanent, visible and terrifying reminder to all civilians of the power and propensity to violence of the AFRC and RUF."[1142] With respect to the mistreatment in Sawao, Sesay also fails to acknowledge the finding that, shortly before being amputated and beaten, the victims were brought before a rebel leader in Sawao who stated: "My instructions are if you capture [civilians], kill them and leave them there."[1143]

7349. para. 449: These findings are examples of the "widespread commission" of these types of crimes, which demonstrated that the AFRC/RUF leadership contemplated the commission of crimes as a means to control the territory of Sierra Leone.[1144] Similar to the crimes of sexual violence, the Trial Chamber thus found that the JCE members availed themselves of the perpetrators to commit these crimes in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose. Indeed, the amputations of the three men in Penduma in April 1998 were committed by rebels led by Staff Alhaji, who was explicitly found to have been used by the JCE members in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.[1145] Staff Alhaji's address to one of the victims of this incident is telling: "go to Tejan Kabbah for him to give you a hand because he has brought ten containers load [sic] of arms. Now that you say you don't want our military rule, then go to your civilian rule."[1146] Sesay's and Gbao's submissions as to these crimes are rejected.

vii. Enslavement and pillage – Kono District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes 7350. para. 451: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber provided insufficient reasoning for imputing the following crimes in Kono District to members of the JCE:[1147] (i) the enslavement, by using civilians for forced labour, between February and April 1998 (Count 13);[1148] (ii) the acts of pillage during the February/March 1998 attack on Koidu;[1149] and (iii) the looting of funds from the Tankoro bank in Koidu on or about March 1998.[1150] This submission is dismissed on the basis that Sesay fails to address any of the numerous findings on which the Trial Chamber relied to impute these crimes of enslavement[1151] and pillage[1152] to the JCE members.

viii. Burning of civilian homes (acts of terrorism) – Kono District – JCE – use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes 7351. para. 452: Sesay submits that the Trial Chamber erred in imputing to members of the JCE the burning of civilian houses in Tombodu between February and April 1998 ordered by Staff Alhaji. In support, Sesay challenges Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-012's testimony, yet without explaining why the impugned findings are unreasonable in light of all the evidence on which the Trial Chamber relied which was not limited to TF1-012's testimony.[1154] Sesay also challenges the finding that the burning in question amounted to acts of terrorism. He refers to the Trial Chamber's finding that the burning:

> [W]as intended to punish civilians for failing to support the AFRC/RUF and to prevent civilians from remaining in these towns. The Chamber accordingly finds that the perpetrators directed these acts of violence against civilian property with > the intent of spreading terror among the civilian population as charged in Count 1.[1155]

While Sesay is correct that acts of terrorism and acts of collective punishment require proof of different intentions, it does not follow, as he appears to suggest, that the two cannot be established on the same evidentiary basis.[1156] Beyond that erroneous assertion, Sesay does not challenge the finding that the burning amounted to acts of terrorism. The fact that the Trial Chamber provided sufficient reasons for imputing Staff Alhaji's crimes to the JCE members has already been established.[1157] Sesay's submissions are therefore disallowed.

ix. Kailahun District – JCE - use of principal perpetrators to commit crimes

7352. para. 453: Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber failed to identify the perpetrators or the victims of the forced marriages in Kailahun, and to identify the necessary link between the direct perpetrators and the JCE members.[1158]

7353. para. 454: The Trial Chamber considered that its findings on the acts of sexual violence and forced marriage in Kono District apply also to the forced marriages in Kailahun District now at issue.[1159] Those findings, which have been set out above, clarify how the perpetrators of these crimes were used by members of the JCE.[1160] Furthermore, with respect to Kailahun District specifically, the Trial Chamber held that the "widespread and systematic pattern" of crimes such as forced marriages "were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone."[1161] Sesay's argument that the Trial Chamber failed to identify the link between the perpetrators of the forced marriages in Kailahun and JCE members acting in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose therefore fails. Given the widespread and systematic pattern of these crimes, the fact that some of the victims were unidentified, or that the perpetrators were identified only as "RUF fighters,"[1162] does not render the Trial Chamber's finding on that link unreasonable. In addition, the Appeals Chamber notes that Superman, himself a JCE member,[1163] committed one of the forced marriages in Kailahun District,[1164] and that Bockarie also had a captured "wife."[1165] Sesay's submission is therefore rejected.

7354. para. 650: As Sesay was convicted for the acts of terrorism in question under JCE 1 liability,[1641] and as the Trial Chamber found that one or more members of the JCE used the non-members who carried out the actus reus to commit the crime of acts of terrorism,[1642] his arguments turn on the initial proposition that the Trial Chamber was required to find that the non-members of the JCE who carried out the actus reus had the specific intent for those crimes.

7356. para. 652: Further, the Appeals Chamber agrees "that what matters in a first category JCE is not whether the person who carried out the actus reus of a particular crime is a member of the JCE, but whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose."[1645] As persuasively explained by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, the persons who carry out the actus reus of the crime need not share the common purpose of the JCE in order for liability for their acts to attach to members of the JCE.[1646] To the contrary, the primary question for the purposes of JCE liability is whether the acts of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes can be imputed to the members of the JCE.[1647] So long as it is established that a member of the JCE used the non-member to commit a crime within the common purpose of the JCE, there is no need to show that the non-member intended to further the common purpose of the JCE or indeed even knew of that common purpose.[1648]

7358. para. 654: The Appeals Chamber does not consider that the finding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Limaj et al., cited by Sesay, is relevant to the present issue, as the Appeals Chamber there was concerned with the scope of the common purpose as pleaded in the indictment, a distinct issue from the present question.[1651]

7360. para. 656: While the Trial Chamber did find that those who carried out the actus reus of the crime acted with the specific intent to spread terror,[1652] such a finding is only relevant as a matter of evidence to the other findings that the Trial Chamber was required to make. The Appeals Chamber finds that Trial Chamber's alleged errors with respect to the mens rea of the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes,[1653] even if accepted arguendo, would not render those findings unreasonable. Sesay challenges related to the mens rea of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes are dismissed.

7361. para. 657: Sesay further challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that Bockarie, as the perpetrator and member of the JCE, acted with the requisite mens rea for acts of terrorism. Sesay fails to show an error[1654] in the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the killing of the man at the NIC Building.[1655] Sesay neither explains how the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie acted with the requisite intent would be erroneous even if it were accepted that the victim was a Kamajor who was hors de combat, nor explains how Bockarie's desire to "do away with all the Kamajors"[1656] is inconsistent with or renders unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding. This claim is therefore dismissed.

7362. para. 658: Sesay fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the beating of TF1-129 was committed with the specific intent to spread terror.[1657] Contrary to Sesay's claim, the Trial Chamber did not need to find a "single, all-encompassing intention" among all those who participated in the beating of TF1-129,[1658] as the Trial Chamber's findings show that it found that Sesay and Bockarie used those who carried out the beatings to commit the crime.[1659] In particular, the Appeals Chamber notes the following findings: (i) Sesay ordered his bodyguard to molest TF1-129 during his arrest;[1660] (ii) Sesay's bodyguard further injured TF1-129 when he was to be taken to the Secretariat building;[1661] (iii) Sesay instructed a small boy to guard TF1-129 and kill him if he moved;[1662] (iv) TF1-129 was beaten while being taken to Bockarie and Sesay;[1663] (v) Bockarie and Sesay ordered TF1-129 to be taken to the "dungeon", and TF1-129 was beaten on the way to and from the "dungeon".[1664]

7363. para. 659: In addition, Sesay argues that there was no evidence that he sought to publicise the beating,[1665] and that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding that he and Bockarie used the non- members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit an act of terrorism.[1666] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings that acts of terrorism were within the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE,[1667] and therefore that the intent to commit acts of terrorism was shared by the members of the JCE, including Sesay and Bockarie. The Trial Chamber further found that the six acts of violence in Kenema Town,[1668] including the beating of TF1-129, targeted prominent members of civil society and were publicised.[1669] The Trial Chamber accordingly reasoned that the six acts of violence were "intended to illustrate the gruesome repercussions of collaborating or being perceived to collaborate with enemies of the RUF and so to terrorise and subdue the population," and therefore were committed with the specific intent to terrorise the civilian population.[1670] The Appeals Chamber also recalls the Trial Chamber's finding "that during the conflict in Sierra Leone, the AFRC/RUF regularly killed civilians accused of being Kamajors as a deliberate strategy to terrorise the civilian population and prevent any support for their opponents."[1671] Finally, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie targeted alleged Kamajors on a number of occasions[1672] and publicly expressed his intent to target alleged Kamajors.[1673]

7365. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 22 (p.501): I opine that the finding that in respect of crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts, Gbao did not share the intent of "principal perpetrators" to commit the crimes committed against civilians in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise under the stated Counts cannot lead, reasonably, to a conclusion that he was not a member of the JCE, unless the JCE is compartmentalized by District; contrary to the Prosecution's case. On the Indictment the JCE was not presented as a conglomeration of district-based joint common enterprises; but as a single joint criminal enterprise that was nationwide. Besides, Gbao did not need to share the intent of the 'principal perpetrators' who, themselves, did not need to have been members of the JCE.[33] However, he needed to share the requisite intent with the other participants. This case turns, therefore, partially on the requisite intent.

7366. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 23 (p.501-502): "Principal perpetrators" are the actual physical perpetrators of the crime, or those who performed the actus reus of the crime. As was observed by Judge Bonomy in the Decision on Odjanics Motion Challenging Jurisdiction: "Factual scenarios in cases before the Tribunal are rarely such that all persons involved in perpetration of the crimes pursuant to a JCE can be found to be participants in that particular JCE."[34] In this case the Trial Chamber found that "non-members who committed crimes were sufficiently closely connected to one or more members of the joint criminal enterprise acting in furtherance of the common purpose that such crimes can properly be imputed to all members of the joint criminal enterprise when other conditions of liability are fulfilled."[35]

f. JCE – temporal scope

7367. para. 456: The Trial Chamber found that, after being expelled from Freetown following the 6 to 14 February 1998 ECOMOG intervention, the leading members of the AFRC and RUF maintained their Common Criminal Purpose,1166 but that a major rift occurred between the AFRC and RUF in April 1998.[1167] The rift led to the departure of the majority of the AFRC fighters from Kono, after which the Trial Chamber found the JCE ended in late April 1998.[1168]

7368. para. 461: The Appeals Chamber finds that Kallon selectively refers to the Trial Chamber's findings in support of his position that the alliance between AFRC and RUF leaders collapsed after the ECOMOG intervention. A reading of the relevant findings in context reveals a conflicting picture of the situation after the ECOMOG intervention. The Trial Chamber's findings show that, while the AFRC/RUF withdrawal from Freetown was "chaotic" and "the status of the AFRC/RUF alliance drastically changed" thereafter,[1177] the leaders of the two factions, including Superman, SAJ Musa, Bockarie and Koroma, nonetheless agreed to mount a joint attack on Koidu Town.[1178] After a failed joint attack in the second half of February 1998,[1179] AFRC/RUF forces, urged on by Sesay,[1180] managed to capture Koidu on or about 1 March 1998.[1181] The AFRC and RUF then set up an integrated command structure in Kono District under the direction of, inter alia, Johnny Paul Koroma, Sesay, Superman, Bazzy and Five-Five.[1182] Coupled with its findings on the continued commission of crimes to achieve their objective,[1183] it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to find on this basis that the leaders of the AFRC and RUF persisted in their Common Criminal Purpose after the ECOMOG intervention on 6 to 14 February 1998.[1184] The findings on the arrest of Koroma and Gullit and the dispossession of their diamonds that Kallon additionaly refers to were taken into account by the Trial Chamber for its conclusion that the JCE ended, and so do not detract from the abovementioned findings.[1185] 7369. para. 462: Kallon also challenges the finding that he participated in the continued Common Criminal Purpose on the basis that he was not involved in the plan to attack Koidu Town.[1186] By contrast, he argues, SAJ Musa, who was involved in that plan, was not found to be a JCE member in Kono.[1187] The Appeals Chamber notes that whether Kallon participated in planning the attack on Koidu is not determinative of whether he continued to participate in the JCE after the ECOMOG intervention on 6 to 14 February 1998, because the Trial Chamber found that he participated in the JCE in numerous other ways. For instance, he actively participated in the attack against Koidu Town during which civilians were killed, and he endorsed the instructions issued by Sesay and Koroma after the attack that civilians in Kono should be killed and their homes burned.[1188] By contrast, SAJ Musa did not wish to work with and be subordinated to the RUF, whom he did not respect because they were not professional soldiers, and left before the AFRC/RUF forces proceeded on the Kono attack.[1189] SAJ Musa neither communicated with the joint AFRC/RUF forces nor cooperated with them in any way thereafter.[1190] Kallon does not address these findings. Kallon's present submissions regarding his participation are accordingly rejected.

7370. para. 463: Lastly, Kallon complains that the Trial Chamber failed to specify when the JCE ended and that he was erroneously convicted for crimes in Kono in "May 1998."[1191] The Trial Chamber was "unable to ascertain with certainty" the date on which the split occurred between the AFRC and RUF forces which caused the end of the JCE.[1192] However, it found that it occurred "in late April 1998."[1193] Kallon does not explain how this finding was in error. As to his own JCE liability, the Trial Chamber found that, because the JCE ended in late April 1998, "at that time no responsibility can be imputed to … Kallon … for criminal acts committed by any AFRC fighter under the mode of a [JCE]."[1194] The Trial Chamber's findings in relation to Kallon's participation in the JCE suggest that he incurred JCE liability for the crimes in Kono between 14 February and "April/May 1998."[1195] However, this phrasing is merely imprecise and does not represent an error that invalidates a verdict, because its findings elsewhere, which are discussed above, indicate that the Trial Chamber understood the date to be "late April 1998." The Appeals Chamber rejects this submission.

7371. para. 464: Sesay essentially submits that the split between the AFRC and RUF occurred, not after, but during the ECOMOG attack on their positions in Koidu town in early April 1998. However, in support he simply refers to a number of excerpts or summaries of various testimonies compiled in Annex F to his Appeal, selected parts of TF1-334's testimony, and a list of testimonies allegedly supporting that the crimes in RUF camps fell outside the JCE.[1196] He makes no mention in his Appeal of why or how no reasonable trier of fact could have relied on the evidence the Trial Chamber referenced for its findings regarding the AFRC/RUF split, let alone how any such error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[1197] The Appeals Chamber recalls that it is for an appellant, not the Appeals Chamber, to clearly articulate the errors alleged to have been committed by the Trial Chamber. Undeveloped assertions such the one now at issue, which merely requests the Appeals Chamber to assess selected parts of the evidence de novo, will be summarily dismissed by the Appeals Chamber.

7373. para. 1106: The Prosecution's Ground 1 asserts that the Trial Chamber erred in not finding the Appellants responsible under JCE liability for crimes committed after April 1998.[3029] First, the Prosecution alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in holding that the AFRC/RUF JCE ceased to exist some time in late April 1998.[3030] The Prosecution argues that the Common Criminal Purpose continued at least until the end of February 1999.[3031] Second, the Prosecution submits that the Appellants continued to participate in the JCE throughout that period.[3032]

7374. para. 1107: The Prosecution supports its position by six main arguments, namely, that: (i) the AFRC and RUF continued to cooperate after April 1998,[3033] in particular in the lead up to,[3034] during[3035] and after[3036] the invasion of Freetown in January 1999; (ii) they continued to have common interests after April 1998, and each could only achieve their common goal to regain power and control over Sierra Leone through cooperation;[3037] (iii) the pattern of crimes committed by both AFRC and RUF forces continued to be the same after late April 1998;[3038] (iv) the Trial Chamber erred in finding that after April 1998 there was an AFRC plan to "reinstate the army" and in relying on that finding to establish the end of the JCE;[3039] (v) the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the internal discord in AFRC/RUF relations in late April 1998 signalled the end of the JCE;[3040] and (vi) the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied on the evidence of Sesay to find that the JCE ended in late April 1998.[3041] The Prosecution also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in applying the elements of JCE.[3042]

7375. para. 1108: The Appeals Chamber will first consider the alleged error of law. When analysing the alleged errors of fact, the Appeals Chamber will first examine the specific challenges the Prosecution makes to the Trial Chamber's findings, and then consider the Prosecution's ultimate claim that the only reasonable conclusion open to a trier of fact was that the JCE continued until the end of February 1999.

7376. para. 1109: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF "had no control over" the AFRC forces in Freetown during the attack and did not form part of a common operation with the AFRC forces for this attack on 6 January 1999.[3043] In respect of the crimes committed in Koinadugu District, the Trial Chamber held that Superman "had no effective control" over SAJ Musa in that District[3044] and that Superman was not "under the effective control" of Bockarie or Sesay after August 1998.[3045] It also held that the RUF High Command "had no effective control" over the fighters who committed the crimes in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts.[3046]

7377. para. 1111: The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Prosecution fails to identify which elements of JCE liability the Trial Chamber erroneously applied by considering issues of command and control as part of its analysis, and further fails to establish how the Trial Chamber's alleged error invalidates the Trial Chamber's conclusion at paragraph 2075 of the Trial Judgment. The Prosecution has merely attempted to build a legal argument out of what is a question of fact.

7378. para. 1112: The Trial Chamber found that a major rift occurred between the AFRC and RUF forces after their capture of Koidu Town.[3051] Following this rift, Gullit announced that the AFRC troops would withdraw from Kono to join the AFRC Commander SAJ Musa in Koinadugu District.[3052] It found that, after the last joint operation between the RUF and AFRC attacking ECOMOG at the Sewafe Bridge in late April 1998, the common plan between the AFRC and RUF ceased to exist.[3053] Each group thereafter independently pursued separate plans.[3054] The Trial Chamber concluded that the AFRC/RUF Common Criminal Purpose ended in late April 1998.[3055] It further found that the Prosecution failed to establish that a common purpose resurfaced or was newly contemplated between members of the AFRC and RUF before the advance on Freetown on 6 January 1999.[3056]

7379. para. 1113: In August 1998, after the RUF's failed attempt to retake Koidu Town from ECOMOG in the Fiti-Fata mission, RUF Commander Superman departed Kono District with loyal RUF fighters and joined SAJ Musa in Koinadugu District.[3057] Although he had sporadic contact with Bockarie and Sesay from Koinadugu, the Trial Chamber found that from August 1998 Superman and his troops operated as an independent RUF faction and not in concert with the RUF High Command in Buedu.[3058]

7381. para. 1118: The Prosecution's bare submission that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that "Gullit and the AFRC would have participated with the RUF in the Sewafe Bridge attack if it was events prior to that attack that were the cause of the 'rift'"[3071] fails to identify an error. The Prosecution fails to challenge the Trial Chamber's findings that after the Sewafe Bridge attack, Gullit stated that "the AFRC troops would withdraw from Kono District to join SAJ Musa in Koinadugu District" and that "[t]he split was acrimonious and Gullit decisively refused to accept Superman's attempt to re-impose cooperation…."[3072] Nor does the Prosecution challenge the Trial Chamber's findings that this rift erupted after Gullit informed the AFRC troops of how the RUF had treated him and Koroma.[3073] By failing to challenge any of these findings, the Prosecution fails to point to the Trial Chamber's specific error. Similarly, the Prosecution's submission that "the conclusion that the mistreatment of Gullit and Koroma had a dramatic divisive effect in April 1998 was not reasonably open to the Trial Chamber"[3074] is unsupported and does not address the Trial Chamber's unchallenged findings.

7382. para. 1119: The Prosecution's assertion that the radio operators were sent by Bockarie in late August 1998 to reinforce SAJ Musa's and Gullit's forces[3075] is not inconsistent with the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie sent the radio operators to act as informants. Indeed, none of the evidence cited by the Prosecution contradicts the Trial Chamber's finding, but only establishes that radio operators were sent to Gullit via SAJ Musa in Koinadugu in response to a request from Gullit.[3076] Moreover, the Trial Chamber found that when SAJ Musa later arrived in Major Eddie Town[3077] to join Gullit, he prohibited the RUF radio operators from using the communications equipment and ordered that any RUF who approached a radio would be killed.[3078] Accordingly, the Prosecution fails to show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Bockarie sent the radio operators as informants.

7383. para. 1120: With respect to the Prosecution's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that from August 1998 Superman and his fighters operated as an independent RUF force and were no longer working in concert with the RUF High Command,[3079] the Trial Chamber found that Superman decided in August 1998 to join forces with SAJ Musa following the failed Fiti-Fata mission,[3080] and that Superman further refused an order from Bockarie to report to Headquarters in Buedu.[3081] The Prosecution argues that Superman was sent by Bockarie to join SAJ Musa in Koinadugu, but merely cites evidence supporting this conclusion without addressing the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber. In making this finding, the Trial Chamber preferred certain evidence after specifically considering and rejecting the alternative evidence that Bockarie ordered Superman to Koinadugu, reasoning that it was not credible in light of the animosity between Bockarie and Superman and Superman's subsequent refusal to cooperate with the RUF High Command.[3082] Similarly, the finding that Superman communicated with Bockarie after his arrival in Koinadugu District and informed Bockarie of the attack on Kabala was specifically considered by the Trial Chamber, which found that this communication was "sporadic".[3083] The Trial Chamber further found that Bockarie shortly after cut off all communication with Superman and forbade all RUF radio operators from contacting Superman, which finding the Prosecution does not challenge.[3084] Finally, by merely citing the evidence, the Prosecution fails to show how the Trial Chamber erred in not accepting the testimony of Witness TF1-361 that SAJ Musa and Superman consulted with Bockarie via radio concerning the training base in Koinadugu. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution fails to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that Superman did not work in concert with the RUF High Command after August 1998, and its claim is rejected. The Appeals Chamber, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, will therefore not further consider the Prosecution's arguments that suggest the interaction between Superman and the AFRC represented cooperation between the AFRC and RUF.

7384. para. 1121: The Trial Chamber held that, after the common plan between the AFRC and RUF ceased to exist in late April 1998, each group independently pursued separate plans.[3085] Although the AFRC and RUF cooperated occasionally thereafter, there was insufficient evidence to conclude that senior members of the two groups acted jointly.[3086]

7385. para. 1123: Contrary to the Prosecution's submission,[3089] the Trial Chamber did make findings as to the independent objectives of the RUF and AFRC at the time of the attack on Freetown. The Trial Chamber found that the RUF planned a military operation to capture Freetown,[3090] while the AFRC "contemplated their individual plan to capture Freetown and to 'reinstate the army'."[3091] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's holding that "[a] common objective in itself is not enough to demonstrate that the plurality of persons acted in concert with each other as different and independent groups may happen to share the same objectives."3092 The Prosecution does not challenge this legal holding by the Trial Chamber, which the Appeals Chamber has previously found accurately reflects the law.[3093]

7386. para. 1124: The Prosecution's claim that the attempted release of Sankoh was inconsistent with the RUF and AFRC pursuing rival plans[3094] misrepresents the Trial Chamber's finding. The Trial Chamber did not find that the RUF and AFRC were pursuing rival plans, but only that they independently pursued separate plans.[3095] As the Prosecution's claim that the attempted release of Sankoh evinces loyalty to the leaders of the RUF offers an alternative interpretation of the evidence, the Appeals Chamber will take it into account when considering the Prosecution's ultimate claim that the Trial Chamber erred in not finding that the JCE continued until at least February 1999.

7387. para. 1125: The Prosecution claims that the only reasonable conclusion that could be drawn from the evidence was that the senior leaders of the RUF intended to cooperate with the AFRC to recapture Freetown.[3096] This claim fails to demonstrate an error. As the Prosecution notes, the Trial Chamber found that although there was evidence that the RUF intended to coordinate with the AFRC's movements so that the two forces together could capture Freetown, there was no evidence that this plan was ever communicated to the AFRC.[3097] The Prosecution does not challenge this finding. The Appeals Chamber concludes, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution accordingly fails to show that the Trial Chamber erred.

7389. para. 1128: The Prosecution fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred[3102] in finding that the AFRC contemplated their individual plan to capture Freetown and to "reinstate the army."[3103] The Prosecution's argument centres on the contention that "the evidence before the Trial Chamber did not establish that any AFRC commander other than SAJ Musa had or supported this plan."[3104] The Prosecution points to the fact that the majority of the AFRC troops elected to remain with the RUF following SAJ Musa's departure in February 1998,[3105] but fails to address the Trial Chamber's findings that Gullit left Kono to join SAJ Musa in late April 1998[3106] and later subordinated himself and his forces to SAJ Musa.[3107] While the Trial Chamber found that there were disagreements between SAJ Musa and Gullit regarding communication with the RUF during the planning and advance to Freetown,[3108] these findings do not show that Gullit, much less other AFRC commanders, did not subscribe to the plan to reinstate the army. To the contrary, the fact that the AFRC commanders remained with SAJ Musa and participated in the advance towards Freetown and the absence of any findings of disputes regarding the plan itself[3109] provide a reasonable basis for inferring that they agreed with that plan notwithstanding their disagreements regarding other matters. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution's claim that there was no evidence that other AFRC commanders supported SAJ Musa's plan[3110] is incorrect.

7390. para. 1129: Similarly, the evidence cited by the Prosecution[3111] does not directly or clearly support its contention, and some of the evidence cited supports the finding that SAJ Musa's plan was more widely shared.[3112] In any event, by merely citing certain evidence, the Prosecution fails to explain why it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to prefer other evidence.

7391. para. 1130: In addition, while the Prosecution suggests that the plan to reinstate the army derived from SAJ Musa's hostility to the RUF and was solely his plan,[3113] the Trial Chamber also found that the existence of separate and independently pursued plans was consistent with "the distrust and animosity that existed between Gullit and the RUF in May 1998…."[3114] The Prosecution does not contest this finding. The fact that the AFRC did not attempt to reinstate the army during its three-day occupation of the city of Freetown in January 1999[3115] does not establish that the AFRC's plan did not continue after SAJ Musa's death, particularly as the AFRC under Gullit continued implementing the plan by attacking Freetown.[3116] Finally, as the Trial Chamber found that the plan to "reinstate the army" was the AFRC's plan,[3117] and that in Koinadugu District the AFRC forces under SAJ Musa, the RUF forces under Superman[3118] and the STF forces under Bropleh were "three distinct factions of fighters",[3119] disagreements between SAJ Musa and Superman and the fact that the STF forces remained with Superman after SAJ Musa departed to join Gullit[3120] do not establish that members of the AFRC did not support the plan to reinstate the army.

7392. para. 1131: The Trial Chamber found that, while the AFRC and RUF initially had a functioning relationship, over time it began to sour and disagreements were frequent.[3121] The Trial

Chamber held that the AFRC/RUF JCE ended following a rift between the two groups in late April 1998.[3122]

7393. para. 1133: While the Prosecution claims that the Trial Chamber "erred in taking one particular instance of fractious relations in April 1998 as signifying the end of the JCE,"[3127] it fails to explain why, on the facts, the Trial Chamber's finding was unreasonable; indeed, it fails to reference or address the circumstances that led the Trial Chamber to that finding. By merely listing prior disagreements between the AFRC and RUF,[3128] the Prosecution neither analogises the circumstances in late April 1998 to those prior disagreements, nor rebuts the particular characteristics of the circumstances in late April 1998 upon which the Trial Chamber relied. Similarly, the lists of disagreements between SAJ Musa and the RUF and within the RUF itself[3129] are not responsive to the Trial Chamber's findings and reasoning regarding events in late April 1998. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not rely exclusively on the fact and seriousness of the discord between the RUF and AFRC to reach its finding, as it also considered the behaviour of the two groups after April 1998.[3130]

7394. para. 1134: To the extent that the Prosecution suggests that the Trial Chamber could not, as a matter of law, find that the members of the JCE no longer shared a common purpose on the basis of the seriousness of internal discord because it had previously found a common purpose notwithstanding prior disagreements,[3131] such a suggestion must be rejected. While a trier of fact may find a shared common purpose notwithstanding internal friction between the alleged members of the JCE, it is also certainly open to a trier of fact to find that the extent of disagreement was such as to preclude the conclusion that there was a shared common purpose, or to find that the level of internal discord had grown so serious as to show that the members no longer shared a common purpose. Similarly, the Prosecution's submissions that there may be internal struggles, friction, separate motives, and diverging agendas[3132] among the members of the JCE are unresponsive to the issue, as while such factors do not necessarily preclude the finding of a shared common purpose, they are still relevant evidentiary considerations. The assessment of the effect of any disagreements or discord vis-à-vis the existence of a shared common purpose is an evidentiary matter to be made on a case-by-case basis in light of all relevant circumstances.[3133]

7395. para. 1135: The Trial Chamber relied on Sesay's testimony in part to find that (i) Bockarie doubted the veracity of Gullit's claim that SAJ Musa had died and suspected that the AFRC tried to mislead the RUF;[3134] (ii) despite his representations to Gullit, it seemed that Bockarie did not immediately order the deployment of RUF troops;[3135] and (iii) Bockarie regarded the AFRC's failure to wait for reinforcements as evidence that Gullit had lied to him and that SAJ Musa was in fact still alive.[3136]

7396. para. 1137: The Prosecution's overly broad reference to "other evidence and … the weight of all of the other evidence and findings in the case referred to above"[3139] is vague and fails to precisely explain why no reasonable trier of fact could have accepted the challenged testimony to make the particular findings it impugns. Moreover, the Trial Chamber's findings the Prosecution highlights are not inconsistent or contradictory, as the Trial Chamber found only that Sesay's version of events was "not generally accepted."[3140] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the "Trial Chamber has the advantage of observing witnesses in person and so is better positioned than the Appeals Chamber to assess the reliability and credibility of the evidence."[3141] This submission is accordingly rejected.

7400. para. 1141: Factors relevant in determining whether a plurality of persons shared a common criminal purpose include, but are not limited to: the manner and degree of interaction, cooperation and communication (joint action) between those persons;[3148] the manner and degree of mutual reliance by those persons on each other's contributions to achieve criminal objectives that they could not have achieved alone;[3149] the existence of a joint decision-making structure;[3150] the degree and character of dissension; and the scope of any joint action as compared to the scope of the alleged common criminal purpose.[3151] The mere showing of some communication and cooperation is not necessarily sufficient to establish a shared common purpose. As JCE liability attaches individual criminal responsibility for the commission of crimes perpetrated by others, the trier of fact must always ensure that the evidence establishes that the persons alleged to constitute the plurality joined together to realise their common goal.[3152]

7401. para. 1142: Having considered the Prosecution's submissions as a whole, the Appeals Chamber concludes, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the Common Criminal Purpose between the AFRC and RUF ended in late April 1998. The Trial Chamber found that after April 1998, the AFRC and RUF were independent groups not acting in concert to realise a shared common purpose, but only irregularly communicating and cooperating in their independent pursuit of similar, but separate purposes.[3153] The Prosecution constructs an alternative interpretation of the evidence and the Trial Chamber's findings to support its contention that the AFRC and RUF continued to share a common purpose following Gullit's departure from Kono District. However, the Prosecution fails to show that all doubts as to the Accused's guilt are eliminated. The Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the evidence and findings were coherent and reasonable in light of the evidence as a whole, and reflect reasonable doubt as to the Accused's liability for the crimes for which they were acquitted.

7402. para. 1143: In arguing that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the Common Criminal Purpose ended in late April 1998, the Prosecution cites the Trial Chamber's own findings to show that the AFRC and RUF continued to cooperate after April 1998.[3154] In the period prior to the attack on Freetown, the Prosecution highlights communications between AFRC leaders, particularly Gullit, and the RUF High Command and Bockarie's dispatch of four radio operators to join Gullit as reinforcements in response to Gullit's request.[3155] The Prosecution further highlights the communication between Gullit and Bockarie following SAJ Musa's death immediately prior to the invasion of Freetown, as well as the communication and cooperation between Gullit and Bockarie during and after the attack on Freetown.[3156] The Prosecution also makes numerous submissions regarding how these findings should be interpreted, particularly noting that internal discord, power struggles and ulterior motives do not preclude a finding of a common purpose,[3157] and suggesting how the individual interests of the AFRC and RUF[3158] as well as the pattern of crimes committed[3159] support the finding that the AFRC and RUF continued to share a common purpose. Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution merely provides an alternative interpretation of the evidence, and fails to show that the Trial Chamber's conclusion was unreasonable.

7403. para. 1144: As an initial matter, the Appeals Chamber notes that the assessment of whether the alleged plurality was acting in concert to realise a shared common purpose is principally an evidentiary matter. The Prosecution points to a number of considerations that it suggests either support or do not disprove the existence of a shared common purpose. For example, the Prosecution notes that "a gap in communication does not require a finding that action in concert had ceased",[3160] that the rupture of the joint AFRC/RUF command structure "is not fatal to the continuation of the JCE",[3161] that "[h]armony between members of a JCE is not a legal requirement of JCE responsibility",[3162] and that "the fact that strategies may have differed does not detract from the joint commitment to the common goal."[3163] The Appeals Chamber considers, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that while these propositions are generally correct as a matter of law, they are largely unhelpful when assessing whether the Trial Chamber factually erred in light of the evidence as a whole. The Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that by merely pointing out that the Trial Chamber could have found a shared common purpose notwithstanding those factors, the Prosecution does not show that a reasonable trier of fact must have found a shared common purpose.

7405. para. 1146: With respect to the period from April 1998 until December 1998, that is, the period from Gullit's departure to the initial stages of the eventual attack on Freetown, the findings and evidence cited by the Prosecution3167 show only minimal cooperation and communication between the RUF and AFRC. The Trial Chamber found that the interaction between the two groups was "sporadic" and "occasional" and did not establish that the leadership of both groups continued to act in concert.3168 The Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that this conclusion was reasonable, particularly when the scarce amount of cooperation during this period is contrasted with the degree of cooperation between the AFRC and RUF prior to late April 1998 and in light of the degree of discord between the leaders of the AFRC and RUF exemplified by Gullit's "acrimonious" departure from Kono. The Prosecution's argument that such discord does not preclude a finding of a shared common purpose3169 is not responsive to the critical issue, particularly as the Prosecution fails to show that the Trial Chamber erred in its factual findings regarding the degree of cooperation between the AFRC and RUF during this period. The Appeals Chamber further notes that the Prosecution fails to show any mutual reliance between the AFRC and RUF leadership during this period. The Prosecution does not show that the actions of the RUF in Kono and Kailahun Districts directly or indirectly supported the AFRC's operations in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts during this period, or vice versa. The Trial Chamber specifically found that after their departure from Kono, the AFRC forces no longer received arms and ammunition from Kailahun, forcing them to be self-sufficient and rely on captured supplies,3170 which the Prosecution does not challenge. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber also notes that while the Prosecution suggests that the AFRC and RUF could only realise their individual purposes through cooperation,3171 the critical inquiry is whether they in fact did so to the extent that they can be said to have acted in concert such that a common purpose between them is the only reasonable inference. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution fails to establish that all reasonable doubt as to the Accused's guilt has been eliminated.

7406. para. 1147: The Prosecution further argues that the only reasonable interpretation of the Trial Chamber's findings is that the RUF, in particular Bockarie,3172 and the AFRC, in particular Gullit,3173 intended to cooperate together during the attack on Freetown, and that the RUF and AFRC did in fact act in concert prior to, during and after the attack on Freetown.3174 In support of its interpretation, the Prosecution points to the death of SAJ Musa as removing an obstacle to cooperation between the AFRC and RUF,3175 the common interest of both groups in seizing Freetown3176 and the interdependence of the groups to realise their objectives.3177 However, again, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution has only provided an alternative interpretation of the evidence without establishing that all reasonable doubt as to the Accused's guilt has been eliminated.

7407. para. 1148: The Trial Chamber's findings establish only that Gullit and Bockarie communicated on a few occasions prior to and during the attack,3178 and that Bockarie dispatched RUF fighters to Freetown following Gullit's request for reinforcements.3179 The Trial Chamber further found it was not clear when Bockarie dispatched those forces,3180 that it was not clear whether the RUF forces were willing to support the AFRC's retreat3181 and, in any event, the RUF forces did not enter Freetown and only met the AFRC forces after their retreat to Waterloo.3182 While the Prosecution argues that the communication between Bockarie and Gullit, together with other considerations, supports the inference that the AFRC and RUF shared a common purpose,3183 the Trial Chamber interpreted the evidence as showing that the RUF and AFRC continued to act independently.3184 In particular, the Trial Chamber noted that (i) the RUF plans to attack Freetown were not communicated to the AFRC;3185 (ii) Bockarie distrusted Gullit's claim that SAJ Musa had died;3186 (iii) Bockarie did not send the RUF troops until after the AFRC had entered Freetown;3187 (iv) Gullit did not again contact Bockarie for assistance after his arrival in Freetown until the AFRC was encircled by ECOMOG forces;3188 (v) Bockarie and Gullit continued to be in conflict;3189 and (vi) Bockarie publicly overstated his actual role in the Freetown attack.3190 Accordingly, the Trial Chamber was not satisfied that the Prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that the leaders of the AFRC and RUF were acting in concert to realise a shared common purpose.3191 In light of these findings and reasoning, the Appeals Chamber finds, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution's alternative inferences and interpretations fail to establish that all reasonable doubt as to the Accused's guilt has been eliminated.

7408. para. 1149: Therefore, the Appeals Chamber concludes, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, that the Prosecution fails to show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the Common Criminal Purpose of the AFRC/RUF JCE ended in late April 1998. For that reason, the Appeals Chamber, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, finds that it need not consider the Prosecution's claims regarding the Appellants' liability pursuant to JCE after that date.

7409. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 3 (p. 485): The Trial Chamber found that the common plan between the AFRC and the RUF ceased to exist from late April 1998, when a rift between the two forces erupted. In this regard it stated:

> The rift between the two forces erupted after the Sewafe Bridge attack when Gullit disclosed to his troops that Bockarie had beaten him and seized his > diamonds and that Johnny Paul Koroma was under RUF arrest. Gullit declared that the AFRC troops would withdraw from Kono District to join SAJ Musa in Koinadugu District. Gullit and Bazzy accordingly departed, taking with them the vast bulk of the AFRC fighters in Kono District. The split was acrimonious and Gullit decisively refused to accept Superman's attempt to re-impose cooperation, ignoring a directive from him to return to Kono District.6

It should be noted here that Gullit aka Alex Tamba Brima, Johnny Paul Koroma aka JPK and Bazzy aka Bazzy Kamara were Commanders in the AFRC. Bockarie aka Mosquito was a Commander in the RUF. The Trial Chamber found that in August 1998, Bockarie modified the RUF radio codes to prevent Superman from monitoring radio transmissions and forbade radio operators from contacting Superman.7 It also found that, in Koinadugu District from August 1998, Superman and those fighters under his command operated as an independent RUF faction.8

7410. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 4 (p. 485-486): The above factual findings are at the core of the Trial Chamber's finding that the so-called rift in late 1998 was fatal to the JCE. We opine that, as the Prosecution correctly submitted, no reasonable trier of fact could have found that such instance of a fractious relationship occurring in April 1998 signified the end of the JCE.9 Sesay and Kallon submit that the Trial Chamber did not attribute the rift between AFRC and RUF to the ill treatment of Koroma and Gullit, but to a relatively protracted and prolonged process involving a number of causative factors.10 The submission is unfounded, misguided and not supported by the evidence. In our opinion, such finding - based on the sole evidence of one insider witness given before another Trial Chamber in a previous case11 - could not be regarded by a reasonable trier of fact as conclusive of the termination of the JCE.

7411. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 5 (p. 486): A fortiori, the Trial Chamber's findings establish that internal friction was an ongoing feature of relations between the AFRC/RUF and within the RUF itself, even during the period within which the Trial Chamber found the JCE existed.12 For instance, it found that "while the two groups initially had a functioning relationship, over time it began to sour and disagreements between the AFRC and RUF were frequent. On or about August 1997, Sam Bockarie, the acting leader of the RUF in the absence of Foday Sankoh, left Freetown to establish his headquarters in Kenema, as he was dissatisfied with Johnny Paul Koroma's management of the government and the discord was such that he feared that attempts would be made on his life."13 that they needed to cooperate. In a subsequent radio communication with Bockarie, Gullit explained the logistical reasons for his lack of contact. Bockarie indicated that "he was very happy . . . that the two sides, both the RUF and the SLA, were brothers."14 The evidence cited shows that the so-called rift which erupted in April 1998 did not prevent the AFRC/RUF acting in concert in furtherance of their Common Purpose, after April 1998. We, therefore, find that the Trial Chamber erred in fact by giving undue weight to the alleged rift and failing to evaluate the entirety of the evidence which proves that the RUF and AFRC continued their JCE despite the rift.

7413. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 7 (p. 487): The Trial Chamber found that after the last combat operation between the RUF and AFRC when they jointly attacked ECOMOG at Sewafe Bridge in late April 1998, the common plan between the AFRC and RUF ceased to exist and that "each group thereafter had its own separate plan."15 It found that the AFRC's plan, hatched by SAJ Musa, was to launch an attack on Freetown for the purpose of reinstating the AFRC as the army of Sierra Leone,16 which plan according to the Trial Chamber, did not involve the RUF.17

7414. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 8 (p. 487): We consider that no reasonable trier of fact could have come to the conclusion that because SAJ Musa planned to "reinstate the army," that was evidence of termination of the Common Purpose between the AFRC and the RUF. On the contrary, the plan to reinstate the army is poignant evidence of the Common Purpose to take over the Sierra Leone Government. We say this for the simple reason that the mandate to create, let alone reinstate, the country's army belongs to the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone and no one else. In any event, assuming that SAJ Musa's plan was shared by other AFRC commanders, that is no reason to hold that the common purpose between the AFRC and the RUF ceased to exist. In fact, SAJ Musa's plan is clear proof of an act which was to be done in furtherance of the Common Purpose to regain power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, through the commission of crimes within the Statute.

7415. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 9 (p. 487): The Trial Chamber had found that the JCE between the AFRC and the RUF originated after the coup d'etat by the Sierra Leone Army on 27 May 1997, following which, coup leaders of the then recently formed AFRC contacted leaders of the RUF to arrange a joint 'government.' The Trial Chamber further found that following the ECOMOG intervention of 14 February 1998 and "despite the change of circumstances following the retreat from Freetown after the ECOMOG intervention, the leading members of the AFRC and RUF maintained the common purpose to take power and control over Sierra Leone."18

7416. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 10 (p. 488): The Trial Chamber posited that "a common objective in itself is not enough to demonstrate that the plurality of persons acted in concert with each other, as different and independent groups may happen to share the same objectives."19 However, in the instant case, there is strong evidence of AFRC/RUF concerted action to achieve their common objective in furtherance of their Joint Criminal Enterprise. After Gullit and his troops departed from Kono District in late April 1998, they travelled to Kurubola in Koinadugu District. SAJ Musa advised Gullit to establish an AFRC defensive base in Bombali District. Gullit accordingly led his group of AFRC fighters from Mansofinia across Bombali District to Rosos. "A small number of RUF fighters also formed part of the group and were subordinate to Gullit's command."20

7417. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 11 (p. 488): This concerted action of the AFRC/RUF continued unabated as can be seen from the following finding of the Trial Chamber:

> The AFRC troops under Gullit's command committed numerous atrocities against civilians in their destructive march across Bombali District. Villages near Bunbuna and the border of Bombali and Koinadugu Districts were razed by fire; civilians at multiple villages including Kamagbengbe and Foroh Loko were killed; the town of Karina was attacked and civilians were massacred, abducted and subjected to amputations. Homes were also looted and burned. Amputations were carried out near Gbendembu and crimes of equal savagery were committed in other locations. Upon arrival at Rosos, Gullit declared that no civilians were to be permitted within 15 miles of the camp and that any civilians captured nearby was to be executed.21

Although a rift erupted between certain commanders of both factions in late April 1998, such storm in a teacup does not detract from the compelling evidence, accepted by the Trial Chamber, that the two forces continued to communicate and to cooperate in furtherance of the shared common purpose. We opine that the decisive question as to whether the JCE continued after April 1998 in spite of the acknowledged RUF/AFRC peevishness is: Did the RUF and AFRC continue to work cooperatively in furtherance of the common purpose in spite of the fractiousness? There is, clearly, abundant evidence, referred to above, to merit an answer in the affirmative.

7418. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 12 (p. 488-489): We, therefore, do not agree with our learned colleagues in the Appeals Chamber who consider "reasonable" the Trial Chamber's finding that, from April 1998 until December 1998, the interaction between the two groups was "sporadic" and "occasional" and did not establish that the leadership of both groups continued to act in concert.22 The Trial Judgment makes it clear that the only period when the absence of cooperation and communication between the two forces may be regarded as significant spanned from the time Gullit and his forces departed from Kono in late April/May 1998 until the time they reached Rosos sometime in July or August 1998.23 Yet, even at that time, the Trial Chamber found that during the march from Mansofinia to Rosos, Gullit's radio operator was captured and the microphone for their radio was lost, as a result of which "Gullit's group was . . . not in direct communication with SAJ Musa or the RUF High Command until they reached Rosos sometime in July or August 1998."24

7419. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 13 (p. 489): The Trial Chamber further stated that "[a]t about this time, Gullit also communicated with Sesay and Kallon on the radio."25 These findings lead to the only reasonable conclusion that, even during the period when the tension between the two forces was at its peak – from the AFRC's departure from Kono and their march from Mansofinia to Rosos – the AFRC forces still intended to communicate and did communicate with the RUF as soon as the logistics so permitted. Furthermore, when Gullit's troops abandoned Rosos, due to bombardments by ECOMOG forces, they proceeded to Major Eddie Town, where Gullit communicated with AFRC and RUF Commanders.26

7420. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 14 (p. 489-490): The Trial Chamber found that in late August 1998, at the joint training base in Koinadugu, Bockarie ordered that a group of four radio operators be dispatched from Kono to join Gullit's fighting force as informants, in order to ensure that the RUF High Command was apprised of Gullit's movements and intentions.27 Addressing the Prosecution's submission challenging the Trial Chamber's finding that the radio operators were only sent as "informants" rather than to reinforce the RUF/AFRC fighting forces in Rosos,28 the Majority considered that "the Prosecution's assertion . . . is not inconsistent with the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie sent the radio operators to act as informants."29 The Majority stated that "none of the evidence cited by the Prosecution contradicts the Trial Chamber's finding, but only establishes that radio operators were sent to Gullit via SAJ Musa in Koinadugu in response to a request from Gullit."30 Even if, arguendo, it is accepted that the radio operators were sent as informants only, and not as reinforcements, is that not direct and conclusive evidence that those Commanders of the AFRC and RUF were working in concert in furtherance of their common purpose as at late August 1998?

7421. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 15 (p. 490): With respect, the Majority unwittingly glosses over the issue by merely stating that the Prosecution's submission does not contradict the Trial Chamber's finding that radio operators were sent as informants. The critical issue is whether the JCE was being continued by sending radio operators with the aim of ensuring that the AFRC/RUF's forces in Rosos would ultimately be reinforced. The evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber supports this view.31 The impugned Trial Chamber's finding is, in any event, evidence which confirms interactions between Gullit's troops and RUF High Command up to the time SAJ Musa arrived at Major Edie Town.32

7422. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 16 (p. 490): The Trial Chamber's findings further reveal some more significant interaction and cooperation between AFRC and RUF High Commands during the attack on Freetown on 6 January 1999. The evidence discloses that in the heat of the Freetown attack and during the retreat from Freetown, Gullit (AFRC) was in regular contact with Bockarie (RUF), informing the latter of the advance of his troops and requesting RUF reinforcement which Bockarie agreed to send from Makeni.33 The Trial Chamber found that Bockarie agreed to send reinforcements;34 that he made a public announcement on Radio France Internationale, in the afternoon of 6 January 1999, that Gullit's troops had captured Freetown and would continue to defend it.35 Further, that Bockarie and Gullit "arranged that AFRC fighters would meet the RUF reinforcements at a factory near Wellington."36 The Trial Chamber highlighted Bockarie's order that strategic positions, including Government buildings, be burned37 and also the advice from Bockarie to Gullit that if ECOMOG forced them to retreat further, the troops should burn the central part of Freetown.38

7423. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 17 (p. 490-491): Many instances of nauseating and barbaric atrocities committed by the RUF and AFRC Forces during their retreat from Freetown in January 1999 are catalogued in the Trial Chamber's findings. Understandably, we will refer to the bare minimum: "According to witness George Johnson, AFRC Commander Five-Five [Santigie Borbor Kanu] issued an order to commit 200 civilian amputations and to send the amputees to the Government. Several witnesses testified that rebels asked civilians whether they wanted 'short sleeves' or 'long sleeves' and their arms were amputated either at the elbow or at the wrist accordingly. Rebels were also known to amputate four fingers, leaving only the thumb, which they referred to as 'one love' and which they encouraged the victims to show to Tejan Kabbah."39

7424. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 19 (p. 491): State House did not escape the carnage. The Trial Chamber found that "approximately 30 persons were killed by the rebels at State House. On January 6, 1999, the rebels took women to State House where they were raped. Each of the senior Commanders and many of the troops had captured women at their disposal."41 We will cite one more instance of this sickening and sordid episode: "TF1-093, a former RUF fighter, had been living with her brother and her child in Freetown since 1998. On January 6 1999, TF1-093's brother was shot and killed . . . [A] named Commander, who recognised her . . . gave TF1-093 command of a group of over 50 men, women and children, all of whom were armed with knives and had been instructed to kill civilians. TF1-093 and the fighters under her command burned houses and killed and raped civilians . . . They killed more than 20 people, not including those that were caught inside burning houses."42 We opine that these findings would lead a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that Bockarie (RUF) and Gullit (AFRC) continued to act in concert in January 1999 and that the RUF and AFRC shared the common purpose to regain power in Sierra Leone through the commission of crimes within the Statute.

7425. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 20 (p. 491-492): Finally, the Trial Chamber found that "after the retreat from Freetown, Sesay chaired a meeting of AFRC and RUF Commanders including Kallon, Rambo and Superman at which the two groups planned to cooperate in a second attack on Freetown. This second attack failed."43 It is therefore, quite clear to us, that having regard to all the evidence to which we have referred, the only reasonable conclusion is that the two forces continued to share the same Common Purpose.

7426. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 21 (p. 492): The Prosecution listed the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the attack on the civilian population and the crimes of burning, looting, forced recruitment and forced labour44 and submitted that the pattern of atrocities committed by the AFRC and RUF in obedience to Bockarie's order show that "it was intended that the means used to achieve the goals of capturing Freetown and controlling the seat of power continued to include the same criminal means."45 The Majority found the Prosecution's submissions on the continuing pattern of crimes "not particularly probative"46 and that the Prosecution's reference to "the fact that each group individually continued to commit the crime that constituted the criminal means of the prior shared criminal purpose" is "misplaced, as those facts are consistent with the Trial Chamber's reasoning and conclusion."47 We beg to disagree.

7427. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 22 (p. 492): It is quite clear to us - and it makes good sense - that the Prosecution's reference to the continued pattern of crimes is most relevant in assessing whether a common purpose continued to exist between the AFRC and the RUF after April, 1998. In determining whether a common purpose continued to exist after the ECOMOG Intervention of 14 February 1998, the Trial Chamber found "that the common purpose and the means contemplated within remained the same as they were, as there was no fundamental change".48 We endorse this finding.

7428. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 23 (p. 492-493): In assessing whether the AFRC/RUF directed a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population within the meaning of Article 2 of the Statute, the Trial Chamber found the attack on the civilian population from February 1998 until the end of January 2000 involved a series of large-scale concerted military actions undertaken by the AFRC/RUF forces in multiple locations throughout Sierra Leone. Further, it found that the enslavement and 'forced marriages' of civilians in Kailahun District persisted as before, and these practices spread to Kono District, Bombali District, Koinadugu District, Freetown and the Western Area and Port Loko District.49

7429. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 24 (p. 493): The Trial Chamber also found that: "in addition to ongoing forced labour in Kenema and Kailahun Districts, the attack against the civilian population of Sierra Leone continued throughout other parts of the country between February 1998 and January 2000."50 It further found "that during the January 1999 invasion of Freetown, rebel troops were ordered by their leaders to burn public and private property and to kill and maim civilians."51 The Trial Chamber was satisfied "that the widespread violence against civilians was organised. The evidence contains multiple examples of operations staged by AFRC/RUF forces pursuant to preconceived plans or policies which were given particular names and directed at specific objectives … 'Operation Pay Yourself' ... was instituted by AFRC/RUF Commanders who, unable to pay their troops encouraged the looting of civilian property. The Fiti-Fata mission in August 1998 and the RUF attack to recapture Kono District in December 1998 saw numerous atrocities committed against civilians."52

7430. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 25 (p. 493): We list these findings for the simple reason that it follows, logically and conclusively, that the Trial Chamber's findings made in respect of the chapeau requirements of crimes against humanity are equally important and relevant to the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the JCE. The Appeals Chamber is also of the view that the widespread and systematic nature of various crimes is a relevant factor in the determination of whether a JCE exists.53

7431. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 26 (p.4 93): Therefore, we opine that having regard to the crimes committed by the AFRC and the RUF after late April 1998 throughout Sierra Leone, taking into account the modus operandi of the various attacks against the civilian population, and noting the widespread and systematic nature of those attacks, all these factors point, like a gun, in one direction and one direction only: that the criminal means of the Common Purpose that the Trial Chamber found to exist from May 1997 to late April 1998 continued until February, 1999, at the least. In the circumstances, we find that the only conclusion open to a reasonable trier of fact is that the AFRC and the RUF after April 1998, continued to contemplate the commission of crimes within the Statute for the purpose of achieving their common plan to regain power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas.

7432. Dissents – Justice Kamanda and Justice King, para. 27 (p. 494): In the light of the above considerations, we find that a reasonable trier of fact would have concluded that the AFRC/RUF Joint Criminal Enterprise which the Trial Chamber found to have existed from May 1997 to late April 1998, when the Trial Chamber held it ceased to exist, did in fact continue to exist until at least February 1999, during which period the AFRC and RUF shared a common purpose which contemplated the commission of crimes within the Statute. We, therefore, grant the Prosecution's First Ground of Appeal.

g. JCE – categories of JCE and mens rea

7433. para. 467: The Trial Chamber found that "the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 were within the [JCE] and intended by the participants to further the common purpose."1199 As previously noted, the Common Criminal Purpose found by the Trial Chamber consisted of the non-criminal objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as means of achieving that objective.1200 It further held that mid- and low-level RUF and AFRC Commanders and rank-and-file fighters were used by JCE members to commit crimes that "were either intended by the members to further the common purpose, or were a natural and foreseeable consequence of the implementation of the common purpose."1201 The Trial Chamber held that it would not consider the Appellant's liability pursuant to JCE 2.1202

7434. para. 468: The Trial Chamber concluded that Kallon "shared with the other participants in the [JCE] the requisite intent to commit" the crimes in Bo, Kenema, Kono and Kailahun Districts.1203 In terms of Gbao's mens rea, the Trial Chamber found that he did not intend the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts as a means of achieving the Common Criminal Purpose.1204 Instead, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew that the crimes in these Districts were being committed by RUF fighters, continued to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose of the joint criminal enterprise,1205 and "willingly took the risk that the crimes charged and proved … might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise or persons under their control."1206 The Trial Chamber found that Gbao shared with the other JCE members the intent to commit the crimes in Kailahun District.1207

7435. para. 474: The actus reus is essentially common to all three categories of JCE.1231 What primarily distinguishes them from each other is the mens rea required.1232 As found by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Tadić:1233

> With regard to the first category, what is required is the intent to perpetrate a certain crime (this being the shared intent on the part of all co-perpetrators). ["JCE 1"] With regard to the second category (which … is really a variant of the first), personal knowledge of the system of ill-treatment is required (whether proved by express testimony or a matter of reasonable inference from the accused's position of authority), as well as the intent to further this common concerted system of ill-treatment. ["JCE 2"] With regard to the third category, what is required is the intention to participate in and further the criminal activity or the criminal purpose of a group and to contribute to the joint criminal enterprise or in any event to the commission of a crime by the group. In addition, responsibility for a crime other than the one agreed upon in the common plan arises only if, under the circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk.1234 ["JCE 3"]

7436. para. 475: At issue here are primarily the mens rea elements for JCE 1 and JCE 3. Under JCE 1, also known as the "basic" form of JCE, liability attaches where the accused intended the commission of the crime in question and intended to participate in a common plan aimed at its commission.1235 In other words, JCE 1 liability attaches to crimes within the common criminal purpose.1236 By contrast, JCE 3 liability attaches to crimes which are not part of the common criminal purpose.1237 That is why it is often referred to as the "extended" form of JCE.1238 However, before an accused person can incur JCE 3 liability, he must be shown to have possessed "the intention to participate in and further the criminal activity or the criminal purpose of a group."1239 Therefore, both JCE 1 and JCE 3 require the existence of a common criminal purpose which must be shared by the members of the JCE, including in particular the accused.1240 Where that initial requirement is met, JCE 3 liability can attach to crimes outside the common criminal purpose committed by members of the JCE or by non-JCE perpetrators used by members of the JCE if it was reasonably foreseeable to the accused that a crime outside the common criminal purpose might be perpetrated by other members of the group in the execution of the common criminal purpose and that the accused willingly took that risk *(dolus eventualis).*1241

7437. para. 476: The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by Kallon's submissions that the Trial Chamber failed to find whether JCE 1 or JCE 3 liability applied in respect of the crimes and that it instead made its finding in the alternative, that crimes were either within or a foreseeable consequence of the JCE.1242

7438. para. 477: The question of which category of JCE applies depends first and foremost on the particular mens rea of the accused. Before turning to the Appellants' mens rea, the Trial Chamber found that non-JCE perpetrators were used by JCE members to commit crimes "that were either intended by the members to further the common purpose, or were a natural and foreseeable consequence of the implementation of the common purpose."1243 Whether this alternative finding was in error is of no consequence because on the critical question of whether Kallon possessed the mens rea required for either of the JCE categories the Trial Chamber's findings are unequivocal. In particular, it found that Kallon intended all the crimes for which he incurred JCE liability, thereby finding him liable under JCE 1.1244

7439. para. 478: Kallon's additional argument that the Trial Chamber erroneously convicted him under JCE 2 is also without merit.1245 He references only two findings in support, which state that after "Operation Pay Yourself was announced "looting was a systemic feature of AFRC and RUF operations"1246 and that criminal conduct was initiated pursuant to a "deliberate policy" by the Supreme Council.1247 These two findings are wholly insufficient to show that the Trial Chamber departed from its express holding that it would not consider the Appellants' liability under JCE 2.1248

7440. para. 480: Justices Winter and Fisher dissent from the Majority's holdings in relation to Gbao's sub-grounds 8(j) and 8(k).

7441. para. 481: In answering this question, it is pertinent to recall that apart from Ground 8, Gbao filed a further 19 so-called "sub-grounds," 8(a) to 8(s), of which sub-grounds 8(j) and 8(k) that we are now considering, are a part.

Ground 8 reads: The Majority of the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in finding the existence of a Joint Criminal Enterprise and in finding Gbao a member of the Joint Criminal Enterprise.

Sub-grounds 8(j) and (k) read:

8(j): The Majority of the Trial Chamber erred in fact by finding Gbao individually criminally responsible using the mens rea standard under the extended form in attributing individual responsibility.

8(k): Gbao did not share the intent with other members of the Joint Criminal Enterprise in Bo, Kenema and Kono.

The three purported grounds are obviously vague, disjointed, imprecise and unclear. They do not fulfil the minimum and basic requirements of pleading Grounds of Appeal which the Appeals Chamber has highlighted, inter alia, in paragraphs 31 and 32 supra. The appellant has not provided any details of the alleged error of law and/or of fact and has not even attempted to state how the alleged error of fact occasioned a miscarriage of justice. The Appeals Chamber would be fully justified in summarily dismissing the grounds were it not for the fact that it is opportune for the Chamber to adumbrate on the developing concept of Joint Criminal Enterprise liability in International Humanitarian Law.

7442. para. 482: In support of Ground 8(j) Gbao states in paragraph 144 of his Appeal Brief: "The Majority of the Trial Chamber erred in fact by finding Gbao individually criminally responsible as a member of the joint criminal enterprise by using the extended JCE mens rea against him in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts when all crimes found to be part of the JCE were found to have been committed pursuant to the first form of JCE." He cites paragraph 1985 of the Trial Judgement in support. A perusal of the whole paragraph shows that the Trial Chamber made no such finding. Paragraph 1985 states:

> The Chamber finds that during the Junta regime, high ranking AFRC and RUF members shared a common plan which was to take any action necessary to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas. The Chamber finds that crimes were contemplated by the participants of the joint criminal enterprise to be within the common purpose. The Chamber further finds that the AFRC/RUF forces targeted civilians in a widespread and systematic attack designed to terrorise the population into submission through collective punishment, unlawful killings, sexual violence and physical violence. In addition the joint AFRC/RUF forces continued to rely on forced labour of civilians to generate revenue, used children under the age of 15 years as fighters and generally accepted pillage as a means to gratify the fighters.

Nowhere in that paragraph did the Majority of the Trial Chamber make the finding alleged by Gbao. It is not proper for Gbao to put words into the mouth of the Trial Chamber for the apparent purpose of manufacturing a case that bears no semblance to reality. The Ground is without merit and the Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, dismisses it in this short shrift.

7443. para. 483: However, taking the opportunity to adumbrate on JCE, the Appeals Chamber recalls that it has held that pleading the basic and extended forms of JCE in the alternative is now a well-established practice of International criminal tribunals.1249 In the basic and systemic categories of JCE, all members of the JCE may be found criminally liable for all crimes committed that fall within the common design. The extended form of JCE involves criminal acts that fall outside the common design. An Accused who intends to participate in a common design may be found guilty of acts outside that design if such acts are a "natural and foreseeable consequence of the effecting of that criminal purpose."1250

7444. para. 484: The trial Chamber found > that following the 25 May 1997 coup, high ranking AFRC members and the RUF leadership agreed to form a joint 'government' in order to control the territory of Sierra Leone. The Chamber considers that such an objective in and of itself is not criminal and therefore does not amount to a common purpose within the meaning of the law of joint criminal enterprise pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute. However, where the taking of power and control over State territory is intended to be implemented through the commission of crimes within the Statute, this may amount to a common criminal purpose.1251

We opine that this is a correct statement of the law.

7445. para. 485: The Trial Chamber defined the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE as consisting of the objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as the means of achieving that objective.1252 The Trial Chamber further found that Gbao was "a participant" in the JCE.1253 The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, considers that in consequence Gbao, as with the other participants of the JCE, would be liable for all crimes which were a natural and foreseeable consequence of putting into effect that criminal purpose.

7446. para. 486: In paragraph 1990 of the Trial Judgment, the Trial Chamber found that the RUF, including in particular Sesay, Kallon, Sankoh, Bockarie, Superman, Eldred Collins, Mike Lamin, Isaac Mongor, Gibril Massaquoi and other RUF Commanders began working in concert with the AFRC, including at least Johnny Paul Koromah, Alex Tamba Brima, Bazzy Kamara, Santigie Borbor Klanu, SAJ Musa Zagalo, Eddie Kanneh and others to hold power in Sierra Leone on or shortly after 25 May 1997. The Majority found that Gbao was a participant in the JCE. As stated in paragraph 1985, Gbao shared the common plan which was to take any action necessary to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and that Gbao contemplated the commission of crimes.

7447. para. 487: The Trial Chamber further found, with respect to Gbao, that

> The Accused person does not need to have been present at the time of the crime.[1254] Therefore, the distance of Gbao to many of the crimes is not a reason for denying his participation under the basic form. What matters is that he intended or that it was foreseeable that he would further the joint criminal enterprise.1255

7448. para. 488: As to the crimes in Bo District, the Trial Chamber found in paragraph 2040 of the Trial Judgment that > Gbao did not share the intent of the principal perpetrators to commit the crimes committed against civilians under Counts 3 t o 5 (unlawful killings), and Count 14 (pillage) in Bo District in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise.

It is important to note here that the 'principal perpetrators' are those persons who personally and physically committed the crimes alleged and may be persons who are not members of the joint criminal enterprise.

7449. para. 489: Further in regard to the crimes in Bo District, the Trial Chamber concluded in paragraph 2048 of the Trial Judgment that although Gbao did not share the intent of the principal perpetrators as aforesaid,

> [T]he Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that Gbao willingly took the risk that the crimes charged and proved under unlawful killings (Count 3 to 5) and pillage (Count 14), which he did not intend as a means of achieving the common purpose, might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise or persons under their control.

7450. para. 490: In respect of the crimes committed in Kenema District, the Trial Chamber found in paragraph 2060 of the Trial Judgment that

> [T]he Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that Gbao willingly took the risk that the crimes charged and proved under Counts 3 to 5 (unlawful killings), Count 11 (physical violence) and Count 13 (enslavement) which he did not intend as a means of achieving the common purpose, might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise or persons under their control.

7451. para. 491: Finally, with regard to the crimes committed in Kono District, the Trial Chamber held in paragraph 2109 of the Trial Judgment that

> [T]he Prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that Gbao willingly took the risk that the crimes charged and proved under Counts 3 to 5, 6 to 9, 10 and 11, 13 and 14 which he did not intend as a means of achieving the common purpose, might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise or persons under their control. (Emphasis supplied)

7452. para. 492: The Appeals Chamber holds that so long as Gbao agreed to the Common Criminal Purpose and was, therefore, a member of the JCE as the Trial Chamber found,1256 he is responsible for all crimes that he either intended, or were naturally foreseeable would be committed by members of the JCE or persons under their control. This is consistent with the pleading of the crimes in the Indictment (which must be read in its entirety) and which pleaded each of the crimes in Counts 1 to 14 as either within the JCE or as a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the JCE.1257

7453. para. 493: The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Prosecution's submission during the Appeal Hearing that Gbao "shared the intent for the crimes to be committed in Kailahun District, so he was a participant in the joint criminal enterprise."1258 Gbao it must be recalled was at all material times the senior RUF Commander stationed in Kailahun. It follows that, since Gbao was a member of the JCE, so long as it was reasonably foreseeable that some of the members of the JCE or persons under their control would commit crimes, Gbao would be criminally liable for the commission of those crimes.1259 As the Trial Chamber found that the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts, which were within the Common Criminal Purpose, were reasonably foreseeable, it follows that the Trial Chamber did not err. Gbao's Ground 8 is accordingly dismissed.

7454. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 4 (p. 512-513): As a preliminary matter, I disagree with the Majority that Gbao's Grounds 8(j) and (k) are "vague, disjointed, imprecise and unclear," nor do I agree that these grounds "do not fulfil the minimum basic requirements of pleading Grounds of Appeal."3 Gbao clearly sets forth his arguments under these grounds in his Notice of Appeal,4 and fully develops them in his Appeal Brief,5 citing the applicable law and the Trial Chamber's findings, explaining the precise legal error and how that error invalidates his convictions. Moreover, given that the Parties and the Appeals Chamber extensively discussed these arguments during the Appeal Hearing, I do not consider that they could be subject to summary dismissal.

7455. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 5 (p. 513): Gbao contests the Trial Chamber's finding that he could be held liable under JCE for crimes that he did not intend but which the Trial Chamber found were within the Common Criminal Purpose. He takes exception to his conviction for these crimes based on the Trial Chamber's conclusion that he "willingly took the risk" that these crimes might be committed.6 The Majority finds no error in the Trial Chamber's conclusion.

7456. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 6 (p. 513): A shared common criminal purpose is the foundation of all JCE liability, under any "form" of JCE recognized in customary international law. By eliminating the requirement for a shared common criminal purpose, the Trial Chamber and Majority dangerously expand the scope of potential JCE liability beyond the limits allowed by law.

7457. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 7 (p. 513): JCE is not a crime in itself, nor is JCE liability for membership in an organisation. Instead, JCE is a mode of attaching liability for a crime under the Statute.7 Where it attaches, the accused is responsible for committing that crime.8

7458. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 8 (p. 513-514): I am in complete agreement with the general statements of the law on JCE set out in our Appeal Judgment in section V.E.3(a), paragraphs, 474 and 475. We also rightly note in the Judgment that JCE 2 is not at issue in the instant case.9 In particular, we hold that "both JCE 1 and JCE 3 require the existence of a common criminal purpose which must be shared by the members of the JCE, including in particular the accused.10" In other words, before arriving at the question of whether the accused may incur JCE liability for reasonably foreseeable crimes committed beyond the scope of the common criminal purpose, a trier of fact must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused shared the intent to commit the crimes within the common criminal purpose.11 JCE 3 therefore cannot attach without first finding all the elements of JCE 1.

7459. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 9 (p. 514): It follows from this section of our Appeal Judgment, consistent with JCE as customary international law, that liability under both JCE 1 and JCE 3 requires, among other things, that the accused possess "the same criminal intention" as the other participants in the JCE – that he shares the common criminal purpose with them.12 Where he shares that intent, all other elements met, he incurs JCE 3 liability for crimes which he does not intend, but which are reasonably foreseeable to him if he willingly takes the risk that they may be committed in the implementation of the crimes that he does intend as part of the common criminal purpose.13

7460. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 10 (p. 514): It is therefore crucial to define the common criminal purpose in order to ascertain the accused's liability pursuant to a JCE. In particular, the trier of fact must establish which crime or crimes under the Statute of the Special Court the alleged plurality of persons in the JCE shared the intent to commit.14 Additionally, it must > specify the common criminal purpose in terms of both the criminal goal intended and its scope (for example, the temporal and geographic limits of this goal, and the general identities of the intended victims) [and] make a finding that this criminal purpose is not merely the same, but also common to all of the persons acting together within a joint criminal enterprise.15

7461. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 11 (p. 515): Once the scope of the common criminal purpose shared by the participants has been established, the trier of fact must be satisfied that the accused, too, shares "the same criminal intention" as the other participants.16 Accordingly, he must intend the full extent of the shared common criminal purpose, both in terms of the crimes intended and the geographical area covered by the JCE. Where this is established, and the other elements of JCE liability are met, customary international law attaches criminal responsibility to the accused not only for his own actions, but also for the actions of his fellow JCE members that further the commonly intended crimes (JCE 1) or that are reasonably foreseeable consequences of carrying out the commonly intended crimes (JCE 3).17 Conversely, if the accused did not intend those crimes to begin with, neither form of JCE liability can arise.

7462. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 12 (p. 515): The judgment of the Appeals Chamber reflects that we unanimously find that the common criminal purpose established by the Trial Chamber in the present case was:

> [T]he objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as means of achieving that objective ("Common Criminal Purpose").18

7463. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 13 (p. 515): The statutory crimes within the Common Criminal Purpose were thus the criminal acts described under Counts 1 to 14 in the Indictment. The geographical scope of the Common Criminal Purpose was the territory of Sierra Leone, though the crimes for which the Appellants were convicted were committed in Bo, Kenema, Kono and Kailahun Districts.

7464. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 14 (p. 515-516): Where I first differ from the Majority is in the recognition of what I believe to be the fatal contradiction in the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Gbao was a "participant" in the JCE.19 While Gbao's "participation" in the JCE is a legal conclusion, requiring proof beyond reasonable doubt that Gbao had the requisite mens rea and actus reus, the Trial Chamber's finding that Gbao was a "participant" is unsupported by any reference to the evidence. In fact, it is contradicted by the Trial Chamber's findings on his mens rea. In making its detailed findings on Gbao's "participation" in the Common Criminal Purpose,20 the Trial Chamber found that Gbao did not intend any of the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts as means of achieving the Common Criminal Purpose.21 He was found to have intended only the crimes committed in Kailahun District.22 In addition to being geographically distinct from the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono, the crimes in Kailahun did not even include all of the counts which formed the means of achieving the common objective, as acts of pillage (Count 14) was neither charged nor found to have been committed there.23

7465. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 15 (p. 516): By contrast, Sesay and Kallon, who were also found by the Trial Chamber to have been "participants" in the same JCE as Gbao, were found to have intended not only the crimes committed in Kailahun, but all the crimes in all four Districts at issue, including the acts of pillage under Count 14.24 Their intent thus is identical to the Common Criminal Purpose.

7466. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 16 (p. 516): The inescapable conclusion from the finding that Gbao did not intend the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts – a total of approximately 63 crime incidents, and, in addition, the continuous crimes of enslavement and forced marriage25 – is that Gbao did not share the "same criminal intention"26 as the other alleged participants in the Common Criminal Purpose. He cannot, therefore, be found to incur JCE liability.

7467. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 17 (p. 516-517): In affirming Gbao's convictions under JCE, the Majority adopts the Trial Chamber's circular reasoning, but compounds the Trial Chamber's error by collapsing the distinction between JCE 1 and JCE 3. The Majority reasons that it was sufficient for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Gbao was a "participant" in the JCE and therefore shared the Common Criminal Purpose.27 By virtue of that conclusion, the Majority reasons, he is responsible for all crimes by members of the JCE that either he intended or were reasonably foreseeable.28 Therefore, according to the Majority's reasoning, it matters not whether Gbao intended the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono;29 given that he was "a member of the JCE," he was liable for the commission of "the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts, which were within the Common Criminal Purpose," so long as it was "reasonably foreseeable that some of the members of the JCE or persons under their control would commit crimes."30

7468. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 18 (p. 517): This reasoning is not only circular, but dangerous. First, describing Gbao as a "participant" under this theory is mistaken because whether or not he was a "participant" is only significant if it means that he shared the common intent of the JCE, that is, the Common Criminal Purpose. The Trial Chamber's findings, unquestioned, and indeed quoted by the Majority, state unequivocally that he did not.31

7469. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 19 (p. 517): Second, the Majority collapses the distinction between the mens rea required for JCE 1 and the mens rea applicable to JCE 3 by holding that Gbao can be liable for crimes within the Common Criminal Purpose that he did not intend and that were only reasonably foreseeable to him. Such an extension of JCE liability blatantly violates the principle nullum crimen sine lege because it imposes criminal responsibility without legal support in customary international law applicable at the time of the commission of the offence. The Majority makes no effort to reason why it considers that this extension of JCE liability was part of the law to which Gbao was subject at the time these offences were committed and it fails to cite a single case in which this extension of liability is recognized as part of customary international law.

This dearth of jurisprudential support was acknowledged by the Prosecution which admitted at the Appeal Hearing that there "may be no authority" in international criminal law in which the mens rea element for JCE is characterized or applied as the Trial Chamber applied it to Gbao.32

7470. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 20 (p. 517): The primary justification suggested by the Majority for its radical departure from customary international law is that its conflation of JCE 1 and JCE 3 mens rea standards "is consistent with the pleading of the crimes in the Indictment."33 That an Indictment may plead in the alternative does not establish that there is no distinction between the forms of liability so pled. Also, whether the Indictment permissibly pleaded JCE is irrelevant as an evidentiary matter.

7471. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 21 (p. 517-518): The Majority further agrees with the Trial Chamber's finding that:

> Therefore, the distance of Gbao to many of the crimes is not a reason for denying his participation under the basic form. What matters is that he intended or that it was foreseeable to him that he would further the joint criminal enterprise.34

"Basic form" is used in the jurisprudence to mean JCE 1.35 The Trial Chamber's pronouncement on the law here is wrong, and the Majority's agreement is therefore misplaced. The distance of an accused to the crimes may of course be a relevant evidentiary consideration in determining whether the necessary mens rea and actus reus for JCE liability are established. More critically, the Trial Chamber's reference to a foreseeability standard with respect to JCE 1 is plainly erroneous,36 as is the conflation of the actus reus and mens rea elements in the holding that it must be "foreseeable" to the accused that he "would further" the JCE.

7472. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 22 (p. 518): Finally, in a perplexingly contradictory and unexplained pronouncement, the Majority expresses its agreement with the Prosecution's position at the Appeal Hearing that Gbao "shared the intent for the crimes to be committed in Kailahun District, so he was a participant in the joint criminal enterprise."37 As an initial matter, this position is contrary to the Majority's own reasoning, as it envisages a common criminal purpose different from that found by the Trial Chamber and confirmed unanimously on appeal. That different "subsidiary" common criminal purpose is limited solely to Kailahun District and excludes acts of pillage (Count 14), as no such crimes were committed there.

7473. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 23 (p. 518): If in fact the Majority accepts the position of the Prosecution that the shared intent for commission of the crimes committed in Kailahun describes the common criminal purpose of the JCE, then Gbao would presumably have been liable under JCE 1 for the crimes in Kailahun District, and liable under JCE 3 for the crimes in other Districts. However, such a limited, "subsidiary" JCE was neither sufficiently pleaded in the Indictment nor found by the Trial Chamber. Nor did the Trial Chamber make any findings that the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono were reasonably foreseeable by Gbao as a consequence of the implementation of that "subsidiary" JCE, (as opposed to the country-wide JCE found by the Trial Chamber.) This theory therefore finds no support in the pleadings or the evidence.

7474. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 24 (p. 518-519): The only JCE pleaded, established and upheld in this case had as its Common Criminal Purpose to control the territory of Sierra Leone through the commission of the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14.38 Gbao either shared the intent of this criminal purpose – both in terms of the type of crimes and the geographical scope it encompassed – or he did not.

7475. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 25 (p. 519): It remains unclear what common criminal purpose, in the Majority's mind, Gbao did share. It purports to hold that Gbao shared the Common Criminal Purpose that the Trial Chamber found established on the evidence.39 But as explained, that was a legal impossibility, given that the evidence showed that he did not share the intent of the other "participants" in the JCE. The Majority has not articulated, any alternative common criminal purpose which Gbao shared. Yet it convicts him pursuant to JCE liability. That conviction was neither in accordance with the law nor the facts as found by the Trial Chamber and upheld on appeal.

7476. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 26 (p. 519): The Trial Chamber's error with respect to Gbao's mens rea is not simply a harmless mistake that can be rectified or overlooked on appeal. Rather, because of this error, the entire legal edifice the Trial Chamber and Majority have constructed for Gbao's JCE liability is so fundamentally flawed that those convictions which rest upon it collapse.

7477. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 27 (p. 519): The Trial Chamber found that Gbao did not share the Common Criminal Purpose. Its decision, upheld by the Majority, to nonetheless convict Gbao under JCE absent the crucial element of shared criminal intent constitutes a legal error which invalidates Gbao's conviction under JCE.

7478. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 28 (p. 519): I therefore would grant Gbao's Grounds 8(j) and (k). Although Gbao formally only requests his JCE convictions to be reversed in respect of Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts, the critical submission in these grounds of appeal is that he was not part of the JCE at all. As that submission in my opinion succeeds, there is no basis on which the Trial Chamber was permitted to convict Gbao under the JCE mode of liability for any of the crimes in the four Districts. I further note that the elimination of Gbao as a participant in the JCE might have implications for the scope of his co-accused's JCE liability for crimes in Kailahun.

7479. Dissent – Justice Winter, para. 5 (p. 482): In addition to this clarification, I also wish to express my complete agreement with the reasoning and conclusions expressed by Hon. Justice Fisher in her Partially Dissenting and Concurring Opinion insofar as it pertains to Gbao's Sub-Grounds 8(j) and 8(k), Gbao's Sub-Ground 8(i), Sesay's Grounds 33 and 46, and her opinion regarding the failure to plead locations with sufficient specificity. In particular, I join her dissent from the Majority's decision to confirm Gbao's conviction under JCE liability, given the Trial Chamber's findings that he did not share the Common Criminal Purpose with the other participants in the case before us.

7480. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 22 (p. 501): I opine that the finding that in respect of crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts, Gbao did not share the intent of "principal perpetrators" to commit the crimes committed against civilians in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise under the stated Counts cannot lead, reasonably, to a conclusion that he was not a member of the JCE, unless the JCE is compartmentalized by District; contrary to the Prosecution's case. On the Indictment the JCE was not presented as a conglomeration of district-based joint common enterprises; but as a single joint criminal enterprise that was nationwide. Besides, Gbao did not need to share the intent of the 'principal perpetrators' who, themselves, did not need to have been members of the JCE.33 However, he needed to share the requisite intent with the other participants. This case turns, therefore, partially on the requisite intent.

7481. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 23 (p. 501-502): "Principal perpetrators" are the actual physical perpetrators of the crime, or those who performed the actus reus of the crime. As was observed by Judge Bonomy in the Decision on Odjanics Motion Challenging Jurisdiction: "Factual scenarios in cases before the Tribunal are rarely such that all persons involved in perpetration of the crimes pursuant to a JCE can be found to be participants in that particular JCE."34 In this case the Trial Chamber found that "non-members who committed crimes were sufficiently closely connected to one or more members of the joint criminal enterprise acting in furtherance of the common purpose that such crimes can properly be imputed to all members of the joint criminal enterprise when other conditions of liability are fulfilled."35

7482. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 24 (p. 502): The imposition of liability upon an accused for his participation intended to further a common criminal purpose does not require an understanding or an agreement between the accused and the principal perpetrator of the crime to commit the particular crime.36 It follows that a shared intention between Gbao and the principal perpetrators, who may not be members of the JCE, is not the shared intention envisaged in stating the JCE principles; even though the intent of the principal perpetrators may be relevant in determining whether the crime committed by them is within the common purpose or not. In the result, not much weight needs be attributed to the finding by the Trial Chamber that Gbao did not share the intent of the principal perpetrators in determining his participation in the JCE. It is noted that the ICTY Appeal Chamber held in Brdanin that:

> as far as the basic form of JCE is concerned, an essential requirement in order to impute to any accused member of the JCE liability for a crime committed by another person is that the crime in question forms part of the common criminal purpose. In cases where the principal perpetrator shares that common criminal purpose of the JCE or, in other words, is a member of the JCE, and commits a crime in furtherance of the JCE, it is superfluous to require an additional agreement between that person and the accused to commit that particular crime.37

7483. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 25 (p. 502): For reasons that will be stated, presently; there is really no substance in the suggestion by Gbao that in the absence of a shared intention to use the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono District as means of achieving the common purpose, Gbao was not a member of the JCE. Such suggestion must have emanated from an unduly narrow interpretation of the applicable principles and a misconception of what constituted the JCE in this case. The applicable principles cannot be applied in this case as if the JCE is concerned with a one-transaction criminal activity like, for instance robbing a bank.

7486. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 28 (p. 503): It is recalled that Gbao's participation did not need to involve direct commission of crimes or presence at the time a crime was committed.38 The requisite shared intent that needs to be established in regard to Gbao's JCE liability is the shared intent on the part of all co-perpetrators to perpetrate crimes against humanity and war crimes charged in the Indictment. It is sufficient for a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furtherance of that common design.39 The requisite mental element is intent to pursue a common purpose.40

7490. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 32 (p. 504): The JCE principle expounded in Tadic is adequate to deal with these issues. It is to be recalled, however, that Tadic continues to be discussed in regard to some issues which, understandably, could not have been resolved in the case; understandably, issues determined in a case are essentially shaped and defined by the factual scenario of the case.42 It is also essential to the application of the principles to convert terms used when the case is about a simple one-event criminal activity (like killing a person) to suit cases, such as the present case, of a joint criminal enterprise that contemplates a widespread and systematic collective criminality. The "same criminal intention to kill" where killing is the common design of the JCE must be converted to the "same criminal intention to attack the civilian population" where that is the common design."

7493. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 35 (p. 505): There may arise situations, such as the present, in which one of the parties to the common criminal enterprise does not agree to some extent to the means; but nevertheless continues to participate in the enterprise with the foresight that the other members would use the means in furtherance of the common criminal enterprise. In such a case the other members would not be acting outside the common design but, rather, playing it out, as the party (Gbao in this case) foresaw they would within and in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise, fulfilling its shared intention.

7494. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 36 (p. 505-506): There are some authorities which, I presume, proceed from common-sense and reason, that an accused would be criminally responsible if he realises, (although he did not agree with the conduct being used) that a member of the criminal enterprise may commit a criminal act within the purpose of the enterprise with the requisite intent, but nevertheless continues to participate with the member in the criminal enterprise as that would be sufficient mental element for the accused to be guilty of the offence committed. In the decision of the High Court of Australia in McAuliffe v R48, reference was made to remarks made in *Chang Wing-Su v. The Queen*49 as being the correct principle accepted in some other decision. It was stated as follows:

> "If B realizes (without agreeing to such conduct being used) that A may kill or inflict serious injury, but nevertheless continues to participate with A in the venture, that will amount to a sufficient mental element for B to be guilty of murder if A, with the requisite intent, kills in the course of the venture."50

7495. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 37 (p. 506): It may not be inappropriate to refer also to the opinion of the High Court of Australia in McAuliffe51 as follows: "There was no occasion for the Court to turn its attention to the situation where one party foresees, but does not agree to, a crime other than that which is planned, and continues to participate in the venture. However, the secondary offender in that situation is as much a party to the crime which is an incident of the agreed venture as he is when the incidental crime falls within the common purpose." (Italics supplied)

7496. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 38 (p. 506): In regard to the third category, there would have been a common design to pursue one course of conduct, but one of the perpetrators commits an act which, while outside the common design, was nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of the common purpose.52 This category deals with a crime foreseen as incidental to the planned crime. An example of this is described in Tadic.53

7497. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 39 (p. 507): That a joint criminal enterprise may incorporate both basic and extended forms of the enterprise is illustrated by the example given in the Separate Opinion of Judge Hunt in Milutinovic.54

7498. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 40 (p. 507): In this case the three requirements that are common to the three categories of JCE are found by the Trial Chamber, namely: (i) a plurality of persons; (ii) the existence of a common purpose (or plan) which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided in the Statute, and (iii) the participation of the accused in the common purpose. It is instructive to recall that the plurality found by the Trial Chamber was not on a District by District basis; but a single plurality covering all the criminal activities of the JCE in Sierra Leone, including criminal activities in Kailahun where Gbao's activities were undertaken. The common purpose in this case, as pleaded and found, is expansive; it involves a criminal design that contemplates perpetration of numerous crimes on a large and nation-wide scale.

7499. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 41 (p. 507): The issues in regard to the sub-grounds now being considered, therefore, turn on the subjective elements of the first and third categories of JCE liability as expounded in the case law in light of the factual scenario in the case.

7500. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para .43 (p. 507): The question arose because the nub of the criminal responsibility imputed to Gbao is that he foresaw that crimes charged and proved which he did not intend as a means of achieving the common purpose, might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise or persons under their control, but willingly took the risk.55

7501. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 44 (p. 507-508): In this case Gbao foresaw that crimes charged and proved which he did not intend as a means of achieving the common purpose, might be committed by other members of the joint criminal enterprise (of which he is a participant) or persons under their control, but willingly took the risk by continuing to participate in the enterprise.56 The principle earlier referred to in *Chang Wing-Su v. The Queen*57 becomes readily persuasive in regard to him and becomes even more apposite when adapted and rendered thus: "If Gbao realizes (without agreeing to such conduct being used) that other members of the JCE may commit crimes as a means of achieving the common purpose of the JCE, but nevertheless continues to participate with the other members in the venture, that will amount to a sufficient mental element for Gbao to be criminally responsible as a member of the JCE if the other members, with the requisite intent, commits the crimes within the common criminal purpose in the course of the venture."

basic element of JCE when Gbao submits as follows: "The basic element of JCE, the common purpose, either has such crimes within it or as a reasonable and foreseeable consequence of it."58 A reasonable and foreseeable consequence of the common criminal purpose is that it will lead to widespread commission of the crimes charged without limitation as to Districts; as has happened. In the circumstances it is difficult to understand how he turns round to claim that there was a misplacement of mens rea standard by the Trial Chamber.

punishments, extermination, murder, violence to life etc, sexual slavery, other inhumane acts, outrages upon personal dignity committed in that District in furtherance of the common purpose of the JCE. There has been no suggestion that he withdrew from the JCE at any time, as was the case of SAJ Musa, formerly a participant of the JCE, who withdrew from the JCE in February 1998.59

7507. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 50 (p. 509): The complaint that the Trail Chamber used the extended JCE form mens rea standard against him lacks substance and is rejected.

7509. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 52 (p. 510): Earlier in this Opinion the issue has been discussed at some length. Enough has been said about the question of shared intent. The conclusion of the matter is that the submission made by Gbao that the findings by the Trial Chamber concerning his intent in regard to the crimes found committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono negate the findings as to his criminal responsibility on the basis of the JCE, is misconceived and untenable.

7511. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 54 (p. 510-511): Besides, it is expedient to reiterate that a close and holistic reading of the Trial Judgment does disclose that the Trial Chamber was emphatic in its findings in regard to Bo, Kenema and Kono that the three accused were acting in concert; and that non-members who committed crimes (described as principal participants) were sufficiently closely connected to one or more members of the JCE acting in furtherance of the common purpose that such crimes can properly be imputed to all members of the JCE when the other conditions of liability are fulfilled.61 There was no finding that any of the crimes went beyond the scope of the JCE.

7513. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 56 (p. 511): For these reasons, the submission that the mens rea element of JCE is not met is not tenable.

7514. Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola, para. 57 (p. 511): I agree with the conclusion arrived at by Justice Kamanda and Justice King contained in the body of the Appeal Judgment that Gbao's sub-grounds 8(j) and 8(k) be dismissed. Gbao's sub-ground 8(a) has earlier been allowed with the result that his role as an RUF Ideology Instructor is not taken into consideration in defining his role in the JCE or at all in consideration of the issues arising in regard to sub-grounds 8(j) and 8(k). The rest of the findings made by the Trial Chamber in regard to his role and contribution to the JCE without the finding that he was an Ideology Instructor are sufficient to support the conclusion that he is a member of the JCE.

7515. para. 650: As Sesay was convicted for the acts of terrorism in question under JCE 1 liability,1641 and as the Trial Chamber found that one or more members of the JCE used the non-members who carried out the actus reus to commit the crime of acts of terrorism,1642 his arguments turn on the initial proposition that the Trial Chamber was required to find that the non-members of the JCE who carried out the actus reus had the specific intent for those crimes.

7517. para. 652: Further, the Appeals Chamber agrees "that what matters in a first category JCE is not whether the person who carried out the actus reus of a particular crime is a member of the JCE, but whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose."1645 As persuasively explained by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, the persons who carry out the actus reus of the crime need not share the common purpose of the JCE in order for liability for their acts to attach to members of the JCE.1646 To the contrary, the primary question for the purposes of JCE liability is whether the acts of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes can be imputed to the members of the JCE.1647 So long as it is established that a member of the JCE used the non-member to commit a crime within the common purpose of the JCE, there is no need to show that the non-member intended to further the common purpose of the JCE or indeed even knew of that common purpose.1648

7518. para. 653: For the purposes of determining the liability of JCE members for the acts of non-members who carry out the actus reus of the crime, the critical inquiry is not the mens rea of the non-member, but rather the acts and mental state of the JCE member, who uses the non-member to commit a crime within and in furtherance of the common purpose.1649 As the mens rea element of JCE 1 liability relates solely to the shared intent of the members of the JCE, and as the persons who carry out the actus reus of the crime need not be members of the JCE, the mens rea of non-members who carry out the actus reus of the crime is not a legal element of JCE 1 liability.1650

7519. para. 654: The Appeals Chamber does not consider that the finding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Limaj et al., cited by Sesay, is relevant to the present issue, as the Appeals Chamber there was concerned with the scope of the common purpose as pleaded in the indictment, a distinct issue from the present question.1651

7521. para. 656: While the Trial Chamber did find that those who carried out the actus reus of the crime acted with the specific intent to spread terror,1652 such a finding is only relevant as a matter of evidence to the other findings that the Trial Chamber was required to make. The Appeals Chamber finds that Trial Chamber's alleged errors with respect to the mens rea of the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes,1653 even if accepted arguendo, would not render those findings unreasonable. Sesay challenges related to the mens rea of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes are dismissed.

7522. para. 657: Sesay further challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that Bockarie, as the perpetrator and member of the JCE, acted with the requisite mens rea for acts of terrorism. Sesay fails to show an error1654 in the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the killing of the man at the NIC Building.1655 Sesay neither explains how the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie acted with the requisite intent would be erroneous even if it were accepted that the victim was a Kamajor who was hors de combat, nor explains how Bockarie's desire to "do away with all the Kamajors"1656 is inconsistent with or renders unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding. This claim is therefore dismissed.

7523. para. 658: Sesay fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the beating of TF1-129 was committed with the specific intent to spread terror.1657 Contrary to Sesay's claim, the Trial Chamber did not need to find a "single, all-encompassing intention" among all those who participated in the beating of TF1-129,1658 as the Trial Chamber's findings show that it found that Sesay and Bockarie used those who carried out the beatings to commit the crime.1659 In particular, the Appeals Chamber notes the following findings: (i) Sesay ordered his bodyguard to molest TF1-129 during his arrest;1660 (ii) Sesay's bodyguard further injured TF1-129 when he was to be taken to the Secretariat building;1661 (iii) Sesay instructed a small boy to guard TF1-129 and kill him if he moved;1662 (iv) TF1-129 was beaten while being taken to Bockarie and Sesay;1663 (v) Bockarie and Sesay ordered TF1-129 to be taken to the "dungeon", and TF1-129 was beaten on the way to and from the "dungeon".1664

7524. para. 659: In addition, Sesay argues that there was no evidence that he sought to publicise the beating,1665 and that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding that he and Bockarie used the non- members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit an act of terrorism.1666 In this respect, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings that acts of terrorism were within the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE,1667 and therefore that the intent to commit acts of terrorism was shared by the members of the JCE, including Sesay and Bockarie. The Trial Chamber further found that the six acts of violence in Kenema Town,1668 including the beating of TF1-129, targeted prominent members of civil society and were publicised.1669 The Trial Chamber accordingly reasoned that the six acts of violence were "intended to illustrate the gruesome repercussions of collaborating or being perceived to collaborate with enemies of the RUF and so to terrorise and subdue the population," and therefore were committed with the specific intent to terrorise the civilian population.1670 The Appeals Chamber also recalls the Trial Chamber's finding "that during the conflict in Sierra Leone, the AFRC/RUF regularly killed civilians accused of being Kamajors as a deliberate strategy to terrorise the civilian population and prevent any support for their opponents."1671 Finally, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie targeted alleged Kamajors on a number of occasions1672 and publicly expressed his intent to target alleged Kamajors.1673

7525. para. 660: In light of the above findings, whether or not the Trial Chamber found that Sesay or others sought to publicise the beating directly, the Trial Chamber did find that TF1-129 was targeted because he was considered to be prominent1674 and a "chief Kamajor."1675 Sesay fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded on that basis that he and Bockarie used the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit acts of terrorism. Sesay further argues that as TF1-129 was a suspected Kamajor ally, "an aggravated Bockarie" ordered his arrest, and therefore, any crimes committed during TF1-129's arrest were not committed with the primary intent of spreading terror.1676 Although the Trial Chamber found that certain acts of violence did not constitute acts of terror because the acts were committed in response to conduct that aggravated the perpetrators,1677 Sesay misinterprets that finding and ignores the evidence as a whole as relied on by the Trial Chamber, in particular the findings noted above. Accordingly, Sesay fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he and Bockarie acted with the specific intent to spread terror.

7526. para. 778: In Ground 2, Kallon advances three arguments of general applicability to his contribution to the JCE. First, he challenges the Trial Chamber's holding that an accused can incur JCE liability even if his significant contributions occurred only in a smaller geographical area, provided he had knowledge of the wider common purpose,2028 arguing it infringes the requirement that the accused share the purpose of the JCE.2029 Second, Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erroneously tried him for the conduct of the RUF as an organisation.2030 Third, Kallon submits that the evidence showed him acting benignly toward civilians.2031 The Prosecution responds that participation in a JCE does not require a significant contribution in all geographical areas covered by the JCE2032 and that the Trial Chamber observed that "this trial is not a trial of the RUF organisation."2033 Kallon replies that the Prosecution ignores that the JCE covered different crimes involving different participants, victims and circumstances.2034

7527. para. 779: The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by Kallon's first submission. Kallon fails to explain how, in his view, the Trial Chamber's error in holding that an accused's contribution to the JCE may be more limited in geographical scope than the JCE itself if the accused knew of the wider common purpose, invalidates the decision. In particular, he ignores the Trial Chamber's findings that an accused must have made a significant contribution to the crimes for which he is to be held responsible, and that Kallon intended and contributed to all of the crimes in all the Districts for which he incurred JCE liability.2035 Moreover, contrary to Kallon's arguments, the Trial Chamber did not rely on his contribution to the JCE in Kono in order to establish his contribution in Kenema,2036 and JCE liability does not require that the accused ordered or was responsible as a superior for the crime. Kallon's submissions relating to his contribution in respect of Kono and the link between him as a JCE member and non-JCE perpetrators are addressed elsewhere.2037 This submission is therefore rejected.

7528. para. 823: Kallon's submission that he did not share the intent with the other JCE participants, is based on the premise that the Trial Chamber failed to state who they were, what role they had in the crimes, and how he shared their intent.2159 However, the Trial Chamber made findings on these issues.2160 Having concluded, inter alia, on the basis of these findings,2161 that Kallon shared the intent to commit the crimes in Kailahun in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose,2162 the Trial Chamber was not, contrary to Kallon's suggestion,2163 required to establish that he, in addition, knew of the specific crimes committed there.2164 Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

h. JCE – significant contribution

7529. para. 778: In Ground 2, Kallon advances three arguments of general applicability to his contribution to the JCE. First, he challenges the Trial Chamber's holding that an accused can incur JCE liability even if his significant contributions occurred only in a smaller geographical area, provided he had knowledge of the wider common purpose,2028 arguing it infringes the requirement that the accused share the purpose of the JCE.2029 Second, Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erroneously tried him for the conduct of the RUF as an organisation.2030 Third, Kallon submits that the evidence showed him acting benignly toward civilians.2031 The Prosecution responds that participation in a JCE does not require a significant contribution in all geographical areas covered by the JCE2032 and that the Trial Chamber observed that "this trial is not a trial of the RUF organisation."2033 Kallon replies that the Prosecution ignores that the JCE covered different crimes involving different participants, victims and circumstances.2034

7531. para. 780: The Appeals Chamber notes that, contrary to Kallon's submission, the Trial Chamber did not convict him based on "mere membership" in the Supreme Council or in the RUF. Rather, it inferred from the widespread and systematic nature of the crimes, in particular the attacks on Bo and the forced labour in Kenema District, that such conduct was a "deliberate policy" which must have been initiated by the members of the Supreme Council, of which he was one.2038 Moreover, Kallon's contribution to the JCE did not consist solely of his actions on the Supreme Council.2039 These submissions are rejected.

incurred JCE liability2042 is not dispositive of whether he could be held responsible for them under this form of responsibility.2043 This submission is rejected.

7533. para. 782: The Trial Chamber was satisfied that Kallon's involvement as a member of the Supreme Council, the governing body of the Junta, contributed to the JCE, as this body was involved in the decision-making processes through which the Junta regime determined how best to secure power and maintain control over Sierra Leone.2044 The widespread and systematic nature of the crimes in which the RUF was engaged indicate that such conduct was a deliberate policy of the AFRC/RUF that the Trial Chamber found "must have been" initiated by the Supreme Council, of which Kallon was a member.2045

7534. para. 785: The Appeals Chamber understands Kallon to be making a four-pronged argument, such that: (i) the Trial Chamber confused the Supreme Council with the AFRC; (ii) if it did not, the Supreme Council was not involved in crimes; (iii) even if the Supreme Council were involved in crimes, Kallon was not a member of it; and (iv) if Kallon was a member, he did not participate in criminal activity on the Supreme Council.

7536. para. 787: The next prong of Kallon's appeal is that the Supreme Council was not itself inherently criminal or involved in planning or executing criminal policies. In support, he invokes the finding in paragraph 756 of the Trial Judgment that the major issues discussed by the Supreme Council were "the security of the Junta; revenue generation; the resolution of conflicts between the AFRC and the RUF; and harassment of civilians", and Exhibit 224, which form part of the evidentiary basis for this finding.2052 The Appeals Chamber has already considered and dismissed a similar claim under Sesay's Ground 242053 because the finding in paragraph 756 does not detract from the Trial Chamber's inference, based on the "widespread and systematic nature of the crimes, in particular the attacks on Bo and the forced labour in Kenema District," that such conduct "was a deliberate policy of the AFRC/RUF" that must have been "initiated by the Supreme Council."2054 Since Kallon does not address the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber to draw that inference,2055 his argument is rejected.

7538. para. 789: Kallon's last submission is that he did not participate in criminal activity by his involvement with the Supreme Council. The Trial Chamber inferred that Kallon, by his membership in the Supreme Council, was involved in decisions or policy-making by the Supreme Council.2059 Contrary to Kallon's claim,2060 the Trial Chamber based this finding on evidence that he was one of the few RUF Commanders to be a member of the Supreme Council, which was a privileged position in the Junta governing body, and that he attended Supreme Council meetings on a fairly regular basis.2061 Similarly, the inference that Kallon cooperated with the AFRC at Teko Barracks was reasonable based on evidence that he was received by former SLA when he arrived there on 3 June 1997 and that he was based at Teko Barracks until August 1997.2062 Kallon's additional claim that he was not involved in any of the national diamond mining programmes is but a bare assertion which he acknowledges will be addressed under other grounds of appeal.2063

7539. para. 790: Kallon therefore fails to show an error in the Trial Chamber's inference that he contributed to the JCE through his involvement on the Supreme Council. The Appeals Chamber rejects Kallon's Ground 2 in present parts, and dismisses his Ground 8 in its entirety.

7540. para. 1063: Finally, Gbao argues that the lack of findings that he acted "in concert" with the senior leaders or members of the AFRC demonstrates that he did not significantly contribute to the JCE.2937 In light of all the above findings and discussion, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the absence of findings that Gbao directly acted together with members of the AFRC precluded a reasonable trier of fact from concluding that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the manner in which the members of the JCE interact and cooperate can take as many forms as conceived by the participants to pursue the realisation of their shared common criminal purpose.2938 In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao remained in Kailahun after the May 1997 coup on Bockarie's instructions, and that in June 1997 Bockarie ordered Gbao to move from Giema to Kailahun Town.2939 The Trial Chamber further found that other senior RUF Commanders also remained in Kailahun District, including the Area Commander Denis Lansana and the overall G5 Commander Prince Taylor.2940 Furthermore it found that the RUF and AFRC worked alongside one another in Kailahun District.2941 The Appeals Chamber also notes the important role Kailahun District played in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose.2942

7541. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 29 (p. 520): Although the absence of the requisite mens rea is sufficient to compel a reversal of Gbao's convictions under JCE liability, the same result is also required by the absence of a finding of Gbao's significant contribution to the crimes within the JCE for which he was found responsible, an element necessary to establish the actus reus of JCE liability.40

7542. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 30 (p. 520): In dismissing Gbao's Ground 8(i), the Majority holds that a reasonable trier of fact could have concluded, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's confirmed findings, that Gbao significantly contributed to the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose.41 I dissent from this conclusion.

7543. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 31 (p. 520): The Majority has considered whether the Trial Chamber reasonably found that Gbao significantly contributed to the Common Criminal Purpose through his role as OSC and his participation in forced farming in Kailahun District.42 However, the Majority overlooks the fact that the Trial Chamber did not itself make such a finding. The Majority thereby upholds Gbao's conviction under JCE in the absence of any confirmed finding by a trier of fact that Gbao significantly contributed to the furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.

7544. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 32 (p. 520): In the Appeal Judgement we unanimously uphold Gbao's Ground 8(a) and disallow the Trial Chamber's finding "of [Gbao's] significant contribution to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor."43 We hold that reference to Gbao's role as an ideology instructor and expert must be struck from the Trial

Chamber's findings because Gbao had no notice of the allegation that he contributed to the JCE in this capacity.44 The Majority fails to consider the consequences of this holding, but is content in this regard to note that "[c]onsideration of Gbao's challenges to the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as the RUF ideology expert and instructor therefore does not arise."45 Instead they assert that Gbao's position as OSC and his role in forced farming in Kailahun District were sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt his significant contribution to the JCE, a finding never made by the Trial Chamber.

7545. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 33 (p. 521): I cannot agree. Having determined that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Gbao's role as RUF ideology instructor and expert in finding that he significantly contributed to the JCE, it was incumbent on the Appeals Chamber to fully consider the consequences of its conclusion. In particular, the Appeals Chamber had to determine whether the reversed finding on Gbao's role as an ideology instructor and expert was so integral to the Trial Chamber's finding on his contribution to the JCE that the latter cannot stand without the former.

7546. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 34 (p. 521): We say in our Judgment granting Gbao's Appeal on Ground 8(a) that the Trial Chamber's erroneous finding on Gbao's role as the RUF ideology instructor and expert was integral to its finding on his contribution to the JCE. Indeed, we hold that "[t]he Trial Chamber … found it necessary to assess the significance of the RUF ideology to the RUF, and Gbao's role in implementing the ideology in order to find that Gbao participated in the JCE."46 We further hold that Gbao's unpleaded role as RUF ideology instructor and expert was "found [by the Trial Chamber] to be necessary to the determination of Gbao's participation in the JCE."47

7547. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 35 (p. 521-522): The Trial Chamber clearly expressed its decisive reliance on Gbao's unpleaded role as the RUF ideology instructor and expert to find that he significantly contributed to the JCE. The Trial Chamber stated, inter alia:

> In making a determination on the participation of Gbao, the RUF ideology expert and instructor under the rubric of the JCE, the Chamber deems it necessary to address, inter alia, issues relating to the ideology of the RUF and how its content and philosophy impacted on its Commanders and fighters in their operational activities vis-à-vis their relationship with the civilian population.48
> We recall that Gbao was not a member of the AFRC/RUF Supreme Council and remained in Kailahun District during the Junta regime. He was not directly involved or did not directly participate in any crimes committed in Bo District. However, the Chamber has found that Gbao was an ideology instructor and that ideology played a significant role in the RUF movement….49

> [W]e are of the opinion that where the evidence establishes that there is a criminal nexus between [a revolutionary] ideology and the crimes charged and alleged to have been committed, the perpetrators of those crimes should be held criminally accountable under the rubric of a joint criminal enterprise for the crimes so alleged in the Indictment. …50
> … Therefore, the distance of Gbao to many of the crimes is not a reason for denying his participation under the basic form. … In this regard, the relevant factors, amongst others, to be considered are Gbao's commitment to the RUF ideology; his role in propagating and implementing the said ideology as the propelling force behind the conflict; [and] the nexus between the ideology and the joint criminal enterprise….51
> The Chamber is satisfied that there is compelling direct and circumstantial evidence to justify the inference that the ideology of the RUF, in its normative and operational settings, significantly contributed to the commission of the crimes falling within the joint criminal enterprise and were [sic] natural and foreseeable consequences of the same.52

7548. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 36 (p. 522): Additionally, the Trial Chamber confirmed in the Sentencing Judgment the centrality of Gbao's role as the RUF ideology instructor and expert to his contribution to the JCE:

> We have also found that Gbao's personal role within the overall enterprise was neither at the policy making level, nor was it at the "fighting end" where the majority of the actual atrocities were committed. Indeed, as the Gbao Defence pointed out in its closing submissions, Gbao has not been found to have ever fired a single shot and never to have ordered the firing of a single shot. Gbao was a loyal and committed functionary of the RUF organisation, whose major contributions to the joint criminal enterprise can be characterised by his role as an ideology instructor and his planning and direct involvement in the enslavement of civilians on RUF government farms within Kailahun District.53

7549. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 37 (p. 522): In light of this clear reasoning the Appeals Chamber holds that Gbao's unpleaded role as RUF ideology instructor and expert was "found [by the Trial Chamber] to be necessary to the determination of Gbao's participation in the JCE."54 Indeed, the Trial Chamber itself confirmed that "it include[d] only those established facts that have been seriously considered by the Chamber in determining whether or not, an Accused bears responsibility for the charges against him."55 In short, the Trial Chamber was not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Gbao significantly participated in the JCE without this reversed finding.

7550. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 38 (p. 522-523): The Appeals Chamber is not in the position to speculate whether the Trial Chamber would have found that Gbao significantly contributed to the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose had it not considered his role as the RUF ideology instructor and expert. The Appeals Chamber's role is limited to reviewing the Trial Chamber's findings as the Trial Chamber found them. It must take those findings as they are, and cannot intuit or conjecture what conclusions the Trial Chamber would have reached in other circumstances.

7551. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 39 (p. 523): In my respectful opinion, the Majority fails to appreciate this crucial aspect of the appeal process. Instead, it proceeds as if the Trial Chamber found that Gbao significantly contributed to the Common Criminal Purpose only through his role as OSC and his participation in forced farming in Kailahun District.56 The Trial Chamber, however, made no such finding.

7552. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 40 (p. 523): The Majority accordingly misapplies the standard of review and analyses the reasonableness of a hypothetical finding that the Trial Chamber did not make. The standard on appeal requires deference to a finding of fact reached by the Trial Chamber.57 The Majority here has misapplied that standard. Having struck the actual finding of the actual Trial Chamber, the Majority has theorized that a hypothetical reasonable trier of fact could have reached a different finding. As a consequence, the Majority upholds Gbao's conviction under JCE in the absence of any confirmed finding by the trier of fact that Gbao significantly contributed to the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose.

7553. Dissent – Justice Fisher, para. 41 (p. 523): It is be beyond the scope of appellate review for the Appeals Chamber to act as the trier of fact and determine itself whether the Trial Chamber's confirmed findings prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Gbao significantly contributed to the realization of the Common Criminal Purpose. In this respect, I fully concur that:

> an appeal is not a trial de novo and the Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to act as a primary trier of fact. Not only is the Appeals Chamber not in the best position to assess the reliability and credibility of the evidence, but doing so would also deprive the Parties of their fundamental right to appeal factual findings.58

I consider that making findings on such critical questions as an accused's significant contribution to the common criminal purpose is a task only within the purview of the trier of fact and beyond the proper scope of appellate review.

7554. para. 1024: The Trial Chamber found that "[i]n 1995, Gbao was a Sergeant and was sent to the Baima base in Kailahun District as an ideology instructor."2794 The Trial Chamber found that "Gbao was responsible for the teaching of the ideology to the new commando recruits."2795 The Trial Chamber further held that "Gbao was a strict adherent to the RUF ideology and gave instruction on its principles to all new recruits to the RUF."2796

7555. para. 1027: The Appeals Chamber has previously upheld Gbao's Ground 8(a) and overruled the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor.2805 Gbao's Ground 8(b) is therefore moot. The Appeals Chamber will further consider below whether a reasonable trier of fact could have found, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's other findings, that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE.

7557. para. 1041: The Trial Chamber also considered other ways in which Gbao participated in the JCE. For instance, it found that Gbao had a "supervisory role"2838 over the IDU,2839 the MP,2840 the IO2841 and the G5,2842 which entailed travelling widely in Kailahun to monitor the implementation of the RUF ideology.2843 Gbao was also found to have been involved in the forced labour of civilians to produce foodstuffs,2844 which in the Trial Chamber's view significantly contributed to maintaining the strength and cohesiveness of the RUF fighting force.2845 Moreover, the Trial Chamber held that Gbao's "status, rank and personal relationship with Sankoh, as well as his knowledge of the RUF's ideology" gave him considerable prestige in the RUF in Kailahun.2846 It further considered that Gbao's failure to properly investigate allegations against a civilian woman (TF1-113) and his instruction that she be publicly beaten, would have had a demonstrative effect to compel the obedience of the civilian population in Kailahun to RUF authority.2847

7558. para. 1048: Gbao raises a number of specific issues of fact as preliminary challenges. He further claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in concluding that his alleged contributions significantly contributed to the joint criminal enterprise. The Appeals Chamber will first consider those preliminary issues, before turning to the broader issue of Gbao's contribution.

7559. para. 1049: The Appeals Chamber has previously upheld Gbao's Ground 8(a) and overruled the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor.2877 Consideration of Gbao's challenges to the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as the RUF ideology expert and instructor therefore does not arise.

7560. para. 1050: Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that he supervised the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District to ensure that the RUF ideology was put into practice.2878 Gbao contests this finding on the grounds that Witness DIS-188, upon whom the Trial Chamber relied was previously found to require corroboration and that the witness's testimony does not support the Trial Chamber's finding.2879 Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding this testimony credible. The Trial Chamber did find as a general matter that the witness's testimony required corroboration, as it was "inconsistent" and the witness "was not genuinely assisting the Court to arrive at the truth."2880 However, the Trial Chamber further noted that it had doubts as to the witness's veracity because the witness's testimony "was influenced in part by his support for the RUF movement and its ideology."2881 By merely pointing to the Trial Chamber's own finding, Gbao fails to demonstrate that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on this witness's testimony in these circumstances. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes,"2882 nor is it "required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."2883

> was a "popular" and "effective Commander" who travelled widely in Kailahun District, visiting different areas behind the front lines, reporting on whether the MP and G5 units were doing their jobs and observing the conduct of investigations in order to ensure that the RUF ideology was put into practice.2885

The testimony of Witness DIS-188 cited in footnote 3 77 1 2886 does not support the finding that Gbao's "supervisory role entailed, in great measure, the monitoring of the implementation of the ideology."2887 However, Gbao fails to show that this error rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that as OSC he travelled widely in Kailahun District, reported on whether the MP and G5 units were doing their jobs and observed the conduct of investigations in order to ensure that the RUF ideology was put into practice. The Appeals Chamber will accordingly disregard the characterization of Gbao's supervisory role as monitoring the implementation of the RUF ideology, but the remaining impugned findings stand.

7562. para. 1052: Gbao's claim that the RUF security apparatus - the IDU, MP, IO and G5 - had no or only a nominal role during the Junta Period2888 relies on bare assertions unsupported by evidence and questionable inferences from other facts established by the Trial Chamber. Gbao further fails to address the Trial Chamber's finding that the RUF "security units enjoyed enhanced importance [in RUF controlled territory] as the central components of a static administration."2889 Thus, Gbao merely provides an alternative interpretation of the evidence and fails to show that the Trial Chamber's findings were unreasonable.

7563. para. 1053: In arguing that he had limited authority and responsibility in his role as OSC, Gbao has pointed to a number of the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the structure and operations of the RUF security apparatus.2890 Gbao highlights, in particular, findings that he had little or no authority to issue orders to the Overall Unit Commanders,2891 initiate investigations2892 or enforce punishments.2893 However, the Trial Chamber did not disregard these findings in its reasoning, specifically noting that "the evidence is insufficient to conclude that Gbao had effective control over [the IDU, MP, IO and G5] as OSC."2894 Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao still had "considerable influence over the decisions taken by these bodies" due to "his appointment to this position by Sankoh, his status as a Vanguard and his power to issue recommendations."2895 The Trial Chamber further specifically found that whatever his de jure authority, Gbao "enjoyed substantial practical authority over the members of the security units."2896 The Trial Chamber considered then, that it was his "considerable influence" and "practical authority" as the supervisor of the RUF security apparatus, rather than his formal power and authority,that founded in part Gbao's contribution to the JCE through his role as OSC. By merely pointing to other findings, Gbao fails to address the Trial Chamber's reasoning and its finding that he had "considerable influence" over the RUF security apparatus.

7564. para. 1054: The Appeals Chamber has previously considered Gbao's claims under his Grounds 8(s) and 11 regarding forced farming in Kailahun District.2897 The Appeals Chamber recalls its conclusions that Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that forced farming took place in Kailahun District during the Junta period, or that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Gbao shared the intent to commit the crime of enslavement with respect to that of forced farming.2898

7566. para. 1056: In both Grounds 8(c) and (i), Gbao claims that he was not a senior leader of the RUF, but only a captain and mid-level officer, arguing that the Trial Chamber thus erred in finding his rank significant was significant in its determination of whether he significantly contributed to the JCE.2904 In arguing that he only held the rank of captain and that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding his rank significant, Gbao mischaracterizes the Trial Chamber's finding and ignores the Trial Chamber's relevant findings.2905 Gbao does not dispute the Trial Chamber's finding that he was OSC for the RUF and Overall IDU Commander,2906 and that he often served as Chairman of the Joint Security Board of Investigations.2907 More importantly, Gbao does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that "in RUF controlled territory, the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order."2908 Similarly, Gbao neither challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that he was a Vanguard,2909 nor the findings regarding the status and authority Vanguards held.2910 In particular, he does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that assignment and status could be more important in terms of authority and influence than rank in the RUF.2911 Accordingly, Gbao's citation to testimonial evidence of his rank by Witness DAG-048 and the testimony of Witness TF1-371 does not establish that the Trial Chamber unreasonably found that he had considerable prestige and power in Kailahun District.

7567. para. 1057: Gbao further claims that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gained additional prestige and power within the RUF as a result of a personal connection with Foday Sankoh.2912 However, Gbao fails to articulate how this error rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that "Gbao had considerable prestige and power within the RUF in Kailahun District,"2913 particularly as he does not contest his assignment as OSC and Overall IDU Commander and his status as a Vanguard, as noted above.

7568. para. 1058: Gbao misrepresents the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the general credibility of TF1-113. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not consider that this witness required corroboration when testifying about Gbao's acts and conduct.2914 Rather, the Trial Chamber was not convinced that the whole of the witness's testimony was not credible, and found that it was only necessary to exercise extreme caution and often seek corroborative evidence.2915 Furthermore, Gbao fails to support his assertion that the testimonies of witnesses who lie under oath should, as a rule, be disregarded,2916 as none of the authorities he cites supports such a proposition.2917 In that regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that Rules 77 and 91 of the Rules allow a Chamber to hold in contempt a witness who wilfully gives false testimony under oath, but nothing in the Rules obligates a Chamber to discard the testimony of such witnesses for that reason alone. Rather, Rule 89 permits a Chamber to admit any evidence it deems relevant. The Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion in this respect. Indeed, "it is primarily for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witness' testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of the reasoning in reaching a decision on these points."2918 Accordingly, Gbao's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding TF1-113's testimony credible on this issue is rejected.2919

7570. para. 1060: Gbao first argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he significantly contributed as the OSC, submitting that the RUF security apparatus had a nominal role during the Junta period,2920 and that he had limited authority over the RUF security units.2921 Gbao further submits that the security apparatus did not deal with most disciplinary issues in fact, which "were instead handled by the local Area Commander where the crime was alleged to have taken place."2922 The Appeals Chamber has previously dismissed Gbao's first submission,2923 and has noted that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao, whatever his de jure authority, exercised "considerable influence" and "practical authority" over the RUF security apparatus.2924 The Appeals Chamber further notes with respect to the last submission that the Trial Chamber specifically distinguished between discipline in combat areas and RUF-controlled territory, finding that although "Gbao may have possessed only limited authority in respect to combat operations," "the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order" in RUF-controlled territory.2925 In this regard, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the role of the RUF security apparatus and the RUF disciplinary system in maintaining the cohesiveness of the RUF as an armed force and allowing the RUF leadership to control RUF fighters.2926

7571. para. 1061: Second, Gbao argues that he had only a nominal role as OSC outside Kailahun District,2927 noting that the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence that he received reports of unlawful killings in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts or that he failed in his duty to ensure proper investigations were conducted in those areas.2928 The Appeals Chamber notes that the findings Gbao cites do not show that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he had a more than nominal role outside Kailahun District, particularly in light of the Trial Chamber's specific findings regarding his practical influence and authority over the RUF security apparatus as a whole. Furthermore, Gbao fails to show that it was not open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he significantly contributed to the JCE on the basis of his contributions in

Kailahun District. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Gbao's significant role as OSC in Kailahun District,2929 his supervision of the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District2930 and the finding that Gbao had considerable prestige and power in the RUF in Kailahun District.2931 Moreover, the Trial Chamber specifically found that Kailahun District played an important role in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> The[] widespread and systematic crimes [by the RUF in Kailahun2932] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.2933

7572. para. 1062: Third, Gbao argues that the Trial Chamber did not demonstrate how the forced farming significantly contributed to the JCE, with respect to the forced farming in Kailahun District.2934 However, Gbao does not address the Trial Chamber's findings that the produce from these farms was used by the RUF in their operations2935 and that the produce was turned over by Gbao to Sesay for commercialisation.2936 Furthermore, Gbao characterises as "generic" the Trial Chamber's finding that his role in the forced farming significantly contributed to maintaining the strength and cohesiveness of the RUF fighting force. This does not, however, show that the Trial Chamber erroneously concluded that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE through his role in the forced farming.

7573. para. 1063: Finally, Gbao argues that the lack of findings that he acted "in concert" with the senior leaders or members of the AFRC demonstrates that he did not significantly contribute to the JCE.2937 In light of all the above findings and discussion, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the absence of findings that Gbao directly acted together with members of the AFRC precluded a reasonable trier of fact from concluding that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the manner in which the members of the JCE interact and cooperate can take as many forms as conceived by the participants to pursue the realisation of their shared common criminal purpose.2938 In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao remained in Kailahun after the May 1997 coup on Bockarie's instructions, and that in June 1997 Bockarie ordered Gbao to move from Giema to Kailahun Town.2939 The Trial Chamber further found that other senior RUF Commanders also remained in Kailahun District, including the Area Commander Denis Lansana and the overall G5 Commander Prince Taylor.2940 Furthermore it found that the RUF and AFRC worked alongside one another in Kailahun District.2941 The Appeals Chamber also notes the important role Kailahun District played in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose.2942

7574. para. 1064: Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber concludes that Gbao fails to show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he significantly contributed to the JCE.

(iv) Planning

a. Legal test – Planning

7575. para. 687: The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of this mode of liability requires that the planning was a factor "substantially contributing" to the criminal conduct for which the accused is to be held responsible.1764 The Trial Chamber correctly set out this legal requirement when pronouncing on the legal elements of planning.1765 However, when applying the legal test for planning to the facts now at issue, it found Sesay liable for planning on the basis that his conduct was a "significant" contributory factor to the perpetration of enslavement.1766

7576. para. 688: An accused's "significant" contribution may denote a lesser degree of impact on the crime than "substantial" contribution.1767 Having set out the proper legal standard for planning, which requires "substantial" contribution, the Trial Chamber proceeded to make findings on Sesay's involvement in the enslavement in Kono District between the recapture of the District by RUF troops under his command in December 1998, and January 2000,1768 which demonstrate a "substantial" contribution on his part. For example, the Mining Commander reported to Sesay, and in 2000, Sesay himself appointed a new Overall Mining Commander.1769 Sesay visited Kono District and collected diamonds and kept a house in Koidu Town where he received mining Commanders for this purpose.1770 He visited the mines and ordered that civilians be captured from other Districts and arranged for transportation of the captured civilians to the mines.1771 The Trial Chamber further found that, as the illicit sale of diamonds was the RUF's primary means of financing, the mining system in Kono was designed and supervised at the highest levels, and Sesay, as the BFC and subordinate to Bockarie at that time, was actively and intimately involved in the forced mining operations and its processes in Kono District.1772

7577. para. 689: The Appeals Chamber therefore holds that the Trial Chamber did not apply the wrong legal test for planning.

7578. para. 1170: Planning and aiding and abetting also require that the accused contribute to the crimes, to an even higher degree. These forms of liability only attach where the accused "substantially" contributed to the crimes.3258

(v) Aiding and abetting

a. Legal test – aiding and abetting

7579. para. 1170: Planning and aiding and abetting also require that the accused contribute to the crimes, to an even higher degree. These forms of liability only attach where the accused "substantially" contributed to the crimes.3258

(vi) Kenema District

a. JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kenema District

i. Sesay – JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kenema District

7580. para. 617: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay actively participated in the furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose and thereby significantly contributed to the acts of terrorism (Count 1), collective punishments (Count 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), physical violence (Count 11), enslavement (Count 13) and pillage (Count 14) found to have been committed in Kenema District between 25 May 1997 and 19 February 1998.1533

7581. para. 619: Sesay's first challenge to his participation in the JCE in Kenema District concerns the Trial Chamber's finding that, "on Sesay's orders, from 1997 onwards, captured civilians were taken to Bunumbu for military training."1538 The Trial Chamber found that the Bunumbu training camp was established in 1998,1539 and that the AFRC/RUF Junta was ousted from power by the ECOMOG intervention on 14 February 1998.1540 It did not say whether the Bunumbu training camp was established before or after 14 February 1998, but the testimony of TF1-362, relied on by the Trial Chamber for the impugned finding and invoked by Sesay and the Prosecution on appeal, suggests that the camp was established shortly after the ECOMOG intervention.1541 Sesay thus appears to be correct that the Bunumbu training camp did not open until after the Junta period.

7583. para. 621: Sesay contests the finding that he participated in the JCE through his involvement in the planning and organising of the forced mining in Kenema District. His first argument, that this involvement was not carried out with the intent to cause terror,1544 is dismissed because it is based on the erroneous premise that the common criminal purpose of the JCE was to cause terror.1545

7584. para. 622: Second, Sesay contends that the finding in paragraph 1091 of the Trial Judgment that "[d]iamonds were then either given to RUF Commanders including Bockarie, Sesay and Mike Lamin" was an insufficient basis for the Trial Chamber to conclude in paragraph 1997 that "the forced mining was a planned and a systematic policy of the Junta Government devised at the highest level" and that he "as a member of the Supreme Council, was involved in the planning and organisation of the forced mining in Kenema District."1546 However, Sesay only selectively quotes paragraph 1091 in support of his claim. The full finding states that many civilians dug for diamonds in Tongo Field and

Also, Sesay does not challenge the finding in paragraph 1997 that "the government mining in Tongo Field provided an important source of revenue for the Junta Government and that this topic was discussed in AFRC Supreme Council meetings when Sesay was present." Rather, Sesay refers to TF1-371's testimony to argue that the issue of force was not discussed and that the Supreme Council would replace the commander if civilians were harassed while mining in his area.1548 However, he does not explain how it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to disregard this evidence given "[t]he sheer scale of the enslavement in Kenema District."1549 Further, merely invoking the finding that "significant decisions were made by Koroma, SAJ Musa and certain other Honourables,"1550 Sesay fails to show that the Trial Chamber's finding concerning his participation was unreasonable.

7585. para. 623: The Appeals Chamber therefore rejects the arguments in Sesay's Ground 27 that he did not participate in the JCE in Kenema District.

7586. para. 646: The Trial Chamber found that six acts of unlawful killings and physical violence committed in Kenema Town constituted acts of terrorism.1622 The Trial Chamber found that "a number of the victims were prominent members of civil society and were targeted on this account."1623 It further found that AFRC/RUF fighters publicised these crimes.1624 The Trial Chamber concluded that these crimes "were intended to illustrate the gruesome repercussions of collaborating or being perceived to collaborate with enemies of the RUF and so to terrorise and subdue the population",1625 and thus were committed with the specific intent to terrorise the civilian population.1626

7588. para. 651: The Appeals Chamber notes as an initial matter that the mens rea of those who carry out the actus reus of the crime is not among the elements of JCE 1 liability as set out in Tadić.1643 While "participants in a basic or systemic form of joint criminal enterprise must be shown to share the required intent of the principal perpetrators,"1644 this holding only reinforces that the members of the JCE must share the intent to commit the crime for which they are held to be responsible under JCE 1 and JCE 2, and does not imply that non-members used by a JCE member to carry out the actus reus of the crime must share the intent with the members of the JCE.

7589. para. 652: Further, the Appeals Chamber agrees "that what matters in a first category JCE is not whether the person who carried out the actus reus of a particular crime is a member of the JCE, but whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose."1645 As persuasively explained by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, the persons who carry out the actus reus of the crime need not share the common purpose of the JCE in order for liability for their acts to attach to members of the JCE.1646 To the contrary, the primary question for the purposes of JCE liability is whether the acts of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes can be imputed to the members of the JCE.1647 So long as it is established that a member of the JCE used the non-member to commit a crime within the common purpose of the JCE, there is no need to show that the non-member intended to further the common purpose of the JCE or indeed even knew of that common purpose.1648

7590. para. 653: For the purposes of determining the liability of JCE members for the acts of non-members who carry out the actus reus of the crime, the critical inquiry is not the mens rea of the non-member, but rather the acts and mental state of the JCE member, who uses the non-member to commit a crime within and in furtherance of the common purpose.1649 As the mens rea element of JCE 1 liability relates solely to the shared intent of the members of the JCE, and as the persons who carry out the actus reus of the crime need not be members of the JCE, the mens rea of non-members who carry out the actus reus of the crime is not a legal element of JCE 1 liability.1650

7591. para. 654: The Appeals Chamber does not consider that the finding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Limaj et al., cited by Sesay, is relevant to the present issue, as the Appeals Chamber there was concerned with the scope of the common purpose as pleaded in the indictment, a distinct issue from the present question.1651

7593. para. 656: While the Trial Chamber did find that those who carried out the actus reus of the crime acted with the specific intent to spread terror,1652 such a finding is only relevant as a matter of evidence to the other findings that the Trial Chamber was required to make. The Appeals Chamber finds that Trial Chamber's alleged errors with respect to the mens rea of the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes,1653 even if accepted arguendo, would not render those findings unreasonable. Sesay challenges related to the mens rea of non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes are dismissed.

7594. para. 657: Sesay further challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that Bockarie, as the perpetrator and member of the JCE, acted with the requisite mens rea for acts of terrorism. Sesay fails to show an error1654 in the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the killing of the man at the NIC Building.1655 Sesay neither explains how the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie acted with the requisite intent would be erroneous even if it were accepted that the victim was a Kamajor who was hors de combat, nor explains how Bockarie's desire to "do away with all the Kamajors"1656 is inconsistent with or renders unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding. This claim is therefore dismissed.

7595. para. 658: Sesay fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the beating of TF1-129 was committed with the specific intent to spread terror.1657 Contrary to Sesay's claim, the Trial Chamber did not need to find a "single, all-encompassing intention" among all those who participated in the beating of TF1-129,1658 as the Trial Chamber's findings show that it found that Sesay and Bockarie used those who carried out the beatings to commit the crime.1659 In particular, the Appeals Chamber notes the following findings: (i) Sesay ordered his bodyguard to molest TF1-129 during his arrest;1660 (ii) Sesay's bodyguard further injured TF1-129 when he was to be taken to the Secretariat building;1661 (iii) Sesay instructed a small boy to guard TF1-129 and kill him if he moved;1662 (iv) TF1-129 was beaten while being taken to Bockarie and Sesay;1663 (v) Bockarie and Sesay ordered TF1-129 to be taken to the "dungeon", and TF1-129 was beaten on the way to and from the "dungeon".1664

7596. para. 659: In addition, Sesay argues that there was no evidence that he sought to publicise the beating,1665 and that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding that he and Bockarie used the non- members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit an act of terrorism.1666 In this respect, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings that acts of terrorism were within the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE,1667 and therefore that the intent to commit acts of terrorism was shared by the members of the JCE, including Sesay and Bockarie. The Trial Chamber further found that the six acts of violence in Kenema Town,1668 including the beating of TF1-129, targeted prominent members of civil society and were publicised.1669 The Trial Chamber accordingly reasoned that the six acts of violence were "intended to illustrate the gruesome repercussions of collaborating or being perceived to collaborate with enemies of the RUF and so to terrorise and subdue the population," and therefore were committed with the specific intent to terrorise the civilian population.1670 The Appeals Chamber also recalls the Trial Chamber's finding "that during the conflict in Sierra Leone, the AFRC/RUF regularly killed civilians accused of being Kamajors as a deliberate strategy to terrorise the civilian population and prevent any support for their opponents."1671 Finally, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie targeted alleged Kamajors on a number of occasions1672 and publicly expressed his intent to target alleged Kamajors.1673

7597. para. 660: In light of the above findings, whether or not the Trial Chamber found that Sesay or others sought to publicise the beating directly, the Trial Chamber did find that TF1-129 was targeted because he was considered to be prominent1674 and a "chief Kamajor."1675 Sesay fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded on that basis that he and Bockarie used the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit acts of terrorism. Sesay further argues that as TF1-129 was a suspected Kamajor ally, "an aggravated Bockarie" ordered his arrest, and therefore, any crimes committed during TF1-129's arrest were not committed with the primary intent of spreading terror.1676 Although the Trial Chamber found that certain acts of violence did not constitute acts of terror because the acts were committed in response to conduct that aggravated the perpetrators,1677 Sesay misinterprets that finding and ignores the evidence as a whole as relied on by the Trial Chamber, in particular the findings noted above. Accordingly, Sesay fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he and Bockarie acted with the specific intent to spread terror.

ii. Kallon – JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kenema District

7598. para. 798: The Trial Chamber held that its previous findings, described in its JCE findings on Bo District, regarding Kallon's participation and significant contribution "apply mutatis mutandis to the crimes committed in Kenema District."2081 It therefore concluded that Kallon participated in the furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose and thereby significantly contributed to the crimes found to have been committed in Kenema.2082 It held that Kallon shared with the other JCE members the requisite intent to commit these crimes.2083

7599. para. 801: As to the Trial Chamber's application of its findings on Kallon's contribution in Bo District mutatis mutandis to its findings on events in Kenema District, the Appeals Chamber recalls that Kallon's challenges to the former findings have been dismissed.2091 In remaining parts, Kallon's argument relies on the assertion that the evidence supporting both his conviction and the existence of the crimes in Kenema was different from that pertaining to Bo. This is correct insofar as the crime incidents in the two Districts were not the same. However, Kallon does not point to any examples in the evidence to sustain that, inasmuch as his own participation is concerned, no reasonable trier of fact could have found, as the Trial Chamber did, that his contribution was such that it contributed to both the crimes in Bo and the crimes in Kenema. Kallon therefore fails to demonstrate an error and accordingly his argument is rejected.

7600. para. 802: Second, Kallon contends that he did not contribute to or share the intent for the JCE in Kenema because he "featured nowhere in [the] power equation" between Bockarie and Eddie Kanneh, who were in control of the District.2092 The Appeals Chamber notes that Kallon's contribution and intent in respect of Kenema did not turn on whether he was in any particular position of control together with Bockarie and Kanneh there. Rather, the Trial Chamber inferred that he contributed to and intended, in particular, the "forced labour in Kenema District" through his involvement on the Supreme Council.2093 The Appeals Chamber has already dismissed Kallon's challenge to that inference.2094 Moreover, as also previously noted, whether Kallon personally committed any crimes in Kenema is not determinative for his JCE liability.2095 This argument is rejected.

7601. para. 803: Third, Kallon argues that he was absent from Kenema and Tongo Field at the time the unlawful killings there were committed.2096 His reference in support to the testimonies of TF1-071, TF1-125, TF1-367 and DMK-047 is but a mere restatement of this evidence as presented before the Trial Chamber in support of his alibi for Kenema District.2097 The Trial Chamber assessed this evidence, but was not convinced that there was any reasonable possibility that his alibi was true.2098 Simply repeating this evidence on appeal, Kallon fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's assessment thereof was unreasonable.

7603. para. 900: In relation to acts of physical violence in Kenema District, Kallon submits that there was no evidence that he knew about, contributed to, or shared with the perpetrators the intent to commit the beatings of TF1-122 and of TF1-129.2352 He also claims a lack of evidence that he knew about or shared the intent for the amputations of the hands of three civilians and the flogging of TF1-197 and his younger brother.2353 As to the amputations, Kallon further claims a lack of evidence that he "was in any way linked to the perpetrators of the crime," and as to the flogging he avers that the perpetrators "were neither under his control or authority."2354 The Prosecution responds that it was only required that Kallon substantially contributed to the JCE.2355 Kallon offers no additional arguments in reply.

7604. para. 905: With respect to physical violence in Kenema District, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not specifically detail how it reached the conclusion that Kallon shared the intent for the acts of physical violence in question, nor did it expressly set out on which evidence it relied.2361 Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber's conclusion was open to a reasonable trier of fact. Based on the "widespread and systematic nature of the crimes," the Trial Chamber found that the Supreme Council, of which Kallon was a member, initiated a "deliberate" policy of commission of crimes.2362 Kallon was also "directly involved in the commission of crimes designed to further the common purpose," in particular the killing of enslaved civilian miners and enslavement, both of which he was found to have endorsed.2363 He had an active combat role in the February/March 1998 attack on Koidu Town during which an unknown number of civilians were killed by Junta forces.2364 Moreover, the Trial Chamber found that Kallon endorsed Johnny Paul Koroma's order to burn houses and kill civilians in Koidu Town in March 1998.2365 He was further found to have participated in a mock vote on TF1-015's life, wherein he voted to kill the witness.2366 In addition, Kallon received regular communications about the activities of the joint forces in Kono.2367

7605. para. 906: The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, holds that these findings provide a sufficient basis on which a reasonable trier of fact could have inferred that Kallon also intended this crime. As Kallon does not question the evidence underpinning these findings, and in light of the fact that JCE liability does not require that Kallon knew about or intended the specific criminal incidents in question,2368 the Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, rejects his submission.

7606. para. 907: Turning to Kallon's actus reus, the Appeals Chamber notes that he did not have to participate specifically in the crimes, so long as his participation in the JCE was such that he thereby significantly contributed to them.2369 JCE liability also does not require "control or authority" over the perpetrators.2370 Trial Chamber found that the three amputations and the flogging were both committed by fighters led by Staff Alhaji, who was used by the JCE members to commit crimes in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose.2371 These findings demonstrate how the Trial Chamber "linked" the crimes to Kallon as a participant in the JCE.2372 Because Kallon does not address the evidence relied on for these findings, his submission is dismissed.

7610. para. 933: The Appeals Chamber finds that a reasonable trier of fact could have relied on the relevant parts of TF1-141's testimony to find that "Kallon was actively engaged in the abduction for and planning of training of SBUs in Kono District in February/March 1998."2442 In particular, TF1-141, a former child soldier,2443 testified that after being captured he was with "Morris Kallon's men" and was then taken to a junction in Koidu Town where he saw Kallon. From there, TF1-141 was taken by Akisto, who was "close to Morris Kallon," with a group of combatants to Guinea Highway where he kept "guard in the night as security."2444 The Appeals Chamber recalls that is has upheld the finding that Kallon was in charge of the Guinea Highway area.2445 The Trial Chamber further provided corroboration of these parts of TF1-141's testimony.2446 This submission is rejected.

iii. Gbao – JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kenema District

7614. See above: Chapter 12 – Article 6.1. Liability – RUF – Appellate Judgment – Findings and conclusions – JCE – Categories of JCE and mens rea – Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola – paras.22-41. 43 – 57 [7480].

7615. para. 946: In these sub-grounds of appeal, Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his mens rea for his convictions under JCE 1 and JCE 3 liability. In his Grounds 8(l) and (m), Gbao alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the crimes for which he was convicted under JCE 3 liability in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him and that he willingly took the risk that those crimes might be committed. In his Grounds 8(o), (p), (q), (r) and (s), Gbao alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he shared the intent to commit the crimes for which he was convicted under JCE 1 liability in Kailahun District.

7616. para. 947: The Trial Chamber found with respect to Bo District that Gbao either knew or had reason to know that the deliberate, widespread killings of civilians occurred during RUF

military assaults, that suspected Kamajor collaborators would be killed and that pillage took place during AFRC/RUF operations.2479 As regards Kenema District, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know that deliberate, widespread physical violence against civilians occurred during RUF military assaults, that suspected Kamajor collaborators would be killed or subject to great suffering or serious physical injury and that civilians were enslaved in order to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose.2480 With respect to Kono District, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know that deliberate, widespread sexual violence against civilians occurred during RUF military assaults, that sexual violence would have been inflicted upon these persons, that non-consensual sexual relationships in the context of forced marriages were likely to be committed by RUF fighters, that sexual violence was intended by the members of the JCE to further the goals of the JCE and that civilians were enslaved in order to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose.2481 The Trial Chamber further found that despite knowing that these crimes were being committed, Gbao "continued to pursue the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise."2482

7617. para. 948: On the basis of those findings, the Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao "willingly took the risk that the crimes charged and proved under Counts 3-5 (unlawful killings) and Count 14(pillage) might be committed" in Bo District,2483 that the crimes charged and proved under Counts 3 to 5, 11 and 13 might be committed in Kenema District2484 and that the crimes charged and proved under Counts 3 to 5, 6 to 9, 10 and 11, 13 and 14 might be committed in Kono District.2485 Accordingly, the Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao was liable for those crimes as a member of the joint criminal enterprise.2486

7619. para. 952: Gbao claims that the Trial Chamber failed to adequately explain how the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him.2506 The Appeals Chamber finds that Gbao has mischaracterized the Trial Chamber's findings. Contrary to Gbao's submission, the Trial Chamber did not find that the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him. Rather, the Trial Chamber found that he "knew or had reason to know" of those crimes.2507 The Trial Chamber's only findings with respect to foreseeability were in regard to the crimes of acts of terrorism and acts of collective punishment committed in Bo and Kenema Districts, which the Trial Chamber found were not reasonably foreseeable to Gbao.2508 Gbao's contention is therefore flawed and misconceived, as the Trial

Chamber found that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes in those Districts for which he was held responsible, and did not find, as Gbao suggests, that those crimes were reasonably foreseeable to him. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber based its conclusion that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts2509 on numerous factors, including the facts that: (i) as IDU Commander, Gbao was charged with investigating crimes against civilians;2510 (ii) in his capacity as OSC, Gbao oversaw the G5, which managed the capture and deployment of civilians in furtherance of the RUF's goals;2511 (iii) Gbao had the position as a Vanguard and senior Commander in the RUF;2512 (iv) the RUF ideology justified abuses against civilians considered to be "enemies of the revolution";2513 and (v) RUF fighters deliberately killed civilians on a massive scale during military attacks from the time of the initial invasion in 1991.2514 Moreover, with respect to the crimes of sexual violence in Kono District, the Trial Chamber noted the deliberate and widespread commission of these crimes during RUF military assaults,2515 and inferred from Gbao's important role and oversight functions that he knew that non-consensual sexual relationships were likely to be committed by RUF fighters in the context of forced marriage.2516 It further considered that forced marriage was important to the RUF both as a tactic of war and as a means of obtaining unpaid logistical support for troops.2517

7620. para. 953: Finally, Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber did not explain its finding that Gbao willingly took the risk that such crimes might be committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts.2518 The Appeals Chamber recalls that, as a general rule, a Trial Chamber "is required only to make findings on those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count";2519 it "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes"2520 nor is it "required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."2521 For each of the types of crimes committed in those districts, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the crimes.2522 The Trial Chamber further found that Gbao, despite having that knowledge, continued to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE.2523 Accordingly, the Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao willingly took the risk that such crimes would be committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts and was responsible for those crimes as a member of the JCE.2524 In light of these findings, the Appeals Chamber concludes that Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber did not provide sufficient reasoning for its conclusion.

"by receiving and adhering to this ideology and imparting it to all recruits … the Accused knew, ought to know, and are in fact presumed to have known, that the Commanders and the fighters under their control targeted, molested and killed innocent civilians who were not taking part in hostilities."2526 Gbao fails to show that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on his role as an ideological instructor at Baima base and his knowledge of the RUF ideology more generally to establish that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes. In addition, the Trial Chamber relied on a number of different grounds to establish Gbao's mens rea.

7622. para. 955: In arguing that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes committed, Gbao points to certain other of the Trial Chamber's findings and argues that these findings contradict that conclusion. However, Gbao fails to address the findings upon which the Trial Chamber relied. In particular, Gbao does not address the Trial Chamber's findings that the RUF ideology justified abuses against civilians considered to be "enemies of the revolution"2527 and that RUF fighters deliberately killed civilians on a massive scale during military attacks from the time of the initial invasion in 1991.2528 While Gbao notes that the Trial Chamber found no evidence to indicate that Gbao received reports regarding unlawful killings,2529 that finding does not establish that no reasonable trier of fact could conclude that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the unlawful killings. Similarly, Gbao notes the finding that the IDU did not have power or authority over military activities,2530 and the finding that Gbao did not visit the frontline and was not involved in military planning.2531 However, these findings do not establish that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Gbao's roles as OSC and overall IDU Commander, in which roles he supervised the RUF security units, and was charged with investigating crimes against civilians, to determine that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes.2532 Finally, in arguing that he was not in and did not communicate with anyone in Bo, Kenema or Kono Districts, and did not communicate with the AFRC Supreme Council,2533 Gbao fails to address the Trial Chamber's finding that the members of the JCE, including himself,2534 ever contemplated the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 in order to gain and exercise political power and control "over … Sierra Leone."2535 He therefore fails to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts.

7623. para. 1061: Second, Gbao argues that he had only a nominal role as OSC outside Kailahun District,2927 noting that the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence that he received reports of unlawful killings in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts or that he failed in his duty to ensure proper investigations were conducted in those areas.2928 The Appeals Chamber notes that the findings Gbao cites do not show that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he had a more than nominal role outside Kailahun District, particularly in light of the Trial Chamber's specific findings regarding his practical influence and authority over the RUF security apparatus as a whole. Furthermore, Gbao fails to show that it was not open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he significantly contributed to the JCE on the basis of his contributions in Kailahun District. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Gbao's significant role as OSC in Kailahun District,2929 his supervision of the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District2930 and the finding that Gbao had considerable prestige and power in the RUF in Kailahun District.2931 Moreover, the Trial Chamber specifically found that Kailahun District played an important role in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> The[] widespread and systematic crimes [by the RUF in Kailahun2932] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.2933

b. Planning – Kenema District

i. Sesay – Planning – Child soldiers - Kenema District

7624. para. 749: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono, Bombali and Kenema Districts.1948 The Trial Chamber held that the execution of this system of conscription required a substantial degree of planning, and that this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organisation.1949

7625. para. 750: The Trial Chamber also found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of this system of conscription.1950 It, therefore, convicted him under Article 6(1) for planning the "use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000, as charged in Count 12."1951

7626. para. 755: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay contributed to the planning of the offence under Count 12 by issuing orders that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu.1971 Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber found that these "young boys" were in fact 15 years of age and above.1972 However, Sesay misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings which referred to "young boys" to include persons of at least 15 years of age as well as SBUs comprising children as young as 9 to 11 years of age.1973

7628. para. 757: This testimony is consistent with the testimony of TF1-362, relied on by the Trial Chamber to find that civilians captured on the highway to Freetown from 1997 onward, as well as people from Daru and the SLA, were brought to Bunumbu training base at the command of Issa Sesay.1979 Importantly, although Sesay challenges the Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-362 in other contexts, he does not impugn these findings.1980

7629. para. 758: Trial Chambers enjoy broad discretion in their assessment of evidence and determination of the weight to accord testimony. In general, a Trial Chamber may in the exercise of its discretion rely on a single witness for support of its factual findings. With respect to TF1-366, the Trial Chamber stated that it "has not accepted the testimony of TF1-366 as it relates to the acts and conduct of the Accused unless it was corroborated in some material aspect by a reliable witness."1981

evidence was found credible by the Trial Chamber.1982 The Trial Chamber's failure to explicitly cite TF1-362's testimony for the impugned finding is unfortunate, but in the circumstances caused no error.

7631. para. 760: Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding, on the basis of testimony of TF1-362, that he personally communicated reports to Bunumbu and ordered that the training camp be moved from Bunumbu to Yengema.1983 Sesay, however, fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber could not reasonably rely on TF1-362 for these findings. As Sesay does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion to assess the witness's credibility or determine the weight it attached to his testimony, this part of Sesay's argument fails.

7632. para. 761: Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied upon Witnesses TF1-114 and TF1-1081984 to support its finding that children were forcibly trained,1985 but disregarded their testimony that, Sesay contends, "contradicted TF1-362's account of Sesay's involvement in the training base." However, Sesay fails to demonstrate how the testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-108 contradicts the testimony relied upon by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber is unable to infer his argument. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "[w]hile it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record."1986 Sesay fails to show error in the Trial Chamber's finding.

7633. para. 762: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of the RUF system of child use by, inter alia, receiving reports on training at Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema.1987 Specifically, the Trial Chamber found that the adjutant at the base drew up a list of recruits including their names, ages and other personal data.1988 Sesay submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that receipt of reports substantially contributed to the crime of child conscription or use.1989 He posits that the alleged planning must be found to have actually led to the commission of specific crimes.1990

reported directly through Sesay to Bockarie, until Bockarie left the RUF in December 1999, after which she reported to Sesay only.1995 According to the Trial Chamber, records were kept of the ages of SBUs and SGUs trained at Bunumbu and Yengema, from which it could be inferred that the fighters who conducted the training knew or had reason to know that certain trainees were under the age of 15.1996

7635. para. 764: The Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay's receipt of reports is relevant circumstantial evidence supporting the findings that "the execution of this system of conscription [of child soldiers] required a substantial degree of planning"1997 and that "this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organization,"1998 including Sesay.1999 That reports on the training of child soldiers were transmitted to RUF headquarters signifies that the conscription of child soldiers was highly organised, and that the RUF leadership was responsible for that organisation. Moreover, the creation and transmission of training reports represents a mechanism through which the RUF headquarters could monitor the implementation of the planned conscription of child soldiers. Sesay's receipt of such reports was indicative that he had participated in that planning process. Accordingly, contrary to Sesay's contention, the Trial Chamber did not consider that he substantially contributed to the planning by merely receiving reports, but that his receipt of such reports was part of the evidence taken into consideration in coming to the conclusion that he had participated in the planning at both the preparatory and execution phases.

7637. para. 766: The Trial Chamber acknowledged the "concerns" raised by the Defence,2002 and indicated that it was "uneasy with portions of TF1-141's testimony that appear[ed] to be fanciful and thus implausible."2003 The Trial Chamber noted that the witness was captured by the RUF in 1998 and remained with the group until 2000, when he was demobilised.2004 The Trial Chamber considered that although the witness was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder as a result of his experience as a child soldier with the RUF, he was nonetheless able to give truthful testimony.2005 The Trial Chamber concluded that, after seeing the witness in court, hearing his testimony and observing him under cross-examination, he "came across as a candid

witness." The Trial Chamber, therefore, "generally accepted his testimony, especially as it relates to his own experiences as a child combatant."2006

7638. para. 767: Sesay contends the witness was "constantly contradicting himself," and that the Trial Chamber disregarded a "significant contradiction" in the witness's testimony, but he only points to one purported contradiction, which, even if a contradiction, was not material to the findings Sesay contests here.2007 Sesay further fails to show what portions of the witness's testimony contain discrepancies that made the Trial Chamber's assessment of the witness's credibility unreasonable. Seasy thus fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting parts of the witness's evidence.

7639. para. 768: Taking into account the foregoing discussion, the Appeals Chamber will now consider Sesay's broader claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him liable for planning the use of child soldiers.

7640. para. 769: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in concluding that his acts amounted to "planning."2008 The Appeals Chamber considers that whether particular acts amount to a substantial contribution to the crime for the purposes of planning liability is to be assessed on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole. In concluding that Sesay's cumulative conduct fulfilled the actus reas of planning, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Sesay gave orders in June 1998 that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and that he received reports on training in Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema;2009 (ii) he visited Camp Lion where he addressed the recruits and told them that they would be sent to the battlefield; and that if they failed to comply with orders they would be executed;2010 (iii) he visited RUF fighters including children under the age of 15 who were preparing to conduct an attack on Daru and distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters;2011 and (iv) he participated in an attack on Koidu in December 1998 together with his bodyguards, including children under the age of 15.2012

7641. para. 770: Sesay fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he performed the actus reus of planning. His contention appears to be centred on the notion that none of his acts as found by the Trial Chamber constitute the "planning" or "designing" of the crimes per se. However, Sesay does not explain why a reasonable trier of fact could not have inferred from these findings and other evidence that he had substantially contributed to designing the criminal conduct. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes in particular the Trial Chamber's findings that Sesay ordered the training of child soldiers, received reports on such training and personally visited the Camp Lion training camp, addressing and threatening the child soldier conscripts there. Therefore, in inferring that Sesay contributed to the planning of the crimes, the Trial Chamber did not rely solely on Sesay's command role, as Sesay suggests.2013 Rather, the Trial Chamber further considered Sesay's personal and direct participation in the conscription and training process. Specifically, the acts relied on by the Trial Chamber evince that Sesay participated in all stages of that process, from ordering the training of child soldiers to monitoring the implementation of the training to monitoring the use of child soldiers. In addition, although not referenced in its reasoning, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie and Sesay "issued orders to move the RUF training base from Bunumbu to Yengema in Kono District," and that "Sesay personally discussed the creation of the new Yengema base with the training commander."2014 Finally, as noted above, the Trial Chamber found that the highly organised character of the conscription process was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.2015 It was on the basis of these findings as a whole that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes. Sesay fails to show that the Trial Chamber's finding, on the basis of the evidence as a whole, was unreasonable. Sesay's submission is dismissed.

7643. para. 772: However, Sesay again fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's findings, could have concluded that he substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes for which he was held liable. Although Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are "simply insufficient,"2020 and points to the absence of findings regarding his acts with respect to the conscription and use of child soldiers in Kenema and Bombali Districts2021 and before February 1998,2022 he does not explain how the Trial Chamber's conclusion was accordingly unreasonable. In particular, Sesay does not show that no reasonable trier of fact could infer from the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his acts, in combination with other findings such as those concerning the nature of the conscription and use of child soldiers, that he substantially contributed to the planning of crimes committed in other locations as well. In merely submitting that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are insufficient to ground his liability for planning the other instances of the crime, Sesay fails to explain why this is so. Sesay further fails to point to other findings or evidence to show that the crimes in Kenema and Bombali Districts were unique or distinct from the crimes in Kailahun and Kono Districts. While Sesay correctly submits that he can only be held liable for those crimes he substantially contributed to the planning of, he does not show how no reasonable trier of fact could infer, on the basis of his acts with respect to Bunumbu and Yengema in particular, that he substantially contributed as well to the planning of the other crimes for which he was held liable.

7644. para. 773: Sesay further fails to explain why the manner in which the Trial Chamber evaluated the evidence precluded it from finding that he substantially contributed to the planning of the specific crimes for which he was held liable.2023 Sesay cites no authority for his position that the Trial Chamber could only make such a finding on the basis of the identity of the victims, or that the Trial Chamber was required to demand a specimen count here. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber found that the crimes committed were those that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of on the basis of the identity of the perpetrators and the manner in which the crimes were committed. Sesay fails to address the Trial Chamber's approach and to explain how it was erroneous.

under the control of Gullit after the cessation of the JCE.2026 In contrast, Sesay was found to have planned an RUF system of use of child soldiers.2027

ii. Kallon – Planning – Child soldiers – Kenema District

7649. para. 918: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gave orders that "young boys" be trained, as the Trial Chamber itself found that the boys to be trained were over 15 years of age.2394 The Appeals Chamber has previously considered this issue in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that Kallon misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings.2395 Similarly, the Appeals Chamber has previously considered the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Witness TF1-366 in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that the Trial Chamber reliance on that testimony was not erroneous.2396 Kallon further fails otherwise to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding the testimony of Witness TF1-366 credible. This submission is rejected.

7650. para. 919: The Appeals Chamber also rejects Kallon's argument that it is not established beyond reasonable doubt that the boys and girls trained at the RUF training bases were under the age of 15.2397 Witnesses TF1-141 and TF1-263 testified that they were 12 and 14 years of age respectively at the time they were abducted and sent for military training.2398 Similarly, Witness Dennis Koker saw Kallon bring juveniles under the age of 15 to Bunumbu for training.2399 The Trial Chamber accepted the testimonies of the Witnesses and found them credible. Kallon has not established that no reasonable trier of fact could rely on their testimonies for a finding of fact. This submission is rejected.

consistent pattern of conduct in violation of Rule 93(B) of the Rules. Rather, the Trial Chamber found that the fact that children between the ages of 8 and 15 were trained at Camp Naama in Liberia; and Matru Jong and Pendembu and Camp Zogoda in Sierra Leone "demonstrates a consistent pattern of conduct by the RUF of recruiting and training children for military purpose that began as early as 1991 and continued throughout the Indictment period."2402 Although the Trial Chamber also noted that Kallon was seen at Camp Zogoda with fighters in 1994, its finding on the consistent pattern of conduct related to the RUF rather than Kallon specifically. Moreover, there is no further indication that the Trial Chamber relied on the evidence that Kallon was at Camp Zogoda in 1994 to establish his liability for planning the crimes between 1997 and 2000. There is therefore no violation of Rule 93(B) of the Rules and consequently, no error as alleged. This submission is rejected.

7652. para. 921: With respect to Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber found that he and Sesay gave orders for "young boys" to be trained, but that those boys were 15 years of age and above, the Appeals Chamber refers to its conclusion above that some of the "young boys" included persons both under and above the age of 15.2403 The Appeals Chamber recalls its decision concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker, particularly in relation to the ages of the children with whom they associated Kallon.2404 The Appeals Chamber also recalls that the Trial Chamber exercised caution in determining the ages of children associated with the rebel factions in its findings.2405 The Appeals Chamber defers to these findings2406 and dismisses Kallon's argument regarding the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker relating to the ages of children.

7653. para. 922: Kallon contends that the Trial Chamber found that he "knew or had reason to know that the persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15" was erroneous given its inconclusive nature, thereby suggesting that it was not the only reasonable inference that could be drawn from the evidence.2407 Kallon mischaracterises the Trial Chamber's findings. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not find that he "knew or had reason to know that persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15."2408 Rather, the Trial Chamber identified several factors which it found to be "cumulatively sufficient to put the fighters who perpetrated the abductions and military training on notice that the persons involved may have been under the age of 15."2409 Accordingly, this part of Kallon's argument must fail.

of 15, it was incumbent upon the perpetrator to ascertain the person's age."2410 The Appeals Chamber has previously held that the prohibition on conscripting or using child soldiers existed in customary international law at the times relevant to the offences in this case, and that violation of this prohibition incurs individual criminal responsibility in customary international law.2411 In reaching those holdings, the Appeals Chamber observed that a significant body of conventional international law imposes an obligation on parties to "take all feasible measures" to ensure that children are not recruited or used in hostilities.2412 The accused are under a duty to act with due diligence to ensure that children under the age of 15 are not recruited or used in combat. Failure to exercise such due diligence to ascertain the age of recruits does not relieve an accused of his liability for their recruitment or use.2413 The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no error in the Trial Chamber's statement that the accused were under a duty to exercise due diligence to ascertain the age of a child.

7655. para. 924: Kallon submits a number of arguments contesting the Trial Chamber's finding that he planned the use of child soldiers.2414 Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber relied solely on his command role to support that finding,2415 and argues that there was no evidence that he was involved in the planning of the abduction and training of children.2416

(vii) Kono District

a. JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kono District

i. Sesay - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kono District

7659. para. 627: The Appeals Chamber addresses Sesay's five challenges in turn. First, Sesay challenges his participation in respect of the attack on Koidu Town and his tacit endorsement and encouragement of the looting during Operation Pay Yourself.1562 He argues that, "[e]ven if the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Sesay planned [the Koidu] attack was correct," no evidence showed that such planning also involved planning the crimes of terror and collective punishment committed during the attack.1563 The Appeals Chamber observes, however, that it was not required that Sesay planned the crimes committed during the attack in order to significantly contribute to them. As to the looting, Sesay merely repeats the fact, noted by the Trial Chamber, that he was not actively engaged in the attack on Koidu Town as he was still recovering from the injury he had sustained during the attack on Bo Town.1564 However, Sesay fails to account for the finding that, even though Sesay was injured, the Commander of the attack (Superman) was subordinate to him during the attack.1565 Sesay therefore fails to demonstrate that, on the evidence as a whole, no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he tacitly endorsed and encouraged the looting. These arguments are rejected.

7660. para. 628: Second, Sesay disputes the Trial Chamber's finding that he endorsed Johnny Paul Koroma's instructions to burn houses and kill civilians in Koidu in March 1998.1566 This challenge turns on the quality of Witness TF1-334's testimony, on which the impugned finding relies.1567 Sesay claims that TF1-334, contrary to the Trial Chamber's finding, did not testify that the meeting at which Sesay endorsed Koroma's instructions took place at Kimberlite, yet he fails to address the other evidence relied upon by the Trial Chamber when it found that the meeting was held at Kimberlite.1568 In any event, he fails to explain how such a mistake as to location would render unreasonable the finding that the meeting took place and that Sesay endorsed Koroma's instructions.

7661. para. 629: Sesay further argues that the Trial Chamber failed to explain why it accepted TF1-334's testimony in spite of the fact that the witness was an accomplice, was released from prison during his involvement with the Prosecution, sought relocation, obtained unexplained payments from the Prosecution, and gave evidence in court which differed from a previous interview.1569 This is not true. The Trial Chamber noted TF1-334 among the "insider" witnesses who may be considered accomplices, and "cautioned itself on the risk and danger of accepting uncorroborated evidence from an insider witness as credible."1570 The Trial Chamber also considered that "[t]he Defence has alleged that some of the Prosecution evidence is unreliable because the witnesses were provided with financial incentives to testify, or were aided in some other way such as their relocation to another country."1571 It noted the forms of remuneration to which individuals testifying before the Special Court may be entitled, and that the payments received by certain witnesses were disclosed and admitted as evidence.1572 Further, Sesay neither provides any reference to the alleged earlier interview of TF1-334, nor does he explain why it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to prefer the witness's viva voce evidence instead of the interview.1573 Sesay's challenges to the quality of TF1-334's testimony are accordingly dismissed.

7662. para. 630: Third, Sesay disputes that he was involved in the forced mining in Kono before December 1998, and argues that his involvement with the Yengema training base could not constitute participation in the JCE because the base did not start operating until late 1998 or early 1999.1574 Both arguments are based on the Trial Chamber's findings. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay participated in the forced labour in diamond mines in Kono "between 14 February and May 1998" in order to further the Common Criminal Purpose.1575 While the Trial Chamber provided more detailed findings on Sesay's involvement in the mining in Kono after December 1998,1576—and appears to have erroneously relied on some of this later involvement for its finding on Sesay's participation in the JCE1577—the Appeals Chamber is satisfied it was nonetheless open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that Sesay participated in the JCE by being involved in forced mining in Kono between 14 February and May 1998. The Trial Chamber found that "[a]s early as August 1997 the AFRC/RUF Junta forced civilians to conduct alluvial diamond mining throughout Kono District"1578 and that the practice of forced mining in Kono "continued throughout 1998."1579 During the period of joint AFRC/RUF control over Kono District between February/March 1998 and late April 1998, there was a "widespread commission by RUF and AFRC fighters of … enslavement."1580 Sesay organised the integrated AFRC/RUF command structure in Koidu Town and appointed Superman overall Commander in Kono District;1581 it was Superman who on 30 March 1998 issued a written order to Commanders to hand over all civilians for mining.1582 The Appeals Chamber therefore dismisses Sesay's challenge to his participation in the JCE insofar as it pertains to the forced mining in Kono District.

7663. para. 631: As to the Yengema training base, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that it was established after Kono had been recaptured by the RUF in December 1998, that is, at least seven months after the JCE ended.1583 The Prosecution argues that the "reference to Yengema must also be seen in its context as a reference to involvement in the planning and creation of the base."1584 However, the Appeals Chamber fails to see how the fact that Sesay was involved in planning and creating a training base which started operating seven months after the crimes for which he allegedly incurred JCE liability were committed could have significantly contributed to those crimes, and any contribution under these circumstances is not explained by Trial Chamber. Such a conclusion was not open to any reasonable trier of fact. The Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding that Sesay participated in the JCE by ordering the establishment, and being involved in the planning and creation of the Yengema training base.1585 The Appeals Chamber will determine whether this error occasioned a miscarriage of justice after having considered Sesay's remaining challenges to his participation in the JCE in Kono District.1586

7664. para. 632: Fourth, Sesay's speculation that the fact that 500 people were trained at Bunumbu during its operation is insufficient to constitute a significant contribution to the maintenance of military manpower, operations or territory as well as terror and collective punishment1587 is unsupported and fails to account for the other ways in which he contributed in Kono District.1588 This submission is dismissed.1589

Sam Bockarie."1594 Sesay's description of the testimony, even if accepted, is not such that it would render this finding unreasonable. Finally, the fact that the Trial Chamber accepted Sesay's testimony that he heard about the killings by Savage in Tombodu in September 1998 does not render unreasonable its conclusion that he received regular radio reports from Kono District, including reports of crimes committed by RUF and AFRC fighters.1595 Whether Bockarie was informed about Rocky's crimes in April or May 1998 is irrelevant to this finding. These submissions are dismissed. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber need not address Sesay's challenge to the finding that Kallon reported to Sesay as BFC, and in any event, this argument is improperly raised for the first time in Sesay's Reply.1596

7666. para. 634: The Appeals Chamber recalls that it has found that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Sesay participated in the JCE by ordering the establishment and being involved in the planning and creation of the Yengema training base.1597 In light of the extensive findings on Sesay's participation in the JCE in Kono District, which we have upheld,1598 and those which have not been challenged,1599 we do not find that the error in relation to the Yengema training base occasioned a miscarriage of justice. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Sesay's Ground 34 in its entirety.

ii. Kallon - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kono District

7667. para. 806: Analysing Kallon's participation in the JCE in Kono District, the Trial Chamber held, inter alia, that Kallon held a high ranking position, was able to give orders to troops that were obeyed and commanded troops within his area of responsibility of laying ambushes.2104 He was assigned to an area known as Guinea Highway, and responsible for mounting ambushes against ECOMOG troops along the Makeni-Kono Highway.2105 In the joint AFRC/RUF hierarchy in Kono District, Kallon was an important and influential Commander who enjoyed considerable respect, power, authority and prestige.2106 Kallon agreed to and endorsed Sesay's and Koroma's instructions to unlawfully kill civilians and burn their houses.2107

Kallon remained in Kono District "and reported to Superman."2120 He was one of several RUF Commanders who were "not directly within the control hierarchy of Superman and did not have discrete combat units or forces assigned to their command."2121 The Appeals Chamber fails to see how these findings prevented any reasonable trier of fact from finding that Kallon nonetheless "was an operational Commander who gave orders which were complied with by troops" and entrusted with the assignments given to Kallon.2122 The finding that Kallon "did not occupy a formal position within the operational command structure of the RUF" and that "it is therefore unclear to what extent he received reports on the actions of troops throughout Kono District"2123 pertains to Kallon's superior responsibility for mutilations in Tomandu in Kono in May 1998, that is, after the JCE had ended as found by the Trial Chamber,2124 and so do not detract from the Appeals Chamber's conclusion. This argument is rejected.

7670. para. 812: Third, Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber's finding that he "would instruct Commanders to undertake ambush laying missions on the basis of orders from Superman" is unsupported by evidence.2125 The Appeals Chamber notes that this finding is not followed by any reference to the evidence. However, the two findings immediately preceding it, namely, that Kallon could give orders which were complied with by troops and that he was entrusted with defending the Makeni-Kono Highway, were both based on evidence, including the testimony of George Johnson.2126 The passage of his testimony relied on by the Trial Chamber for these two findings support the impugned finding that Kallon instructed Commanders to lay ambushes.2127 The remaining part of the impugned finding (that Kallon issued those instructions on the orders of Superman) was not relied on by the Trial Chamber in its relevant findings on Kallon's participation in the JCE,2128 and Kallon does not say whether and if so how it affects his position of authority in Kono as found by the Trial Chamber. Therefore, although the Trial Chamber did not cite evidence for its impugned finding, that did not amount to an error. Kallon's additional claims that his posting at the Makeni-Kono Highway did not vest him with "overall command authority" and that the fighters he instructed did not commit the crimes charged are irrelevant as the Trial Chamber made no such findings,2129 nor was it obliged to do so in order to find him liable under the JCE theory. This submission is rejected.

7671. para. 813: Fourth, Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on the uncorroborated testimony of TF1-141 to find that he "gave orders to fighters at daily muster parades in the Guinea Highway area"2130 and that he "enjoyed privileges only afforded to senior RUF Commanders, such as personal bodyguards."2131 The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not rely exclusively on TF1-141 for these two findings, which concern the acts and conduct of Kallon, because it made other similar findings based on other evidence.2132 This submission is rejected.

7672. para. 814: Fifth, Kallon challenges the reliability of TF1-361, the testimony of which the Trial Chamber relied on to find that "Kallon supervised the burning of homes on the orders of Superman" during the retreat from Kono during the April 1998 ECOMOG attack.2133 However, in support Kallon simply invites the Appeals Chamber to reassess the witness's evidence, arguing without more that the witness's testimony in cross-examination should be preferred over that relied on by the Trial Chamber. In any event, the Appeals Chamber notes that the parts of TF1-361's testimony Kallon invokes are not inconsistent with the impugned finding.2134 This submission is rejected.

7673. para. 815: Lastly, Kallon's challenge to the finding that being a Vanguard afforded him "power and engendered respect," is dismissed because Kallon addresses none of the findings or evidence the Trial Chamber relied on to reach this conclusion.2135

7674. para. 928: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon incurred JCE liability for enslavement (Count 13) in Kenema, Kono and Kailahun Districts.2422 Kallon had bodyguards who were under the age of 15 years, and he knew the SBUs were used to force the enslaved mining and guard the mining sites.2423 During 1998 and 1999, Kallon brought persons under 15 years of age to be trained by the RUF at Bunumbu.2424 Kallon, therefore, was engaged in the creation and maintenance of a system of enslavement that was created by the RUF in order to maintain and strengthen their fighting force.2425 Through these acts, among others, Kallon was found to have participated in the JCE.2426 The Trial Chamber also found Kallon guilty under superior responsibility for the enslavement of hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998.2427

7675. para. 931: The Appeals Chamber notes that the finding that the "SBUs seen by TF1-141 with Kallon … in Kono in February 1998" and "the boys in SBUs seen by TF1-045 with Kallon in Freetown in 1997 and in Makeni in 1999 to 2000" were not bodyguards2434 could be read to contradict the finding that "Kallon had bodyguards who were under the age of 15 years."2435 However, Kallon fails to establish that this contradiction, if any, occasioned a miscarriage of justice. In inferring that Kallon was engaged in the system of enslavement, the Trial Chamber's findings show that it also relied on his contribution to the use of children under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities,2436 which the Trial Chamber found included the use of children to guard the mines at Tombodu in Kono in February/March 1998,2437 and to intimidate and kill civilians working there.2438 These findings were supported by evidence which Kallon does not address. This submission is therefore rejected.

7676. para. 932: The Trial Chamber's holding that it would not use evidence that Kallon may have personally conscripted children is limited to the use of that evidence for the purpose of determining Kallon's responsibility for personal commission under Count 12.2439 For purposes of that mode of liability, the allegation that Kallon brought children for training at Bunumbu was a material fact which was insufficiently pleaded in the Indictment, and so the Trial Chamber declined to enter a conviction that Kallon personally committed the crimes charged under Count 12. However, Kallon's conviction under Count 13, which is the subject matter of his present ground of appeal, was not based on personal commission, but instead on his participation in a JCE.2440 The Trial Chamber did not exclude evidence of Kallon bringing children for training at Bunumbu from consideration in respect of the mode of liability of JCE, the pleading requirements of which are different from personal commission.2441 Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

7678. para. 935: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon incurred JCE liability for the following instances of pillage: (i) the looting of Le 800,000 by Bockarie from Ibrahim Kamara in June 1997 in Sembehun in Bo District;2447 (ii) the appropriation of a bicycle, Le 500,000 and other items from TF1-197 near Tombodu in Kono District;2448 (iii) an unknown number of acts of pillage during the February/March 1998 attack on Koidu Town;2449 and (iv) the looting of funds from Tankoro Bank in Koidu Town.2450 The Trial Chamber found that Kallon was present at a meeting when Johnny Paul Koroma ordered that all houses in Koidu Town should be burned to the ground, which message Sesay reiterated.2451 Looting of civilian property was committed during the execution of the order.2452 Civilians complained to Kallon and Superman, who were 7681. para. 943: The above findings by the Trial Chamber also demonstrate that Kallon shared the intent with the perpetrators of the pillage in Kono, which is why his submission to the contrary with respect to the looting of items from TF1-197 fails. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that it was not required that Kallon knew about this specific criminal incident in order for him to incur JCE liability for it. As to the "relationship" between Kallon and the perpetrators of this crime, the Appeals Chamber has already found that the Trial Chamber provided a sufficiently reasoned opinion as to how it imputed the crimes of pillage in Kono to the JCE members.2478 Kallon addresses none of the evidence on which that reasoning relies. Kallon's challenge relating to the looting of items from TF1-197 is therefore rejected.

Commanders on the ground, about the burning, harassment and looting, but they took no action in response.2453

7679. para. 941: Regarding the finding that Kallon was present at the meeting when Johnny Paul Koroma ordered the burning of Koidu Town, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber referred solely to Witness TF1-366 for this finding.2471 It also referenced only TF1-366's testimony to find that Kallon took no action in response to civilians complaining to him about the burning, harassment and looting that followed Koroma's order.2472 The Trial Chamber held that it would not accept TF1-366's testimony without corroboration as it relates to the acts and conducts of the Appellants.2473

iii. Gbao - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kono District

7685. See above: Chapter 12 – Article 6.1. Liability – RUF – Appellate Judgment – Findings and conclusions – JCE – Categories of JCE and mens rea – Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola – paras. 22-41, 43– 57 [7480].

7686. para. 946: In these sub-grounds of appeal, Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his mens rea for his convictions under JCE 1 and JCE 3 liability. In his Grounds 8(l) and (m), Gbao alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the crimes for which he was convicted under JCE 3 liability in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him and that he willingly took the risk that those crimes might be committed. In his Grounds 8(o), (p), (q), (r) and (s), Gbao alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he shared the intent to commit the crimes for which he was convicted under JCE 1 liability in Kailahun District.

7687. para. 947: The Trial Chamber found with respect to Bo District that Gbao either knew or had reason to know that the deliberate, widespread killings of civilians occurred during RUF military assaults, that suspected Kamajor collaborators would be killed and that pillage took place during AFRC/RUF operations.2479 As regards Kenema District, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know that deliberate, widespread physical violence against civilians occurred during RUF military assaults, that suspected Kamajor collaborators would be killed or subject to great suffering or serious physical injury and that civilians were enslaved in order to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose.2480 With respect to Kono District, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know that deliberate, widespread sexual violence against civilians occurred during RUF military assaults, that sexual violence would have been inflicted upon these persons, that non-consensual sexual relationships in the context of forced marriages were likely to be committed by RUF fighters, that sexual violence was intended by the members of the JCE to further the goals of the JCE and that civilians were enslaved in order to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose.2481 The Trial Chamber further found that despite knowing that these crimes were being committed, Gbao "continued to pursue the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise."2482

7690. para. 952: Gbao claims that the Trial Chamber failed to adequately explain how the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him.2506 The Appeals Chamber finds that Gbao has mischaracterized the Trial Chamber's findings. Contrary to Gbao's submission, the Trial Chamber did not find that the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts were reasonably foreseeable to him. Rather, the Trial Chamber found that he "knew or had reason to know" of those crimes.2507 The Trial Chamber's only findings with respect to foreseeability were in regard to the crimes of acts of terrorism and acts of collective punishment committed in Bo and Kenema Districts, which the Trial Chamber found were not reasonably foreseeable to Gbao.2508 Gbao's contention is therefore flawed and misconceived, as the Trial Chamber found that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes in those Districts for which he was held responsible, and did not find, as Gbao suggests, that those crimes were reasonably foreseeable to him. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber based its conclusion that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts2509 on numerous factors, including the facts that: (i) as IDU Commander, Gbao was charged with investigating crimes against civilians;2510 (ii) in his capacity as OSC, Gbao oversaw the G5, which managed the capture and deployment of civilians in furtherance of the RUF's goals;2511 (iii) Gbao had the position as a Vanguard and senior Commander in the RUF;2512 (iv) the RUF ideology justified abuses against civilians considered to be "enemies of the revolution";2513 and (v) RUF fighters deliberately killed civilians on a massive scale during military attacks from the time of the initial invasion in 1991.2514 Moreover, with respect to the crimes of sexual violence in Kono District, the Trial Chamber noted the deliberate and widespread commission of these crimes during RUF military assaults,2515 and inferred from Gbao's important role and oversight functions that he knew that non-consensual sexual relationships were likely to be committed by RUF fighters in the context of forced marriage.2516 It further considered that forced marriage was important to the RUF both as a tactic of war and as a means of obtaining unpaid logistical support for troops.2517

7691. para. 953: Finally, Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber did not explain its finding that Gbao willingly took the risk that such crimes might be committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts.2518 The Appeals Chamber recalls that, as a general rule, a Trial Chamber "is required only to make findings on those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count";2519 it "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes"2520 nor is it "required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."2521 For each of the types of crimes committed in those districts, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the crimes.2522 The Trial Chamber further found that Gbao, despite having that knowledge, continued to pursue the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE.2523 Accordingly, the Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao willingly took the risk that such crimes would be committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts and was responsible for those crimes as a member of the JCE.2524 In light of these findings, the Appeals Chamber concludes that Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber did not provide sufficient reasoning for its conclusion.

7693. para. 955: In arguing that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes committed, Gbao points to certain other of the Trial Chamber's findings and argues that these findings contradict that conclusion. However, Gbao fails to address the findings upon which the Trial Chamber relied. In particular, Gbao does not address the Trial Chamber's findings that the RUF ideology justified abuses against civilians considered to be "enemies of the revolution"2527 and that RUF fighters deliberately killed civilians on a massive scale during military attacks from the time of the initial invasion in 1991.2528 While Gbao notes that the Trial

Chamber found no evidence to indicate that Gbao received reports regarding unlawful killings,2529 that finding does not establish that no reasonable trier of fact could conclude that Gbao knew or had reason to know of the unlawful killings. Similarly, Gbao notes the finding that the IDU did not have power or authority over military activities,2530 and the finding that Gbao did not visit the frontline and was not involved in military planning.2531 However, these findings do not establish that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Gbao's roles as OSC and overall IDU Commander, in which roles he supervised the RUF security units, and was charged with investigating crimes against civilians, to determine that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes.2532 Finally, in arguing that he was not in and did not communicate with anyone in Bo, Kenema or Kono Districts, and did not communicate with the AFRC Supreme Council,2533 Gbao fails to address the Trial Chamber's finding that the members of the JCE, including himself,2534 ever contemplated the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 in order to gain and exercise political power and control "over … Sierra Leone."2535 He therefore fails to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that he knew or had reason to know of the crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts.

7694. para. 1061: Second, Gbao argues that he had only a nominal role as OSC outside Kailahun District,2927 noting that the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence that he received reports of unlawful killings in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts or that he failed in his duty to ensure proper investigations were conducted in those areas.2928 The Appeals Chamber notes that the findings Gbao cites do not show that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he had a more than nominal role outside Kailahun District, particularly in light of the Trial Chamber's specific findings regarding his practical influence and authority over the RUF security apparatus as a whole. Furthermore, Gbao fails to show that it was not open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he significantly contributed to the JCE on the basis of his contributions in Kailahun District. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Gbao's significant role as OSC in Kailahun District,2929 his supervision of the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District2930 and the finding that Gbao had considerable prestige and power in the RUF in Kailahun District.2931 Moreover, the Trial Chamber specifically found that Kailahun District played an important role in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> The[] widespread and systematic crimes [by the RUF in Kailahun2932] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in

Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.2933

b. Planning – Kono District

i. Sesay – Planning – Enslavement - Kono District

7695. para. 681: The Trial Chamber found Sesay criminally responsible for planning the enslavement of hundreds of civilians to work in mines at Tombodu and throughout Kono District between December 1998 and January 2000.1742

7696. para. 687: The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of this mode of liability requires that the planning was a factor "substantially contributing" to the criminal conduct for which the accused is to be held responsible.1764 The Trial Chamber correctly set out this legal requirement when pronouncing on the legal elements of planning.1765 However, when applying the legal test for planning to the facts now at issue, it found Sesay liable for planning on the basis that his conduct was a "significant" contributory factor to the perpetration of enslavement.1766

7697. para. 688: An accused's "significant" contribution may denote a lesser degree of impact on the crime than "substantial" contribution.1767 Having set out the proper legal standard for planning, which requires "substantial" contribution, the Trial Chamber proceeded to make findings on Sesay's involvement in the enslavement in Kono District between the recapture of the District by RUF troops under his command in December 1998, and January 2000,1768 which demonstrate a "substantial" contribution on his part. For example, the Mining Commander reported to Sesay, and in 2000, Sesay himself appointed a new Overall Mining Commander.1769 Sesay visited Kono District and collected diamonds and kept a house in Koidu Town where he received mining Commanders for this purpose.1770 He visited the mines and ordered that civilians be captured from other Districts and arranged for transportation of the captured civilians to the mines.1771 The Trial Chamber further found that, as the illicit sale of diamonds was the RUF's primary means of financing, the mining system in Kono was designed and supervised at the highest levels, and Sesay, as the BFC and subordinate to Bockarie at that time, was actively and intimately involved in the forced mining operations and its processes in Kono District.1772

7700. para. 691: Sesay's first argues that the Trial Chamber disregarded TF1-304's evidence that the mining in Tombodu did not start in 1999, but instead, that it started between March and April 2000.1775 He specifically impugns the findings at paragraph 1255 of the Trial Judgment, which concern events relating to mining in Tombodu that, the Trial Chamber found, took place "in April 1999." The Trial Chamber relied on TF1-304's testimony-in-chief for these findings.1776 Sesay correctly notes that, when cross-examined on when the mining commenced, the witness repeatedly stated it started in 2000.1777 The latter evidence, if accepted, would place the mining in Tombodu largely outside the timeframe pleaded for the relevant charges in the Indictment.1778

7701. para. 692: The Appeals Chamber, however, is not satisfied that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on TF1-304's testimony-in-chief to find that the mining activities described in paragraph 1255 of the Trial Judgment took place in April 1999. The reason is that a comparison of other parts of TF1-304's testimony with key events in the case demonstrates that TF1-304's chronological description of events corresponds with other findings of the Trial Chamber. TF1-304 testified that Junta forces attacked Tombodu in March 1998,1779 which is consistent with the finding that the AFRC/RUF attacked Kono on or about March 1998.1780 After the RUF attack on Tombodu, TF1-304 fled for Guinea and returned to Tombodu in February 1999, at which point in time the RUF was in Tombodu.1781 This evidence corresponds with the Trial Chamber's finding that, after the RUF re-captured Koidu Town on 16 December 1998,1782 Kono District remained largely under RUF control throughout the Indictment period.1783 While in Tombodu, TF1-304 continued, around March 1999 he was forced by the rebels to retrieve vehicles from the bush,1784 and carried luggage for them and performed other tasks.1785 TF1-304 testified that "when we ceased carrying the luggages [sic]" diamond mining began when Officer Med came in April 1999.1786 Sesay's reference to the testimony of TF1-071 does not support his contention that Officer Med first arrived in Tombodu in 2000; at most, this evidence merely places Officer Med in Tombodu at that time, but it is silent on when he arrived.1787 His additional reference to the testimony of TF1-012 is equally unpersuasive.1788 Sesay's challenge to the Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-304 in paragraph 1255 is therefore rejected.

7702. para. 693: Next, Sesay challenges the Trial Chamber's assessment of TF1-077. The Trial Chamber found that TF1-077 was "mistaken about the year" when testifying to being captured in Koidu Town in December 1999 and then sent to Tombodu to mine, since the witness testified that this incident occurred during the recapture of Koidu, which took place in December 1998.1789 Sesay essentially argues that the Trial Chamber's interpretation is contrary to TF1-077's pre-trial statement, that the witness testified that Officer Med, who allegedly arrived in Tombodu in 2000, was among his capturers, and that the witness mined until disarmament, which did not occur in Kono during 1999.1790 The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by Sesay's arguments. First, Sesay does not address why the Trial Chamber was unreasonable to rely on the witness's reference to the recapture of Koidu, as opposed to other events, to find that the witness was mistaken about the year. Second, as already noted, TF1-071 did not testify when Officer Med arrived in Tombodu in 2000. In fact, TF1-071 indicated that diamond mining by hand occurred in Tombodu from 1998.1791 Third, the Trial Chamber's interpretation that TF1-077 was mistaken about the year is consistent with TF1-304's testimony in examination-in-chief that the mining in Tombodu began in 1999. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied on this basis that the Trial Chamber's impugned finding was reasonable. Sesay's argument is rejected.

instance, he avers that the Trial Chamber failed to address his "real defence" that there was no organised system of enslavement in Kono, but ignores its findings showing precisely such a system.1797 That the Trial Chamber found there was such a system in spite of his position that there was none, does not establish that the Trial Chamber failed to address his "real defence." He also argues without support that the Trial Chamber's finding that "[c]ivilians would go to the surrounding villages on the weekends to find food and would then return to work" contradicts the findings that "[c]ivilians who refused to mine were beaten" and "were constantly supervised by armed men [and so] there was no possibility of escape."1798 Similarly, he fails to explain how the finding indicating that some civilians may have been "willing volunteers" detracts from the findings that other civilians were "captured and brought forcefully to mining sites … and forced to work at gunpoint."1799 The findings that Sesay points to are neither legally contradictory in view of the law of enslavement nor factually contradictory in the context of the Trial Chamber's findings as a whole. Contrary to Sesay's contention, then, the Trial Chamber did not err in failing to explain these "contradictions." In this regard, Sesay alleges an error of fact, arguing that TF1-367 testified that some of the 200 to 300 civilians captured and forced to work at Kaisambo volunteered and that the civilians were not forced to return, but fails to avert to the evidence supporting the finding that civilians who refused to mine were beaten.1800 Further relevant indicia of enslavement is found in the holdings that the "conditions for the hundreds of civilians forced to mine were poor; they were neither paid nor given adequate housing, food or medical treatment" and "they were constantly supervised by armed men."1801

7706. para. 697: Except for the error of law found above, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not fail to provide a reasoned opinion.

7708. para. 699: The Appeals Chamber recalls that "[w]hile there must be a sufficient link between the planning of a crime both at the preparatory and the execution phases, it is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct."1805 The Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay's actions both before and after December 1998 are relevant in this regard. In particular, contrary to the Prosecution's argument,1806 Sesay's conduct pre-December 1998 is relevant to whether a reasonable trier of fact could have found that he planned the enslavement which ensued thereafter.

7709. para. 700: As to his conduct before December 1998, Sesay essentially relies on the findings underlying the conclusion that he was not in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono from May to the end of November 1998.1807 The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that these findings alone show that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that he planned the enslavement from December 1998 onward. The following findings provided a basis for a reasonable trier of fact to find that Sesay was involved in the preparatory phase of planning the enslavement: (i) the RUF continued conducting mining operations in parts of Kono District after having been forced to retreat from Koidu Town in early April 1998;1808 (ii) he led and commanded the RUF troops who re-captured Koidu Town on 16 December 1998, although the Trial Chamber could not specifically determine Sesay's involvement in Kono District between August and November 1998;1809 and (iii) after Koidu Town was retaken, RUF mining in Kono District "intensified significantly,"1810 and "mining operations expanded" to different areas in Kono District, in particular Tombodu.1811 These findings must be read together with those on Sesay's involvement in mining in Kono after December 1998. In particular, the Trial Chamber found that the Mining Commander reported to Sesay,1812 that Sesay visited the mining site at Tombodu and collected diamonds (for which purpose he maintained a house in Koidu),1813 and that he ordered that civilians be captured from other Districts and arranged for transportation of the captured civilians to the mines in Kono.1814

7710. para. 701: Sesay's reference to evidence that Bockarie was in control of the mining,1815 or other evidence allegedly showing that Sesay "had nothing to do with the mining,"1816 fails to address the evidence on which the Trial Chamber based its findings. Moreover, the Trial Chamber recognised that Sesay was "subordinate to Bockarie at the time," but that since the illicit sale of diamonds was the RUF's primary means of financing its operations, "the mining system in Kono District was designed and supervised at the highest levels" and "Sesay, as the BFC … was actively and intimately involved in the forced mining operations" in Kono.1817 The fact that Sesay was subordinate to Bockarie does not exclude that Sesay was involved in planning the enslavement. Sesay's arguments regarding Bockarie's control over the diamond mining in Kono, and Sesay's general lack thereof, are therefore rejected.

7711. para. 702: Other parts of Sesay's submission, however, challenge the evidence on which the Trial Chamber found that he collected diamonds and that he ordered civilians to be captured for mining. As to the former finding, Sesay avers that the Trial Chamber should have relied on TF1-071's evidence in cross-examination instead of that given during examination-in-chief, but fails to explain why the Trial Chamber's assessment of the testimony was unreasonable.1818 He also argues that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on TF1-371, as the witness had no knowledge of pre-2000 mining operations, but fails to explain why the Trial Chamber could not reasonably rely on TF1-367 and TF1-366.1819 This challenge is rejected.

7712. para. 703: Regarding Sesay's order that civilians be captured for mining, the Trial Chamber, relying on TF1-041's testimony, found that Sesay sent a message to Kallon in Makeni requiring civilians to be gathered and sent to Kono for mining. Approximately 400 civilians were gathered by Kallon, jailed and then taken daily to Kono in trucks sent by Sesay.1820 Sesay fails to explain why the fact that none of the persons who executed the order, other than Kallon, were mentioned by the Trial Chamber renders the finding unreasonable. The alleged inconsistencies in TF1-041's testimony Sesay refers to were not such that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to explain expressly how it resolved them.1821 Sesay's challenge to this finding is thus rejected.

7713. para. 704: In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that Sesay fails to establish that, on the basis of its factual findings as a whole, the Trial Chamber erred in finding him responsible for planning the enslavement in Tombodu in Kono District between December 1998 and January 2000. Having thus found, the Appeals Chamber need not address Sesay's argument that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Exhibits 41 and 42 (RUF diamond productions records from Kono), as that challenge is premised on the success of the other arguments under this part of his appeal.1822

ii. Sesay – Planning – Child soldiers – Kono District

7714. para. 749: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono, Bombali and Kenema Districts.1948 The Trial Chamber held that the execution of this system of conscription required a substantial degree of planning, and that this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organisation.1949

7715. para. 750: The Trial Chamber also found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of this system of conscription.1950 It, therefore, convicted him under Article 6(1) for planning the "use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000, as charged in Count 12."1951

7716. para. 755: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay contributed to the planning of the offence under Count 12 by issuing orders that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu.1971 Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber found that these "young boys" were in fact 15 years of age and above.1972 However, Sesay misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings which referred to "young boys" to include persons of at least 15 years of age as well as SBUs comprising children as young as 9 to 11 years of age.1973

7717. para. 756: Sesay further submits that "in any event, the Trial Chamber cites only one piece of valid evidence for this finding: the evidence of Witness TF1-366," and that the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-199 and TF1-371, also cited by the Trial Chamber in further support, do not in fact support the finding.1974 The Trial Chamber provided no citations for its finding that Sesay issued the orders in June 1998, however, it cited the testimony of TF1-366, TF1-199 and TF1-371 for its findings that SBUs were children tasked with carrying weapons for the RUF. Witness TF1-366's testimony most closely supports both findings of the Trial Chamber, including that Sesay issued orders. He testified directly that Kallon and Superman issued orders and Sesay "sent messages" that young boys should be brought to be trained at Bunumbu.1975 He stated that some of the "young boys" were 15 years of age, but that many were SBUs comprising children ages 9 to 11 years and smaller boys.1976 Witness TF1-199 testified that SBUs were "really small boys" and because he was a small boy of 12 years of age, he was called an SBU.1977 However, he did not mention Sesay in his testimony or testify to anyone giving orders. Witness TF1-371 testified that children between the ages of 12 and 18 years were classified as SBUs, and that Sesay had SBUs, one of whom was around 15 years and the other around the age of 16.1978 Importantly, of the testimony cited by the Trial Chamber, only TF1-366 supports the finding that Sesay issued orders for "young boys" to be trained at Bunumbu in June 1998.

7718. para. 757: This testimony is consistent with the testimony of TF1-362, relied on by the Trial Chamber to find that civilians captured on the highway to Freetown from 1997 onward, as well as people from Daru and the SLA, were brought to Bunumbu training base at the command of Issa Sesay.1979 Importantly, although Sesay challenges the Trial Chamber's reliance on TF1-362 in other contexts, he does not impugn these findings.1980

acts and conduct of the Accused unless it was corroborated in some material aspect by a reliable witness."1981

7721. para. 760: Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding, on the basis of testimony of TF1-362, that he personally communicated reports to Bunumbu and ordered that the training camp be moved from Bunumbu to Yengema.1983 Sesay, however, fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber could not reasonably rely on TF1-362 for these findings. As Sesay does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion to assess the witness's credibility or determine the weight it attached to his testimony, this part of Sesay's argument fails.

7722. para. 761: Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied upon Witnesses TF1-114 and TF1-1081984 to support its finding that children were forcibly trained,1985 but disregarded their testimony that, Sesay contends, "contradicted TF1-362's account of Sesay's involvement in the training base." However, Sesay fails to demonstrate how the testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-108 contradicts the testimony relied upon by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber is unable to infer his argument. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "[w]hile it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record."1986 Sesay fails to show error in the Trial Chamber's finding.

7724. para. 763: Reports on the trainees were compiled by the adjutant and sent to the deputy at the training base and then to the training commandant who would forward the reports to an advisor.1991 Next, the reports were either delivered by hand or communicated via radio to Sesay and finally to Bockarie;1992 and Sesay would confirm delivery of the report back to the base.1993 The Trial Chamber found that "[e]very such report was either hand-delivered or communicated via radio to Sesay."1994 The Trial Chamber also found that the training commander at Yengema reported directly through Sesay to Bockarie, until Bockarie left the RUF in December 1999, after which she reported to Sesay only.1995 According to the Trial Chamber, records were kept of the ages of SBUs and SGUs trained at Bunumbu and Yengema, from which it could be inferred that the fighters who conducted the training knew or had reason to know that certain trainees were under the age of 15.1996

7725. para. 764: The Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay's receipt of reports is relevant circumstantial evidence supporting the findings that "the execution of this system of conscription [of child soldiers] required a substantial degree of planning"1997 and that "this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organization,"1998 including Sesay.1999 That reports on the training of child soldiers were transmitted to RUF headquarters signifies that the conscription of child soldiers was highly organised, and that the RUF leadership was responsible for that organisation. Moreover, the creation and transmission of training reports represents a mechanism through which the RUF headquarters could monitor the implementation of the planned conscription of child soldiers. Sesay's receipt of such reports was indicative that he had participated in that planning process. Accordingly, contrary to Sesay's contention, the Trial Chamber did not consider that he substantially contributed to the planning by merely receiving reports, but that his receipt of such reports was part of the evidence taken into consideration in coming to the conclusion that he had participated in the planning at both the preparatory and execution phases.

7727. para. 766: The Trial Chamber acknowledged the "concerns" raised by the Defence,2002 and indicated that it was "uneasy with portions of TF1-141's testimony that appear[ed] to be fanciful and thus implausible."2003 The Trial Chamber noted that the witness was captured by the

RUF in 1998 and remained with the group until 2000, when he was demobilised.2004 The Trial Chamber considered that although the witness was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder as a result of his experience as a child soldier with the RUF, he was nonetheless able to give truthful testimony.2005 The Trial Chamber concluded that, after seeing the witness in court, hearing his testimony and observing him under cross-examination, he "came across as a candid witness." The Trial Chamber, therefore, "generally accepted his testimony, especially as it relates to his own experiences as a child combatant."2006

7728. para. 767: Sesay contends the witness was "constantly contradicting himself," and that the Trial Chamber disregarded a "significant contradiction" in the witness's testimony, but he only points to one purported contradiction, which, even if a contradiction, was not material to the findings Sesay contests here.2007 Sesay further fails to show what portions of the witness's testimony contain discrepancies that made the Trial Chamber's assessment of the witness's credibility unreasonable. Seasy thus fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting parts of the witness's evidence.

7729. para. 768: Taking into account the foregoing discussion, the Appeals Chamber will now consider Sesay's broader claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him liable for planning the use of child soldiers.

7730. para. 769: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in concluding that his acts amounted to "planning."2008 The Appeals Chamber considers that whether particular acts amount to a substantial contribution to the crime for the purposes of planning liability is to be assessed on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole. In concluding that Sesay's cumulative conduct fulfilled the actus reas of planning, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Sesay gave orders in June 1998 that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and that he received reports on training in Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema;2009 (ii) he visited Camp Lion where he addressed the recruits and told them that they would be sent to the battlefield; and that if they failed to comply with orders they would be executed;2010 (iii) he visited RUF fighters including children under the age of 15 who were preparing to conduct an attack on Daru and distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters;2011 and (iv) he participated in an attack on Koidu in December 1998 together with his bodyguards, including children under the age of 15.2012 per se. However, Sesay does not explain why a reasonable trier of fact could not have inferred from these findings and other evidence that he had substantially contributed to designing the criminal conduct. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes in particular the Trial Chamber's findings that Sesay ordered the training of child soldiers, received reports on such training and personally visited the Camp Lion training camp, addressing and threatening the child soldier conscripts there. Therefore, in inferring that Sesay contributed to the planning of the crimes, the Trial Chamber did not rely solely on Sesay's command role, as Sesay suggests.2013 Rather, the Trial Chamber further considered Sesay's personal and direct participation in the conscription and training process. Specifically, the acts relied on by the Trial Chamber evince that Sesay participated in all stages of that process, from ordering the training of child soldiers to monitoring the implementation of the training to monitoring the use of child soldiers. In addition, although not referenced in its reasoning, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie and Sesay "issued orders to move the RUF training base from Bunumbu to Yengema in Kono District," and that "Sesay personally discussed the creation of the new Yengema base with the training commander."2014 Finally, as noted above, the Trial Chamber found that the highly organised character of the conscription process was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.2015 It was on the basis of these findings as a whole that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes. Sesay fails to show that the Trial Chamber's finding, on the basis of the evidence as a whole, was unreasonable. Sesay's submission is dismissed.

7733. para. 772: However, Sesay again fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's findings, could have concluded that he substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes for which he was held liable. Although Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are "simply insufficient,"2020 and points to the absence of findings regarding his acts with respect to the conscription and use of child soldiers in Kenema and Bombali Districts2021 and before February 1998,2022 he does not explain how the Trial Chamber's conclusion was accordingly unreasonable. In particular, Sesay does not show that no reasonable trier of fact could infer from the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his acts, in combination with other findings such as those concerning the nature of the conscription and use of child soldiers, that he substantially contributed to the planning of crimes committed in other locations as well. In merely submitting that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are insufficient to ground his liability for planning the other instances of the crime, Sesay fails to explain why this is so. Sesay further fails to point to other findings or evidence to show that the crimes in Kenema and Bombali Districts were unique or distinct from the crimes in Kailahun and Kono Districts. While Sesay correctly submits that he can only be held liable for those crimes he substantially contributed to the planning of, he does not show how no reasonable trier of fact could infer, on the basis of his acts with respect to Bunumbu and Yengema in particular, that he substantially contributed as well to the planning of the other crimes for which he was held liable.

7734. para. 773: Sesay further fails to explain why the manner in which the Trial Chamber evaluated the evidence precluded it from finding that he substantially contributed to the planning of the specific crimes for which he was held liable.2023 Sesay cites no authority for his position that the Trial Chamber could only make such a finding on the basis of the identity of the victims, or that the Trial Chamber was required to demand a specimen count here. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber found that the crimes committed were those that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of on the basis of the identity of the perpetrators and the manner in which the crimes were committed. Sesay fails to address the Trial Chamber's approach and to explain how it was erroneous.

7736. para. 775: Sesay's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding him responsible for the offence in Bombali when it had specifically held that he could not be liable for crimes committed in Bombali District2025 is misconceived. The Trial Chamber held that Sesay was not liable for crimes in Bombali District in relation to crimes attributable to AFRC forces under the control of Gullit after the cessation of the JCE.2026 In contrast, Sesay was found to have planned an RUF system of use of child soldiers.2027

iii. Kallon – Planning – Child soldiers – Kono District

7737. para. 909: The Trial Chamber convicted Kallon for planning the crime of using children under the age of 15 by the RUF to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000.2373

7739. para. 918: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gave orders that "young boys" be trained, as the Trial Chamber itself found that the boys to be trained were over 15 years of age.2394 The Appeals Chamber has previously considered this issue in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that Kallon misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings.2395 Similarly, the Appeals Chamber has previously considered the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Witness TF1-366 in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that the Trial Chamber reliance on that testimony was not erroneous.2396 Kallon further fails otherwise to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding the testimony of Witness TF1-366 credible. This submission is rejected.

7740. para. 919: The Appeals Chamber also rejects Kallon's argument that it is not established beyond reasonable doubt that the boys and girls trained at the RUF training bases were under the age of 15.2397 Witnesses TF1-141 and TF1-263 testified that they were 12 and 14 years of age respectively at the time they were abducted and sent for military training.2398 Similarly, Witness Dennis Koker saw Kallon bring juveniles under the age of 15 to Bunumbu for training.2399 The Trial Chamber accepted the testimonies of the Witnesses and found them credible. Kallon has not established that no reasonable trier of fact could rely on their testimonies for a finding of fact. This submission is rejected.

7742. para. 921: With respect to Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber found that he and Sesay gave orders for "young boys" to be trained, but that those boys were 15 years of age and above, the Appeals Chamber refers to its conclusion above that some of the "young boys" included persons both under and above the age of 15.2403 The Appeals Chamber recalls its decision concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker, particularly in relation to the ages of the children with whom they associated Kallon.2404 The Appeals Chamber also recalls that the Trial Chamber exercised caution in determining the ages of children associated with the rebel factions in its findings.2405 The Appeals Chamber defers to these findings2406 and dismisses Kallon's argument regarding the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker relating to the ages of children.

7743. para. 922: Kallon contends that the Trial Chamber found that he "knew or had reason to know that the persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15" was erroneous given its inconclusive nature, thereby suggesting that it was not the only reasonable inference that could be drawn from the evidence.2407 Kallon mischaracterises the Trial Chamber's findings. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not find that he "knew or had reason to know that persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15."2408 Rather, the Trial Chamber identified several factors which it found to be "cumulatively sufficient to put the fighters who perpetrated the abductions and military training on notice that the persons involved may have been under the age of 15."2409 Accordingly, this part of Kallon's argument must fail.

7744. para. 923: Kallon further submits that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof to him by stating that "where doubt existed as to whether a person abducted or trained was under the age of 15, it was incumbent upon the perpetrator to ascertain the person's age."2410 The Appeals Chamber has previously held that the prohibition on conscripting or using child soldiers existed in customary international law at the times relevant to the offences in this case, and that violation of this prohibition incurs individual criminal responsibility in customary international law.2411 In reaching those holdings, the Appeals Chamber observed that a significant body of conventional international law imposes an obligation on parties to "take all feasible measures" to ensure that children are not recruited or used in hostilities.2412 The accused are under a duty to act with due diligence to ensure that children under the age of 15 are not recruited or used in combat. Failure to exercise such due diligence to ascertain the age of recruits does not relieve an accused of his liability for their recruitment or use.2413 The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no error in the Trial Chamber's statement that the accused were under a duty to exercise due diligence to ascertain the age of a child.

7745. para. 924: Kallon submits a number of arguments contesting the Trial Chamber's finding that he planned the use of child soldiers.2414 Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber relied solely on his command role to support that finding,2415 and argues that there was no evidence that he was involved in the planning of the abduction and training of children.2416

7746. para. 925: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon "participated in the design and maintenance of [the RUF] system of forced recruitment and use [of child soldiers] and that his contribution in this regard was substantial."2417 In reaching this conclusion, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Kallon was a senior RUF Commander during the attack on Koidu Town in February 1998 in which children were abducted in large numbers to be sent to RUF camps; (ii) Kallon gave orders for children to be trained at RUF camps; (iii) Kallon brought a group of children to Bunumbu for training in 1998; and (iv) Kallon was the senior RUF Commander on 3 May 2000 at Moria where child soldiers were used in the ambush of UNAMSIL forces.2418 The Trial Chamber also found that the highly organised character of the process of conscripting and using child soldiers was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.2419As these findings make clear, the Trial Chamber did not solely rely on Kallon's command role to find that he planned the use of child soldiers.2420

7747. para. 926: Kallon fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have inferred from these findings and the evidence as a whole that he planned the use of child soldiers.2421 This submission is rejected.

c. Instigation – Kono District

i. Kallon – Instigation – Kono District

7748. para. 826: The Trial Chamber found that Waiyoh, a Nigerian female who resided in the civilian camp at Wendedu and had lived in Kono District for twenty years was killed on the orders of Rocky, an RUF Commander in May 1998.2169 It found that this crime constituted an unlawful killing as charged in Counts 4 and 5 of the Indictment.2170 It further found that Kallon was liable under Article 6 (1) of the Statute for its instigation.2171 The Trial Chamber found that although Wendedu was not named as a location of murder in the Indictment, the pleading of locations in Counts 4 and 5 was nonexhaustive and sufficiently specific in light of the cataclysmic nature of the alleged crimes.2172

> About mid February 1998, AFRC/RUF fleeing from Freetown arrived in Kono District. Between about 14 February 1998 and 30 June 1998, members of AFRC/RUF unlawfully killed several hundred civilians in various locations in Kono District, including Koidu, Tombodu, Foindu, Willifeh, Mortema and Biaya.2175

7750. para. 829: The relevant question on appeal is whether the pleading of locations of murder in Kono District as "various locations in Kono District, including Koidu, Tombodu, Foindu, Willifeh, Mortema and Biaya" without naming Wendedu, is sufficiently specific to allow Kallon to prepare his defence to the charge of instigating murder in Wendedu.

7751. para. 830: As a general matter, the location of the crimes alleged to have been committed should be specified in an indictment.2176 However, the degree of specificity required will depend on the nature of the Prosecution's case.2177 The specificity required for the pleading of the location of an alleged crime will depend on factors such as: the form of accused's participation in the crime;2178 the proximity of the accused person to the events at the location for which he is alleged to be criminally responsible;2179 the nature of the crime itself, such as whether the crime is characterized by the movement of the victim; whether the victim's identity provides specificity; and whether the crime was committed at numerous locations within a defined geographic area that was pleaded.

Article 6(1) liability averred. For example, the Appeals Chamber has indicated that the material facts for pleading personal commission are distinct from those pleaded for JCE liability.2180 As stated by the ICTR Appeals Chamber, there may well be "situations in which the specific location of criminal activities cannot be listed, such as where the accused is charged as having effective control over several armed groups that committed crimes in numerous locations. In cases concerning physical acts of violence perpetrated by the accused personally, however, location can be very important."2181

7753. para. 832: This distinction between the specificity requirements for the pleading of locations in relation to different modes of liability is consistent with our holding in the Brima et al. Appeal Judgment. There, we held that the Trial Chamber's decision to reconsider an earlier form of indictment decision was a proper exercise of its discretion in the interests of justice.2182 The Brima et al. Trial Chamber held that the indictment had not pleaded locations with sufficient specificity and they therefore declined to find the accused liable for crimes committed at unnamed locations. Similar to Kallon's present conviction, the accused in Brima et al. were not convicted pursuant to their participation in a JCE, but rather they were convicted of more direct forms of participation, such as, inter alia, personal commission and instigation.

7755. para. 834: In view of the mode of Kallon's liability for the crime and that his culpable conduct occurred at the location, the location of the murder as having occurred at Wendedu was a material fact that must have been pleaded in the Indictment to inform Kallon clearly of the charges against him so that he could prepare a defence.2186

that Kallon had notice of the charge as a result of timely, clear and consistent information detailing the factual underpinnings of the charge.2188

7757. para. 836: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds that Kallon was not put on notice of the charge that he instigated murder at Wendedu. The trial against Kallon was thereby rendered unfair, and as a result he should not have been found responsible for the killing of Waiyoh.

(viii) Kailahun District

a. JCE – Participation in and shared intent – Kailahun District

i. Sesay - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kailahun District

7758. para. 635: Sesay relies on Grounds 24-34 to challenge the findings on his participation and intent regarding Kailahun District.1600 Ground 37 is accordingly also dismissed.

ii. Kallon - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kailahun District

7759. para. 817: Determining Kallon's JCE liability, the Trial Chamber held that his participation in the JCE as "set out above" furthered the JCE and significantly contributed to the crimes in Kailahun District.2136 It found that Kallon contributed to the JCE "by securing revenues, territory and manpower for the Junta Government, and by aiming to reduce or eliminate civilian opposition to Junta rule."2137 By his participation in the JCE Kallon significantly contributed to the crimes in Kailahun District, and he shared with the other participants in the JCE the requisite intent to commit these crimes.2138

7760. para. 820: The Appeals Chamber notes that Kallon correctly states that the unlawful killings in Kailahun were committed on 19 February 1998, which was after the Junta was ousted from power on 14 February 1998.2149 The Trial Chamber found that Kallon's participation in the JCE in Kailahun consisted of "securing revenues, territory and manpower for the Junta government, and by aiming to reduce or eliminate civilian opposition to Junta rule."2150 However, the JCE which existed between members of the AFRC and the RUF during the Junta period continued after the Junta government had been ousted.2151 In particular, their Common Criminal Purpose continued to contemplate crimes "as a means of increasing [their] exercise of power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone."2152 Accordingly, the unlawful killings now at issue "served to further consolidate RUF power over Kailahun District at a time when the joint AFRC/RUF forces were weakened after the fall of Freetown."2153 Both Bockarie, who committed and ordered the killings, and Kallon continued to be members of the JCE after 14 February 1998.2154 As such, the Trial Chamber's findings must be understood to mean that the determinative question is not whether Kallon contributed to the killings by assisting the Junta government per se, but, instead, whether he lent such contribution by his participation in the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE.2155 In that regard, the Appeals Chamber fails to see how it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on Kallon's contribution by way of securing revenues, territory and manpower to achieve the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE during the Junta period in determining whether he also contributed to the JCE after the Junta was ousted from power. Kallon fails to show that the AFRC/RUF Common Criminal Purpose would not have continued to benefit from such contributions even after the alliance was ousted from government power.

7761. para. 821: Kallon's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he so contributed is unsupported, particularly as it was not required that he was present in Kailahun when the killings were carried out.2156 Also, the "link"—to use Kallon's term—between the killings and the continued JCE, as well as the "nexus" between Kallon and Bockarie's intent to rid Kailahun of possible Kamajors among the civilian population, were both established by the Trial Chamber's finding that the killings were committed in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose which Kallon and Bockarie shared.2157 Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

7763. para. 823: Kallon's submission that he did not share the intent with the other JCE participants, is based on the premise that the Trial Chamber failed to state who they were, what role they had in the crimes, and how he shared their intent.2159 However, the Trial Chamber made findings on these issues.2160 Having concluded, inter alia, on the basis of these findings,2161 that Kallon shared the intent to commit the crimes in Kailahun in furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose,2162 the Trial Chamber was not, contrary to Kallon's suggestion,2163 required to establish that he, in addition, knew of the specific crimes committed there.2164 Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

Kallon responsible under this form of liability for crimes "committed in Kailahun District between 25 May 1997 and April 1998."2167 Kallon's last set of arguments do not extend beyond repetitions of claims which have been previously dismissed.2168 For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Kallon's Ground 15 in its entirety.

7765. para. 928: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon incurred JCE liability for enslavement (Count 13) in Kenema, Kono and Kailahun Districts.2422 Kallon had bodyguards who were under the age of 15 years, and he knew the SBUs were used to force the enslaved mining and guard the mining sites.2423 During 1998 and 1999, Kallon brought persons under 15 years of age to be trained by the RUF at Bunumbu.2424 Kallon, therefore, was engaged in the creation and maintenance of a system of enslavement that was created by the RUF in order to maintain and strengthen their fighting force.2425 Through these acts, among others, Kallon was found to have participated in the JCE.2426 The Trial Chamber also found Kallon guilty under superior responsibility for the enslavement of hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998.2427

7766. para. 931: The Appeals Chamber notes that the finding that the "SBUs seen by TF1-141 with Kallon … in Kono in February 1998" and "the boys in SBUs seen by TF1-045 with Kallon in Freetown in 1997 and in Makeni in 1999 to 2000" were not bodyguards[2434] could be read to contradict the finding that "Kallon had bodyguards who were under the age of 15 years."[2435] However, Kallon fails to establish that this contradiction, if any, occasioned a miscarriage of justice. In inferring that Kallon was engaged in the system of enslavement, the Trial Chamber's findings show that it also relied on his contribution to the use of children under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities,[2436] which the Trial Chamber found included the use of children to guard the mines at Tombodu in Kono in February/March 1998,[2437] and to intimidate and kill civilians working there.[2438] These findings were supported by evidence which Kallon does not address. This submission is therefore rejected.

JCE.[2440] The Trial Chamber did not exclude evidence of Kallon bringing children for training at Bunumbu from consideration in respect of the mode of liability of JCE, the pleading requirements of which are different from personal commission.[2441] Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

iii. Gbao - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Kailahun District

7772. See above: Chapter 12 – Article 6.1. Liability – RUF – Appellate Judgment – Findings and conclusions – JCE – Categories of JCE and mens rea – Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola – paras. 22-41, 43– 57 [7480].

7773. para. 958: The Trial Chamber found that Gbao incurred JCE 1 liability for the unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5) of 63 alleged Kamajors in Kailahun Town on 19 February 1998 pursuant to the orders of Bockarie.[2536] It found that "Gbao intended the death of the suspected Kamajors as a consequence of his failure to halt the executions."[2537] Also, "Gbao intended that this crime be committed in order to strengthen the power and control of the RUF over Kailahun District and the civilian population there, which in turn enhanced the power and capacity of the RUF to pursue the goals of the common purpose."[2538] In addition, the deaths were found to be a "logical consequence to the pursuance of the goals prescribed in RUF ideology."[2539]

7774. para. 959: With regard to these unlawful killings, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie ordered suspected Kamajors to be arrested for investigation by Gbao.[2540] Pursuant to Bockarie's orders, 110 men were arrested and detained by Kailahun District MP Commander John Aruna Duawo and MPs subordinate to him.[2541] They were divided into two groups of 45 and 65 men, respectively.[2542] The first group was declared not to be Kamajors and then released by a JSBI panel led by Gbao.[2543] The second group was released on parole while the JSBI investigation was on-going.[2544] Upon learning that the second group had been released on parole, Bockarie ordered their re-arrest and execution.[2545] The Trial Chamber found that "Gbao was present when Bockarie gave the order and while it was carried out, but he did not directly participate in the killing.[2546]

7777. para. 964: After Bockarie ordered the killing of the suspected Kamajors, and he killed three of them himself in front of Gbao and others, Bockarie left Kailahun Town before the remaining suspected Kamajors were killed.[2561] Gbao, however, stayed throughout the remainder of the executions.[2562] Although the Prosecution does not substantiate its assertion that Gbao was the most senior officer present, the Trial Chamber's findings make clear that he was a senior officer in Kailahun at the time of the killing.[2563] As such, while he was not found to have effective control over the security units as OSC, Gbao, by virtue of his supervisory role as OSC and status as a Vanguard, had "considerable influence" over the decisions taken by these units, which included MP Officers[2564] such as the ones who carried out the executions.[2565]

7778. para. 965: In the Appeals Chamber's view, these findings show that, while limited by the fact that Bockarie had ordered the executions, Gbao was not without power to halt them. Moreover, whether Gbao's power in the circumstances was such that he could actually have stopped the killings is not determinative of whether the Trial Chamber erred in inferring intent from his failure to intervene. Gbao had chaired the JSBI panel responsible for investigating the victims, and he was present when Bockarie executed three of them. He elected to stay, and did not interfere with the execution of the remaining suspected Kamajors. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that this was an unreasonable basis for inferring Gbao's intent. In addition, Gbao does not support his further assertions with any reference to evidence or the Trial Chamber's findings that Bockarie had a propensity to be dictatorial, that Bockarie harassed him, and would have killed him if he attempted to halt the executions.[2566] As to Gbao's claim that he "did all in his power" to release the victims, this argument is without merit given that Gbao did have some power to halt the executions and that his failure to do so is undisputed.[2567] It was therefore not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on Gbao's failure to halt the executions to infer his intent.

7779. para. 966: For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that Gbao fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that he shared the intent for the killings of the 63 suspected Kamajors. Gbao's sub-ground 8(q) is rejected.

7781. para. 972: Gbao was found to have shared with the other participants in the JCE the requisite intent to commit acts of sexual violence in Kailahun District.[2594] The Trial Chamber found that these acts included subjecting an unknown number of women to sexual slavery and forced marriages in Kailahun.[2595] With regard to Gbao, the Trial Chamber found that he "shared the requisite intent for rape in the context of 'forced marriage' in order to further the goals of the JCE."[2596] The Trial Chamber further found that rapes and forced marriages "were a logical consequence to the pursuance of the goals prescribed in the RUF ideology."[2597] Contrary to Gbao's assertion that there are no findings connecting him to the acts of sexual violence in question,[2598] the Trial Chamber thus explained how it inferred his intent for these acts from its explicit finding that he shared the intent for rape within forced marriages. The Appeals Chamber is accordingly satisfied that the Trial Chamber provided a sufficiently reasoned opinion for its finding that Gbao shared the requisite intent for the acts under Counts 7 to 9 in Kailahun. Gbao's submission to the contrary is rejected.

7782. para. 973: Turning to the reasonableness of the impugned finding, Gbao's challenge that the Trial Chamber impermissibly relied on expert evidence to establish his intent[2599] has been addressed under Gbao's Ground 2.[2600] The remaining three challenges allege that the Trial

Chamber erred in relying on insufficiently corroborated testimony, temporally irrelevant evidence and on the testimony of Witness DIS-080.[2601] These challenges will be addressed in turn below.

7783. para. 974: The Appeals Chamber notes that the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-314,[2602] TF1-093,[2603] TF1-371,[2604] TF1-366[2605] and TF1-045[2606] were found by the Trial Chamber to require corroboration in some, but not every circumstance. Thus, the Trial Chamber accepted the core of TF1-093's testimony without corroboration, particularly as it related to her own experiences, such as her time spent as a "bush wife."[2607] Similarly, the Trial Chamber accepted the evidence of TF1-371 and TF1-366 without corroboration where the evidence was more general in nature, or in the case of TF1-366, where the testimony also related to the witness's own experiences.[2608] TF1-314 was found to be "largely credible."[2609] The Trial Chamber did not rely on the testimony of TF1-045 for its findings on forced marriage and sexual slavery in Kailahun District.[2610]

7786. para. 977: Gbao asserts that the testimony of these witnesses was "employed to find he possessed the requisite intent" and therefore relates to his acts and conduct.[2617] However, he does not point to any relevant intent findings that are based on the testimony of the aforementioned witnesses.[2618] Accordingly, Gbao fails to demonstrate how the Trial Chamber erred in basing its findings on the uncorroborated evidence of the above mentioned witnesses. This argument fails.

7787. para. 978: Gbao's argument that the Trial Chamber relied on evidence of events outside the Junta period is limited to the testimony of Denis Koker (TF1-114).[2619] Gbao points to parts of Koker's testimony relating to the witness's observation of forced marriage in Kailahun District as an MP Adjutant.[2620] This evidence pertains to the period after the 6 to 14 February 1998

ECOMOG intervention, which according to the Trial Chamber marked the end of the Junta period.[2621]

7789. para. 980: Gbao argues that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Witness DIS-080's testimony to support its finding that a woman's married status was no bar to becoming a "bush wife."[2626] He asserts that this finding falls by DIS-080's lack of credibility and denial that forced marriages occurred in Kailahun.26[2]7 The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber put DIS-080 in the category of defense witnesses who "testified out of loyalty to the RUF and their superior commanders … and not necessarily to assist the Trial Chamber in its search for the truth."[2628] The impugned finding, however, was supported by the testimony of other witnesses, such as TF1-093 and TF1-371.[2629] The Trial Chamber accepted Witness TF1-093's testimony, where, as here, it related to her own experience as a "bush wife."[2630] The challenged finding is further supported by Witness TF1-371, whose testimony on general matters relating to forced marriages did not require corroboration.[2631] Aside from his challenges to the testimonies of TF1-093 and TF1-371 dismissed above, Gbao does not dispute the substance of their evidence. The Appeals Chamber is therefore not satisfied that the denial by DIS-080 that forced marriages occurred, rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's impugned finding. Gbao accordingly fails to show an error.

7790. para. 981: Gbao's Ground 8(r) is dismissed in its entirety. Having thus found, the Appeals Chamber need not consider Gbao's additional assertion that in the absence of a valid finding that he shared the intent for these acts under Counts 7 to 9, he could also not be held responsible therefore under Count 1.

7791. para. 982: The Trial Chamber found that Gbao incurred JCE liability for the acts of terrorism of unlawful killings and sexual violence in Kailahun District.[2632] He was found to have shared with other participants in the JCE the requisite intent to commit acts of terror.[2633] Also, acts of terror committed in Kailahun were "the logical consequence to the pursuance of the goals prescribed in the RUF ideology, the instruction on which … was imparted particularly by Gbao, who was present during the execution of suspected Kamajors."[2634]

7792. para. 983: The unlawful killings constituting acts of terrorism were the killings of the suspected Kamjors ordered by Bockarie.[2635] As to sexual violence, the Chamber found a consistent pattern of sexual slavery and forced marriage that was committed with the requisite specific intent to terrorise the civilian population in Kailahun District.[2636]

7793. para. 986: This ground essentially turns on whether the Trial Chamber's findings on the requisite intent for acts of terror in respect of Gbao were sufficiently reasoned and if so, whether the Trial Chamber could reasonably find that Gbao shared such intent.

7794. para. 987: In the section of the Trial Judgment on Gbao's JCE liability for the crimes committed in Kailahun District, the Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao "shared with the other participants in the joint criminal enterprise the requisite intent to commit," acts of terror in Kailahun.[2648] The Trial Chamber did not explicitly enumerate the findings on which it based this conclusion. Nevertheless, the question is whether a reading of the Trial Judgment as a whole[2649] reveals on what basis the Trial Chamber determined Gbao's mens rea.

7796. para. 989: As to whether Gbao shared this intent, the Trial Chamber found that he intended the killings of the suspected Kamajors "in order to strengthen the power and control of the RUF over Kailahun District and the civilian population there."[2658] Gbao was also found to have "shared the requisite intent for rape within the context of 'forced marriage' in order to further the goals of the joint criminal enterprise."[2659] The Trial Chamber further concluded that the acts of terror committed in Kailahun "were a logical consequence to the pursuance of the goals prescribed in the RUF ideology, which … was imparted particularly by Gbao."[2660] Considering that the Trial Chamber is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding that it makes,[2661] the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber, by these findings, provided a sufficiently reasoned opinion on why Gbao held the requisite intent for acts of terrorism in Kailahun.

7798. para. 991: The Appeals Chamber now turns to Gbao's submission that the Trial Chamber's finding that he held the requisite intent for acts of terrorism in Kailahun is unreasonable. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber notes that while Gbao disputes that he shared such intent for both the killing of the 63 suspected Kamajors and the sexual violence in Kailahun, his present ground of appeal only details that challenge in respect of the killings. The detailed arguments for why he did not share the intent required under Count 1 in respect of the acts of sexual violence, Gbao submits, are presented under his Ground 8(r).[2672] Gbao's Ground 8(r) has been earlier rejected.[2673]

7799. para. 992: Gbao's challenge is based on the claim that he was doing his best to facilitate the release of the victims and therefore did not have the requisite intent under Count 1 in relation to the killings.[2674] Gbao has misconstrued the Trial Chamber's findings. While the panel chaired by Gbao paroled the 63 suspected Kamajors as he alleges,[2675] the Trial Chamber made no findings as to whether that group would have been released eventually or what active steps, if any, Gbao took in attempting to secure their release. As such, Gbao fails to demonstrate that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to infer his intent to commit acts of terror from his adherence to the RUF ideology and his presence as a senior and effective commander at the execution of 63 suspected Kamajors.[2676]

7802. para. 998: The Trial Chamber found that "Gbao was directly involved in the planning and maintaining of a system of enslavement."[2690] It held that enslavement and forced labour, among other crimes, were a logical consequence of RUF ideology, the instruction of which was imparted particularly by Gbao.[2691] The Trial Chamber concluded that Gbao shared with the other JCE members the requisite intent to commit, inter alia, enslavement in Kailahun.[2692] Among the underlying acts constituting enslavement in Kailahun District were forced farming, forced mining and forced military training.[2693] Gbao was found to have managed the forced civilian farming in Kailahun between 1996 and 2001,[2694] and in 1997 and 1998, Gbao met with civilian Commanders and instructed them regarding the produce and labour they were to provide in support of the war.[2695] Civilians were also forced to work on Gbao's personal farm in 1997 and 1998.[2696] Further, Gbao and Patrick Bangura oversaw the forced civilian mining at Giema, which took place from 1998 to 1999.[2697]

7803. para. 1004: Gbao challenges the reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's finding that he shared the requisite intent for enslavement in Kailahun by attacking the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber to make findings regarding forced farming and forced mining found to constitute enslavement.[2720] Alternatively, Gbao submits that neither forced farming nor forced mining furthered the goals of the JCE.[2721]

7804. para.1005: In relation to forced farming, Gbao generally claims that the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber is temporally irrelevant and unreliable. In particular, Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's findings in relation to (i) RUF "government" farms operating in Kailahun; (ii) physical violence perpetrated against civilian farm workers; (iii) the large-scale coordination of farms and use of produce by the RUF and his meeting with civilian commanders in 1997 and 1998; (iv) the use of forced labour on his personal farm; and (v) his involvement in the management of forced farming in Kailahun from 1996 to 2000. As to forced mining, Gbao asserts that uncorroborated and temporally irrelevant evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber does not establish that forced mining took place in Kailahan during the Junta period. The Appeals Chamber deals with each challenge in turn.

7805. para. 1006: The Appeals Chamber notes that Witnesses TF1-141,[2722] TF1-113,[2723] TF1-114[2724] and TF1-367[2725] gave evidence of forced farming after the Junta period. As to the testimony of TF1-036, the transcript pages cited by Gbao refer to a screening process in relation to military training, not forced farming, and accordingly do not relate to Gbao's present argument.[2726] The observations of TF1-045, contrary to Gbao's assertion, are relevant to the Junta period as the witness observed forced farming from "1997 to disarmament."[2727] Gbao only points to three findings[2728] — two in relation to two separate RUF "government" farms[2729] and a finding relating to civilian workers subjected to physical violence on such farms[2730] — that are supported by the abovementioned testimonies relating to events outside the Junta period. The Appeals Chamber addresses Gbao's temporal relevancy concerns specific to the impugned findings below.[2731]

7806. para. 1007: In addition to temporal challenges to the evidence, Gbao challenges the credibility of the testimony of TF1-330,[2732] TF1-108[2733] and TF1-366.[2734] Gbao's general credibility challenges to TF1-330 and TF1-108, are addressed in the discussion of his Ground 11.[2735] Under his present ground of appeal, Gbao asserts that TF1-108, TF1-366,[2736] and TF1-045's[2737] testimonies required corroboration, but were uncorroborated. The Appeals Chamber addresses whether the testimony in relation to the impugned findings were adequately corroborated below.[2738]

7807. para. 1008: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that two RUF government farms, one located in Pendembu and another located between Benduma and Buedu, operated outside the Junta period.[2739] These findings were primarily based on the testimony of TF1-141 and TF1-113.[2740] Gbao, however, does not explain the error occasioned by consideration of this evidence. The Trial Chamber limited Gbao's JCE liability in respect of Kailahun District to the period between 25 May 1997 and 19 February 1998.[2741] While the two farms in question operated outside this time period, other RUF "government" farms operated in Kailahun from 1996 to 2001,[2742] which included the Junta period.[2743] Consequently, in the context of Gbao's JCE liability for crimes committed in Kailahun, the Trial Chamber's findings on RUF "government" farms were not based solely on the evidence which Gbao asserts is temporally irrelevant. Gbao's submission is therefore rejected.

7808. para. 1009: Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that there was "ample evidence that civilians were enslaved and subjected to physical violence while working on RUF government farms."[2744] The supporting testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-113 mainly concerned physical violence against civilians working on RUF farms in Kailahun after 19 February 1998.[2745] This temporal irrelevance does not render the Trial Chamber's finding inapplicable to Gbao, since it does not disprove the occurrence of physical violence on RUF farms during the time period relating to Gbao's JCE liability. Indeed, the Trial Chamber's finding on physical violence on RUF "government" farms is sufficiently supported by the credible testimony of other witnesses,[2746] whose temporal relevance is unchallenged by Gbao.[2747] TF1-108's testimony supporting the impugned finding was corroborated by the credible testimony of TF1-330 and TF1-045.[2748] The Trial Chamber did not question TF1-330's credibility[2749] and found that TF1-045 did not need corroboration, unless testifying to the "acts and conduct of the accused."[2750] Here, TF1-045 was simply testifying to general matters regarding the working conditions on RUF farms.[2751] As such, this evidence does not relate to the acts and conduct of the accused as defined by the Trial Chamber,[2752] and therefore by the Trial Chamber's own findings did not require corroboration.[2753] While Gbao correctly asserts, in his final challenge to the above finding, that DAG-111 did not testify that civilian farm workers were subjected to violence on RUF farms on the cited transcript page,[2754] the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber's finding was open to a reasonable trier of fact based on the other credible witnesses. Gbao accordingly fails to show an error, and his submission is untenable.

7809. para. 1010: Gbao challenges the Trial Chamber's findings that farming was coordinated on a large-scale[2755] and that he met with "civilian Commanders" to instruct them about produce and labour to be provided in support of the war.[2756] He does so by attacking the credibility of TF1-108 and TF1-3 3 0 [2757] and arguing that TF1-108 did not testify regarding Gbao's meeting with "civilian Commanders" in 1997 and 1998 at the transcript pages cited.[2758] The Trial Chamber's credibility concerns were addressed when it stated that TF1-108's testimony was corroborated by a credible witness such as TF1-3 3 0.[2759] Gbao's claim that TF1-108 did not testify that Gbao met with civilian commanders is without merit; the witness testified that Gbao met with "civilian Commanders" regarding produce and labour in support of the war in 1997, 1998, and 1999.[2760] This submission fails.

7810. para. 1011: With regard to Gbao's use of forced labour on his personal farm, the Trial Chamber found that "civilians were required to work on farms owned by ...Gbao... in each year from 1995 to 2000."[2761] Gbao correctly asserts that this finding is not fully supported by TF1-330, as TF1-330 did not testify that civilians were forced to work, but rather simply worked on Gbao's farm.[2762] Contrary to Gbao's assertion, however, the occurrence of forced farming on Gbao's personal farm is supported by other evidence: TF1-366 testified that he captured civilians and sent them to work on Gbao's farm.[2763] As this evidence related to TF1-366's own experience, it did not require corroboration.[2764] Accordingly, TF1-366's testimony as to forced labour also provides the credible evidence needed to corroborate TF1-108's testimony[2765] that Gbao had a farm where civilians involuntarily worked.[2766] The Trial Chamber's finding therefore stands. Additionally, Gbao's claim that it is "unclear whether this all took place" during the Junta period is without merit as the Trial Chamber found that Gbao had a private farm in every year between 1995 and 2000.[2767] Gbao's challenge to the impugned finding is therefore rejected.

7812. para. 1013: The Appeals Chamber notes that Gbao was in Bombali District between March 1999 and May 2000.[2770] The Appeals Chamber also notes that the Trial Chamber did not make findings as to how Gbao managed RUF "government" farms in Kailahun from afar.[2771] However, while the Trial Chamber found that Gbao managed large-scale forced civilian farming until 2001, Gbao argues that his liability for these crimes was limited to 19 February 1998. Accordingly, no demonstrable error results from a failure to consider events relevant to a time period for which Gbao, on his own submission, was not held responsible.

7813. para. 1015: The Appeals Chamber notes that Gbao was found to have overseen forced civilian mining in Giema, which took place between 1998 and 1999.[2772] Gbao asserts, however, that mining did not (i) take place in Kailahun, (ii) take place during the Junta period, and (iii) even if it did, TF1-330 did not explicitly testify that civilians were forced to mine.[2773]

7814. para. 1016: First, the Appeals Chamber notes that TF1-371's testimony in relation to the Supreme Council's appointment of senior members to supervise diamond mining areas only refers to Kono and Kenema Districts as traditional areas of diamond mining.[2774] Contrary to Gbao's assertion, however, there is ample evidence of forced mining activity in Kailahun. TF1-366, whose testimony in relation to general matters did not require corroboration,[2775] testified that forced mining took place in Kailahun in locations such as Yenga, Jabama and Golahun.[2776] TF1-108's corroborated testimony,[2777] also provided evidence of forced mining activities throughout Kailahun.[2778] Consequently, the fact that senior members of the Supreme Council were appointed to supervise diamond mining areas in Kono and Kenema, as suggested by Gbao,[2779] does not disprove that mining took place in Kailahun, especially in light of testimony provided by TF1-108 and TF1-366.[2780]

7815. para. 1017: Second, in respect of Gbao's temporal challenge to the evidence, he argues that TF1-330 testified about mining activities in 1998 "at a time when Bockarie was in Kailahun District" which, Gbao argues, puts TF1-330's testimony after the Junta period.[2781] However, the Trial Chamber's findings Gbao relies on do not unequivocally support his claim,[2782] and Gbao does not support it beyond reference to those findings.[2783] Rather, the salient passages in the Trial Judgment to which Gbao refers, concern mining in 1998 and state that "Gbao and Patrick Bangura oversaw the civilians mining at Giema as well as 'the soldiers who had guns.'"[2784] Gbao fails to show an error and therefore his challenge is rejected.

7816. para. 1018: Third, while TF1-330 did not explicitly state that civilians were "forced" to mine for diamonds in Giema, the witness did testify that civilians were not given food and soldiers with guns oversaw the civilians as they worked.[2785] The Trial Chamber therefore reasonably inferred from the evidence that the labour civilians provided was forced. Gbao's submission in relation to forced mining in Kailahun is therefore rejected.

7817. para. 1019: For these reasons, Gbao fails to demonstrate that the evidence adduced at trial does not support a finding that he was involved in forced farming or forced mining in Kailahun. Having determined that the Trial Chamber did not so err, the Appeals Chamber now turns to Gbao's argument that these activities were not done in furtherance of the JCE.[2786]

7819. para. 1021: The Trial Chamber also found that the "RUF engaged in diamond mining in Kailahun District as early as 1996 and until 2000," and that "the mining activities were an important and vitalsource of income for the RUF, and later the AFRC/RUF Junta."[2792] Gbao's claim that no diamond was ever found in Kailahun and diamond mining was but "an elaborate ruse," and therefore could not have furthered the JCE is unsupported, as the transcript pages he cites do not mention mining, let alone any "elaborate ruse."[2793]

7821. para. 1024: The Trial Chamber found that "in 1995, Gbao was a Sergeant and was sent to the Baima base in Kailahun District as an ideology instructor."[2794] The Trial Chamber found that "Gbao was responsible for the teaching of the ideology to the new commando recruits."[2795] The Trial Chamber further held that "Gbao was a strict adherent to the RUF ideology and gave instruction on its principles to all new recruits to the RUF."[2796]

7822. para. 1027: The Appeals Chamber has previously upheld Gbao's Ground 8(a) and overruled the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor.[2805] Gbao's Ground 8(b) is therefore moot. The Appeals Chamber will further consider below whether a reasonable trier of fact could have found, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's other findings, that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE.

7824. para. 1033: The Trial Chamber found as a general matter that "the three Accused ... and the other listed individuals were all acting in concert."[2819] Gbao does not contest this finding generally, nor does he contest that other AFRC and RUF members of the JCE were acting in concert. Rather, Gbao only contests the Trial Chamber's failure to find that he acted in concert with the AFRC.[2820] In particular, Gbao's arguments are centred on the Trial Chamber's failure to find that he acted in concert with the AFRC in a direct or physical manner.[2821]

7825. para. 1034: The Trial Chamber found that it must be established that the "plurality of persons acted in concert with each other."[2822] The Trial Chamber considered that "a common objective in itself is not enough to demonstrate that the plurality of persons acted in concert with each other as different and independent groups may happen to share the same objectives."[2823] The Appeals Chamber considers that these statements accurately reflect the law. However, contrary to Gbao's suggestion, the Trial Chamber did not introduce an additional element to JCE liability. The Trial Chamber properly understood the law as requiring that the accused participated in the common purpose shared by the members of the JCE.[2824] In contrast, the concept of "acting in concert" advanced by the Trial Chamber serves to clarify the required relationship between the persons said to be a plurality sharing a common purpose. This makes clear that the plurality of persons must have a common purpose, and not merely the same purpose, in the sense that persons act together in the pursuit of that purpose, creating a relationship of inter-dependence and cooperation.[2825] Alternatively, persons with identical purposes who do not share that purpose in common, as evidenced by the absence of joint action between them, do not constitute a plurality of persons having a common criminal purpose within the meaning of JCE liability. Thus, the requirement that the "plurality of persons acted in concert with each other in the implementation of a common purpose"[2826] merely clarifies and restates the first two elements of JCE liability, namely the existence of a plurality of persons sharing a common criminal purpose.

7826. para. 1035: Gbao then errs in proposing an additional legal element of concerted action to establish his participation in the JCE. To establish Gbao's liability under JCE, the Trial Chamber was not required to make findings on Gbao's concerted action with the AFRC beyond finding that his acts established his contribution to the Common Criminal Purpose. In this regard, however, the Appeals Chamber notes that the accused's "joint action" with other members of the JCE, as an evidentiary matter, can be relevant to assessing the accused's participation in the JCE. Simply, the character, quality and quantity of the accused's joint action with other members of the JCE may be relevant evidentiary considerations when analysing the intent and contribution of the accused relative to the common purpose of the JCE. The Appeals Chamber considers that this evaluation must be made on a case-by-case basis, but does note that the manner in which the members of the JCE interact and cooperate can take as many forms as conceived by the participants to pursue the realisation of their shared common criminal purpose. What matters is that they are all "the cogs in the wheel of events leading up to the result which in fact occurred."[2827] Nonetheless, the manner in and degree to which the accused and the members of the JCE interact, coordinate and mutually rely on one another's contributions can indicate whether the accused shared the common purpose and significantly contributed to realising it.[2828]

7828. para. 1038: The Appeals Chamber rejects the premise of Gbao's argument that he could not be a member of the AFRC/RUF JCE if he was not a senior officer of the RUF.[2830] While the Trial Chamber found as a general matter that there was insufficient evidence to establish that mid- and low-level commanders of the AFRC and RUF, as well as rank-and-file soldiers of both groups, were members of the JCE, this was only a general finding as to a broad group of persons.[2831] This finding did not strictly limit the JCE to only "senior leaders" of the RUF and AFRC, nor did it imply that the Trial Chamber was foreclosed from finding that individuals not found to be "senior leaders" were also members of the JCE. Thus, notwithstanding such a finding, it was open to a reasonable trier of fact, in light of more specific, individualised evidence, to conclude that Gbao, even if a non-senior officer, was also a member of the AFRC/RUF JCE together with senior officers of those groups.

7829. para. 1039: Gbao mischaracterises the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bombali District.[2832] The Trial Chamber found that the crimes committed in Bombali District were not attributable to the Accused because the crimes occurred after the termination of the JCE and the pepetrators of those crimes were AFRC forces under the command of Gullit.[2833] The Trial Chamber further reasoned that while there were RUF troops among those forces, the crimes could still not be attributed to the Accused because the most senior RUF commander among those RUF troops, Major Brown, was not in a command position, confirming that RUF troops were under the control of the AFRC and Gullit.[2834] The Trial Chamber neither reasoned nor found that Major Brown was not a participant in the JCE because he was not in a position of command over soldiers.

7830. para. 1040: Examining whether Gbao participated in the JCE, the Trial Chamber found that he was an "ideology instructor"[2835] who taught RUF recruits and monitored the implementation of the RUF ideology.[2836] It held that this ideology, in its normative and operational settings, significantly contributed to the crimes which were within the JCE or a natural and foreseeable consequence thereof.[2837]

7831. para. 1041: The Trial Chamber also considered other ways in which Gbao participated in the JCE. For instance, it found that Gbao had a "supervisory role"[2838] over the IDU,[2839] the MP,[2840] the IO[2841] and the G5,[2842] which entailed travelling widely in Kailahun to monitor the implementation of the RUF ideology.[2843] Gbao was also found to have been involved in the forced labour of civilians to produce foodstuffs,[2844] which in the Trial Chamber's view significantly contributed to maintaining the strength and cohesiveness of the RUF fighting force.[2845] Moreover, the Trial Chamber held that Gbao's "status, rank and personal relationship with Sankoh, as well as his knowledge of the RUF's ideology" gave him considerable prestige in the RUF in Kailahun.[2846] It further considered that Gbao's failure to properly investigate allegations against a civilian woman (TF1-113) and his instruction that she be publicly beaten, would have had a demonstrative effect to compel the obedience of the civilian population in Kailahun to RUF authority.[2847]

7832. para. 1048: Gbao raises a number of specific issues of fact as preliminary challenges. He further claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in concluding that his alleged contributions significantly contributed to the joint criminal enterprise. The Appeals Chamber will first consider those preliminary issues, before turning to the broader issue of Gbao's contribution.

7833. para. 1049: The Appeals Chamber has previously upheld Gbao's Ground 8(a) and overruled the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as an ideology expert and instructor.[2877] Consideration of Gbao's challenges to the Trial Chamber's findings that he significantly contributed to the JCE through his role as the RUF ideology expert and instructor therefore does not arise.

was previously found to require corroboration and that the witness's testimony does not support the Trial Chamber's finding.[2879] Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding this testimony credible. The Trial Chamber did find as a general matter that the witness's testimony required corroboration, as it was "inconsistent" and the witness "was not genuinely assisting the Court to arrive at the truth."[2880] However, the Trial Chamber further noted that it had doubts as to the witness's veracity because the witness's testimony "was influenced in part by his support for the RUF movement and its ideology."[2881] By merely pointing to the Trial Chamber's own finding, Gbao fails to demonstrate that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on this witness's testimony in these circumstances. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes,"[2882] nor is it "required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."[2883]

> was a "popular" and "effective Commander" who travelled widely in Kailahun District, visiting different areas behind the front lines, reporting on whether the MP and G5 units were doing their jobs and observing the conduct of investigations in order to ensure that the RUF ideology was put into practice.[2885]

The testimony of Witness DIS-188 cited in footnote 3 77 1 [2886] does not support the finding that Gbao's "supervisory role entailed, in great measure, the monitoring of the implementation of the ideology."[2887] However, Gbao fails to show that this error rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that as OSC he travelled widely in Kailahun District, reported on whether the MP and G5 units were doing their jobs and observed the conduct of investigations in order to ensure that the RUF ideology was put into practice. The Appeals Chamber will accordingly disregard the characterization of Gbao's supervisory role as monitoring the implementation of the RUF ideology, but the remaining impugned findings stand.

7837. para. 1053: In arguing that he had limited authority and responsibility in his role as OSC, Gbao has pointed to a number of the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the structure and operations of the RUF security apparatus.[2890] Gbao highlights, in particular, findings that he had little or no authority to issue orders to the Overall Unit Commanders,[2891] initiate investigations[2892] or enforce punishments.[2893] However, the Trial Chamber did not disregard these findings in its reasoning, specifically noting that "the evidence is insufficient to conclude that Gbao had effective control over the IDU, MP, IO and G5 as OSC."[2894] Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber found that Gbao still had "considerable influence over the decisions taken by these bodies" due to "his appointment to this position by Sankoh, his status as a Vanguard and his power to issue recommendations."[2895] The Trial Chamber further specifically found that whatever his de jure authority, Gbao "enjoyed substantial practical authority over the members of the security units."[2896] The Trial Chamber considered then, that it was his "considerable influence" and "practical authority" as the supervisor of the RUF security apparatus, rather than his formal power and authority,that founded in part Gbao's contribution to the JCE through his role as OSC. By merely pointing to other findings, Gbao fails to address the Trial Chamber's reasoning and its finding that he had "considerable influence" over the RUF security apparatus.

7838. para. 1054: The Appeals Chamber has previously considered Gbao's claims under his Grounds 8(s) and 11 regarding forced farming in Kailahun District.[2897] The Appeals Chamber recalls its conclusions that Gbao fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that forced farming took place in Kailahun District during the Junta period, or that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Gbao shared the intent to commit the crime of enslavement with respect to that of forced farming.[2898]

the JCE.[2904] In arguing that he only held the rank of captain and that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding his rank significant, Gbao mischaracterizes the Trial Chamber's finding and ignores the Trial Chamber's relevant findings.[2905] Gbao does not dispute the Trial Chamber's finding that he was OSC for the RUF and Overall IDU Commander,[2906] and that he often served as Chairman of the Joint Security Board of Investigations.[2907] More importantly, Gbao does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that "in RUF controlled territory, the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order."[2908] Similarly, Gbao neither challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that he was a Vanguard,[2909] nor the findings regarding the status and authority Vanguards held.[2910] In particular, he does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that assignment and status could be more important in terms of authority and influence than rank in the RUF.[2911] Accordingly, Gbao's citation to testimonial evidence of his rank by Witness DAG-048 and the testimony of Witness TF1-371 does not establish that the Trial Chamber unreasonably found that he had considerable prestige and power in Kailahun District.

7841. para. 1057: Gbao further claims that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gained additional prestige and power within the RUF as a result of a personal connection with Foday Sankoh.[2912] However, Gbao fails to articulate how this error rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that "Gbao had considerable prestige and power within the RUF in Kailahun District,"[2913] particularly as he does not contest his assignment as OSC and Overall IDU Commander and his status as a Vanguard, as noted above.

7842. para. 1058: Gbao misrepresents the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the general credibility of TF1-113. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not consider that this witness required corroboration when testifying about Gbao's acts and conduct.[2914] Rather, the Trial Chamber was not convinced that the whole of the witness's testimony was not credible, and found that it was only necessary to exercise extreme caution and often seek corroborative evidence.[2915] Furthermore, Gbao fails to support his assertion that the testimonies of witnesses who lie under oath should, as a rule, be disregarded,[2916] as none of the authorities he cites supports such a proposition.[2917] In that regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that Rules 77 and 91 of the Rules allow a Chamber to hold in contempt a witness who wilfully gives false testimony under oath, but nothing in the Rules obligates a Chamber to discard the testimony of such witnesses for that reason alone. Rather, Rule 89 permits a Chamber to admit any evidence it deems relevant. The Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion in this respect. Indeed, "it is primarily for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witness' testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of the reasoning in reaching a decision on these points."[2918] Accordingly, Gbao's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding TF1-113's testimony credible on this issue is rejected.[2919]

7844. para. 1060: Gbao first argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he significantly contributed as the OSC, submitting that the RUF security apparatus had a nominal role during the Junta period,[2920] and that he had limited authority over the RUF security units.[2921] Gbao further submits that the security apparatus did not deal with most disciplinary issues in fact, which "were instead handled by the local Area Commander where the crime was alleged to have taken place."[2922] The Appeals Chamber has previously dismissed Gbao's first submission,[2923] and has noted that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao, whatever his de jure authority, exercised "considerable influence" and "practical authority" over the RUF security apparatus.[2924] The Appeals Chamber further notes with respect to the last submission that the Trial Chamber specifically distinguished between discipline in combat areas and RUF-controlled territory, finding that although "Gbao may have possessed only limited authority in respect to combat operations," "the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order" in RUF-controlled territory.[2925] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the role of the RUF security apparatus and the RUF disciplinary system in maintaining the cohesiveness of the RUF as an armed force and allowing the RUF leadership to control RUF fighters.[2926]

7845. para. 1061: Second, Gbao argues that he had only a nominal role as OSC outside Kailahun District,[2927] noting that the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence that he received reports of unlawful killings in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts or that he failed in his duty to ensure proper investigations were conducted in those areas.[2928] The Appeals Chamber notes that the findings Gbao cites do not show that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he had a more than nominal role outside Kailahun District, particularly in light of the Trial Chamber's specific findings regarding his practical influence and authority over the RUF security apparatus as a whole. Furthermore, Gbao fails to show that it was not open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he significantly contributed to the JCE on the basis of his contributions in Kailahun District. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Gbao's significant role as OSC in Kailahun District,[2929] his supervision of the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District[2930] and the finding that Gbao had considerable prestige and power in the RUF in

Kailahun District.[2931] Moreover, the Trial Chamber specifically found that Kailahun District played an important role in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> The widespread and systematic crimes by the RUF in Kailahun[2932] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.[2933]

7847. para. 1063: Finally, Gbao argues that the lack of findings that he acted "in concert" with the senior leaders or members of the AFRC demonstrates that he did not significantly contribute to the JCE.[2937] In light of all the above findings and discussion, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the absence of findings that Gbao directly acted together with members of the AFRC precluded a reasonable trier of fact from concluding that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the manner in which the members of the JCE interact and cooperate can take as many forms as conceived by the participants to pursue the realisation of their shared common criminal purpose.[2938] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao remained in Kailahun after the May 1997 coup on Bockarie's instructions, and that in June 1997 Bockarie ordered Gbao to move from Giema to Kailahun Town.[2939] The Trial Chamber further found that other senior RUF Commanders also remained in Kailahun District, including the Area Commander Denis Lansana and the overall G5 Commander Prince Taylor.[2940] Furthermore it found that the RUF and AFRC worked alongside one another in Kailahun District.[2941] The Appeals Chamber also notes the important role Kailahun District played in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose.[2942]

7849. para. 1094: Gbao's submission that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he played a role in the forced labour has already been partially addressed in the Appeals Chamber's discussion above. Four of Gbao's arguments in support of that submission remain to be addressed here

7850. para. 1095: Gbao first challenges the credibility of Witnesses TF1-108, TF1-336 and TF1-330. With regard to TF1-108, the Appeals Chamber has upheld the Trial Chamber's assessment of this witness in relation to Sesay's Ground 18, which presents similar challenges to this witness.[3010] As to TF1-366, Gbao relies on a statement by Judge Thompson that the witness was "virtually repudiating his own record." Gbao does not substantiate this quotation with a reference to the transcript. In any event, this statement in itself is insufficient to demonstrate an error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of TF1-366 that his testimony required reliable corroboration with respect to the acts and conduct of the Appellants.[3011] As to TF1-330, Gbao merely asserts that Exhibit 84b, a handwritten note dated 13 February 1999, shows that TF1-330 was paid in kind for his work, and that it is "surprising" that TF1-330 did not mention Gbao's significant role in forced labour until a couple of months before testifying.[3012] These submissions fail to show TF1-330 lacked credibility.

7851. para. 1096: Second, Gbao impugns the finding that "Gbao and Patrick Bangura oversaw the civilians mining at Giema as well as 'the soldiers who had guns.'"[3013] This challenge is dismissed since Gbao misrepresents TF1-330's testimony to diminish his (Gbao) role in the mining.[3014]

7852. para. 1097: Third, Gbao asserts that, if he had truly planned the enslavement in Kailahun District, "one may have expected that Gbao's role might have been remembered by the relevant RUF insiders."[3015] This speculative submission is untenable.

7853. para. 1098: Lastly, Gbao argues that TF1-330's testimony was insufficient to show that Gbao designed the forced labour at both the preparatory and execution phases, which is a requirement for planning.[3016] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not convict Gbao for the enslavement in Kailahun District under the mode of liability of planning. Instead, Gbao's direct involvement "in the planning and maintaining of a system of enslavement" in Kailahun was found to constitute a form of contribution to the JCE in this case.[3017] For that purpose, it was not required that Gbao's conduct in question was such that it met the legal elements of planning as a mode of liability distinct from JCE. The submission also fails on the ground that the Trial Chamber did not rely solely on the testimony of TF1-330 for its findings on Gbao's involvement in the forced labour which constituted enslavement in Kailahun.[3018]

7854. para. 1100: The Trial Chamber found that the acts of sexual slavery and forced marriage in Kailahun District were committed with the specific intent to spread terror and therefore constituted acts of terrorism.[3019]

7855. para. 1103: The Appeals Chamber recalls its conclusion that the Trial Chamber was not required to find that those who carried out the actus reus of the crimes had the requisite mens rea for acts of terrorism.[3024] The Appeals Chamber notes the Trial Chamber's findings that acts of terrorism were within the Common Criminal Purpose of the JCE,[3025] and that, with respect to Kailahun District, Gbao intended the commission of acts of terrorism and shared that Common Criminal Purpose.[3026] The Trial Chamber further found that one or more members of the JCE used the non-members who carried out the actus reus of the crimes to commit the crime of acts of terrorism.[3027]

7856. para. 1104: By merely referring to the Trial Chamber's factual findings on acts of sexual slavery and forced marriage in Kailahun District,[3028] Gbao fails to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the persons who committed those acts acted with the specific intent to spread terror. Gbao only offers an alternative interpretation of the evidence without explaining how the Trial Chamber's conclusion was unreasonable. Gbao further fails to address the Trial Chamber's finding that the members of the JCE intended the commission of acts of terrorism.

b. Planning – Kailahun District

i. Sesay – Planning – Child soldiers - Kailahun District

7857. para. 749: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono, Bombali and Kenema Districts.[1948] The Trial Chamber held that the execution of this system of conscription required a substantial degree of planning, and that this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organisation.[1949]

7858. para. 750: The Trial Chamber also found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of this system of conscription.[1950] It, therefore, convicted him under Article 6(1) for planning the "use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000, as charged in Count 12."[1951]

7860. para. 756: Sesay further submits that "in any event, the Trial Chamber cites only one piece of valid evidence for this finding: the evidence of Witness TF1-366," and that the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-199 and TF1-371, also cited by the Trial Chamber in further support, do not in fact support the finding.[1974] The Trial Chamber provided no citations for its finding that Sesay issued the orders in June 1998, however, it cited the testimony of TF1-366, TF1-199 and TF1-371 for its findings that SBUs were children tasked with carrying weapons for the RUF. Witness TF1-366's testimony most closely supports both findings of the Trial Chamber, including that Sesay issued orders. He testified directly that Kallon and Superman issued orders and Sesay "sent messages" that young boys should be brought to be trained at Bunumbu.[1975] He stated that some of the "young boys" were 15 years of age, but that many were SBUs comprising children ages 9 to 11 years and smaller boys.[1976] Witness TF1-199 testified that SBUs were "really small boys" and because he was a small boy of 12 years of age, he was called an SBU.[1977] However, he did not mention Sesay in his testimony or testify to anyone giving orders. Witness TF1-371 testified that children between the ages of 12 and 18 years were classified as SBUs, and that Sesay had SBUs, one of whom was around 15 years and the other around the age of 16.[1978] Importantly, of the testimony cited by the Trial Chamber, only TF1-366 supports the finding that Sesay issued orders for "young boys" to be trained at Bunumbu in June 1998.

366, the Trial Chamber stated that it "has not accepted the testimony of TF1-366 as it relates to the acts and conduct of the Accused unless it was corroborated in some material aspect by a reliable witness."[1981]

7864. para. 760: Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding, on the basis of testimony of TF1-362, that he personally communicated reports to Bunumbu and ordered that the training camp be moved from Bunumbu to Yengema.[1983] Sesay, however, fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber could not reasonably rely on TF1-362 for these findings. As Sesay does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion to assess the witness's credibility or determine the weight it attached to his testimony, this part of Sesay's argument fails.

7865. para. 761: Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied upon Witnesses TF1-114 and TF1-108[1984] to support its finding that children were forcibly trained,[1985] but disregarded their testimony that, Sesay contends, "contradicted TF1-362's account of Sesay's involvement in the training base." However, Sesay fails to demonstrate how the testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-108 contradicts the testimony relied upon by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber is unable to infer his argument. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "while it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record."[1986] Sesay fails to show error in the Trial Chamber's finding.

7867. para. 763: Reports on the trainees were compiled by the adjutant and sent to the deputy at the training base and then to the training commandant who would forward the reports to an advisor.[1991] Next, the reports were either delivered by hand or communicated via radio to Sesay and finally to Bockarie;[1992] and Sesay would confirm delivery of the report back to the base.[1993] The Trial Chamber found that "every such report was either hand-delivered or communicated via radio to Sesay."[1994] The Trial Chamber also found that the training commander at Yengema reported directly through Sesay to Bockarie, until Bockarie left the RUF in December 1999, after which she reported to Sesay only.[1995] According to the Trial Chamber, records were kept of the ages of SBUs and SGUs trained at Bunumbu and Yengema, from which it could be inferred that the fighters who conducted the training knew or had reason to know that certain trainees were under the age of 15.[1996]

7868. para. 764: The Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay's receipt of reports is relevant circumstantial evidence supporting the findings that "the execution of this system of conscription of child soldiers required a substantial degree of planning"[1997] and that "this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organization,"[1998] including Sesay.[1999] That reports on the training of child soldiers were transmitted to RUF headquarters signifies that the conscription of child soldiers was highly organised, and that the RUF leadership was responsible for that organisation. Moreover, the creation and transmission of training reports represents a mechanism through which the RUF headquarters could monitor the implementation of the planned conscription of child soldiers. Sesay's receipt of such reports was indicative that he had participated in that planning process. Accordingly, contrary to Sesay's contention, the Trial Chamber did not consider that he substantially contributed to the planning by merely receiving reports, but that his receipt of such reports was part of the evidence taken into consideration in coming to the conclusion that he had participated in the planning at both the preparatory and execution phases.

1998 and remained with the group until 2000, when he was demobilised.[2004] The Trial Chamber considered that although the witness was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder as a result of his experience as a child soldier with the RUF, he was nonetheless able to give truthful testimony.[2005] The Trial Chamber concluded that, after seeing the witness in court, hearing his testimony and observing him under cross-examination, he "came across as a candid witness." The Trial Chamber, therefore, "generally accepted his testimony, especially as it relates to his own experiences as a child combatant."[2006]

7872. para. 768: Taking into account the foregoing discussion, the Appeals Chamber will now consider Sesay's broader claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him liable for planning the use of child soldiers.

7873. para. 769: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in concluding that his acts amounted to "planning."[2008] The Appeals Chamber considers that whether particular acts amount to a substantial contribution to the crime for the purposes of planning liability is to be assessed on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole. In concluding that Sesay's cumulative conduct fulfilled the actus reas of planning, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Sesay gave orders in June 1998 that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and that he received reports on training in Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema;[2009] (ii) he visited Camp Lion where he addressed the recruits and told them that they would be sent to the battlefield; and that if they failed to comply with orders they would be executed;[2010] (iii) he visited RUF fighters including children under the age of 15 who were preparing to conduct an attack on Daru and distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters;[2011] and (iv) he participated in an attack on Koidu in December 1998 together with his bodyguards, including children under the age of 15.[2012]

per se. However, Sesay does not explain why a reasonable trier of fact could not have inferred from these findings and other evidence that he had substantially contributed to designing the criminal conduct. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes in particular the Trial Chamber's findings that Sesay ordered the training of child soldiers, received reports on such training and personally visited the Camp Lion training camp, addressing and threatening the child soldier conscripts there. Therefore, in inferring that Sesay contributed to the planning of the crimes, the Trial Chamber did not rely solely on Sesay's command role, as Sesay suggests.[2013] Rather, the Trial Chamber further considered Sesay's personal and direct participation in the conscription and training process. Specifically, the acts relied on by the Trial Chamber evince that Sesay participated in all stages of that process, from ordering the training of child soldiers to monitoring the implementation of the training to monitoring the use of child soldiers. In addition, although not referenced in its reasoning, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie and Sesay "issued orders to move the RUF training base from Bunumbu to Yengema in Kono District," and that "Sesay personally discussed the creation of the new Yengema base with the training commander."[2014] Finally, as noted above, the Trial Chamber found that the highly organised character of the conscription process was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.[2015] It was on the basis of these findings as a whole that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes. Sesay fails to show that the Trial Chamber's finding, on the basis of the evidence as a whole, was unreasonable. Sesay's submission is dismissed.

7876. para. 772: However, Sesay again fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's findings, could have concluded that he substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes for which he was held liable. Although Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are "simply insufficient,"[2020] and points to the absence of findings regarding his acts with respect to the conscription and use of child soldiers in Kenema and Bombali Districts[2021] and before February 1998,[2022] he does not explain how the Trial Chamber's conclusion was accordingly unreasonable. In particular, Sesay does not show that no reasonable trier of fact could infer from the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his acts, in combination with other findings such as those concerning the nature of the conscription and use of child soldiers, that he substantially contributed to the planning of crimes committed in other locations as well. In merely submitting that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are insufficient to ground his liability for planning the other instances of the crime, Sesay fails to explain why this is so. Sesay further fails to point to other findings or evidence to show that the crimes in Kenema and Bombali Districts were unique or distinct from the crimes in Kailahun and Kono Districts. While Sesay correctly submits that he can only be held liable for those crimes he substantially contributed to the planning of, he does not show how no reasonable trier of fact could infer, on the basis of his acts with respect to Bunumbu and Yengema in particular, that he substantially contributed as well to the planning of the other crimes for which he was held liable.

7879. para. 775: Sesay's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding him responsible for the offence in Bombali when it had specifically held that he could not be liable for crimes committed in Bombali District [2025] is misconceived. The Trial Chamber held that Sesay was not liable for crimes in Bombali District in relation to crimes attributable to AFRC forces under the control of Gullit after the cessation of the JCE.[2026] In contrast, Sesay was found to have planned an RUF system of use of child soldiers.[2027]

ii. Kallon – Planning – Child soldiers – Kailahun District

7882. para. 918: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gave orders that "young boys" be trained, as the Trial Chamber itself found that the boys to be trained were over 15 years of age.[2394] The Appeals Chamber has previously considered this issue in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that Kallon misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings.[2395] Similarly, the Appeals Chamber has previously considered the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Witness TF1-366 in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that the Trial Chamber reliance on that testimony was not erroneous.[2396] Kallon further fails otherwise to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding the testimony of Witness TF1-366 credible. This submission is rejected.

7883. para. 919: The Appeals Chamber also rejects Kallon's argument that it is not established beyond reasonable doubt that the boys and girls trained at the RUF training bases were under the age of 15.[2397] Witnesses TF1-141 and TF1-263 testified that they were 12 and 14 years of age respectively at the time they were abducted and sent for military training.[2398] Similarly, Witness Dennis Koker saw Kallon bring juveniles under the age of 15 to Bunumbu for training.[2399] The Trial Chamber accepted the testimonies of the Witnesses and found them credible. Kallon has not established that no reasonable trier of fact could rely on their testimonies for a finding of fact. This submission is rejected.

7885. para. 921: With respect to Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber found that he and Sesay gave orders for "young boys" to be trained, but that those boys were 15 years of age and above, the Appeals Chamber refers to its conclusion above that some of the "young boys" included persons both under and above the age of 15.[2403] The Appeals Chamber recalls its decision concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker, particularly in relation to the ages of the children with whom they associated Kallon.[2404] The Appeals Chamber also recalls that the Trial Chamber exercised caution in determining the ages of children associated with the rebel factions in its findings.[2405] The Appeals Chamber defers to these findings[2406] and dismisses Kallon's argument regarding the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker relating to the ages of children.

7887. para. 923: Kallon further submits that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof to him by stating that "where doubt existed as to whether a person abducted or trained was under the age of 15, it was incumbent upon the perpetrator to ascertain the person's age."[2410] The Appeals Chamber has previously held that the prohibition on conscripting or using child soldiers existed in customary international law at the times relevant to the offences in this case, and that violation of this prohibition incurs individual criminal responsibility in customary international law.[2411] In reaching those holdings, the Appeals Chamber observed that a significant body of conventional international law imposes an obligation on parties to "take all feasible measures" to ensure that children are not recruited or used in hostilities.[2412] The accused are under a duty to act with due diligence to ensure that children under the age of 15 are not recruited or used in combat. Failure to exercise such due diligence to ascertain the age of recruits does not relieve an accused of his liability for their recruitment or use.[2413] The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no error in the Trial Chamber's statement that the accused were under a duty to exercise due diligence to ascertain the age of a child.

7888. para. 924: Kallon submits a number of arguments contesting the Trial Chamber's finding that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2414] Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber relied solely on his command role to support that finding,[2415] and argues that there was no evidence that he was involved in the planning of the abduction and training of children.[2416]

7889. para. 925: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon "participated in the design and maintenance of [the RUF] system of forced recruitment and use [of child soldiers] and that his contribution in this regard was substantial."[2417] In reaching this conclusion, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Kallon was a senior RUF Commander during the attack on Koidu Town in February 1998 in which children were abducted in large numbers to be sent to RUF camps; (ii) Kallon gave orders for children to be trained at RUF camps; (iii) Kallon brought a group of children to Bunumbu for training in 1998; and (iv) Kallon was the senior RUF Commander on 3 May 2000 at Moria where child soldiers were used in the ambush of UNAMSIL forces.[2418] The Trial Chamber also found that the highly organised character of the process of conscripting and using child soldiers was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.[2419]As these findings make clear, the Trial Chamber did not solely rely on Kallon's command role to find that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2420]

7890. para. 926: Kallon fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have inferred from these findings and the evidence as a whole that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2421] This submission is rejected.

iii. Gbao – Planning – Child soldiers – Kailahun District

7891. para. 1151: The Prosecution appeals Gbao's acquittal under Count 12, arguing that the Trial Chamber should have found him liable either pursuant to JCE, planning or aiding and abetting. Because the Appeals Chamber, Justices Kamanda and King dissenting, has dismissed the Prosecution's Ground 1 in which it argued that the JCE continued beyond late April 1998, there is no basis for the submission that Gbao is liable under Count 12 pursuant to JCE after that date.[3192] The Appeals Chamber proceeds to consider the remainder of the Prosecution's Ground 2.

7892. para. 1152: The Trial Chamber acquitted Gbao of the charge under Count 12 of conscripting children under the age of 15 into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities.[3193] It found that Gbao loaded former child soldiers onto a truck and removed them from the Interim Care Centre in Makeni in May 2000, but that this was insufficient to constitute a substantial contribution to the widespread system of child conscription or the consistent pattern of using children to actively participate in hostilities.[3194] It found no other evidence that Gbao participated in the design of these crimes.[3195]

7893. para.1169: The present ground of appeal essentially turns on whether, and if so to what extent, Gbao contributed to the crimes charged under Count 12. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber finds, as a preliminary matter, that the Prosecution is incorrect in law to suggest that JCE liability does not require that the accused contribute to the crimes for which he is alleged to be responsible.[3255] The Appeals Chamber has already held that, while JCE liability does not require that the accused performed any part of the actus reus of the perpetrated crime,[3256] it does require that the accused by his participation in the common criminal purpose lent "a significant contribution to the crimes for which the accused is to be found responsible."[3257]

7895. para. 1171: The Prosecution's theory as to Gbao's contribution to the crimes is principally the same for all three modes of liability alleged, and can be summarised as follows: (i) the G5 played a role in the system of enslavement in Kailahun by screening captured civilians, including children, and assessing their suitability for different types of labour such as military training; and (ii) Gbao had power and prestige over the RUF in Kailahun and a supervisory role over the G5, to which he sometimes issued orders. The Appeals Chamber stresses that it is not sufficient that this theory could allow for an inference that Gbao significantly or substantially contributed to the crimes. For the Prosecution to succeed, it must show that no reasonable trier of fact could have arrived at the Trial Chamber's conclusion. As explained earlier, because the Prosecution is appealing against an acquittal, its alternative reading of the facts must eliminate all reasonable doubt of the accused's guilt.[3259]

7896. para. 1172: The Prosecution fails to meet this burden. First, while it is true that the Trial Chamber found that the G5 screened captured civilians to assess their suitability for different types of labour,[3260] and that children were "screened to ascertain their suitability for combat operations,"[3261] the Trial Chamber made no finding that the G5's screening was done for the purpose of conscripting children under the age of 15, or that it resulted in the use of such children in active combat. Moreover, the only link between Gbao and child conscription made in the findings is his relationship as OSC over the G5.[3262] However, this finding was made in respect of the RUF's disciplinary system and not as to whether Gbao contributed to child conscription. The Prosecution refers to the testimony of Witness TF1-141 who stated that the G5 decided whether he was fit for military training,[3263] and that he was told that the first person he met after his abduction and travel to Kailahun was Gbao.[3264] This evidence is insufficient to eliminate all doubt as to whether Gbao "participated in the execution, administration and running of a plan" encompassing child conscription, as argued by the Prosecution.[3265]

7898. para. 1174: In this regard, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by the Prosecution's attempt to link child conscription and use with the enslavement in Kailahun District. While both were within the JCE, it does not follow that Gbao, simply by contributing to the latter crime also significantly contributed to the former, as the two crimes are distinct both in law and in fact. The Trial Chamber found no evidence that Gbao's participation in the JCE was such that it contributed to both.[3268] By merely reiterating the Trial Chamber's findings, without proffering any evidence that might have been disregarded by the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution's submission is but a bare request that the Appeals Chamber substitute its own conclusion for that of the Trial Chamber. Such a submission fails to meet the Prosecution's burden to eliminate all reasonable doubt as to Gbao's guilt.

7899. para. 1175: The Prosecution makes two additional submissions as to Gbao's alleged responsibility for aiding and abetting child conscription and use outside Kailahun District. The first is that his alleged contribution to planning the execution of the crime in Kailahun District, coupled with his purported failure to interfere in the recruitment of civilians including persons under the age of 15 being sent to training and then used for military purposes, amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime.[3269] The Appeals Chamber recalls that it has rejected the Prosecution's contention that Gbao significantly or substantially contributed to the child conscription and use in Kailahun District. Moreover, assuming arguendo that Gbao did so contribute, the Prosecution fails to point to findings or evidence establishing Gbao's alleged failure to interfere beyond Kailahun, or suggest what measures he could have taken in that respect and what effect his failure to do so would have had on the perpetrators. To the contrary, the Prosecution itself refers to evidence that Gbao granted permission for the re-opening of the Interim Care Centre in Makeni in February 2000.[3270]

7900. para. 1176: The Prosecution's second submission is that Gbao aided and abetted "re-recruitment" and use of the children he removed from the Interim Care Centre in May 2000.[3271] The Trial Chamber found that the fact that Gbao loaded former child fighters onto a truck and removed them from the Interim Care Centre in May 2000 was "insufficient to constitute a substantial contribution to the widespread system of child conscription or the consistent pattern of using children to participate actively in hostilities."[3272] The Prosecution challenges this finding,[3273] essentially arguing that some of the removed children were used in combat in the Lunsar area during the RUF attack on the ZAMBATT peacekeepers.[3274]

7902. para. 1178: Second, the Prosecution also fails to eliminate all reasonable doubt as to whether they were used to participate actively in hostilities. Here, the Prosecution relies on the testimony of TF1-174.[3277] It says the witness testified that he left Makeni on 6 May 2000 and that when he returned to the Interim Care Centre at Makeni the number of children there had decreased drastically.[3278] A day after Gbao removed the children from the Interim Care Centre, "one of the boys" returned to the Interim Care Centre crying and saying that "a good number of his companions were killed in the attack at Lunsar."[3279] The Prosecution posits that this leads to the only reasonable inference that the children removed by Gbao were used in combat during the RUF attack on the ZAMBATT peacekeepers between 3 and 4 May 2000.[3280] However, the Prosecution fails to eliminate the doubt arising from the fact that, according to the Prosecution's recitation of TF1-174's testimony, Gbao does not appear to have removed the children before 6 May 2000, that is, two days after the attack in which the Prosecution says the children he removed were used.

7903. para. 1179: Having found the Prosecution fails to eliminate all doubt as to Gbao's significant or substantial contribution to the crimes charged under Count 12, the Appeals Chamber need not address the additional submissions on Gbao's mens rea.

c. Aiding and abetting – Kailahun District

i. Gbao - Aiding and abetting – Planning – Child soldiers - Kailahun District

7904. See above: Chapter 12 - Kailahun District – Planning – Child soldiers – Gbao – paras. 1151, 1152, 1169– 1179 [7891].

a. JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Bo District

i. Sesay - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Bo District

7905. para. 612: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay actively participated in the furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose and thereby significantly contributed to the acts of terrorism (Count 1), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), and pillage (Count 14) found to have been committed in Bo District between 1 June 1997 and 30 June 1997.[1517] It held that he shared the intent with the other JCE members to commit these crimes.[1518]

7906. para. 614: Both of Sesay's arguments under his present ground of appeal seek to suggest that the Trial Chamber did not find that he participated in the JCE between 1 June 1997 and 30 June 1997 when the crimes for which he incurred JCE liability were committed in Bo District.[1522] This is incorrect. The Trial Chamber found that Sesay significantly contributed to the JCE, inter alia, through his "close relationship and cooperation with Bockarie" from the outset of the JCE on 25 May 1997.[1523] Bockarie, himself a JCE member,[1524] led the attack on Sembehun in Bo District in June 1997[1525] during which AFRC/RUF fighters committed unlawful killings, pillage and acts of terrorism.[1526]

7907. para. 615: As to the Trial Chamber's conclusion on Sesay's use of "the levers of State power," the Appeals Chamber notes that this conclusion was supported by evidence, and that Sesay himself recognises the factual findings underpinning it.[1527] Those factual findings were that Sesay, while he was a member of the Supreme Council,[1528] used "his power and authority to compel his subordinates to arrest a suspected Kamajor supporter."[1529] He "used police officers, AFRC and RUF fighters to arrest and detain suspected Kamajor sympathisers and collaborators in Kenema Town. In certain instances, such individuals were detained without charges and seriously mistreated by Sesay."[1530] On this basis, the Trial Chamber concluded that "Sesay used the levers of State power in an attempt to destroy civilian support for the Kamajors."[1531] Sesay's "use of the levers of State power" accordingly referred to his use of police officers and AFRC/RUF fighters to arrest suspected Kamajor collaborators, sometimes without charges and subjected to serious mistreatment. Thus qualified, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that the conclusion on Sesay's "use of the levers of State power" was "hyperbolic." Whether Sesay's mistreatment of the detainees in itself amounted to a crime under the Statute is not determinative of whether his conduct contributed to the JCE.[1532]

ii. Kallon - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Bo District

7908. para. 791: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon incurred JCE liability for the crimes, including unlawful killings, committed in Bo District between 1 June 1997 and 30 June 1997.[2064] It held that Kallon participated in the furtherance of the Common Criminal Purpose and thereby significantly contributed to the commission of these crimes, and that he shared the intent to commit the crimes with the other JCE members.[2065]

7909. para. 794: The Appeals Chamber notes as a preliminary matter that it was not required that Kallon performed any part of the actus reus of the crimes in Bo District for him to incur JCE liability for these crimes.[2069] Rather, as far as his actus reus is concerned, it sufficed that Kallon's participation in the JCE, whether or not physically carried out in Bo District, significantly contributed to the crimes there.[2070]

7910. para. 795: The Appeals Chamber finds that Kallon's two arguments lack merit, for the following reasons. His first argument is based on the erroneous assertion that the Trial Chamber found that he did not become a member of the Supreme Council until August 1997. Rather, the Trial Chamber found that he started attending Supreme Council meetings on a reasonably regular basis from that time onwards.[2071] Contrary to Kallon's claim,[2072] there is no contradiction between this finding and the finding that it "was often" difficult for him to travel to Freetown due to Kamajor attacks.[2073] As noted, the Trial Chamber also relied on evidence that Kallon was a member of the Supreme Council "with effect from" 25 May 1997 in establishing his membership in that body.[2074] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber did not, as Kallon argues, "ignore" that he was not posted in Bo until August 1997;[2075] it explicitly recognised this fact.[2076] However, it was not required that Kallon was physically present in Bo in order to contribute to the crimes there through his participation in the JCE. Kallon fails to explain how his absence precluded a reasonable trier of fact from finding that he incurred JCE liability for the crimes in Bo in June 1997.[2077] This argument is rejected.

7911. para. 796: Kallon's second argument is also unavailing. The fact that he did not personally commit any of the crimes did not, as the Trial Chamber correctly noted, exclude JCE liability on his part.[2078] Contrary to Kallon's claim, the Trial Chamber further specified that the common criminal purpose of the JCE crystallised shortly after the coup on 25 May 1997, and explained how the JCE came into existence.[2079] The fact that Bo District was only partly under joint AFRC/RUF control by June 1997 does not, as previously explained, render unreasonable the finding that the crimes there, namely, those committed during the attacks on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun, formed part of the common criminal purpose.[2080] This argument is rejected.

7913. para. 940: Concerning the looting from Ibrahim Kamara, the Trial Chamber also found that Kallon incurred liability because of his significant contribution to the crime by his participation in the JCE.[2467] Kallon's present challenges to that conclusion are without merit, as it was not required that Kallon was either present in Bo at the time the crime was committed[2468] or knew about the specific incident.[2469] Further, given the finding that both Kallon and Bockarie were members of the JCE,[2470] which finding Kallon does not challenge here, it is irrelevant whether Kallon had control over Bockarie. This argument is rejected.

iii. Gbao - JCE – Participation in and shared intent - Bo District

7917. See above: Chapter 12 – Article 6.1. Liability – RUF – Appellate Judgment – Findings and conclusions – JCE – Categories of JCE and mens rea – Separate opinion – Justice Ayoola – paras. 22-41, 43– 57 [7480].

7919. para. 1061: Second, Gbao argues that he had only a nominal role as OSC outside Kailahun District,[2927] noting that the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence that he received reports of unlawful killings in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts or that he failed in his duty to ensure proper investigations were conducted in those areas.[2928] The Appeals Chamber notes that the findings Gbao cites do not show that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he had a more than nominal role outside Kailahun District, particularly in light of the Trial Chamber's specific findings regarding his practical influence and authority over the RUF security apparatus as a whole. Furthermore, Gbao fails to show that it was not open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he significantly contributed to the JCE on the basis of his contributions in Kailahun District. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Gbao's significant role as OSC in Kailahun District,[2929] his supervision of the MP and G5 units in Kailahun District[2930] and the finding that Gbao had considerable prestige and power in the RUF in Kailahun District.[2931] Moreover, the Trial Chamber specifically found that Kailahun District played an important role in the realisation of the Common Criminal Purpose:

> The[] widespread and systematic crimes by the RUF in Kailahun[2932] were for the benefit of the RUF and the Junta in furthering their ultimate goal of taking political, economic and territorial control over Sierra Leone. We find it was only through their joint action that the AFRC and RUF were able to control the entire country, because the RUF needed the AFRC to access Kenema and Bo Districts, while the AFRC could not bring Kailahun within the sphere of the Junta Government control without cooperation from the RUF. Thus, RUF activities in Kailahun furthered the ultimate goal of joint political, economical and territorial control.[2933]

(x) Bombali District

a. Planning – Bombali District

i. Sesay – Planning – Child soldiers - Bombali District

7920. para. 749: The Trial Chamber found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono, Bombali and Kenema Districts.[1948] The Trial Chamber held that the execution of this system of conscription required a substantial degree of planning, and that this planning was conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organisation.[1949]

7921. para. 750: The Trial Chamber also found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of this system of conscription.[1950] It, therefore, convicted him under Article 6(1) for planning the "use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000, as charged in Count 12."[1951]

the orders in June 1998, however, it cited the testimony of TF1-366, TF1-199 and TF1-371 for its findings that SBUs were children tasked with carrying weapons for the RUF. Witness TF1-366's testimony most closely supports both findings of the Trial Chamber, including that Sesay issued orders. He testified directly that Kallon and Superman issued orders and Sesay "sent messages" that young boys should be brought to be trained at Bunumbu.[1975] He stated that some of the "young boys" were 15 years of age, but that many were SBUs comprising children ages 9 to 11 years and smaller boys.[1976] Witness TF1-199 testified that SBUs were "really small boys" and because he was a small boy of 12 years of age, he was called an SBU.[1977] However, he did not mention Sesay in his testimony or testify to anyone giving orders. Witness TF1-371 testified that children between the ages of 12 and 18 years were classified as SBUs, and that Sesay had SBUs, one of whom was around 15 years and the other around the age of 16.[1978] Importantly, of the testimony cited by the Trial Chamber, only TF1-366 supports the finding that Sesay issued orders for "young boys" to be trained at Bunumbu in June 1998.

7925. para. 758: Trial Chambers enjoy broad discretion in their assessment of evidence and determination of the weight to accord testimony. In general, a Trial Chamber may in the exercise of its discretion rely on a single witness for support of its factual findings. With respect to TF1-366, the Trial Chamber stated that it "has not accepted the testimony of TF1-366 as it relates to the acts and conduct of the Accused unless it was corroborated in some material aspect by a reliable witness."[1981]

7927. para. 760: Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding, on the basis of testimony of TF1-362, that he personally communicated reports to Bunumbu and ordered that the training camp be moved from Bunumbu to Yengema.[1983] Sesay, however, fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber could not reasonably rely on TF1-362 for these findings. As Sesay does not show an error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion to assess the witness's credibility or determine the weight it attached to his testimony, this part of Sesay's argument fails.

7928. para. 761: Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied upon Witnesses TF1-114 and TF1-108[1984] to support its finding that children were forcibly trained,[1985] but disregarded their testimony that, Sesay contends, "contradicted TF1-362's account of Sesay's involvement in the training base." However, Sesay fails to demonstrate how the testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-108 contradicts the testimony relied upon by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber is unable to infer his argument. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "while it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record."[1986] Sesay fails to show error in the Trial Chamber's finding.

7930. para. 763: Reports on the trainees were compiled by the adjutant and sent to the deputy at the training base and then to the training commandant who would forward the reports to an advisor.[1991] Next, the reports were either delivered by hand or communicated via radio to Sesay and finally to Bockarie;[1992] and Sesay would confirm delivery of the report back to the base.[1993] The Trial Chamber found that "every such report was either hand-delivered or communicated via radio to Sesay."[1994] The Trial Chamber also found that the training commander at Yengema reported directly through Sesay to Bockarie, until Bockarie left the RUF in December 1999, after which she reported to Sesay only.[1995] According to the Trial Chamber, records were kept of the ages of SBUs and SGUs trained at Bunumbu and Yengema, from which it could be inferred that the fighters who conducted the training knew or had reason to know that certain trainees were under the age of 15.[1996]

conducted at the highest levels of the RUF organization,"[1998] including Sesay.[1999] That reports on the training of child soldiers were transmitted to RUF headquarters signifies that the conscription of child soldiers was highly organised, and that the RUF leadership was responsible for that organisation. Moreover, the creation and transmission of training reports represents a mechanism through which the RUF headquarters could monitor the implementation of the planned conscription of child soldiers. Sesay's receipt of such reports was indicative that he had participated in that planning process. Accordingly, contrary to Sesay's contention, the Trial Chamber did not consider that he substantially contributed to the planning by merely receiving reports, but that his receipt of such reports was part of the evidence taken into consideration in coming to the conclusion that he had participated in the planning at both the preparatory and execution phases.

7933. para. 766: The Trial Chamber acknowledged the "concerns" raised by the Defence,[2002] and indicated that it was "uneasy with portions of TF1-141's testimony that appeared to be fanciful and thus implausible."[2003] The Trial Chamber noted that the witness was captured by the RUF in 1998 and remained with the group until 2000, when he was demobilised.[2004] The Trial Chamber considered that although the witness was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder as a result of his experience as a child soldier with the RUF, he was nonetheless able to give truthful testimony.[2005] The Trial Chamber concluded that, after seeing the witness in court, hearing his testimony and observing him under cross-examination, he "came across as a candid witness." The Trial Chamber, therefore, "generally accepted his testimony, especially as it relates to his own experiences as a child combatant."[2006]

7934. para. 767: Sesay contends the witness was "constantly contradicting himself," and that the Trial Chamber disregarded a "significant contradiction" in the witness's testimony, but he only points to one purported contradiction, which, even if a contradiction, was not material to the findings Sesay contests here.[2007] Sesay further fails to show what portions of the witness's testimony contain discrepancies that made the Trial Chamber's assessment of the witness's credibility unreasonable. Seasy thus fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting parts of the witness's evidence.

7936. para. 769: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in concluding that his acts amounted to "planning."[2008] The Appeals Chamber considers that whether particular acts amount to a substantial contribution to the crime for the purposes of planning liability is to be assessed on a case-by-case basis in light of the evidence as a whole. In concluding that Sesay's cumulative conduct fulfilled the actus reas of planning, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Sesay gave orders in June 1998 that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and that he received reports on training in Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema;[2009] (ii) he visited Camp Lion where he addressed the recruits and told them that they would be sent to the battlefield; and that if they failed to comply with orders they would be executed;[2010] (iii) he visited RUF fighters including children under the age of 15 who were preparing to conduct an attack on Daru and distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters;[2011] and (iv) he participated in an attack on Koidu in December 1998 together with his bodyguards, including children under the age of 15.[2012]

7937. para. 770: Sesay fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he performed the actus reus of planning. His contention appears to be centred on the notion that none of his acts as found by the Trial Chamber constitute the "planning" or "designing" of the crimes per se. However, Sesay does not explain why a reasonable trier of fact could not have inferred from these findings and other evidence that he had substantially contributed to designing the criminal conduct. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes in particular the Trial Chamber's findings that Sesay ordered the training of child soldiers, received reports on such training and personally visited the Camp Lion training camp, addressing and threatening the child soldier conscripts there. Therefore, in inferring that Sesay contributed to the planning of the crimes, the Trial Chamber did not rely solely on Sesay's command role, as Sesay suggests.[2013] Rather, the Trial Chamber further considered Sesay's personal and direct participation in the conscription and training process. Specifically, the acts relied on by the Trial Chamber evince that Sesay participated in all stages of that process, from ordering the training of child soldiers to monitoring the implementation of the training to monitoring the use of child soldiers. In addition, although not referenced in its reasoning, the Trial Chamber found that Bockarie and Sesay "issued orders to move the RUF training base from Bunumbu to Yengema in Kono District," and that "Sesay personally discussed the creation of the new Yengema base with the training commander."[2014] Finally, as noted above, the Trial Chamber found that the highly organised character of the conscription process was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.[2015] It was on the basis of these findings as a whole that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes. Sesay fails to show that the Trial Chamber's finding, on the basis of the evidence as a whole, was unreasonable. Sesay's submission is dismissed.

7939. para. 772: However, Sesay again fails to explain how no reasonable trier of fact, on the basis of the Trial Chamber's findings, could have concluded that he substantially contributed to the planning of the crimes for which he was held liable. Although Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are "simply insufficient,"[2020] and points to the absence of findings regarding his acts with respect to the conscription and use of child soldiers in Kenema and Bombali Districts[2021] and before February 1998,[2022] he does not explain how the Trial Chamber's conclusion was accordingly unreasonable. In particular, Sesay does not show that no reasonable trier of fact could infer from the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his acts, in combination with other findings such as those concerning the nature of the conscription and use of child soldiers, that he substantially contributed to the planning of crimes committed in other locations as well. In merely submitting that the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to Bunumbu are insufficient to ground his liability for planning the other instances of the crime, Sesay fails to explain why this is so. Sesay further fails to point to other findings or evidence to show that the crimes in Kenema and Bombali Districts were unique or distinct from the crimes in Kailahun and Kono Districts. While Sesay correctly submits that he can only be held liable for those crimes he substantially contributed to the planning of, he does not show how no reasonable trier of fact could infer, on the basis of his acts with respect to Bunumbu and Yengema in particular, that he substantially contributed as well to the planning of the other crimes for which he was held liable.

7942. para. 775: Sesay's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding him responsible for the offence in Bombali when it had specifically held that he could not be liable for crimes committed in Bombali District[2025] is misconceived. The Trial Chamber held that Sesay was not liable for crimes in Bombali District in relation to crimes attributable to AFRC forces under the control of Gullit after the cessation of the JCE.[2026] In contrast, Sesay was found to have planned an RUF system of use of child soldiers.[2027]

ii. Kallon – Planning – Child soldiers – Bombali District

7944. para. 917: In finding that Kallon was a senior RUF commander during the attack on Koidu Town in February 1998,[2390] the Trial Chamber found that Kallon held the rank of Major during the retreat to Kono in February 1998[2391] and that he gave orders which were complied with by troops.2392 Kallon does not challenge these findings or show how no reasonable trier of fact could have reached those findings on the basis of the evidence.[2393] This submission is dismissed.

7945. para. 918: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gave orders that "young boys" be trained, as the Trial Chamber itself found that the boys to be trained were over 15 years of age.[2394] The Appeals Chamber has previously considered this issue in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that Kallon misinterprets the Trial Chamber's findings.[2395] Similarly, the Appeals Chamber has previously considered the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Witness TF1-366 in addressing Sesay's Ground 43, and reiterates its conclusion that the Trial Chamber reliance on that testimony was not erroneous.[2396] Kallon further fails otherwise to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding the testimony of Witness TF1-366 credible. This submission is rejected.

7946. para. 919: The Appeals Chamber also rejects Kallon's argument that it is not established beyond reasonable doubt that the boys and girls trained at the RUF training bases were under the age of 15.[2397] Witnesses TF1-141 and TF1-263 testified that they were 12 and 14 years of age respectively at the time they were abducted and sent for military training.[2398] Similarly, Witness Dennis Koker saw Kallon bring juveniles under the age of 15 to Bunumbu for training.[2399] The Trial Chamber accepted the testimonies of the Witnesses and found them credible. Kallon has not established that no reasonable trier of fact could rely on their testimonies for a finding of fact. This submission is rejected.

7948. para. 921: With respect to Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber found that he and Sesay gave orders for "young boys" to be trained, but that those boys were 15 years of age and above, the Appeals Chamber refers to its conclusion above that some of the "young boys" included persons both under and above the age of 15.[2403] The Appeals Chamber recalls its decision concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker, particularly in relation to the ages of the children with whom they associated Kallon.[2404] The Appeals Chamber also recalls that the Trial Chamber exercised caution in determining the ages of children associated with the rebel factions in its findings.[2405] The Appeals Chamber defers to these findings[2406] and dismisses Kallon's argument regarding the testimonies of Witnesses TF1-141, TF1-263, TF1-366 and Dennis Koker relating to the ages of children.

7949. para. 922: Kallon contends that the Trial Chamber found that he "knew or had reason to know that the persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15" was erroneous given its inconclusive nature, thereby suggesting that it was not the only reasonable inference that could be drawn from the evidence.[2407] Kallon mischaracterises the Trial Chamber's findings. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not find that he "knew or had reason to know that persons conscripted 'may have been' under the age of 15."[2408] Rather, the Trial Chamber identified several factors which it found to be "cumulatively sufficient to put the fighters who perpetrated the abductions and military training on notice that the persons involved may have been under the age of 15."[2409] Accordingly, this part of Kallon's argument must fail.

7950. para. 923: Kallon further submits that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof to him by stating that "where doubt existed as to whether a person abducted or trained was under the age of 15, it was incumbent upon the perpetrator to ascertain the person's age."[2410] The Appeals Chamber has previously held that the prohibition on conscripting or using child soldiers existed in customary international law at the times relevant to the offences in this case, and that violation of this prohibition incurs individual criminal responsibility in customary international law.[2411] In reaching those holdings, the Appeals Chamber observed that a significant body of conventional international law imposes an obligation on parties to "take all feasible measures" to ensure that children are not recruited or used in hostilities.[2412] The accused are under a duty to act with due diligence to ensure that children under the age of 15 are not recruited or used in combat. Failure to exercise such due diligence to ascertain the age of recruits does not relieve an accused of his liability for their recruitment or use.[2413] The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no error in the Trial Chamber's statement that the accused were under a duty to exercise due diligence to ascertain the age of a child.

7951. para. 924: Kallon submits a number of arguments contesting the Trial Chamber's finding that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2414] Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber relied solely on his command role to support that finding,[2415] and argues that there was no evidence that he was involved in the planning of the abduction and training of children.[2416]

7952. para. 925: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon "participated in the design and maintenance of the RUF system of forced recruitment and use of child soldiers] and that his contribution in this regard was substantial."[2417] In reaching this conclusion, the Trial Chamber relied on its findings that: (i) Kallon was a senior RUF Commander during the attack on Koidu Town in February 1998 in which children were abducted in large numbers to be sent to RUF camps; (ii) Kallon gave orders for children to be trained at RUF camps; (iii) Kallon brought a group of children to Bunumbu for training in 1998; and (iv) Kallon was the senior RUF Commander on 3 May 2000 at Moria where child soldiers were used in the ambush of UNAMSIL forces.[2418] The Trial Chamber also found that the highly organised character of the process of conscripting and using child soldiers was such as to demand a substantial degree of prior planning by the RUF leadership.[2419]As these findings make clear, the Trial Chamber did not solely rely on Kallon's command role to find that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2420]

7953. para. 926: Kallon fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have inferred from these findings and the evidence as a whole that he planned the use of child soldiers.[2421] This submission is rejected.

C. AFRC

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-PT, Indictment, 13 May 2004

(a) Individual Criminal Responsibility

7954. Paragraphs 1 through 20 are incorporated by reference.[383]

(i) The Accused

7956. ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was a member of the group which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA, Chairman and leader of the AFRC, appointed ALEX TAMBA BRIMA a Public Liaison Officer (PLO) within the AFRC. In addition, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was a member of the Junta governing body.[385]

7957. Between mid February 1998 and about 30 April 1998, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was in direct command of AFRC/RUF forces in the Kono District. In addition, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA was in direct command of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Bombali District between about May 1998 and 31 July 1998. As of about 22 December 1998, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA was in command of AFRC/RUF forces which attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999.[386]

7959. BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a member of the group which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA, Chairman and leader of the AFRC, appointed BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA a Public Liaison Officer (PLO) within the AFRC. In addition, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a member of the Junta governing body.[388]

7960. Between about mid-February 1998 and 30 April 1998, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces based in Kono District. In addition, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north, eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts between about mid February 1998 and 31 December 1998. BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999.[389]

7961. At all times relevant to this Indictment, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a senior member of the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces.[390]

[385] AFRC Indictment, para. 23.

[388] AFRC Indictment, para. 26.

7962. SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a member of the group of 17 soldiers which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. In addition, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a member of the Junta governing body, the AFRC Supreme Council.[391]

7963. Between mid February 1998 and 30 April 1998, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a senior commander of AFRC/RUF forces in Kono District. In addition, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north, eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts between about mid February 1998 and 31 December 1998. SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, along with ALEX TAMBA BRIMA and BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA, was also one of three commanders of AFRC/RUF forces during the attack on Freetown on 6 January 1999.[392]

7965. At all times relevant to this Indictment, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, through their association with the RUF, acted in concert with CHARLES GHANKAY TAYLOR aka CHARLES MACARTHUR DAPKPANA TAYLOR.[394]

7966. The AFRC, including ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, and the RUF, including ISSA HASSAN SESA Y, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, shared a common plan, purpose or design joint criminal enterprise) which was to take any actions necessary to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas. The natural resources of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamonds, were to be provided to persons outside Sierra Leone in return for assistance in carrying out the joint criminal enterprise.[395]

7968. ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, by their acts or omissions, are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6.1. of the Statute for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute as alleged in this Indictment, which crimes each of them planned, instigated, ordered, committed or in whose planning, preparation or execution each Accused otherwise aided and abetted, or which crimes were within a joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated.[397]

2. Trial Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-T, Judgement, 20 June 2007

(a) Findings and Conclusions:

(i) Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1

7971. para. 759: The Indictment cumulatively charges each of the Accused for the crimes in counts 1 through 14 under different modes of liability. These are:

> 1. Individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute in that > a. each of the Accused planned, instigated, ordered, or committed the said crimes, or
>
>
> b. each Accused otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation, or execution of the said crimes, or
> c. the said crimes were within a joint criminal enterprise, or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise, in which each Accused participated;
> 2. In addition, or in the alternative, individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed by their subordinates whilst each of the Accused was holding a position of authority. [1465]

(ii) Individual Criminal Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute

7972. para. 760: Article 6(1) of the Statute lists the forms of criminal conduct which, provided that all other necessary conditions are satisfied, may result in an accused incurring individual criminal responsibility for one or more of the crimes provided for in the Statute. 1466 Article 6(1) of the Statute provides:

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime.

7973. para. 761: The principle that an individual may be held criminally responsible under one of these modes of responsibility is enshrined in customary international law. [1467] The Trial Chamber in the ICTY case of Kordic[1468] made the following observations on the object of the ICTY equivalent to Article 6(1) (that is, Article 7(1) of the International Statute):

> The principle that an individual may be held criminally responsible for planning, assisting, participating or aiding and abetting in the commission of a crime is firmly based in customary international law. Article 7(1) reflects the principle of criminal law that criminal liability does not attach solely to individuals who physically commit a crime but may also extend to those who participate in and contribute to a crime in various ways, when such participation is sufficiently connected to the crime, following principles of accomplice liability. The various forms of liability listed in Article 7(1) may be divided between principal perpetrators and accomplices. Article7(1) may thus be regarded as intending to ensure that all those who either engage directly in the perpetration of a crime under the Statute, or otherwise contribute to its perpetration, are held accountable.

a. Committing

7974. para. 762: The actus reus of 'committing' primarily covers "the physical perpetration of a crime by the offender himself."[1469] An accused will be held responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for having committed a crime charged enumerated in the Statute when he "participated, physically or otherwise directly, in the material elements" of the said crime. [1470] Committing also covers situations where the accused engenders "a culpable omission in violation of a rule of criminal law." [1471] There can be several perpetrators in relation to the same crime where the conduct of each one of them fulfils the requisite elements of the definition of the substantive offence. [1472]

7975. para. 763: In addition, an accused must either possess the relevant mens rea for the crime in question, or be aware that the act or omission will more likely than not result in the commission of a crime in the Statute and accept this risk. [1473]

7976. para. 764: In light of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber rejects the argument of the Brima and Kamara Defence that in the absence of physical perpetration of a crime by an accused, any submission that the accused should be held culpable for 'committing' a crime ought to be dismissed, or at least weakened. [1474]

b. Planning

7977. para. 765: "Planning" implies that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases. [1475] Proof of the existence of a plan may be provided by circumstantial evidence. [1476] Responsibility is incurred when the level of the accused's participation is substantial, even when the crime is actually committed by another person. [1477]

7978. para. 766: The actus reus requires that the accused, alone or together with others, designated the criminal conduct constituting the crimes charged. It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct. [1478] The mens rea requires that the accused acted with direct intent in relation to his or her own planning or with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed a in the execution of that plan. Planning with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime. [1479]

7979. para. 767: Where an accused is found guilty of having committed a crime, he or she cannot at the same time be convicted of having planned the same crime,[1480] even though his or her involvement in the planning may be considered an aggravating factor. [1481]

7980. para. 768: Both the Brima and the Kamara Defence, relying on the Braanin Trial Judgement, contend that responsibility for planning a crime only arises when an accused is "substantially involved at the preparatory stage of the crime in the concrete form it took, which implies that he possessed sufficient knowledge thereof in advance."[1482] The Trial Chamber does not agree with such a narrow construction of the responsibility for planning, although it cannot be denied that there must be a sufficient link between the planning of a crime both at the preparatory and the execution phases. In the opinion of the Trial Chamber, it is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct. [1483]

c. Instigating

7981. para. 769: "Instigating" means prompting another to commit an offence. [1484] This requires more than merely facilitating the commission of the principal offence, which may suffice for aiding and abetting. It requires some kind of "influencing the principal perpetrator by way of inciting, soliciting or otherwise inducing him or her to commit the crime".[1485] Both acts and omissions may constitute instigating, which covers express as well as implied conduct. [1486] A nexus between the instigation and the perpetration must be proved, but it is not necessary to demonstrate that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the involvement of the accused. [1487]

7982. para. 770: The actus reus requires that the accused prompted another person to commit the offence [l488] and that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of the other person(s) committing the crime. [1489] The mens rea requires that the accused acted with direct intent or with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed in the execution of that instigation. [1490]

7983. para. 771: If a principal perpetrator has definitely decided to commit the crime, further encouragement or moral support may still qualify as aiding and abetting. [1491]

d. Ordering

7985. para. 773: The mens rea for ordering requires that the accused acted with direct intent in relation to his own ordering or with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order. [1497] The state of mind of an accused may also be inferred from the circumstances, provided that it is the only reasonably inference to be drawn. [1498]

7986. para. 774: The Trial Chamber agrees with the Prosecution that an accused may be responsible for "reissuing illegal orders", i. e., for receiving a criminal order from a superior and, in turn, instructing subordinates to act upon it. [1499]

e. Aiding and abetting

7987. para. 775: The actus reus of 'aiding and abetting' requires that the accused gave practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of a crime. [1500] "Aiding and abetting" may be constituted by contribution to the planning, preparation or execution of a finally completed crime. [1501] Such contribution may be provided directly or through an intermediary [l502] and irrespective of whether the participant was present or removed both in time and place from the actual commission of the crime. [1503] Mere presence at the scene of crime without preventing its occurrence does not per se constitute aiding and abetting. [1504]. However, the presence at a crime scene of a person who is in a position of authority may be regarded as an important indication for encouragement or support. [1505]

7988. para. 776: The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial, likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator.

However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed. [1506]

7989. para. 777: The Prosecution contends that a "persistent failure to prevent or punish crimes by subordinates over time may also constitute aiding or abetting."[1507] The Trial Chamber agrees that, while such failure entails a superior's responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute, it may also be a basis for his liability for aiding and abetting, subject to the mens rea and actus reus requirements being fulfilled. [1508]

f. Participation in a Joint Criminal Enterprise

7990. para. 778: The Trial Chamber has already found that the pleading of common purpose in the Indictment was defective and that joint criminal enterprise as a mode of liability cannot be relied upon by the Prosecution.

(iii) Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

7991. para. 1641: In its factual findings, the Trial Chamber found that in Bo District in June 1997 AFRC/RUF forces unlawfully killed an unknown number of civilians, as charged under Counts 3 through 5, [2847] and terrorised civilians and subjected them to collective punishment, as charged under Count 1 and 2. [2848]

7992. para. 1642: The Trial Chamber also found that in Kenema District between 25 May 1997 - 14 February 1998, AFRC/RUF forces committed a number of crimes including unlawfully killing a number of civilians, as charged under Counts 4 and 5;[2849] inflicting physical violence on an unknown number of civilians as charged under Count 10;[2850] illegally recruiting and using children under the age of 15 years for military purposes, as charged under Count 12;[2851] abducting an unknown number of civilians and using them as forced labour at Cyborg Pit in Tongo Field, as charged under Count 13; [2852] and terrorising civilians and subjecting them to collective punishment, as charged under Count 1 and 2. [2853]

7993. para. 1643: The Trial Chamber further found that in Kailahun District during the Junta period, RUF troops abducted civilians and used them as forced labour, as charged under Count 13.[2854].

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts[400]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

7994. para. 1644: In its Final Trial Brief the Prosecution makes no submissions with regard to the individual criminal responsibility of the Accused Brima pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute. The Prosecution only alleges that "For all crimes committed in Kailahun District during the Indictment period, the three Accused are individually criminally responsible under the theory of joint criminal enterprise, in that the crimes were in the contemplation of the common enterprise or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of its implementation".[2855] The Prosecution further submits that the Accused Brima held a significant position in the AFRC government and that he attended meetings at which crimes were discussed. The Prosecution submits that this is evidence of planning, instigating and aiding and abetting.[2856] The Prosecution makes no submissions as to whether or not the Accused Brima ordered or committed the alleged crimes.

7995. para. 1645: In its Final Trial Brief, the Brima Defence submits that no reliable evidence of instigation, ordering, committing, or aiding or abetting has been adduced by the Prosecution against the Accused Brima in relation to the Districts of Bo, Kenema and Kailahun during the relevant Indictment period.[2857] The Brima Defence further submits that the Prosecution led no evidence of any attack on Bo by the AFRC in general or the Accused Brima in particular;[2858] nor evidence to prove that the Accused Brima had superior control over the perpetrators of the alleged crimes in those districts. The Brima Defence instead relies on Brima's alibi defence for those districts. [2859] The Brima Defence submits that throughout the Indictment period Kailahun District was under the control of the RUF.[2860] In addition, it argues that the Accused was detained by the RUF in Kailahun District during the relevant period and was not in a position of superior commander over the perpetrators of the alleged crimes in Kailahun.[2861]

ii. Committing - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

7996. para. 1646: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima committed any of the crimes that occurred in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts during the [400] Note Kailahun District is treated in common with Bo and Kenema but is also dealt with under a separate heading relevant Indictment period. The Trial Chamber therefore finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima in respect of the crimes committed in those districts during the relevant Indictment period.

iii. Ordering - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts 7997. para. 1647: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of any of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts during the relevant Indictment period. The Trial Chamber therefore finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima in respect of the crimes committed in those districts during the relevant Indictment period.

iv. Planning - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

7998. para. 1648: The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the Accused Brima participated in high-level coordination meetings of the AFRC government during the Junta period but that no evidence was adduced that the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts were planned at these meetings.[2862] The Trial Chamber is therefore not satisfied that the Accused Brima made a substantial contribution to the planning of these crimes and finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima in respect of the crimes committed in those districts during the relevant Indictment period.

v. Instigating - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

7999. para. 1649: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima prompted or influenced the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kai1ahun Districts during the relevant Indictment period. The Trial Chamber therefore finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal

vi. Otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8000. para. 1650: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kai1ahun Districts during the relevant Indictment period. The Trial Chamber therefore finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima in respect of the crimes committed in those districts during the relevant Indictment period.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8001. para. 1842: In its factual findings, the Trial Chamber has found that an unknown number of civilians were unlawfully killed by AFRC/RUF forces in Bo District in June 1997, as charged under Counts 3 through 5. Civilians were also terrorised and subjected to collective punishment, as charged under Count 1 and 2. [3147]

8002. para. 1843: The Trial Chamber has also found that AFRC/RUF forces committed a number of crimes in Kenema District in this period. Civilians were unlawfully killed, as charged under Counts 4 and 5,[3148] and physical violence was inflicted on an unknown number of civilians as charged under Count 10.[3149] Children were illegally recruited and used for military purposes, as charged under Count 12.[3150] An unknown number of civilians were abducted and used as forced labour at Cyborg Pit in Tongo Field, as charged under Count 13.[3151] Finally, civilians were terrorised and subjected to collective punishment, as charged under Count 1 and 2.

8003. para. 1844: The Trial Chamber has further found that RUF troops abducted civilians and used them as forced labour in Kailahun District during the AFRC Government period, as charged under Count 13.[3152] Finally, civilians were terrorised and subjected to collective punishment, as charged under Count 1 and 2.

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8004. para. 1845: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution argues that given his position in the government, the Accused Kamara must have been aware of AFRC government policies which included the use of forced labour in Bo and Kenema Districts. [3153] The Prosecution concludes that Kamara is therefore liable for planning, instigating or otherwise aiding and abetting the crime of enslavement in Kenema and Bo, as well as killings and other crimes committed during the AFRC Government period.[3154]

8005. para. 1846: In its Final Brief, the Kamara Defence submits that the Prosecution failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted the planning, preparation or execution of the crimes committed in Bo and Kenema Districts.[3155]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8006. para. 1847: The Prosecution adduced no evidence that the Accused Kamara committed, ordered, instigated, planned or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes that occurred in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts. The Prosecution has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is criminally responsible for crimes committed in the Kono District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any mode: of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8007. para. 1982: In its factual findings, the Trial Chamber found that an unknown number of civilians were unlawfully killed by AFRC/RUF forces in Bo District in June 1997, as charged under Counts 3 through 5. Civilians were also terrorised and subjected to collective punishment, as charged under Counts 1 and 2.[3310]

8008. para. 1983: The Trial Chamber also found that AFRC/RUF forces committed a number of crimes in Kenema District in this period. Civilians were unlawfully killed, as charged under Counts 4 and 5,[3311] and physical violence was inflicted on an unknown number of civilians as charged under Count 10.[3312] Children were illegally recruited and used for military purposes, as charged under Count 12.[3313] An unknown number of civilians were abducted and used as forced labour at Cyborg Pit in Tongo Field, as charged under Count 13.[3314] Finally, civilians were terrorised and subjected to collective punishment, as charged under Counts 1 and 2.

8009. para. 1984: The Trial Chamber further found that RUF troops abducted civilians and used them as forced labour in Kailahun District during the Junta period, as charged under Count 13.[3315]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8010. para. 1985: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution argues that given his position in the Government, the Accused Kanu was aware of the AFRC Government policies which included the use of forced labour in Bo and Kenema Districts.[3316] It submits that the Accused Kanu is therefore liable for planning, instigating or otherwise aiding and abetting the crime of enslavement in Kenema and Kono, as well as killings and other crimes committed during the AFRC government period. [3317]

8011. para. 1986: In its Final Brief, the Kanu Defence submits that the perpetrators of the crimes in Bo and Kenema Districts were soldiers who were present in the District before the AFRC coup and who were under the command of their local commanders during the Indictment period. [3318] The Defence submits that the SLA brigades based in Bo and Kenema Districts operated independently from the AFRC Government seated in Freetown.[3319]

ii. Committing and Ordering - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8012. para. 1987: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu committed or ordered any of the crimes that occurred in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has not proved either of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes that occurred in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

iii. Planning - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8013. para. 1988: The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the Accused Kanu participated in high-level coordination meetings of the AFRC government, but that no evidence was adduced that the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts were planned at these meetings.[3320]

8014. para. 1989: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu made a substantial contribution to the planning of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

iv. Instigating - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8015. para. 1990: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu prompted or influenced the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

v. Otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8016. para. 1991: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of crimes in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

(iv) Kono District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8017. para. 1665: The Trial Chamber found that in the period mid-February to June 1998, AFRC/RUF troops in Kono District unlawfully killed civilians,[2882] committed sexual slavery and physical violence against civilian population;[2883] abducted civilians and used them as forced labour,[2884] and illegally recruited and used children under the age of 15 years for military purposes, as charged under the Indictment.[2885] The Trial Chamber also found that AFRC/RUF troops engaged in widespread looting; [2886] and committed various crimes against the civilian population as collective punishments.[2887]

i. JCE - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8018. para. 1666: The Prosecution in its Final Trial Brief, submits that all three Accused are liable for crimes committed in Kono District under its theory of JCE. The Prosecution then submits that only Kamara bears liability under articles 6(1) and (3) of the Statute.[2888] In its closing arguments the Prosecution asserts that for Kono, during the crimes committed in the Indictment period after the intervention, it is the case of the Prosecution that only Kamara was present when the crimes were committed. Brima and Kanu however can still be held liable for those crimes under the theory of a JCE.[2889]

8020. para. 1668: The Trial Chamber has already held above that it will not consider any responsibility under joint criminal enterprise. The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes that occurred in Kono District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima for the crimes committed in the Koinadugu District.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8021. para. 1856: The Trial Chamber has found that in the period February through June 1998, AFRC/RUF troops in Kono District unlawfully killed civilians, as charged under Counts 3 through 5,[3163] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6

through 9 and 10 respectively.[3164] AFRC/RUF troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour, as charged under Count 13,[3165] and used illegally recruited children for military purposes, as charged under Count 12[3166] Finally, AFRC/RUF troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2. [3167]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8022. para. 1857: In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution contends that the Accused Kamara was the second in command to Denis Mingo (RUF) in Kono District and as such was involved in planning and designing the operations and crimes committed in Kono District. [3168] The Prosecution then submits that only Kamara bears liability under articles 6(1) and (3) of the Statute.[3169] Furthermore, the Prosecution submits in its closing arguments that:

> for Kono, during the crimes committed in the Indictment period after the intervention, it is the case of the Prosecution that only Kamara was present when the crimes were committed. Brima and Kanu however can still be held liable for those crimes under the theory of a JCE.[3170] The Prosecution adds given the position of the Accused, his role in planning, and the reports he received, the Accused intended that the crimes would occur, or was aware of the substantial likelihood of the occurrence of all the crimes. It concludes that he is therefore liable for planning and instigating the crimes charged, or in the alternative that he actively encouraged the commission of such acts. [3171]

8023. para. 1858: Finally, the Prosecution alleges that the Accused Kamara gave direct orders to burn houses, and argues that given his position it may be inferred that he gave orders for all the crimes charged in Kono District. [3172]

8024. para. 1859: In its Final Trial Brief, the Kamara Defence submits that the RUF was in complete control of Kono District, and that the Prosecution failed to prove that the Accused Kamara planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted the planning, preparation or execution of the crimes committed in Kono District. It further argues that numerous witnesses who testified regarding crimes committed in Kono did not mention Kamara.[3173]

ii. Findings – Responsibility of Accusd Kamara under Article 6.1- Kono District

8025. para. 1860: The Trial Chamber has found that in the period February through June 1998, AFRC/RUF troops in Kono District unlawfully killed civilians, as charged under Counts 3

through 5, [3174] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6 through 9 and 10 respective1y.[3175] AFRC/RUF troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour, as charged under Count 13,[3176] and used illegally recruited children for military purposes, as charged under Count 12.[3177] Finally, AFRC/RUF troops engaged in looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2. [3178]

8026. para. 1861: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kamara committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Kono District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Kono District.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8027. para. 1997: The Trial Chamber found that in the period February through June 1998, AFRC/RUF troops in Kono District unlawfully killed civilians, as charged under Counts 3 through 5,[3327] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3328] AFRC/RUF troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour, as charged under Count l3,[3329] and used illegally recruited children for military purposes, as charged under Count 12.[3330] Finally, AFRC/RUF troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2.[3331]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8028. para. 1998: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution asserts that the "three Accused are individually criminally responsible under the theory of joint criminal enterprise" and does not refer to other modes of liability. [3332] The Prosecution then submits that only Kamara bears liability under Articles 6(1) and (3) of the Statute. [3333] Furthermore, the Prosecution submits in its Closing Arguments that for Kono, during the crimes committed in the Indictment period after the intervention, it is the case of the Prosecution that only Kamara was present when the crimes were committed. Brima and Kanu however can still be held liable for those crimes under the theory of a JCE. [3334]

8029. para. 1999: In its Final Brief, the Kanu Defence submits that the Prosecution failed to provide evidence that the Accused Kanu was present in Kono District for "more than a few days" and that it failed to show that Kanu had any authority during the Indictment period.[3335]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Kono District

8030. para. 2000: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu committed, ordered, planned, instigated or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in Kono District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes 0f individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Kono District.

(v) Kailahun District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Kailahun District

8031. para. 1674: The Trial Chamber found in relation to Kailahun District that an unknown number of civilians were unlawfully killed by RUF forces in or around February 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5[2905], and that RUF troops or troops not established beyond a reasonable doubt to be members of the AFRC abducted civilians and used them as forced labour in the period following 14 February 1998.[2906]

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Brima under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District

8032. para. 1675: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution makes no submissions with regard to the individual criminal responsibility of the Accused Brima pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute. The Prosecution only alleges that "For all crimes committed in Kailahun District during the Indictment period, the three Accused are individually criminally responsible under the theory of joint criminal enterprise, in that the crimes were in the contemplation of the common enterprise or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of its implementation." [2907]

8033. para. 1676: The Brima Defence submits that throughout the Indictment period Kailahun District was under the control of the RUF[2908] In addition, it argues that the Accused was detained by the RUF in Kailahun District during the relevant period and was not in a position of superior commander over the perpetrators of the alleged crimes in Kailahun.[2909]

8034. para. 1677: The Trial Chamber found tha the Prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that AFRC/RUF troops unlawfully killed a number of civilians in Kailahun District between February and June 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5.[2910] The issue for determination here is whether the Accused Brima bears individual criminal responsibility for those crimes pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Brima under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District

8035. para. 1678: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes that occurred in Kailahun District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima for the crimes committed in the Kailahun District.

iii. Otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibility of Brima under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District 8036. para. 1679: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of crimes in Kailahun District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Kailahun District.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Kailahun District

8037. para. 1894: The Trial Chamber has found that an unknown number of civilians were unlawfully killed by RUF forces in or around February 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5[3225] and that RUF troops or troops not established beyond a reasonable doubt to be members of the AFRC abducted civilians and used them as forced labour in Kailahun District in the period following 14 February 1998.[3226]

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District

8039. para. 1896: The Kamara Defence, in its Final Brief, argues that Kailahun District was an RUF stronghold and that the Accused Kamara had no role there. [3228]

ii. Findings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District

8040. para. 1897: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kamara committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Kailahun District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Kailahun District.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Kailahun District

8041. para. 2006: The Trial Chamber found that an unknown number of civilians were unlawfully killed by RUF forces in or around February 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5,[3340] and that RUF troops or troops not established beyond a reasonable doubt to be members of the AFRC abducted civilians and used them as forced labour in Kailahun District in the period following 14 February 1998.[3341]

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Kailahun District

8042. para. 2007: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution alleges that the Accused Kanu was liable for crimes committed in Kailahun as a principal in a joint criminal enterprise and does not refer to any other form of liability. [3342]

8043. para. 2008: The Kanu Defence submits that Kailahun District was under the exclusive control of the RUF and that the Accused Kanu was never present there. [3343]

ii. Findings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1- Kailahun District

8044. para. 2009: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Kailahun District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in the Kailahun District.

(vi) Koinadugu District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 - Koinadugu District

8045. para. 1686: Trial Chamber found that AFRC/RUF forces unlawfully killed or inflicted sexual or physical violence on an unknown number of civilians in Koinadugu District in the period February through September 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5, 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[2915] In addition, the Trial Chamber found that AFRC/RUF forces abducted an unknown number of civilians and used them as forced labour in that District, as charged under Count 13.[2916] In addition, the Trial Chamber found that AFRC/RUF forces illegally recruited children under the age of 15 years and used them for military purposes in that District, as charged under Count 12.[2917] Finally, the Trial Chamber found that AFRC/RUF forces also engaged in widespread looting of civilian homes, as charged in Count 14.[2918]

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District

8046. para. 1687: In its Final Brief the Prosecution submits that the three Accused are liable for planning and instigating or otherwise aiding and abetting the crimes committed in Koinadugu District. [2919] It argues that the crimes committed in Koinadugu followed a consistent pattern. This pattern involved repeated attacks by SLA/RUF forces against civilians for either supporting ECOMOG or failing to support the AFRC/RUF.[2920]

8047. para. 1688: The Prosecution emphasises in particular the evidence regarding the attack on Yiffin. [2921] On this submission, the Trial Chamber notes the Prosecution did not plead the location of Yifin/Yiffin under Counts 3 through 6, 8 through 11 or 14 of the Indictment, and thus no findings have been made on evidence adduced in this regard. The Trial Chamber notes further that the Prosecution did not adduce any with respect to YifinlYiffin under Counts 7, 12 or 13.

ii. Committing – Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District

8049. para. 1690: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima personally committed any of the crimes found to have been perpetrated in Koinadugu District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

iii. Ordering/Instigating - Order at Mansofinia to terrorise the civilian population - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District

8050. para. 1691: Witness TF1-334 testified that at Mansofinia, Brima gave a strict warning to the civilians that as they headed into Bombali District, any civilian who tried to run away was a betrayer and will be shot on sight. He warned the troops in his own words "minus you, plus you [...] ." The witness further testified that Brima ordered the troops as they moved northwards to capture strong civilians to add to the strength of the troops.[2925]

8052. para. 1693: Prosecution witness TF1-033 also gave evidence of an order in similar terms; however he stated that this occurred at Y arya. [2927] The Trial Chamber has found that the Witness was mistaken in his recollection of the location and was in fact referring to the same speech described by Witness TFl-334. Witness TF1-033 stated that he heard Alex Tamba Brima claim that civilians had been involved in attacking the AFRC, AFRC families and AFRC sympathisers when the AFRC was ousted from Freetown and that therefore, the AFRC should now do the same to the civilians. Brima declared "Operation Spare No Soul" and instructed his troops to kill, maim or amputate any civilian with whom they came into contact. Towns and villages were to be burned and women and girls were "free to satisfy the soldier's sexual desires.[2928]

8053. para. 1694: The Defence disputed this evidence as 'unreliable' on the grounds that Defence witnesses as well as other Prosecution witnesses put Brima elsewhere during the month of March 1998. Prosecution witness TF1-033 recalls 'Gullit' stating, "You all know what befell on us when the ECOMOG forces removed us from power in Freetown. Our colleagues, soldiers, sympathisers, relatives, were killed by civilians as well as ECOMOG soldiers. So for that reason, we are going back to Freetown. We are going back to Freetown and we should all return that fell on us [...] So we are not going to spare any civilian, only those we desire to be with us. [...] Young girls and women are free to satisfy your sexual desire. This is Operation Spare No Soul."[2929] On crossexamination the witness stated that these were 'Gullit's exact words [2930] The witness stated that as a result, "the journey of atrocities destined for Freetown started that evening". [2931]

8054. para. 1695: The Trial Chamber finds that the above orders, insofar as they were targeted at civilians, were intended to spread fear among the civilian population. The Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that Accused Brima while at Mansofinia, did order the AFRC/RUF forces subordinate to him to commit acts of terror against the civilian population. However, since the Trial Chamber has found that the crimes arising out of this particular order were not committed in Koinadugu District. Therefore the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima in relation to the crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

iv. Planning and otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District 8055. para. 1696: No evidence was adduced that the Accused Brima planned the commission of crimes or gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes in Koinadugu District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1- Koinadugu District

period February through September 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5, 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3230] In addition, an unknown number of civilians were abducted and used as forced labour, as charged under Count 13.[3231] Children were used for military purposes, as charged under Count 12.[3232] Finally, AFRC/RUF forces also engaged in looting of civilian homes, as charged in Count 14. [3233]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District

8058. para. 1906: In its Final Brief, the Kamara Defence contends that those witnesses who testified that the Accused Kamara was present in Koinadugu District during the Indictment period did not allege that he participated in the offences alleged or that he instructed any other persons to do so.[3235]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Koinadugu District

8059. The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kamara committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Koinadugu District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Koinadugu District.[401]

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Koinadugu District

8060. para. 2015: The Trial Chamber found that AFRC/RUF forces unlawfully killed or inflicted sexual or physical violence on an unknown number of civilians in Koinadugu District in the period February through September 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5, 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3345] In addition, an unknown number of civilians were abducted and used as forced labour, as charged under Count 13.[3346] Children were used for military purposes, as charged under

Count 12.[3347] Finally, AFRC/RUF forces also engaged in looting of civilian homes, as charged in Count 14. [3348]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Koinadugu District

8062. para. 2017: In its Final Brief, the Kanu Defence submits that several AFRC groups moved from Koinadugu District to Bombali District, and that the Accused Kanu was not part of the group that included Prosecution Witness George Johnson.[3350]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Koinadugu District

8063. para. 2018: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes that occurred in Koinadugu District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in the Koinadugu District.

(vii) Bombali District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8064. para. 1700: The Trial Chamber found that AFRC troops in Bombali District engaged in unlawful killings of civilians[2933] and inflicted sexual violence on civilians[2934] , as charged in the Indictment. AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour and illegally recruited and used children for military purposes.[2935] Finally, the Trial Chamber found that AFRC troops engaged in widespread looting, terrorised and committed crimes of collective punishments against the civilian population. [2936]

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8065. para. 1701: The Prosecution conceded that with regards to the Accused Brima, it did not adduce evidence of sexual violence in respect of Mandaha.[2937] In its Final Brief, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Brima committed, planned, ordered, instigated and otherwise aided and abetted attacks on Karina, Bornoya, Mateboi and Mandaha and the crimes associated with those locations outlined in the Indictment.[2938] More specifically, it argues that the Accused Brima ordered the attack on Karina in order to demonstrate the power of his forces. Attacks on the surrounding villages were carefully designed and organised by the Accused who intended the commission of all the crimes pleaded in the Indictment. In addition, the Prosecution submits that the Accused prompted others to participate in the unlawful acts.[2939] The Prosecution further submitted that" [...] the three Accused themselves gave orders for, and actively encouraged, killings physical and sexual violence and the burning of villages amounting to a campaign of terrorism" in Bombali District. [2940] The Prosecution further submitted that the First Accused ordered 'Operation Clear the Area' meaning that all villages surrounding Rosos were to be burnt down and looted, and that these orders were in fact carried out.[2941]

8066. para. 1702: The Brima Defence argues that the Prosecution witnesses who testified regarding crimes committed in Bombali District provided contradictory and self-serving accounts of the events. [2942] The Brima Defence refers to the testimony of its own witnesses that they did not hear the Accused's name mentioned in connection with the events that took place in Bombali.[2943] The Brima Defence therefore submits that Defence witnesses have established reasonable doubt regarding the responsibility of the Accused Brima for instigating or aiding and abetting the crimes committed in

ii. Committing - Murder and Extermination at Karina - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8067. para. 1703: The Trial Chamber considered the evidence presented by the Prosecution witness TFl-334 on the killing of 12 civilians at a mosque in Karina and found that on 8 May 1998, the Accused Brima participated in a mass killing of 12 civilians at a mosque in Karina. The finding was based on the testimony of eye witness TF1-334 who was with the Accused Brima during the attack on the mosque at Karina. Witness TF1-334 stated that he moved with the Accused Brima to the town of Karina where they found a mosque. While the witness was standing with soldiers at the mosque, Brima questioned the Imam for praying for the people and accused him of being a relative of 'Pa Kabbah's family.' When the Imam responded, Brima shot dead the Imam, six men and five women, in front of the witness.[2945]

8068. para. 1704: Witness George Johnson also testified that he met and saw "plenty of dead bodies with gun shot wounds" inside and outside the mosque at Karina town. Although the witness did not see what had happened to the dead bodies, he stated that they were attacked by Alhaji Kamanda a.k.a. "Gun Boot"[2946] without giving further information on the means with which he committed the attack. The evidence of Defence witness DBK-094, a relative to the Imam of the mosque, is corroborated by that of DBK-089. Both witnesses claim that during the attack on the mosque in Karina, the Imam's brother was the one actually leading the prayers and that the Imam himself had left the town three days before the attack and could therefore not have been killed during this attack.

8069. para. 1705: The Trial Chamber notes that there are inconsistencies in the evidence of the identity of the person who led the prayers that day, with Prosecution witnesses stating that it was "the Imam" and the defence witnesses stating that the Imam is still alive. The Chamber is of the view that the exact identity of the individual who led the prayers that day is not paramount but rather the fact that the leader of the prayers was indeed killed. This fact is not in dispute. In that regard, the Trial Chamber finds the evidence of eye witness TFl-334 who was present at the mosque and actually saw the Accused Brima shooting civilians including the leader of the prayers at the mosque in Karina is credible and reliable. The fact that several civilians died as a result of the shooting is corroborated by TF1-167. In the Trial Chamber's view, the Prosecution evidence is not challenged by the evidence of DBK-094 and DBK-089 who only testified about the absence of the Imam during the attack on the mosque. They do not dispute the fact that mass killings of civilians including the person who led the prayers that day, took place at the mosque. However, before the Trial Chamber relies on the Prosecution evidence to determine whether the Accused Brima is individually criminally responsible for the Karina killings, it must take the following factors into account.

8070. para. 1706: The Indictment does not plead the material facts of this specific incident with regard to the Accused Brima.[2947] The Prosecution failed to include these particulars in the Indictment and rendered the Indictment defective.

should make its mark on Karina and that no one should be spared. It also alleges that the Accused Brima participated in the shooting on the attack on Karina.[2948] However, it does not specify the details of the attack on the mosque, that is the means and purpose of the attack or a description of the victims. In addition, the OTP Opening Statement does not specify the Accused Brima participation in the killing of civilians at a mosque in Karina. Instead, the Prosecution indicated that when the people of Karina village were assembled at the mosque at 5:00 o'clock for morning prayers, AFRC/RUF forces led by the three Accused descended on them with guns, machetes and axes. They lined them up and one after the other hacked them to death. [2949]

8072. para. 1708: The Trial Chamber notes that the Prosecution disclosure materials of a Witness Statement of TFl-334 dated 6 November 2003, does not mention the shooting of the Imam by the Accused Brima. However, it specifically states that Witness TFl-334 saw 'Gullit' going to a mosque in Karina and questioned the people as morning prayers were going on. Thereafter, the witness saw 'Gullit' remove his pistol and shoot the civilians dead. [2950] Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds that the above constitutes sufficient notice of the material particulars relating to Brima's participation in the Karina killings and that the defect in the Indictment with regard to this crime was cured by clear, timely and consistent notice to the Defence.

iii. Ordering - Order to terrorise and kill the civilian population at Karina - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8074. para. 1710: Around June 1998, at Kamagbengbe and in the presence of Kamara and Kanu, the Accused Brima gave orders to the AFRC troops to attack Karina. Brima referred to Karina as a strategic location because it was the home town of President Ahmed Tejan Kabbah. The witness stated that Brima ordered the troops to burn down Karina, capture strong male civilians, and amputate civilians. Brima concluded that he wanted the attack on Karina to shock "the whole country" and the international community. The Trial Chamber has found that there were no ECOMOG or Kamajor troops in Karina at the time and that all the victims were civilians.[2951] Witness TFl-157 testified that after the attack on Karina, he heard rebels say that the town had been attacked because it was the home town of President Kabbah.[2952] Witness TF1-033 testified that he heard 'Gullit' order that civilian women should be stripped naked and raped during the attack on Karina, and the neighbouring town of Bornoya.[2953] The Trial Chamber found this evidence detailed, consistent and credible.

8075. para. 1711: The Trial Chamber is therefore satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered his subordinates to perpetrate crimes against the civilian population in Karina and its environs with the specific intent of instilling terror in the civilian population.

iv. Ordering - Order to terrorise the civilian population around Rosos - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8076. para. 1712: Witness TF1-334 testified that during the rainy season in 1998, the AFRC/Junta forces established a base at Rosos and remained there for approximately three months. While at Rosos, the witness heard Brima order the troops to occupy the surrounding villages and ensure that no civilians remained within 15 miles of the village.[2954] Brima ordered that any civilians be executed rather than brought back to the camp, and added that he would take disciplinary action against any soldier who brought a civilian to the camp. Brima named this action "Operation Clear the Area". Witness TF1-334 testified that villages surrounding Rosos were burnt down and looted following this order.[2955] Witness TF1-033 corroborated the evidence of Witness TF1-334 testifying that he heard Brima order his soldiers to kill any civilians in the area of Rosos.[2956] Witness TF1-267 also testified that rebels told her that civilians who did not leave a village near Rosos would be killed. [2957]

8077. para. 1713: The Indictment does not charge unlawful killings at Rosos and therefore will not make any findings on the killings perpetrated following Brima's order. However, the evidence shows that the Accused Brima, in issuing such orders to his subordinates specifically intended to terrorise the civilian population in the areas surrounding Rosos. The Trial Chamber concludes that Brima's generalised instruction created a climate of criminality which endured in the months following the order.

v. Ordering- Order for killings at Mateboi and Gbendembu - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8078. para. 1714: Witness TF1-334 testified that after the Accused Brima banned civilians from the area surrounding 'Camp Rosos' ,[2958] an AFRC commander executed six civilians, four men and two women, with an AK-47 rifle in a village near Mateboi. [2959]

8079. para. 1715: Witness TF1-033 testified that in or around August 1998 at 'Colonel Eddie Town,' the Accused Brima ordered two AFRC commanders named Salifu Mansaray and 'Arthur' to attack Gbendembu because ECOMOG and "loyal" Sierra Leonean Army troops were present there. [2960] When the Operations Commander returned from the operation he reported to Brima that the troops had captured arms and ammunition and that 25 civilians had been killed. Brima commended his men for "a job well done."[2961]

vi. Ordering - Order at Rosos to recruitment children for military purposes - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8082. para. 1718: Witness TFl-l58, a former child soldier, testified that he was abducted by the AFRC forces and spent one week at Rosos. Upon arrival in Rosos, a commander named 'Staff Alhaji' gave the civilians guns and ordered them to search the town for food. [2965] 'Staff A1haji' told witness TF1-158 and the other civilians that this order came from the Accused Brima.[2966] During the week at Rosos, the witness was given military training together with approximately 300 other civilians. [2967]

8083. para. 1719: The Trial Chamber has found to be credible and is therefore satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the abduction of children under the age of 15 years for military purposes.

vii. Planning, Instigating and otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Bombali District 8084. para. 1720: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Brima planned, instigated or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Bomba1i District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima for the crimes committed in the Bomba1i District.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8085. para. 1911: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC troops in Bombali District engaged in unlawful killings of civilians as charged under Counts 3 through 5[3238] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3239] AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour and used children illegally recruited for military purposes, as charged under Counts 13 and 12 respectively.[3240] Finally, AFRC troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2.[3241]

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8086. para. 1912: In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara was present when the order was given to burn down Karina and kill its inhabitants. On this evidence the Prosecution asks the Trial Chamber to infer that Kamara assisted in planning the attack. In addition, the Prosecution contends that Kamara was present in Karina and saw his own security guard carry out unlawful killings. The Prosecution further argues that given that he was present when the order was given to make Camp Rosos a civilian "no go" area, the systematic nature of crimes committed, and his position within the renegade-SLA hierarchy, the Trial Chamber may be able to infer that the Accused promoted or encouraged the commission of crimes, and that he intended the commission of such crimes or was aware of the substantial likelihood that they would be committed. [3242]

8087. para. 1913: In its Final Brief, the Kamara Defence submits that the command structure during the attacks in Bomba1i District the command structure was not the one described by Prosecution witnesses. [3243] It refers to Prosecution witnesses who testified that the Accused Kamara was detained during a part of the relevant time period.[3244] It further contends that most of the witnesses who testified that the Accused Kamara was present in Bombali District during the Indictment period did not allege that he participated in the offences alleged or that he instructed any other persons to do so. Finally, it argues that those witnesses who did allege such participation – in particular TFl-334 and George Johnson - failed to corroborate each others' testimonies.[3245]

ii. Committing - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8088. para. 1914: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Bombali District.

iii. Ordering - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8089. para. 1915: The Trial Chamber finds that the Accused Kamara ordered the unlawful killing of five young girls in Karina. Kamara ordered that the girls be locked in a house and that the house then be set on fire. This order was obeyed by AFRC troops.[3246]

8090. para. 1916: The Trial Chamber finds that as the deputy commander in Bomba1i District the Accused Kamara had sufficient authority over the troops to instruct the commission of the crimes. On all the evidence adduced, the Trial Chamber finds that the Accused Kamara was aware of the substantial likelihood that the burning to death of the five young girls in Karina would be carried out.

iv. Planning - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8091. para. 1917: The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the Accused Brima ordered the attack on Karina in an address to the troops at Kamagbengbe.[3247] In the course of this address, the Accused Brima stated that he wanted to divide the troop and make attacks on both Karina and Kamabai, but that the other commanders suggested to him that keeping the troop together would result in less casualties. The Accused Brima agreed to this.[3248] The Trial Chamber notes that this incident was a strategic discussion between commanders which could constitute planning of the attack on Karina and the crimes committed therein. However, witness TFl-334 does not name the commanders involved in this discussion. The Trial Chamber is not prepared to infer merely by virtue of the Accused Kamara's position as deputy commander that he was one of them.

8092. para. 1918: No evidence was adduced that the Accused Kamara made a substantial contribution to the planning of any crimes under Counts 3 through 6, 10 through 11 and 14 in Bombali District.

v. Instigating and otherwise Aiding and Abetting - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8094. para. 1920: No evidence was adduced that the Accused Kamara prompted or influenced or gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Bombali District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Bombali District.

c. Responsibility of Accued Kanu under Article 6.1– Bombali District

8095. para. 2025: The Trial Chamber found that AFRC troops in Bombali District engaged in unlawful killings of civilians as charged under Counts 3 through 5[3355] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6 to 9 and 10 and 11 respectively.[3356] AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour and used children illegally recruited for military purposes, as charged under Counts 13 and 12 respectively.[3357] Finally,

AFRC troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2.[3358]

i. Pleadings – Respsonsiblity of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8096. para. 2026: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution contends that the Accused Kanu was present when the order was given to burn Karina and kill its inhabitants and that he assisted in the planning phase. The Prosecution submits that Kanu also helped to lead the attack on Bomoya where numerous civilians were killed. The Prosecution further argues that it is inferable from the position of the Accused Kanu, coupled with the systematic nature of the crimes committed in Bombali District, that he prompted or encouraged these acts. Additionally, he either intended such acts or was aware of the substantial likelihood that such crimes would be committed. Finally, the Prosecution asserts that at Camp Rosos, the Accused Kanu was in charge of training child soldiers and was in total control of the women at the camp.

8097. para. 2027: In its Final Brief, the Kanu Defence submits that several AFRC groups moved from Koinadugu District to Bombali District, and that the Accused Kanu was not part of the group that included Prosecution Witness George Johnson. The Kanu Defence further contends that the Prosecution has led no evidence regarding the involvement of the Accused Kanu in the illegal recruitment of child soldiers and that the evidence regarding his involvement in training these children for military purposes is vague.

ii. Committing/Ordering – Respsonsiblity of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8098. para. 2028: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu committed or ordered any of the crimes that occurred in Bombali District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved either of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in the Bombali District.

iii. Planning - – Respsonsiblity of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8099. para. 2029: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu planned any crimes under Counts 3 to 6, 10 to 11 and 14 in Bombali District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed under those counts. The Accused Kanu's criminal responsibility for Counts 9, 12 and 13, which are crimes of a continuing nature spanning various districts, will be discussed below.[3364]

iv. Instigating – Respsonsiblity of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Bombali District

8100. para. 2030: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu prompted or influenced the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Bombali District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in the Bombali District.

v. Otherwise aiding and abetting – Respsonsiblity of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Bombali District 8101. para. 2031: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu gave practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of crimes in Bombali District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Bombali District.

(viii) Freetown and Western Area

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1- Freetown and Western Area

8102. para. 1745: The Trial Chamber found in relation to Freetown and the Western Area that AFRC troops committed unlawful killings of civilians [3000] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians; that AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour; [3003] that AFRC troops illegally recruited and used children under the age of 15 years for military purposes in the attack on Freetown;[3004] and that AFRC troops engaged in looting,[3005] and committed collective punishments and acts of terror against the civilian population,[3006] as charged in the Indictment.

i. Pleadings – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8103. para. 1746: In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution asserts that the Accused Brima together with the Accused Kamara and Kanu planned and led the invasion of Freetown, and that the attack on Freetown was designed and organised by Brima. The Prosecution further asks the Trial Chamber to infer that the Accused, based on his position and participation in the commission of crimes in Freetown, intended the commission of the crimes pleaded in the Indictment in Freetown 1999, or was aware of the substantial likelihood that the crimes would occur.[3007] Alternatively, it submits that the Accused Brima is liable for aiding and abetting all of the crimes charged through his presence on the ground, his position of authority and his active support for operations.

8104. para. 1747: The Prosecution further contends that Freetown was attacked pursuant to the orders of the Accused Brima, and that given his position of authority, it may reasonably be inferred that Brima ordered the commission of all the crimes in Freetown. It adds that the Accused gave specific orders to burn down Police stations and all of Calaba town; issued a general order to execute "collaborators", and ordered specific unlawful killings, and that he also ordered amputations, abductions and looting.

8105. para. 1748: In addition, the Prosecution submits, the Accused Brima committed numerous killings, amputations and burnings and that he further committed, instigated or aided and abetting acts of sexual violence.

8106. para. 1749: The Brima Defence contends that the evidence adduced by the Prosecution is insufficient to support any theory that the Accused was liable by his acts or omissions for the crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area in 1999. The Brima Defence argues in Brima never came to Freetown during the January 1999 invasion nor was he part of the attack there, a fact supported by various Defence witnesses.

ii. Committing - Killings of three persons at State House – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8107. para. 1750: Prosecution evidence that during the 6 January 1999 invasion of Freetown by the AFRC forces, the Accused Brima personally shot and killed three men whom he believed to be Nigerians at State House, went unchallenged.[3014] Witness TF1-184, who was an AFRC commander at the time, stated that whilst inside the State House, he saw junior soldiers bring four civilians including one woman to State House from the Paramount Hotel. The Accused Kanu took the woman and the three civilians who were accused of being "Nigerians." The witness then saw the Accused Brima shoot and kill them. [3015] The testimony of Witness TF1-184 was corroborated by that of Witness TF1-334. In support of Brima's alibi defence, Defence witness DBK-126 stated that she would take food to the Accused Kamara at the State House but that she did not see the Accused Brima while there. [3016]

8110. para. 1753: Material facts were not provided in the Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief nor its Opening Statement. The only document referring to the incident is a pre-trial statement of Prosecution Witness TF1-184 stating that:

> On the 7 January 1999, a Nigerian Civilian was captured by our soldiers. This man told us that his friends were staying at the Paramount Hotel. After that, the three other Nigerians, two men and one woman, were captured and all of them were brought to State House and presented to Gullit. Gullit said that the men should die. Then he took his pistol and shot one Nigerian in the head, one in the chest and the last one in the side. [3018]

8111. para. 1754: The Trial Chamber notes that among its disclosure materials the Prosecution included a document entitled "Additional Information provided by Witness TF1-184 on 20 May 2005 and 17 June 2005." In that document, the witness said that the Accused Brima murdered three civilians at the State House on 7 January 1999. This document might have put the Defence on notice of the particulars of the charge against Brima, as it details the manner in which the three men were captured and killed. The Trial Chamber, however, observes that this information was not disclosed to the Defence until at least two months after the opening of the trial. Thus, the notice provided cannot be described as 'timely' nor can it qualify as 'consistent.' However, the Brima Defence did not object to the leading of evidence of this incident. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the failure to give notice did not materially impair the ability of the Brima Defence to prepare its case.

8112. para. 1755: Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds the Accused Brima criminally responsible for committing the murder of three civilian Nigerian men at the State House as part of a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian population.

iii. Committing - Killing of a soldier's wife at the State House Area - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8113. para. 1756: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima personally killed the wife of one of his soldiers outside State House in Freetown in early January 1999.[3019] Witness TF1-184 stated that he heard the husband of the victim assert that "[t]his Papay [the Accused Brima] had been after my woman for quite sometime."[3020]

8114. para. 1757: Yet again this incident is not pleaded in the Indictment, rendering the Indictment defective. The Trial Chamber must therefore determine whether this defect in the Indictment was cured by clear, timely and consistent notice to the Brima Defence. The Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief and the Prosecution's Opening Statements do not refer to this incident. The only document that does refer to the incident is a prior statement of Prosecution Witness TF1-334, dated 7 November 2003, which described the killing in the following terms:

> [...] I returned to State House. Surprisingly Gullit started firing soldiers who, according to him, were not members of the troop, who were not cooperating. Also, some Nigerian soldiers we have captured, Gullit fired them. Also, in my presence, he killed a certain lady we had brought from the jungle.[3021]

8115. para. 1758: As the date of disclosure was not provided to the Trial Chamber, it is unable to determine the timeliness of the notice to the Defence.

8116. para. 1759: Prosecution Witness TF1-334 did not ultimately give evidence of this incident in his oral testimony, but Prosecution Witness TF1-184 did. The Trial Chamber is unable to determine the passage of time between the initial disclosure of the Prosecution material and the testimony of Witness TFl-184, and is therefore unable to determine the timeliness of the notice. however, the Brima Defence did not object. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the failure to give notice did not materially impair the ability of the Brima Defence to prepare its case.

8117. para. 1760: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Accused Brima is criminally responsible for personally killing a soldier's wife at the State House Area.

iv. Committing - Unlawful killings at Kissy Mental Home/Portee area - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8118. para. 1761: The Trial Chamber heard unchallenged evidence that shortly after the AFRC forces invaded Freetown in early January 1999, on the way from Kissy Mental Home towards the Portee area, the Accused Brima personally shot dead a nun.[3022] Witness TF1-153 stated that he moved together with the AFRC troops to the Portee area by the Cotton Tree where they met nuns and that after 'Gullit' ordered the nuns to walk faster he later took out his pistol and shot dead "a black nun."[3023]

8119. para. 1762: The Trial Chamber finds that once again, the Indictment does not plead the incident on the killing of a black nun by the Accused Brima around the Portee area, the failure of which renders the Indictment defective. The Trial Chamber observes that the Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief and its Opening Statement do not mention the killing of a black nun in the Portee area. However, this defect was cured by the information provided in the pre-trial Statement of witness TF1-153 dated 28 February 2003.

8120. para. 1763: Although the pre-trial statement of witness TF1-153 do not provide specific details on the killing of a black nun by the Accused Brima, the information contained therein put the Defence on adequate notice.[3024] Further information was contained in the pre-trial statement of witness TF1-153 on the conduct of the Accused Brima upon the AFRC troops' retreat from Freetown, and that the witness responded to the question put to him in relation to the killing of the black nun. In addition, the Defence cross examined the witness on this incident. [3025]

8121. para. 1764: Taking these statements together, the Trial Chamber finds that adequate notice was given to the Brima Defence of this incident. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds the Accused Brima individually criminally liable for committing the murder of a nun around the

v. Committing - Unlawful killings in the Wellington area - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8122. para. 1765: Witness TFl-334 testified that in early January 1999, AFRC forces along the Wellington area, including the Accused Brima shot at civilians.[3026] The witness stated that all the three Accused participated in the shooting of civilians and that he saw 'Gullit' shooting with his own gun. The witness did not state whether any persons died as a result of the shooting.

8123. para. 1766: Furthermore, the Indictment does not plead the particulars of the incidents that took place around the Wellington area in which the Accused Brima is alleged to have shot at civilians, and the Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief, OTP Opening Statement and Witness Statements provide no information on this specific incident with regard to the Accused Brima. The Trial Chamber will therefore make no finding on this incident.

vi. Committing - Amputation of a civilian's hand at Old Road area - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8124. para. 1767: The Trial Chamber heard unchallenged evidence that 'Gullit' (the Accused Brima) intentionally amputated the hand of a man at Shell Company by Old Road in Freetown in January 1999.[3027] The Indictment does not plead the material facts regarding this specific incident with regard to the Accused Brima and is therefore defective. The Trial Chamber must therefore determine whether this defect was cured by clear, timely and consistent notice to the Brima Defence.

8125. para. 1768: The Prosecution's Pre-Trial Brief and Opening Statement do not refer to this incident. Annex A of the Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief states that "Alex Tamba Brima ordered amputations of civilians because they had pointed out the rebel positions to ECOMOG" emphasis added.[3028] This information does not put the Defence on notice of the Prosecution's intent to charge the Accused with the personal commission of an amputation. The Trial Chamber notes however, that the pre-trial statement of witness TFl-184 specifically refers to the commission of the act by the Accused Brima:

> In late January 1999, around the Kissy mental hospital, I saw Kabila telling members of the high command including Gullit that the civilians where showing ECOMOG where we were hiding. I then heard Gullit say 'well those hands that > point against us, cut them of. After this I saw several victims' amputations. The commander in charge of cutting hands was Lt Col Changabulanga. The amputations were done on the Old Road, Shell Company. Changabulanga, Gullit and 55 were there. I saw Gullit cutting hands of one man with a cutlass. The boys were doing this too. I saw 6 persons whose hands were cut. [3029]

The Trial Chamber cannot determine whether this information was disclosed to the Defence before the start of trial. Therefore the Trial Chamber considers that the Defence was not give timely and consistent notice of critical material facts.

8126. para. 1769: The Trial Chamber notes however that the Defence cross examined the witness with respect to this incident, [3030] and therefore finds that the failure to provide adequate notice did not materially impair the ability of the Brima Defence to prepare its case. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber Pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, finds the Accused Brima individually criminally liable for committing the amputation of one civilian at Shell Company, Old Road, as part of a wide spread and systematic attack against the civilian population in January 1999.

vii. Ordering/Instigating - Order to kill civilians in Fourah Bay area - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8127. para. 1770: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima ordered his soldiers to kill civilians in the Fourah Bay area in retaliation for the killing of an AFRC soldier. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of these crimes in the awareness that the crimes were likely to be committed.

viii. Ordering/Instigating - Orders to terrorise and collectively punish the civilian population – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area battalion was to create fear among the civilian population. To do this, they amputated civilian's hands.[3031] The trial Chamber also heard that during the retreat, the Accused Brima ordered the hands of all those who were pointing out the AFRC positions to ECOMOG forces to be amputated. As a result, "Mines" came back with full bag of hands and hour and a half later. [3032] From the pattern of the events, the Trial Chamber has no doubt that the hands were amputated from civilians by AFRC forces.

8129. para. 1772: Witness TF1-334 told court that on an unspecified day during the January 1999 invasion of Freetown, AFRC troops occupied the area of Kissy Mental Home in the eastern part of Freetown. In the evening hours and in the presence of senior AFRC commanders, including 'Bazzy' (the Accused Kamara) and 'Five-Five' (the Accused Kanu), 'Gullit' (the Accused Brima) ordered his troops to "clear up" the area by killing civilians as punishment for their support of ECOMOG.[3033] The Accused Brima in presence of the Accused Kamara and Accused Kanu, ordered his troops to attack Kissy Mental hospital and to go to the low-cost area and amputate the arms of civilians, kill civilians and burn property "because the civilians were celebrating the arrival ofECOMOG".[3034]

8130. para. 1773: The orders of the Accused Brima to the perpetrators of the amputations, together with the fact that a battalion was created not for military strategy but specifically to instil fear amongst the civilian population in Freetown clearly indicate an intention to terrorise the civilians. The Trial Chamber also heard the following unchallenged evidence of Witness TF1-084 who stated that during the rebel attack on Freetown in January 1999, civilians were mutilated and killed by ARFC forces because the AFRC believed the people of Freetown supported President Tejan Kabbah.[3035] Witness TF1-334 was present when 'Gullit' announced that it was time to attack Freetown and that the Sierra Leone People's Party government was responsible for denying the success of the rebel troops. He ordered that Freetown should be looted and burnt down, that anyone who opposed the troops should be a considered a collaborator and should be killed. [3036] This testimony is corroborated by Witness TF1-033 who also heard 'Gullit' order the burning of houses and the murder of civilians during the attack on Freetown.[3037] This evidence was unchallenged and is credible.

8131. para. 1774: The Trial Chamber also heard that in early January 1999 during the Freetown invasion, at the State House, the Accused told his fighters to force captured civilians to join the AFRC forces in order to compensate for those fighters killed by ECOMOG. Following the order, civilians who refused to join the AFRC forces were shot in the presence of the Accused Brima, and their dead bodies thrown out of the back of State House.[3038] In addition, witness TF1-334 also testified that Brima ordered the abduction of civilians from Freetown during the attack "so as to attract the attention of the international community".[3039] During the attack civilians were indeed abducted. Another witness testified that when the ARFC entered Freetown, they ordered the civilians to sing while they were burning their houses.[3040] The Trial Chamber found the above Prosecution evidence which was unchallenged, credible.

8132. para. 1775: The Trial Chamber also heard evidence that soon after the troops lost State House the Accused Brima was informed by a soldier that one of the troops had been hacked to death by civilians at the Fourah Bay crossroad.[3041] In response, the Accused Brima called 'Major Mines', one of his subordinates, and instructed him to collect cutlasses at the SLRA [3042] compound. 'Major Mines' returned with cutlasses, some of which he kept for himself while the remainder he distributed to 'Changabulanga' who was the "battalion commander for amputations". The Accused Brima then ordered his men to go to Upgun roundabout where he ordered the fighters saying, "these people we should teach them a lesson." He ordered his men to amputate and kill civilians and burn the area down. The Trial Chamber has found that the order to commit these crimes was carried out. [3043] On the basis of this evidence the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of crimes in full awareness that the crimes were likely to be committed. Witnesses TF1-334 and TF1-I04 testified that the amputations and killings of civilians continued during the AFRC retreat from Freetown. When it became clear that Guinean troops had taken over, 'Gullit' saw that the civilian population was celebrating. In the presence of the Accused Kamara and Kanu, 'Gullit' stated that the people of Freetown were ungrateful and ordered the troops to go as far as they could burning and killing people. Attacks on civilians were then carried out by the troops around the area of the Kissy Mental Hospital, Blackhall Road, the Kissy Police Station up to PWD Junction near Shankardass.[3044] Witness TF1-334 testified that he personally saw six civilians whose arms were amputated by 'Changabulanga'. The arms of the civilians were chopped off at the elbow and 'Osman Sesay' told them to "go to Pa Tejan Kabbah to get new hands".[3045]

ix. Ordering/Instigating - Orders to kill collaborators - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8134. para. 1777: The Trial Chamber also heard evidence that during the January 1999 attack on Freetown, the Police were specifically targeted and punished by the AFRC troops who saw them as "collaborators" of the Kabbah Government. Witness TF1-334 heard Gullit giving orders to the AFRC troops in Freetown, specifying that "Police stations should be targeted and burnt down" and collaborators killed. [3047] Witness TF1-157 who confirmed the fact that the invading AFRC troops searched Freetown for Police officers and killed them and their "their people" (families). The witness also saw the AFRC troops attack the Eastern Police Station.[3048]

x. Ordering/Instigating - Order to loot UN Vehicles and civilian property – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8135. para. 1778: The Trial Chamber heard the unchallenged evidence of Witness TF1-334 that on 6 January 1999, the Accused Brima ordered the Operations Commander to loot vehicles at United Nations headquarters and to bring them back to State House and that the Operations Commander complied with the order.[3049] Another witness Gibril Massaquoi, testified that soon after the January 1999 Freetown Invasion, he saw the Accused Kanu and other commanders driving UN vehicles in Freetown.[3050] The Trial Chamber is satisfied on the basis of this evidence that the Accused Brima's that he ordered the commission of this crime in full awareness that the crime was likely to be committed and that the order was carried out. The Trial Chamber heard evidence that in Allen Town, on the eve of the invasion of Freetown in January 1999, the Accused Brima gathered his troops and instructed them to execute "collaborators" - a term witness TF1-334 explained was used to refer to any person who did not support the AFRC troops. Brima also informed his troops that as he did not have the means to pay them they were free to loot from the civilian population. Brima also instructed the troops to burn down all police stations.[3051]

xi. Ordering/Instigating - Order to kill 14 captive Nigerian ECOMOG soldiers at State House - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8136. para. 1779: The Trial Chamber has found that at State House on an unknown date during the Freetown attack, Brima ordered the execution of 14 to 16 captive and unarmed Nigerian ECOMOG soldiers.[3052] Although the Prosecution witnesses TF1-334 and TF1-033 gave varying accounts of why the Nigerians were killed, they were all consistent regarding the fact that the Accused Brima gave the order for the Nigerians to be killed.[3053] The Trial Chamber found that these ECOMOG soldiers, hors de combat, were subsequently killed.[3054] On the basis of this evidence the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of crimes in full awareness that the crimes were likely to be committed.

xii. Ordering/Instigating - Order to kill eight nuns at Kissy Mental Home – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8137. para. 1780: A number of Prosecution witnesses testified that on an unspecified day in early January 1999, AFRC troops captured two clerics and eight nuns at Kissy Mental Home. After ECOMOG began bombarding the troops there, the two abducted clerics escaped. 'Gullit' ordered his fighters to execute the eight nuns "so as to prevent them escaping and leaking information". Pursuant to this order, Foday Bah Marah a.k.a. 'Bulldoze' executed five nuns. [3055] The witness stated that following the execution of the nuns, the Accused explained to his troops that they were trapped and that it was time "for a complete bulldoze." The entire brigade then began to withdraw towards Wellington killing civilians and burning houses as they went.[3056] Witness George Johnson also testified that the troops had eight abducted nuns at Kissy mental home. However, he stated that when ECOMOG attacked the troops, Foday Bah Marah killed three nuns and the others escaped. The witness did not state whether this was pursuant to any order.[3057] Witness TF1-184 corroborated the evidence that three nuns were killed when the Nigerians attacked the mental home. He does not state who killed the nuns, but he testified that it was 'Gullit' who ordered their execution.[3058] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima gave the order to kill the nuns and that the killing was carried out. On the basis of this evidence the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of crimes in full awareness that the crimes were likely to be committed.

xiii. Ordering/Instigating - Order to massacre civilians in Rogbalan Mosque – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8138. para. 1781: The Trial Chamber heard unchallenged evidence that at Kissy Mental Home while the AFRC were retreating from Freetown, the Accused Brima called several senior commanders together and informed them that he had received information that civilians were harbouring ECOMOG troops in a nearby mosque. He told his commanders not to assume that mosques were housing civilians and ordered that all those found in the Mosque be killed. On these instructions, the Accused Kanu set off with the soldiers. Once they reached the Mosque the Accused Kanu ordered the troops to begin firing. The witness observed that the mosque was full of civilians and that many people were killed.[3059] The evidence of this massacre was corroborated by the following evidence.

8139. para. 1782: Witnesses TF1-083 and TF1-021 both testified about a massacre at Rogbalan Mosque in Freetown in January 1999. Towards the end of January 1999,[3060] TF1-083 was told that there was an ongoing fire fight between ECOMOG troops and rebels. He therefore decided to seek refuge in Rogbalan Mosque. When he arrived he found approximately 70 dead bodies inside the mosque.[3061] TF1-021 testified that he was present in Rogbalan Mosque at midday on a Friday in January 1999 when men wearing "mixed clothing" (partly combat uniform and partly civilian clothing) and carrying guns and machetes attacked the mosque. The attackers first robbed the worshippers and then told them that they would all be killed for supporting President Kabbah. The attackers then began shooting. The witness estimated that 71 worshippers were killed in this attack. The witness stressed that the victims were civilian worshippers who had gathered for the traditional 14:00 prayers. [3062] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima gave the order to kill the civilians at Rogbalan Mosque and that the killing was carried out by his subordinates. On the basis of this evidence the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of crimes in full awareness that the crimes were likely to be committed.

xiv. Ordering/Instigating - Order to abduct and enslave civilians including child soldiers - – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area were later trained as Small Boy Units.[3063] The Trial Chamber notes the evidence of Prosecution witness TF1-024 that the Accused Brima ordered the abduction of civilians because he lost so many troops and needed reinforcements from among the civilian population.[3064] On the basis of all the Prosecution evidence narrated above, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ordered the commission of these crimes in full awareness that they were likely to be committed. The Trial Chamber finds, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, that the Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima ordered his subordinates to commit crimes against the civilian population in Freetown, in January 1999 as part of a widespread attack on the population.

8140. para. 1783: The Trial Chamber heard evidence that during the retreat of the AFRC fighters from Freetown, the Accused Brima ordered the abduction of civilians "in order to attract the attention of the international community". Civilians were then abducted by the renegade-SLA troops and used to carry loads. On Brima's orders, the young boys under the age of fifteen years

xv. Planning – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8141. para. 1784: No evidence was adduced that the Accused Brima planned any crimes under Counts 3 through 6, 10 through 11 and 14 in Freetown and the Western Area. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, in relation to Freetown and the western Area.

xvi. Otherwise aiding and abetting – Responsbiltiy of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8143. para. 1786: Given his authority as commander of the troops, the Trial Chamber finds Brima's presence at the scene gave moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. In addition, given the systematic pattern of crimes committed by the AFRC troops throughout the District, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima was aware of the substantial likelihood that his presence would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrators.

b. Responsibilty of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8144. para. 1929: The Trial Chamber had found that AFRC troops engaged in unlawful killings of civilians as charged under Counts 3 through 5 [3260] and inflicted sexual and physical violence on civilians as charged under Counts 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3261] AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour and used children illegally recruited for military purposes in the attack on Freetown, as charged under Counts 13 and 12 respectively.[3262] Finally, AFRC troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2.[3263]

i. Pleadings – Responsbility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8145. para 1930: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara was present when the attack on Freetown was planned and that it can be inferred from his position as second in command that he was therefore actively involved in the planning phase. It further contends that Kamara was often present when the Accused Brima issued unlawful orders. [3264]

8146. para. 1931: The Prosecution further asserts that 'Captain Blood' carried out Kamara's order to execute civilians, ordered the burning of houses during the retreat towards Waterloo and was present when the Accused Brima ordered other burnings in Freetown and the Western Area.[3265]

8147. para. 1932: Finally, the Prosecution argues that the Accused Kamara carried out killings in Freetown, participated in burnings during the retreat from Freetown, and committed, instigated or aided and abetted the commission of sexual violence in Freetown.[3266]

8148. para. 1933: In its Final Brief, the Kamara Defence submits that the command structure during the Freetown invasion was not as it was described by Prosecution witnesses and that the Accused Kamara was not in Freetown at any time relevant to the Indictment. Therefore, he did not participate directly or indirectly in any of the crimes committed in Freetown.[3267]

ii. Committing - Killings of civilians in the Fourah Bay Area - Responsbility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8149. para. 1934: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC troops killed an unknown number of civilians at Fourah Bay in retaliation for an alleged murder of an AFRC soldier during the 1999 attack on Freetown.[3268] Although the evidence shows that the Accused Kamara "partook" in the attack, it does not specify the way in which he participated in the incident. The Trial Chamber has found that this evidence does not establish that the Accused Kamara personally killed any civilians. [3269]

8150. para. 1935: The Trial Chamber will assess his responsibility with regard to the mode of aiding and abetting.

iii. Committing – Killing of civilians at Wellington - Responsbility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8151. para. 1936: In early January 1999, on the way to Wellington, AFRC forces, including the Accused Kamara, shot at civilians.[3270] In the absence of specific evidence that civilians died as a result of Kamara's actions the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that the Accused Kamara personally killed any civilians.

iv. Ordering, Planing, and Instigating - Responsbility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8152. para. 1937: The Trial Chamber finds no evidence that the Accused Kamara ordered, planned or instigated the commission of crimes in Freetown and the Western Area. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in the Western Area.

8153. para. 1938: In view of the continuing nature of these crimes charged under Counts 9, 12 and 13 and the fact that they span across various districts the Trial Chamber will discuss the Accused Kamara's criminal responsibility for Counts 9, 12 and 13 below.[3271]

v. Otherwise aiding and abetting – Responsibilty of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8154. para. 1939: As stated above with regards to liability for commission of crimes in Fourah Bay, the Trial Chamber has found that there is evidence that the Accused Kamara "partook" in the attack on Fourah Bay in which civilians were killed and houses. While the precise meaning of "partook" is unclear, the Trial Chamber has found that Kamara was present during the commission of the crimes and either himself participated or failed to admonish the troops from committing the crimes.

8155. para. 1940: Given his authority as deputy commander of the troops, the Trial Chamber finds Kamara's presence at the scene gave moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. In addition, given the systematic pattern of crimes committed by the AFRC troops throughout the District, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kamara was aware of the substantial likelihood that his presence would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrators.

vi. Otherwise aiding and abetting – Operation "Cut Hand" in Freetown - Responsibilty of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8156. para. 1941: The Accused Kamara led an mission to loot machetes from the W orId Food Program warehouse. He later explained to Tina Musa, the late SAJ Musa's wife, that they had been used that day in "Operation Cut Hand," meaning that his troops had used the machetes to amputate civilians. [3272] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused, in providing weapons to the troops, with knowledge of how these weapons were to be used, the Accused Kamara gave practical assistance which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of unlawful killings and physical violence in Freetown. It further finds that the Accused Kamara was aware of the substantial likelihood that the use of the machetes would assist in the commission of these crimes. The Trial Chamber therefore finds the Accused Kamara liable for aiding and abetting physical violence.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

civilians as charged under Counts 6 through 9 and 10 respectively.[3382] AFRC troops also abducted civilians and used them as forced labour and used children illegally recruited for military purposes in the attack on Freetown, as charged under Counts 13 and 12 respectively.[3383] Finally, AFRC troops engaged in widespread looting, as charged under Count 14, terrorised the civilian population, as charged under Count 1, and committed collective punishments, as charged under Count 2. [3384]

i. Pleadings – Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8158. para. 2046: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Kanu personally executed and amputated civilians, burned property, forced civilians to work and committed or aided and abetted acts of sexual violence in Freetown and the Western Area.[3385] The Prosecution argues that the Accused Kanu ordered amputations and executions of civilians.[3386] The Prosecution contends that the Accused Kanu was present during the planning of the attack on Freetown, and that it can be inferred from his position as third in command that he actively participated in this planning phase.[3387] Finally, the Prosecution submits that based on the Accused Kanu's authority and the widespread nature of the crimes committed, it can be reasonably inferred that he prompted or encouraged these acts, and that he intended the acts or was aware of the substantial likelihood that such acts would be committed.[3388]

8159. para. 2047: In its Final Brief, regarding the role of the Accused Kanu in killings at a mosque at Kissy, the Kanu Defence argues that the victims were ECOMOG soldiers and therefore that the Accused cannot be held liable for any crimes under the Statute.[3389] The Kanu Defence further submits that the evidence of Prosecution witness TF1-282, who testified that she had been raped by the Accused Kanu, was unreliable. [3390] The Kanu Defence contends that the Prosecution wi1'1ess George Johnson's evidence regarding Kanu's order at Kissy Mental Home to amputate civilians is unsafe.[3391] It further contends that Prosecution witness TF1-184' s evidence that the Accused Kanu demonstrated a method for carrying out amputations does not suffice to hold him liable under Counts 10 and 11. Finally, it submits that Prosecution witness TF1-334's testimony as a whole, including his testimony regarding the role of the Accused in amputations committed in Freetown, is unreliable.[3392]

ii. Committing - Fourah Bay: The killing of civilians - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8160. para. 2048: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC troops killed an unknown number of civilians at Fourah Bay in retaliation for the alleged murder of a soldier during the 1999 attack on Freetown.[3393] While witness TF1-334 testified that the Accused Kanu "partook" in the attack, the witness does not further clarify the manner of his participation.[3394]

8161. para. 2049: The Trial Chamber has found that this evidence does not establish that the Accused Kanu personally killed any civilians.[3395]

iii. Committing - Kissy Road: "Demonstration" of an amputation to the troops - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8162. para. 2050: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kanu amputated a civilian near Kissy Old Road during the 6 January 1999 invasion in order to "demonstrate" to his troops how best to carry out amputations [3396] He explained that there were two types of amputation possible, one called a long sleeve, meaning an amputation of the arms, and the other a short sleeve, meaning an amputation of the arm up to the bicep.[3397] The Indictment does not provide any of the particulars of the incident and is therefore defective in this regard.

8164. para. 2052: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the Accused Kanu individually criminally responsible for committing an act of physical violence.

iv. Committing - Upgun: "Demonstration" of an amputation on a civilian - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8165. para. 2053: The Trial Chamber has found that subsequently the Accused Kanu demonstrated how to perform amputations on two other civilians at Upgun during the retreat from Freetown in January 1999.[3398] The Trial Chamber is satisfied that this is a separate incident to the act of physical violence described above. The Indictment does not provide any of the particulars of the incident and is therefore defective in this regard.

8166. para. 2054: The Trial Chamber must determine whether this defect in the Indictment was cured by clear, timely and consistent notice to the Brima Defence. The Prosecution Supplemental Pre-Trial Brief and the Prosecution's Opening Statements do not refer to this incident. The Trial Chamber observes that the relevant information did not come into the Prosecution's possession until March or April 2005, and that on 22 April 2005 it disclosed a statement to the defence in which the witness said that > Whilst we were at Upgun, 55 came with a commander, Major Mines and Captain Kabila and some people were amputated. 55 demonstrated by amputating two people. From then on the amputations started.[3399]

8167. para. 2055: Thus, the Defence was not put on notice of this allegation until over one month after the trial commenced. The Trial Chamber does not consider that this constitutes timely notice. Nevertheless, the Kanu Defence did not object to the evidence when led and in fact cross-examined the witness on this specific incident during trial. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the failure to give timely notice did not materially impair the ability of the Kanu Defence to prepare its case.

8168. para. 2056: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the Accused Kanu individually criminally responsible for committing an act of physical violence.

v. Committing - State House: Looting of vehicles - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8169. para. 2057: Witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that vehicles were looted by AFRC troops in Freetown and that the Accused Kanu arrived at State House with a stolen vehicle during the 6 January 1999 Freetown invasion. [3400] The Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt on this evidence that the Accused Kanu personally looted at least one vehicle in Freetown. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the Accused Kanu individually criminally responsible for committing an act of pillage.

vi. Ordering – Order at State House to kill captive Nigerian ECOMOG soldiers - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8170. para. 2058: The Trial Chamber found that the Accused Brima ordered the execution of fourteen to sixteen captive ECOMOG soldiers at State House, and that the Accused Kanu then tool.. the soldiers outside, killed one ECOMOG soldier himself, and ordered his soldiers to execute the remaining captives. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the executions were carried out [3401] and that the Accused Kanu ordered the commission of this crime in full awareness that the crime was likely to be committed.

vii. Ordering – Order to kill civilians at a mosque in Kissy - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8171. para. 2059: The Trial Chamber found that the Accused Kanu reissued an order given by the Accused Brima on the day after the troops withdrew from Kissy Mental Home that an unknown number of civilians at a mosque were to be killed. The Accused Kanu is not relieved of criminal responsibility for ordering this massacre simply because he was reissuing an order originally made by his commander, the Accused Brima. The Trial Chamber has found that the executions were carried out. [3402] The Trial Chamber is further satisfied that the Accused Kanu ordered the commission of this crime in full awareness that the crime was likely to be committed.

viii. Ordering – Order to commit amputations in Eastern Freetown - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8173. para. 2061: The Trial Chamber has found that when the troops reached Upgun during the retreat from Freetown, the Accused Kanu told his commanders, including Col. Mines and Kabila, that it was time for amputations to begin, and that he would begin by demonstrating. Later two civilians were captured and the Accused amputated their arms. The Accused explained that he had begun the amputations as an example to his troops of how to proceed. He then told the victims that they should go to President Kabbah to ask for new hands. Later that day, ten other civilians were captured and amputated by Kabila and Mines in Kanu's presence. Mines repeated Kanu's instruction to the victims to seek new hands from President Kabbah.[3404] The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the Accused is liable for committing two amputations at Upgun. It additionally finds that he ordered the commission of further amputations which were then carried out. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kanu ordered the commission of this crime in full awareness that the amputations were likely to be committed. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has proved this particular mode of individual criminal responsibility beyond reasonable doubt.

ix. Planning - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8174. para. 2062: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu planned any crimes under Counts 3 through 6, 10 through 11 and 14 in Freetown and the Western Area. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for any crimes committed under those Counts. The Accused Kanu's criminal responsibility for Counts 9, 12 and 13, which involve crimes of a continuing nature spanning various districts, will be discussed below.[3405]

x. Instigating - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area

8175. para. 2063: The Trial Chamber recalls that on the eve of the 6 January 1999 invasion of Freetown, the Accused Brima chaired a meeting at which the Accused Kanu reminded the AFRC troops present about orders to burn down police stations and kill "targeted persons'' collaborators.[3406] The Trial Chamber has found that a number of civilians were subsequently killed in Freetown. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kanu prompted the perpetrators to kill civilians in Freetown. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has proved this mode of liability against the Accused Kanu.

xi. Otherwise aiding and abetting - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Freetown and Western Area 8176. para. 2064: The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kanu aided and abetted any crimes in Freetown and the Western Area. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area.

(ix) Port Loko District

a. Responsibility of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Port Loko District

8177. para. 1811: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC/RUF troops unlawfully killed a number of civilians in Port Loko District as charged under Counts 3 through 5.[3109] In addition, AFRC troops held persons in sexual slavery as charged under Count 9.3110 AFRC/RUF troops used abducted civilians for forced labour, as charged under Count 13.

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Port Loko District

8178. para. 1812: In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution argues only that the Accused Brima is liable for the crimes committed in Port Loko District as a principal in a joint criminal enterprise.[3111]

8179. para. 1813: The Brima Defence invites the Trial Chamber to disregard the testimony of Witness TF1-256 on the grounds that it is unreliable and alternatively submits that as the Accused Brima was under detention at the material time, he had no relationship with the alleged perpetrators of the crimes committed in Port Loko District and then: is no nexus between the events in Nonkoba described by witness TF1-256 and the Accused.[3112]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accued Brima under Article 6.1 – Port Loko District

8180. para. 1814: No evidence was adduced that the Accused Brima individually committed, ordered, planned, instigated or aided and abetted the commission of any of the crimes that occurred in Port Loko District. The Trial Chamber finds pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the

b. Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1– Port Loko District

8181. para. 1951: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC/RUF troops unlawfully killed a number of civilians in Port Loko District as charged under Counts 3 through 5.[3282] In addition, AFRC troops held persons in sexual slavery as charged under Count 9.3283 AFRC/RUF troops used abducted civilians for forced labour, as charged under Count 13.

8182. para. 1952: The Trial Chamber has found that the unlawful killings committed in Manaarma are attributable to troops working with the Accused Kamara.[3284] The Trial Chamber has found that the unlawful killings committed in Nonkoba and the sexual crimes are not attributable beyond reasonable doubt to any particular group of fighters.

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1- Port Loko District

8183. para. 1953: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution asks the Trial Chamber to infer, based on the position of the Accused Kamara and his management of the troops, that he "designed and organised" the attacks on Port Loko District and that he is therefore liable for planning, instigating and/or aiding and abetting the crimes associated with the attacks.[3285] The Prosecution further contends that the Accused Kamara ordered the commission of crimes in Port Loko District. [3286]

8184. para. 1954: Finally, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara committed a killing at Mamamah and a rape at Gberibana.[3287] The Trial Chamber notes that Mamamah and Gberibana were not locations specified in the Indictment under Counts 3-5 and 6 respectively.

8185. para. 1955: In its Final Brief, the Kamara Defence submits that the Accused Kamara was not in Port Loko District at any time relevant to the Indictment and that the command structure in Port Loko District was not as described by Prosecution witnesses.[3288]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accued Kamara under Article 6.1– Port Loko District

8186. The Prosecution has not adduced any evidence that the Accused Kamara committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes committed in the Port Loko District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kamara for the crimes committed in Port Loko District. [402]

c. Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1– Port Loko District

8187. para. 2081: The Trial Chamber has found that AFRC/RUF troops unlawfully killed a number of civilians in Port Loko District as charged under Counts 3 through 5.[3422] In addition, AFRC troops held persons in sexual slavery as charged under Count 9.[3423] AFRC/RUF troops used abducted civilians for forced labour, as charged under Count 13.

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Port Loko District

8188. para. 2082: In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution argues only that the Accused in Kanu is liable for the crimes committed in Port Loko District as a principal in a joint criminal enterprise. [3424]

8189. para. 2083: The Kanu Defence makes no specific submissions regarding the alleged liability of the Accused for crimes committed in Port Loko District in its Final Brief.

ii. Findings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 – Port Loko District

8190. para. 2084: The Prosecution has not adduced any that the Accused Kanu individually committed, ordered, planned, instigated, or otherwise aided and abetted any of the crimes that occurred in Port Loko District. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved any of these modes of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Kanu for the crimes committed in Port Loko District.

(x) Responsibility for Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Responsililty Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

8191. para. 1820: The Trial Chamber has found that civilians were subjected to sexual slavery as charged under Count 9; that children under the age of 15 were conscripted into the AFRC forces and/or used to participate in active hostilities as charged under Count 12; and that civilians were enslaved as charged under Count 13. Because of the continuing nature of these crimes and the fact that victims were in most cases forced to follow the perpetrators on a journey that spans across a number of districts, the Trial Chamber has deemed it fit to consider these additional findings on responsibility of the Accused Brima for these crimes here. These findings do not detract from the trial Chamber's findings elsewhere in this Judgement with regard to these three crimes.

8193. para. 1822: Once the AFRC troops had established a base at Camp Rosos in Bombali District, abductees were forced to undergo a three week military training program. Civilians that attempted to escape were executed.[3123] The Prosecution Military Expert, Colonel Iron, stated: "The AFRC had little choice but to run this training: there was a finite number of trained ex-SLA soldiers, and each casualty or loss could not be otherwise replaced." Although the Trial Chamber accepts that the primary purpose of these abductions was to support the military effort, it rejects Colonel Iron's conclusion that the AFRC "little choice" in adopting this strategy.

8194. para. 1823: The Trial Chamber heard that sexual slavery was systemic amongst the perpetrators. Abducted women were distributed to soldiers and commanders who signed for them. There were disciplinary measures regulating the conduct of sexual slaves and their rebel 'husbands'. This system was overseen by commanders who appointed a 'Mammy Queen' to assist them. At Camp Rosos, abducted young women were forced to provide sexual services and to perform domestic tasks. [3124]

8195. para. 1824: The magnitude of commission of the three enslavement crimes by AFRC troops indicates their systemic nature. The Trial Chamber notes that the Brigade included a position in which an individual was appointed specific responsibility for abducted civilians.[3125] Although the Trial Chamber is unable to make a finding on the total number of civilians abducted and forced to undergo military training, the example provided by Colonel Iron that one battalion at 'Colonel Eddie Town' consisted of approximately 150 trained soldiers supplemented by approximately 200 abducted civilians [3126] corroborates the evidence of fact-based witnesses that these crimes were committed on a large scale.[3127]

8196. para. 1825: Indeed, it would appear that once established the modus operandi of enslavement became so deeply entrenched that it was difficult to break. Col. Iron's conclusion about the abduction of civilians during the withdrawal from Freetown is instructive. There can be little military justification for what happened" during the retreat from Freetown [...] The abductions seem particularly self-defeating: at a time when there was benefit in reducing the size of the force to make it faster moving during the escape, the abductees swelled the size of the column, slowed it down, and made it a bigger target. One reason given for the abductions was to make the fighting strength seem larger than it was; but I suspect that the truth is more simply that abductions were now common practice for the AFRC." [3128] [emphasis added] [1826]. Based on the large scale, continuous and organised nature of the enslavement crimes, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the only reasonable inference is that a substantial degree of planning and preparation were required to commit the crimes.

8198. para. 1828: The Accused played a substantial role in the system of exploitation and cruelty. The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima was the overall commander of both the AFRC troops that moved from Mansofinia, Koinadugu District to Camp Rosos, Bombali District and of the AFRC troops that later invaded Freetown on 6 January 1999. As the overall commander, the Accused Brima was substantially involved planning the various operations in these Districts.[3129]

8200. para. 1830: The Accused Brima also directly participated in and made a substantial contribution to the planning and execution of the said crimes. In Mansofinia, at the start of the journey of the AFRC troops through Bombali District, the Accused Brima ordered that any strong civilian encountered by the troops on the journey should be captured and made to join the troops.[3131] Following this order, hundreds of civilians were abducted in Bombali District. [3132] These civilians were used as forced labour. [3133] During the attack on Karina, Bombali District, Brima ordered the distribution of children captured among the commanders.[3134] Upon completion of civilian military training at Camp Rosos, the trainees were addressed by both the Accused Kanu and the Accused Brima. Brima then ordered that the boys should be distributed to the various companies, while the women were sent back to the soldiers and commanders who had taken them as their "wives".[3135]

8201. para. 1831: During the withdrawal from Freetown in January 1999, the Accused Brima held a meeting attended by the Accused Kamara and Kanu, among others. At this meeting, the Accused Brima ordered his troops to begin abducting civilians, saying that this would attract the attention of the international community.[3136] Troops immediately began breaking into houses and capturing civilians, especially young girls, and taking them to headquarters at the PWD.[3137] Witness TF1-334 testified that "Almost everybody" had civilians, including the commanders,[3138] and abducting commanders were formally responsible for ensuring that civilians did not escape.[3139] Several days later, the Accused Brima ordered the further abduction of civilians.[3140] This order was also implemented by the troops.[3141]

8204. para. 1834: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused planned, ordered, organised and implemented the system to abduct and enslave civilians which was in fact committed by AFRC troops in Bombali and Western Area. It is further satisfied that the Accused had the direct intent to set up and implement the system of exploitation involving the three enslavement crimes, namely, sexual slavery, conscription and use of children under the age of 15 for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour.

i. Count 9 (Outrages on Personal Dignity) – Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

8205. para. 1835: On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima is individually criminally responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the commission of the crime of outrages on personal dignity in Bombali District and Freetown and the Western Area.

ii. Count 12 (Child Soldiers) - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.1 – Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

8206. para. 1836: On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima is individually criminally responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the commission of conscription of children under the age of 15 into the armed group or using them to participate actively in hostilities in Bombali District and the Western Area.

iii. Count 13 (Enslavement) - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.1– Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

b. Resposibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.1 - Responsibility for Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

8208. para. 1970: The Trial Chamber has found that civilians were subjected to outrages upon personal dignity as charged under Count 9; that children under the age of 15 were conscripted into the AFRC forces and/or used to participate in active hostilities as charged under Count 12; and that civilians were enslaved as charged under Count 13.

8209. para. 1971: As with the Accused Brima, the Trial Chamber will examine the evidence in relation to the responsibility of the Accused Kamara for each of the enslavement crimes as a whole. The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the only reasonable inference available from the systemic commission of these crimes on a large scale is that these crimes were planned.[3304]

8210. para. 1972: While the Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kamara was overall commander in Kono District after the departure of Johnny Paul Koroma, the Prosecution has not established that he was involved or substantially contributed in this position to the enslavement crimes in that district.[3305] However the Trial Chamber finds that, in his position as overall commander, he was aware that civilians were abducted and subjected to enslavement in that district.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1 - Responsibility for Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

8211. para. 2089: The Trial Chamber has found that civilians were subjected to sexual slavery as charged under Count 9; that children under the age of 15 were conscripted into the AFRC forces and/or used to participate in active hostilities as charged under Count 12; and that civilians were enslaved as charged under Count 13.

8213. para. 2091: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kanu was Chief of Staff and commander in charge of abducted civilians in Bombali District and the Western Area.[3427] As the AFRC troops depended heavily on these civilians for a multitude of tasks, the Accused Kanu's position was a critical one.

8214. para. 2092: In Bombali District the Accused Kanu designed and implemented a system to control abducted girls and women. All abducted women and girls were placed in the custody of the Accused. Any soldier who wanted an abducted girl or woman to be his "wife" had to "sign for her". The Accused informed his fighters that any problems with the women were to be immediately reported back to him, and that he would then monitor the situation.[3428] The Accused issued a disciplinary instruction ordering that any woman caught with another woman's husband should be beaten and locked in a box.[3429] In one instance, Witness TF1-334 observed a Staff Sergeant reporting to Kanu that he suspected his "wife" of misbehaving and the Accused Kanu called the woman before him and found her guilty. He ordered that she be sent to the Mammy Queen, be given a dozen lashes and be locked in the box.[3430]

8215. para. 2093: The Trial Chamber has also found that the Accused Kanu was in charge of the forced military training of civilians at Camp Rosos. Among those forced to undergo training were children below the age of 15 years o1d.[3431]

8216. para. 2094: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kanu continued in his positions as Chief of Staff and commander in charge of civilians in Freetown and the Western Area. The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kanu had approximately ten child combatants in his charge in Benguema following the retreat from Freetown. [3432]

8217. para. 2095: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kanu planned, organised and implemented the system to abduct and enslave civilians which was committed by AFRC troops in Bombali and Western Area. It is further satisfied that the Accused Kanu had the direct intent to establish and implement the system of exploitation involving the three enslavement crimes, namely, sexual slavery, conscription and use of children under the age of 15 for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour.

i. Responsibility for Count 9 (Sexual Slavery) – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1

ii. Responsibility for Count 12 (Child Soldiers) – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1

8219. para. 2097: On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is individually criminally responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the commission of conscription of children under the age of 15 into the armed group or using them to participate actively in hostilities in Bombali District and the Western Area.

iii. Responsibility for Count 13 (Enslavement) – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.1

8220. para. 2098: On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is individually criminally responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for enslavement in Bombali District and the Western Area. [3432]

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-A, Judgement, 22 February 2008

(a) Findings and Conclusions:

(i) Law on relating to pleading of the Indictment.

i. Specificity – Law on relating to pleading of the Indictment 8221. para. 37: In order to guarantee a fair trial the Prosecution is obliged to plead material facts with a sufficient degree of specificity. The question whether material facts are pleaded with the required degree of specificity depends on the context of the particular case.

8222. para. 38: In particular, the required degree of specificity varies according to the form of participation alleged against an accused. Where direct participation is alleged in an indictment, we opine that the Prosecution's obligation to provide particulars in an indictment must be adhered to fully.

8223. para. 39: Where superior responsibility is alleged, the liability of an accused depends on several material factors such as the relationship of the accused to his subordinates, his knowledge of the crimes and the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take to prevent the crimes or to punish his subordinates. Therefore, these are material facts that must be pleaded with a sufficient degree of specificity.

8224. para. 40: In considering the extent to which there is compliance with the specificity requirement in an indictment, the term specificity should not be understood to have any special meaning. It is to be understood in its ordinary meaning as being specific in regard to an object or subject matter. An object or subject matter that is particularly named or defined cannot be said to lack specificity.

ii. Exception to Specificity - Law on relating to pleading of the Indictment 8225. para. 41: The pleading principles that apply to indictments at international criminal tribunals differ from those in domestic jurisdictions because of the nature and scale of the crimes when compared with those in domestic jurisdictions. For this reason, there is a narrow exception to the specificity requirement for indictments at international criminal tribunals. In some cases, the widespread nature and sheer scale of the alleged crimes make it unnecessary and impracticable to require a high degree of specificity.

(ii) Challenges to an Indictment on Appeal

8226. para. 42: Challenges to the form of an indictment should be made at a relatively early stage of proceedings and usually at the pre-trial stage pursuant to Rule 72(B)(ii) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules") which provides that it should be made by a preliminary motion. An accused, therefore, is in the ordinary course of events expected to challenge the form of an indictment prior to the rendering of judgment or at the very least, challenge the admissibility of evidence of material facts not pleaded in an indictment by interposing a specific objection at the time the evidence is introduced.

8227. para. 43: Failure to challenge the form of an indictment at trial is not, however, an absolute bar to raising such a challenge on appeal. An accused may well choose not to interpose an objection when certain evidence is admitted or object to the form of an indictment, not as a means of exploiting a technical flaw, but rather, because the accused is under the reasonable belief that such evidence is being introduced for purposes other than those that relate to the nature and cause of the charges against him.

8228. para. 44: Where an accused fails to make specific challenges to the form of an indictment during the course of the trial or challenge the admissibility of evidence of material facts not pleaded in the indictment, but instead raises it for the first time on appeal, it is for the Appeals Chamber to decide the appropriate response. Where the Appeals Chamber holds that an indictment is defective, the options open to it are to find that the accused waived his right to challenge the form of an indictment, to reverse the conviction, or to find that no miscarriage of justice had resulted notwithstanding the defect. In this regard the Appeals Chamber may also find that any prejudice that may have been caused by a defective indictment was cured by timely, clear and consistent information provided to the accused by the Prosecution.

8229. para. 45: The Appeals Chamber must ensure that a failure to pose a timely challenge to the form of the indictment did not render the trial unfair. The primary concern at the appeal stage therefore, when faced with a challenge to the form of an indictment, is whether the accused was materially prejudiced.

(iii) Joint Criminal Enterprise

i. Pleadings – Joint Criminal Enterprise

8231. para. 69: Kanu, in his Tenth Ground of Appeal, submits that once the Trial Chamber found that joint criminal enterprise had been defectively pleaded in the Indictment, it should have quashed the Indictment because the Indictment was predicated in its entirety on the notion of a joint criminal enterprise. He also submits that the defective Indictment substantially prejudiced him in the preparation of his defence because at all material times he was unsure of the exact nature of the case against him.

8232. para. 70: The Prosecution replies that the purpose of the joint criminal enterprise was inherently criminal and that joint criminal enterprise was therefore not defectively pleaded. It argues that "even where the ultimate aim or objective of a common enterprise is not in itself inherently criminal, it is nonetheless a joint criminal enterprise if the participants have a common purpose of committing particular types of crimes in order to achieve that objective." The Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber erred in treating the "ultimate objective of the joint criminal enterprise as the alleged common criminal purpose itself, and in finding that the Indictment therefore did not plead a joint criminal enterprise that was inherently criminal." In particular, it submits that the Indictment as a whole alleges a common plan to carry out a campaign of terrorising and collectively punishing the civilian population of Sierra Leone through the commission of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Special Court, in order to achieve the ultimate objective of gaining and exercising political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone.

8233. para. 71: Brima and Kamara in their response submit that by alleging in the Indictment that "the members of the JCE were willing to 'take any actions necessary,' " the Prosecution failed to indicate clearly "the criminal means involved in conducting the JCE . . . ." Kanu submits that "gaining and exercising control over the population of Sierra Leone" is not a crime under international law and that with respect to JCE, an indictment must allege a common purpose which is a crime under international law. Further, that the Prosecution should have pleaded unambiguously the joint criminal enterprise upon which it intended to hold him criminally responsible for the crimes alleged in paragraphs 34, 38, 39, 40, and 41 of the Indictment.

ii. Discussion – Joint Criminal Enterprise

8234. para. 72: Article 6(1) of the Statute which is in the same terms as Article 7(1) of the ICTY Statute prescribes individual criminal responsibility for acts or transactions in which a person has been personally engaged or in some other way participated in one or more of the five ways stated in the Article. As was said by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Tadić:

> "[t]he basic assumption must be that in international law as much as in national systems, the foundation of criminal responsibility is the principle of personal culpability: nobody may be held criminally responsible for acts or transactions in which he has not personally engaged or in some other way participated (nulla poena sine culpa)."

8235. para. 73: Article 6(1) does not expressly prescribe individual criminal responsibility through participation in the realisation of a common design or purpose. It was in these circumstances that the Appeals Chamber of ICTY in Tadić developed a doctrine of individual criminal responsibility for participation in a JCE.

8236. para. 74: The ICTY Appeals Chamber reasoned thus:

> An interpretation of the Statute based on its object and purpose leads to the conclusion that the Statute intends to extend the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal to all those 'responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law' committed in the former Yugoslavia (Article 1). As is apparent from the wording of both Article 7(1) and the provisions setting forth the crimes over which the International Tribunal has jurisdiction (Articles 2 to 5), such responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law is not limited merely to those who actually carry out the actus reus of the enumerated crimes but appears to extend also to other offenders (see in particular Article 2, which refers to committing or ordering to be committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and Article 4 which sets forth various types of offences in relation to genocide, including conspiracy, incitement, attempt and complicity) . . .
> Thus, all those who have engaged in serious violations of international humanitarian law, whatever the manner in which they may have perpetrated, or participated in the perpetration of those violations, must be brought to justice. If this is so, it is fair to conclude that the Statute does not confine itself to providing for jurisdiction over those persons who plan, instigate, order, physically perpetrate a crime or otherwise aid and abet in its planning, preparation or execution. The Statute does not stop there. It does not exclude those modes of participating in the commission of crimes which occur where several persons having a common purpose embark on criminal activity that is then carried out either jointly or by some members of this plurality of persons. Whoever contributes to the commission of crimes by the group of persons or some members of the group, in execution of a common criminal purpose, may be held to be criminally liable, subject to certain conditions, which are specified below . . .
> Under these circumstances, to hold criminally liable as a perpetrator only the person who materially performs the criminal act would disregard the role as co-perpetrators of all those who in some way made it possible for the perpetrator physically to carry out that criminal act. At the same time, depending upon the circumstances, to hold the latter liable only as aiders and abettors might understate the degree of their criminal responsibility . . .
> This interpretation, based on the Statute and the inherent characteristics of many crimes perpetrated in wartime, warrants the conclusion that international criminal responsibility embraces actions perpetrated by a collectivity of persons in furtherance of a common criminal design. It may also be noted that - as will be mentioned below - international criminal rules on common purpose are substantially rooted in, and to a large extent reflect, the position taken by many States of the world in their national legal systems.

8237. para. 75: The actus reus for all forms of joint criminal enterprise liability consists of the following three elements:

(i) a plurality of persons;

(ii) the existence of a common plan, design or purpose which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided for in the Statute;

(iii) participation of the accused in the common design involving the perpetration of one of the crimes provided for in the Statute.

8239. para. 77: In Kvočka et al. the ICTY Appeals Chamber was of the opinion that "the common design that united the accused was the creation of a Serbian state within the former Yugoslavia, and that they worked to achieve this goal by participating in the persecution of Muslims and Croats." Whereas creation of a Serbian State within the former Yugoslavia is not a crime within the Statute of the ICTY, the means to achieve the goal, such as persecution, constitute crimes within that statute.

8240. para. 78: Reference to the indictments in cases of Martić and Haradinaj et al., cited by the Prosecution, is similarly instructive. In Haradinaj et al. for example, it would appear that the Trial Chamber accepted that the pleading of joint criminal enterprise was proper notwithstanding the Prosecution pleading a common purpose (namely "consolidate[ing] the total control of the Kosovo Liberation Army over the KLA operational zone of Dukagjin") which itself does not amount to any crime within the Statute of the ICTY. However, the Haradinaj Indictment clearly alleges that the joint criminal enterprise involved the commission of crimes such as intimidation, abduction, imprisonment, beating, torture and murder of targeted civilians in violation of Articles 3 and 5 of the ICTY Statute.

8241. para. 79: Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court ("Rome Statute" and "ICC," respectively) does not require that the joint criminal enterprise has a common purpose that amounts to a crime within the ICC's jurisdiction. Indeed, the Rome Statute departs altogether from the use of the phrase "amounts to" and instead requires that the "criminal activity or criminal purpose … involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court." This formulation reflects the consensus reached by all of the States negotiating the Statute of the ICC at the Rome Conference, and therefore is a valuable indication of the views of States and the international community generally on the question of what constitutes a common purpose.

8242. para. 80: In view of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the requirement that the common plan, design or purpose of a joint criminal enterprise is inherently criminal means that it must either have as its objective a crime within the Statute, or contemplate crimes within the Statute as the means of achieving its objective.

> 34. The joint criminal enterprise included gaining and exercising control over the population of Sierra Leone in order to prevent or minimize resistance to their geographic control, and to use members of the population to provide support to the members of the joint criminal enterprise. The crimes alleged in this Indictment, including unlawful killings, abductions, forced labour, physical and sexual violence, use of child soldiers, looting and burning of civilian structures, were either actions within the joint criminal enterprise or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise.
> 35. ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, by their acts or omissions, are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1). of the Statute for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute as alleged in this Indictment, which crimes each of them planned, instigated, ordered, committed or in whose planning, preparation or execution each Accused otherwise aided and abetted, or which crimes were within a joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated.

8244. para. 82: The ultimate objective alleged in paragraph 33 of the Indictment, namely: to "take any actions necessary to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas," may not of itself amount to a crime within the Statute of the Special Court, nonetheless, paragraph 33 of the Indictment read together with paragraphs 34 and 35 demonstrates the Prosecution's allegation that the parties to the common enterprise shared a common plan and design to achieve the objective by conduct constituting crimes within the Statute.

8245. para. 83: Paragraph 33 of the Indictment states that the plan was to "take any actions necessary" to gain territorial control and political power. Paragraph 34 of the Indictment states that the actions "included": controlling the population of Sierra Leone; using members of the population to support the JCE; and specifically enumerated crimes such as "unlawful killings, abductions, forced labour, physical and sexual violence." Paragraph 35 of the Indictment also indicates that crimes "referred to in Articles 2, 3, and 4 of the Statute . . . were within the joint criminal enterprise," or that those crimes were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the JCE.

8246. para. 84: The Appeals Chamber holds that the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise was not defectively pleaded. Although the objective of gaining and exercising political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone may not be a crime under the Statute, the actions contemplated as a means to achieve that objective are crimes within the Statute. The Trial Chamber took an erroneously narrow view by confining its consideration to paragraph 33 and reading that paragraph in isolation. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber erred in its consideration of "evidence" adduced at trial to determine whether the Indictment was properly pleaded. The error arose because determination of whether the Prosecution properly pleaded a crime must be determined on the basis of whether the Prosecution pleaded all the material facts in the Indictment, not whether it had adduced evidence to support the allegations.

8247. para. 85: Several other issues arose in the context of JCE for which the Appeals Chamber wishes to express itself. The Trial Chamber erred in concluding that the Prosecution could not plead the basic and extended forms of joint criminal enterprise liability in the alternative on the grounds that the two forms, as pleaded, logically exclude each other. Pleading the basic and extended forms of JCE in the alternative is now a well-established practice in the international criminal tribunals. The Trial Chamber erred in finding that the Indictment failed to specify the period covered by the JCE. That period is that covered by all of the alleged crimes, which in this case is between 25 May 1997 and January 2000.

8248. para. 86: The Appeals Chamber having concluded that joint criminal enterprise was not defectively pleaded in the Indictment, need not address the Trial Chamber's finding that the Prosecution failed to cure the defective pleading of JCE. Similarly, Kanu's Tenth Ground of Appeal, that the Trial Chamber erred in law by failing to quash the entire Indictment after finding that joint criminal enterprise was defectively pleaded, must fail.

iii. Disposition – Joint Criminal Enterprise

8249. para. 87: The Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber erred in law when it concluded that JCE was not properly pleaded in the Indictment. Consequently, the Prosecution's Fourth Ground of Appeal succeeds, however we see no need to make further factual findings or to remit the case to the Trial Chamber for that purpose, having regard to the interest of justice.

(iv) Waiver of indictment defects

i. Pleadings – Waiver of indictment defects

8251. para. 112: Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber ought to have dismissed all charges that alleged his personal commission after it established that those counts of the Indictment were defective. In support of this submission he argues that in his Pre-Defence Motion he raised several challenges to the validity of the Indictment including lack of specificity regarding different forms of individual criminal responsibility and lack of specificity regarding various Counts. He further argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law, in finding that his failure to object to evidence led by the Prosecution, during the course of the trial automatically amounted to a waiver. Such evidence, Kanu argues, could have been relevant for purposes other than establishing individual liability. Thus, according to Kanu, the Trial Chamber ought not to have concluded that his failure to object amounted to waiver "without firstly satisfying itself that the failure by the Defence to challenge the extraneous evidence was a deliberate defence tactic, in which case the Defence would have been held to have taken a gamble to its detriment."

8252. para. 113: In response, the Prosecution submitted that contrary to Kanu's claims, Kanu had not previously challenged the manner in which the Indictment pleaded crimes that alleged his personal commission. Further, in instances where evidence was adduced that tended to show that Kanu personally committed specific crimes, the Prosecution contends that it was clear to Kanu that such evidence would be relied upon to establish his individual responsibility for "committing" crimes. The Prosecution finally submits that in any event, it is Kanu who bears the burden of showing that he was prejudiced by the Trial Chamber's approach and that he has failed to discharge this burden.

ii. Discussion – Waiver of indictment defects

8253. para. 114: Whether or not the Appellant raised a timely objection at trial will affect the question on appeal whether he was in fact prejudiced by the defective Indictment. Perusing the Record on Appeal and Kanu's "Preliminary Motion On Defects In The Indictment," it is clear that Kanu did not previously complain that the Indictment was defective in respect of his personal commission of the criminal acts alleged. This, therefore being the first time Kanu has raised this complaint, he must show that he was prejudiced.

8254. para. 115: The Appeals Chamber finds no merit in Kanu's Second Ground of Appeal and finds that he has manifestly failed in discharging this burden. Neither in his Appeal Brief nor during oral argument did he say that he had no notice of the crimes he was alleged to have personally committed. Further, he neither demonstrated that he was prejudiced, nor that the preparation of his defence was materially impaired by the defect in the Indictment. On the contrary, counsel for Kanu cross-examined witnesses as to specific incidents, and when asked during the appeal hearing why no objection was raised when evidence was being led in respect of the aforementioned crimes, he replied that it was "a question of strategy" at trial.

8255. para. 116: The Appeals Chamber accordingly rejects Kanu's Second Ground.

(v) The "Bombali-Freetown Campaign" and Kamara's Alleged Responsibility under Article 6(1) for Crimes Committed in Port Loko District

i. Pleadings - The "Bombali-Freetown Campaign" and Kamara's Alleged Responsibility under Article 6(1) for Crimes Committed in Port Loko District

8256. para. 165: In its First Ground of Appeal, the Prosecution alleges the Trial Chamber made numerous legal and factual errors in failing to find the Appellants individually responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning, instigating, ordering, or otherwise aiding and abetting, and pursuant to Article 6(3), for all crimes committed in Bombali District, Freetown and other parts of the Western Area during the so-called "Bombali-Freetown Campaign." It submits that the "Bombali-Freetown Campaign" constituted a "single planned and systematic campaign" that originated at a planning meeting in Koinadugu District in April or May 1998 and continued in Freetown and the subsequent retreat and regrouping of the AFRC combatants in the Western Area.

8257. para. 166: The Prosecution alleges the Trial Chamber erred in law in that:

(i) The Trial Chamber adopted a compartmentalized or "myopic" approach to the evidence;

(ii) It relied upon direct evidence and discounted circumstantial evidence;

(iii) It failed to consider that a single act could cause multiple crimes;

(iv) It failed to appreciate the legal significance of conduct of the Appellants;

(v) It erroneously withheld findings on multiple modes of responsibility under Article 6(1) for each crime; and

(vi) It failed to consider whether the three Appellants bear Article 6(3) responsibility for the crimes for which they were convicted under Article 6(1).

(vii) The Appeals Chamber will consider each of these arguments in turn.

8258. para. 167: The Third Ground of the Prosecution's Appeal alleges both a legal and a factual error on the part of the Trial Chamber in finding that the Prosecution did not adduce any evidence and consequently did not prove that Kamara was individually responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for any of the crimes committed in Port Loko District. Most of the arguments presented by the Prosecution concern the Trial Chamber's factual findings in respect of the following crimes that were committed in Port Loko District (hereinafter the "Port Loko District crimes"):

(i) Unlawful killings in Manaarma for which Kamara was found individually responsible under Article 6(3) of the Statute;

(ii) Sexual slavery; and

(iii) Acts of terror and collective punishment in respect of (i) and (ii) above.

8259. para. 168: Grounds One and Three of the Prosecution's Grounds of Appeal address certain legal and factual issues, namely:

(i) that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in not finding the Appellant individually responsible under both Articles 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute for all crimes that the Trial Chamber found to have been committed in Bombali District, Freetown and other parts of the Western Area; and

(ii) that it erred in law and in fact in finding that the Prosecution did not adduce any evidence that Kamara committed, ordered, planned, instigated or otherwise aided and abetted any other crimes committed in the Port Loko District and that the Prosecution did not prove any of the modes of individual responsibility against Kamara for the crimes committed in Port Loko District.

8260. para. 169: However, as the Appellants have been convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment of fifty (50) years and forty-five (45) years for crimes committed under Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute in Bombali District and in the Western Area, the Appeals Chamber is of the opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, particularly having regard to the length of the sentences imposed, that it becomes an academic exercise and also pointless to adjudicate further on minute details raised in Grounds One and Three of the Prosecution's Appeal.

(vi) The "Enslavement Crimes" as Acts of Terror and Collective Punishment

8261. para. 171: In its Fifth Ground of Appeal the Prosecution complains in substance that in the particular factual context of the case the Trial Chamber erred in law in holding that the three enslavement crimes were not acts of terrorism and also were not collective punishments.

8262. para. 172: The Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that the Prosecution's attempt to search for further acts of terrorism by adding the three enslavement crimes to this list is an unnecessary exercise since the Appellants have already been convicted of acts of terrorism and an adequate sentence has been imposed.

8264. para. 174: The Appeals Chamber exercises its discretion not to entertain the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal and therefore it is dismissed in its entirety.

(vii) Article 6(1) Responsibility for Murder and Extermination in Bombali District

8265. para. 231: In respect of Brima's Fifth Ground of Appeal, the Appeals Chamber repeats its opinion in regard to Grounds Four and Six, as Ground Five of Brima's Appeal has the same defects as those other two Grounds.

8266. para. 232: For the reasons stated in respect of those Grounds, Ground Five of Brima's Appeal must also fail.

(viii) Findings of Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.1 of the Statute

i. Pleadings – Findings of Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.1 of the Statute 8267. para. 298: In his Ninth Ground of Appeal, Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting him under Article 6(1) for planning the commission of sexual slavery (Count 9), the conscription and use of children for military purposes (Count 12), and abductions and forced labour (Count 13). The Trial Chamber held that Kanu "planned, organised and implemented the system to abduct and enslave civilians which was committed by AFRC troops in Bombali and Western Area." It further held that Kanu "had the direct intent to establish and implement the system of exploitation involving the three enslavement crimes, namely, sexual slavery, conscription and use of children under the age of 15 for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour." The Trial Chamber was, therefore, satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Kanu bore individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) for planning the commission of the above crimes in the Bombali District and the Western Area.

8268. para. 299: Kanu argues that while the evidence shows that it fell upon him, as Chief of Staff, to manage the system of slavery within the AFRC faction, he could not be convicted on that basis for planning the crimes of sexual slavery, conscription and use of children for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour. He further argues that at best, the evidence implicates him at the execution stage in the military training of children and the exploitation of women for sexual purposes.

8269. para. 300: The Prosecution responds that Kanu's position of influence in the AFRC and his admission that he managed this system of slavery amply justify a reasonable inference that he was involved in planning the above crimes.

ii. Discussion - Findings of Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.1 of the Statute 8270. para. 301: The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber's definition of planning under Article 6(1). The Trial Chamber stated that " 'planning' implies that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases." Circumstantial evidence may provide proof of the existence of a plan, and an individual may incur responsibility for planning when his level of participation is substantial even though the crime may have actually been committed by another person. According to the Trial Chamber, the actus reus for planning requires that "the accused, alone or together with others, designated [sic] the criminal conduct constituting the crimes charged." While "there must be a sufficient link between the planning of a crime both at the preparatory and the execution phases," it is "sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct." The Trial Chamber further stated that the mens rea "requires that the accused acted with direct intent in relation to his or her own planning or with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed … in the execution of that plan."

8271. para. 302: With regard to sexual slavery, the Trial Chamber found that:

> "In Bombali District the Accused Kanu designed and implemented a system to control abducted girls and women. All abducted women and girls were placed in the custody of the Accused. Any soldier who wanted an abducted girl or woman to be his "wife" had to 'sign for her'. The Accused informed his fighters that any problems with the women were to be immediately reported back to him, and that he would then monitor the situation. The Accused issued a disciplinary instruction ordering that any woman caught with another woman's husband should be beaten and locked in a box."

On the basis of this evidence, the Trial Chamber was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Kanu was responsible for planning the commission of the crime of sexual slavery in the Bombali District and the Western Area. The Appeals Chamber agrees.

8272. para. 303: The Appeals Chamber now turns to the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the conscription and use of children for military purposes, as well as abductions and forced labour in the Bombali District and the Western Area. In the case of Bombali District, the Trial Chamber found that Kanu was in charge of forced military training of civilians at Camp Rosos and that children below the age of 15 years were among those forced to undergo training. On the basis of this evidence, the Trial Chamber was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that in the Bombali District Kanu was not only responsible for planning the conscription of children under the age of 15 into an armed group, but also for using such children to participate actively in hostilities, as well as for the crime of enslavement.

8274. para. 305: Finally, the Appeals Chamber finds that the evidence led before the Trial Chamber warrants an examination of Kanu's responsibility for aiding and abetting the commission of sexual slavery and forced labour in Newton in the Western Area. The Appeals Chamber notes that witness TF1-334, whom the Trial Chamber found to be credible and reliable, stated that Kanu was responsible for the women and girls in the camp at Newton. AFRC soldiers reported to Kanu if they had any problems with the women and girls. The Trial Chamber found that while the women were helping with the cooking, "the 'girls' were sleeping with the 'commanders.' " The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that in this position of responsibility regarding the women and girls at Newton, Kanu provided practical assistance to a system of sexual slavery and forced labour. The Appeals Chamber is further satisfied that Kanu was aware that his acts would assist in the implementation of this system of sexual slavery and forced labour. In light of the above evidence, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that Kanu aided and abetted the commission of sexual slavery and forced labour in the Western Area. Thus, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to convict Kanu for aiding and abetting the commission of sexual slavery and forced labour in the Western Area.

8275. para. 306: The Appeals Chamber upholds the conviction of Kanu for planning the commission of sexual slavery in the Bombali District and upholds the conviction of Kanu for planning the commission of sexual slavery in the Western Area and further upholds the Trial Chamber's convictions for planning the conscription and use of children for military purposes as well as abductions and forced labour in the Bombali District and the Western Area. The Appeals Chamber furthermore finds that there is sufficient evidence that Kanu aided and abetted the commission of the said crimes. However, as he has already been convicted of planning those crimes the question of convicting him on the basis of aiding and abetting does not arise.

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Samuel Hinga Norman, Moinina Fofana, and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-03-14-I, Indictment, 4 February 2004

(a) General Allegations

8276. At all times relevant to this Indictment, a state of armed conflict existed in Sierra Leone. For the purposes of this Indictment the organized armed factions involved in this conf1ict included the Civil Defence Forces (CDF) fighting against the combined forces of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) and the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC).[403]

8277. A nexus existed between the armed conflict and all acts or omissions charged herein as Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II and as Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.[404]

8278. The CDF was an organized armed force comprising various tribally-based traditional hunters. The Kamajors were comprised mainly of persons from the Mende tribe resident in the South and East of Sierra Leone, and were the predominant group within the CDF. Other groups playing a less dominant role were the Gbethis and the Kapras, both comprising mainly of Temnes from the north; the Tamaboros, comprising mainly of Korankos also from the north; and the Donsos, comprising mainly of Konos from the east.[405]

8279. The RUF was founded about 1988 or 1989 in Libya and began organized armed operations in Sierra Leone in or about March 1991. The AFRC was founded by members of the Armed Forces of Sierra Leone who seized power from the elected government of Sierra Leone via a coup d'etat on 25 May 1997. Soldiers of the Sierra Leone Army comprised the majority of the AFRC membership. Shortly after the AFRC seized power, the RUF joined with the AFRC.[406]

8280. The ACCUSED and all members of the CDF were required to abide by International Humanitarian Law and the laws and customs governing the conduct of armed conflicts, including the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, to which the Republic of Sierra Leone acceded on 21 October 1986.[407]

8281. All offences charged herein were committed within the territory of Sierra Leone after 30 November 1996.[408]

8282. All acts or omissions charged herein as Crimes Against Humanity were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against the civilian population of Sierra Leone.[409]

8283. The words civilian or civilian population used in this indictment refer to persons who took no active part in the hostilities, or were no longer taking an active part in the hostilities.[410]

(b) Individual Criminal Responsibility

8284. Paragraphs 4 through 11 are incorporated by reference.[411]

8285. At all times relevant to this Indictment, SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN was the National Coordinator of the CDF. As such he was the principal force in establishing, organizing, supporting, providing logistical support, and promoting the CDF. He was also the Leader and Commander of the Kamajors and as such had de jure and de facto command and control over the activities and operations of the Kamajors.[412]

8286. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MOININA FOFANA was the National Director of War of the CDF and ALLIEU KONDEWA was the High Priest of the CDF. As such, together with SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA were seen and known as the top leaders of the CDF. MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA took directions from and were directly answerable to SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN. They took part in policy, planning and operational decisions of the CDF.[413]

8287. MOININA FOFANA acted as leader of the CDF in the absence of SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN and was regarded as the second in command. As National Director of War, he had direct responsibility for implementing policy and strategy for prosecuting the war. He liaised with field commanders, supervised and monitored operations. He gave orders to and received reports about operations from subordinate commanders, and he provided them with logistics including supply of arms and ammunition. In addition to the duties listed above at the national CDF level, MOININA FOFANA commanded one battalion of Kamajors.[414]

8288. ALLIEU KONDEWA, as High Priest had supervision and control over all initiators within the CDF and was responsible for all initiations within the CDF, including the initiation of children under the age of 15 years. Furthermore, he frequently led or directed operations and had direct command authority over units within the CDF responsible for carrying out special missions.[415]

8289. SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, as National Coordinator of the CDF and Commander of the Kamajors knew and approved the recruiting, enlisting, conscription, initiation, and training of Kamajors, including children below the age of 15 years. SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN; MOININA FOFANA, as the National Director of War of the CDF; and ALLIEU KONDEWA, as the High Priest of the CDF, knew and approved the use of children to participate actively in hostilities.[416]

8290. In the positions referred to in the aforementioned paragraphs, SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA, individually or in concert, exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the CDF.[417]

8291. The plan, purpose or design of SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA, ALLIEU KONDEWA and subordinate members of the CDF was to use any means necessary to defeat the RUF/AFRC forces and to gain and exercise control over the territory of Sierra Leone. This included gaining complete control over the population of Sierra Leone and the complete elimination of the RUF I AFRC, its supporters, sympathizers, and anyone who did not actively resist the RUF/AFRC occupation of Sierra Leone. Each Accused acted individually and in concert with subordinates, to carry out the said plan, purpose or design.[418]

8292. SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA, by their acts or omissions are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6.1. of the Statute for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute as alleged in this indictment, which crimes each of them planned, instigated, ordered, committed, or in whose planning, preparation or execution each Accused otherwise aided and abetted, or which crimes were within a common purpose, plan or design in which each Accused participated or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the common purpose, plan or design in which each Accused participated.[419]

(c) Charges

8293. Paragraphs 4 through 21 are incorporated by reference.[420]

2. Trial Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-T, Judgement, 2 August 2007

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

a. Committing – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8294. para. 204: The Chamber notes that the Prosecution charges the Accused pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute with committing the crimes referred to in the Indictment. [247]

8295. para. 205: Consistent with established jurisprudence, the Chamber adopts the definition of "committing" a crime as "physically perpetrating a crime or engendering a culpable omission in violation of criminal law". [248] The actus reus for committing a crime consists of the proscribed act of participation, physical or otherwise direct, in a crime provided for in the Statute, through positiveacts or culpable omissions, whether individually or jointly with others.[249] The Chamber takes the view that the mens rea requirement for committing a crime is satisfied if the Prosecution proves that the Accused acted with intent to commit the crime, or with the reasonable knowledge that the crime would likely occur as a consequence of his conduct.

b. Committing through Participation in a Joint Criminal Enterprise – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8296. para. 206: The Indictment charges the Accused with participating in a common purpose, plan or design. The Chamber notes that the phrases "common purpose doctrine" on the one hand, and "joint criminal enterprises" on the other have been used interchangeably in the international jurisprudence and they refer to one and the same thing. The latter term, which this Chamber adopts, refers to the same form of liability as that known as the common purpose doctrine or liability.[250]

8297. para. 207: For the Court to exercise its jurisdiction on the basis of this form of liability, it must conclude that, even though Article 6(1) does not make a specific reference to joint criminal enterprise, it is indeed included in Article 6(1) as a means of "committing".[251]

8298. para. 208: The Chamber adopts the position that, although "committing" in Article 6(1) of the Statute "covers first and foremost the physical perpetration of a crime by the offender himself, or the culpable omission of an act that was mandated by a rule of criminal law,"[252] the verb "commit" is sufficiently protean in nature as to include participation in a joint criminal enterprise to commit the crime.[253] The view that "committing" also describes participation in a joint criminal enterprise is reinforced "to the extent that, insofar as a participant shares the purpose of the joint criminal enterprise (as he or she must do) as opposed to merely knowing about it, he or she cannot be regarded as a mere aider and abettor to the crime which is contemplated".[254] The Chamber also recalls that this mode of liability has been routinely applied in the jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals.[255] The Chamber is therefore satisfied that individual criminal responsibility for participation in a joint criminal enterprise to commit a crime over which the Court has jurisdiction is included with in Article 6(1) of the Statute.[256]

8300. para. 210: The jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals has identified the following three categories of joint criminal enterprise:

> The first category is a "basic" form of joint criminal enterprise. It is represented by cases where all co-perpetrators, acting pursuant to a common purpose, possess the same criminal intention. An example is a plan formulated by the participants in the joint criminal enterprise to kill where, although each of the participants may carry out a different role, each of them. has the intent to kill.
> The second category is a "systemic" form of joint criminal enterprise. It is a variant of the basic form, characterised by the existence of an organised system of ill-treatment. An example is extermination or concentration camps, in which the prisoners are killed or mistreated pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise.
> The third category is an "extended" form of joint criminal enterprise. It concerns cases involving a common purpose to commit a crime where one of the > perpetrators commits an act which, while outside the common purpose, is nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of the effecting of that common purpose. An example is a common purpose or plan on the part of a group to forcibly remove at gun-point members of one ethnicity from their town, village or region (to effect "ethnic cleansing") with the consequence that, in the course of doing so, one or more of the victims is shot and killed. While murder may not have been explicitly acknowledged to be part of the common purpose, it was nevertheless foreseeable that the forcible removal of civilians at gunpoint might well result in the deaths of one or more of those civilians. [258]

8301. para. 211: In the present case, however, the pleading in the Indictment is limited to an alternative pleading of the first and third categories of joint criminal enterprise.

8302. para. 212: Regardless of the category at issue or the charge under consideration, the actus reus of the participant in a joint criminal enterprise is common to each of the three above-mentioned categories and comprises three requirements.[259]

8304. para. 214: Second, the existence of a common purpose which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided for in the Statute is required. [262] There is no need for this purpose to have been previously arranged or formulated. It may materialise extemporaneously and be inferred from the facts.[263]

8305. para. 215: Third, the participation of the Accused in the common purpose is required.[264] "This participation need not involve the commission of a specific crime under one of the provisions (for example murder, extermination, torture or rape), but may take the form of assistance in, or contribution to, the execution of the common purpose."[265] It must be shown that the plurality of persons acted in concert with each other in the implementation of a common purpose.[266] As to the required extent of the participation, the Prosecution need not demonstrate that the Accused's participation is necessary or substantial, but the Accused must at least have made a significant contribution to the crimes for which he is held responsible. [267]

8306. para. 216: The principal perpetrator need not be a member of the joint criminal enterprise, but may be used as a tool by one of the members of the joint criminal enterprise. The Chamber adopts the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Brdjanin et al., that "where the principal perpetrator is not shown to belong to the JCE, the trier of fact must further establish that the crime can be imputed to at least one member of the joint criminal enterprise, and that this member - when using the principal perpetrator - acted in accordance with the common plan". [268]

8307. para. 217: The mens rea requirements for liability under the first and third categories of joint criminal enterprise, which are pleaded in the Indictment, are different.

8308. para. 218: In the first category of joint criminal enterprise the Accused must intend to commit the crime and intend to participate in a common plan whose object was the commission of the crime.[269] The intent to commit the crime must be shared by all participants in the joint criminal enterprise. [270]

8309. para. 219: The mens rea for the third category of joint criminal enterprise is two-fold: in the first place, the Accused must have had the intention to take part in and contribute to the common purpose. In the second place, responsibility under the third category of joint criminal enterprise for a crime that was committed beyond the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise, but which was "a natural and foreseeable consequence thereof", arises only if the Prosecution proves that the Accused had sufficient knowledge that the additional crime was a natural and foreseeable consequence to him in particular.[271] The Accused must also know that the crime which was not part of the common purpose, but which was nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of it, might be perpetrated by a member of the group (or by a person used by the Accused or another member of the group).[272] The Accused must willingly take the risk that the crime might occur by joining or continuing to participate in the enterprise.[273] The Chamber can only find that the Accused has the requisite intent "if this is the only reasonable inference on the evidence". [274]

c. Planning – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8311. para. 220: The Prosecution charges the Accused pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute with planning the crimes referred to in the Indictment.[275]

8312. para. 221: The Chamber adopts the view of the various Chambers of the Ad Hoc Tribunals which have consistently stated that "planning" a crime implies that one or several persons plan or design the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases.[276] The Chamber agrees with the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Kordic and Cerkez case that the actus reus of planning a crime requires that one or more persons design the criminal conduct constituting one or more crimes provided for in the Statute, which are later perpetrated.[277] "It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct."[278] The Chamber is of the opinion that the mens rea requirement for planning an act or omission is satisfied if the Prosecution proves that the Accused acted with an intent that a crime provided for in the Statute be committed or with reasonable knowledge that the crime would likely be committed in the execution of that plan.

d. Instigating – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8313. para. 222: The Prosecution charges the Accused pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute with instigating the crimes referred to in the Indictment.[279]

8314. para. 223: The Chamber is of the view that "instigating" a crime means urging, encouraging or "prompting another to commit an offence".[280] The actus reus required for instigating a crime is an act or omission, covering both express and implied conduct of the Accused, [281] which is shown to be a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[282] A causal relationship between the instigation and the perpetration of the crime must be demonstrated; although it is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have occurred without the Accused's involvement.[283] To establish the mens rea requirement for "instigating" a crime, the Prosecution must prove that the Accused intended to provoke or induce the commission of the crime, or had reasonable knowledge that a crime would likely be committed as a result of that instigation.

e. Ordering – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8316. para. 225: The Chamber takes the view that the actus reus of "ordering" a crime requires that a person who is in a position of authority orders a person in a subordinate position to commit an offence.[285] It is our opinion that no formal superior-subordinate relationship between the superior and the subordinate is required. It is sufficient that there is proof of some position of authority on the part of the Accused that would compel another to commit a crime in compliance with the Accused's order.[286] Such authority can be de jure or de facto and can be reasonably implied.[287] The Chamber is of the view that a "causal link between the act of ordering and the physical perpetration of a crime [...] also needs to be demonstrated as part of the actus reus of ordering" but that this "link need not be such as to show that the offence would not have been perpetrated in the absence of the order."[288]

8317. para. 226: The Chamber finds that to establish the mens rea requirement for "ordering" a crime, the Prosecution must prove that the Accused either intended to bring about the commission of the crime or that the Accused had reasonable knowledge that the crime would likely be committed as a consequence of the execution or implementation of that order.

f. Aiding and Abetting – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8319. para. 228: It is the view of the Chamber that "aiding and abetting" consists of the act of rendering practical assistance, encouragement or moral support, which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of a certain crime.[290] "Aiding and abetting" can include providing assistance, helping, encouraging, advising, or being sympathetic to the commission of a particular act by the principal offender.[291]

8321. para. 230: Mere presence at the scene of a crime will not usually constitute aiding and abetting. Where, however, such presence provides encouragement or support to the principal offender, that may be sufficient. For example, the presence of a person with superior authority at the scene of a principal crime may be probative to determining whether such person encouraged or supported the principal perpetrator.[295] The Chamber also notes that a superior's failure to punish for past crimes might result in acts that would constitute instigation or aiding and abetting for further crimes.[296]

8322. para. 231: The Chamber recognises that the mens rea of aiding and abetting is the knowledge that the acts performed by the Accused assist the commission of the crime by the principal offender.[297] Such knowledge may be inferred from all relevant circumstances. [298] The Accused need not share the mens rea of the principal offender, but he must be aware of the principal offender's intention.[299] In the case of specific intent offences, the aider and abettor must have knowledge that the principal offender possessed the specific intent required.[300] The aider and abettor, however, need not know the precise crime that is intended by the principal offender. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed by the principal offender, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, then he has intended to assist or facilitate the commission of that crime, and may be guilty of aiding and abetting.[301]

g. Conviction under Article 6.1. and Article 6.3. of the Statute – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1.

8323. para. 251: The Chamber takes the view that where the Indictment charges the Accused with both Article 6(1) and Article 6(3) responsibility under the same count, and where the legal requirements pertaining to both of these heads of responsibility are met, a Trial Chamber may only enter a conviction on the basis of Article 6(1).[347]

(ii) President Kabbah's Role in the Conflict

8324. para. 705: As has been briefly mentioned in the introduction of this Judgement, persistent references and allusions were made by the Defence Team in the course of the proceedings that have preceded this Judgement, to President Kabbah and his alleged involvement in the conflict on the side of the CDF.

8325. para. 706: In this regard, and again as well mentioned in passing in the introduction of this Judgement, the Chamber recalls that the three Accused Persons all along in the course of these proceedings, raised a veiled Defence that all they did and stand charged for was as a result of their struggle to restore to power, President Kabbah's democratically elected government that had been ousted in a coup d'Etat by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) on the 25th of May 1997.

8328. para. 709: In February/March 1997, the then Vice President, Albert Joe Demby, organised two meetings to address military dissatisfaction over rice distributions because while senior officers were receiving only one bag for every two officers. A plan to reduce the rice rations provoked discontent and unrest in the Army.[1536]

8330. para. 711: Peter Penfold the British High Commissioner to Sierra Leone, the American Ambassador John Hirsh and the UN Special Representative, Ambassador Berhanu Dinka, in a meeting with President Kabbah, warned him of a possible coup against his government. He told them that he had already heard about that coup and that he would be talking to the Military.[1538]

8332. para. 713: Like the Ambassadors who preceded him, Norman told President Kabbah that there was an imminent plot to overthrow him but that the coup d'Etat may not be deadly or destructive without those parts of the weapons. On the 5th of May 1997, President Kabbah told Norman that he returned the contents of the bag to the Chief of Defence Staff and the Army Chief, late Brigadier Hassan Conteh and late Max Kanga. Norman then told President Kabbah that the coup d'Etat against his government could not be averted.

8334. para. 715: He bought a satellite phone for Norman's use to report to him regularly on the progress of the war. He continued to provide logistics support to the Kamajors and their leaders. Samuel Hinga Norman, Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa who were involved in the delegation from Bonthe, went to Freetown to see President Kabbah amongst others to complain about lootings and killings by Kamajors. The President sent 100 bags of rice to the Kamajors in Bonthe Town.[1539]

8335. para. 716: In view of the international recognition accorded to his Government, President Kabbah made it possible for the Economic Community of West African States through ECOMOG to provide military assistance to the CDF to enable it attain the objective of restoring his ousted Government to power. Indeed ECOMOG fought alongside the CDF Kamajor forces against the combined forces of the RUF and of the AFRC as the war raged inside the country for control of areas occupied by enemy forces.

8336. para. 717: It is also on record that Lady Patricia Kabbah gave the sum of $10,000US to Hon. Meme Momoh Pujoh to be conveyed to late Norman for use as part of logistical support to the fighters particularly the amphibious Kassilla battalion in Bonthe. She said that she was very proud of them. She even promised them that she was communicating by a letter and that she would give further offers.[1540]

8339. para. 720: In a second meeting held in Bo and at which prominent dignitaries were in attendance, President Kabbah told the Kamajors he would return and give them all medals. He left two sample medals at the Hall.[1543]

(iii) Towns of Tongo Field

8340. para. 721: The Chamber outlines below, the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.3.2 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) Base Zero existed as the headquarters for the CDF High Command from about 15 September 1997 to 10 March 1998. Norman, as the National Coordinator, Fofana, as the National Director of War, and Kondewa, as the High Priest, were the key and essential components of the leadership structure of the organisation. They were the executives of the CDF actually taking the decisions, while nobody else could take a decision in their absence. They were the leaders of the CDF and all the Kamajors looked up to them.

(ii) Base Zero was a central storage and distribution site for all of the CDF's logistics. Commanders came to Base Zero from every group and location in the country to take instructions from the High Command or Norman and to receive logistics. Reports were being delivered to Base Zero from the frontlines. Thousands of civilians and Kamajors travened to Base Zero for initiation and military training. Although the COF was a cohesive force under one central command, there were some fighters who acted on their own without the knowledge of central command. Commanders' authority to discipline their men on the ground was entirely their own.

(iii) Norman, Fofana, Kondewa, Mohamed Orinco Moosa, Joseph Koroma, Lamin Ngobeh, Albert J Nallo and die battalion commanders made strategic war decisions of determining when and where to go to war.

(iv) Fofana in his capacity as Director of War at Base Zero planned and executed the war strategies and received frontline reports from the commanders. In executing these functions he was largely assisted by Albert J Nallo and on occasion Fofana passed on his responsibilities to Nallo. These war strategies did not include the commission of criminal acts, such as killing of civilians or looting.

(v) Fofana selected commanders to go to battle and could, on occasion, issue direct orders to these commanders. For example, he issued the order to Joe Tamidey not to release captured vehicles and other items to any other person until they are registered with the CDF Headquarters. Fofana was responsible for the receipt and provision of ammunitions at Base Zero to the commanders upon the instruction of Norman.

(vi) Fofana was seen as having power and authority at Base Zero and was the overall boss of the commanders at Base Zero.

(vii) Kondewa in his capacity as High Priest was in charge of the initiations at Base Zero and was the head of all the CDF initiators in the country. The Kamajors believed in mystical powers of the initiators, especially Kondewa, and that the process of the initiation and immunisation would make them

"bullet-proof'. The Kamajors looked up to Kondewa and admired the man with such powers. They believed that he was capable of transferring his powers to them to protect them. By virtue of these powers Kondewa had command over the Kamajors in the country. He never went to the war front himself, but whenever a Kamajor was going to war, Kondewa would give his advice and blessings, as well as the medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against bullets. No Kamajor would go to war without Kondewa's blessings.

(viii) Kondewa attended passing out parades at Base Zero, which signified that the Kamajors had passed their training and could present their skills. He, along with Norman and Mbogba, signed a training certificate, which each trainee received after the training.

(ix) On 16 November 1997 TF2-079 prepared a situation report on events occurring between 19 September and 13 November 1997 in Zone II Operational Frontline which included Lower Bambara and Dodo Chiefdoms. It requested arms and ammunitions and described attacks which had been launched in the area. It also narrated crimes which were committed by Kamajors in that area. The report was endorsed by Musa Junisa, the then Commander-in-chief of Zone II Operational Frontline and Mohamed Orinco Moosa, his deputy. TF2-079, Junisa and Moosa with 100 other Kamajors then travelled to Base Zero. At Base Zero they gave the report first to Fofana and then to Norman. Norman commended their efforts and told them that a good number of that group should return to the area with another senior commander to keep the area strong and only a few of them should remain at Base Zero to await ammunitions. Seven people, including Moosa and TF2-079 stayed at Base Zero.

(x) At a passing out parade at Base Zero between 10 and 12 December 1997 Norman gave instructions for the Tongo and Black December operations. Norman said that the attack on T ongo would determine who wins the war. He also said that there was no place to keep captured prisoners like the juntas, let alone their collaborators. He directed the Kamajors that instead of wasting their bullets, to chop off the left hand of any captured junta as a signal to any group that would want to seize power through the barrels of the gun and not the ballot paper. He also told the fighters not to spare the houses of the juntas. After hearing Norman's instructions, Fofana addressed the Kamajors saying that any commander failing to perform accordingly and "losing your own ground", should kill himself and not come to report to Base Zero. Then all the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with a mystic power, and he gave the last comment saying that the time for the surrender of rebels had long been exhausted and that they did not need any surrendered rebels. He then gave his blessings.

the meeting contributed to the discussion, including Fofana and Kondewa. Norman then ordered Fofana to provide logistics for the operation.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Towns of Tongo Field

8341. para. 722: Based on the above evidence the Chamber finds that Fofana's speech at the passing out parade in December 1997 when the attack on Tongo was discussed was clearly an encouragement and support of Norman's instructions to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses. At this parade Fofana, as Director of War, addressed the fighters immediately after the National Coordinator for the CDF had given his instructions about Tongo. Fofana not only encouraged the Kamajors to follow Norman's unlawful orders to commit criminal acts but also told them that if they failed to perform accordingly, they should not come back to Base Zero to report but to kill themselves rather than losing their own ground. As found by the Chamber above, those Kamajors who then proceeded to attack Tongo not only received a direction from Norman to commit specific criminal acts, they also had a clear encouragement and support from Fofana, as one of their leaders, to commit such acts.

8342. para. 723: The Chamber is satisfied that Fofana's speech had a substantial effect on the perpetration of those criminal acts. Although this speech was given by Fofana at Base Zero in December 1997, prior to the commission of the criminal acts by Kamajors in Tongo in January 1998, the Chamber finds that the Accused is liable for aiding and abetting even when his conduct occurred before the principal crime had been perpetrated and at a location geographically removed from that of the principal crime.[1544]

8343. para. 724: The Chamber observes that in order to make a finding that Fofana aided and abetted in the commission of the alleged crimes it is irrelevant whether he shared the intent of the perpetrators. Similarly, the Chamber need not examine whether Fofana knew of the precise crime that was intended by the principal perpetrator. However, the Chamber is satisfied that Fofana was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed by the Kamajors and that one of those crimes was in fact committed. The Chamber finds that Fofana knew of Norman's orders that the Kamajors were to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses. The Chamber finds that, based on his awareness that the Kamajors who operated in the towns of Tongo Field had previously engaged in criminal conduct, which had been reported to Base Zero,[1545] Fofana knew that it was probable that the Kamajors would commit at least one of these acts in compliance with the instructions issued. With this knowledge and his knowledge of the orders given by Norman, the National Coordinator, Fofana encouraged and supported the Kamajors in their actions, in consequence of which they committed acts of killing and infliction of physical suffering or injury in Tongo, as found by the Chamber above.

8344. para. 725: The Chamber further finds that Fofana was present and contributed to the discussion at the subsequent commanders' meeting in December 1997 at Base Zero where plans to attack Tongo were discussed. At this meeting Norman further reiterated, clarified and expanded his unlawful orders, which now included looting, to the Kamajor commanders from Tongo. In the absence of any evidence showing how Fofana contributed to the discussion and decision at this meeting the Chamber finds that in the circumstances there is no evidence to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana either planned the commission of this additional crime of looting or that he aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of this additional crime in Tongo.

8345. para. 726: The Chamber notes that Fofana was ordered by Norman to provide logistics to the commanders from Tongo following this meeting. The Chamber observes that no specifications have been provided as to what these logistics consisted of. Although at this stage Fofana knew that the order to attack Tongo included not only instructions to kill, inflict physical suffering or injury or destroy houses, but also to loot, it is not the only reasonable inference that the logistics provided by Fofana were used to commit those specific crimes in Tongo or that such provision of logistics had a substantial effect upon the perpetration of these specific crimes in Tongo. The Chamber finds that this action by Fofana did not constitute further aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the criminal acts committed by Kamajors in Tongo subsequently.

8347. para. 728: With respect to Count 7, the Chamber recalls that for specific intent crimes, the aider and abettor must have knowledge of the specific intent of the perpetrator to commit such crimes. The Chamber finds that the specific intent to impose a punishment on persons for acts or omissions they have not committed can reasonably be inferred from the circumstances that existed at the time and in particular from Norman's order. The Chamber therefore finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana was aware of the required specific intent to punish collectively.

8348. para. 729: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts alleged in the Indictment were in fact committed in the towns of Tongo Field. However, the Chamber finds that such acts were not included in Norman's order. Therefore, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana aided and abetted in the preparation of all the other criminal acts, such as infliction of mental harm or suffering and looting, which we found were committed by the Kamajors in the towns of Tongo Field during the second and third attacks.

8350. para. 731: With respect to Count 6, the Chamber recalls that for specific intent crimes, the aider and abettor must have knowledge of the specific intent of the perpetrator to commit such crimes. The Chamber finds that while spreading terror may have been Norman's primary purpose in issuing the order to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses, this is not the only reasonable inference that can be drawn from the evidence. As such the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had the requisite knowledge, an essential element of the crime of acts of terrorism.

8351. para. 732: In addition, the Chamber finds that no evidence has been adduced that Fofana planned, instigated, ordered or committed any of the other criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in the towns of Tongo Field during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

b. Responsibility of Kondewa – Towns of Tongo Field

8352. para. 735: The Chamber finds that at the passing out parade in December 1997 when the attack on Tongo was discussed Kondewa addressed the fighters as the High Priest after the National Coordinator and the Director of War had made their comments. All the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with mystic powers, and he made the last comment saying that the time for the surrender of rebels had long been exhausted and that they did not need any surrendered rebels. The Chamber finds that in uttering these words Kondewa effectively supported Norman's instructions and encouraged the Kamajors to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses. Kondewa then gave his blessings for these criminal acts as the High Priest. The Chamber notes that no fighter would go to war without Kondewa's blessings because they believed that Kondewa transferred his mystical powers to them and made them immune to bullets.

8353. para. 736: As found by the Chamber above, the Kamajors who then proceeded to attack Tongo not only received a direction from Norman to commit specific criminal acts, they also had encouragement and support from Kondewa through his blessing, as one of their leaders with mystical powers, to commit such acts. The Chamber is satisfied that Kondewa's words had a substantial effect on the perpetration of those criminal acts. Although Kondewa's speech was given at Base Zero in December 1997 prior to the commission of the criminal acts by Kamajors in Tongo in January 1998, the Chamber finds that the Accused is liable for aiding and abetting even when his conduct occurred before the principal crime had been perpetrated and at a location geographically removed from that of the principal crime.

8354. para. 737: The Chamber observes that in order to make a finding that Kondewa aided and abetted in the commission of the alleged crimes it is irrelevant whether he shared the intent of the perpetrators. Similarly, the Chamber need not examine whether Kondewa knew of the precise crime that was intended by the principal perpetrator. However, the Chamber should be satisfied that Kondewa was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed by the Kamajors and that one of those crimes was in fact committed. The Chamber finds that Kondewa knew of Norman's orders that the Kamajors were to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses. The Chamber finds that, based on his awareness that the Kamajors who operated in the towns of Tongo Field had previously engaged in criminal conduct, which had been reported to Base Zero,[1547] Kondewa knew that it was probable that the Kamajors would commit at least one of these acts in compliance with the instructions issued. With this knowledge and his knowledge of the orders given by the National Coordinator, Kondewa encouraged and supported the Kamajors in their actions, in consequence of which they committed acts of killing and infliction of physical suffering or injury in the towns of Tongo Field, as was found by the Chamber above.

8355. para. 738: We further find that Kondewa was present and contributed to the discussion at the subsequent commanders' meeting in December 1997 at Base Zero where plans to attack

Tongo were discussed. At this meeting Norman further reiterated, clarified and expanded his unlawful orders, which now included looting, to the Kamajor commanders from Tongo. In the absence of any evidence showing how Kondewa contributed to the discussion and decision at this meeting, the Chamber finds that in the circumstances there is no evidence to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa either planned the commission of this additional crime of looting or that he aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of this additional crime in Tongo.

8357. para. 740: With respect to Count 7, the Chamber recalls that for specific intent crimes, the aider and abettor must have knowledge of the specific intent of the perpetrator to commit such crimes. The Chamber finds that the specific intent to impose a punishment on persons for acts or omissions they have not committed can reasonably be inferred from the circumstances that existed at the time and in particular from Norman's order. The Chamber therefore finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa was aware of the required specific intent to punish collectively.

8358. para. 741: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts alleged in the Indictment were in fact committed in the towns of Tongo Field. However, the Chamber finds that such acts were not included in Norman's order. Therefore, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa aided and abetted in the preparation of all the other criminal acts, such as infliction of mental harm or suffering and looting, which we found were committed by the Kamajors in the towns of T ongo Field during the second and third attacks.

8359. para. 742: Under the sub-heading "Counts - towns of Tongo Field", the Chamber will therefore examine only those particular criminal acts that were explicitly included in Norman's order.

8360. para. 743: With respect to Count 6, the Chamber recalls that for specific intent crimes, the aider and abettor must have knowledge of the specific intent of the perpetrator to commit such crimes. The Chamber finds that while spreading terror may have been Norman's primary purpose in issuing the order to kill captured enemy combatants and "collaborators", to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses, this is not the only reasonable inference that can be drawn from the evidence. As such the Chamber finds that it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had the requisite knowledge, an essential element of the crime of acts of terrorism.

8361. para. 744: In addition, the Chamber finds that no evidence has been adduced that Kondewa planned, instigated, ordered or committed any of the other criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in the towns of Tongo Field during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

c. Counts – Towns of Tongo Field

8362. para. 747: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in the towns of Tongo Field during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber will not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

8363. para. 748: The Chamber observes that the allegations against Fofana and Kondewa for criminal acts alleged to have been committed by the Kamajors in the towns of Tongo Field are identical. The evidence relied on by the Chamber to make its factual findings on the criminal acts committed by Kamajors in these locations are also identical. While the Chamber has dealt with the factual findings underlying each count together, it has considered the individual criminal liability of each Accused, with respect to each count, separately.

i. Count 2: Murder – Counts – Towns of Tongo Field

8364. para. 749: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana and Kondewa are individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1), for the unlawful killing of an unknown number of civilians and captured enemy combatants at or near Tongo Field and at or near the towns of Lalehun, Kamboma, Konia, Talama, Panguma and Sembehun, between about 1 November 1997 and 30 April 1998.1549

8365. para. 750: As set out above in Sections V.2.3.3 – V.2.3.7 of the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 2, Murder:

(i) In early January 1998, a 12 year-old boy named Foday Koroma was killed in Talama because he was related to a rebel from Tonga.

(ii) In early January 1998, 150 Loko, Limba and Temne tribe members were separated from members of other tribes and were killed in Talama.

(iii) On 14 January 1998, two men identified as rebels were killed by Kamabote at the NDMC Headquarters in Tonga.

(iv) On 14 January 1998, Kamabote killed a man named "Dr. Blood" and a woman named Fatrnata Kamara at the NDMC Headquarters in Tonga. Both were considered to be collaborators.

(v) On 14 January 1998, at the NDMC Headquarters in Tonga, two women identified more than 10 men as collaborators. These men were led by armed Kamajors to a place behind the Headquarters where cows were slaughtered. Two hundred others who had been identified as rebels were also led in the same direction.

(vi) On 14 January 1998, Kamajors took TF2-048's uncle, an unidentified woman and an unidentified child behind a house at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo. The Kamajors returned with blood on their machetes. These people have not been seen again.

(vii) On 15 January 1998, 20 men who had been accused of being rebels were hacked to death with machetes at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo.

(viii) Around noon on 15 January 1998, Kamajors shot at a crowd of civilians at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo. Many civilians were hit by stray bullets and at least one died.

(ix) On 15 January 1998, at an intersection near the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo, TF2-048' s brother was killed by a Kamajor.

(x) On 15 January 1998, Kamajors at a checkpoint hacked one man to death for carrying a photograph of a rebel.

(xi) On 15 January 1998, Kamajors at another checkpoint hacked a boy named Sule to death for carrying a wallet that resembled SLA fatigues.

(xii) Kamajors separated men and women in Bumie and killed five men after making them stare at the sun.

(xiii) Shortly after the third attack on Tongo, a group of 65 civilians was separated into two lines in Kamboma; the Kamajors shot the first 57 people and rolled the bodies into a swamp behind a house. The last eight people were hacked in the neck with machetes and rolled into the swamp with the other bodies. Only one man survived.

(xiv) In mid-February 1998, Aruna Konowa was killed in Lalehun, on the order of a Kamajor boss named Chief Baimba Aruna, because he was considered to be a collaborator.

(xv) A few days after the killing of Aruna Konowa, Brima Conteh was killed in Lalehun by Kamajors who accused him of being "the chief of the rebels".

8366. para. 751: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i) through (xv) and concludes that all of the perpetrators were Kamajors. We find that individuals were killed intentionally; in the majority of cases they were specifically targeted because of the perpetrator's belief that they were "collaborators" or rebels. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 750(i) - 750(iv) and 750(vi) - 750(xv) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to above in paragraph 750, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that they were killed and, furthermore, that the perpetrator knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

8368. para. 753: With respect to those incidents described in paragraph 750(i)750(iv) - 750(iv) and 750(vi) - 750(xv), above, the Chamber is satisfied not only that the general requirements of war crimes have been established but also that the specific elements of murder have been met with respect to each incident. However, the Chamber finds that the specific elements of the crime of murder have not been established with respect to paragraph 750*, as the conclusion that these people were killed is not the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the evidence. (*Note: this should probably read: paragraph 750(v))

ii. Count 4: Cruel Treatment – Counts – Towns of Tongo Field

8369. para. 754: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana and Kondewa are individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1), for the intentional infliction of serious physical harm and serious physical suffering on an unknown number of civilians in Tongo Field and the surrounding areas, between 1 November 1997 and 30 April 1998.[1550]

8370. para. 755: Additionally, the Prosecution alleges that Fofana and Kondewa are individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1), for the intentional infliction of serious mental harm and serious mental suffering on an unknown number of civilians in Tongo Field and the surrounding areas, between November 1997 and December 1999, through the following acts:

- screening for collaborators;
- unlawfully killing suspected collaborators, often in plain view of friends and relatives;
- illegal arrest and unlawful imprisonment of collaborators;
- the destruction of homes and other buildings;
- looting and threats to unlawfully kill, destroy or loot.[1551]

8371. para. 756: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 4, Cruel Treatment:

(i) On 14 January 1998, at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo, a Kamajor hacked at three people with a cutlass.

(ii) On 15 January 1998, at a checkpoint in Dodo, Kamajors hacked the right hand of a man they thought was a rebel.

(iii) Shortly after the third attack on Tongo, a group of 65 civilians was separated into two lines in Kamboma; 64 were killed. One man was hacked in the neck with a machete but survived.

(iv) Some time after escaping from a checkpoint in Panguma, Kamabote found TF2-035 in Ngiehun. On discovering that TF2-035 was a Limba, Kamabote ordered a child soldier named "Small Hunter" to kill TF2-035. Small Hunter shot TF2-035 five times; one bullet is still in his body.

8372. para. 757: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(iv) and concludes that all these acts were committed by Kamajors. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 756 (i) - (iv) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to above in paragraph 756, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

8373. para. 758: In light of the findings set out above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of cruel treatment have been established with respect to each incident described in paragraph 756.

iii. Count 7: Collective Punishments – Counts – Towns of Tongo Field

8376. para. 761: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced proves beyond reasonable doubt that the acts described in paragraph 750(i)750(iv) - 750(iv) and 750(vi) - 750(xv) [Count 2] and in paragraph 756 [Count 4] were perpetrated with the specific intent to punish the civilian population in Tongo Field and the surrounding areas.

8377. para. 762: The Chamber is therefore satisfied, in relation to those acts described in paragraph 750(i)750(iv) - 750(iv) and 750(vi) - 750(xv)and in paragraph 756, that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of collective punishments have been proved beyond reasonable doubt with respect to each incident.

d. Conclusion – Towns of Tongo Field

i. Responsibility of Fofana – Conclusion – Towns of Tongo Field

8378. para. 763: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting in the preparation of the crimes committed in the towns of Tongo Field as found under Counts 2, 4 and 7 above.

ii. Responsibility of Kondewa – Conclusion – Towns of Tongo Field

8379. para. 764: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting in the preparation of the crimes committed in the towns of Tongo Field as found under Counts 2, 4 and 7 above.

(iv) Koribondo

8380. para. 765: In addition to the facts listed above in paragraph 721 (i) to (viii), the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2,4.2, V.2,4.3, V.2,4,4 and V.2,4.6 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa with respect to Koribondo:

(i) At a passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998 Norman gave orders to the Kamajors to launch an "all-out offensive" in all the areas occupied by the Juntas and laid-down military instructions on how to conduct this operation.

(ii) Fofana addressed the Kamajors at this parade, confirming Norman's order to attack various junta-held territories. During this speech Fofana told the fighters to attack the villages where the juntas were located and "to destroy the soldiers from where they were [...] settled". He also said that the failure to take Koribondo was a disgrace to the Kamajors and that this time he wanted them to go and capture Koribondo.

(iii) Kondewa gave his blessings and the medicines which would make the fighters fearless if they did not spoil the law. He also said that all of his powers had been transferred to them to protect them, so that no cutlass would strike them and that they should not be afraid.

(iv) A subsequent commanders' meeting for Koribondo was held by Norman at Base Zero on the same day as the passing out parade, which had in attendance, among others, Fofana, Kondewa, Lamin Ngobeh, Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker and other commanders. Norman chose Joe Tamidey to lead the attack on Koribondo. Norman ordered that Koribondo should be taken "at all costs" because they had already spent a lot on Koribondo. Norman gave specific orders to the commanders to destroy or burn everything in Koribondo, except for a mosque, church, the Bani and the school. He also said that anyone left in town should be termed an enemy or a rebel since they had been forewarned and should be killed.

(v) At the same meeting Bobor Tucker's group was specifically ordered to reinforce the Bo-Koribondo Highway so that no one could come from Bo to help the juntas.

(vi) At the request of Joe Tamidey, Norman ordered Lumeh to provide Tamidey with ammunition, food and money. Bobor Tucker had reserve ammunitions from before that he used for the attack.

(vii) Norman met with NaIlo before the Koribondo and Bo attacks at Base Zero and gave him specific insttuctions for these two attacks, while Fofana was present. Norman told Nallo that the Kamajors had tried to capture Koribondo many times and that they had failed because the civilians had given their children to the juntas in marriage and thus they were all "spies and collaborators". Therefore, when he goes to Koribondo "anybody that was met there should be killed" and nothing should be left "not even a farm" or "a fowl". All houses were to be burnt, and he was given petrol for the job. Some specific names were mentioned. Shekou Gbao, the driver, should be killed and his compound be burnt because he was giving his vehicle to the juntas. The house of Mike Lamin's father was also to be burnt, because Mike Lamin was a RUF. Mr Biyo, a driver, should have his compound burnt as well. Although Joe Tamidey was appointed by Norman to lead the attack on Koribondo, he and the other commanders involved in that attack were all under Nallo's overall command.

(viii) Fofana as Director of War and one of the leaders at Base Zero was the superior of Nallo by virtue of Nallo's positions in the hierarchical structure of the organisation that existed at Base Zero. Nallo was the Deputy National Director of Operations and the Regional Director of Operations for the Southern Region, which included Districts of Bo, Moyamba, Pujehun and Bonthe. In his capacity as Deputy National Director of Operations, Nallo was responsible for transmitting general and specific insttuctions from Norman to the warfront commanders, for collecting reports he received from the frontline upon his visits and transmitting them to Fofana before presenting them to Norman, and bringing arms and ammunitions to the fighters.

(ix) As Regional Director of Operations Nallo was responsible for implementing commands he received from Base Zero with his commanders. In implementing those commands he did not distinguish between the lawful and unlawful orders and did not recognise that he had discretion to implement them or not.

(x) The local operational planning for the attack on Koribondo was done at Kpetewoma. Nallo was the intermediary between Norman at Base Zero and Joe Tamidey. During the first meeting local manpower was provided to assist the Kamajors. At the third meeting, Nallo supplied cartridges, bombs, G3s and AK-47s to Joe Tamidey, which he had said were given by Norman for the attack on Koribondo. Thereafter plans were made, fighters were organized and the arms and ammunition were distributed to the various groups by Joe Tamidey. The following commanders were to lead the battle from three flanks: Bobor Tucker from the Bo-Koribondo Highway; Lahai George from the Sumbuya-Koribondo Highway; and Joe Tamidey from Blama. Joe Tamidey then informed Nallo for further report to Norman that the attack was planned for the 13th of February 1998.

(xi) The attack started from Jombohun and was commanded by Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker and Lamin Ngobeh. Although the commanders were operating with different groups, they were all under Nallo's command. Around 700 Kamajors that attacked Koribondo were predominantly, but not exclusively, from the Jaiama-Bongor Chiefdom. Others came from the Districts of Pujehun, Bonthe and Bo.

(xii) Four days after the capture of Bo, Joe Tamidey met with Fofana, Kondewa and Norman in Koribondo. He was taken to Bo where he was questioned by Fofana as to his reasons for not killing Shekou Gbao.

(xiii) At the end of March 1998, Norman addressed approximately 200 civilians and 400 Kamajors at the Court Barri in Koribondo. Norman scolded the Kamajors for not having done the work he had told them to do, in particular to destroy all the houses, except for three. On this visit Fofana and Kondewa accompanied Norman but they did not attend this meeting.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

8381. para. 766: The Chamber takes the view that Fofana's speech at the passing out parade in early January 1998, when Norman gave orders to the Kamajors to launch an "all-out offensive" in all the areas occupied by the Juntas and laid-down military instructions on how to conduct this operation, was words of encouragement to the Kamajor fighters who were about to conduct those military operations. The Chamber finds, however, that this speech does not amount to urging, encouraging or prompting the Kamajors to commit criminal acts. Although this speech contained an instruction to "attack the villages", "destroy the soldiers" and "capture Koribondo" and was given by Fofana in his position as Director of War to his subordinates, it did not include the instruction to commit criminal acts. This evidence does not demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana intended to provoke or induce or bring about the commission of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors subsequently during the attack on Koribondo or that Fofana had reasonable knowledge that criminal acts would likely be committed as a result of this speech.

8382. para. 767: Furthermore, the Chamber finds that uttering these words of encouragement to the Kamajor fighters who were about to conduct military operations against the junta-held territories, does not constitute aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation of execution of the criminal acts alleged. We find that there is no evidence to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of giving of his speech Fofana was aware of the Kamajors' intention to commit any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo by the Kamajors during the attack.

8383. para. 768: Although Fofana was present at the subsequent commanders' meeting where the attack on Koribondo was planned, we find that this evidence together with the evidence of his speech at the passing out parade does not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana planned the commission of any of the criminal acts in Koribondo.

8386. para. 771: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber now finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Responsibility of Kondewa – Koribondo

8388. para. 800: Furthermore, the Chamber finds that giving moral support or blessing as well as providing medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against the bullets does not constitute aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation of execution of the criminal acts. We find that there is no evidence to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of giving his speech and providing his medicine Kondewa was aware of the Kamajors' intention to commit any criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by the Kamajors in Koribondo during the attack.

8390. para. 802: The Chamber finds that the mere presence by Kondewa at this subsequent commanders' meeting, at which Norman gave orders to Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker, Lamin Ngobeh and other Kamajor commanders to commit criminal acts does not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of these criminal acts.

8391. para. 803: The Chamber further finds that no evidence has been adduced of Kondewa ordering or physically or otherwise directly perpetrating any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8392. para. 804: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

8393. para. 808: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment

(v) Bo District

8394. para. 809: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii), (viii) and (ix) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections Y.2.2, V.2.5.2 and V.2.5.3, V.2.5.6 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) After a passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998 a subsequent commanders' meeting was held on the same day at the back of the field at Base Zero. At this meeting Norman ordered the Kamajor commanders James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017 to attack Kebi and Bo Towns. Norman gave specific orders to these commanders to kill enemy combatants and "collaborators", to burn down their houses and loot big shops, especially pharmacies. Fofana and Kondewa were both present at this meeting.

(ii) After the commanders' meeting Fofana provided arms, ammunitions and a vehicle to James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017.

(iii) In Dar-es-Salam TF2-017 presented a verbal situation report on the Kebi attack and handed over a captured soldier and two solar panels to Norman, in the presence of Fofana and Kondewa. Norman handed over the captured soldier to Kondewa who took him to Base Zero.

(iv) The order to attack Bo was reiterated by Norman to TF2-017 in Bumpeh, in the presence of the Director of War Fofana and the High Priest Kondewa. Kondewa renewed the initiation of certain Kamajors to prepare them for the attack.

(v) Norman met with Nallo before the Koribondo and Bo attacks at Base Zero and gave him specific instructions for these two attacks, while Fofana was present. Norman gave specific orders to Nallo to kill certain identified civilians in Bo who he labelled as "collaborators", loot and burn their houses, loot the Southern Pharmacy and bring the medicines to Norman. Specifically the name of MB Sesay was mentioned. Norman also ordered Nallo to kill the police officers.

(vi) The attack on Bo proceeded from four flanks. James Kaillie was the Battalion Commander and the commander of the group coming from the Tikonko road (Mattru). Joseph Lappia was his deputy. TF2-017 was part of this group with his 38 Kapras. Nallo, in his capacity as the Regional Director of Operations, was in charge of the commanders below him but could not exercise full or strict control over all of them because of their large numbers. In Bo operation specifically, he was regarded by TF2-017 as his "operational" or "division" commander.

(vii) In addition to the James Kaillie's group, there were at least three other groups of Kamajors who attacked Bo from Gerihun, Dambara and Moyamba-Bo Highway. At least 270 Kamajors participated in this attack. The tactical planning for the Bo' attack was done in Bumpeh, which was considered by Norman as a focal point for this attack. Nallo knew about the local planning in Bumpeh.

(viii) In April 1998, Norman, Fofana and Kondewa with other Kamajor leaders and initiators visited the New Police barracks in Bo Town. Norman complained that the Kamajor chiefs, in particular Fofana, had lied to him about the burnt down police barracks and policemen killed in Bo Town. Norman said that he felt deceived after having seen the barracks intact and the police at the parade.

(ix) Sometime after the attack on Bo in February 1998, a CDF office was set up in Bo. It was initially run by Alhaji Daramy Rogers, the Regional Coordinator for the Southern Region. Around June 1998, the position of Regional Coordinator was replaced by that of the District Administrator. Kosseh Hindowa occupied the latter position in Bo.

(x) After the dissolution of Base Zero, Fofana retained his position of Director of War. However, he was no longer responsible for the conduct of the war and the fighting forces. His duties included distribution of logistics to the various parts of the country. In mid-1999 he became the Director of the Peace Office in Bo.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

8398. para. 813: We found that although Fofana was responsible at Base Zero for the receipt and the provision of ammunitions to the commanders, he could only perform these acts, if and when directed to do so by Norman. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that Fofana provided logistics to launch military attacks on Kebi and Bo Towns. Although at this stage Fofana knew that the plan to attack Bo Town included the commission of criminal acts, it is not the only reasonable inference that the logistics provided by Fofana were used to commit specific criminal acts in Bo Town or that such provision had a substantial effect upon the perpetration of these specific criminal acts in Bo. Therefore, these actions by Fofana do not constitute aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the criminal acts committed by Kamajors subsequently in Bo.

8400. para. 815: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Responsibility of Kondewa – Bo District

8401. para. 847: The Chamber reiterates that Kondewa's speech at the passing out parade in early January 1998 does not constitute instigating the commission of the criminal acts by Kamajors which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment. The Chamber also reiterates that this speech as well as the provision of the medicine by Kondewa, does not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of those criminal acts.

8402. para. 848: The Chamber finds that although Kondewa was present at the subsequent commanders' meeting where the attack on Bo was planned, this evidence does not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa planned the commission of any of the criminal acts in Bo.

8403. para. 849: The Chamber finds that mere presence by Kondewa at this commanders' meeting at which Norman gave orders to Nallo, James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017 to commit criminal acts in Bo does not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of these criminal acts.

8406. para. 855: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

(vi) Bonthe District

8407. para. 856: In addition to the facts, listed in in paragraphs 72 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2.6.2 and V.2.6.3 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) On 16 August 1997, a delegation from Bonthe Town was sent to Kondewa at the Kamajor base at Tihun Sogbini to discuss the continuing harassment of civilians by soldiers and the security of the island. Kondewa was considered the supreme head of Kamajors.

(ii) At Momaya Kamajors were shooting all around the delegation and threatening them. Kamajor Commander Sheku Kaillie ("Bombowai") pleaded on the delegation's behalf and led them, under his protection, to Kondewa, who by then was no longer in Tihun but in Talia. From Mattru Jong the delegation was led to Talia by Ngobeh, the district grand Kamajor commander.

(iii) The delegation arrived at Kondewa's house in Talia on 24 August 1997. A boy was playing guitar and percussion and singing about the greatness of Kondewa and the Kamajor society. Kamajors armed with rifles and guns were guarding the house. The delegation explained to Kondewa the dreadful effects of the war. In response Kondewa stated: "war means to know that you will die; to know that you have no control over your life; to know that you have no dignity; to know that your property is not yours". Kondewa then called a meeting at the Court Barri that was attended by all of the elders of the region, the paramount chiefs and Kamajor commanders. Kondewa said at the meeting that he was not going to give any of the areas under his control to a military government but to the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah. Kondewa agreed on the cessation of hostilities between the Kamajors and the Soldiers, the stopping of the harassment of civilians and the free movement of boats, and wrote a letter to this effect to all Kamajor commanders around Bonthe. The agreement did not work.

(iv) The delegation accompanied by Ngobeh was stopped in Tihun by a Kamajor who presented a letter, which he demanded to be read in the presence of Kondewa. The letter was written by a commander from Gambia and was accusing the delegation of bringing the soldiers to Bonthe. When the letter was read to Kondewa in Talia, he declared that if the information was true, all of the delegation would be killed; if it was not true, those responsible for the lie would experience a terrible death. In Gambia Kondewa ordered a court sitting and placed Pa Lewis, Ngobeh and Bombowai in charge of the investigation. Those responsible for the letter pleaded guilty. They were supposed to be killed, but the delegation pleaded with Kondewa to spare their lives and he agreed.

(v) The Kamajors operating in Bonthe were of the Shebro tribe and were referred to as the Kassilla Battalion. Baigeh was the Battalion Commander of the Kassilla Battalion.

(vi) On 15 February 1998 a group of approximately 300 to 500 Kamajors entered Bonthe. The Kamajors came from three chiefdoms, including Sittia and Nongoba Bullom.

(vii) From 15 February 1998, Bonthe Town was under the control of the Kamajors, headed by the District Battalion Commander, Morie Jusu Kamara. Commander Julius Squire was the second in command to Morie Jusu Kamara and was from Bendu Cha.

(viii) On 16 February 1998 Kamajors announced a meeting at the St. Patrick Parish's Compound. Morie Jusu Kamara, was present at the meeting together with Commander Julius Squire, the secretary and spokesman for the meeting.

(ix) Although Morie Jusu was a disciplinarian "in his own right", he did not punish his Kamajors. He promised that that no one else would be killed in Bonthe but demanded money from the civilians.

(x) On 15 February, Kamajors looked for Lahai Ndokoi Koroma, a Chiefdom Speaker, in the Catholic mission who was accused of being a junta collaborator. They threatened to kill everyone if they did not produce this person. Two delegations were sent to Bonthe from Base Zero under Kondewa's instructions. On 1 March 1998, a third group of Kamajors came to Bonthe under the leadership of Kondewa. At a public meeting Kondewa said that he had not allowed his men to enter Bonthe, but that they had not listened to his advice and had done what they had done. Kondewa apologized on their behalf. Kondewa also told those assembled that they should forget about ECOMOG, as they were not responsible for Bonthe. Kondewa said that it was the Kamajors who were responsible for security in the area. He told Father Garrick that he was aware of the atrocities committed by the Kamajors and for this reason he wanted to get Lahai Ndokoi Koroma out of the country. After getting paid 600,000 leones Kondewa took Lahai Ndokoi Koroma to Talia and later to Bo. Only Kondewa had authority to release Lahai Koroma and claimed to kill without restraint and to send people to Mecca.

(xi) Around 23 February 1998, Norman, accompanied by two ECOMOG officials, came to Bonthe. At a public meeting at the Bonthe town hall Norman said that any complaint against the Kamajors was useless as they had fought and saved the nation and that working with the Kamajors was like "working with the cutlass".

(xii) In March 1998 a letter from Soloman Berewa addressed to the Kamajors in Bonthe requesting them to stop looting and killing, was given to Commander Morie Jusu Kamara, who passed it on to his second in command, Julius Squire. Julius Squire said that he did not recognise the authority of the Attorney-General; he refused to accept the instructions in the letter, unless they came from Norman or Kondewa. Morie Jusu Kamara told Father Garrick that he was not able to control the Kamajors.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Bonthe District

8408. para. 857: The Chamber finds that it is a reasonable inference that the order to attack Bonthe Town was included in the instructions given by Norman at the passing out parade held at Base Zero in early January 1998, when he ordered to launch an "all-out offensive" in all the areas occupied by the juntas. This inference can be drawn on the basis of the fact that at the time of the parade Bonthe Town was one of those areas and furthermore because according to the evidence the attack on Bonthe Town took place on the same day as the attack on Bo and Kenema Towns, i.e. the 15th of February 1998. However, the Chamber reiterates its earlier finding that Fofana's speech at this particular parade did not constitute instigating or ordering the commission of the criminal acts, or aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were subsequently committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District.

8409. para. 858: The Chamber further finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana was involved, either directly or otherwise, in the attack on Bonthe Town or in any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8410. para. 859: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Bonthe District

pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

8413. para. 865: Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8414. para. 866: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

(vii) Kenema District

8415. para. 904: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2.7.2, V.2.7.3 and 2.7.8 of the Factual Findings, which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) Mohamed Bhonie Koroma, a Battalion Commander, led the attack on SS Camp. Other Kamajors that participated in this attack included Mohamed Swaray, a Battalion Commander from Kenema, Fallah Bindi, a Commander, CO Sahr, a Section CO and Stephen Lahai Fassay. SS Camp was taken approximately one week before Kenema.

(ii) Mohamed Bhonie Koroma left SS Camp to attack Kenema on 15 February 1998. When he left, Stephen Lahai Fassay replaced him as the Kamajor boss and maintained this position at least until May 1998.

(iii) Kamajors entered Blama on Sunday, 15 February 1998. Key commanders in this attack included Alhaji Bockarie, Sau Vibbie and Foday Saidu.

(iv) Kamajors took control of Kenema Town on Sunday, 15 February 1998. Mohamed Bhonie Koroma led the first battalion of Kamajors, which entered Kenema from the direction of SS Camp. Twenty to thirty units from different sections, comprising at least one thousand Kamajors, entered Kenema on the same day.

(v) ECOMOG arrived in Kenema approximately on 18 February 1998.

(vi) While at Base Zero Musa Junisa was the Director of Operations for the Eastern Region.

(vii) In mid-February 1998, TFUl79 and TF2-201 traveled from Base Zero to Bo and Kenema on the orders of Norman to set up a CDF office. At that time the CDF commanders in Kenema were KBK Magonna, Eddie Massallay and Arthur Koroma. George Jambawai, the Regional Coordinator for the Eastern Region became the head of the new administration; TF2-079 was also part of the executive. Jambawai's administration lasted until June 1998. He was succeeded by the District Administrator, Arthur Koroma. During the administration of Arthur Koroma a base was opened at SS Camp where civilians were taken for detention.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Kenema District

8416. para. 905: The Chamber finds that it is a reasonable inference that the order to attack Kenema Town was included in the instructions given by Norman at the passing out parade held at Base Zero in early January 1998, when he ordered to launch an "all-out offensive" in all the areas occupied by the juntas. This inference can be drawn on the basis of the fact that at the time of the parade Kenema Town was one of those areas and also because according to the evidence the attack on Kenema Town took place on the same day as the attack on Bo and Bonthe Towns, i.e. 15 February 1998. However, the Chamber reiterates its earlier finding that Fofana's speech at this particular parade did not constitute instigating or ordering the commission of the criminal acts, or aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were subsequently committed by Kamajors in Kenema District.

8417. para. 906: The Chamber further finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana was involved, either directly or otherwise, in the attacks on Kenema Town, SS Camp and Blama or in any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors during and after the attacks on those locations. The evidence shows that the existence of the plan to capture Kenema was known at Base Zero because Norman then ordered the War Council members to open the CDF office there but this evidence, even considered with the evidence as a whole, is not sufficient to conclude to any individual criminal liability of the accused beyond reasonable doubt.

8418. para. 907: Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8419. para. 908: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Kenema District

8420. para. 911: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Kenema District

8422. para. 913: The Chamber further finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa was possibly involved, directly or otherwise, in the attacks on Kenema Town, SS Camp and Blama or in any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors during and after the attacks on those locations. The evidence shows that the existence of the plan to capture Kenema Town was known at Base Zero because Norman then ordered the War Council members to open the CDF office there but this evidence alone is not sufficient to attach individual criminal liability to the accused beyond reasonable doubt.

8423. para. 914: Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8424. para. 915: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is indiVidually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

d. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Kenema District

8425. para. 918: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

e. Counts – Kenema District

8426. para. 919: The Chamber recognises that criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Kenema District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber did not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

(viii) Talia / Base Zero

8427. para. 920: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.8 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) By late 1996 or early 1997 the Kamajors had taken over Talia from the rebels. The first Kamajor leaders who came to Talia were Ngobeh and Joe Tamidey. Kondewa, who was a herbalist, came two weeks later with his priests and was performing initiations in Mokusi. By the time of the coup the Kamajors were also in control of the surrounding villages around Talia.

(ii) After the coup and before the arrival of Norman to Talia around 15 September 1997, Fofana and Kondewa were both in Talia. Around July-August 1997 Kondewa was in Tihun performing initiations. At that time Kondewa was considered the supreme head of Kamajors in Bonthe District.

(iii) Fofana and Kondewa stayed in Talia for the entire period of time of the existence of Base Zero.

8428. para. 921: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following criminal acts have been committed in Talia / Base Zero, which the Chamber will consider for the purposes of making its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa in this area:

(i) TF2-134 was captured by Kamajors and forcefully brought to Talia. She was tied with FM rope and beaten until she vomited blood. She was then kept in a guardroom and released later in the day.

(ii) TF2-109 was captured by Kamajors along with other women and three men in her village of Mattru Jong and was taken to Talia by Kamajor Kamoh Bonnie. She was held in Talia for three days. The Kamajors also looted her property in Mattru, including furniture, household items and clothing.

(iii) Sometime towards the end of 1997, two "Town Commanders" were brought to Talia. Kondewa took a gun from Kamoh Bonnie, Kondewa's priest, shot and killed one of the town commanders. The next morning witness saw two graves where the bodies of the two town commanders were buried.

(iv) TF2-133 was captured and taken to Talia, where she stayed for one month. During that time, TF2-133 saw Kamajors kill her mother in the palm oil plantation.

(v) TF2-188 and her mother were captured and made to carry loads to Talia. In Talia, Kondewa told his boys to capture TF2-188's mother and kill her. TF2-188 saw the Kamajors kill her mother.

(vi) During the rainy season of 1997, TF2-189 was captured by Kamajors and taken to Talia. While in Talia, TF2-189's husband was captured, his throat was cut by Kamajors and he was decapitated.

(vii) Jusu Shalley, Baggie Vaiey and Lahai Lebbie were captured together and brought to Talia. They were killed in front of a large group of Kamajors and civilians. All three men were civilians. Next morning the Kamajors summoned civilians to a parade, which had Norman and Kondewa in attendance.

(viii) Sometime after 13 February 1998, a surrendered soldier, named Sgt. Kamanda was brought to Talia from Koribondo. Sgt. Kamanda was killed.

(ix) Kondewa's bodyguards Kafi Jini, Jahman, Junisa and Bokindeh accused TF2-096's friend, who was selling cassava, to be a rebel. Jahman reported TF2-096's friend to Kondewa and she was arrested and taken to Nyandehun. She was held in a cage and was not released until 40,000 leones were paid to Kondewa.

(x) Sometime between January and March 1998, Mustafa Fallon was killed at the Poro Bush in Talia as part of a Kamajor ritual. Mustafa Fallon was a fighting Kamajor who had been enlisted by Bobor Tucker. Norman, Fofana and Kondewa and many other Kamajors were present.

(xi) Sometime between December 1997 and January 1998, Alpha Dauda Kanu was killed in the palm oil plantation near Talia as part of a Kamajor ritual. Kanu was one of about 40 Kapras from Gbonkolenken Chiefdom in Tonkolili District who had come to Talia for training. Norman, Fofana and Kondewa approved the killing.

(xii) A truck carrying cocoa and coffee arrived in T alia. It was unloaded and the contents were given to the Director of War, Fofana and the High Priest, Kondewa. The truck was detained in Talia.

constituted an unlawful killing, it holds that the Prosecution has limited the allegations in Count 2 for Talia / Base Zero to the unlawful killing of "an unknown number of civilians" only and not that of "captured enemy combatants".[1571]

8432. para. 925: The Chamber further finds that the incidents listed under paragraph 921 (x) and (xi) do not constitute a war crime since both Fallon and Kanu fighters and members of the CDF. Here the Chamber particularly recalls the final position of the Prosecution in respect of these two killings made during their closing arguments as follows:

> [Tlhe best approach is simply to see these two men's deaths as examples of where the three accused stood in the hierarchy, their ability to do acts without sanction from anyone else. In fact, it demonstrates that they were in absolute control of the CDF. That is, we would say, how the deaths of those two men fit into the Prosecution case.[1572]

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Talia / Base Zero

8433. para. 926: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3) for the acts listed by the Chamber above under paragraph 921 (ii), (iii), (vii) and (xii).

8435. para. 928: In relation to the incident described under paragraph 921 (xii) the Chamber finds that the fact that a truck was brought to Talia and the contents of it was given to Fofana is not sufficient to establish beyond reasonable doubt that either the truck might have been looted or that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that the truck might have been looted.

8436. para. 929: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Talia / Base Zero during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Responsibility of Kondewa – Talia / Base Zero

8437. para. 931: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3) for the incidents listed by the Chamber above under paragraph 921 (ii), (iii), (vii) and (xii).

8440. para. 934: The Chamber finds that the incident listed under paragraph 921 (iii) constitutes an intentional killing perpetrated by Kondewa. The Chamber further finds that these two men were killed because they were considered to be "collaborators", after having been appointed to the position of "Town Commanders" by the rebels, these men organized civilians from their town to assist the rebels. In the context of the widely-held Kamajor belief that anyone who assisted the rebels was a "collaborator", the Chamber finds that the unlawful killing of the two "Town Commanders" was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes.

8441. para. 935: In light of the particular facts and circumstances of each of the events referred to above, the Chamber is also satisfied both that neither of the victims was taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that they were killed and, furthermore, finds that Kondewa knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

8442. para. 936: In light of the above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of murder have been established with respect to each incident described in paragraph 921 (iii).

8443. para. 937: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for committing murder as a war crime as charged under above.

8444. para. 938: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii), (viii) and (ix) and 809 (vi) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.9 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(0 and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) Sometime after August 1997, the Kamajors returned to Moyamba in full strength under the leadership of Mustapha Ngobeh. Kenei Torma was the second-in-command to Mustapha Ngobeh. Sometime after Ngobeh's death, Torma became the first in command. In late 1997 and early 1998, Kenei Torma and Chuck Norris were in control of the Kamajors in Moyamba town.

(ii) Albert J Nallo in late 1997 was the Director of Operations for the Southern Province, which included Moyamba District. In this capacity Albert J Nallo had control over Moyamba District. When Albert J Nallo went to Moyamba Town he learned from Mustapha Ngobeh that four days earlier Abu Bawote, the Commander in the Ribbi area, had killed the Chiefdom Speaker. Mustapha Ngobeh related that he had seen Abu Bawote in Bradford with the severed hand of the Chiefdom Speaker; Bawote had dried the hand and tied to his neck as a necklace. Albert J Nallo reported this incident to Fofana and Norman and told Norman that this Chiefdom Speaker was a collaborator. Norman responded: "Well, a Collaborator deserves that. That was the standing order. You know that was the standing order I passed long ago."

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Moyamba District

8445. para. 939: The Chamber finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana was possibly involved, directly or otherwise, in the attack on Moyamba town by Kamajors or in any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8446. para. 940: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Moyamba District

8447. para. 948: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Moyamba District

8448. para. 949: The Chamber finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa was possibly involved, directly or otherwise, in the attack on Moyamba town by Kamajors or in any of the criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment. Although on the basis of the evidence adduced it appears that Norman, Fofana, Kondewa and their subordinates may have acted in concert with each other, we find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that they did so in order to further a common purpose, plan or design to commit criminal acts. There is no evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt such a purpose, plan or design.

8449. para. 950: On the basis of the foregoing the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

d. Counts – Moyamba District

8450. para. 956: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Moyamba District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber did not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

(x) Count 8 – Child Soldiers

8451. para. 957: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana and Kondewa are individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3), for enlisting children under the age of 15 years ("child soldiers") into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities at all times relevant to the Indictment throughout the Republic of Sierra Leone.[1575]

8452. para. 958: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraph 721 (i) to (viii) and 809(i) (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.10 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa with respect to Count 8.

(i) A commanders' meeting was held by Norman after the passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998, which had in attendance, among others, Fofana, Kondewa and commanders for the Bo attack. Norman added that the adult fighters were doing less than the children, and just eating and looting.

(ii) Child fighters were present at various times at Base Zero.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Count 8 – Child Soldiers

8453. para. 959: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana planned, ordered or committed the crime of enlisting child soldiers into an armed group, or using them to participate actively in hostilities.

8454. para. 960: Specifically regarding the commanders' meeting, the Chamber finds that Fofana's mere presence does not demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that he encouraged anyone to make use of child soldiers. Neither does it demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that he aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of either the enlistment of child soldiers into the armed forces or the use of child soldiers to participate actively in hostilities anywhere in the Republic of Sierra Leone during the time frame specified in the Indictment.

8455. para. 961: The Chamber further finds that the presence of Fofana at Base Zero where child soldiers were also seen is not sufficient by itself to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had any involvement in the commission of these criminal acts under any of the modes of liability charged in the Indictment.

8456. para. 962: The trial record contains ample evidence that the CDF as an organisation was involved in the recruitment of children under the age of 15 to an armed group, and used them to participate actively in hostilities, however this does not demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt that Fofana was personally involved in such crimes.

8457. para. 963: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) for planning, instigating, ordering, committing (including through a joint criminal enterprise) or otherwise aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of enlistment of child soldiers into armed forces or groups or use of child soldiers to participate actively in hostilities.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Count 8 – Child Soldiers

8458. para. 967: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for Count 8.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Count 8 – Child Soldiers

8459. para. 968: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraph 958 above, the Chamber outlines below the fact upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) of Kondewa with respect to Count 8:

(i) TF2-021 was nine years old when he was abducted by rebels. In 1997, when the witness was eleven years old he was captured by Kamajors and forced to carry looted property. The Kamajors subsequently took him to Base Zero for initiation.

(ii) At Base Zero, the witness was initiated along with around 20 other young boys. Kondewa performed the initiation and told the boys that they would be made powerful for fighting. He gave them a potion to rub on their bodies before going into battle.

(iii) After receiving training, TF2-021 was sent on his first mission to Masiaka, where he shot a woman in the stomach and left her there on the ground. On subsequent missions, he fought with the Kamajors at Kenema, SS Camp, Joru and Daru. In 1999 TF2-021 was flown by helicopter into Freetown with three other small boys and their commanders where they were given guns and sent to support ECOMOG who were fighting the rebels at Congo Cross.

(iv) In 1999, when TF2-021 was thirteen years old, he was initiated into the Avondo Society, a group of Kamajors led by Kondewa. He received a certificate (Exhibit 18) which proved his membership in this group. The certificate bears details showing the place of initiation (Bumpeh), the initiate's name, photograph and age. It also bears Kondewa's name, signature and stamp.

8460. para. 969: The Chamber understands from the evidence that initiation into the Kamajor Society does not necessarily amount to enlistment in an armed force or group.[1576] Some parents put their children through initiation for other reasons. Thus, the Chamber has looked at the details of the actual initiation ceremony, the circumstances surrounding initiation, as well as the subsequent events, to determine whether in fact a child could be said to have been enlisted in an armed force or group.

8461. para. 970: Having considered the evidence outlined above, that during the first initiation of TF2-021 initiates were given potions to rub on their bodies before going into battle, were told that they would be made strong for fighting, were, subsequently given military training, and soon afterwards were sent into battle, the evidence is absolutely clear that on this occasion, the initiates had taken the first step in becoming fighters. It is beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa, in these circumstances, when initiating the boys, was also performing an act analogous to enlisting them for active military service. TF2-021 was eleven years old when Kondewa enlisted him. In the Chamber's view, there can be no mistaking a boy of eleven years old for a boy of fifteen years or older, especially for a man such as Kondewa who regularly performed initiation ceremonies. Kondewa knew or had reason to know that the boy was under fifteen years of age, and too young to be enlisted for military service. Although the Chamber found this evidence entirely sufficient to establish enlistment beyond a reasonable doubt, TF2-021 was given a second initiation, into the Avondo Society, headed by Kondewa himself, when he was thirteen years old. Exhibit 18, dated 10 June 1999, bears Kondewa's signature and stamp of approval and lists the boy's age (incorrectly) as twelve.

8462. para. 971: Thus, the Chamber concludes that this evidence has established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa committed the crime of enlisting a child under the age of 15 into an armed force or group.

8463. para. 972: The Indictment charges use of child soldiers as an alternative to enlistment. Therefore, having found that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible for enlisting child soldiers, the Chamber need not consider the evidence in relation to their use actively participating in armed hostilities.

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, Judgment, 28 May 2008

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Tongo Town

a. Fofana –Tongo Town

i. Instigation – Fofana – Tongo Town

8464. para. 51: The Trial Chamber held that the actus reus of instigating requires "an act or omission, covering both express and implied conduct of the Accused, which is shown to be a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime,"[117] and that there must be a "causal relationship between the instigation and the perpetration of the crime ... although it is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have occurred without the Accused's involvement."[118] The Trial Chamber also held that the mens rea of instigating is an intention "to provoke or induce the commission of the crime," or a "reasonable knowledge that a crime would likely be committed as a result of that instigation.,,[119] Neither of the parties takes issue with the Trial Chamber's definition of instigation.

8465. para. 52: The Trial Chamber found that Fofana's speech at the First Passing Out Parade substantially contributed to the commission of crimes by the Kamajors in Tongo Town and thereby satisfied the actus reus of aiding and abetting. The parties have not challenged this finding. Both aiding and abetting and instigating require the actus reus to have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.

8468. para. 55: Fofana's speech at the First Passing Out Parade at Base Zero was removed both temporally and geographically from the unlawful acts committed by the Kamajors in Tongo Town in January 1998 This alone would not be enough to deny a causal link between the speech and the crimes alleged. However, in this case the Appeals Chamber is of the view that there is insufficient evidence to show how Fofana's words influenced the perpetration of crimes which took place at a significantly different place and time. Fofana's speech may have substantially contributed to the military effort, but not to the crimes as such. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber was not in error in finding that Fofana's speech did not have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crimes or that a causal relationship did not exist and that the actus reus for instigating was, consequently, not satisfied.

8469. para. 56: With regard to the mens rea required for "instigating," the Prosecution submits that Fofana's intent or knowledge that crimes would likely be committed may be inferred from his substantial contribution to the planning, which was done with knowledge of the crimes which Norman had ordered in the execution of the plan. Fofana's words "now you've heard the National Coordinator [...] any commander failing to perform accordingly and losing your own ground, just decide to kill yourself there and don't come to report to us" are ambiguous and may be interpreted not as approving Norman's unlawful orders, but rather as an appeal to each of the commanders to fight hard and not loose his ground. Further, Fofana's call "to destroy the soldiers finally from where they were [...] settled"[124] was directed at the military campaign and does not include any incitement to perpetrate unlawful acts. This leads the Appeals Chamber to conclude that there were other possible interpretations of the evidence than the one suggested by the Prosecution. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds that a reasonable trier of fact could have found that Fofana did not have the requisite mens rea.

8470. para. 57: Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in failing to convict Fofana for instigating the commission of crimes in Tongo Town. The Prosecution's Fourth Ground of Appeal, therefore, fails in this respect.

ii. Planning – Fofana – Tongo Town

8471. para. 61: Regarding the requisite actus reus, given the absence of factual findings by the Trial Chamber concerning the nature of Fofana's participation in the commanders' meetings in December 1997, the Appeals Chamber finds that it was open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that evidence of Fofana's presence did not by itself amount to planning. Although Fofana participated in these commanders' meetings and held H position of responsibility as Director of War, it was open to a reasonable trier of fact to conch; de that this evidence alone did not prove beyond reasonable doubt that he participated in the planning of the criminal conduct which took place in Tongo Town.

8472. para. 62: Regarding the requisite mens rea, the Trial Chamber found that Fofana participated in the commanders' meetings. However, the Appeals Chamber notes that the findings did not indicate that he participated at those meetings in the planning of unlawful acts rather than in the successful completion of military operations.

8473. para. 63: The Appeals Chamber therefore, concludes that the evidence did not disclose beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana possessed the requisite mens rea for planning violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute, violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular cruel treatment, punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute as well as collective punishments, a violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3.b. of the Statute.

8474. para. 64: The Appeals Chamber finds that in this respect, the Prosecution's Fourth Ground of Appeal must fail.

b. Kondewa – Tongo Town

i. Aiding and Abetting – Kondewa – Tongo Town

8475. para. 70: Kondewa submits that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law. However, he states that he agrees with the legal requirements of aiding and abetting found by the Trial Chamber. Further, he agrees that the applicable standard for actus reus is that of "substantial effect." His challenge is therefore not directed at the legal standard as such but rather at the Trial Chamber's application of the facts.[153] The Appeals Chamber, therefore, is of the view that Kondewa raises an error of fact rather than law, and his arguments will be considered in this context.

8476. para. 71: Although not specifically raised in this appeal, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that it is necessary to determine whether, as a matter of law, words of encouragement and support may have a "substantial effect" even though they were spoken at a time and place that are temporally and geographically removed from the commission of the crimes. The Trial Chamber held that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may occur before, during, or after the perpetration of the crime and at a location geographically removed from the place where the crime is committed, if the act of the aider and abetter has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[154] In this regard, the Trial Chamber relied on the ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in Blaskic which found that the acts of aiding and abetting "may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated, and that the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime."[155] Further, it is recognized in the jurisprudence of other ad hoc Tribunals that "encouragement" and "moral support" are two forms of conduct which may lead to criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting a crime.[156]

8477. para. 72: The Appeals Chamber agrees that "encouragement" and "moral support" may constitute the actus reus and that acts of aiding and abetting can be made at a time and place removed from the actual crime.

8478. para. 73: In regard to the actus reus for aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber found that Kondewa's speech at the First Passing Out Parade had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crimes in Tongo. [157] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Clamber found that at the First Passing Out Parade Norman instructed the Kamajors "to kill captured enemy combatants and 'collaborators' to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses."[158] After Norman and Fofana spoke "all the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with mystic powers, and he made the last comment saying that the time for surrender of the rebels had long been exhausted and that they did not need any surrendered rebels."[159] The Trial Chamber then found that in uttering these words Kondewa effectively supported Norman's instructions and encouraged the Kamajors to execute Norman's unlawful orders.[160] The Trial Chamber also noted that no fighter would go to war without Kondewa's blessing because they believed that Kondewa transferred his mystical powers to commit such acts.[161]

8479. para. 74: In addition to his spiritual responsibilities, Kondewa was, together with Norman and Fofana, the three people regarded as what was referred to as the "Holy Trinity" at Base Zero; the three of them were the key and essential components of the leadership structure [162] and were the three people who according to the Trial Chamber actually made the decisions and nobody could make a decision in their absence.[163]

8481. para. 76: Regarding the requisite mens rea, the Appeals Chamber agrees with Kondewa that the Trial Chamber erroneously relied on the fact that he had received the report to Base Zero of the Kamajors' previous crimes in Tongo. On the contrary, the Trial Chamber found that Norman and Fofana received this report, not Kondewa.[165] Thus, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in relying on this report.[166]

8482. para. 77: It is the unchallenged finding of the Trial Chamber, that Norman at the Passing Out Parade ordered the Kamajors to commit criminal acts in Tongo, and that Kondewa who spoke after Norman, knew of the orders of Norman when he said: "a rebel is a rebel; surrendered, not surrendered, they're all rebels ... the time for their surrender had long since been exhausted, so we don't need any surrendered rebel ... I give you my blessings; go my boys, go."[167] The Trial Chamber further found that "no fighter would go to war without Kondewa's blessings because they believed that Kondewa transferred his mystical powers to them and made them immune to bullets."[168]

8483. para. 78: On these findings the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Kondewa by his words of encouragement aided and abetted the commission of criminal acts ordered by Norman in Tongo.

8484. para. 79: The Appeals Chamber therefore concludes, Justice King dissenting, that the Trial Chamber did not err in finding Kondewa responsible for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes in Tongo Town. The Appeals Chamber accordingly finds, Justice King dissenting, that Kondewa's Fourth Ground of Appeal must fail and upholds his conviction in relation to violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder and cruel treatment punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute (Counts 2 and 4, respectively).

ii. Dissents – Justice King - Aiding and abetting – Kondewa – Tongo Town

8485. para. 81: The Trial Chamber found Kondewa criminally responsible under Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting war crimes in Tongo, in particular murder under Count 2 and cruel treatment under Count 4.[1173] It is not disputed that Kondewa himself did not commit the crimes. The Kamajors attacked Tongo Town at least three times, from late November or early December 1997 to late January 1998.[1174] The Trial Chamber also found that Kondewa's speech at the December 1997 Passing Out Parade had a substantial effect, (wrongly, in my opinion), on the perpetration of crimes by Kamajors in Tongo.[1175] It held that Kondewa was liable for adding and abetting crimes in Tongo, despite the fact that his statements were made more than a month before the crimes were committed and when Kondewa spoke in Talia.[1176] The Trial Chamber found that Kondewa had the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting because he was aware that Kamajors would commit crimes such as murder and cruel treatment, based on his knowledge of Norman's orders and his knowledge that Kamajors had committed crimes in Tongo in the past.[1177]

8486. para. 82: I disagree with the Majority Opinion that a reasonable tribunal of fact could have found that Kondewa's conduct had a substantial effect on the crimes committed by Kamajors during their attack on Tongo, for the following reasons: From the evidence accepted by the Trial Chamber, Kondewa made a speech at a passing out parade sometime between 10 December and 12 December 1997 at Base Zero (Talia). The passing out parade was witnessed by many civilians and Kamajors. Kondewa spoke after Norman and Fofana and, according to the Trial Chamber:

> "Then all the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with mystical power, and he gave the last comment saying 'a rebel is a rebel; surrendered, not surrendered, they're all rebels [... t]he time for their surrender had long since been > exhausted, so we don't need any surrendered rebel.' He then said, 'I give you my blessings; go my boys go."[1178]

8487. para. 83: The Trial Chamber's paraphrasing of TF2-222's evidence does not accurately accord with what was actually said on reading the transcript. The transcript mentions "command", but in fact what Kondewa said was not a command, but a rallying cry and a statement of fact: "a rebel is a rebel; surrendered, not surrendered, they're all rebels …" That, in my opinion, is an innocuous statement of fact. How can those words be reasonably said to aid and abet the crimes alleged to have been committed in Tongo? The opinion evidence of "admiring" and "a man who had mystical powers" is of no evidentiary value and confirms that both the Trial Chamber and my learned colleagues misdirected themselves by drawing the wrong inference.

8488. para. 84: The Trial Chamber relied entirely upon these comments made by Kondewa as his actus reus for aiding and abetting the crimes later committed in Tongo, finding that this statement had a substantial effect on the crimes committed.

8490. para. 86: Approximately a month later, another group of Kamajors met in Panguma and planned the second attack on Tongo with BJK Sei. [1180] Kondewa was not present, and there is no evidence that his previous statements were mentioned at the planning. On a morning in early January 1998, a group of approximately 47 Kamajors, led by one Kamabote, attacked Tongo and, in the course of the attack against rebels, they killed some civilians. In the circumstances, I opine that it would be unreasonable to suggest that anyone hearing Kondewa's words, which were clearly directed against the rebels, and not the civilians, could be taken as encouragement to murder civilians.

8491. para. 87: This error is compounded by the fact that Trial Chamber's paraphrasing does not portray the import of the words and the meaning of Kondewa's statement. The relevant portion of the transcript states:

> A. That a rebel is a rebel; surrendered, not surrendered, they're all rebels. The time for their surrender"

Q. Apart from Moinina Fofana did anyone else speak at the meeting again?

A. The only person who spoke was the high priest. He at that time [inaudible] give the last command.

Q. Sorry, I didn't get that.

A. He, after all other command had been given, we all looked at him to admire the man who had a mystic power, that he will be the one to give the last command.

Q. The last command?

A. Yes, My Lord.

Q. Was that last command given?

A. He did, yes, My Lord.

Q. What was the last command?

The time for surrender had long been since exhausted, so we don't need any surrendered rebel.

Q. Is that all?

A. Finally, "I give you my blessings; go my boys, go."

Q. Finally gave his blessings?

A. Yes, My Lord."[1181]

The words speak for themselves and do not support my learned colleagues' conclusion. In any event, there is no evidence that those who actually and personally committed the crimes were present when Kondewa made his speech. How can Kondewa, by his words, aid and abet those who did not hear his speech?

8492. para. 88: I repeat that the names of those who committed atrocities were given in evidence and Kondewa was not one of them. If he was, I would have not the slightest hesitation to hold him accountable.

8493. para. 89: For the reasons I have given, I have come to the conclusion that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have found that Kondewa's statements had a substantial effect on the crimes in Tongo.

8494. para. 90: Accordingly, I would reverse the convictions under Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting murder under Count 2 and cruel treatment under Count 4, and enter a finding of Not Guilty under Counts 2 and 4. Let me end up by asking the question: having regard to the Historical Facts in this case, could it also be said that those of the International Community, as Great Britain, the United States and Nigeria, who mandated Kondewa, ECOMOG, the Civil Defence Forces and their allies to fight for the restoration of the democratically elected Government and are, apparently, in a superior/subordinate relationship with Kondewa and the others, are guilty of War Crimes?

8496. para. 92: As Charles Margai, counsel for Kondewa eruditely put it in his plea for leniency to the Trial Chamber:

> "We thank God, My Lords, that the war is over, but this war was described and has been described as the most brutal known to mankind. We should not lose sight of that. If it were not for the sacrifice of the CDF, God knows whether some of us, including my learned friend Kamara, would be here today. That I submit, My Lords, is a factor to be considered, because otherwise, if a sentence is l:evere and there occurs a rebel war, whether in Sierra Leone or elsewhere. Government militias are going to ask themselves the question: Is it advisable for us to intervene? If we do, might we not be treated in the same manner as Allieu Kondewa and others"[1182]

8497. para. 93: I understand and appreciate his concerns, not only for his client, but a fortiori, for the overriding interests of his Country, Sierra Leone. As the Trial Chamber Judges put it, also eruditely: "The contlribution of the two Accused Persons to the establishment of the much desired peace in Sierra Leone and the difficult, risky, selfless and for a very sizeable number of their CDF/Kamajors, the supreme sacrifices that they made to achieve this through a bloody conflict, is in itself a factor that stands significantly in mitigation in their favour. In fact, the medal awarded to Moinina Fofana, after the restoration, by the reinstated President Kabbah, is a testimony of gratitude and appreciation of Sierra Leonean Society which the President incarnates"[1183]. I agree, without any reservation whatsoever. The learned Trial Chamber Judges made it abundantly clear that the mitigating factor was the fight for the restoration of the democratically elected Government, and not any far-fetched thesis about an unwarranted allegation of a so-called "just war"!

8498. para. 94: I would grant Kondewa's Appeal in its entirety and enter a finding of Not Guilty on all the Counts for which my colleagues have him Guilty and acquit him on Counts 1, 2, 3 and 4.

iii. Instigation – Kondewa – Tongo Town

8499. para. 83: The Trial Chamber's statement of the elements of the actus reus and the mens rea of instigating has already been noted in paragraph 51.

8500. para. 84: The Trial Chamber found Kondewa's speech at the First Passing Out Parade to have had a substantial effect on the perpetration of crimes in Tonglo Town and thereby satisfied the actus reus of aiding and abetting. Both aiding and abetting and instigating require the actus reus to have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. A finding that an accused's conduct had a "substantial effect" for the purpose of aiding and abetting will therefore normally also satisfy the "substantial effect" requirement for the purpose of instigating.

8501. para. 85: In this case, in order to show a causal link between Kondewa's speech and the crimes committed in Tongo Town, the Prosecution must lead evidence to show that the Kamajors who were present at the First Passing Out Parade at which Kondewa's speech was made were the same Kamajors who subsequently committed the crimes in Tongo Town. There was no such evidence before the Trial Chamber. For this reason the Appeals Chamber finds that "instigation" for the crimes charged in Tongo Town was not proved.

8502. para. 86: Consequently, the Prosecution's Fourth Ground of Appeal fails in this respect.

(ii) Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

a. Fofana – Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

i. Planning – Fofana – Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

8503. para. 97: Given the absence of factual findings by the Trial Chamber concerning the nature of Fofana's participation in the January 1998 commanders' meetings, the Appeals Chamber finds that it was open to a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that evidence of Fofana's presence at these meetings does not amount to planning.[213] Although Fofana attended these meetings and held a position of responsibility as Director of War, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that this evidence alone does not prove beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana designed the criminal conduct which took place in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District, or that his involvement in the planning process substantially contributed to the criminal conduct which occurred. Furthermore, despite the Trial Chamber's finding that Fofana provided commanders with arms, ammunition and a vehicle which were used by the Kamajors during their attack on Kebi Town, the Appeals Chamber finds that it was open to the Trial Chanber to conclude that Fofana's provision of logistics for attacks in Bo District did not substantially contribute to the commission of criminal acts in Bo District.[214] 8504. para. 98: Thus, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in finding Fofana not liable for planning the commission of crimes in Korlbondo, Bo District and Kenema District. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber finds that in this respect, the Prosecution's Third and Fourth Grounds of Appeal must fail.

ii. Aiding and Abetting – Fofana – Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

8505. para. 101: In view of the Trial Chamber's findings that Fofana's speech at the January 1998 passing out parade did not amount to urging, encouraging or prompting the Kamajors to commit criminal acts, the Appeals Chamber holds that Fofana's speech did not constitute aiding and abetting the commission of crimes in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District.[218]

8506. para. 102: Furthermore, although Fofana was present at the January 1998 commanders' meeting the Trial Chamber did not make any factual findings as to the nature of Fofana's participation during these meetings. The Appeals Chamber opines that Fofana's mere presence at these meetings did not amount to aiding and abetting the criminal conduct which took place in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District. Furthermore, in regard to the Trial Chamber's finding that Fofana provided commanders with arms, ammunition and a vehicle prior to their attack on Kebi Town, the Appeals Chamber holds that Fofana's provision of logistics is not sufficient to establish beyond reasonable doubt that he contributed as an aider and abetter to the commission of specific criminal acts in Bo District.[219]

8507. para. 103: Thus, The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber was correct in finding Fofana not liable for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District. Consequently, the Prosecution's Third and Fourth Grounds of Appeal must fail.

b. Kondewa – Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

i. Aiding and Abetting – Kondewa – Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

8508. para. 109: The Trial Chamber found that Kondewa's speech at the Second Passing Out Parade did not amount to urging, encouraging or prompting the Kamajors to commit criminal acts.[230] In addition, there was an absence of a finding by the Trial Chamber concerning the nature of Kondewa's participation in the January 1998 commanders' meetings at which Norman gave orders for the commission of unlawful acts during the "all-out offensive."[231] The fact that Kondewa held a position of responsibility as High Priest and that he spoke at the Second Passing Out Parade and attended Commanders' meetings is not sufficient to conclude that this evidence alone does prove beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa encouraged or supported the criminal conduct which took place in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District.

8509. para. 110: The Appeals Chamber agrees with the findings of the Trial Chamber that giving "words of moral support and encouragement to the Kamajor fighters who were about to conduct military operations on the junta-held territories"[232] or blessings, as well as providing medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against the bullets does not constitute aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the criminal acts in Bo District.[233]

8510. para. 111: The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was correct in finding Kondewa not liable for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes in Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District. Consequently, the Prosecution's Third and Fourth Grounds of Appeal fail in this respect.

(iii) Summary of the Findings – Tongo, Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District

8511. para. 112: In relation to the attacks on Tongo, the Appeals Chamber, Justice King dissenting, upholds the Trial Chamber's convictions of Kondewa and Fofana, pursuant to Article 6(1), of aiding and abetting violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder and cruel treatment punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute (Counts 2 and 4 respectively).

8512. para. 113: In relation to the attacks on Koribondo, Bo District and Kenema District, the Appeals Chamber upholds the Trial Chamber's acquittals of Kondewa and Fofana, pursuant to Article 6(1), of violence to life, health and physical or mental well-·being of persons, in particular murder and cruel treatment, punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute (Counts 2 and 4, respectively) as well as pillage, a violation of Article 3.a. common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3.f. of the Statute (Count 5).

8513. para. 114: The Appeals Chamber dismisses the Prosecution's Third and Fourth Grounds of Appeal and dismisses, Justice King dissenting, Kondewa's Fourth Ground of Appeal.

(iv) Child Soldiers

a. Fofana – Child Soldiers

i. Aiding and Abetting – Fofana – Child Soldiers

8514. para. 152: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber accepted and considered the foregoing evidence in determining Fofana's criminal responsibility but found that it did not establish beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is responsible for child enlistment or use pursuant to any of the modes of liability under Article 6(1), including aiding and abetting.[313] The Prosecution merely proffers arguments based on evidence which the Trial Chamber considered and rejected, but does not point to any error in the reasoning of the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber emphasises that on appeal, a party cannot merely repeat arguments which did not succeed at trial in the hope that the Appeals Chamber will consider them afresh, unless that party can demonstrate that rejecting them constituted an error which warrants the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[314]

8515. para. 153: The Appeals Chamber finds, Justice Winter dissenting, that the Prosecution has failed to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that Fofana was not responsible for aiding and abetting child enlistment and their use to participate actively in hostilities.

b. Kondewa – Child Soldiers

8516. para. 124: The Prosecution submits that although the Trial Chamber found Kondewa responsible for enlisting Witness TF2-021, it was in error in not finding him responsible for enlisting and/or using other children.

8517. para. 125: The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the crime of enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups and of using them to participate actively in hostilities may be committed irrespective of the number of children enlisted by the accused person.

i. Committing or Aiding and Abetting – Kondewa – Child Soldiers

8518. para. 126: The Appeals Chamber will now determine whether the Trial Chamber erred in failing to find Kondewa responsible for committing and/or aiding and abetting the enlistment of children other than Witness TF2-021.

8521. para. 129: In the absence of evidence concerning the ages of the other boys, the Appeals Chamber finds that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the testimony of Witness TF2-021 sufficiently establishes the age of the 20 young boys who were initiated with him.

8522. para. 130: The Trial Chamber accepted the evidence provided by two other former child soldiers who underwent initiation.[269] The Trial Chamber found that Witness TF2-140 was initiated into the Kamajor society at the age of 14 years along with adults, as well as other children who were 10 or 11 years old.[270] Initiation fees were paid to the district initiator who then sent the fees to Kondewa, the High Priest of the Kamajors.[271] The Trial Chamber also found that Witness TF2-004 was initiated at Liya by Muniro Sherif along with many others, including children as young as 10 years old.[272]

8525. para. 133: Although the Prosecution has charged Kondewa in Count 8 with the use of children below the age of 15 years in hostilities, as an alternative to the charge of enlisting them as child soldiers, the Trial Chamber held that having found him individually criminally responsible for enlisting children as child soldiers, it did not need to consider the evidence in relation to the alternative charge. The Appeals Chamber holds, in the circumstances, that it cannot consider any evidence or pronounce a verdict on the alternative charge.[274] Even if the Appeals Chamber were to consider the evidence, it would still have come to the conclusion as it earlier did [275] that there was absence of evidence concerning the ages of the alleged children.

8526. para. 134: The Appeals Chamber opines that the Trial Chamber should have considered any evidence on the alternative charged and made findings upon such evidence even though, at the end, a verdict would be pronounced on only one of the alternative charges.

8527. para. 135: The Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal therefore fails in this respect.

ii. Committing the Crime of Enlistment of Children – Kondewa – Child Soldiers

8528. para. 139: The Appeals Chamber affirms that the crime of recruitment by way of conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into an armed force or group and/or using them to participate actively in hostilities constitutes a crime under customary international law entailing individual criminal responsibility.[286] Pursuant to Article 4.c. of the Statute, the crime of conscripting or enlisting children or using them to participate actively in hostilities, constitutes an other serious violation of international humanitarian law.[287] The actus reus requires that the accused recruited children by way of conscripting or enlisting them or that the accused used children to participate actively in hostilities.[288] These modes of recruiting children are distinct from each other and liability for one form does not necessarily preclude liability for the other.

8529. para. 140: According to the Trial Chamber in the AFRC Trial Judgment, enlistment means "accepting and enrolling individuals when they volunteer to join an armed force or group."[289] The act of enlisting presupposes that the individual in question voluntarily consented to be part of the armed force or group. However, where a child under the age c f 15 years is allowed to voluntarily join an armed force or group, his or her consent is not a valid defence.[290]

8530. para. 141: It is apparent to the Appeals Chamber that there is a paucity of jurisprudence on the question of how direct an act must be to constitute "enlistment" under Article 4.c., as well as the possible modes of enlistment. The Appeals Chamber holds that for enlistment there must be a nexus between the act of the accused and the child joining the armed force or group. There must also be knowledge on the part of the accused that the child is older the age of 15 years and that he or she may be trained for combat.[291] Whether such a nexus exists is a question of fact which must be determined on a case-by-case basis.

8531. para. 142: On the particular facts of this case, it is clear that the enlistment of Witness TF2-021 had taken place before he was initiated by Kondewa. The evidence shows that the Witness had first been captured by the rebels in 1995 and was later captured by the CDF in 1997.[292] Upon his capture by the CDF, Witness TF2-021 was forced to carry looted property by the CDF.[293] This act, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber constituted enlistment. For this conclusion, the Appeals Chamber draws support from paragraph 4557 of the ICRC Commentary to Article 4(3)(c) of Additional Protocol II referred to by the Trial Chamber itself.[294]

8532. para. 143: Paragraph 4557 of the Commentary states:

> "The principle of non-recruitment also prohibits accepting voluntary enlistment. Not only can a child not be recruited, or enlist himself, but furthermore he will not be 'allowed to take part in hostilities', i.e. to participate in military operations such as gathering information, transmitting orders, transporting ammunition and foodstuffs, or acts of sabotage."[295]

8533. para. 144: In the context of this case, III which the armed group is not a conventional military organisation, "enlistment" cannot narrowly be defined as a formal process. The Appeals Chamber regards "enlistment" in the broad sense as including any conduct accepting the child as a part of the militia. Such conduct would include making him participate in military operations.

8534. para. 145: In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, holds the view that Witness TF2-021 had already been enlisted before Kondewa initiated him into the Kamajors.

8535. para. 146: For the above reasons, the Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, grants Kondewa's Fifth Ground of Appeal and reverses the verdict of guilt and substitutes a verdict of not guilty on Count 8.

c. Conclusion – Child Soldiers

8536. para. 154: For the reasons stated, the Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, dismisses the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal in its entirety, grants Kondewa's Fifth Ground of Appeal, reverses the verdict of guilt on Count 8 and substitutes the verdict of not guilty.

d. Dissents - Justice Winter – Child Soldiers

8537. para. 7: I do not agree with the Majority's decisions first, to acquit Kondewa for liability under Article 6(1) of the Statute for "committing" the crime of enlisting Witness TF2-021, a child under the age of 15 into an armed force or group;[1203] second, in finding that "it cannot consider any evidence or pronounce a verdict on whether Kondewa aided and abetted the 'use' of child solders;" and third, in finding Fofana not guilty of aiding and abetting the use and enlistment of child soldiers.

i. Kondewa – Enlistment and Use of Child Soldiers – Dissents – Justice Winter – Child Soldiers

8538. para. 8: In this Judgment, the Majority overturns the Trial Chamber's finding that Kondewa was guilty of enlisting Witness TF2-021 into the CDF. In overturning the Trial Chamber's decision, the Majority finds that:

> "[I]t is clear that the enlistment of Witness TF2-C21 had taken place before he was initiated by Kondewa. The evidence shows that the Witness had first been captured by the rebels in 1995 and was later captured by the CDF in 1997. Upon his capture by the CDF, Witness TF2-021 was forced to carry looted property by the CDF."[1204]

8539. para. 9: I do not agree with this interpretation and analysis on the facts of this particular case. In finding that the act of forcing Witness TF2-021 to carry looted property constituted enlistment, the Majority misapplies the concept of enlistment as it relates to the circumstances surrounding the CDF's recruitment of children under the age of fifteen.[1205] While I agree that in certain circumstances the "use" of a child soldier may constitute enlistment, based on the Trial Chamber's findings of facts in relation to Witness TF2-021, this particular "use" could not have constituted enlistment.

8540. para. 10: Artic1e 4.c. of the Statute punishes "conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities" (emphasis added). Our earlier interlocutory decision in this case held that conscripting and enlisting children under the age of fifteen into an armed force or group and/or using children to participate actively in hostilities is prohibited under customary international law.[1206]

8541. para. 11: Enlistment entails "accepting and enrolling individuals when they volunteer to join an armed force or group."[1207] As the Majority points out, it includes any conduct accepting the child as part of an armed force or group. In my opinion, the key test to determine whether an act in question constitutes enlistment is whether the act substantially furthers the process of a child's enrolment and acceptance into an armed force or group.

8543. para. 13: In the situation where there are no formal or informal processes for enlisting individuals, especially children, the "use" of a child to participate actively hostilities may amount to enlistment. However, where the evidence demonstrates the existence of a process that contributes to the enrolment and acceptance of a child into an armed force or group, logic dictates that "use" of a child cannot constitute enlistment. Accordingly, the types of acts which constitute the crime of enlistment must necessarily depend on the particular circumstances of each case.

8544. para. 14: In the CDF, as opposed to AFRC, the Trial Chamber findings demonstrate a clearly defined enlistment process which consisted of a child receiving ritualized initiation and military training. Although the purpose of this procedure changed as the war evolved, initiation and military training remained the cornerstones of enlistment in the CDF at all times during the conflict.1208

8545. para. 15: The Trial Chamber's findings and the evidence in the trial record reveal that the initiation of Witness TF2-021 and the other twenty boys was a major part of the process of enrolling them and accepting them into the CDF. Witness TF2-014 testified that Kamajors went to war at an early age provided that they had been initiated.[1209] Expert Witness TF2-EW2 testified that initiation was a stepping stone to recruitment as a soldier because it was used as a means to prepare men and young boys to participate m the fighting groups. The Trial Chamber, nonetheless, acknowledged that initiation into the Kamajor society alone did not always amount to enlistment,[1211] and therefore, was very careful to evaluate whether a particular instance of initiation amounted to enlistment.[1212]

8546. para. 16: In the circumstances of Kondewa's initiation of Witness TF2-021 and the twenty boys around his age, the Trial Chamber considered the following evidence:

> In 1997, when the witness was eleven years old he was captured by Kamajors and forced to carry looted property. The Kamajors subsequently took him to Base Zero for initiation.
>
> At Base Zero, the witness was initiated along with around 20 other young boys. Kondewa performed the initiation and told the boys that they would be made powerful for fighting. He gave them a potion to rub on their bodies before going into battle.
> After receiving training, TF2-02l was sent on his first mission to Masiaka, where he shot a woman in the stomach and left her there on the ground. On subsequent missions, he fought with the Kamajors at Kenema, SS Camp, Joru and Daru. In 1999 TF2-021 was flown by helicopter into Freetown with three other small boys and their commanders where they were given guns and sent to support ECOMOG who were fighting the rebels at Congo Cross.[1213]

8547. para. 17: The Trial Chamber concluded that the evidence clearly showed that on this occasion, the initiates had become fighters."[1214] The Trial Chamber also found Witness TF2-021 was eleven years old when he was initiated by Kondewa.

8548. para. 18: The Trial Chamber also found that Kondewa knew or had reason to know he was initiating an eleven year old boy into the CDP because Kondewa regularly performed initiation ceremonies, issued certificates confirming e.g. the age of eleven [1215] and would have known the difference between an eleven year old boy and a fifteen year old hoy.[1216] On the basis of these findings, it is clear that Kondewa's initiation of Witness TF2-021 if 1997 was the condition sine qua non for Witness TF2-021 ‘s enrolment and acceptance into the CDF. Therefore, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that given these circumstances, when Kondewa was initiating the boys “he was also performing an act analogous to enlisting them for active military service.”[1217]

8549. para. 19: Furthermore, the act of carrying looted property that the Majority of the Appeals Chamber finds constituted enlistment, cannot be deemed as conduct accepting a child into an armed group or force. When Witness TF2-021, upon his capture in 1997, was forced to carry looted property by the CDF, he was not participating in active hostilities or in any activity that involves the CDF as a military organization, but was instead being forced to assist CDF soldiers in the illegal appropriation of property for the soldiers’ private use. Nothing in the evidence indicates he (or the soldiers for whom he was carrying looted property) was participating actively in hostilities. Looting is a term of art used by international courts to denote the appropriation of property for private purposes rather than military necessity.[1218] The Trial Chamber understood looting to refer to the appropriation of property for private purposes.[1219] This act of carrying loot, therefore, could not have constituted enlistment into an armed force or group or the use of a child to participate actively in hostilities because it was done for private purposes.

8551. para. 21: Having concluded that the evidence established beyond a reasonable doubt that Kondewa committed the crime of enlisting a child under the age of 15 into an armed force or group,[1220] I am of the opinion that the Trial Chamber should also have found Kondewa guilty of committing the crime of enlisting more than one child. The Trial Chamber found that Kondewa initiated Witness TF2-02l along with around twenty other young boys. Witness TF2-021 testified that he estimated the boys to be in almost the same age group as him, that means slightly younger than him.[1221] The Trial Chamber also found “beyond a reasonable doubt that Kondewa, in these circumstances, when initiating the boys, was also performing an act analogous to enlisting them for active military service.[1222]

8552. para. 22: On the basis of these findings alone, the Trial Chamber was required to enter a conviction against Kondewa for enlisting children rather than only Witness TF2-021.

8553. para. 23: The Majority of the Appeals Chamber concluded as well that in the absence of evidence concerning the age of the other boys, no reasonable trier of fact could have found the testimony of Witness TF2-021 sufficient to establish the age of the twenty young boys. However, as mentioned before, Witness TF2-021 testified that he estimated the boys to be in almost the same age group as him.[1223] Given that Witness TF2-021 was eleven when Kondewa initiated him, it is therefore logical and reasonable to conclude that the other twenty boys were younger than fifteen. The Trial Chamber found no reason to doubt his testimony. On the contrary, the Trial Chamber found that his testimony was "highly credible and largely reliable," and that the "intensity of his experience has left him with an indelible recollection of the events in question."[1224] In light of the fundamental principle that a Trial Chamber is in the best position to evaluate and assess the evidence, I find that the Majority's conclusion is without merit.

8554. para. 24: Other Trial Chamber findings circumstantially show that Kondewa initiated many more than 20 boys under the age of 15 and that these initiations qualified as enlistments into armed forces. In addition to the testimony given by Witness TF2-021, that Trial Chamber also accepted the evidence provided by two other former child soldiers who underwent initiation before participating in active military service.[1225] The Trial Chamber found that Witness TF2-140 was initiated into the Kamajor society at the age of 14 along with adults as well as other children who were 10 or 11 years old.[1226] Initiation fees were paid to the district initiator who then sent the fees to Kondewa, the High Priest of the Kamajors who was responsible for all of the initiators.[1227] The Trial Chamber also found that Witness TF2-004 was initiated at Liya by Muniro Sherif along with many others, including children as young as 10 years old.[1228] On the same day that he was initiated, TF2-004 left Liya to go fight in Zimmi.[1229] The purpose of the initiation was to fight the war.[1230]

8555. para. 25: Furthermore, the Trial Chamber found that the CDF as an organization was involved in the recruitment of children under the age of 15 into an armed force or group.[1231] In particular, in 1999, the CDF registered over 300 children under the age of 14 in a disarmament, demobilization and reintegration program in the Southern Province in Sierra Leone.[1232]

8557. para. 27: Given that Kondewa, as the High Priest of the entire CDF organisation, accepted initiation fees of children under the age of 15 years,[1235] was the head of all CDF initiators, performed initiations at Base Zero and the fact that no Kamajor would go to war without his blessings,[1236] Kondewa must have either personally, or through an initiator subordinate to him, enlisted many children under the age of 15 years into the CDF. In light of this evidence, I find that no reasonable trier of fact could have failed to conclude that the only reasonable inference from the evidence was that Kondewa enlisted many children under the age of 15 years into the armed forces.

8558. para. 28: I, therefore, hold that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to find that Kondewa enlisted children into the CDF and grant the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal in this respect and enter a conviction for Kondewa for enlisting many children into the CDF.

ii. Kondewa – Aiding and Abetting the Use of Child Soldiers – Dissents – Justice Winter – Child Soldiers

8559. para. 29: In relation to Kondewa's liability for aiding and abetting the "use" of child soldiers, the Majority finds that it cannot consider any evidence or pronounce a verdict on whether Kondewa was liable tor the "use" of child soldiers because the Trial Chamber declined to examine this issue. The Appeals Chamber corrected the Trial Chamber's error of law in considering that the Trial Chamber should have considered the evidence on the alternative charge. In light of the standard of appellate review, the Appeals Chamber was in a position to consider existing evidence concerning Kondewa's "use" of child soldiers, especially where the Trial Chamber had made findings demonstrating Kondewa's aiding and abetting the "use" of child soldiers.[1237] Therefore, I find the Majority's statement misplaced. I now turn to the merits of the Prosecution's appeal.

8560. para. 30: As demonstrated above, Kondewa initiated many children under the age of fifteen into the CDF. The Trial Chamber findings show that Kondewa was aware in performing these initiations for children that the purpose of initiation of many of the children was to prepare them to become fighters. Initiations were of paramount importance in Kamajor society as a prerequisite to participation in active military service. No Kamajor would go to war without Kondewa's blessings.[1238] Moreover, Kondewa's job included the preparation of herbs which the initiates smeared onto their bodies to protect themselves from bullets.[1239] He himself told initiates that the initiation would make them powerful for fighting.[1240] Furthermore, he also knew or had reason to know as demonstrated already that the children were under the age of fifteen years.[1241] On the basis of this evidence, I am also satisfied that Kondewa's initiation of these children offered practical assistance to the CDF's "use" of children under the age of fifteen to participate in active hostilities and that it had a substantial effect on the commission of this crime.

8561. para. 31: Therefore, I find that the Trial Chamber and the Majority of the Appeals Chamber erred in failing to find Kondewa liable for aiding and abetting the use of children under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities. I grant the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal in this respect and I enter a conviction accordingly.

iii. Fofana – Enlistment and Use of Child Soldiers – Dissents – Justice Winter – Child Soldiers

8562. para. 32: The Majority declines to address the merits of the Prosecution's argument under this subground of appeal because the Prosecution "merely proffers arguments based on evidence which the Trial Chamber considered and rejected, but does not point to any error in the reasoning of the Trial Chamber."[1242] I cannot agree with the Majority's position.

8564. para. 34: Based on the Trial Chamber's findings, in my opinion, no reasonable trier of fact could have come to any conclusion other than that Fofana was aware that children were both enlisted in the CDF and "used" to participate actively in hostilities. Fofana was present at the passing out parade in early January 1998, where children involved in operations were present.[1244] At a subsequent commander's meeting held on the same day, where Fofana was present,[1245] Norman commented that "adult fighters were doing less than children, just eating and meeting."[1246] Children were present at this meeting.[1247] Fofana also was one of the architects of the Black December Operation,[1248] an operation where children were present everywhere on the frontlines and in support roles,[1249] The Trial Chamber also found that Fofana was present at Base Zero for its entire existence, and was the overall boss of Base Zero and that child soldiers were present at various times at Base Zero,[l250] At Base Zero, Kondewa also initiated children into the CDF, and the child initiates were trained for war there.[1251] being enlisted and used to participate actively in hostilities because Fofana, was the 'Director of War' for the CDF. He was part of the High Command and actually made many decisions along with Norman and Kondewa and was the overall boss of the Commanders at Base Zero.[1254] Significantly, he was also the one responsible for the receipt and provision of logistics to the frontline, including the provision of manpower.[1255] Given that he had to have known that the CDF was enlisting and "using" children in active military service, his provision of logistics, manpower, and strategic directions provided practical assistance and had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime of enlisting and using children under the age of fifteen to participate actively hostilities.

8567. para. 37: Furthermore, there is ample evidence in the trial record that Fofana, as a leader in the High Command of the CDF, did not take a stand in public or at any of the commanders' meetings against the enlistment or use of children under the age of 15 in military activities. Although Fofana did not enlist or use child soldiers personally, I am satisfied that his high position within the CDF command structure and his physical presence at meetings where child soldiers were either present or were discussed, constituted tacit approval, encouragement and moral support to the commanders and Kamajors to continue to enlist and use children under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities.[1256] Fofana's tacit approval served to leave no doubt in the minds of the Kamajors that they enjoyed his full support in their enlistment and use of child soldiers. I am thus satisfied that Fofana's conduct had a substantial effect on the commission of this crime.

8568. para. 38: I, therefore, grant the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal in this respect as well and find Fofana responsible under Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting the crimes of enlistment of children under the age of 15 into armed forces or groups and the use of children under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities, crimes punishable under Article 4.c. of the Statute.

8569. para. 39: For the foregoing reasons I dismiss Kondewa's Fifth Ground of Appeal and grant the Prosecution's Fifth Ground of Appeal in its entirety.

(v) Talia / Base Zero

a. Kondewa – Talia / Base Zero

i. Committing Murder – Kondewa – Talia / Base Zero

8571. para. 196: First, Kondewa submits that the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber in finding that the Town Commander actually died was "skeletal at best" and did not establish that the Town Commander was dead. Second, Kondewa argues that the Trial Chamber erred in relying solely on this uncorroborated hearsay evidence of Witness TF2-096 in finding Kondewa guilty for committing the murder of the town commander, as the Trial Chamber failed to exercise the appropriate caution in reviewing the hearsay evidence. Third, Kondewa submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its reliance on circumstantial evidence to convict him of murder because "inferences reasonably to be drawn from the evidence must not only be consistent with Kondewa's guilt but inconsistent with every reasonable hypothesis of Kondewa's innocence." He asserts that a number of alternative explanations exist, such as that the Town Commander could have been murdered by someone else.

8572. para.197: In response, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber took into account the hearsay evidence only as corroborating the eyewitness testimony of Witness TF2-096. Therefore, the Prosecution submits that this evidence and the inferences to be drawn from all of the relevant evidence in the case as a whole were not only consistent with Kondewa's individual responsibility for shooting and killing one of the town commanders, but were inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of Kondewa' s innocence. The Prosecution argues that Witness TF2-096' s testimony that the Town Commander "fell" should naturally be understood as a statement that the victim was shot dead. The Prosecution argues that this was the understanding of everyone in the courtroom including the Defence Counsel, as there was no objection to the Prosecution's subsequent question about how the witness knew the person who killed the town commander.

8573. para. 198: Before assessing whether the Trial Chamber erred in its application of the law to the facts, the Appeals Chamber considers it necessary to set out the applicable law. The Appeals Chamber considers that as a matter of law it is permissible to base a conviction on circumstantial evidence and/or hearsay evidence. Because hearsay evidence is admissible as substantive evidence in order to prove the truth of its contents, the Appeals Chamber considers that establishing the reliability of hearsay evidence is of paramount importance.

8576. para. 201: Witness TF2-096 testified that she saw Kondewa shoot one of the town commanders and that he fell. Immediately after witnessing this incident, the witness ran away. The Appeals Chamber finds that the fact that she did not herself witness that the town commander was dead, leaves the possibility open that someone else may have killed the town commander. The Trial Record does not contain any evidence corroborating the veracity of Witness TF2-096's testimony that the Kamajors identified the graves of the two people dancing. Furthermore, no evidence indicates the identity of the Kamajors or whether they were present during the incident during which Witness TF2-096 saw Kondewa shoot the town commander. In addition, no further evidence concerned whether the town commander died. No nexus exists between Kondewa's act and the death of the town commander. The evidence that the town commander died is insufficient and, therefore, the offence of murder has not been proved.

8577. para. 202: Therefore, because Witness TF2-096's testimony did not establish that the town commander died, no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the only reasonable inference was that Kondewa killed the town commander. Further, even if it had been established that the Town Commander died, someone else could have killed the town commander after Witness TF2-096 ran away, given that it has not been established that the town commander died because of Kondewa's shot.

8578. para. 203: Having found that the death of the Town Commander was not proved beyond reasonable doubt, the Appeals Chamber comes to the conclusion that the Trial Chamber was in error in finding that the Town Commander was killed by the Kamajors as alleged in the Indictment.

8579. para. 204: The Appeals Chamber grants Kondewa's Second Ground of Appeal.

(vi) Acts of Terrorism

a. Aiding and Abetting – Acts of Terrorism

8580. para. 331: The Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law and fact in failing to find Fofana and Kondewa criminally responsible for acts of terrorism under Article 6(1) of the Statute for aiding and abetting "acts of terrorism" in the town of Tongo. It submits that on the findings of the Trial Chamber and the evidence it accepted, the only conclusion open to any reasonable tribunal of fact is that first, the perpetrators of crimes committed in Tongo had the specific intent of terrorizing the population and second, that Fofana and Kondewa as aiders and abetters had the requisite knowledge of the specific intent to spread terror.

8581. para. 332: In support of its argument, it claims that the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence exclusively relied on the instructions given by Norman at the December 1997 Passing Out Parade. It submits that the instructions given by Norman was but one of a number of factors that should have been considered by the Trial Chamber.

8582. para. 333: The Prosecution further challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that "while spreading terror may have been Norman's primary purpose in issuing the order to kill captured enemy combatants and 'collaborators,' . . . this is not the only reasonable inference that can be drawn from the evidence." It argues that orders given by Norman demonstrate an intent to spread terror. Statements such as "any junta you capture, instead of wasting your bullet, chop of his left [hand] as an indelible mark [...] to be a signal," can only be reasonably interpreted as demonstrating the specific intent to spread terror amongst the civilian population.

8583. para. 334: The Prosecution lists several proven acts of violence committed in Tongo and argues that becausle of the "gruesomeness and cruelty of these acts, the fact that it targeted civilians according to their ethnicity, the modus operandi of the Kamajors, and the fact that the entrails of one victim were displayed in front of the remaining civilians" no reasonable tribunal of fact could have concluded that these acts did not show the specific intent to spread terror.

8584. para. 335: In submitting that both Fofana and Kondewa had knowledge of the physical perpetrators' specific intent to spread terror, the Prosecution contends that first, the contents of the orders given by Norman indicate an intention to spread terror and second, that they had knowledge that civilians had in the past been terrorized by the CDF.

8585. para. 336: In response, Fofana submits that knowledge of the specific intent to spread terror cannot be imputed to him from the orders given by Norman. He proffers alternative inferences that may be drawn from Norman's comments and argues that at best, Norman's comments contained an intent to commit criminal acts but that it "cannot be interpreted ... in its meaning to transfer knowledge on Fofana of a specific intent of the Kamajors to spread terror."

8586. para. 337: Kondewa similarly submits that the "decision by the Trial Chamber to rely on the instruction at the Passing Out Parade was within its discretion" and that even if it is established that the specific intent of the perpetrators of acts of violence committed in Tongo was to spread terror" there is no evidence to suggest that he had the requisite knowledge that such was the case.

8587. para. 366: The Appeals Chamber has previously endorsed the following statement of the mens rea for aiding and abetting:

> "The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator. However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed."

8588. para. 367: The person aiding and abetting a specific intent crime need not possess the principal's intent to commit the crime, but must at least have knowledge of the principal's specific intent.

8589. para. 368: In regard to the acts of terrorism committed in Tongo, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by the Prosecution's submission that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have found that Fofana and Kondewa may not have been aware of the specific intent to commit acts of terrorism in Tongo. The Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber's error resulted from its "exclusive reliance on the instruction given by Norman at the December 1997 Passing Out Parade to determine whether the perpetrators of the proven acts of violence had the specific intent to terrorise the civilian population." Contrary to the Prosecution's assertion, the Trial Chamber used evidence of Norman's statements at the December 1997 Passing Out Parade to determine whether Fofana and Kondewa were aware of his specific intent to spread terror. While the instructions given by Norman are inherently illegal, they are ambiguous with respect to his intent to spread terror, and therefore a reasonable tribunal of fact could have determined that Fofana and Kondewa were not aware of the specific intent with respect to any acts of terrorism in Tongo.

8590. para.369: The Prosecution further argued that Fofana must have known of the specific intent to commit acts of terrorism because he was aware "that the Kamajors who operated in the towns of Tongo Field had previously engaged in criminal conduct." A similar argument was advanced in relation to Kondewa.[729] However, the Prosecution makes no submission as to how knowledge of past general intent crimes would provide Fofana or Kondewa with knowledge of the principal's specific intent to spread terror.

8591. para. 370: The Prosecution's argument with respect to Fofana's and Kondewa's liability for aiding and abetting acts of terrorism in Tongo must be rejected.

CHAPTER 13 - ARTICLE 6.3 LIABILITY

A. CHARLES TAYLOR

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, SCSL-03-01-I, Indictment, 7 March 2003

(a) Individual Criminal Responsibility

(i) The Accused

8593. CHARLES GHANKAY TAYLOR aka DANKPANNAH CHARLES GHANKAY TAYLOR aka GHANKAY TAYLOR aka DANKPANNAH CHARLES GHANKAY MACARTHUR TAYLOR (the ACCUSED) was born on 27 or 28 January 1948 at Arthington in the Republic of Liberia.[421]

8594. From the late 1980's the ACCUSED was the Leader or Head of the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL), an organized armed group.[422]

8595. From 2 August 1997 until about 11 August 2003, the ACCUSED was the President of the Republic of Liberia.[423]

8596. Paragraphs 1 through 3 are incorporated by reference in CHARGES below.[424]

(ii) Charges

8597. By his acts or omissions in relation to the below described events, the ACCUSED, pursuant to Article 6.1. and, or alternatively, Article 6.3. of the Statute, is individually criminally responsible for the crimes alleged below.[425]

(iii) Individual Criminal Responsibility

8598. In addition, or alternatively, pursuant to Article 6.3. of the Statute, the ACCUSED, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising command and control over subordinate members of the RUF, AFRC, AFRC/RUF Junta or alliance, and/or Liberian fighters, is individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute as

[422] Taylor Indictment, para. 2.
[423] Taylor Indictment, para. 3.
[424] Taylor Indictment, para. 4.

alleged in this Amended Indictment. The ACCUSED is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the ACCUSED failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[426]

2. Trial Judgement

The Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgement, 18 May 2012

(a) Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

(i) General - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.1 of the Statute

8599. para. 488: Article 6(3) of the Statute provides:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

(ii) Elements of Superior Responsibility - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

8600. para. 490: In order to establish criminal liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute, three requirements must be proved beyond reasonable doubt:

i. The existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the Accused as superior and the perpetrator of the crime;

ii. The Accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was about to be or had been committed; and

iii. The Accused failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the crime or punish the perpetrators thereof. [1154]

8601. para. 491: The principle that an individual may be held responsible as a superior in the course of an armed conflict is established in customary international law. [1155] The scope of Article 6(3) does not only include military commanders, but also political leaders and other civilian superiors in possession of authority. [1156]

8602. para. 492: The responsibility of a superior is not limited to crimes committed by subordinates in person, but encompasses any mode of criminal liability proscribed in Article 6(1) of the Statute. It follows that a superior can be held responsible for failure to prevent or punish a crime which was planned, ordered, instigated or aided and abetted by subordinates. [1157]

(iii) Existence of a Superior-Subordinate Relationship - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

(iv) Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

8606. para. 496: For a superior to be held responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, it must be established that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit or had committed such crimes. [1166]

a. Actual Knowledge - Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

8607. para. 497: Actual knowledge may be defined as the awareness that the relevant crimes were committed or about to be committed. [1167] There is no presumption of such knowledge but, in the absence of direct evidence, it may be established through circumstantial evidence. [1168] Factors indicative of actual knowledge include, first of all, an individual's superior position and the superior's geographical and temporal proximity to the crimes; [1169] also, the type and scope of crimes, the time during which they occurred, the number and type of troops and logistics involved, the widespread occurrence of crimes, the tactical tempo of operations, the modus operandi of similar illegal acts and the officers and staff involved. [1170]

b. Imputed Knowledge - Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

8608. para. 498: In determining whether a superior "had reason to know", or imputed knowledge, that his or her subordinates were committing or about to commit a crime, it must be shown that specific information was available which would have put the superior on notice of crimes committed or about to be committed. [1171] The superior may not be held liable for failing to acquire such information in the first place. [1172] However, it suffices for the superior to be in possession of sufficient information, even general in nature, written or oral, of the likelihood of illegal acts by subordinates. [1173] The superior need only have notice of a risk that crimes might be carried out and there is no requirement that this be a strong risk or a substantial likelihood. [1174]

8609. para. 499: It is clear from the case law referred to above that negligence is insufficient to attribute imputed knowledge, and that a superior cannot be held liable for having failed in his duty to obtain information in the first place. [1175] What is required is the superior's awareness of information which should have prompted him or her to acquire further knowledge. [1176] Responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute will attach when the superior remains wilfully blind to the information that is available to him. [1177]

(v) Failure to Prevent or Punish - Law on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

distinct duties: it is the superior's primary duty to intervene as soon as he or she becomes aware of crimes about to be committed, while taking measures to punish will only suffice if the superior did not become aware of these crimes until after they were committed. [1178]

8611. para. 501: As regards the duty to prevent the crimes of subordinates, the type of necessary and reasonable measures a superior must take is a matter of evidence rather than one of substantive law. [1179] Generally, it can be said that the measures required of the superior are limited to those within his or her material ability under the circumstances, [1180] including those that may lie beyond his or her formal powers. [1181] The type and extent of measures to be taken depend on the degree of effective control exercised by the superior at the relevant time, and on the severity and imminence of the crimes that are about to be committed. [1182]

8612. para. 502: The duty to punish only arises once a crime under the Statute has been committed. [1183] A superior is bound to conduct a meaningful investigation with a view to establish the facts, order or execute appropriate sanctions, or report the perpetrators to the competent authorities in case the superior lacks sanctioning powers. [1184] According to the ICTY Appeals Chamber, there is no support in customary international law for the proposition that a commander can be held responsible for crimes committed by a subordinate prior to the commander's assumption of command over that subordinate. [1185]

(b) Legal Findings on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

(i) Superior Responsibility- Legal Findings on Responsibility Pursuant to Article 6.3 of the Statute

8613. para. 6977: Article 6(3) of the Statute provides for criminal responsibility if a superior knew or had reason to know that his or her subordinate was about to commit crimes prohibited by the Statute or had done so, and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or punish the perpetrators of such crimes. [15605]

8615. para. 6979: The Trial Chamber has considered whether the Accused had "effective control" over the RUF and the AFRC. The Accused had substantial influence over the leadership of the RUF, and to a lesser extent that of the AFRC. However, the Trial Chamber notes that substantial influence over the conduct of others falls short of effective control. In considering whether the Accused exercised effective control over the RUF and the AFRC, it has examined his interactions with the leaders of these groups closely.

8616. para. 6980: The Trial Chamber first considered the relationship of the Accused and Sankoh in the pre-Indictment period. The evidence on record establishes that from 1990 to March 1997 Sankoh was the sole leader of the RUF and that he did not take orders from the Accused. When Foday Sankoh was arrested in March 1997 he instructed Bockarie to take direction from the Accused, but the evidence showed that Sankoh was not handing over his command to the Accused. Instead, the evidence indicated that Sankoh maintained control of the RUF leadership. Moreover, had the Accused been effectively in control of the RUF, such an order would not have come from Sankoh. On the basis of the evidence, the Trial Chamber found that Sankoh was not a subordinate to the Accused. [15606]

8618. para. 6982: With regard to Issa Sesay, who was appointed as Interim Leader of the RUF in 2000, the Trial Chamber notes that Sesay refused to accept the appointment from the Accused and others without the approval of the RUF and Sankoh, [15608] indicating that Sesay was not initially a subordinate of the Accused and that the Accused did not have effective control over the RUF during Sesay's tenure as Interim Leader of the RUF.

8619. para. 6983: Similarly, the Trial Chamber notes that the Accused gave guidance, advice, instruction and direction to Johnny Paul Koroma when he was leader of the AFRC/RUF Junta, but the evidence does not establish that Koroma was a subordinate of the Accused, nor that the Accused had effective control over the AFRC/RUF Junta, i.e. that the Accused was in a position to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or punish Koroma for the commission of crimes.

8620. para. 6984: With regard to Liberian fighters who were found to have participated in the commission of crimes in Sierra Leone, the Trial Chamber notes that even if they were sent to Sierra Leone by the Accused, there is insufficient evidence to find beyond a reasonable doubt that they remained under the authority or effective control of the Accused once in Sierra Leone. Similarly, the Trial Chamber notes that the evidence is insufficient to establish that repatriated Sierra Leoneans who were sent by the Accused to Sierra Leone were under the authority or effective control of the Accused upon their return to Sierra Leone

8621. para. 6985: As the RUF and AFRC leaders were not subordinates of the Accused, and the RUF and AFRC/RUF Junta were not under the effective control of the Accused, the Trial Chamber need not consider the other elements of superior responsibility.

8622. para. 6986: In light of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused is individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute, as alleged in the Indictment by virtue of holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising command and control over subordinate members of the RUF, AFRC, AFRC/RUF Junta or alliance, and/or Liberian fighters.

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-2004-15-PT, Indictment, 13 May 2004

(a) Individual Criminal Responsibility

(i) The Accused

8624. Paragraphs 1 through 18 are incorporated by reference.[427]

[427] RUF Indictment, para. 19.

8625. At all times relevant to this Indictment, ISSA HASSAN SESAY was a senior officer and commander in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces.[428]

8626. Between early 1993 and early 1997, ISSA HASSAN SESAY occupied the position of RUF Area Commander. Between about April 1997 and December 1999, ISSA HASSAN SESAY held the position of the Battle Group Commander of the RUF, subordinate only to the RUF Battle Field Commander, SAM BOCKARIE aka MOSQUITO aka MASKITA, the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[429]

8627. During the Junta regime, ISSA HASSAN SESAY was a member of the Junta governing body. From early 2000 to about August 2000, ISSA HASSAN SESAY served as the Battle Field Commander of the RUF, subordinate only to the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[430]

8628. FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH has been incarcerated in the Republic of Sierra Leone from about May 2000 until about 29 July 2003. From about May 2000 until about 10 March 2003, by order of FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, ISSA HASSAN SESAY directed all RUF activities in the Republic of Sierra Leone.[431]

8629. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MORRIS KALLON was a senior officer and commander in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces.[432]

8630. Between about May 1996 and about April 1998, MORRIS KALLON was a Deputy Area Commander. Between about April 1998 and about December 1999, MORRIS KALLON was Battle Field Inspector within the RUF, in which position he was subordinate only to the RUF Battle Group Commander, the RUF Battlefield Commander, the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[433]

8631. During the Junta regime, MORRIS KALLON was a member of the Junta governing body.[434]

8632. In early 2000, MORRIS KALLON became the Battle Group Commander in the RUF, subordinate only to the RUF Battle Field Commander, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, the leader of the

8633. About June 2001, MORRIS KALLON became RUF Battle Field Commander, subordinate only to the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, ISSAHASSAN SESA Y, to whom FODA Y SA YBANA SANKOH had given direct control over all RUF operations, and to the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[436]

8634. At all times relevant to this Indictment, AUGUSTINE GBAO was a senior officer and commander in the RUF and AFRCIRUF forces.[437]

8635. AUGUSTINE GBAO joined the RUF in 1991 in Liberia. Prior to the coup, AUGUSTINE GBAO was Commander of the RUF Internal Defence Unit, in which position he was in command of all RUF Security units.[438]

8636. Between about November 1996 until about mid 1998, AUGUSTINE GBAO was a senior RUF Commander in control of the area of Kailahun Town, Kailahun District. In this position, between about November 1996 and about April 1997, AUGUSTINE GBAO was subordinate only to the RUF Battle Group Commander, the RUF Battle Field Commander and the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH. In this position, between about April 1997 and about mid 1998, AUGUSTINE GBAO was subordinate only to the RUF Battle Field Commander, the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[439]

8637. Between about mid 1998 and about January 2002, AUGUSTINE GBAO was Overall Security Commander in the AFRC/RUF forces, in which position he was in command of all Intelligence and Security units within the AFRC/RUF forces. In this position, AUGUSTINE GBAO was subordinate only to the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[440]

8638. Between about March 1999 until about January 2002, AUGUSTINE GBAO was also the joint Commander of AFRC/RUF forces in the Makeni area, Bombali District. As commander of AFRC/RUF forces in the Makeni area, AUGUSTINE GBAO was subordinate only to the RUF

Battle Field Commander, the leader ofthe RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.[441]

8639. In their respective positions referred to above, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, individually, or in concert with each other, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA aka JPK, FODA Y SA YBANA SANKOH, SAM BOCKARIE aka MOSQUITO aka MASKITA, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA aka TAMBA ALEX BRIMA aka GULLIT, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA aka IBRAHIM BAZZY KAMARA aka ALHAJI IBRAHIM KAMARA, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU aka 55 aka FIVE-FIVE aka SANTIGIE KHANU aka S. B. KHANU aka S.B. KANU aka SANTIGIE BOBSON KANU aka BORBOR SANTIGIE KANU and/or other superiors in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces, exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces.[442]

8640. At all times relevant to this Indictment and in relation to all acts and omissions charged herein, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, through their association with the RUF, acted in concert with CHARLES GHANKAY TAYLOR aka CHARLES MACARTHUR DAPKPANA TAYLOR.[443]

8641. In addition, or alternatively [to responsibility under Article 6.1. of the Statute], pursuant to Article 6.3. of the Statute, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over their subordinates, are individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute. Each Accused is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[444]

2. Trial Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Judgement, 2 March 2009

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8643. See above: Chapter 12 – Article 6.1. Liability – RUF – Trial Judgment – Findings and conclusions - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.1. – paras. 244-247 [6725].

8644. para. 281: In addition or in the alternative, the Prosecution alleges that the Accused are responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 18 of the Indictment as these crimes were allegedly committed while the Accused were holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising command and control over their subordinates.[506]

8645. para. 282: The Chamber subscribes to the principle that superior responsibility is today anchored firmly in customary international law.[507] To this end, the Chamber endorses the views of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Celebici that the individual criminal responsibility of superiors for failure to prevent or to punish crimes committed by subordinates was already an established principle of customary international law in 1992[508] whether the crimes charged were committed in the context of an international or an internal armed conflict.[509] The Chamber further adopts the finding of the Appeals Chamber of the Ad Hoc Tribunals that the principle of individual criminal responsibility of superiors is applicable to both civilian and military superiors.[510]

8646. para. 283: The Chamber is of the opinion that the nature of responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) is based upon the duty of a superior to act, which consists of a duty to prevent and a duty to punish criminal acts of his subordinates.[511] Therefore, "it is the failure to act when under a duty to do so which is the essence of this form of responsibility."[512] It is responsibility for an omission[513] in which a superior may be held criminally responsible when he fails to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or to punish the offender, as the case may be.[514]

8647. para. 284: The Chamber is satisfied that superior responsibility encompasses criminal conduct by subordinates under all modes of participation under Article 6(1) of the Statute.[515] "It follows that a superior can be held criminally responsible for his subordinates' planning, instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting a crime."[516]

8648. para. 285: The Chamber opines that the following three elements must be satisfied in order to invoke individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute:

> (i) The existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the superior and the offender of the criminal act;
> (ii) The superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and
> (iii) The superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the offender thereof.[517]

8649. para. 1971: In addition, we endorse the established jurisprudence that an accused may not be convicted under Article 6(1) and Article 6(3) in respect of the same conduct. The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that:

> [I]t is not appropriate to convict under both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) of the Statute. Where both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) responsibility are alleged under the same count, and where the legal requirements pertaining to both of these heads of responsibility are met, a Trial Chamber should enter a conviction on the basis of Article 7(1) only, and consider the accused's superior position as an aggravating factor in sentencing.[3695]

8650. para. 1972: The Chamber is of the opinion that it would be inappropriate to hold a superior criminally responsible for ordering, planning, instigating or aiding and abetting the commission of crimes and at the same time reproach the superior for failing to prevent or punish the perpetrators.[3696] The Chamber's position on this issue is fortified by the Prosecution's pleading that superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute is only pleaded "in addition, or alternatively" to the individual responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute.

8651. para. 1973: As responsibility under Article 6(1) subsumes responsibility under Article 6(3) for the purpose of entering a conviction, the Chamber considers that it is neither necessary nor appropriate, in the interests of judicial efficiency, to debate the Accused's liability under both heads of responsibility.[3697] Although the Chamber has made detailed findings on the Accused's command roles within the RUF throughout the Indictment period,3698 the Chamber will proceed to determine the Accused's superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute only in respect of crimes for which the Accused are not liable under Article 6(1).

a. Superior-subordinate relationship - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

8653. para. 287: The Appeals Chamber has confirmed that the "effective control" test must be applied in determining whether a superior—subordinate relationship exists.[520] According to this test, the superior must possess the "material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct".521 The indicators of effective control are more a matter of evidence than of substantive law [522] and must be determined on a case-by-case basis.[523] Mere substantial influence that does not meet the threshold of effective control is not sufficient under customary international law to serve as a means of exercising superior criminal responsibility.[524]

8654. para. 288: The power or authority of the superior to prevent or to punish does not arise solely from a de jure status of a superior conferred upon him by official appointment.[525] Someone may also be considered to be a superior based on the existence of de facto powers or degree of control. This may often be the case in contemporary conflicts where only de facto armies and paramilitary groups subordinated to self-proclaimed governments may exist.[526]

8655. para. 289: Moreover, while possession of de jure powers may "suggest a material ability to prevent or punish criminal acts of subordinates, it may be neither necessary nor sufficient to prove such ability[…]" The possession of de jure authority, without more, provides only some evidence of effective control.[527] In other words, while the de jure authority may be evidentially relevant to such a determination,[528] the Prosecution will still bear the burden of proving effective control beyond reasonable doubt.[529]

8656. para. 290: The necessity of proving that the principal perpetrator was the subordinate of the Accused "does not require direct or formal subordination. Rather the Accused has to be, by virtue of his position, senior in some sort of formal or informal hierarchy to the perpetrators."[530] Hierarchy, subordination and chains of command need not be established in the sense of a formal organisational structure as long as the test of effective control is met.[531] Further, "there is no requirement that the superior-subordinate relationship be immediate in nature for a Commander to be found liable for the acts of his subordinate."[532]

8658. para. 292: In applying the test of effective control, this Chamber will consider inter alia the following indicators which would demonstrate that the Accused exercised effective control: the nature of the Accused's position, including his position within the military or political structure; the procedure for appointment and the actual tasks performed;[536] his capacity to issue orders[537] and whether or not such orders are actually executed by his subordinates;[538] the fact that subordinates show greater discipline in the presence of the Accused than when he is absent;[539] the authority of the Accused to invoke disciplinary measures;[540] the nature of negotiations in which the Accused has represented the armed group;[541] and the authority of the Accused to release or transfer prisoners.542 The Chamber is satisfied that the absence of any other authority over the perpetrators in no way implies that an Accused exercised effective control.[543] Any evidence of prior indiscipline or non-compliance with orders by subordinates is relevant in this determination of effective control.[544] The fact that a superior is compelled to use force to control some of his subordinates does not automatically lead to the conclusion that the superior does not exercise effective control over them as this could, in some situations, even demonstrate that the superior has the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of crimes.[545]

8659. para. 293: The Chamber has also considered indicia which may be particularly useful in assessing the ability of superiors in irregular armies to exercise effective control such as: the superior's entitlement to looted property and natural resources; control over the fate of vulnerable persons such as women and children; access to or control of arms, ammunition and communications equipment; protection by loyal personal security guards; the propagation of the ideology of the movement to which the subordinates adhere; the interaction with external bodies or individuals on behalf of the group; the ability to reward himself with positions of power and influence and to intimidate subordinates into compliance.[54]

8660. para. 294: This Chamber has also considered when a superior may be held liable for a failure to fulfil his duty to prevent or punish and, in particular, whether a superior may be held liable for a failure to punish his subordinates for an act that occurred before he assumed effective control over those subordinates.

8661. para. 295: The Chamber notes that, by a three-two majority, the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Hadzihasanovic et al. case held that individual criminal responsibility for superior command responsibility did not exist at customary international law for crimes that occurred before an Accused became a superior over the subordinates in question.[547] Justice Shahabuddeen and Justice Hunt strongly dissented.[548] In the most recent Appeal Judgement in Oric, the majority of the Chamber, which included Justice Shahabuddeen, declined to pronounce on the issue on the basis that it was not necessary based on the particular findings in the Oric Appeal. Justice Shahabuddeen clearly stated, however, that he agreed with the two dissenting Judges that the holding in the Hadzihasanovic et al. was wrong in law.[549] This Chamber is not bound by decisions of the ICTY Appeals Chamber, but will, however, consider all relevant jurisprudence and be guided by these decisions as appropriate.[550]

8662. para. 296: This Chamber has already held that the individual criminal responsibility of superiors for failure to prevent or to punish crimes committed by subordinates is firmly established in customary international law. The Chamber considers that any application of the principle of superior responsibility that can reasonably fall within the application of this principle would therefore also exist at customary international law.[551] Customary international law cannot be expected to address every possible factual permutation and if a particular factual situation can reasonably fall within the application of the principle of superior command responsibility as it exists at customary international law, then the principle can be so applied.

8663. para. 297: Article 6(3) of the Statute provides that a Commander is criminally responsible if he "knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such criminal acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof." This language is identical to Article 6(3) of the ICTR Statute and Article 7(3) of the ICTY Statute.

8664. para. 298: The language of this provision is broad, and clearly envisions a superior's responsibility for preventing acts that are about to be committed and for punishing acts that have already been committed.[552] A superior is not held criminally liable for the criminal act itself, but rather for a failure in his duty to either prevent or punish the subordinate as the case may be. The Chamber adopts the statement of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Krnojelac that:

> It cannot be overemphasised that, where superior responsibility is concerned, an accused is not charged with the crimes of his subordinates but with his failure to carry out his duty as a superior to exercise control.[553]

8665. para. 299: Given this basis of superior responsibility, the Chamber considers that the focus of the liability must be on the time during which the superior failed in his duty to prevent or punish. Thus, the Chamber is satisfied that, in order to incur criminal responsibility as a superior, the superior must have had effective control over the perpetrator at the time at which the superior is said to have failed to exercise his powers to prevent or to punish.[554] While in practice the superior will also often have effective control at the time that the subordinate commits or is about to commit a criminal act, this in itself is not required. Thus, if a superior assumes command after a crime has been committed by his subordinates and he knows or has reason to know that such a crime has been committed, the Chamber is of the opinion that to assume his responsibility as a superior officer, he will have the duty to punish the perpetrators from the moment he assumes effective control.

8666. para. 300: The Chamber considers that this principle was properly stated by the Trial Chamber in Oric:

> The superior must certainly have effective control of the relevant subordinates at the time when measures of investigation and punishment are to be taken against them. Such a link, however, appears less essential, if necessary at all, with regard to the time at which the crime was committed. The duty to prevent calls for action by the superior prior to the commission of the crime, and thus presupposes his power to control the conduct of his subordinates. The duty to punish, by contrast, follows the commission of a crime of which the superior need not have been aware, and thus at the moment of commission was in fact out of his or her control to prevent. Since a superior in such circumstances is obliged to take punitive measures notwithstanding his or her ability to prevent the crime due to his lack or her lack of awareness and control, it seems only logical that such an obligation would also extend to the situation wherein there has been a change of command following the commission of a crime by a subordinate. The new Commander in such a case, now exercising power over his or her subordinates and being made aware of their crimes committed prior to the change of command, for the sake of coherent prevention and control, should not let them go unpunished…. Consequently, for a superior's duty to punish, it should be immaterial whether he or she had assumed control over the relevant subordinates prior to their committing the crime.[555]

8667. para. 301: The Chamber is also satisfied that this holding is consistent with the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Celebici which concluded that:

> As long as a superior has effective control over subordinates, to the extent that he can prevent them from committing crimes or punish them after they committed > the crimes, he would be held responsible for the commission of the crimes if he failed to exercise such abilities of control.[556]

8668. para. 302: The Chamber has also considered the sources of law relied on by the majority in the Hadzihasanovic et al. Appeal Decision to determine the content of superior responsibility at customary international law. Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I provides:

> The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach.

8669. para. 303: Similarly, in relation to the duties of Commanders, Article 87(3) of Protocol I states:

> The High Contracting Parties and Parties to the conflict shall require any Commander who is aware that subordinates or other persons under his control are going to commit or have committed a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol, to initiate such steps as are necessary to prevent such violations of the Conventions or this Protocol, and, where appropriate, to initiate disciplinary or penal action against violators thereof.

8670. para. 304: The Chamber is of the opinion that both of these provisions must be read together to properly understand their full content.[557] While Article 86(2) refers to knowledge that a subordinate was committing or was about to commit a crime, Article 87(3) places a duty on Commanders whose subordinates are "going to commit or have committed a breach". Thus, while the majority of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Hadzihasanovic et al. relied on Article 86(2) to conclude that a superior could only be liable for subordinates who were under his effective control at the time of the criminal act,[558] this Chamber concludes that this interpretation is not consistent with the Articles when read together. Moreover, this Chamber considers that such an interpretation would be inconsistent with the object and purpose of the Additional Protocol and would "leave a gaping hole in the protection which international humanitarian law seeks to provide for the victims of the crimes committed contrary to that law."[559]

8671. para. 305: The Chamber has also considered Article 28 of the ICC Statute which, in a very complex provision compared to that of Article 6(3) of the SCSL Statute, refers to a military Commander who "either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes."[560] While this Chamber does consider that the ICC Statue has value in determining the state of customary international law,[561] the Chamber is also cognisant of the fact that the ICC Statute was also often the product of delicate negotiations and compromises.[562] Furthermore, if this provision is interpreted to mean that the Commander must have known of the crimes either before or during their commission, then this would also mean that superiors who exercised effective control at the time of the criminal acts, but only found out about the crimes after they had been completed, would be under no obligation to either report the matter for investigation or to punish.[563]

8672. para. 306: For all of these reasons, this Chamber is satisfied that the principle of superior responsibility as it exists in customary international law does include the situation in which a Commander can be held liable for a failure to punish subordinates for a crime that occurred before he assumed effective control. While it must clearly be established that the superior exercised effective control over the subordinate who committed the crime at the time that there was an alleged failure in his duty to punish, it is not necessary that the effective control also existed at the time of the criminal act.

8673. para. 307: Similarly, in order to hold a Commander liable for the acts of subordinates who operated under his command on a temporary basis, it must be demonstrated that the Commander had "effective control over subordinates, to the extent that he can prevent them from committing crimes or punish them after they committed the crimes […]".[564] This Chamber understands that the relevant time period for the effective control of the superior relates again to the time during which the superior is alleged to have failed to prevent or failed to punish the subordinates for the criminal acts.

b. Knowledge - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8674. para. 308: In order to hold a superior responsible under Article 6(3) of the Statute for crimes committed by a subordinate, the Chamber is of the opinion that the Prosecution must prove that the superior knew or had reason to know that his subordinate was about to commit or had committed such crimes. Responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute is not a form of strict liability.[565]

8675. para. 309: The actual knowledge of the superior, that is, that he knew that his subordinate was about to commit or had committed the crime, may not be presumed and may be established by direct evidence or through circumstantial evidence from which it may be inferred that the Commander had in fact acquired such knowledge.[566] The superior must have knowledge of the alleged criminal conduct of his subordinates and not simply knowledge of the occurrence of the crimes themselves.[567] Various factors or indicia may be considered by the Chamber when determining the actual knowledge of the superior. Such indicia would include: the number, type and scope of the illegal acts; the time during which the illegal acts occurred; the number and type of subordinates involved; the logistics involved, if any; the means of communication available; the geographical location of the acts; the widespread occurrence of the acts; the tactical tempo of operations; the modus operandi of similar illegal acts; the officers and staff involved; and the location of the superior at the time and the proximity of the acts to the location of the superior.[568]

8676. para. 310: The Chamber accepts the jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals that the "had reason to know" standard will only be satisfied if information was available to the superior which would have put him on notice of offences committed by his subordinates or about to be committed by his subordinates.[569] Such information need not be such that, by itself, it was sufficient to compel the conclusion of the existence of such crimes.[570] It need not, for instance, take "the form of specific reports submitted pursuant to a monitoring system" and "does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed".[571] It can be general in nature, but it must be sufficiently alarming so as to alert the superior to the risk of the crimes being committed or about to be committed,[572] and to justify further inquiry in order to ascertain whether indeed such crimes were committed or were about to be committed by his subordinates.[573] The superior need only have notice of a risk that crimes might be carried out and there is no requirement that this be a strong risk or a substantial likelihood.[574]

> [A] Trial Chamber may take into account the failure by a superior to punish the crime in question. Such a failure is indeed relevant to the determination of whether, in the circumstances of a case, a superior possessed information that was sufficiently alarming to put him on notice of the risk that similar crimes might subsequently be carried out by subordinates and justify further inquiry. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber stresses that a superior's failure to punish a crime of which he has actual knowledge is likely to be understood by his subordinates at least as acceptance, if not encouragement, of such conduct with the effect of increasing the risk of new crimes being committed.[576]

8678. para. 312: The superior cannot be held liable for having failed in his duty to obtain such information in the first place.[577] The information in question must be available to the superior, but the superior need not have actually acquainted himself with the information.[578] Thus, the superior cannot remain wilfully blind to information that is available to him.[579] In any event, an assessment of the mental element required by Article 6(3) of the Statute should be conducted in the particular circumstances of each case, taking into account the specific situation of the superior concerned at the time in question.[580]

c. Necessary and reasonable measures - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8679. para. 313: The Chamber is of the opinion that a superior may be held responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute if he has failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of a crime or punish the perpetrators thereof. Necessary measures are those measures appropriate for the superior to discharge his obligation by showing that he genuinely tried to prevent or punish a crime. Reasonable measures can be said to be those "reasonably falling within the material powers of the superior."[581] The determination of what constitutes necessary and reasonable measures that fulfil the duty of the Commander must be made on a case-by-case basis and is not a matter of substantive law, but of evidence.[582]

8680. para. 314: Under Article 6(3), the superior has a duty both to prevent the commission of the offence and punish the perpetrators. These are not alternative obligations – they involve different crimes committed at different times: "the failure to punish concerns past crimes committed by subordinates, whereas the failure to prevent concerns future crimes of subordinates."[583] The duty to prevent arises from the time a superior acquires knowledge, or has reason to know that a crime is being or is about to be committed, while the duty to punish arises after the superior acquires knowledge of the commission of the crime.[584] "A superior must act from the moment that he acquires such knowledge. His obligations to prevent will not be met by simply waiting and punishing afterwards."[585]

8681. para. 315: The Chamber is of the opinion that whether a superior has discharged his duty to prevent the commission of a crime will depend on his material ability to intervene in a specific situation. In making this determination, the Chamber may take into account factors such as those which have been enumerated in the Strugar case on the basis of the case law developed by the military tribunals in the aftermath of World War II: the superior's failure to secure reports that military actions had been carried out in accordance with international law, the failure to issue orders aimed at bringing the relevant practices into accord with the rules of war, the failure to protest against or to criticise criminal action, the failure to take disciplinary measures to prevent the commission of atrocities by the fighters under the superior's command and the failure to insist before a superior authority that immediate action be taken.[586] As part of his duty to prevent subordinates from committing crimes, the Chamber is of the view that a superior also has the obligation to prevent his subordinates from following unlawful orders given by other superiors.

8683. para. 317: The Chamber is of the opinion that the duty imposed on a superior to punish subordinate offenders includes the obligation to investigate the crime or to have the matter investigated to establish the facts in order to assist in the determination of the proper course of conduct to be adopted.[589] The superior has the obligation to take active steps to ensure that the offender will be punished.[590] The Chamber further takes the view that, in order to discharge this obligation, the superior may exercise his own powers of sanction, or if he lacks such powers, report the offender to the competent authorities.[591]

(ii) Pleading

8684. para. 327: Where the criminal responsibility of an accused person for an offence is based on an allegation of superior responsibility, the Prosecution must plead "the relationship of the accused to his subordinates, his knowledge of the crimes and the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take to prevent the crimes or to punish his subordinates" with a sufficient degree of specificity.[605] Therefore, an Indictment must particularise both the conduct of an accused by which he is alleged to be responsible as a superior and the alleged criminal conduct of his subordinates.[606]

8685. para. 328: With respect to the conduct of persons other than an accused under Article 6(3), although the Prosecution must still provide the particulars which it is able to give, the relevant allegations will usually be pleaded with a relatively lower degree of precision than allegations made under Article 6(1). A relatively lower degree of specificity is required in an Indictment in relation to allegations of superior responsibility. This is because the details of these acts, including the identities of victims and physical perpetrators, may be unknown. Moreover, the acts themselves generally will not "be greatly in issue".[607]

8686. para. 406: The Sesay and Kallon Defence both argued in their Final Trial Briefs that the Indictment is defective because it does not plead adequately the material facts underlying the responsibility of the Accused pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statue.[780] The Sesay Defence, relying on both the AFRC Appeal Judgement and the judgement of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Blaskic,[781] submitted that the Indictment must plead the following particulars of allegations of superior responsibility under Article 6(3): the alleged perpetrators of the crimes; the conduct of the Accused by which he may have known or had reason to know that crimes were being committed or had been committed by his subordinates; the related conduct of those alleged subordinates and the relationship of the accused to his subordinates; his knowledge of the crimes; and the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take to prevent the crimes or to punish his subordinates.[782] The Kallon Defence submitted that this Chamber should adopt the ICTY specificity standards as they are set out in the Blaskic Appeal Judgement.[783] The Kallon Defence also submitted that the Indictment is defective for failing to differentiate between the material facts underlying Kallon's alleged responsibility pursuant to Articles 6(1) and 6(3).[784] The Prosecution, on the other hand, argued that the Indictment meets the legal requirements in the Statute and the Rules.[785] Citing the Sesay Form of Indictment Decision, the Prosecution also submitted that it may be sufficient for the Indictment to plead the legal pre-requisites embodied in the provisions of the Statute.[786]

8687. para. 407: The Chamber considers that the material facts required to be pleaded in the Indictment are those articulated by the Appeals Chamber, namely, facts such as "the relationship of the accused to his subordinates, his knowledge of the crimes and the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take to prevent the crimes or to punish his subordinates".[787] The Chamber recalls that a lower degree of specificity is required in the Indictment when the Prosecution alleges liability under a theory of superior responsibility.[788]

8688. para. 408: Given the circumstances of this case, the Chamber finds that it is sufficient to describe the nature of the relationship between an Accused and his subordinate by reference to the command position of the Accused.[789] The Chamber finds that the identities of victims and perpetrators were pleaded with adequate particularity in relation to allegations under Article 6(3). It also was permissible for the Prosecution to plead the material facts underlying both individual and superior responsibility in a manner which was consistent with both.[790]

8690. para. 410: Taking into account all of the foregoing considerations, we are of the view that the Kallon Defence has not demonstrated the existence of a clear error of reasoning in the Sesay Form of Indictment Decision where we upheld the form of the pleading of allegations of superior responsibility. We are of the opinion that, considering the scale and duration of the conflict, the nature of the evidence presented to the Court, and the complexities of the RUF command structure, the Accused were provided with adequate notice of the material facts underlying their alleged superior responsibility for the crimes set out in the Indictment. We do not find that the Defence has demonstrated the existence of a clear error of reasoning in the Sesay Form of Indictment Decision and we therefore decline to reconsider that decision.

8691. Separate Concurring Opinion – Justice B.Thompson – para. 10 (p. 700): As regards the degree of specificity for the pleading of allegations pursuant to Article 6(3) of the said Statute, my reading of the case-law is that the Prosecution must plead with sufficient particularity (a) the relationship of the Accused to his subordinates, (b) the Accused's knowledge of the crimes, and (c) the necessary and reasonable measures of a preventive or punitive character not taken by the accused.

(iii) Kono District

a. Crimes committed – Kono District

8692. para. 2062: The Prosecution alleges that the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute and, or in addition, Article 6(3) of the Statute for crimes committed in Kono District between about 14 February 1998 and about 30 June 1998.

8693. para. 2063: The Chamber has found that the following crimes were committed during the period from 14 February 1998 and the end of April 1998, which period we have found corresponds to the continuation of the AFRC/RUF joint criminal enterprise:

1. Unlawful Killings (Counts 1 to 5) (…)
2. Sexual Violence (Counts 1 and 6 to 9) (…)
3. Physical Violence (Counts 1 to 2 and 10 to 11) (…)
4. Enslavement (Count 13) (…)
5. Pillage (Count 14) (…)
6. Acts of Terrorism and Collective Punishments (Counts 1 to 2) (…)

8694. para. 2065: The Chamber finds that the following crimes were committed by RUF members in Kono District after the joint criminal enterprise ceased to exist sometime in late April 1998:

1. Unlawful Killings (Counts 1 and 4 to 5) (…)
2. Sexual Violence (Counts 1 and 6 to 9) (…)
3. Physical Violence (Counts 1 and 10 to 11) (…)
4. Enslavement (Count 13) (…)

b. Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8695. para. 2122: Having found Sesay liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Kono District between February 1998 and April 1998 and the forced mining in Kono District between December 1998 and about 30 January 2000, the Chamber will proceed to determine his liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the remaining crimes we found to have been committed within the Indictment period.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

ii. May 1998 to November 1998 – Superior-subordinate relationship – Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8696. para. 2123: The Chamber recalls its findings on the command role of Sesay for the period May 1998 to November 1998. From early March 1998 to end of April 1998, Sesay was based in Buedu in Kailahun District as BFC and worked closely with Bockarie.[3823] We have found Sesay liable for crimes committed in Kono District in this period through his participation in the AFRC/RUF joint criminal enterprise.

8697. para. 2124: We recall that in May 1998, Sesay was assigned as BFI to Pendembu. Although Sesay was an active Commander in Pendembu, DIS-174 testified that Sesay's control was limited to Kailahun District at that time.[3824] There is also evidence that while Superman was overall Commander for Kono District from March until August 1998, he refused to take orders from Sesay.[3825] The Prosecution did not adduce sufficient evidence about the RUF's operations in Kono District between August and November 1998 to allow a proper determination of Sesay's involvement in Kono District at that time. Furthermore, no evidence was adduced to establish that Sesay communicated with or was able to give orders to RUF fighters in Kono District during this period. There is evidence of the failed Fiti-Fata mission during that time, but there is no evidence to establish any command or superior-subordinate relationship by Sesay for that period.

8698. para. 2125: The Chamber accordingly finds that it has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Sesay was in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono District during the period from May to the end of November 1998.

iii. December 1998 to January 2000 – Superior-subordinate relationship – Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8699. para. 2126: The Chamber recalls its findings on the command role of Sesay as a RUF superior Commander from December 1998 to September 2000. In the first or second week of December 1998, Bockarie recalled Sesay to Buedu and reinstated him as BFC. Sesay was therefore only subordinate to the Commander-in-Chief Bockarie and the Leader Sankoh in the RUF command structure. Sesay led and commanded the successful RUF attack to re-capture Koidu in December 1998. He also proceeded to capture Makeni and Masiaka and was subsequently based at the Teku Barracks in Makeni until March 1999 and again from October 1999 until February 2000, at which time he temporarily moved to Koidu. He returned to Makeni on 2 May 2000. Sesay's command capability and responsibility only increased in early 2000 when Sankoh appointed him as his deputy after Bockarie left the RUF for Liberia at that end of December 1999.[3826]

8700. para. 2127: The Chamber recalls the evidence that Sesay regularly gave orders to RUF troops, received reports from them and regularly communicated with Bockarie and Sankoh. There is also evidence that Sesay deployed forces, disciplined fighters, monitored the movement of NGOs in RUF-controlled territory and communicated with civil society groups on behalf of the RUF.[3827] The Chamber finds that such evidence proves Sesay's seniority and ability to effectively control RUF fighters under his command during that period of time.

8701. para. 2128: The Chamber is satisfied that Sesay regularly visited Kono District between December 1998 and January 2000. Sesay had a house in an area of Koidu known as "Lebanon."[3828] Sesay was deeply involved in mining operations in Kono District between December 1998 and January 2000.[3829] TF1-367 interacted with Sesay regularly and testified that Sesay was always accompanied by a coterie of bodyguards.[3830] Sesay visited Yengema on several occasions and the training Commander there reported to him.[3831] In July 1999 Sesay reported to

Bockarie that he was taking certain RUF members and materials to the Kono axis to reinforce it.[3832] Prominent civilians in Kono District knew Sesay as the man in charge of the RUF.[3833]

8702. para. 2129: The Chamber notes that throughout the period ranging from March to October 1999, Superman and RUF fighters loyal to him remained largely around Makeni in Bombali District and the Port Loko area. AFRC fighters also remained in these Districts. Although there is evidence of Superman being in sporadic contact with Bockarie and Sankoh throughout this period, the Chamber finds that Sesay's effective command did not extend to those fighters in Bombali and Port Loko Districts.[3834] Rather, the Chamber is of the view that between March and October 1999 Sesay and Superman each enjoyed control over different groups of RUF fighters and we are satisfied that the rift between them did not undermine Sesay's ability to effectively control the RUF fighters in Kono District.

8703. para. 2130: Predicated upon the foregoing, the Chamber finds that Sesay was in a superior subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono District between December 1998 and the end of September 2000. We therefore find that he exercised effective control over the RUF rebels who enslaved an unknown number of civilians at Yengema training base throughout this period.

iv. Knowledge – Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8704. para. 2131: The Chamber is satisfied that Sesay had actual knowledge of the enslavement of civilians at Yengema due to his visits to the base and the fact that he received reports pertaining to its operation. The Chamber therefore finds that Sesay knew that an unknown number of civilians were enslaved there between December 1998 and January 2000.

v. Failure to prevent / punish – Sesay – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8705. para. 2132: The Chamber finds that there is no evidence that Sesay attempted to prevent or punish the perpetrators of the enslavement of civilians at the military training base at Yengema. Rather, we observe that Sesay actively monitored the prolongation of this crime in his capacity as BFC.

8706. para. 2133: The Chamber therefore finds Sesay liable pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the enslavement of an unknown number of civilians at Yengema training base between December 1998 and about 30 January 2000.

c. Kallon – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8707. para. 2134: Having found Kallon liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Kono District between February 1998 and April 1998 and the killing of Waiyoh in May or June 1998, the Chamber will proceed to determine his liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the remaining crimes committed within the Indictment period in Kono District.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Kallon - Superior responsibility – Kono District

ii. April 1998 to November 1998 – Superior-subordinate relationship – Superior responsibility – Kallon – Kono District

8708. para. 2135: The Chamber recalls its findings on the command role of Kallon within the RUF organisation from February 1998 to November 1998. The Chamber has found that between April and August 1998, Kallon was able to give orders to troops that were obeyed and he commanded troops within his area of responsibility of laying ambushes.[3835] In addition, Kallon interacted with the Battalion Commanders in Kono District as an intermediary between them and Superman.[3836] Kallon was a Vanguard and we recall the further indicia of authority that he had personal bodyguards, access to a radio set and subordinates who forced civilians to mine for him personally.[3837]

8709. para. 2136: The Chamber recalls that Superman called muster parades in Kono District but as a senior officer Kallon had the right to address the parades.[3838] This evidence indicates that Kallon enjoyed a high public profile among the troops. Kallon was known to be a strict disciplinarian[3839] and he was feared by RUF troops in Kono District. Kallon killed both AFRC and RUF fighters whom he deemed to be acting contrary to orders.[3840]

8710. para. 2137: The Chamber further finds that although the Commanders of the civilian camps in Kono District were directly subordinate to Superman, Kallon had a supervisory role over the camps.[3841] We recall that Kallon visited Kaidu and Wendedu several times and he was superior to the Commander of the civilians, RUF Rocky. Civilians were required to see Kallon in order to obtain permission to travel outside the Kaidu area, as Rocky did not have the authority to issue travel passes. Further, it was Kallon who gave orders to move the civilians when the camps became too close to the front lines.[3842] Kallon also on one occasion assigned Rocky as the leader of a mission to Bumpeh.[3843] The Chamber accordingly finds it established beyond reasonable doubt that Kallon was able to exercise effective control over Rocky as the Commander of the civilian camps.

8711. para. 2138: The Chamber finds that by virtue of the complex culture of status, assignment and rank within the RUF there were senior RUF Commanders in Kono District over whom Kallon did not have effective control, such as Superman, Isaac Mongor3844 and RUF Rambo.[3845]

8712. para. 2139: We further find that the killings of Sata Sesay's family were committed on the specific orders of Superman, over whom Kallon did not have effective control. The Chamber recalls that the relationship between Kallon and Superman in Kono District was difficult and certain RUF fighters were very loyal to Superman. It is not clear whether (Col.) KS Banya departed Kono District with Superman in August 1998. In the absence of evidence that Kallon was in fact able to give orders to Col. Banya, who was himself an RUF Commander, the Chamber finds that there is reasonable doubt as to whether Kallon had effective control over or was in a superior-subordinate relationship with (Col.) KS Banya. The Chamber accordingly does not find Kallon liable under Article 6(3) for this killing.

8713. para. 2140: In relation to the killings at PC Ground, we have found that the affiliation of the perpetrators of this crime has not been established.[3846] The witness was an abducted civilian in the custody of STF fighters and the time frame of the killing was between April and May 1998. There is accordingly a reasonable doubt as to whether Kallon had effective control over the perpetrators, who may have been STF, RUF or AFRC fighters and the Chamber opines that Kallon did not have effective control over this group of fighters.

8714. para. 2141: The Chamber recalls that the Prosecution has failed to establish Kallon's position and command role after the failed Fiti-Fata Mission in August 1998.[3847] Subject to the findings in the preceding paragraphs (2135-2140), the Chamber accordingly finds that Kallon was in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono District until August 1998 only.

iii. December 1998 to January 2000 – Superior-subordinate relationship – Superior responsibility – Kallon – Kono District

8715. para. 2142: The Chamber recalls its findings on Kallon's command role between December 1998 and January 2000.[3848] Kallon was Sesay's second in command throughout this period and the standard operating procedure until Bockarie's departure in December 1999, was for Bockarie to send orders to Sesay who would pass them on to Kallon.[3849] In December 1999, Kallon replaced Superman as BGC.[3850]

8716. para. 2143: It is unclear whether Kallon's position as BFI remained active throughout 1999, as the RUF were not engaged in large scale combat operations for much of this period. From March to October 1999, Kallon was the RUF Commander in Magburaka in Tonkolili District.[3851]

8717. para. 2144: On various occasions in 1999 Sankoh also gave instructions directly to Kallon via radio and Kallon reported to Sankoh.[3852] It is indicative of Kallon's seniority that he was so close to Sankoh.[3853] Kallon's messages to Sankoh over the radio were often sent through Sesay and Bockarie, demonstrating that the chain of command from the Leader to the CDS to the BFC was respected and functioned properly.[3854] The content of these messages demonstrates that Kallon was in command of troops and conducting military operations. For instance, in May 1999, when Sankoh ordered Kallon to report on enemy movements within "his area," Kallon replied that "Magburaka, Makali, Matotoka, Masingbi, Mabonto and other important towns" were under control.[3855] Kallon also took troops to regain control of areas which had come under Kamajor attack.[3856]

8719. para. 2146: For the foregoing reasons, the Chamber finds that Kallon had effective control over the RUF fighters who carved "RUF" into the backs and arms of civilian men in Tomandu in May 1998; the RUF fighters who forcibly married TF1-016 and her daughter in Kissi Town between May and June 1998; and the RUF fighters who enslaved hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998. As this latter crime is of a continuous nature, we find it immaterial to Kallon's responsibility for its commission that he departed Kono District in August 1998.

8720. para. 2147: The Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established that Kallon exercised effective control over the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Kono District between December 1998 and about 30 January 2000.

iv. Knowledge – Kallon – Superior responsibility - Kono District

8721. para. 2148: The Chamber has found that Kallon occupied a supervisory role with respect to the civilian camps and we are therefore satisfied that Kallon had actual knowledge of the enslavement of civilians there. The Chamber is further of the view that the commission of the crime of 'forced marriage' was widespread in Kono District and indeed throughout Sierra Leone and we find that in these circumstances, Kallon had reason to know of the fighters who committed this crime at Kissi Town.

8722. para. 2149: However, the Prosecution has failed to establish that Kallon knew or had reason to know of the mutilation inflicted on the civilian men at Tomandu. We recall that Kallon, although a senior RUF Commander, did not occupy a formal position within the operational command structure of the RUF and it is therefore unclear to what extent he received reports on the actions of troops throughout Kono District. In particular, the Prosecution has not proven that Kallon was ever in Tomandu or had reason to know of events there. We therefore find that the Prosecution has not proved beyond reasonable doubt an essential element of superior responsibility and we find Kallon not liable under Article 6(3) for this act of mutilation.

v. Failure to prevent / punish – Kallon – Superior responsibility - Kono District

8723. para. 2150: The Chamber finds that Kallon failed to prevent or punish the commission of the crimes of enslavement and 'forced marriage' by his subordinates in Kono District.

8724. para. 2151: The Chamber therefore finds that Kallon is responsible under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the 'forced marriages' of TF1-016 and her daughter in Kissi Town between May and June 1998 and the RUF fighters who enslaved hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998.

d. Gbao – Superior responsibility – Kono District

8725. para. 2152: Having found Gbao liable for the crimes committed in Kono District between February 1998 and April 1998 through his participation in the AFRC/RUF joint criminal enterprise, Justice Boutet dissenting, the Chamber will proceed to determine his liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed between April 1998 and about 30 January 2000.

8726. para. 2153: The Chamber recalls that Gbao was based in Kailahun District at the time of the Intervention and remained there until February 1999, when he was deployed to Makeni by Sesay, who was then the BFC. Gbao was the Overall Security Commander and Overall IDU Commander, in which assignment he monitored and supervised the various security units within the RUF. This assignment, however, did not entitle Gbao to exercise command and control over any RUF fighters or over the Overall Commanders of the various security units, or over any fighters or fighting units.[3858]

8727. para.2154: In addition, the Chamber finds that there is insufficient evidence to establish that Gbao was involved with the operation of security units in Kono District from his base in Kailahun District and then in Makeni. During this period there is reasonable doubt as to whether Gbao possessed the material ability to control any RUF fighters in Kono District.

8728. para.2155: The Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has failed to establish that Gbao was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the RUF fighters who perpetrated crimes in Kono District between April 1998 and about 30 January 2000.

(iv) Bombali District

8729. para. 2179: The Prosecution alleges that the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1), or alternatively Article 6(3), of the Statute for the crimes of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12), enslavement (Count 13) and pillage (Count 14) committed in Bombali District between 1 May 1998 to 30 November 1998.

8730. para. 2180: The Chamber heard evidence of heinous criminal acts committed in Bombali District within the Indictment period. However, the Chamber recalls its finding that the fighters in Bombali District were under the command of SAJ Musa, Gullit or Superman, who were not acting in concert with or under the control of any of the Accused.[3863]

8731. para. 2181: The Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused are liable under either Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute for any crimes committed in Bombali District during the period between 1 May 1998 and 30 November 1998.

(v) Freetown and Western Area

a. Crimes committed – Freetown and Western Area District

8732. para. 2182: The Prosecution alleges the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1), or alternatively Article 6(3), of the Statute for the crimes of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12), enslavement (Count 13) and pillage (Counts 14) between 6 January and 28 February 1999. The Chamber recalls its Legal Findings on Freetown and the Western Area, wherein we have enumerated the crimes committed in respect of the Counts charged.[3864]

b. Superior Responsibility of the Accused – Freetown and Western Area District

8733. para. 2127: The Prosecution has not established that Sesay, Kallon or Gbao were in a superiorsubordinate relationship with respect to the AFRC fighters in Freetown. The Chamber accordingly finds that the three Accused are not liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area between 6 January 1999 and 28 February 1999.

(vi) Port Loko District

8734. para. 2218: The Prosecution alleges that the Accused are individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, and/or alternatively Article 6(3) of the Statute, for the crimes/acts of terrorism and collective punishment (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12) and enslavement (Count 13) committed in Port Loko District between about February 1999 and April 1999.

8735. para. 2219: The Chamber heard evidence of criminal acts committed in Port Loko District within the Indictment period. However, the Chamber recalls its finding that the renegade AFRC fighters in Port Loko District were not at any time during the Indictment period acting in concert with or under the control of any of the Accused.[3901] The Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has failed to prove that the Accused are liable under either Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Port Loko District.

(vii) Koinadugu District

8736. para. 2174: The Prosecution alleges that the Accused are individually criminal responsible pursuant to Article 6(1), or alternatively Article 6(3), of the Statute for the crimes of terrorism and collective punishment, (Counts 1 and 2), unlawful killings (Counts 3 to 5), sexual violence (Counts 6 to 9), physical violence (Counts 10 and 11), conscription, enlistment and use of child soldiers (Count 12), enslavement (Count 13) and pillage (Count 14) committed in Koinadugu District between 14 February 1998 to 30 September 1998.

8737. para. 2175: The Chamber heard evidence of egregious criminal acts committed in Koinadugu District within the Indictment period. However, the Chamber recalls its finding that the fighters in Koinadugu District were under the command of SAJ Musa, Gullit or Superman, who were not acting in concert with or under the control of any of the Accused.[3861]

8738. para. 2176: In relation to the crimes committed in Koinadugu District the Chamber has found that the crimes in that district were primarily committed by AFRC troops under the command of SAJ Musa [3862] or Gullit. The Chamber has found that no joint criminal enterprise existed from the time Gullit moved out of Kono with the AFRC fighters to join SAJ Musa. The Chamber has found that Gullit and the AFRC fighters left Kono District because of a major dispute between the RUF and the AFRC. SAJ Musa, Gullit and other AFRC fighters contemplated their individual and separate plan that did not involve the RUF. They planned to attack the capital in order to "re-instate" the army. Therefore the Chamber has found that the joint criminal enterprise dissolved in April 1998.

8739. para. 2177: The Chamber has furthermore found that the Accused did not have any effective control over SAJ Musa, Gullit or any of the AFRC fighters that joined Gullit to Koinadugu District. In addition, the Chamber has found that the Accused did not have any effective control over Superman when he defected from the main RUF group in August 1998.

8740. para. 2178: Therefore the Chamber finds that the Accused are not responsible for any of the crimes committed in Koinadugu District between 14 February 1998 to 30 September 1998. The Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused are liable under either Article 6(1) or Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

(viii) Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

a. Crimes committed

8741. para. 2220: The Chamber has found that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts.

b. Superior Responsibility of the Accused – Conscription, Enlistment and Use of Child soldiers

8742. para. 2237: The Chamber further concludes that the Prosecution has failed to establish that Gbao was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of these crimes. We accordingly find that Gbao is not liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the conscription of persons under the age of 15 into the RUF or the use of children under the age of 15 by the RUF to actively participate in hostilities.

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, 26 October 2009

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Pleading liability for superior responsibility

8743. para. 64: The Trial Chamber, relying on the Appeals Chamber's statement of the law in the Brima et al. Appeal Judgment, considered the following material facts concerning liability pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute were required to be pleaded in the Indictment: (i) the relationship of the accused to his subordinates, (ii) his knowledge of the crimes [142] and (iii) the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take to prevent the crimes or to punish his subordinates.[143]

8744. para. 65: In relation to pleading mens rea for superior responsibility, the Trial Chamber found that because the "mens rea of the Accused for the liability as a superior is pleaded explicitly in paragraph 39 of the Indictment and incorporated into each Count by paragraph 40, ... the Accused's knowledge of the crimes and his failure to prevent or punish those crimes, therefore, is adequately pleaded in the Indictment."[144]

8745. para. 66: Sesay challenges the pleading of (i) his relationship with his alleged subordinates, (ii) his mens rea with respect to the alleged crimes, and (iii) the necessary and reasonable measures that he failed to take. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber notes that Sesay was convicted of the following crimes pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute:

(i) Enslavement (Count 13) in relation to events in Yengema in Kono District;

(ii) Intentionally directing attacks against the UNAMSIL peacekeeping operations (Count 15) in relation to events in Bombali, Port Loko, Kono and Tonkolili Districts;

(iii) Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, (Count 17) in relation to events involving UNAMSIL peacekeepers in Bombali and Tonkolili Districts.[145]

In the circumstances, the Appeals Chamber will only consider Sesay's submissions in relation to the pleading of crimes for which Sesay was convicted.

8746. para. 67: In relation to enslavement at Yengema in Kono District, the Trial Chamber found that "Sesay had actual knowledge of the enslavement of civilians at Yengema due to his visits to the base and the fact that he received reports pertaining to its operation. The Chamber therefore found that Sesay knew that an unknown number of civilians were enslaved there between December 1998 and January 2000."[146]

8747. para. 69: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay's mens rea as a superior with respect to these crimes was "pleaded explicitly in paragraph 39 of the Indictment and incorporated into each Count by paragraph 40 and therefore Sesay's knowledge of the crimes and his failure to prevent or punish those crimes ... is adequately pleaded in the Indictment."[151] Paragraph 39 of the Indictment states:

> In addition, or alternatively, pursuant to Article 6.3. of the Statute, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over their subordinates, are individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute. Each Accused is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[152]

8748. para. 70: The case law of the ICTY Appeals Chamber suggests that there are at least two ways in which the mens rea for superior responsibility can be adequately pleaded in an indictment.[153] In the Blaškić Appeal Judgment, the ICTY Appeals Chamber summarized these possible approaches as follows:

> With respect to the mens rea, there are two ways in which the relevant state of mind may be pleaded: (i) either the specific state of mind itself should be pleaded as a material fact, in which case, the facts by which that material fact is to be established are ordinarily matters of evidence, and need not be pleaded; or (ii) the evidentiary facts from which the state of mind is to be inferred, should be pleaded.[154]

8749. para. 71: The Appeals Chamber notes that the form of pleading in the Indictment is consistent with the first formulation, and endorses the view that this is sufficient in the circumstances of some cases. Sesay has not offered any argument that specific acts or conduct relied upon by the Trial Chamber to infer his mens rea constituted material facts that should have been pleaded in the Indictment. The facts relied upon by the Trial Chamber are related to the functions of the RUF command, the nature of which was sufficiently pleaded in the Indictment.[155] The Appeals Chamber therefore dismisses this part of Sesay's submissions.

8750. para. 72: In relation to enslavement of civilians at the military base at Yengema, Sesay argues that he lacked notice of the identity of his alleged subordinates and what measures he was alleged to have failed to take to prevent or punish them.[156] The Trial Chamber found that (i) "RUF rebels enslaved an unknown number of civilians at the military training base at Yengema between December 1998 and January 2000";[157] (ii) Sesay was a RUF superior Commander during this period, and that he exercised effective control over RUF subordinates at Yengema;[158] (iii) the training Commander at Yengema reported to Sesay;[159] (iv) Sesay "had actual knowledge of the enslavement of civilians at Yengema due to his visits to the base and the fact that he received reports pertaining to its operation;"[160] (v) Sesay actively monitored the prolongation of the commission of enslavement; and (vi) there was no evidence that he attempted to prevent or punish it.[161]

> 20. At all times relevant to this Indictment, ISSA HASSAN SESAY was a senior officer and commander in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces.

> of the RUF, subordinate only to the RUF Battle Field Commander, SAM BOCKARIE aka MOSQUITO aka MASKITA, the leader of the RUF, FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH and the leader of the AFRC, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA.
>
> 23. FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH has been incarcerated in the Republic of Sierra Leone from about May 2000 until about 29 July 2003. From about May 2000 until about 10 March 2003, by order of FODAY SAYBANA SANKOH, ISSA HASSAN SESAY directed all RUF activities in the Republic of Sierra Leone.

8752. para. 74: The above paragraphs, in addition to paragraphs 34, 39 and 44 of the Indictment indicate the subordinates subject to Sesay's command were fighters of the RUF and AFRC/RUF forces. Paragraph 34 provides that Sesay "exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces." Paragraph 39 alleges that "while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over his subordinates," Sesay is "individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute." It further alleges that he "is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof." Paragraph 44 provides that "members of the AFRC/RUF subordinate to and/or acting in concert with ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO committed the crimes set forth below in paragraphs 45 through 82 and charged in Counts 3 through 14."

8753. para. 75: In relation to the specific crimes at the military training camp at Yengema, paragraph 40 incorporates the previous paragraphs. Paragraph 71 particularises the charge of enslavement in relation to Kono District, and states:

> 71. Between about 14 February 1998 to January 2000, AFRC/RUF forces abducted hundreds of civilian men, women and children, and took them to various locations outside the District, or to locations within the District such as AFRC/RUF camps, Tombodu, Koidu, Wondedu, Tomendeh. At these locations the civilians were used as forced labour, including domestic labour and as diamond miners in the Tombodu area;

> By their acts or omissions in relation to these events, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, pursuant to Article 6.1. and, or alternatively, Article 6.3. of the Statute, are individually criminally responsible for the crimes alleged below: Count 13: Enslavement, a CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 2.c. of the Statute.

8754. para. 76: These paragraphs demonstrate that Sesay's command position and his relationship with his subordinates were pleaded at all the relevant times. They further show that he was alleged not to have taken the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish the crimes alleged. The manner in which these material facts were to be proven was a matter of evidence and thus not for pleading. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, dismisses Sesay's sub-ground of appeal concerning the pleading of his relationship to his subordinates.

8755. para. 77: Sesay's contention that the failure of notice caused the Trial Chamber to commit an "error of law" such that it found, allegedly inconsistently, "that recruits who had been captured in Kono District were trained at Yengema base" and "that recruits from Kono and Bunumbu base were trained at Yengema"[162] appears to be an alleged error of fact rather than of law. Even so, his argument is misplaced. The Trial Chamber found that the RUF training base was moved in December 1998 from Bunumbu, Kailahun District to Yengema, Kono District and that civilians from both Bunumbu in Kailahun and from Kono were trained at Yengema.[163]

8756. para. 78: In relation to the attacks against UNAMSIL peacekeepers, Sesay did not state which were the material facts that should have been pleaded in the Indictment. In the absence of such clarification, the Appeals Chamber is unable to address Sesay's submission on the merits.

8757. para. 132: Kallon challenges the pleading of his liability as a superior for crimes in Kono District. The Appeals Chamber notes that he was convicted pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute of the following crimes in Kono District:

> (...) (v) Enslavement (Count 13) in relation to events in unspecified locations in Kono District;

8758. para. 133: Kallon makes general submissions that he lacked notice that he was alleged to have superior responsibility for crimes committed in Kono District, but he fails to provide substantiating arguments.[257] His submissions are at odds with a plain reading of the Indictment. It charges that Kallon "was a senior officer and Commander in the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces,"[258] and that when he was a "Battle Field Inspector, … he was subordinate only to the RUF Battle Group Commander, the Battlefield Commander, the leader of the RUF … and the leader of the AFRC."[259] Kallon was BFI at the times relevant to his convictions for crimes in Kono.[260] The Indictment further charges that in his position, Kallon "exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the RUF, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces"[261] and that he "is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and … failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof."[262] The Indictment expressly lists locations in Kono District as those at which the crimes charged under Counts 6-9 and 13 were committed [263] and states that by his "acts or omissions in relation to these events, … MORRIS KALLON …, pursuant to … Article 6.3. of the Statute, is individually criminally responsible for" the crimes charged under Counts 6-9 and 13.[264]

8759. para. 134: In relation to sexual violence, forced marriages and acts of terrorism at Kissi Town in Kono District, Kallon additionally argues that his subordinates at Kissi Town "were never sufficiently or at all particularized."[265] The Appeals Chamber notes, however, that in addition to the pleading of Kallon's superior position, discussed above, the Indictment states that the crimes were committed by "members of AFRC/RUF" at "Kissi-town (or Kissi Town)… and AFRC/RUF camps such as … Kissi-town (or Kissi Town) camp."[266] The Indictment, therefore, puts Kallon on notice of the charge that ARFC/RUF members who were his subordinates at Kissi Town committed the crimes charged in Counts 6-9. Kallon fails to argue how this pleading did not sufficiently identify his subordinates.

(ii) Kono District – Superior responsibility

a. Sesay – Kono District– Superior responsibility - Enslavement

8760. para. 706: The Trial Chamber found Sesay liable under superior responsibility for the enslavement of an unknown number of civilians at Yengema training base in Kono District between December 1998 and about 30 January 2000.[1823]

8761. para. 709: Sesay complains about a lack of sufficiently specific findings.[1832] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber was required only to make findings on those facts which were essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count.[1833] In the present instance, Sesay does not explain how the Trial Chamber's identification of his culpable subordinates as "RUF rebels" at the Yengema base,[1834] the victims as "civilians who had been captured in Kono,"[1835] or the duration of their captivity as "from 1998 until disarmament"[1836] were insufficiently reasoned so as to undermine the Trial Chamber's determination of Sesay's guilt under superior responsibility.

8764. para. 712: In the absence of a finding as to whether the forced military training at the Yengema base amounted to the crime of enslavement, there was no legal basis on which the Trial Chamber could find that Sesay incurred superior responsibility for this crime at the Yengema base. The Trial Chamber therefore erred in law in so finding.[1843] This error invalidates Sesay's conviction under Article 6.3 of the Statute insofar as it relates to enslavement at the Yengema training base between December 1998 and about 30 January 2000.[1844] Any implications of this finding will be considered in sentence. Having thus found, the Appeals Chamber need not consider the remainder of Sesay's present ground of appeal.

b. Kallon - Kono District– Superior responsibility

8765. para. 811: Kallon's second submission is that the Trial Chamber contradicted itself as to his authority. The Trial Chamber found that, after the February/March 1998 attack on Koidu, Kallon remained in Kono District "and reported to Superman."[2120] He was one of several RUF Commanders who were "not directly within the control hierarchy of Superman and did not have discrete combat units or forces assigned to their command."[2121] The Appeals Chamber fails to see how these findings prevented any reasonable trier of fact from finding that Kallon nonetheless

"was an operational Commander who gave orders which were complied with by troops" and entrusted with the assignments given to Kallon.[2122] The finding that Kallon "did not occupy a formal position within the operational command structure of the RUF" and that "it is therefore unclear to what extent he received reports on the actions of troops throughout Kono District"[2123] pertains to Kallon's superior responsibility for mutilations in Tomandu in Kono in May 1998, that is, after the JCE had ended as found by the Trial Chamber,[2124] and so do not detract from the Appeals Chamber's conclusion. This argument is rejected.

c. Kallon – Kono District – Superior responsibility - Enslavement

8766. para. 863: The Trial Chamber found that "civilians were forced to work by AFRC/RUF fighters and to carry loads to and from different areas of Kono District" between February and March 1998, and that these acts satisfied the elements of enslavement under Count 13.[2250] The Trial Chamber further found that the detention of hundreds of civilians in RUF camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998 satisfied the elements of enslavement under Count 13.2251

8767. para. 864: The Trial Chamber found Kallon liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the enslavement of hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998.[2252] The Trial Chamber found, however, that Kallon was in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono District only until August 1998, because it considered that the Prosecution had failed to establish his position in Kono District after the failed "Fiti-Fata" mission which was found to have occurred in August 1998.[2253] It further found that because the crime of enslavement was "of a continuous nature" it considered it "immaterial to Kallon's responsibility for its commission that he departed Kono District in August 1998."[2254]

i. Superior- subordinate relationship – Effective control - Kallon – Kono District – Enslavement

8768. para. 868: In reaching its findings on the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between Kallon and RUF fighters in Kono District, the Trial Chamber relied in part on its findings on Kallon's command role within the RUF organisation in Kono District from February 1998.[2261] With respect to his authority in civilian camps in particular, the Trial Chamber further found that: (i) Kallon visited Kaidu and Wendedu several times and that he was superior to Rocky who was the Commander of these camps;[2262] (ii) civilians were required to see Kallon in order to obtain permission to travel outside the Kaidu area, as Rocky did not have the authority to issue travel passes;[2263] (iii) Kallon gave orders to move the civilians when the camps became too close to the frontlines;[2264] and (iv) Kallon assigned Rocky on one occasion to lead a mission to Bumpeh.[2265] The Trial Chamber found that Kallon had a supervisory role over the civilian camps in Kono district even though their Commanders were directly subordinate to Superman, and that it was established beyond reasonable doubt that Kallon was able to exercise effective control over Rocky as the Commander of the camps.[2266] Based on his relationship to Rocky together with his status as a Vanguard, and Senior Commander in Kono, the Trial Chamber consequently found that Kallon was also able to exercise effective control over the RUF fighters who enslaved hundreds of civilians in camps throughout Kono District between February and December 1998.[2267]

8769. para. 869: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber failed to properly consider evidence that others besides him exercised control over the troops in Kono District.[2268] The Appeals Chamber reiterates that the Trial Chamber found that even though RUF Commanders in Kono District reported to Superman who was the overall commander in Kono District, as Bockarie remained in Buedu, Kallon nonetheless exercised effective control over Rocky as the Commander of the civilian camps. The Appeals Chamber considers that the indications that Bockarie exercised control over the RUF troops in Kono District at the relevant time do not exclude the conclusion that Kallon exercised effective control over Rocky and the RUF fighters who enslaved civilians in camps in Kono District. The Appeals Chamber has repeatedly maintained that the concurrent authority of other superiors does not diminish the criminal liability of an Accused under Article 6(3) when the accused is found to have possessed effective control over the same subordinates.[2269]

8770. para. 870: The Appeals Chamber concludes that Kallon has not established that, based on the evidence, no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that a superior-subordinate relationship existed and that he exercised effective control over Rocky as the Commander of the civilian camps, and the RUF fighters who enslaved civilians in those camps in 1998.

8771. para. 872: The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber reasonably found that Kallon exercised effective control for the period between February and the end of August 1998. Thereafter, the Trial Chamber found that there was insufficient evidence to establish Kallon's position and command role in Kono District after the failed "Fiti-Fata" mission.[2271] The Trial Chamber accordingly found that "Kallon was in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono District until August 1998 only."[2272] However, it nonetheless held that because of the "continuous nature" of the crime of enslavement "throughout Kono District between February and December 1998," Kallon was liable for its commission for the entire period under Article 6(3) of the Statute.[2273]

8772. para. 873: The Appeals Chamber agrees with Kallon's contention that the findings are insufficient as a matter of law to find him liable under Article 6(3) for enslavement in Kono District after August 1998. The Trial Chamber decided that the evidence failed to establish that he had effective control over RUF forces after that date. The Appeals Chamber recalls that customary international law recognises three essential elements in order for a superior to be found guilty for a crime under command responsibility.[2274] One of those elements is the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship, by virtue of which the superior exercises effective control over the subordinate. During the existence of that relationship, superiors can be found guilty of the underlying crime of the subordinate if they knew or had reason to know of the crime and if they failed to prevent the crime or punish the perpetrator.

8773. para. 874: The Trial Chamber recognised the need for the coextensive existence of these three elements.[2275] In addition, the Trial Chamber reasoned in obiter dicta that if the crime is committed prior to the formation of the superior-subordinate relationship, but a superior subsequently gains effective control over the subordinate who committed the crime and the superior has notice of the previously committed crime and fails to punish the subordinate, the superior is still, in the opinion of the Trial Chamber, liable for the crime inasmuch as his duty to punish under responsible command existed simultaneously with effective control and notice.[2276] However, such situation described by the Trial Chamber did not arise at all on the facts as found by it in this case. More particularly, it is not the situation presented by the facts on which the Trial Chamber found Kallon liable, under Article 6(3), for the months the Trial Chamber found there was no evidence that he continued in a superior-subordinate relationship with the principal perpetrators of the enslavement in Kono District. Beyond the statement that enslavement was a "continuing crime" the Trial Chamber did not reason any facts that permitted a conclusion that Kallon had criminal liability under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by subordinates after he ceased to have effective control and the ability to prevent or punish. Neither did the Trial Chamber offer any explanation as to why this apparent extension of liability under command responsibility was consistent with customary international law in effect at the time of the commission of the crimes.

8774. para. 875: Kallon is responsible for his failure to prevent the crime of enslavement up to and including the last day on which he was found to have exercised effective control over Rocky and the RUF troops who detained civilians in camps in Kono District. Thereafter, the consequent harm caused by the continuation of the crime of enslavement, which he is found to have failed to prevent at the time when he had the ability to do so, continues to be relevant to sentencing and properly reflected in findings on the gravity of his offence.[2277] However, the Trial Chamber has failed to support, either by findings of facts or reasoning of applicable law, its conclusion that Kallon is criminally liable under Article 6(3) for the crimes of enslavement in Kono District found to have been committed, after August 1998.

ii. Knowledge - Kallon – Kono District – Enslavement

8775. para. 871: Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to distinguish "between general knowledge and specific knowledge that sufficiently identified subordinates had committed crimes."[2270] He avers that the Trial Chamber "simply concludes that since he occupied a supervisory role with respect to the civilian camps, he had actual knowledge of the enslavement of civilians there." The alleged error of law on the part of the Trial Chamber, he asserts, is in finding that his knowledge was sufficient, without finding that he possessed the knowledge of specific crimes perpetrated by specifically identified persons. Kallon overlooks the Trial Chamber's findings regarding Kallon's actual presence in the camps and the manner in which he exercised his supervisory role. In addition, he gives neither reasoning nor authority for his position that "actual knowledge" requires a greater degree of specificity than that set out by the Trial Chamber in its findings. Those findings are consistent with its pronouncement of the applicable law, with which Kallon does not disagree. His argument fails.

d. Kallon - Kono District– Superior responsibility – Forced marriages

8776. para. 838: The Trial Chamber found that approximately three months after the Intervention in February 1998, TF1-016 and her eleven year old daughter were captured together with twelve other civilians in Tomandu, Kono District, by fighters who identified themselves as belonging to the RUF.2189 It found that TF1-016 and her daughter were among those given as "wives" to the rebels, with TF1-016 given to "Kotor" a member of the RUF, and that she was forced to reside with him in the house of the armed rebel leader Alpha.[2190] It consequently found that RUF members forcibly married TF1-016 and her daughter in Kissi Town, Kono District between May and June 1998.[2191]

8777. para. 839: The Trial Chamber further found that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between Kallon and the RUF members who forcibly married TF1-016 and her eleven year old daughter in Kissi Town, Kono District and that he had effective control over them.[2192] It also found that Kallon had "reason to know of the fighters who committed this crime at Kissi Town" due to the widespread nature of the crime in Kono District and throughout Sierra Leone.[2193] It further found that Kallon failed to prevent or punish the commission of the crime by his subordinates in Kono District. The Trial Chamber consequently held Kallon liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the forced marriage of TF1-016 and her daughter in Kissi Town, Kono District between May and June 1998.[2194]

8778. para. 841: Addressing Kallon's second argument first, the Appeals Chamber concludes that Kallon's submission that the Trial Chamber "ignored vital exculpatory evidence during cross-examination of Prosecution witness TF1-016"[2200] is without merit. The Trial Chamber was able to determine from the testimony and other undisputed evidence that the crime began in April/May 1998, a fact with which Kallon does not disagree.[2201] In addition, the Trial Chamber considered the fact that Kortor did not personally carry a gun;[2202] explained its findings on the relationship between Kortor and Witness TF1-016 in light of all the evidence, including the fact that Kotor took her out of Kissi Town to "Njagbema, where she continued working for him and he continued to force her to have intercourse with him";[2203] and accepted that she was ultimately released on the orders of the rebel Commander who announced the cease fire.[2204] As the Trial Chamber in fact considered the evidence referred to by Kallon he must demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have assessed the evidence as the Trial Chamber did. Kallon fails to do so, but instead only offers an alternative interpretation of the evidence, thereby seeking to substitute his own evaluation of the evidence for that of the Trial Chamber.

8779. para. 842: To establish Kallon's liability under the principle of command responsibility, Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber properly recalled that the following three elements must be shown: (i) the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the superior and the offender of the criminal act; (ii) that the superior knew or had reason to know that his subordinate was about to commit a crime or had done so; and (iii) that the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent his subordinate's criminal act or punish his subordinate.[2205] Kallon does not dispute the correctness of the Trial Chamber's formulation of the law. Rather Kallon's argument is that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that: (1) he had a superior-subordinate relationship with the principal perpetrators of these crimes; and (2) that he had reason to know of the commission of the crimes.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Effective control - Kallon – Kono District – Forced Marriages

8780. para. 843: Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber failed to establish the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between him and the perpetrators of the crimes against TF1-016 and her daughter, and that there is nothing in the evidence to show that he had effective control of

RUF troops in Kissi Town.[2206] He argues that the Trial Chamber's findings to the contrary are inconsistent with its findings that during the relevant timeframe he was based at the Guinea Highway "on the military mission of laying ambushes … to impede ECOMOG's movement;" that he "did not have discrete combat units or forces assigned to his command;" and that he was subordinate to Superman in Kono District and was either equal to or lesser in rank and authority to other commanders in Kono District.[2207]

8782. para. 845: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon, as a Vanguard, was "recognised as senior officer,"[2211] and that "Vanguards, due to their status, were accorded at all times respect and authority within the RUF organisation, particularly by the Junior Commanders."[2212] As a Vanguard and Senior Commander in Kono, Kallon "had personal bodyguards, access to a radio set and subordinates who forced civilians to mine for him personally."[2213] Kallon's position in Kono was sufficiently senior that he was even able to give orders to CO Rocky, a fellow Vanguard, on issues concerning the treatment of civilians.

8783. para. 846: Second, as to the level of his authority in Kono at the operative time, the Trial Chamber found, inter alia, that he was "an operational commander"[2214] and that he "was able to give orders to troops that were obeyed."[2215] Specifically, he is found to have commanded troops who were laying ambushes;[2216] gave orders to fighters at muster parades "about the daily missions to be undertaken and appointed Commanders to lead various patrols pursuant to his instructions."[2217] Most importantly the Trial Chamber found that Kallon "enjoyed a high profile among the troops" and "was known to be a strict disciplinarian" who was feared by RUF fighters in Kono District and that he "killed both AFRC and RUF fighters whom he deemed to be acting contrary to orders."[2218]

8784. para. 847: With respect to the oversight over RUF fighters responsible for civilians in Kono District the Trial Chamber's findings establish that Kallon had a "supervisory role."[2219] The Trial Chamber found that only Kallon could issue permission to civilians to travel outside designated civilian camp areas;[2220] and that it was Kallon who ordered the RUF forces to move the civilians when the camps became too close to the frontlines.[2221] That Kallon had authority to order the manner of treatment of the civilians, and have that order followed, was demonstrated by his order to Captain Rocky that the rebels at one particular time "should not be 'hostile' to the civilians" in the Kaidu camp.[2222] This order was implemented the following day by Rocky who assembled civilians to explain the "rules" of the camp which, if followed, would offer some personal security for the civilians, but if broken would result in execution of the rule breaker.[2223]

8785. para. 848: The Appeals Chamber considers that these findings of the Trial Chamber which Kallon does not address in his present ground of appeal, allowed a reasonable trier of fact to conclude that he had the material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct by the perpetrators in Kono District. That he personally could and did administer punishment to fighters in the most extreme ways was found by the Trial Chamber, which noted that "he was referred to as Bilai Karim, which referred to his ability to punish people for committing crimes."[2224] That in addition he was in a position to report misconduct of troops to superiors for punishment was remarked upon by the Trial Chamber which found that he acted as an intermediary between Superman and Battalion Commanders in Kono District.[2225] The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded, based on its findings, that not only was Kallon able to issue orders to RUF troops and Commanders, but that those orders were actually followed and that he had the power to punish RUF perpetrators of alleged criminal conduct in Kono District.[2226] This is the essence of effective control.

8786. para. 849: The Appeals Chamber further determines that, based on these general findings on Kallon's authority over RUF troops in Kono District, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that Kallon also had effective control over the specific perpetrators who committed the crime of forced marriage against witness TF1-016 and her daughter. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the necessity of proving that the principal perpetrator was the subordinate of the Accused "does not require direct or formal subordination" as long as the Accused is "by virtue of his position, senior in some sort of formal or informal hierarchy to the perpetrators."[2227] The Trial Chamber's description of Kotor and his RUF local leader, Alpha, and other RUF rebels in Kissi Town who committed the crimes against Witness TF1-016 and her eleven year old daughter, is sufficient to establish that Kallon held a senior position to them in Kono at the operative time. The Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between Kallon and the RUF members who committed forced marriage against TF1-016 and her daughter in Kissi Town, Kono District.

ii. Knowledge – Kallon – Kono District – Forced Marriages

8787. para. 850: The Trial Chamber found that Kallon had "reason to know of the fighters who committed" the crime of forced marriage in Kissi Town due to the widespread nature of this crime in Kono District.[2228] Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erred in reaching this finding; that its reasoning, is "vague, baseless and fails to meet the requisite standard for knowledge by a superior;" and that it contradicts the Trial Chamber's own articulation of the applicable law on superior responsibility.[2229]

8788. para. 851: Kallon relies on the Trial Chamber's articulation of the mens rea for superior responsibility set out in paragraphs 308 to 312 of the Trial Judgment. He submits that by failing to require that Kallon must have knowledge of the specific identity of the principal perpetrators, the Trial Chamber disregarded its own earlier statement that "the superior must have knowledge of the alleged criminal conduct of his subordinates and not simply knowledge of the occurrence of the crimes themselves."[2230] Kallon both misunderstands and misuses this statement from the Trial Chamber's findings. First, this statement stands for the proposition that the superior must know that persons subordinate to him were involved in the commission of the crimes, and that mere knowledge that the crimes were committed is not sufficient. It does not, as the Appellant suggests, require that the actual identity of the subordinates be known to the superior. Second, this statement appears in the Trial Chamber's explanation of actual knowledge which expressly is not the standard which the Trial Chamber applied to Kallon in finding that he had "reason to know."

8789. para. 852: Kallon further submits that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to find that Kallon was "put on notice of the crimes by his alleged subordinates in Kissi Town" or that he knew of the criminal conduct and intent of sufficiently identified subordinates, as opposed to mere knowledge of crimes by RUF fighters generally.[2231]

8790. para. 853: The Trial Chamber correctly articulated the requirements for establishing that the superior had reason to know. Neither Party takes issue with this articulation of the law. Of particular note is the requirement that this "standard will only be satisfied if information was available to the superior which would have put him on notice of the offences committed by his subordinates or about to be committed by his subordinates."[2232] The Trial Chamber was therefore required to consider whether in fact Kallon had information which put him on notice of crimes involving those who were subordinate to him in Kono District.

8791. para. 854: As recited above, the scope of Kallon's effective control in Kono, which he exercised during the timeframe relevant to this incident, extended to the RUF members of lower status than himself. Kallon was a Vanguard and a Senior Commander in Kono District, with particular responsibility for overseeing the treatment of civilians. There is no question that Kotor and his local RUF commander Alpha, were of lower status than Kallon and within the RUF in the Kono District.

8792. para. 855: Where a commander receives information of the alleged commission of crimes by his subordinates, he may not remain wilfully blind to those reports.[2233] Had Kallon exercised responsible command and investigated the crime of forced marriage in Kono District which the Trial Chamber found he had reason to know was being committed by his subordinates, he could have had actual knowledge of the identity of the perpetrators. The Trial Chamber found that he took no action to prevent or punish these crimes.[2234] He cannot now claim that it was not proven that he had knowledge of the identities of the subordinates or the victims involved in these specific crimes.

8793. para. 856: The Appeals Chamber notes that in reaching its conclusion that Kallon had reason to know of the commission of the crimes by RUF subordinates, in Kissi Town, the Trial Chamber relied on the facts that established "that the commission of the crime of 'forced marriage' was widespread in Kono District and indeed throughout Sierra Leone."[2235] The failure of the Trial Chamber to repeat each of the findings that supported that conclusion does not render the conclusion either unsupported by the over all findings or unreasonable. The Appeals Chamber recalls in this regard, the Trial Chamber's findings that there was "ample evidence that the AFRC/RUF waged an attack encompassing horrific violence and mistreatment against the civilian population of Sierra Leone, which evolved through three distinct stages."[2236] From the very first stage, November 1996 to May 1997, the Trial Chamber found that mistreatment of civilians by RUF forces was "endemic in Kailhun District" and included subjecting "women and young girls to rapes and 'forced marriages'."[2237] By the third stage, (beginning in February 1998) the Trial Chamber further found:

> The enslavement and 'forced marriages' of civilians in Kailahun District persisted as before, and these practices spread to Kono District, Bombali District, Koinadugu District, Freetown and the Western Area and Port Loko District as troops moved through these areas.[2238]

8794. para. 857: With particular regard to Kono District, the Trial Chamber also found that an unknown number of women were taken as "wives" by AFRC/RUF fighters in Koidu in February and March 1998.[2239]

8795. para. 858: Kallon was present in Kono during this time, and particularly in Koidu and on the Guinea Highway in February and March.[2240] The Trial Chamber found that on the Highway in February and March 1998 "women and girls from villages along the road were forcibly abducted by fighters. Some women were forced into marriage, used as domestics to do cooking or housework, and others were raped."[2241] In Koidu, also in February and March, the Trial Chamber found that women were forcibly taken from their husbands and families: "Some were raped and others, especially the beautiful ones, became the wives of the Commanders. These women were under the control of the Commanders and were responsible for cooking for them and 'serving them as their wives', meaning the rebels used the women for sexual purposes."[2242]

8796. para. 859: In Wendedu camp, which Kallon was found to have frequently visited after its establishment in April,[2243] this crime was found to have continued on a widespread basis and "an unknown number of women were forcibly kept as 'wives' by RUF fighters in the civilian camp."[2244] This was not done secretly or surreptitiously and was obvious to the witnesses who testified at trial.[2245] Also obvious was the screaming of women at night at the Wendedu camp. The Trial Chamber found women were heard by witnesses to be screaming "leave me, leave me, leave me alone. You did not bring me for this. I'm not your wife."[2246]

8797. para. 860: In order to demonstrate that a superior had reason to know of crimes committed or about to be committed by his subordinates, for purposes of establishing liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute, it must be established whether, in the circumstances of the case,[2247] he possessed information sufficiently alarming to justify further inquiry.[2248] From the continuous and pervasive nature of the crime of forced marriage found to have been committed by RUF members coupled with the obvious commission of the crime in Kono District in places where the Trial Chamber found Kallon to have been specifically present at the time these crimes were occurring, the Trial Chamber was reasonable in concluding that Kallon, had he intended to exercise responsible command, had "information sufficiently alarming to justify further inquiry" into whether his subordinates in Kono, including Kissi Town, were committing these crimes against civilians.

8798. para. 861: Having reasonably found that RUF fighters throughout Sierra Leone and specifically in Kono District were committing the crime of forced marriage the Trial Chamber was correct in concluding that the commission of the crime was so widespread and obvious, that Kallon was on notice of the risk that similar crimes would be carried out by RUF members over whom he exercised effective control in Kono District, including Kissi Town.[2249] The Appeals Chamber holds therefore, that Kallon has not demonstrated an error of law invalidating the Trial Chamber's conclusions on the mens rea for his superior responsibility for the crime of forced marriage committed in Kissi Town, Kono District.

C. AFRC

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-PT, Indictment, 13 May 2004

(a) Individual Criminal Responsibility

8799. Paragraphs 1 through 20 are incorporated by reference. [446]

(i) The Accused

8800. At all times relevant to this Indictment, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was a senior member of the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces. [447]

8801. ALEX T AMBA BRIMA was a member of the group which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA, Chairman and leader of the AFRC, appointed ALEX T AMBA BRIMA a Public Liaison Officer (PLO) within the AFRC. In addition, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was a member of the Junta governing body. [448]

8802. Between mid February 1998 and about 30 April 1998, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA was in direct command of AFRC/RUF forces in the Kono District. In addition, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA was in direct command of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Bombali District between about May 1998 and 31 July 1998. As of about 22 December 1998, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA was in command of AFRC/RUF forces which attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999. [449]

8803. At all times relevant to this Indictment, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a senior member of the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces. [450]

8804. BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a member of the group which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA, Chairman and leader of the AFRC, appointed BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA a Public Liaison Officer (PLO) within the AFRC. In addition, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a member of the Junta governing body. [451]

8805. Between about mid-February 1998 and 30 April 1998, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces based in Kono District. In addition, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north, eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts between about mid February 1998 and 31 December 1998. BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999. [452]

8806. At all times relevant to this Indictment, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a senior member of the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces. [453]

8807. SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a member of the group of 17 soldiers which staged the coup and ousted the government of President Kabbah. In addition, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a member of the Junta governing body, the AFRC Supreme Council. [454]

8808. Between mid February 1998 and 30 April 1998, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a senior commander of AFRC/RUF forces in Kono District. In addition, SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU was a commander of AFRC/RUF forces which conducted armed operations throughout the north, eastern and central areas of the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to, attacks on civilians in Koinadugu and Bombali Districts between about mid February 1998 and 31 December 1998. SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, along with ALEX TAMBA BRIMA and BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA, was also one of three commanders of AFRC/RUF forces during the attack on Freetown on 6 January 1999. [455]

8809. In their respective positions referred to above, ALEX T AMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, individually, or in concert with each other, JOHNNY PAUL KOROMA aka JPK, FODAY SA YBANA SANKOH, SAM BOCKARIE aka MOSQUITO aka MASKITA, ISSA HASSAN SESA Y aka ISSA SESA Y, MORRIS KALLON aka BILAI KARIM, AUGUSTINE GBAO aka AUGUSTINE BAO and/or other superiors in 6 the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces, exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the AFRC, Junta and AFRC/RUF forces. [456]

8810. At all times relevant to this Indictment, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, through their association with the RUF, acted in concert with CHARLES GHANKAY TAYLOR aka CHARLES MACARTHUR DAPKPANA TAYLOR. [457]

8811. The AFRC, including ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, and the RUF, including ISSA HASSAN SESA Y, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, shared a common plan, purpose or design Goint criminal enterprise) which was to take any actions necessary to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas. The natural resources of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamonds, were to be provided to persons outside Sierra Leone in return for assistance in carrying out the joint criminal enterprise. [458]

preparation or execution each Accused otherwise aided and abetted, or which crimes were within a joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated or were a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the joint criminal enterprise in which each Accused participated. [460]

8814. In addition, or alternatively, pursuant to Article 6.3. of the Statute, ALEX TAMBA BRIMA, BRIMA BAZZY KAMARA and SANTIGIE BORBOR KANU, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over their subordinates, are each individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute. Each Accused is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof. [461]

(ii) Charges

8815. Paragraphs 21 through 36 are incorporated by reference. [462]

2. Trial Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-T, Judgement, 20 June 2007

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8816. para. 779: In addition, or alternatively, the Indictment charges pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute that the Accused, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over their subordinates, are each individually criminally responsible for the said crimes in that each Accused is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates which he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit or had done so and which each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish the perpetrators thereof. [1509]

8817. para. 780: Article 6(3) of the Statute provides:

[460] AFRC Indictment, para. 35.

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

a. Elements of Superior Responsibility – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8818. para. 781: As is evident from its terms, Article 6(3) of the Statute requires a three-pronged test for criminal liability to attach:

1. The existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the accused as superior and the perpetrator of the crime;

2. The accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was about to be or had been committed; and

3. The Accused failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the crime or punish the perpetrators thereof. [1510]

8819. para. 782: The principle that an individual may be held responsible as a superior in the course of an armed conflict is enshrined in customary international law. [1511] The scope of Article 6(3) does not only include military commanders, but also political leaders and other civilian superiors in possession of authority. [1512]

8820. para. 783: Under Article 6(3) of the Statute, a superior is held responsible for an omission, i.e., for the failure to perform an act required by international law. [1513] The culpable omission of a superior consists of his or her failure to prevent or punish crimes under the Statute committed by subordinates. Hence, a superior is responsible not for the principal crimes, but rather for what has been described as a 'dereliction' or 'neglect of duty' to prevent or punish the perpetrators of serious crimes. [1514] Responsibility of a superior is not limited to crimes committed by subordinates in person, but encompasses any modes of criminal liability proscribed in Article 6(1) of the Statute. It follows that a superior can be held responsible for failure to prevent or punish a crime which was planned, ordered, instigated or aided and abetted by subordinates. [1515]

b. Existence of a Superior-Subordinate Relationship - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8822. para. 785: Indications for effective control include the formality of the procedure used for appointment of a superior,[1522] the power of the superior to issue orders [1523] or take disciplinary action,[1524] the fact that subordinates show greater discipline in the superior's presence,[1525] the level of profile, manifested through public appearances and statements,[1526] or the capacity to transmit reports to competent authorities for the taking of proper measures. [1527]

8823. para. 786: A superior may be held responsible for crimes committed by individuals temporarily subordinated to him, provided he exercises effective control over them. [1528] Further, superior responsibility is not excluded by the concurrent responsibility of other superiors in a chain of command. [1529] If a superior has functioned as a member of a collegiate body with authority shared among various members, the power or authority actually devolved on an accused may be assessed on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the cumulative effect of the accused's various functions. [1530]

8824. para. 787: However, in a conflict characterised by the participation of irregular armies or rebel groups, the traditional indicia of effective control provided in the jurisprudence may not be appropriate or useful. As the Trial Chamber has observed, the formality of an organisation's structure is relevant to, but not determinative of, the question of the effective control of its leaders. The less developed the structure, the more important it becomes to focus on the nature of the superior's authority rather than his or her formal designation.

8825. para. 788: The Trial Chamber considers that indicia which may be useful to assess the ability of superiors in such irregular armies to exercise effective control over their subordinates, include that the superior had first entitlement to the profits of war, such as looted property and natural resources; exercised control over the fate of vulnerable persons such as women and children; the superior had independent access to and/or control of the means to wage war, including arms and ammunition and communications equipment; the superior rewarded himself or herself with positions of power and influence; the superior had the capacity to intimidate subordinates into compliance and was willing to do so; the superior was protected by personal security guards, loyal to him or her, akin to a modern praetorian guard; the superior fuels or represents the ideology of the movement to which the subordinates adhere; and the superior interacts with external bodies or individuals on behalf of the group.

8826. para. 789: Nonetheless, the key traditional indicia of effective control remain central, although they may be more loosely defined. For example, the power of the superior to issue orders is crucial, although these orders may be criminal in nature. Similarly, the superior must be capable of taking disciplinary action, even though the measures taken may be more brutal and arbitrarily utilised.

c. Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8828. para. 791: For a superior to be held responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, it must be established that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit or had committed such crimes.

d. Actual Knowledge - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8829. para. 792: Actual knowledge may be defined as the awareness that the relevant crimes were committed or about to be committed. [1532] There is no presumption of such knowledge but, in the absence of direct evidence, it may be established through circumstantial evidence. [1533] Factors indicative of actual knowledge include, first of all, an individual's superior position and the superior's geographical and temporal proximity to the crimes;[1534] also, the type and scope of crimes, the time during which they occurred, the number and type of troops and logistics involved, the widespread occurrence of crimes, the tactical tempo of operations, the modus operandi of similar illegal acts and the officers and staff involved. [1535]

e. Imputed Knowledge - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8831. para. 794: In determining whether a superior "had reason to know", or imputed knowledge, that his or her subordinates were committing or about to commit a crime, it must be shown that specific information was available which would have put the superior on notice of crimes committed or about to be committed. [1537] The superior may not be held liable for failing to acquire such information in the first place. [1538] However, it suffices for the superior to be in possession of sufficient information, even general in nature, written or oral, of the likelihood of illegal acts by subordinates. [1539] In other words: failure to conclude, or conduct additional inquiry, in spite of alarming information amounts to imputed knowledge. [1540] It is not necessary that the information would compel the conclusion of the existence of concrete crimes. [1541] Rather, the information must have put the accused on notice of the 'present and real risk' that crimes under the Statute were committed, or about to be committed. [1542] Examples of such information include that a subordinate has a violent or unstable character and that a subordinate has been drinking prior to being sent on a mission. [1543] Furthermore, reports addressed to the superior, the level of training and instruction of subordinate officers are factors to be taken into account when determining imputed knowledge. [1544]

8832. para. 795: The Brima Defence objects to an expansive interpretation of the imputed knowledge standard, especially to hold "a commander [...] liable for the most serious of crimes under a mere negligence standard."[1545] Similarly, the Kamara and Kanu Defences oppose the application of strict liability.[1546] The Kamara Defence says that superiors are not under a duty to know, and are only liable when they had "information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that the perpetrator was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach". [1547]

8833. para. 796: It is clear from the case law referred to above that solely negligent ignorance is insufficient to attribute imputed knowledge. What is required is the superior's factual awareness of information which should have prompted him or her to acquire further knowledge. [1548] Responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute will attach when the superior remains wilfully blind to the criminal acts of his or her subordinates. [1549]

f. Failure to Prevent or Punish - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8834. para. 797: It must be established that the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or punish the crimes of his or her subordinates. These are two distinct duties: it is the superior's primary duty to intervene as soon as he or she becomes aware of crimes about to be committed, while taking measures to punish will only suffice if the superior did not become aware of these crimes until after they were committed. [1550]

8835. para. 798: As regards the duty to prevent the crimes of subordinates, the type of necessary and reasonable measures a superior must take is a matter of evidence rather than one of substantive law. [1551] Generally, it can be said that the measures required of the superior are limited to those within his or her material ability under the circumstances,[1552] including those that may lie beyond his or her formal powers. [1553] The kind and extent of measures to be taken depend on the degree of effective control exercised by the superior at the relevant time, and on the severity and imminence of the crimes that are about to be committed. [1554] A superior must prevent not only the execution and completion of a subordinate's crimes, but also their earlier planning and preparation. The superior must intervene as soon as he becomes aware of the planning or preparation of crimes to be committed by his subordinates and as long as he has the effective ability to prevent them from starting or continuing. [1555]

g. Relationship Between Article 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute - Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3

8837. para. 800: Article 6(1) and 6(3) of the Statute denote different categories of individual criminal responsibility. Where both Article 6(1) and Article 6(3) responsibility are alleged under the same count, and where the legal requirements pertaining to both of these heads of responsibility are met, it would constitute a legal error invalidating a judgement to enter a concurrent conviction under both provisions. [1559] Where a Trial Chamber enters a conviction on the basis of Article 6(1) only, an accused's superior position may be considered as an aggravating factor in sentencing. [1560]

(ii) Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8838. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts - Brima - Crimes committed – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts – paras. 1641 - 1643 [7991].

a. Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8839. para. 1651: In its Final Brief, the Prosecution submits that the Accused Brima is individually criminally responsible under Article 6(3) of the Statute for crimes committed by his subordinates during the AFRC Government period by virtue of his membership of the Supreme Council, which had control over the police and political authority over the military.[2863] The Prosecution points to evidence establishing that the Accused regularly attended Supreme Council meetings and held an important position in the mining industry. The Prosecution further contends that that he had power and authority over soldiers and officers of higher rank during the AFRC/RUF Government period.[2864]

8840. para. 1652: The Brima Defence submits that the Accused Brima possessed no military authority and played 'at best' a political role within the AFRC Government. [2865]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8842. para. 1654: The Trial Chamber found that the Accused Brima was a member of the AFRC Supreme Council and was appointed Principal Liaison Officer 2, in which capacity he supervised and monitored various Government ministries. [2868] The Prosecution in its Supplementary Pre-Trial Brief stated that the Accused Brima "held a position, individually or in concert with other AFRC/RUF superiors, superior to the AFRC/RUF subordinates."[2869] The Prosecution therefore relies on the Accused Brima's de jure position as a senior member of the AFRC Government to prove that he was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the AFRC/RUF members who committed crimes in the various Districts. The Trial Chamber is not persuaded by this reasoning for three reasons.

8843. para. 1655: Firstly, the Prosecution's general characterisation of both RUF and AFRC members as "the Accused Brima's subordinates" is untenable for the following reasons. Although the two groups were allied in one Government and worked closely together during the AFRC Government period, the available evidence suggests that individuals continued to identify themselves as either RUF or SLA and that at an organisational level separate commanders for each group co-existed in the Districts. [2870] The Trial Chamber is therefore not satisfied that the Accused Brima exercised effective control over members of the RUF merely by virtue of his de jure position within the AFRC Government administration in Freetown.

headquarters at Cockerill were distinct from the Council members and that in some cases the military had complete control over military operations, in other cases the civil authorities would 'interfere' with the military and vice versa.[2871] There was definite overlap between the two institutions, as Witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that Chief of Army Staff Colonel SO Williams and Chief of Defence Staff SFY Koroma were members of Supreme Council,[2872] as was SAJ Musa and lower ranking soldiers like the three Accused. However, the Supreme Council was the body that oversaw law-making and decision-making in the country. It met once a month, apart from emergency meetings.[2873] The Trial Chamber is not satisfied in light of the above evidence, that the Supreme Council was involved in or responsible for planning the day-to-day operations of the military throughout the country.

8845. para. 1657: Thirdly, the Trial Chamber notes that very little evidence has been adduced relating to the Accused Brima's de facto position and functions as a senior member of the AFRC so as to enable the Trial Chamber to reach any conclusion regarding his relationship with alleged subordinates based on that position alone. Membership of the Supreme Council and attendance at meetings per se, does not suffice to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Brima was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of the offences committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts during the relevant Indictment period. As stated above in the Trial Chamber's discussion of the applicable law, the authority of members of a power-sharing collegiate body like the Supreme Council must be assessed on a case-by-case basis and requires an analysis of the functions of the particular Accused.[2874] The Trial Chamber finds that there is no evidence that within the Supreme Council the Accused Brima possessed any individual decision-making capability.

8846. para. 1658: The only evidence before the Trial Chamber relating to his actual functions as PLO 2 is that he was nominally in charge of several Government ministries.[2875] It is assumed that the Accused Brima would have had the power to give orders in relation to work carried out under his Ministries. However, there is no evidence regarding the type of issues that came within his portfolios or to whom he would have been entitled to issue orders, even apart from the question of whether such orders were issued and obeyed.

8847. para. 1659: The Prosecution submits that the Accused's position as "an Honourable" gave him authority over soldiers and officers of higher rank, on the basis that position precedes rank in the military. The Prosecution consequently submits that the Accused Brima was subordinate only to Johnny Paul Koroma, Foday Sankoh and Abu Sankoh. The Trial Chamber is thus invited to accept that the Accused was capable of exercising control over any other person in the AFRC. The Trial Chamber is not persuaded by this theory. Proof of superior responsibility requires conclusive evidence of the actual exercise of command and control over an identifiable group of subordinates. The Trial Chamber agrees that the Accused Brima enjoyed a privileged position on the Supreme Council as one of the original coup-plotters, as an 'Honourable' and as PLO 2. However, the Prosecution evidence adduced regarding his de jure position is insufficient to persuade the Trial Chamber to draw a conclusion, based on that position alone, that Brima had effective control over subordinate perpetrators of the crimes in the said districts, during the AFRC Government period.

8848. para. 1660: The evidentiary burden required to establish 'effective control' is high. For example in Kordic, the court failed to find 'control' despite the fact that the defendant, a civilian, wore a military uniform, held the title of 'colonel,' issued orders for military equipment and supplies, managed personnel, represented the Croatian forces in UN negotiations, exercised control over roads, roadblocks, and prisoners, participated in planning, was physically present during military operations, and provided "political authorization" for ethnic cleansing campaigns.[2816] The Trial Chamber will now examine the evidence adduced by the Prosecution regarding Brima's alleged superior responsibility in relation to the Districts of Bo, Kenema and Kailahun in which crimes were found to have been committed by AFRC/RUF troops during the Junta period.

iii. Bo District (1 - 30 June 1997) - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8849. para. 1661: The Prosecution evidence showed that administratively, Bo District fell within the responsibility of AFRC Secretary of State East Eddie Kanneh.[2877] Although superior responsibility is not precluded by the existence of other superiors in relation to the same subordinates, there is no evidence that the Accused Brima's responsibilities as PLO 2 overseeing Eddie Kanneh, entailed command of AFRC/RUF forces stationed in Bo District.

iv. Kenema District (25 May 1997 - 19 February 1998) - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8850. para. 1662: Evidence before the Trial Chamber shows that AFRC forces in Kenema District were under the command of Secretary of State East Eddie Kanneh, who reported directly to Johnny Paul Koroma.[2878] The Trial Chamber heard evidence that the Accused Brima was involved in mining activities in Kono District but that he did not have any executive powers in relation to these activities.[2879] The Trial Chamber notes that the three Accused have not been charged with enslavement in Kono District during the Junta period. The Accused Brima's involvement in Kono District is insufficient to prove that he possessed the material ability to prevent of punish the persons responsible for the use of civilians as forced labour in Kenema District during the Junta period.

v. Kailahun District (27 May 1997 - 14 February 1998) - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts 8851. para. 1663: It has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that AFRC troops were present in Kailahun during this period. Indeed, Prosecution witness TF1-334 testified that there were no SLA troops in Kailahun during the Junta period.[2880] The area was controlled by Sam Bockarie of the RUF and his deputy Issa Sesay.[2881] In the absence of evidence that the Accused Brima exercised any superior authority or control over the RUF troops in Kailahun District, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes committed in Kailahun District during the Junta period.

vi. Findings - Responsibility of the Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8852. para. 1664: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of any of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts during the Junta period. As the absence this first element of superior responsibility is fatal to proof of liability under Article 6(3), the Trial Chamber will not consider the evidence relating to the Accused Brima's actual or imputed knowledge of crimes committed and his ability to prevent or punish the perpetrators.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8853. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts - Kamara - Crimes committed – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts – paras. 1842 - 1884 [8001].

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8854. para. 1848: The Prosecution submits m its Final Brief that the Accused Kamara bears superior responsibility for crimes committed during the period 25 May 1997 to 14 February 1998 by virtue of his position as Principal Liaison Officer 3 and membership of the Supreme Council, which had control over the police and political authority over the military.[3156]

8855. para. 1849: The Kamara Defence submits that the Accused Kamara possessed no military authority and played "at best" a political role within the AFRC Government.[3157] The Kamara Defence further submits that the Prosecution failed to show that the Accused Kamara had command and control over Sam Bockarie, Eddie Kanneh or any of the soldiers in Kenema.[3158] The Kamara Defence further submitted that Sam Bockarie was in command of Kailahun District and no evidence was led to prove that persons under the command of the Accused Kamara took part in the crimes committed there. [3159] No submissions were made specific to Bo District.

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8857. para. 1851: As preliminary observation, the Trial Chamber reiterates that that the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship is not precluded by the superior's civilian status.[3160]

8858. para. 1852: The Trial Chamber refers to its findings above in relation to the Accused Brima, where it was found that membership of the Supreme Council and proof of a de jure position of authority as a Principal Liaison Officer within the AFRC government is insufficient per se to prove the existence of a superior subordinate relationship. The Prosecution must prove that the Accused Kamara's individual functions as PLO 3 and/or member of the Supreme Council enabled him to exercise effective control over the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

8859. para. 1853: The Trial Chamber notes that there is little evidence on the Accused Kamara's activities during the AFRC Government period, apart from his attendance at Supreme Council meetings.[3161] It has not been established that the Accused Kamara possessed any individual decision making capacity within the Council. Witnesses testified that 'Bazzy' had people working under him in the ministries he supervised, but did not specify what the work of these people involved.[3162] The Trial Chamber has found that there is no evidence that the Accused Kamara had any particular responsibility for internal or external security.

8860. para. 1854: The Trial Chamber therefore accepts the Kamara Defence's submissions that the Prosecution has failed to prove that the Accused Kamara was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of the crimes in Kenema and Kailahun Districts. It has similarly not been established that the Accused Kamara was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of crimes committed in Bo District. As the absence this first element of superior responsibility is fatal to proof of liability under Article 6(3), the Trial Chamber will not consider the evidence relating to the Accused Kamara's actual or imputed knowledge of crimes committed and his ability to prevent or punish the perpetrators.

iii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8861. para. 1855: The Trial Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts between 25 May 1997 and 14 February 1998.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

i. Pleadings – Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8863. para. 1992: The Prosecution submits in its Final Brief that the Accused Kanu bears superior responsibility for crimes committed during the AFRC Government period by virtue of his position as a member of the Supreme Counci1.[3321] The Prosecution also submits that the Accused Kanu was "only beneath Johnny Paul Koroma, SAJ Musa and the 3 PLOs in the Junta hierarchy".[3322]

8864. para. 1993: The Kanu Defence submits that superior responsibility cannot be based on the Accused Kanu's mere participation in or membership of the AFRC, as this would be "tantamount to strict liability on the basis of organizational responsibility".[3323]

ii. Findings - Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts

8865. para. 1994: The Trial Chamber reiterates its earlier observations that asserting de jure seniority does not suffice to prove liability under Article 6(3).[3324] The Trial Chamber emphasises that in evaluating the evidence, the first element of the test for superior responsibility is whether the Accused Kanu was personally able to exercise effective control over subordinates. Membership of the Supreme Council alone does not satisfy the evidentiary burden on the Prosecution.

8866. para. 1995: Little evidence was adduced with respect to the role of the Accused Kanu during the AFRC Government period. It has been established that the Accused Kanu was a member of the Supreme Council and attended Council meetings. [3325] There is no evidence that he possessed any particular responsibility or performed any individual functions at such meetings. The Trial Chamber has found that it was not established whether the Accused Kanu made any real practical contributions to the policies or running of the AFRC govermnent.[3326] Beyond his position in the AFRC Government, there is no evidence which links the Accused Kanu as a superior to crimes perpetrated by the troops in Bo, Kenema and Kailahun Districts.

8867. para. 1996: The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the Prosecution has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between the Accused Kanu and these troops. In the absence of this first element of superior responsibility, it is unnecessary to consider whether the Accused Kanu had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators thereof.

(iii) Kono District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Kono District

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused under Article 6.3 – Kono District

8869. para. 1669: The Prosecution, in its Final Brief, concedes that the Accused Brima left Kono for Kailahun during the ECOMOG Intervention in Freetown of February 1998, but argues that he returned to Kono by late April or early May 1998.[2893] It contends that while the Accused may have had some disagreement with the RUF faction under Sam Bockarie in Kailahun, this only lasted a few days after which the Accused was "back on good terms with Sam Bockarie and other RUF commanders in Kailahun." [2894] In other words, the Prosecution contends that despite his physical absence the Accused continued to play an influential role in the events that took place in Kono District and in the joint criminal enterprise with the RUF.

8870. para. 1670: The Prosecution in its Final Brief makes no submissions on the superior responsibility of the Accused Brima in relation to Kono District during the period mid-February 1998 to the end of April 1998. The Prosecution concedes that the Accused Brima arrived in Kono District only at the end of April or beginning of May.

8871. para. 1671: The Brima Defence submits that the Prosecution has failed to provide clear evidence on the command and control structure of the SLAs in Kono District.[2895] The Brima Defence also submits that 'Savage' was in command of Tombodu and was not controlled by his SLA superiors.[2896] The Accused Brima argues that he cannot be held responsible for the activities of persons over whom he exercised no control. [2897]

8872. para. 1672: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima arrived in Kono District from Kailahun District at the end of April or beginning of May 1998. [2898] Upon his arrival, the Accused Brima assumed command of the AFRC troops from the Accused Kamara.[2899] There are a number of indicia from the evidence that demonstrate that upon assuming command of the SLA troops, the Accused Brima exercised effective control over the SLA troops in Kono District. The Accused Brima immediately summoned the Accused Kamara, the Operations Commander and other senior SLA soldiers including Leather Boot aka Idrissa Kamara, Adams, Colonel Ibrahim Bioh Sesay, Coachy Borno, Colonel Momoh Dorty, and Junior Lion to a meeting at Five-Five Spot.[2900] Both witness TFl-334 and witness George Johnson attended this meeting. The Accused Brima ordered the commanders to regroup with their soldiers at Tombodu in preparation for the withdrawal to join SAJ Musa in Koinadugu.[2901] Upon arrival at Tombodu, the commanders reported to the Accused Brima.[2902] He ordered them to withdraw their troops to Mansofinia in Koinadugu District and this occurred.[2903]

8873. para. 1673: The crimes detailed in the factual findings were committed prior to the Accused Brima's assumption of command. The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Hadzihasanovic: held that there is no support in customary international law for the proposition that a commander can be held responsible for crimes committed by a subordinate prior to his or her assumption of command.[2904] and June 1998, as charged under Counts 3 through 5.[2910] The issue for determination here is whether the Accused Brima bears individual criminal responsibility for those crimes pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3– Kono District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Kono District

8875. para. 1862: The Prosecution submits that the evidence 'coupled with the high level of authority possessed by the Second Accused' proves that there was a superior-subordinate relationship between the Second Accused and the perpetrators of crimes committed in Kono District in this period. [3179]

8876. para. 1863: The Kamara Defence submits that the evidence of both Prosecution and Defence witnesses alike proves that Kono District after February 1998 was completely controlled by the RUF, to whom the AFRC troops were subordinate.[3180]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Kono District 8877. para. 1864: The Prosecution has not demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt that crimes were committed by members of the AFRC/RUF during the initial attack on Koidu Town in early March 1998 as troops advanced together into Kono District. Thus there can be no findings of liability pursuant to Article 6(3) during this attack.

8878. para. 1865: The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that after the departure of Johnny Paul Koroma from Kono District, the AFRC was subordinated to the RUF and the Accused Kamara became the highest ranking AFRC soldier in the District. The Trial Chamber further found that the

AFRC and RUF worked closely together in Kono District. AFRC and RUF commanders each supervised mixed battalions of AFRC and RUF troops.[3181]

8879. para. 1866: The Trial Chamber is satisfied, on the basis of the evidence that follows, that the Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara exercised effective control over some mixed battalions of AFRC/RUF troops in Kono District.

8880. para. 1867: Witness TFl-334 testified in cross-examination that while Kamara was subordinate to Denis Mingo, the AFRC maintained their own command. He stated that Kamara received orders from Denis Mingo and was answerable to him in terms of operations, but that the AFRC operated under their command and were answerable to the AFRC commanders.[3182] Witness George Johnson corroborated the evidence of witness TF1-334 that the Accused Kamara was the senior AFRC commander, subordinate to Denis Mingo. [3183]

8881. para. 1868: Witness TFl-334 testified that the Accused Kamara gave orders through his subordinate the Operations Commander, whose name was given to the Court in closed session.[3184] The Accused Kamara also appointed Colonel Foday Kallay as deputy operations commander.[3185] Battalions consisting of both RUF and AFRC soldiers (but: predominantly the latter) were under AFRC command in Jagbwema Fiama, Tombodu, Bumpe, Sewafe, Yengema, and Woama.[3186] Witness TF1-334 testified that the battalion commanders were subordinate to the Operations Commander and reported directly to him.[3187] Witness TFl-334 testified that the Accused Kamara promoted these individuals in rank after the capture of Kono District. [3188]

8883. para. 1870: There is evidence that the Accused Kamara's orders were followed. Witness TF1-334 testified that Kamara ordered the troops to attack ECOMOG forces. [3193] In May 1998, the Accused Kamara ordered the burning of houses surrounding the AFRC headquarters in Masingbi Road. This order was obeyed by soldiers including witness TF1-334.[3194] The commanders of surrounding villages including Yengema, Bumpe, Jagbwema Fiama and Tombodu were also ordered to burn those villages and witness TF1-334 accompanied the Operations Commander to monitor the carrying out of these orders. Witness TF1-334 also testified that Kamara organised a squad called "wild dogs" who were responsible for "raising", that is, taking things from other soldiers.[3195]

8884. para. 1871: The Trial Chamber recalls that there was a parallel presence and authority of RUF and AFRC commanders active in Kono District in this period.[3196] While the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kamara maintained effective control over some mixed battalions of AFRC and RUF troops, given evidence of the Accused Kamara's subordination to Denis Mingo; evidence of RUF dominancy over the AFRC; and indications that independent RUF chains of command may have also existed during this time period, the Trial Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara's authority extended to all battalions active in Kono District. Thus, it cannot be stated with certainty that Kamara exercised effective control over the entire AFRC and RUF troops in Kono District during this period. This however does not exclude that he had effective control over some troops.

8885. para. 1872: The Prosecution did not generally attempt to differentiate between crimes committed by AFRC troops and those committed by RUF rebels, they instead referred to 'AFRC/RUF troops' as the perpetrators of crimes in Kono District. For many crimes, the Trial Chamber has been unable to determine beyond reasonable doubt the affiliation of the perpetrators nor to which specific commanders they were subordinate.

8886. para. 1873: The Trial Chamber is, however, satisfied that it has been established beyond a reasonable doubt that crimes were committed by 'Savage' and persons under his authority in Tombodu during this period.[3197] The question that remains to be determined is whether he was subordinate to the Accused Kamara, and whether Accused Kamara was in a position to exercise effective control over him.

8887. para. 1874: Witness TF1-334 testified that Captain Mohamed 'Savage' (alias Changabulanga) was a commander in Tombodu. His deputy was Staff Alhaji and he reported to the AFRC Operation Commander.[3198] Witness TF1-334 testified that the Accused Kamara promoted Staff Alhaji to Lieutenant after the capture of Kono District.[3199] He was a staff sergeant until 'Savage' recommended him for promotion.[3200] Witness George Johnson also stated that 'Savage' was in charge of a battalion in Tombodu and described him as being an SLA soldier. [3201]

8888. para. 1875: There is also evidence that the Accused Kamara actively exerted authority over 'Savage' by directly or indirectly supervising his activities in Tombodu. Witness TF1-334 testified that the SLA Operation Commander [3202], subordinate to the Accused Kamara, patrolled the battalions in various locations including Tombodu. Witness George Johnson testified that Kamara, the Operations Commander and others went to Tombodu on several occasions during the Kono period. [3203] The Witness testified that the Accused Kamara, together with Hassan Papa Bangura and others went to Tombodu to drink palm wine. On one of these occasions, the Witness testified that he observed 'Savage' order the flogging of approximately seven civilians. On cross-examination he testified that 'Savage' would beat people nearly every day and that it was a "common drill".[3204] The Trial Chamber notes that there is no indication on the evidence that the Accused Kamara also observed this event.[3205] Witness TFl-334 testified that the Accused Kamara visited Tombodu with other military supervisors to ensure that Johnny Paul Koroma's orders to burn Tombodu were carried out.[3206]

8889. para. 1876: Witness TF1-334 testified that 'Savage' informed the Accused Kamara that civilians in Tombodu were celebrating because they believed that ECOMOG had taken over the area and that as a result of this communication the SLA Operations Commander, the Witness and Colonel Momoh Dorty went to Tombodu to see what was happening.[3207] When the Witness arrived he observed that 'Savage' and his soldiers had amputated and killed a large number of civilians - actions which this Trial Chamber has found constitute crimes as alleged by the Prosecution.[3208]

8890. para. 1877: Witness George Johnson similarly testified that as the Nigerian ECOMOG troops pressured them out of the District, the Witness together with the three Accused, passed through Tombodu.[3209] There, they met Battalion Commander 'Savage' and the three Accused saw that a large number of civilians had been killed by machete and their bodies had been thrown into a pit. [3210]

8891. para. 1878: The Trial Chamber notes that there is also evidence that 'Savage' was subordinate to the RUF. Witness TF1-334 stated that in addition to reporting to the operations commander, 'Savage' also reported to Denis Mingo.[3211] Significantly, the Witness puts Denis Mingo in Tombodu shortly after the crimes were committed. The Witness testified that Denis Mingo reacted to the crimes by telling 'Savage' that he was committing crimes against humanity.[3212]

8892. para. 1879: Prosecution Witness George Johnson similarly testified that 'Savage' was battalion commander at Tombodu but that he was appointed to the rank of Lieutenant by Denis

Mingo. [3213] He also testified that 'Savage' remained under the command of Denis Mingo while some of his battalion fighters left with the Witness's group to go to Mansofinia.[3214]

8893. para. 1880: Defence Witness DAB-095 testified that Savage was the commander of a battalion of mixed AFRC and RUF troops in Tombodu.[3215] Defence Witness DBK-117 testified on re-examination that he visited Tombodu after December 1998.[3216] He stated that by that time, Staff Alhaji was the commander in Tombodu and that 'Savage' was his deputy. At that time they were all under the control of the RUF.[3217]

8894. para. 1881: The Trial Chamber also notes that there is evidence that regardless of which faction he adhered to, 'Savage' was unruly in character and operated independently from his superiors. Prosecution Witness George Johnson testified in cross-examination that 'Savage' was very difficult to control and was an "unpredictable character".[3218]

8895. para. 1882: He testified that "in the early stages" 'Savage' was under the command of Denis Mingo and would listen to his instructions and carry them out, but later became "abnormal" and stated that he would not listen to anyone except Johnny Paul Koroma.[3219] On one occasion, prior to the time 'Savage' became "abnormal", the Witness saw 'Savage' flogging two individuals in the presence of the Accused Brima and the Accused Kanu. Brima told him to stop, which he did, but Witness George Johnson testified that after they returned to Koidu Town, 'Savage' executed the two men.[3220]

8896. para. 1883: He also testified that 'Savage' had possession of enough weapons to protect himself and his men and that because of this no one dared to tell him what to do or not to do.[3221]

8897. para. 1884: On the basis of the evidence examined above, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kamara exercised effective control over 'Savage'. There is clear evidence that 'Savage' was subordinate to the Accused Kamara; that Kamara both directly and indirectly through the SLA Operations Commander was in a position to supervise the activities of 'Savage'; that the Accused Kamara promoted 'Savage'; that 'Savage' himself reported to the Accused Kamara; and that the Accused Kamara was physically present in Tombodu when it was under the control of' Savage.'

8898. para. 1885: The fact that 'Savage' also reported to Denis Mingo and remained with Denis Mingo after Kamara departed from the District does not preclude Kamara exercising effective control over him. [3222]

8900. para. 1887: Similarly, the Trial Chamber finds the fact that 'Savage' and his men were well armed does not raise a reasonable doubt vis-à-vis the Accused Kamara's ability to exercise effective control over him. Subordinates in any organisation engaged in active combat will be armed or have access to weapons. It remains in all cases for superiors to put in place measures to prevent a malcontent or unstable subordinate from using those weapons for his own purposes. Should a subordinate use the weaponry of the organisation to shore up his own power, it falls also to superiors to quell or at the very least attempt to quell such an initiative. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that as a senior commander of the AFRC, the Accused Kamara himself, or together with other senior commanders such as his immediate superior Denis Mingo, would have had the material ability to control 'Savage' and his subordinates.

iii. Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Kono District

8901. para. 1888: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara either knew or, at least had reason to know, that the subordinates were about to or had committed the offences as the orders were given by him or in his presence. The Prosecution further submits the crimes committed by Savage in Tombodu was so notorious that the Accused must have known.[3223]

8902. para. 1889: The Trial Chamber finds it is not necessary to establish whether the crimes committed by 'Savage' and his battalion in Tombodu were "notorious" as there is clear evidence which establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara knew or ought to have known of the crimes. As examined above, there is evidence which establishes that Kamara was routinely apprised of the situation in Tombodu. He was himself repeatedly present in Tombodu and indirectly supervised the activities in Tombodu through patrols carried out by the SLA Operation Commander. He worked together with Denis Mingo to whom 'Savage' also reported. There is also evidence that the Accused Kamara was apprised specifically of the crimes committed by 'Savage' and his battalion. 'Savage' sent a message to Kamara prior to the commission of the crimes indicating that the civilians in Tombodu were celebrating. Witness George Johnson testified that the Accused Kamara passed through Tombodu after the commission of the crimes and himself observed the bodies of the civilians killed.

iv. Failure to prevent or punish - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Kono District 8903. para. 1890: The Prosecution submits that 'as the key commander in the field, the Second Accused clearly had the material ability to prevent offences or to punish those subordinates responsible for [3224] committing crimes.

8904. para. 189l: The Trial Chamber finds on the basis of the evidence examined above that the Accused Kamara had the ability to issue orders which were followed; that he took over authority for promoting SLA soldiers after Johnny Paul Koroma left Kono District; and that generally, that the SLAs maintained an effective day-to-day chain of command and regularly mustered, that therefore, as examined above, it was within the Accused's material ability to prevent crimes committed by his subordinates or to punish subordinates for committing crimes.

8905. para. 1892: The Trial Chamber finds further on the evidence the Accused Kamara did not attempt to prevent or punish the crimes committed by 'Savage" and his battalion in Tombodu.

v. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Kono District

8906. para. 1893: The Trial Chamber finds that the Accused Kamara was in a position of superior responsibility and criminally responsible under article 6(3) of the Statute, for crimes committed by his subordinates in Kono District; namely, unlawful killings and physical violence, committed with the primary purpose to spread terror and to collectively punish civilians for allegedly failing to provide sufficient support to the AFRC/RUF.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Kono District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Kono District

8908. para. 2001: The Prosecution makes no submission in its Final Brief that the Accused Kanu bears superior responsibility for crimes committed in Kono District. The Prosecution case is that the Accused Kanu was shuttling between SAJ Musa in Koinadugu and the Accused Kamara in Kono in order to keep SAJ Musa informed of the developments on the ground in Kono.[3336]

8909. para. 2002: The Kanu Defence cites witness TF1-033 to demonstrate that Kanu was only one of the commanders present in Tombodu in 1998, the others being Hassan Papa Bangura, Franklyn Woyo Conteh alias 'Woyo', 'Savage', Ibrahim Bazzy Kamara, Ibrahim Sesay alias 'Biyoh', and Abdul Sesay.[3337] The Kanu Defence asserts that thus, the "evidence is insufficient in holding the Third Accused responsible for superior responsibility for the crime of collective punishment, as his mere presence as a commander, one of many, is mentioned".[3338]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Kono District

8910. para. 2003: The Trial Chamber has already found that the evidence regarding the role of the Accused Kanu in Kono District is inconclusive.[3339] The evidence adduced is insufficient to establish that the Accused Kanu occupied a particular position in the: AFRC command structure established by the Accused Kamara or that he had any troops under his effective control.

8911. para. 2004: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the Prosecution has not established that the Accused Kanu was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Kono District. In the absence of this first element of superior responsibility, it is unnecessary to consider whether the Accused Kanu had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators thereof.

8912. para. 2005: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Kono District.

(iv) Kailahun District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

8914. para. 1680: Neither the Prosecution nor the Brima Defence in their Final Briefs make specific submissions son the superior responsibility of the Accused Brima specifically in relation to Kailahun District. The Trial Chamber notes that Accused Brima submits as part of his alibi defence that he was under RUF arrest in Kailahun District throughout the relevant Indictment period and that as a detainee himself, he was not in a position of superior commander over the perpetrators of the alleged crimes in Kailahun.[291]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Kailahun District

8916. para. 1682: The Trial Chamber also recalls its finding that the Accused Brima was detained by the RUF in Kailahun District from February to late April/early May 1998, a much shorter period than he claimed to be under detention.[2913] During this period he was detained by the RUF and did not exercise any control over any troops in the District.

8917. para. 1683: The Trial Chamber further found that after his release from detention in Kailahun in early May 1998, the Accused Brima travelled to Kono District and then travelled to Koinadugu and Bombali Districts in June and July 1998.[2914]

8918. para. 1684: While the presence of a commander in the location in which crimes were committed is not necessary to prove effective control, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima was able to exercise effective control over the RUF in Kailahun District after February 1998.

8919. para. 1685: In the absence of this first element of superior responsibility, the Trial Chamber does not consider it necessary to consider whether there is any evidence that the Accused Brima had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and that he failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Kailahun District.

b. Responsibilty of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

8921. para. 1898: The Prosecution in its Final Brief makes no submissions that the Accused Kamara bears superior responsibility for crimes committed in Kailahun District in the period after the Intervention in February 1998.

8922. para. 1899: The Kamara Defence submits that the Prosecution did not lead any evidence to show that the Accused Kamara was in Kailahun throughout the relevant period and that all the witnesses indicate that the entire Kailahun District was a RUF stronghold.

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Kailahun District

8923. para. 1900: The Trial Chamber recalls its findings that the only proven perpetrators of crimes committed its finding that the AFRC and the RUF were not working together in Kailahun during this period. [3229]

8924. para. 1901: The Trial Chamber finds the evidence insufficient to establish that the Accused Kamara exercised effective control over members of the RUF in Kailahun District after February 1998.

8925. para. 1902: In the absence of this first element of superior responsibility, it is not necessary to consider whether there is any evidence that the Accused Kamara had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators.

8926. para. 1903: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Kailahun District. in Kailahun District during this period were members of the RUF. The Trial Chamber also recalls

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Kailahun District

8928. para. 2010: The Prosecution makes no submission in its Final Brief that the Accused Kanu has superior responsibility for crimes committed in Kailahun District in this period. The Kanu Defence does not make submissions specific to Kailahun District in its Final Brief arguments on the superior responsibility of the Accused Kanu.

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Kailahun District

8929. para. 2011. The Trial Chamber recalls its findings that the only proven perpetrators of crimes committed in Kailahun District during this period were members of the RUF. The Trial Chamber also recalls its finding that the AFRC and the RUF were not working together in Kailahun during this period.[3344]

8930. para. 2012: The Trial Chamber found that there is conflicting evidence regarding the activities of the Accused Kanu in the period February-May 1998, when he joined the group of SLA troops led by the Accused Brima in Mansofinia. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied on the evidence adduced that the Accused Kanu exercised effective control over any members of the RUF in Kailahun District after February 1998.

8932. para. 2014: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Accused Kanu is not liable under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Kailahun District.

(v) Koinadugu District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Koinadugu District

i. Pleadings – Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Koinadugu District 8934. para. 1697: The Prosecution in its Final Brief submits that each of the three Accused bears superior responsibility for crimes committed in the attack on YifinlYiffin.[2932] As stated above, the Trial Chamber notes the Prosecution did not include the location of Yifin/Yiffin in the particulars under Counts 3 through 6, 8 through 11 or 14, and thus no findings have been made on evidence adduced in this regard. The Trial Chamber notes further that no evidence with respect to Yifin/Yiffin has been adduced under Counts 9, 12 or 13.

8935. para. 1698: The Brima Defence makes no submissions specific to Koinadugu District in relation to the superior responsibility of the Accused Brima.

ii. Findings - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Koinadugu District

8936. para. 1699: The Trial Chamber finds that the crimes committed in Koinadugu District were perpetrated by AFRC/RUF forces associated with groups led by SAJ Musa and ‘Superman’. While there is evidence that the Accused Brima was in sporadic contact with SAJ Musa between May and July 1998, the Prosecution has not submitted, nor is there evidence to the effect that, the Accused Brima exercised effective control over the troops of SAJ Musa or Superman. In the absence of proof of the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the Accused Brima and the perpetrators of the crimes in Koinadugu District, it is unnecessary to consider whether there is any evidence that the Accused Brima had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Koinadugu District

i. Pleadings – Responsibilty of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Koinadugu District

8938. para. 1907: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara has superior responsibility for all crimes committed in the attack on Yiffin.[3236]

ii. Findings - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Koinadugu District

8939. para. 1908: As stated above, Yiffin was not a location pleaded in the Indictment.

8940. para. 1909: The Trial Chamber has found that the crimes committed in Koinadugu District were perpetrated by AFRC/RUF forces associated with groups led by SAJ Musa and Denis Mingo.[3237] The Prosecution has not submitted, nor is there evidence to the effect that, the Accused Kamara exercised effective control over the troops of SAJ Musa or Denis Mingo. In the absence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the Accused Kamara and the perpetrators of the crimes in Koinadugu District, it is unnecessary to consider whether there is any evidence that the Accused Kamara had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators.

c. Responsibilty of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Koinadugu District

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of the Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Koinadugu District

8943. para. 2019: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kanu has superior responsibility for all crimes committed in the attack on Yiffin.[3351]

8944. para. 2020: The Kanu Defence makes no submissions on the superior responsibility of the Accused Kanu specifically in relation to crimes committed in Koinadugu District.

ii. Findings – Responsibilty of the Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Koinadugu District

8945. para. 2021: The Trial Chamber notes that the Prosecution did not specify Yiffin as a location in the Indictment under Counts 3 through 6, 8 through Ill, and 14 and therefore, no findings have been made in this regard. No evidence has been adduced that the crimes committed under Counts 9, 12 or 13 in Koinadugu District are attributable to the Accused Kanu.[3352]

8946. para. 2022: The Trial Chamber has found that the crimes: under Counts 3 to 6, 8 to 11, and 14 committed in other locations in Koinadugu District were perpetrated by AFRC/RUF forces associated with groups led by SAJ Musa and 'Superman'. The evidence on the activities of the Accused Kanu between February and late April or early May 1998 is inconclusive.[3353] The Accused Kanu was then sent by SAJ Musa to accompany the Accused Brima's group from Mansofinia to Rosos.3354 The Prosecution has not submitted, nor is there evidence to the effect that, the Accused Kanu was in a command position in relation to the troops of SAJ Musa or Superman, either between February and late April or early May, or while he was with the Accused Brima's group thereafter.

8948. para. 2024: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by AFRC/RUF troops in Koinadugu District.

(vi) Bombali District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Bombali District

8949. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Bombali District - Brima - Crimes committed – Bombali District – para. 1700 [8064].

i. Pleadings – Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Bombali District

8950. para. 1721: The Prosecution in its Final Brief submits that the Accused Brima as a superior over the subordinate perpetrators, bears individual criminal responsibility for all crimes committed in Bombali District from 1 May 1998 until 30 November 1998.[2968]

8951. para. 1722: The Brima Defence in its Final Brief submitted that the Accused Brima was under arrest at Colonel Eddie Town and therefore not in a position to command the alleged perpetrators of the crimes [2969] The crimes in Bombali District were committed by AFRC/RUF troops prior to their arrival in Colonel Eddie Town in September 1998.

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Bombali District 8952. para. 1723: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima was the overall commander of the AFRC forces that committed the crimes in Bombali District.[2970] It has been established that the AFRC in this period had a functioning chain of command, planning and orders process, and disciplinary system [2971] Structures were therefore in place to facilitate the effective control by the Accused Brima of his subordinates. The Trial Chamber will now examine the evidence pertaining to the troops' activities in this period to determine whether the command structure functioned and the Accused Brima was able to actually exercise effective control over the SLA troops on a day-today basis.

8953. para. 1724: There is ample unchallenged evidence that the Accused Brima's orders were obeyed. [2972] For example upon arrival at Rosos, the Accused Brima gave orders distributing the companies out to various surrounding villages [2973] The Accused Brima ordered an advance troop to depart from Rosos to find a suitable new location for the camp.[2974] Upon this location being found at 'Colonel Eddie Town', Brima ordered the entire brigade to move there. [2975] In addition the Trial Chamber refers to its previous findings that the Accused Brima gave a number of orders to commit crimes which were obeyed by AFRC troops. [2976]

8954. para. 1725: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima's exercise of effective control was not sporadic, but constant. His orders remained effective and applicable to incidents that occurred some time after their issuance. For example, at Kamagbengbe, prior to arrival at Rosos, a number of civilian abductees attempted to escape from the troops. They were recaptured and brought before the Accused Brima. He ordered one of the company commanders Lieutenant Tito to immediately execute them, on the basis of his prior order at Mansofinia that persons attempting to escape would be shot. Lieutenant Tito shot the civilians.[2977]

8955. para. 1726: Similarly, at Rosos, the Accused Brima warned the troops that disciplinary action would be taken against soldiers that brought captured civilians to camp.[2978] There is evidence of the subsequent implementation of this order by his subordinates in his absence. Witness TFl-334 testified that on one occasion, he and a number of other troops captured six civilians in a village and brought them to their commander, whose identity was revealed in closed session. The commander ordered their execution on the basis that this was what the Accused Brima had ordered.[2979]

8956. para. 1727: The Trial Chamber has observed that the Accused Brima habitually addressed the troops publicly, often using this as a forum to issue orders. One example of this is the speech made by the Accused Brima at Kamagbengbe, in the course of which he ordered the attack 0;1 Karina.[2980] Witness TFl-334 described a particular field at Rosos as 'the field where Gullit normally addressed the troops' [2981] Witness TFl-334 also testified that at the completion of the military training program for civilian abductees at Rosos, the trainees were addressed by 'Gullit' and 'Five-Five'. [2982] Thus, the Accused Brima clearly had a high public profile among the troops and was able to assemble and address them.

8957. para. 1728: On the basis of the foregoing evidence, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima was able to effectively control the AFRC troops under his command. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between the Accused Brima and the perpetrators of crimes committed in Bombali District.

iii. Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Bombali District

8958. para. 1729: The Prosecution submits that 'based on the fact that in most cases the orders to commit crimes were given to the subordinates directly by the Accused or at least in their presence, the Accused either knew or at the very least had reason to know that the subordinates were about to commit the offences or had done so, especially since on many occasions the Accused were personally present [...] while the crimes were being carried out. [2983]

8959. para. 1730: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that in many cases actual knowledge of the crimes committed by the Accused Brima's subordinates without his direct participation can be inferred from circumstantial evidence for three reasons.

8960. para. 1731: Firstly, the occurrence of the crimes was widespread and involved a typical modus operandi of attacks against civilians.[2984] The frequency and pattern of crimes, coupled with the evidence that the Accused Brima ordered attacks on civilians on several occasions,[2985] indicates that he had actual knowledge that crimes were about to occur whenever his troops went on operations.

8961. para. 1732: Secondly, actual knowledge can be inferred from the evidence that the troops systematically reported to their commanders, and often to the Accused Brima himself, at the conclusion of operations. [2986]

8962. para. 1733: Thirdly, the Accused Brima was at all times physically proximate to the locations in which crimes were committed. The Trial Chamber observes that the context in which the Accused Brima exercised effective control was different to that of overall commanders in traditional military armies, who are often removed from the front line of the conflict and may receive reports of incidents that have passed through several commanders up a vertical chain of command. Instead, the AFRC troops in Bombali District moved together to Rosos and upon arrival were all located in Rosos itself or satellite camps nearby. The Accused Brima was thus consistently on the ground with the troops, even if he did not accompany them on every operation.

8963. para. 1734: The Trial Chamber is also satisfied that the Accused Brima had reason to know of the crimes committed in Bombali District. The standard for proof of imputed knowledge is strict. Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber finds that there can be no reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima was in possession of information that put him on notice of the likelihood of illegal acts being committed by his subordinates. He directly participated in the commission of a number of crimes.[2987] He witnessed the commission of crimes by his subordinates.[2988] He received reports of the commission of crimes.[2989]

8964. para. 1735: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Accused Brima knew, or had reason to know, of the crimes committed by his subordinates in Bombali District in which he did not directly participate.

iv. Failure to Prevent or Punish - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Bombali District

8965. para. 1736: In its Final Trial Brief the Prosecution submits that as one of "the key commanders in the field", the Accused Brima had "necessary and reasonable measures" at his disposal to prevent or punish his subordinates but that he did not do so.[2990]

8966. para. 1737: The Brima Defence does not make any submissions on whether the Accused Brima attempted to prevent the commission of crimes or punish offending subordinates. Rather, the Brima Defence submits that this third limb of superior responsibility is only applicable where the first two limbs have been established. The Brima Defence argues that the Prosecution has failed to prove these first two elements and the case against the Accused Brima under Article 6(3) of the Statute must therefore be dismissed.[2991]

8967. para. 1738: Before turning to the available evidence, the Trial Chamber wishes to emphasise that any analysis of the type of preventative or punitive measures required on the part of the Accused Brima must recognise that the AFRC was not a traditional military organisation. It is not useful to inquire whether the Accused Brima adopted measures commonly cited in the jurisprudence, such as reporting the perpetrators to competent authorities or commencing formal investigations. [2992] Nonetheless, the fundamental question remains whether there were measures of any type reasonably open to the Accused Brima, taking into account the extent of his ability to control his subordinates, which he failed to take.

8968. para. 1739: The Trial Chamber found that the AFRC faction had a functioning disciplinary system in Bombali District.[2993] The Trial Chamber accepts that this system was not advanced in the sense of being properly codified and formally sanctioned by competent authorities. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber finds that that this disciplinary system could have been employed by the Accused Brima. Instead, there is no evidence that the Accused Brima took measures to punish subordinates for the commission of crimes. To the contrary, witnesses testified that on occasion the Accused Brima commended offending subordinates [2994] The only evidence that soldiers were punished for crimes refers to their punishment for the rape of other soldiers' wives. [2995] The Trial Chamber does not consider this sufficient, as the soldier in such cases was not being punished for committing the crime of rape, but for the fact that his victim 'belonged' to another perpetrator.

8969. para. 1740: Insofar as the prevention of offences is concerned, the Trial Chamber recalls that the nature of the measures that must be taken by commanders depends on the degree of their control over their subordinates as well as the severity and imminence of the crimes[2996] The Trial Chamber notes that it is likely that the Accused Brima had less control over his troops than a commander would have over highly disciplined troops in a regular army. It is possible that some of the Accused Brima's troops may have committed crimes even if they were not ordered to do so. This is similarly possible in a traditional military organisation. The law does not require proof that the Accused Brima could have prevented the commission of the crimes. The law requires that the Accused Brima took all steps reasonably open to him in an attempt to do so.

8970. para. 1741: The only evidence of the Accused Brima taking any steps to prevent the crimes committed is that he appointed a provost marshal who was in charge of ensuring that "jungle justice" was adhered to. "Jungle Justice included a "law" prohibiting rapes during operations[2997] and any fighter who raped another fighter's 'wife' would be put to death.[2998] The Trial Chamber finds that rules regarding which troops were entitled to rape civilians or rules that prohibited rape at specified times, do not demonstrate the Accused's attempt to prevent or punish these crimes. Rather they are indicative of the tolerance and institutionalised nature of the commission of the crimes within the AFRC forces.

8971. para. 1742: There is also evidence that the Provost Marshal was in charge of ensuring that "government property," meaning arms, ammunition and medical supplies belonging to the AFRC fighting forces, were not stolen. [2999] The Trial Chamber is of the opinion that this prohibition does not demonstrate the Accused's intention to prevent general looting of civilian property by the troops.

8972. para. 1743: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Accused Brima failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the crimes committed in Bombali District or punish the perpetrators thereof.

v. Findings - Responsibilty of Accused Brima under Article 6.3- Bombali District

8973. para. 1744: On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima as a superior, bears individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(3) for the crimes committed by his subordinates in Bombali District between 1 May 1998 and 30 November 1998 in which he did not directly participate.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Bombali District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Bombali District

8976. para. 1922: The Kamara Defence submits that the evidence adduced does not prove that persons under the 'command, authority or direction' of the Accused Kamara participated in the crimes committed in Bombali District.[3251]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Bombali District 8977. para. 1923: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kamara was the deputy commander of the AFRC troops in Bombali District. [3252] Evidence of a de jure position of authority does not per se suffice to prove the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship, especially in the context of a non-traditional military organisation such as the AFRC troops.[3253] The Trial Chamber must therefore look at the available evidence to determine whether the Accused Kamara, as deputy commander, was able to exercise effective control over the AFRC troops in Bombali District.

8978. para. 1924: There is evidence that the Accused Kamara played a role at a senior level in military operations in Bombali District. Witness TF1-334 testified that the Accused Kamara was Deputy Brigade Commander[3254] and, at Karina, "[...] the commanders have been monitoring each and every soldier"[3255] The Accused Kamara was one of the senior AFRC commanders who was present at the meeting with SAJ Musa at Kurubonla at which the restructuring of the troops was discussed; however, no evidence was adduced as to his contribution[3256] Within the structure which was subsequently established by the Accused Brima, the Operations Commander and the Provost Marshal were required to report to the Accused Kamara. At Rosos, the Accused Kamara was based at 'headquarters', from where operations were planned and orders issued. Whilst there is no direct evidence on the Accused Kamara's precise involvement[3257] Witness TF1-334 testified that the Accused Kamara was one of the commanders who made decisions regarding the brigade;

> Q. Witness, I'm going to ask you to clarify. My question to you was what did you subsequently see the deputy chief in command do as second in command? Just focus on him specifically, please.
> A. He, the chief in command, the chief of staff and the senior military supervisors were responsible for taking decisions in the brigade.
>
> Q. How do you know that?
> A. I myself was present whenever they want to take a decision in my presence. I was there whenever they were deciding on anything before they can send it out. [3258]

8979. para. 1925: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kamara issued an order to the troops in Karina which was obeyed.[3259] The Trial Chamber is satisfied on the evidence that the Accused Kamara participated in decision making. On the evidence the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kamara exercised effective control over the AFRC troops and was aware that the troops under his control committed crimes in Bombali District.

8980. para. 1926: The Trial Chamber finds on the foregoing evidence that there was a formal command structure in the AFRC faction in Bombali District, that the Accused Kamara, in his capacity as Deputy Brigade Commander had and exercised effective control over the troops under his command.

8982. para. 1928: The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the Prosecution established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Bombali District.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Bombali District

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Bombali District

8984. para. 2032: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kanu bears superior responsibility for all crimes committed in Bombali District from 1 May 1998 until 30 November 1998 by virtue of the high level of authority he possessed as third in command.[3365] The Prosecution further submits that the Accused Kanu was in charge of training child soldiers and was in total control of women at the camp.[3366]

8985. para. 2033: The submissions of the Kanu Defence were: comparatively detailed and will be discussed further as they arise in the findings below. However, the Kanu Defence's position can be summarised as follows. First, it argues that the Prosecution evidence conflicts on whether the Accused Kanu was Chief of Staff or G5 and that he cannot have occupied both positions. The Kanu Defence further submits that neither position entails command authority, since the Prosecution has not established that the Accused Kanu ever functioned as an operational commander, which it defines as "a military leader in command and control of a fighting unit". [3367] The Kanu Defence then accepts that the Accused Kanu was responsible for civilians but argues that in this role he protected them and this does not equate to command responsibility for operations conducted by the SLAs.[3368]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Bombali District

8986. para. 2034: The Trial Chamber found that the AFRC faction had a functioning chain of command, planning and orders process and disciplinary system in Bombali District.[3369] The Trial Chamber found that the Accused Kanu was Chief of Staff, commander in charge of civilians and commander in charge of military training.

8988. para. 2036: The Trial Chamber does not find this conclusion particularly helpful, as this description of the Accused Kanu's role does not indicate whether he had effective control over any of the AFRC troops that committed crimes in Bombali District. However, there is other evidence which goes to prove that the Accused Kanu commanded troops on military operations, thus establishing the existence of a superior/subordinate relationship.

8989. para. 2037: Witness TFl-334 testified that while the troops were at Rosos, the Accused Kanu led an operation to Gbinti. [3372] The plan, formulated at Rosos, was to capture the town by pretending to surrender. The soldiers captured a civilian en route, who told them that ECOMOG soldiers were in the town. The Accused Kanu decided that the surrendering tactic would not work. He ordered that the men attack the town immediately, which they did. [3373] The ECOMOG forces withdrew and the Accused Kanu ordered that the town be looted and burned. Soldiers wrote, among other epithets, the words 'Five-Five in town' on the walls.[3374] After this operation, the soldiers returned to Rosos and reported to the Accused Brima.[3375]

8990. para. 2038: Witness George Johnson testified that the Accused Kanu was one of the commanders who led the troops into Karina when the town was burnt and its inhabitants killed.3376 According to the Witness, the Accused Kanu was a member of the headquarters group who "take care of all the operations, and all the orders come from the headquarters". The Witness also said that "headquarters was in charge of planning all operations and giving military orders". Witness TFl-334 confirmed that the Accused Kanu, as chid of staff, was present when the Accused Brima gave orders to attack and burn Karina, amputate the citizens, and capture strong men, as a demonstration "to shock the whole country."

8991. para. 2039: Witness TFl-158 gave evidence that the Accused Kanu was one of the leaders of the troops who attacked Bornoya, where looting took place and civilians were amputated and killed.

8992. para. 2040: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that this evidence proves beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu had effective control over his AFRC subordinates in Bombali District.

iii. Actual or Imputed Knowledge and Failure to Prevent or Punish - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Bombali District

8993. para. 2041: The Trial Chamber is also satisfied on the evidence beyond reasonable doubt that in his role as leader of the attacks, the Accused Kanu knew or should have known of the crimes committed by his troops and that it was within his ability to have prevented such crimes or to have punished his subordinates for committing them, but that he failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to do so.

8994. para. 2042: The Kanu Defence submits that the Accused Kanu's responsibilities with respect to civilians was 'protective'. [3380] The Trial Chamber rejects this submission. The factual findings demonstrate that the Accused Kanu presided over a system that institutionalised serious abuse of civilians. The characterisation of the Accused Kanu's function as 'protective' is incorrect and unacceptable.

8995. para. 2043: The Trial Chamber thus finds that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu knew or ought to have known of the commission of crimes by his subordinates in Bombali District and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators thereof.

iv. Findings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Bombali District

8996. para. 2044: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Bombali District.

(vii) Freetown and Western Area

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Freetown and Western Area

8997. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Freetown and Western Area - Brima - Crimes committed – Freetown and Western Area – para. 1745 [8102].

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Freetown and Western Area

8998. para. 1787: The Prosecution submits m its Final Brief that the Accused Brima has superior responsibility for all crimes committed by his subordinates in Freetown between 6 January 1999 until around 28 January 1999.[3065]

8999. para. 1788: The Brima Defence submits that the evidence of mutiny by junior soldiers at Colonel Eddie Town, which led to the arrest and 'long detention' of the three Accused, 'weakens any responsible chain of command and the existence of superior authority'. 3066 The Brima Defence further submits that there was no effective command or control over the fighters that attacked Freetown, citing in support of this argument the Prosecution Military Expert's conclusion that 'the AFRC faction had a strong command capability which failed on 6th January 1999' .[3067]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area 9000. para. 1789: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Brima was overall commander of the troops in Freetown.[3068] The Trial Chamber will now consider the evidence pertaining to the Accused Brima's control of the troops from the time he regained command throughout the attack on Freetown until the retreat of the troops to Benguema in February 1999 in order to ascertain whether a superior-subordinate relationship existed.

9001. para. 1790: At Allen Town on 5 January 1999, the Accused Brima ordered the invasion of Freetown and specified the locations to be captured, including State House. 'Gullit' announced that the troops were entitled to loot civilian property as he was unable to pay them. However, he also stated that diamonds and dollars were 'government' property and should be given to the Brigade. [3069] The Trial Chamber considers the limits placed by the Accused Brima on the permissible excesses of his troops indicative of his ability to control their behaviour.

9002. para. 1791: Witness TFl-334 described at length the movement of the troops towards State House on 6 January 1999. His evidence reveals a steady, organised advance pursuant to the orders of the Accused Brima who had specified the locations to be captured. The witness was part of the advance troop and he refers to a number of occasions where they captured new ground and then waited for the brigade senior command, including the Accused Brima, to arrive and tell them what to do next. [3070] At one point the witness stated that he and the other soldiers "will not do anything without the command of Gullit".[3071] The witness states that Gullit ordered the soldiers to set fire to vehicles and this was a deliberate tactic to create an obstacle to prevent ECOMOG armoured cars reaching the AFRC position.[3072] The witness refers to a number of other occasions prior to the troops' arrival at State House on which the Accused Brima gave orders which were obeyed.[3073]

9003. para. 1792: Witness George Johnson also describes a co-ordinated advance to State House. The troops advanced in battalions and his role as task force commander was to ensure that they moved the right way and maintained discipline. He reported throughout this time to the Accused Brima, who gave orders to the troops throughout the advance.[3074]

9004. para. 1793: The troops' acquiescence in the Accused Brima's assumption of command suggests that he was able to effectively control them, notwithstanding any lingering loyalties to SAJ Musa. The Trial Chamber therefore rejects the submission of the Brima Defence that the disruption to Brima's authority due to his arrest in Eddie Town prevented him from resuming the control necessary for a finding of superior responsibility.

9005. para. 1794: Upon capturing State House, the AFRC established its headquarters there. The Accused Brima was in command.[3075] Other senior commanders including the Accused Kamara and Kanu were also present there from time to time.[3076] On arrival at State House, Brima ordered the opening of Pademba Road prison.[3077] There is evidence of the Accused Brima giving other orders at this time which were obeyed.[3078]

9006. para. 1795: The movement of the troops throughout 6 January remained ordered and strategic. Witness George Johnson describes the deployment of the various battalions at different locations, which he marked on a map of Freetown.[3079] There is evidence of commanders reporting the progress of their troops to the Accused Brima.[3080] Witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that on the evening of 6 January he attended a meeting at State House to plan an attack on ECOMOG at Wilberforce. All 3 Accused were present and Gullit commanded the meeting.[3081]

9007. para. 1796: Mosquito announced over Radio France International on 6 January that that the troops commanded by the Accused Brima had captured Freetown and would continue to defend

Freetown.[3082] Later that same day, Brigade Administrator Colonel FAT Sesay, in the presence of all of the Accused, gave a message in the same terms over BBC Radio. [3083] Witnesses DBK-037 and DBK-OI2 also stated that FAT Sesay gave an interview to the BBC while in Freetown, although they did not testify as to its content. [3084]

9008. para. 1797: However, the presence of the AFRC headquarters at State House was the high point of the AFRC dominance during invasion. It appears from the evidence of Prosecution and Defence witnesses that in the days following 6 January, ECOMOG regained the upper hand and in the next two to three weeks the AFRC was dislodged from Freetown, the capital and was in continual retreat. The precise movement of the troops during the retreat was difficult to ascertain from the testimony of Prosecution and Defence witnesses. Witness George Johnson testified that approximately a week after 6 January, with ECOMOG advancing, the AFRC headquarters moved to Ferry Junction, near Shankardass.[3085] From Shankardass, they pulled out to Kissy Mental Home.[3086] Witness TF1-334 states that towards the third week the troops then retreated to Eastern Police. [3087] Witness George Johnson testified that after several days at Kissy the troops pulled out and retreated through Calaba Town and eventually to Benguema.[3088]

9009. para. 1798: Prosecution military expert Colonel Iron's report notes that the command structure began to break down in Freetown and the military chain of command failed after the capture of State House, since commanders gave orders to soldiers nearest them without using battalion structure. [3089]

9010. para. 1799: Colonel Iron further concludes that the fighting force retained cohesion in retreat although the battalion structure had completely broken down.[3090] He opines that the AFRC force "was still a capable fighting force. Commanders were still able to make sound decisions, and the command structure was effective enough to be able to conduct a relatively complex manoeuvre."[3091]

9011. para. 1800: The Trial Chamber examined the following evidence in light of the above expert opinion of Colonel Iron.

9012. para. 180l: Witness TF1-334 testified that he remained mostly with the brigade administration while in Freetown, but he states that 'the troops were all scattered, everybody was just about'.[3092] He stated that any time the commanders needed reinforcements to go on a battle, he and his supervisor needed to move around raising soldiers to go on the mission.[3093] This evidence was corroborated by witness TF1-184, who was ordered by 'Gullit' to find manpower to carry out a mission,[3094] and Gibril Massaquoi who reports 'Five-Five' issuing a similar order to look for men.[3095] Witness George Johnson no longer described the movement of the troops in terms of battalions led by commanders, rather his testimony becomes a description of a series of isolated incidents that he witnessed as he moved around Freetown. He states that after the headquarters lost State House arms and ammunition were nearly finished and were no longer being distributed by the G4, but 'everybody had his or her own arms and ammunition,.[3096] Witness TF1-184 agreed with Colonel Iron's conclusion that the battalion structure was no longer operating. He stated that 'everyone was disorganised' and 'everybody was just doing what he want [sic]'. Commanders took the soldiers around them 'who they think they were able to control and were listening to them' and started amputations.[3097]

9013. para. 1802: Witness TF1-334 testified that Gullit told the troops at Kissy mental home 'Gentleman (sic), now the jungle has started'. [3098] Witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that after losing State House, looting and burning increased. He described an incident in which a female civilian complained to 'Five-Five' about her house being burned down, in response to which Five-Five arrested the soldier responsible. Five-Five stated that there had been no order to do this and that things were becoming 'very rampant,.[3099] Witness TF1-184 stated that the troops at Kissy with 'Gullit' and 'Bazzy' were losing ground because they were in 'a confused state' .[3100] 'Gullit' complained to the witness that 'Five-Five' had been acting contrary to his wishes.[3101] He testified that during the retreat from Kissy, the soldiers called on the civilian carrying their ammunition so that they could stage an attack, but he had thrown it away while running.[3102] Witness Gibril Massaquoi stated under cross-examination that by the time the troops left Freetown he did not believe that the commanders knew everything that was being done by their men.[3103]

9014. para. 1803: The Trial Chamber notes from the above evidence that the Accused Brima remained able to exercise command over the troops in his immediate surroundings. There is ample evidence of the Accused Brima giving orders to troops in Freetown which were obeyed.[3104] A number of these orders were issued by the Accused Brima in the presence of the Accused Kamara and Kanu.[3105] He was also able to refuse requests from his subordinates. Witness TFl-153 at one point approached 'Gullit' to ask him to release the priests and nuns held captive at PWD, but 'Gullit' refused.[3106]

9015. para. 1804: The Trial Chamber agrees with Col. Iron's opinion above that the AFRC fighting force "retained cohesion in retreat although the battalion structure had completely broken down" and that the AFRC force "was still a capable fighting force. Commanders were still able to make sound decisions, and the command structure was effective enough to be able to conduct a relatively complex manoeuvre".

9016. para. 1805: The foregoing evidence establishes a superior-subordinate relationship existed between the Accused Brima and the AFRC troops in Freetown after the troops lost State House. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that the Accused Brima was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the AFRC troops that committed crimes in Freetown even after the "Headquarters" were dislodged from State House.

iii. Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area

9017. para. 1806: The Prosecution submits that 'based on the fact that in most cases the orders to commit crimes were given to the subordinates directly by the Accused or at least in their presence, the Accused either knew or at the very least had reason to know that the subordinates were about to commit the offences or had done so.[3107]

9018. para. 1807: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Brima ought reasonably to have known of the commission of crimes committed in which he was not directly involved. He directly participated in the commission of a number of crimes.[3108] The crimes were committed on a wide scale in physical proximity to the Accused Brima at State House.

9019. para. 1808: The Trial Chamber therefore finds that there can be no reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima was in possession of information to put him on notice that crimes were being committed by his subordinates, although he may not have been directly involved in such crimes.

iv. Failure to prevent or punish - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area 9020. para. 1809: There is no evidence that the Accused Brima took any measures to prevent the troops under his control in Freetown from committing crimes against or punish the perpetrators of such crimes.

v. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area 9021. para. 1810: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Brima is liable as a superior under Article: 6(3) for crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area during the relevant Indictment period.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Freetown and Western Area

9022. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Freetown and Western Area - Kamara - Crimes committed – Freetown and Western Area – para. 1929 [8144].

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3- Freetown and Western Area

9023. para. 1942: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kamara bears superior responsibility for all crimes committed by his subordinates in Freetown between 6 January 1999 until around 28 January 1999.[3273]

9024. para. 1943: The Kamara Defence submits that there was an absence of effective command and control over the fighters that attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999.[3274]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3- Freetown and Western Area

9025. para. 1944: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kamara was deputy commander of the AFRC troops during the invasion of Freetown and that a functioning chain of command and a planning and orders process was in place until the senior command moved from State House.[3275]

9026. para. 1945: The Trial Chamber notes that evidence was adduced on the activities of the Accused Kamara during the Freetown invasion. The Accused Kamara was present at the meeting chaired by Brima at Orugu Village on 5 January 1999 in which the invasion of Freetown was planned; however, no evidence was adduced as to Kamara's contribution. The Accused Kamara was present at headquarters at State House immediately after it was captured on 6 January 1999.[3276] There is also evidence that he attended a meeting of senior commanders when an attack on Wilberforce, where ECOMOG forces were based, was discussed; however, no evidence was adduced as to his contribution.[3277] After the capture of the State House, the Accused Brima ordered that Pademba Road Prison should be opened and the prisoners released. The Accused Kamara, together with troops from 1st, 4th and 5th battalion, went to the prison and the door was blasted open. The Accused Kamara ordered that the released prisoners should move to State House; however, while some prisoners followed this order, others did not do so.[3278] The Accused Kamara spoke with 'Mosquito' on the radio prior to the capture of State House.[3279]

9027. para. 1946: Given the limited resources of the AFRC, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that this evidence proves that the Accused Kamara exercised a degree of authority over the AFRC faction.

9028. para. 1947: The Accused Kamara was present at the State House when the Accused Brima announced to the battalion commanders and others, that they were likely to lose "the ground totally" and that the burning of Freetown should start.[3280] After the loss of State House, the Accused Kamara gave an order to AFRC troops to burn houses.[3281]

9029. para. 1948: The Trial Chamber finds the evidence adduced indicates the continual presence of the Accused Kamara during the invasion of Freetown up until State House was lost. He was often in the company of other senior commanders, including the Accused Brima and the Accused Kanu, and gave a number of orders himself, he participated in decision making and did not distance himself from decisions made. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused's had both a de jure position of authority during this period, and the de facto ability to effectively control the AFRC troops under his command in Freetown.

iii. Knowledge and failure to prevent or punish - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3- Freetown and Western Area 9030. para. 1949: The Accused Kamara had actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes committed and failed to prevent or punish the perpetrators.

iv. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3- Freetown and Western Area

9031. para. 1950: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Freetown.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Freetown and Western Area

9032. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Freetown and Western Area - Kanu - Crimes committed – Freetown and Western Area – para. 2045 [8157].

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Freetown and Western Area

9033. para. 2065: The Prosecution submits that the Accused Kanu has superior responsibility for all crimes committed by his subordinates in Freetown from 6 January until about 28 January. The Prosecution argues that the Accused Kanu's actual or imputed knowledge of the crimes can be inferred from the fact that crimes were often ordered by him or in his presence and that as one of the key commanders in the field, the Accused Kanu had the material ability to prevent the commission of crimes or to punish the perpetrators.[3407]

9034. para. 2066: The Kanu Defence submits that the positions of Chief of Staff and commander in charge of civilians are not operational command positions and therefore do not entail superior responsibility.[3408]

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area

9035. para. 2067: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kanu was Chief of Staff and the commander in charge of civilians throughout the attack on Freetown on 6 January 1999 until the retreat to Newton in the Western Area.[3409] The Trial Chamber has also found that the AFRC faction had a functioning chain of command and planning and orders process during the initial invasion of Freetown, but that this command structure failed when the troops lost control of State House.[3410]

9036. para. 2068: The Trial Chamber notes that Accused Kanu's functions as Chief of Staff in the Western Area involved responsibilities which did not require the exercise of command over troops. For example, Prosecution witness George Johnson testified that the Accused Kanu ran the meeting at Orugu Village at which the Accused Brima ordered the attack on Freetown.[3411] The Prosecution Military Expert Colonel Iron opined that it is customary in regular armies for the Chief of Staff to run meetings and for the commander to act as chair, only interjecting when necessary to stress particular points. He also testified that this was the regular practice in the AFRC.[3412]

9037. para. 2069: As with its findings in Bombali District, the Trial Chamber reiterates that it cannot be presumed that the Accused Kanu performed the same role as a Chief of Staff in a regular army. The Trial Chamber accepts the expert evidence of Colonel Iron in this specific regard since it is consistent with the testimony of witness George Johnson. However, as was also demonstrated in Bombali District, there is other evidence upon which the Trial Chamber is satisfied that, in addition to assisting the commander in an administrative capacity, the position of Chief of Staff placed the Accused Kanu in a position of effective control over troops.

9038. para. 2070: The Trial Chamber has found that as Chief of Staff, the Accused Kanu was third in command in Freetown.[3413] The Trial Chamber further recalls its findings that the Operations Director, the Operations Commander, the Task Force Commander and the head of Military Police were all required to report to the Accused Kanu. These men were senior to the battalion commanders.[3414] Thus, although he did not have a particular unit of men under his command, the Trial Chamber rejects the Kanu Defence's submission that as Chief of Staff and commander in charge of civilians, the Accused Kanu was relegated to the role of a non-operational commander.

9039. para. 2071: The Accused Kanu's seniority is also evidenced by the fact that, like the Accused Kamara, he was based at the AFRC headquarters at State House.[3415] He attended the meeting of commanders held there on the evening of 6 January at which an attack on Wilberforce was discussed.[3416] In addition, the Accused Kanu made an announcement over the local radio on 6 January 1999 that the troops had captured Freetown, identifying himself as Chief of Staff.[3417]

9041. para. 2073: During the advance towards Freetown, the Accused Kanu commanded a body of troops that went on an operation to attack Tumbo.[3418] While in Freetown, one morning prior to the loss of State House, the Accused Kanu ordered the military police to move the dead bodies that were piling up in the vicinity, as the area was beginning to smell.[3419]

9042. para. 2074: Witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that while the senior commanders were still at State House, he observed a soldier coming from the front line who encountered the Accused Kanu near State House. The soldier reported to the Accused Kanu on the current positions of the advancing ECOMOG troops. The witness overheard the Accused Kanu ordering some officers to find men to reinforce that particular area. The officers did so and the Accused Kanu ordered the assembled troops to 'put the war candle on', by which he meant to burn the houses. The Accused Kanu then ordered some kerosene to be brought from State House. This kerosene was distributed by the officers among the troops, who then began setting houses alight.[3420]

9043. para. 2075: Finally, the fact that the Accused Kanu ordered the commission of crimes in Freetown is evidence of his ability to control AFRC troops subordinate to him.

9044. para. 2076: The Trial Chamber therefore finds that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between the Accused Kanu and the AFRC troops in Freetown.

iii. Knowledge - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area

9045. para. 2077: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kanu had reason to know of the commission of crimes committed before the loss of State House in which he was not directly involved. He directly participated in the commission of a number of crimes.[3421] The crimes were committed on a wide scale in physical proximity to the Accused Kanu at State House.

9046. para. 2078: The Trial Chamber therefore finds that there can be no reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu was in possession of information to put him on notice that crimes were being committed by his subordinates before the loss of State House, although he was not directly involved in such crimes.

iv. Failure to prevent or punish - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area 9047. para. 2079: There is no evidence that the Accused Kanu took any measures to prevent the troops under his control in Freetown from committing crimes against or punish the perpetrators of such crimes.

v. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area

9048. para. 2080: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in the Western Area.

(viii) Port Loko District

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Port Loko District

9049. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Port Loko District - Brima - Crimes committed – Port Loko District – para. 1811 [8177].

i. Pleadings – Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 – Port Loko District

9050. para. 1815: The Indictment alleges that the Accused Brima, while holding a position of superior responsibility and exercising effective control over his subordinates, is individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute.[3113] The Trial Chamber finds that this is sufficient to charge the Accused Brima with liability under 6(3) for crimes committed in Port Loko District, although it is not specifically referred to in the Indictment as one of the Districts in which the Accused Brima held a command position.[3114] The Trial Chamber notes that the charge of superior responsibility is subsequently reiterated separately in relation to all Counts for which crimes are alleged in Port Loko District.[3115] In addition, the Prosecution in its Supplementary Pre-Trial Brief stated its case that the Accused Brima is liable under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates in Port Loko.[3116] The Brima Defence were therefore put on notice at an early stage of the charge against the Accused.

9051. para. 1816: The Prosecution in its Final Brief makes no submissions as to the superior responsibility of the Accused Brima for crimes committed in Port Loko District after the retreat from Freetown in late January 1999.[3117]

9052. para. 1817: The Brima Defence submits that the alleged perpetrators of the crimes in Port Loko District were not under the control of the Accused Brima as he was at the material time not in Port Loko District.[3l18]

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Freetown and Western Area

9053. para. 1818: The Trial Chamber found that following the: second unsuccessful attack on Freetown staged jointly by AFRC/RUF commanders, the Accused Brima, accompanied by the Accused Kanu and a group of AFRC troops, went to Lunsar to assist Superman, who was fighting against Issa Sesay at the time. [3119] No evidence has been adduced on the organisation of the troops accompanying the Accused Brima or whether this group fought alongside Superman or under his overall command. The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has failed to establish that the Accused Brima had the effective control over the AFRC troops fighting in these areas.

9054. para. 1819: The Trial Chamber finds pursuant to Article: 6(3) of the Statute, that the Prosecution has not proved this mode of individual criminal responsibility against the Accused Brima, for the crimes committed in Port Loko District during the relevant Indictment period.

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Port Loko District

9055. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Port Loko District - Kamara - Crimes committed – Port Loko District – paras. 1951-1952 [8181].

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Port Loko District

9056. para. 1956: The Prosecution submits in its Final Brief that the Accused Kamara bears superior responsibility for crimes committed by the AFRC troops in Port Loko District between January and April 1999 by virtue of his position as their commander. [3289]

9057. para. 1957: The Kamara Defence makes no submissions on the superior responsibility of the Accused specific to Port Loko District. The Kamara Defence relied on the testimony of four Defence witnesses to assert that the Accused Kamara was not commander in the West Side.

ii. Existence of a superior-subordinate relationship - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District

9058. para. 1958: The Trial Chamber has found that the Accused Kamara was the overall commander of AFRC troops in the area known as the 'West Side' in Port Loko District. [3290] The Trial Chamber has further found that the AFRC faction in Port Loko District had a chain of command and a planning and orders process. [3291]

9059. para. 1959: The Trial Chamber is satisfied, on the basis of the evidence, that the Accused Kamara had effective control over AFRC troops operating in the District. As examined above, Kamara was present in the District throughout the relevant period; established the command structure of the AFRC in the 'West Side'; gave orders to captains and troops which were carried out; appointed and promoted commanders; enforced discipline within the ranks and was in a position of de jure authority to other high level commanders including the Operations Commander[3292] who reported to him.

9060. para. 1960: The Trial Chamber is satisfied on the basis of the consistent evidence of both Prosecution and Defence Witnesses, including the evidence of George Johnson himself, that George Johnson held a position of command and exercised active authority during the relevant period. However, evidence which suggests the presence and authority of other commanders in the District during the relevant period, does not, in and of itself, create a reasonable doubt of the ability of the Accused Kamara to exercise effective control over subordinates.

9061. para. 1961: The Trial Chamber recalls its findings that unlawful killings were committed in Nonkoba, Tendekum and Manaarma.[3293] The Trial Chamber is satisfied on the basis of the following evidence that only the unlawful killings in Maararma are attributable to AFRC troops under the command of the Accused Kamara.

9062. para. 1962: The Trial Chamber will now consider the available evidence on the role of Kamara in relation to the attack on Port Loko and Manaarma in order to determine whether the Accused Kamara was in effective control of Junior Lion and the troops underneath him.

9063. para. 1963: Witness George Johnson testified that some time prior to 27 April 1999, a meeting of commanders was held, attended by himself, the Accused Kamara, the Operations Director, Tito and the battalion commanders. At this meeting the commanders planned an attack on Port Loko to capture arms and ammunition from the Malians. Witness TFl-334 also testified that witness George Johnson was the commander that led the operation to Port Loko. He testified that 'Bazzy' ordered Junior Lion to lead the attack and also ordered that troops were to burn down any village and kill civilians en route.

9064. para. 1964: Witness George Johnson testified that after he led the operation on Port Loko which included the attacks on Manaarma, he established communication with 'Bazzy' who sent 'Tito' with some civilians to collect the arms and ammunition. On his return to camp, he reported to the Accused Kamara and informed him of the alleged conduct of Cyborg. However, the witness stated that Kamara was so happy about the success of the operation that he neglected to take any action. Rather, the Accused Kamara sent a 'signal message' to Sam Bockarie in Kailahun recommending the witness for promotion. Bockarie endorsed the recommendation and the witness became a colonel. Witness George Johnson testified that subsequent operations to obtain arms and ammunition were planned by him and carried out at Newton, Mile 38 and Gberi Junction before the signing of the peace process. He does not refer to Manaarma in his evidence.

9065. para. 1965: Both witnesses TFl-334 and George Johnson testified that after the attack, 'Bazzy' contacted Mosquito to inform him of its success and the capture of the Malian soldiers. The Trial Chamber notes that witness Gibril Massaquoi testified that Bazzy sent a message to Gullit regarding the attack on Port Loko. Neither witnesses George Johnson nor TFl-334 mention this.

iii. Actual or Imputed Knowledge - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District

9066. para. 1966: Prosecution Witness George Johnson testified that en route to Port Loko, he sent an advance troop to secure a village ahead. Upon arrival there, he observed a number of dead civilians and 'Sheriff complained to him that 'Cyborg' had amputated and killed civilians in the villages. The Trial Chamber has found that this village was Manaanna.

9067. para. 1967: George Johnson further testified that on his return to camp after the successful operation to Port Loko, he reported to the Accused Kamara, informing him of the conduct of 'Cyborg'. The Trial Chamber is accordingly satisfied that the Accused Kamara had actual knowledge of the commission of crimes in Manaanna by his subordinates.

iv. Failure to prevent or punish - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District 9068. para. 1968: George Johnson stated that the Accused Kamara did not take any disciplinary action in response to his report regarding the killings in Manaanna. Rather, the Accused Kamara radioed Sam Bockarie in Kailahun and recommended that the witness be promoted to Colonel, and Bockarie subsequently endorsed this promotion. George Johnson testified that the Accused Kamara did not take any action. Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Accused Kamara failed to punish his subordinates for committing unlawful killings in Port Loko District.

v. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District

9069. para. 1969: The Trial Chamber finds that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kamara is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Manaanna in Port Loko District.

c. Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District

9070. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Port Loko District - Kanu - Crimes committed – Port Loko District – para. 2081 [8187].

i. Pleadings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 – Port Loko District

9071. para. 2085: The Prosecution makes no submission in its Final Brief that the Accused Kanu has superior responsibility for crimes committed in Port Loko District between January and April 1999.

9072. para. 2086: The Kanu Defence makes no submissions specific to the superior responsibility of the Accused Kanu in Port Loko District.

ii. Findings - Responsibility of Accused Kanu under Article 6.3 - Port Loko District

9073. para. 2087: The Trial Chamber has found that following the second unsuccessful attack on Freetown staged jointly by AFRC/RUF commanders, the Accused Kanu accompanied the Accused Brima to Lunsar to assist Superman, who was fighting against Issa Sesay at the time. No reliable evidence has been adduced on the organisation of the AFRC troops associated with the Accused Kanu in this period or whether this group fought alongside Superman or under his overall command. It has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu had troops under his effective control during this period.

9074. para. 2088: The Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused Kanu is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Port Loko District.

(ix) Responsibility for Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

a. Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3 - Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers 9075. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Brima - Crimes committed – Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers – paras. 1820 – 1834 [8191].

i. Count 9, Count 12 and Count 13 – Responsibility of Accused Brima under Article 6.3

9076. para. 1838: As the Trial Chamber has already found the: Accused Brima criminally responsible for the planning of the enslavement crimes, it is not necessary to examine his responsibility under Article 6(3).

b. Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers 9077. See above: Chapter 12 – AFRC – Trial Judgment – Kamara - Crimes committed – Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers – para. 1970 [8208].

i. Kono District – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 – Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers 9078. para. 1973: The Trial Chamber has found that in Kono District an unknown number of civilians were abducted and used as forced labour; civilians were subjected to sexual slavery; and children under the age of 15 were conscripted into armed groups or used to participate in active hostilities. The Trial Chamber recalls its finding that the Accused Kamara had effective control over the AFRC forces in Kono District led by known SLA commanders 'Savage', SLA Operation Commander and witness TF1-334 while Brima was in detention in Kailahun. The Trial Chamber must therefore determine whether the enslavement crimes proven in Kono District are attributable to AFRC forces under the command of the Accused Kamara.

9079. para. 1974: The Trial Chamber has found, on the evidence of witness TFl-334, that from early March 1998, the Operations Commander and other soldiers went to villages in Kono District and captured civilians who were then used as forced labour or subjected to sexual slavery. Children were also captured who were conscripted into the AFRC force. While the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Operations Commander was under the effective control of the Accused Kamara after the departure of Johnny Paul Koroma from Kono District. The evidence adduced does not establish beyond reasonable doubt whether these crimes were committed prior to the departure of Johnny Paul Koroma or subsequently when the Accused Kamara had effective command over the AFRC commanders who were among the perpetrators.

9080. para. 1975: The Trial Chamber has found that Witnesses DAB-098, TF1-072 and TFl-216, along with an unknown number of other civilians, were captured in approximately March 1998 in Kono District and enslaved in Tombodu. The Trial Chamber is satisfied, from the testimony of these witnesses, that the perpetrators of these crimes were led by AFRC commanders 'Savage' and 'Staff Alhaji', who were under the effective control of the Accused Kamara. 1976. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds the Accused Kamara liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for the crime of enslavement in Kono District.

ii. Port Loko District – Responsibility of Accused Kamara under Article 6.3 - Crimes of Enslavement, Sexual Slavery and Child Soldiers

9081. para. 1977: The Trial Chamber has made no findings on Counts 12 and 13. The Trial Chamber notes the evidence of witnesses TFl-282 and TF1-085 who were subjected to sexual slavery in Port Loko District.[3307] However, the evidence adduced does establish beyond reasonable doubt that the perpetrators of these crimes were troops under the command of the Accused Kamara.

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-A, Judgement, 22 February 2008

(a) Findings and Conclusions:

(i) Brima - Superior Responsibility for Crimes Committed in Bombali, Freetown and Other Parts of the Western Area

9082. para. 225: Brima's Fourth and Sixth Grounds of Appeal, respectively, read as follows:

> (i) "The Trial Chamber erred in fact and/or law by finding the Accused Brima was responsible under Article 6(3) for the crimes committed by his subordinates in Bombali District between 1 May 1998 and 30 November 1998 in which he did not directly participate resulting in a miscarriage of justice."
> (ii) There is an "error in law and/or fact due to the Trial Chamber's finding that the Accused Brima is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed in Freetown and other parts of the Western Area during the relevant indictment period thereby occasioning a miscarriage of justice. The Trial Chamber erroneously relied on the evidence of the prosecution witnesses TF1-334, TF1-167, TF1-184 and the prosecution Military expert witness at the expense of several Defence Alibi witnesses and the Defence military expert."

9083. para. 226: Both Grounds complain that the Trial Chamber erred in law and/or fact in finding that the Appellant Brima is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates in Bombali District (Ground Four) and in Freetown and other parts of the Western Area (Ground Six) during the period covered in the Indictment. Both Grounds of Appeal are grossly defective because they do not give particulars of the errors alleged.

9084. para. 227: In failing to state particulars in his Grounds of Appeal, Brima's submissions are unacceptable, diffused and wide-ranging, complaining of the evaluation of evidence of witnesses by the Trial Chamber and what could be regarded as a profuse, but unnecessary, statement of general principles of law relating to superior responsibility, at the end of which the Appellant Brima did not pinpoint in respect of which finding and in which particular regard the Trial Chamber had erred in fact and or in law.

9085. para. 228: Most of the submissions in respect of Ground Six were mere assertions of fact which properly ought to have been made before the Trial Chamber.

9086. para. 229: The Appeals Chamber in perusing the Judgment of the Trial Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber had made appropriate legal and factual findings upon which it based its conclusion that Brima was responsible as a superior under Article 6(3). We are of the opinion that nothing useful has been urged in this Appeal to make us come to the conclusion that the Trial Chamber was in error.

9087. para. 230: For these reasons Grounds Four and Six of Brima's Grounds of Appeal must fail.

(ii) Kamara - Superior Responsibility

a. Pleadings – Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9088. para. 252: In Kamara's Seventh Ground of Appeal he submits that the "Trial Chamber erred in law and or fact in paragraphs 1884, 1893 (Kono), 1928 (Bombali), 1950 (Western Area), 1969 (Port Loko) and 2117 of the Judgment in finding Kamara criminally responsible/guilty under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates at Tombodu, Kono District and throughout Bombali District and the Western Area and Port Loko District pursuant to Counts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12, 13 and 14 of the Indictment thereby leading to a miscarriage of justice."

9089. para. 255: Under his Seventh Ground of Appeal, Kamara submits:

> (i) That he did not have effective control or the ability to control the actions of Savage and consequently could not be liable for crimes committed by Savage in Kono District;

(ii) That he did not have effective control over AFRC troops in Kono District;

(iii) That the Trial Chamber erred in its interpretation of witness TF1-334's evidence;

(iv) That the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding him criminally responsible as a superior for crimes committed in Bombali District on the basis of evidence demonstrating that he "ordered" crimes and "participated in decision making";

(v) That the Trial Chamber erred in finding him responsible as a superior for crimes committed by AFRC troops in Freetown on the basis of evidence indicating that he was present at meetings and at headquarters at State House immediately following its capture on 6 January 1999.

9090. para. 256: The Prosecution responds that Kamara failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him criminally responsible as a superior for crimes committed by AFRC troops in Kono District, Bombali District, Port Loko District and Freetown and other parts of the Western Area. It argues that Kamara's responsibility is not precluded by evidence that Savage had an uncontrollable character. Further the Prosecution argues that Kamara cannot avoid responsibility by relying on evidence that other superiors concurrently exercised effective control over AFRC troops in Kono District. The Prosecution further submits that the Trial Chamber's interpretation of witness TF1-334's testimony regarding muster parades in Kono District was correct and reasonable and argues that even if the evidence was in fact misinterpreted, Kamara has failed to demonstrate how this occasioned a miscarriage of justice in relation to his Article 6(3) responsibility. The Prosecution maintains that there is no material inconsistency in the evidence of witnesses TF1-167 and TF1-334 concerning the burning of five young girls inside a house in Karina and the events in Freetown. In respect of the incident involving the death of five young girls in Karina, the Prosecution concedes that there are "variations in the details of how the crime was committed;" but notes that there is no dispute concerning what it calls the "essential features" of the evidence.

b. Discussion – Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9091. para. 257: In addition to military commanders, superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute encompasses political leaders and other civilian superiors in positions of authority. A superior is one who possesses the power or authority to either prevent a subordinate's crimes or punish the subordinate after the crime has been committed. The power or authority may arise from a de jure or a de facto command relationship. Whether it is de jure or de facto, the superior-subordinate relationship must be one of effective control, however short or temporary in nature.

Effective control refers to the material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct. The test of effective control is the same for both military and civilian superiors.

9092. para. 258: Kamara submits that a finding of superior responsibility requires proof of both command and control which he claims are inseparable. The Appeals Chamber rejects this assertion. The terms "command" and "control" are two related but distinct concepts. The term "command" refers to powers that attach to a military superior, while the term "control," which has a wider meaning encompasses both military and civilian superiors.

i. Kamara's Responsibility for Crimes Committed by Savage - Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9093. para. 259: Kamara contends that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him liable as a superior for crimes committed by Savage in Kono District. According to Kamara, he did not have the material ability to control the acts of Savage because Savage was unruly in character. The Trial Chamber noted that there was evidence that Savage was very difficult to control and that he was unpredictable. The Trial Chamber was satisfied that Savage's unpredictable character was not a bar to finding that Kamara had effective control over him. The Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disturb the Trial Chamber's finding that Kamara is liable as a superior for crimes committed by Savage in Kono District.

ii. Kamara's Effective Control in Kono District and the Testimony of Witness TF1-334 on AFRC Muster Parades in Kono District - Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9094. para. 260: With respect to Kamara's responsibility for the crimes committed by AFRC troops in Kono, the Trial Chamber found that after the departure of Johnny Paul Koroma from Kono District, the AFRC was subordinate to the RUF and that Kamara became the highest ranking AFRC soldier in the District. It also found that AFRC and RUF troops worked closely together in Kono District and that commanders from each faction supervised mixed battalions of AFRC and RUF troops. It held that despite the AFRC's subordination to the RUF, including Kamara's subordination to the RUF's Denis Mingo, Kamara still had effective control over some mixed battalions of AFRC and RUF troops.

9095. para. 261: In reaching this conclusion, the Trial Chamber relied on the evidence of witness TF1-334 who testified that Kamara, although subordinate to Denis Mingo, was the most senior commander of the AFRC in Kono District and that AFRC combatants "operated under their i.e.

Mingo's and Kamara's command and were answerable to the AFRC commanders." The Trial Chamber also noted the evidence of George Johnson that Denis Mingo appointed and promoted some members of the RUF and this was endorsed by Kamara, and that Kamara exercised authority over promotions within the AFRC troops in Kono District. According to witness TF1-334, although Kamara was subordinate to Denis Mingo and received orders from him, AFRC troops operated under Kamara's command and were answerable to him. Witness TF1-334 corroborated George Johnson's testimony that Kamara made appointments, gave promotions and issued orders which were carried out by AFRC troops.

9096. para. 262: Subordination of the AFRC to the RUF and substantial cooperation between the AFRC and RUF may have diminished the distinction between the two command structures. Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber considers that concurrent command does not vitiate the individual responsibility of any of the commanders. In its evaluation of concurrent command in Kono District, the Trial Chamber concluded that Denis Mingo's command in Kono District over joint units of the AFRC/RUF force did not preclude a finding of superior responsibility on the part of Kamara. The Trial Chamber noted Denis Mingo's position of authority over Kamara, but also noted that Kamara continued to issue orders to AFRC subordinates which were followed, and remained the most senior AFRC commander in Kono until Brima's arrival in mid-May 1998. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's approach, and therefore affirms the Trial Chamber's finding that Kamara exercised effective control in Kono District.

9097. para. 263: Kamara argues that the Trial Chamber erred in its interpretation of witness TF1-334's evidence regarding muster parades in Kono. He contends that witness TF1-334 only testified as to "how often a muster [parade] generally occurs in a military context" rather than to how often the AFRC held muster parades in Kono District as held by the Trial Chamber. The relevant excerpts are the following:

> "Prosecution: You use the word muster, M-U-S-T-E-R; what do you mean by muster?
> Witness TF1-334: This is a military term that is to bring together the various forces and address them. That is what we call mustered.
>
> Prosecution: How often does a muster generally occur in a military context?
>
> Witness TF1-334: Well, this was a weekly address. Every week the two groups were addressed.
> Prosecution: Now go on. You were talking about Morris Kallon saying something about the SLAs and that they should not muster?

> Witness TF1-334: And again he said the SLA should – had no right to call themselves SLA in Kono, and neither AFRC, because he only knew of one faction and that is the RUF faction. So this brought confusion between the RUF and the SLA."

9098. para. 264: In paragraph 1869 of its Judgment, the Trial Chamber summarized the testimony, stating:

> "Witness TF1-334 also testified that the AFRC troops held muster parades every week in Kono, until they were prohibited from doing so by Morris Kallon (RUF) . . . The witness explained that 'mustering' is a military term that refers to the force being brought together and addressed publicly. This procedure is indicative of an organised force that is responsive to superior command."

9099. para. 265: Having considered the relevant excepts, the Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber did not err in its interpretation of the evidence of witness TF1-334. The evidence remains that the AFRC held regular muster parades in Kono and that this fact demonstrates a degree of command and control from which effective control could reasonably be inferred.

iii. Kamara's Effective Control in Bombali District - Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9100. para. 266: Kamara contends that evidence demonstrating he "ordered" crimes and "participated in decision making" in Bombali District is insufficient to establish his criminal responsibility as a superior. Kamara acknowledges that he had powers to issue orders but stated that he did not have powers to discipline AFRC troops. The powers of a superior to issue orders and make binding decisions are indicative of his ability to exercise effective control. Contrary to Kamara's contention, the Trial Chamber did not establish his effective control merely on the basis of evidence that he ordered crimes. Rather, it considered evidence that Kamara, inter alia, issued orders to troops in Karina which were obeyed, participated at a senior level in military operations in Bombali District and received reports from both the operations commander and the provost marshal. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber endorses the Trial Chamber's approach in establishing Kamara's effective control in Bombali District.

iv. Conflicting Testimony of Witness TF1-334 and Witness TF1-167 - Kamara – Superior Responsibility

9101. para. 267: Kamara submits that the Trial Chamber failed to reconcile the conflicting testimony of witness TF1-334 and witness TF1-167 concerning the burning of five young girls inside a house in Karina in Bombali District. He argues that in failing to provide a reasoned opinion explaining its evaluation of the conflicting evidence, the Trial Chamber failed to establish that it was proved beyond reasonable doubt that he is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) of the Statute. Kamara had advanced similar arguments in respect of the testimony of witnesses TF1-167 and TF1-334 concerning an order that prisoners released from Pademba Road Prison should move to State House and that AFRC troops should burn houses and parastatals in Freetown.

9102. para. 268: While it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record. Rather, it may only make findings of material facts that are essential to the determination of guilt in relation to a particular Count. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber has set out in its Judgment the standard of review for the evaluation of witness testimony.

v. Kamara's Responsibility as a Superior for Crimes in Freetown - Kamara – Superior Responsibility 9103. para. 269: The Appeals Chamber now turns to Kamara's final contention that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him responsible as a superior for crimes committed by AFRC troops in Freetown on the basis of evidence indicating that he was present at meetings and at headquarters at State House immediately following its capture on 6 January 1999. Kamara asserts that such evidence does not form the basis upon which his liability as a superior could be assessed. The Appeals Chamber considers that Kamara misconstrues the Trial Chamber's findings. The Trial Chamber noted evidence that Kamara was present at meetings, but drew no inferences or conclusions from the evidence as the Prosecution did not lead evidence about Kamara's contributions at those meetings. The Appeals Chamber finds this conclusion to be reasonable.

9104. para. 270: Contrary to Kamara's assertion, his presence at State House did not form the sole basis for the Trial Chamber's finding of effective control. In addition to his presence, the Trial Chamber based its finding that he exercised effective control over AFRC forces on the fact that Kamara was often in the company of senior commanders; that he participated in decision making; that he did not distance himself from decisions that were made and that he gave orders that were obeyed. Kamara has not demonstrated any error or unreasonableness in the Trial Chamber's findings.

9105. para. 271: For the above reasons, the Appeals Chamber holds that Ground Seven of Kamara's Appeal is untenable.

(iii) Kanu - Effective Control for Superior Responsibility

a. Pleadings – Kanu – Effective Control for Superior Responsibility

9106. para. 286: The Fifth and Sixth Grounds of Kanu's Appeal both invoke errors relating to the Trial Chamber's findings that he bears superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute. Kanu advances identical legal arguments in support of these Grounds. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber will consider them together.

9107. para. 287: Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber adopted a flawed approach in assessing whether he had effective control over AFRC troops in Bombali District (Fifth Ground of Appeal) and Freetown and other parts of the Western Area (Sixth Ground of Appeal). Specifically, Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber adopted a "two-pronged" approach to determining effective control which sought first, to establish whether the AFRC leadership collectively had effective control and second, to establish whether Kanu individually had effective control over AFRC troops. Kanu contends that the approach is "legally flawed" because it imputes criminal responsibility to him on the basis of collective responsibility rather than on the basis of individual criminal responsibility.

9108. para. 288: In response, the Prosecution submits that Kanu had the material ability to prevent or punish the AFRC troops under his command and gave several examples in which Kanu exercised that authority. The Prosecution contends that Kanu's arguments are "without merit" and maintains that the Trial Chamber did not commit an error of fact or law that either resulted in a miscarriage of justice or invalidated the Trial Judgment.

i. Discussion - Kanu – Effective Control for Superior Responsibility

9109. para. 289: The Appeals Chamber recalls that the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship is paramount to the determination of superior responsibility. Critical to the finding of a superior-subordinate relationship is that the commander exercised "effective control" over his subordinates. Effective control refers to the material ability of a superior, whether military or civilian, de jure or de facto, to prevent or punish his subordinates' crimes. "Substantial influence" or "persuasive ability" which falls short of effective control is insufficient for a finding of superior responsibility. A finding that a superior exercised effective control is a question of fact to be determined on a case-by-case basis.

9111. para. 291: As to the issue of effective control in respect of superior responsibility the Appeals Chamber reiterates its conclusion it arrived at on the similar Ground of Appeal by the Appellant Kamara.

9112. para. 292: Kanu's Fifth and Sixth Grounds of Appeal therefore fail.

D. CDF

1. Indictment

The Prosecutor v. Samuel Hinga Norman, Moinina Fofana, and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-03-14-I, Indictment, 4 February 2004

(a) General Allegations

9114. A nexus existed between the armed conflict and all acts or omissions charged herein as Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II and as Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law.[464]

9115. The CDF was an organized armed force comprising various tribally-based traditional hunters. The Kamajors were comprised mainly of persons from the Mende tribe resident in the South and East of Sierra Leone, and were the predominant group within the CDF. Other groups playing a less dominant role were the Gbethis and the Kapras, both comprising mainly of Temnes from the north; the Tamaboros, comprising mainly of Korankos also from the north; and the Donsos, comprising mainly of Konos from the east.[465]

9116. The RUF was founded about 1988 or 1989 in Libya and began organized armed operations in Sierra Leone in or about March 1991. The AFRC was founded by members of the Armed Forces of Sierra Leone who seized power from the elected government of Sierra Leone via a coup d'etat on 25 May 1997. Soldiers of the Sierra Leone Army comprised the majority of the AFRC membership. Shortly after the AFRC seized power, the RUF joined with the AFRC.[466]

9117. The ACCUSED and all members of the CDF were required to abide by International Humanitarian Law and the laws and customs governing the conduct of armed conflicts, including the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, to which the Republic of Sierra Leone acceded on 21 October 1986.[467]

9118. All offences charged herein were committed within the territory of Sierra Leone after 30 November 1996.[468]

9119. All acts or omissions charged herein as Crimes Against Humanity were committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against the civilian population of Sierra Leone.[469]

9120. The words civilian or civilian population used in this indictment refer to persons who took no active part in the hostilities, or were no longer taking an active part in the hostilities.[470]

(b) Individual Criminal Responsibility

9121. Paragraphs 4 through 11 are incorporated by reference.[471]

9122. At all times relevant to this Indictment, SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN was the National Coordinator of the CDF. As such he was the principal force in establishing, organizing, supporting, providing logistical support, and promoting the CDF. He was also the Leader and Commander of the Kamajors and as such had de jure and de facto command and control over the activities and operations of the Kamajors.[472]

9123. At all times relevant to this Indictment, MOININA FOFANA was the National Director of War of the CDF and ALLIEU KONDEWA was the High Priest of the CDF. As such, together with SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA were seen and known as the top leaders of the CDF. MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA took directions from and were directly answerable to SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN. They took part in policy, planning and operational decisions of the CDF.[473]

9124. MOININA FOFANA acted as leader of the CDF in the absence of SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN and was regarded as the second in command. As National Director of War, he had direct responsibility for implementing policy and strategy for prosecuting the war. He liaised with field commanders, supervised and monitored operations. He gave orders to and received reports about operations from subordinate commanders, and he provided them with logistics including supply of arms and ammunition. In addition to the duties listed above at the national CDF level, MOININA FOFANA commanded one battalion of Kamajors.[474]

9125. ALLIEU KONDEWA, as High Priest had supervision and control over all initiators within the CDF and was responsible for all initiations within the CDF, including the initiation of children under the age of 15 years. Furthermore, he frequently led or directed operations and had direct command authority over units within the CDF responsible for carrying out special missions.[475]

9126. SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, as National Coordinator of the CDF and Commander of the Kamajors knew and approved the recruiting, enlisting, conscription, initiation, and training of Kamajors, including children below the age of 15 years. SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN; MOININA FOFANA, as the National Director of War of the CDF; and ALLIEU KONDEWA, as the High Priest of the CDF, knew and approved the use of children to participate actively in hostilities.[476]

9127. In the positions referred to in the aforementioned paragraphs, SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA, individually or in concert, exercised authority, command and control over all subordinate members of the CDF.[477]

9128. In addition, or alternatively, pursuant to Article 6.3. of the Statute, SAMUEL HINGA NORMAN, MOININA FOFANA and ALLIEU KONDEWA, while holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising command and control over their subordinates, are individually criminally responsible for the crimes referred to in Articles 2, 3, and 4 of the Statute. Each Accused is responsible for the criminal acts of his subordinates in that he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and each Accused failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[478]

2. Trial Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-T, Judgement, 2 August 2007

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

9129. para. 232: The Chamber notes that the Prosecution, in addition or in the alternative, alleges that the Accused are responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 8 of the Indictment since these crimes were allegedly committed while the Accused were holding positions of superior responsibility and exercising command and control over their subordinates.[302]

9130. para. 233: The principle of superior responsibility is today anchored firmly in customary international law.[303] The Chamber endorses the views expressed by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Celebici that the individual criminal responsibility of superiors for failure to prevent or to punish crimes committed by subordinates was already an established principle of customary international law in 1992,[304] whether the crimes charged were committed in the context of an international or an internal armed conflict.[305] The Chamber further concurs with the finding of the Appeals Chamber of the Ad Hoc Tribunals that the principle of individual criminal responsibility of superiors is applicable, albeit not exactly in the same way, to both civilian and military superiors.[306]

9131. para. 234: The Chamber is of the opinion that the nature of responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) is based upon the duty of a superior to act, which consists of a duty to prevent and a duty to punish criminal acts of his subordinates. [307] It is thus the failure to act when under a duty to do so which is the essence of this form of responsibility.[308] It is responsibility for an [omission309] where a superior may be held criminally responsible when he fails to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the offender.[310]

[479] CDF Indictment, para. 24.

9132. para. 235: The Chamber takes the view that the following three elements must be satisfied in order to invoke individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute:

(i) the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the superior and the offender of the criminal act;

(ii) the superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and

(iii) the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the offender thereof.[311]

a. Superior-Subordinate relationship – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

9134. para. 237: The power or authority of the superior to prevent or to punish does not arise solely from a de jure status of a superior conferred upon him by official appointment.[314] Someone may also be judged to be a superior based on the existence of de facto powers or degree of control. This may often be the case in contemporary conflicts where only de facto armies and paramilitary groups subordinated to self-proclaimed governments mayexist.[315]

9135. para. 238: In assessing the degree of control to be exercised by the superior over the subordinate, the Appeals Chambers of the Ad Hoc Tribunals have determined that the "effective control" test should be applied. According to this test, the superior must possess the "material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct".[316] The indicators of effective control are more a matter of evidence than of substantive law.[317] The Chamber adopts the view that this is the appropriate test to apply in determining whether a superior-subordinate relationship exists. Mere substantial influence that does not meet the threshold of effective control is not sufficient under customary international law to serve as a means of exercising superior criminal responsibility.[318]

Moreover, de jure power in and of itself is not conclusive of whether a superior-subordinate relationship exists, although it may be evidentially relevant to such a determination.[319] The Chamber is therefore of the view that the effective control test must be satisfied even if the Accused has de jure status as a superior.

9137. para. 240: The Chamber further endorses the finding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that an Accused could not be held liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for crimes committed by a subordinate before the said Accused assumed command over that subordinate.[322] In order to "hold a commander liable for the acts of troops who operated under his command on a temporary basis it must be shown that at the time when the acts charged in the indictment were committed, these troops were under the effective control of that commander."[323]

9138. para. 241: A superior-subordinate relationship may be of a military or civilian character.[324] When examining whether a superior exercises effective control over his subordinates, the Chamber must take into account inherent differences in the nature of military and civilian superior-subordinate relationships. Effective control may not be exercised in the same manner by a civilian superior and by a military commander and, therefore, may be established by the evidence to have been exercised in a different manner.[325] Whether the evidence regarding a civilian's de jure or de facto authority establishes effective control over subordinates must be determined on a case-by-case basis.

b. Knowledge – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

9139. para. 242: In order to hold a superior responsible under Article 6(3) of the Statue for crimes committed by a subordinate, the Chamber is of the opinion that the Prosecution must prove that the superior knew or had reason to know that his subordinate was about to commit or had committed such crimes. Responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute is not a form of strict liability.[326]

9140. para. 243: The actual knowledge of the superior, i.e. that he knew that his subordinate was about to commit or had committed the crime, cannot be presumed and, in the absence of direct evidence, may be established by circumstantial evidence.[327] Various factors or indicia may be considered by the Chamber when determining the actual knowledge of the superior. Such indicia would include: the number, type and scope of the illegal acts; the time during which the illegal acts occurred; the number and type of subordinates involved; the logistics involved, if any; the means of communication available; the geographical location of the acts; the widespread occurrence of the acts; the tactical tempo of operations; the modus operandi of similar illegal acts; the officers and staff involved; and the location of the superior at the time and the proximity of the acts to the location of the superior.[328]

9141. para. 244: The Chamber accepts the jurisprudence of the Ad Hoc Tribunals that the "had reason to know" standard will only be satisfied if information was available to the superior which would have put him on notice of offences committed by his subordinates or about to be committed by his subordinates.[329] Such information need not be such that, by itself, it was sufficient to compel the conclusion of the existence of such crimes.[330] It need not, for example, take "the form of specific reports submitted pursuant to a monitoring system" and "does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed".[331] It can be general in nature, but it must be sufficiently alarming so as to alert the superior to the risk of the crimes being committed or about to be committed,[332] and to justify further inquiry in order to ascertain whether indeed such crimes were committed or were about to be committed by his subordinates.[333]

9142. para. 245: The information in question must in fact be available to the superior, who may not be held liable for failing to acquire such information in the first place.[334] In any event, an assessment of the mental element required by Article 6(3) of the Statute should be conducted in the particular circumstances of each case, taking into account the specific situation of the superior concerned at the time in question.[335]

c. Necessary and Reasonable Measures – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

9143. para. 246: The Chamber is of the opinion that a superior may be held responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute if he has failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of a crime or punish the perpetrators thereof. The question of whether a superior has failed to take such measures is connected to his possession of effective control. In other words, a superior will be liable if he failed to take measures that are within his material ability.[336] Hence, the question of whether the superior had the explicit legal capacity to do so is irrelevant if it is proven that he had the material ability to act.[337]

9144. para. 247: Under Article 6(3), the superior has a duty both to prevent the commission of the offence and punish the perpetrators. These are not alternative obligations - they involve different crimes committed at different times: the failure to punish concerns past crimes committed by subordinates, whereas the failure to prevent concerns future crimes of subordinates.[338] The duty to prevent arises from the time a superior acquires knowledge, or has reason to know that a crime is being or is about to be committed, while the duty to punish arises after the superior acquires knowledge of the commission of the crime.[339] "A superior must act from the moment that he acquires such knowledge. His obligations to prevent will not be met by simply waiting and punishing afterwards."[340]

9145. para. 248: The Chamber is of the opinion that whether a superior has discharged his duty to prevent the commission of a crime will depend on his material ability to intervene in a specific situation. In making this determination, the Chamber may take into account factors such as those which have been enumerated in the Strugar case on the basis of the case law developed by the military tribunals in the aftermath of World War II: the superior's failure to secure reports that military actions have been carried out in accordance with international law, the failure to issue orders aimed at bringing the relevant practices into accord with the rules of war, the failure to protest against or to criticise criminal action, the failure to take disciplinary measures to prevent the commission of atrocities by the troops under the superior's command and the failure to insist before a superior authority that immediate action be taken.[341] As part of his duty to prevent subordinates from committing crimes, the Chamber is of the view that a superior also has the obligation to prevent his subordinates from following unlawful orders given by other superiors.

9146. para. 249: The Chamber notes that a causal link between the superior's failure to prevent the subordinates' crimes and the occurrence of these crimes is not an element of the superior's responsibility; it is a question of fact rather than of law.[342] "Command responsibility is responsibility for omission, which is culpable due to the duty imposed by international law upon a commander" and does not require his involvement in the crime.[343]

9147. para. 250: The Chamber is of the opinion that the duty imposed on a superior to punish subordinate offenders includes the obligation to investigate the crime or to have the matter investigated to establish the facts in order to assist in the determination of the proper course of conduct to be adopted.[344] The superior has the obligation to take active steps to ensure that the offender will be punished.[345] The Chamber further takes the view that in order to discharge this obligation, the superior may exercise his own powers of sanction, or if he lacks such powers, report the offender to the competent authorities.[346]

d. Conviction under Article 6.1. and Article 6.3. of the Statute – Law on the Modes of Liability charged under Article 6.3.

9148. para. 251: The Chamber takes the view that where the Indictment charges the Accused with both Article 6(1) and Article 6(3) responsibility under the same count, and where the legal requirements pertaining to both of these heads of responsibility are met, a Trial Chamber may only enter a conviction on the basis of Article 6(1).[347]

(ii) President Kabbah's Role in the Conflict

9149. para. 705: As has been briefly mentioned in the introduction of this Judgement, persistent references and allusions were made by the Defence Team in the course of the proceedings that have preceded this Judgement, to President Kabbah and his alleged involvement in the conflict on the side of the CDF.

9150. para. 706: In this regard, and again as well mentioned in passing in the introduction of this Judgement, the Chamber recalls that the three Accused Persons all along in the course of these proceedings, raised a veiled Defence that all they did and stand charged for was as a result of their struggle to restore to power, President Kabbah's democratically elected government that had been ousted in a coup d'Etat by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) on the 25th of May 1997.

9154. para. 710: In a meeting between President Kabbah, the vice President Demby and the Army Officers, the late Accused Norman accused two army officials, Hassan Conteh and Col Marx Kanga of planning a coup; an accusation which they denied.[1537]

9155. para. 711: Peter Penfold the British High Commissioner to Sierra Leone, the American Ambassador John Hirsh and the UN Special Representative, Ambassador Berhanu Dinka, in a meeting with President Kabbah, warned him of a possible coup against his government. He told them that he had already heard about that coup and that he would be talking to the Military.[1538]

9156. para. 712: Meantime, late Norman, on April 1997, had seen President Kabbah and handed over to him the strategic keys, a bag with working parts of dangerous weapons for safe keeping.

9157. para. 713: Like the Ambassadors who preceded him, Norman told President Kabbah that there was an imminent plot to overthrow him but that the coup d'Etat may not be deadly or destructive without those parts of the weapons. On the 5th of May 1997, President Kabbah told Norman that he returned the contents of the bag to the Chief of Defence Staff and the Army Chief, late Brigadier Hassan Conteh and late Max Kanga. Norman then told President Kabbah that the coup d'Etat against his government could not be averted.

9158. para. 714: After the coup d'Etat of the 25th of May 1997, President Kabbah went into exile in Guinea. His government-in-exile was still recognised and from Conakry he encouraged late Norman and his Kamajor collaborators like the Accused, Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa and other CDF personnel who were engaged in this struggle to restore him to power.

9159. para. 715: He bought a satellite phone for Norman's use to report to him regularly on the progress of the war. He continued to provide logistics support to the Kamajors and their leaders. Samuel Hinga Norman, Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa who were involved in the delegation from Bonthe, went to Freetown to see President Kabbah amongst others to complain about lootings and killings by Kamajors. The President sent 100 bags of rice to the Kamajors in Bonthe Town.[1539]

9160. para. 716: In view of the international recognition accorded to his Government, President Kabbah made it possible for the Economic Community of West African States through ECOMOG to provide military assistance to the CDF to enable it attain the objective of restoring his ousted Government to power. Indeed ECOMOG fought alongside the CDF Kamajor forces against the combined forces of the RUF and of the AFRC as the war raged inside the country for control of areas occupied by enemy forces.

9161. para. 717: It is also on record that Lady Patricia Kabbah gave the sum of $10,000US to Hon. Meme Momoh Pujoh to be conveyed to late Norman for use as part of logistical support to the fighters particularly the amphibious Kassilla battalion in Bonthe. She said that she was very proud of them. She even promised them that she was communicating by a letter and that she would give further offers.[1540]

9162. para. 718: The President's wife, Lady Patricia Kabbah was particularly very concerned about that part of Sierra Leone she came from and she was always asking about Bonthe, about Borhoi, her birth Village.[1541]

9163. para. 719: Defence Witness, Osman Vandi, testified that a meeting which President Kabbah held in Bo, he thanked the Kamajors for dislodging the junta and restoring him as President and that he promised the Kamajors more rice which he later did.[1542]

9164. para. 720: In a second meeting held in Bo and at which prominent dignitaries were in attendance, President Kabbah told the Kamajors he would return and give them all medals. He left two sample medals at the Hall.[1543]

(iii) Towns of Tongo Field

9165. para. 721: The Chamber outlines below, the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.3.2 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) Base Zero existed as the headquarters for the CDF High Command from about 15 September 1997 to 10 March 1998. Norman, as the National Coordinator, Fofana, as the National Director of War, and Kondewa, as the High Priest, were the key and essential components of the leadership structure of the organisation. They were the executives of the CDF actually taking the decisions, while nobody else could take a decision in their absence. They were the leaders of the CDF and all the Kamajors looked up to them.

(ii) Base Zero was a central storage and distribution site for all of the CDF's logistics. Commanders came to Base Zero from every group and location in the country to take instructions from the High Command or Norman and to receive logistics. Reports were being delivered to Base Zero from the frontlines. Thousands of civilians and Kamajors travened to Base Zero for initiation and military training. Although the COF was a cohesive force under one central command, there were some fighters who acted on their own without the knowledge of central command. Commanders' authority to discipline their men on the ground was entirely their own.

(iii) Norman, Fofana, Kondewa, Mohamed Orinco Moosa, Joseph Koroma, Lamin Ngobeh, Albert J Nallo and die battalion commanders made strategic war decisions of determining when and where to go to war.

(iv) Fofana in his capacity as Director of War at Base Zero planned and executed the war strategies and received frontline reports from the commanders. In executing these functions he was largely assisted by Albert J Nallo and on occasion Fofana passed on his responsibilities to Nallo. These war strategies did not include the commission of criminal acts, such as killing of civilians or looting.

(v) Fofana selected commanders to go to battle and could, on occasion, issue direct orders to these commanders. For example, he issued the order to Joe Tamidey not to release captured vehicles and other items to any other person until they are registered with the CDF Headquarters. Fofana was responsible for the receipt and provision of ammunitions at Base Zero to the commanders upon the instruction of Norman.

(vi) Fofana was seen as having power and authority at Base Zero and was the overall boss of the commanders at Base Zero.

(vii) Kondewa in his capacity as High Priest was in charge of the initiations at Base Zero and was the head of all the CDF initiators in the country. The Kamajors believed in mystical powers of the initiators, especially Kondewa, and that the process of the initiation and immunisation would make them "bullet-proof'. The Kamajors looked up to Kondewa and admired the man with such powers. They believed that he was capable of transferring his powers to them to protect them. By virtue of these powers Kondewa had command over the Kamajors in the country. He never went to the war front himself, but whenever a Kamajor was going to war, Kondewa would give his advice and blessings, as well as the medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against bullets. No Kamajor would go to war without Kondewa's blessings.

(viii) Kondewa attended passing out parades at Base Zero, which signified that the Kamajors had passed their training and could present their skills. He, along with Norman and Mbogba, signed a training certificate, which each trainee received after the training.

(ix) On 16 November 1997 TF2-079 prepared a situation report on events occurring between 19 September and 13 November 1997 in Zone II Operational Frontline which included Lower Bambara and Dodo Chiefdoms. It requested arms and ammunitions and described attacks which had been launched in the area. It also narrated crimes which were committed by Kamajors in that area. The report was endorsed by Musa Junisa, the then Commander-in-chief of Zone II Operational Frontline and Mohamed Orinco Moosa, his deputy. TF2-079, Junisa and Moosa with 100 other Kamajors then travelled to Base Zero. At Base Zero they gave the report first to Fofana and then to Norman. Norman commended their efforts and told them that a good number of that group should return to the area with another senior commander to keep the area strong and only a few of them should remain at Base Zero to await ammunitions. Seven people, including Moosa and TF2-079 stayed at Base Zero.

(x) At a passing out parade at Base Zero between 10 and 12 December 1997 Norman gave instructions for the Tongo and Black December operations. Norman said that the attack on T ongo would determine who wins the war. He also said that there was no place to keep captured prisoners like the juntas, let alone their collaborators. He directed the Kamajors that instead of wasting their bullets, to chop off the left hand of any captured junta as a signal to any group that would want to seize power through the barrels of the gun and not the ballot paper. He also told the fighters not to spare the houses of the juntas. After hearing Norman's instructions, Fofana addressed the Kamajors saying that any commander failing to perform accordingly and "losing your own ground", should kill himself and not come to report to Base Zero. Then all the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with a mystic power, and he gave the last comment saying that the time for the surrender of rebels had long been exhausted and that they did not need any surrendered rebels. He then gave his blessings.

(xi) A subsequent meeting was held by Norman at Base Zero, which was attended by, among others, Fofana, Kondewa, Mohamed Orinco Moosa and some commanders from the Tongo area, such as, Musa Junisa, TF2-079 and Vandi Songo. Norman repeated that whoever took Tongo would win the war and therefore it should be taken "at all costs". He ordered them not to spare anyone working with the juntas or mining for them. He also said that all collaborators should forfeit their properties and be killed. Everyone in the meeting contributed to the discussion, including Fofana and Kondewa. Norman then ordered Fofana to provide logistics for the operation.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Towns of Tongo Field

9166. para. 733: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that there was a superior-subordinate relationship, either de jure or de facto, between Fofana and all of the Kamajors, who committed other criminal acts in the towns of Tongo Field prior to, during, and after the second and third attacks on Tongo, which the Chamber found were committed during the time frame charged in the Indictment, so as to conclude that he could or did exercise effective control over those Kamajors.

9167. para. 734: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to other criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in the towns of Tongo Field during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Responsibility of Kondewa – Towns of Tongo Field

9168. para. 745: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that there was a superior-subordinate relationship, either de jure or de facto, between Kondewa and all of the Kamajors, who committed other criminal acts in the towns of Tongo Field prior to, during, and after the second and third attacks on Tongo, which the Chamber found were committed during the time frame charged in the Indictment, such as to conclude that he could or did exercise effective control over those Kamajors.

9169. para. 746: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to other criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in the towns of T ongo Field during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

(iv) Koribondo

9170. para. 756: In addition to the facts listed above in paragraph 721 (i) to (viii), the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2,4.2, V.2,4.3, V.2,4,4 and V.2,4.6 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa with respect to Koribondo:

(i) At a passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998 Norman gave orders to the Kamajors to launch an "all-out offensive" in all the areas occupied by the Juntas and laid-down military instructions on how to conduct this operation.

(ii) Fofana addressed the Kamajors at this parade, confirming Norman's order to attack various junta-held territories. During this speech Fofana told the fighters to attack the villages where the juntas were located and "to destroy the soldiers from where they were [...] settled". He also said that the failure to take Koribondo was a disgrace to the Kamajors and that this time he wanted them to go and capture Koribondo.

(iii) Kondewa gave his blessings and the medicines which would make the fighters fearless if they did not spoil the law. He also said that all of his powers had been transferred to them to protect them, so that no cutlass would strike them and that they should not be afraid.

(iv) A subsequent commanders' meeting for Koribondo was held by Norman at Base Zero on the same day as the passing out parade, which had in attendance, among others, Fofana, Kondewa, Lamin Ngobeh, Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker and other commanders. Norman chose Joe Tamidey to lead the attack on Koribondo. Norman ordered that Koribondo should be taken "at all costs" because they had already spent a lot on Koribondo. Norman gave specific orders to the commanders to destroy or burn everything in Koribondo, except for a mosque, church, the Bani and the school. He also said that anyone left in town should be termed an enemy or a rebel since they had been forewarned and should be killed.

(v) At the same meeting Bobor Tucker's group was specifically ordered to reinforce the Bo-Koribondo Highway so that no one could come from Bo to help the juntas.

(vi) At the request of Joe Tamidey, Norman ordered Lumeh to provide Tamidey with ammunition, food and money. Bobor Tucker had reserve ammunitions from before that he used for the attack.

(vii) Norman met with NaIlo before the Koribondo and Bo attacks at Base Zero and gave him specific insttuctions for these two attacks, while Fofana was present. Norman told Nallo that the Kamajors had tried to capture Koribondo many times and that they had failed because the civilians had given their children to the juntas in marriage and thus they were all "spies and collaborators". Therefore, when he goes to Koribondo "anybody that was met there should be killed" and nothing should be left "not even a farm" or "a fowl". All houses were to be burnt, and he was given petrol for the job. Some specific names were mentioned. Shekou Gbao, the driver, should be killed and his compound be burnt because he was giving his vehicle to the juntas. The house of Mike Lamin's father was also to be burnt, because Mike Lamin was a RUF. Mr Biyo, a driver, should have his compound burnt as well. Although Joe Tamidey was appointed by Norman to lead the attack on Koribondo, he and the other commanders involved in that attack were all under Nallo's overall command.

(viii) Fofana as Director of War and one of the leaders at Base Zero was the superior of Nallo by virtue of Nallo's positions in the hierarchical structure of the organisation that existed at Base Zero. Nallo was the Deputy National Director of Operations and the Regional Director of Operations for the Southern Region, which included Districts of Bo, Moyamba, Pujehun and Bonthe. In his capacity as Deputy National Director of Operations, Nallo was responsible for transmitting general and specific insttuctions from Norman to the warfront commanders, for collecting reports he received from the frontline upon his visits and transmitting them to Fofana before presenting them to Norman, and bringing arms and ammunitions to the fighters.

(ix) As Regional Director of Operations Nallo was responsible for implementing commands he received from Base Zero with his commanders. In implementing those commands he did not distinguish between the lawful and unlawful orders and did not recognise that he had discretion to implement them or not.

G3s and AK-47s to Joe Tamidey, which he had said were given by Norman for the attack on Koribondo. Thereafter plans were made, fighters were organized and the arms and ammunition were distributed to the various groups by Joe Tamidey. The following commanders were to lead the battle from three flanks: Bobor Tucker from the Bo-Koribondo Highway; Lahai George from the Sumbuya-Koribondo Highway; and Joe Tamidey from Blama. Joe Tamidey then informed Nallo for further report to Norman that the attack was planned for the 13th of February 1998.

(xi) The attack started from Jombohun and was commanded by Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker and Lamin Ngobeh. Although the commanders were operating with different groups, they were all under Nallo's command. Around 700 Kamajors that attacked Koribondo were predominantly, but not exclusively, from the Jaiama-Bongor Chiefdom. Others came from the Districts of Pujehun, Bonthe and Bo.

(xii) Four days after the capture of Bo, Joe Tamidey met with Fofana, Kondewa and Norman in Koribondo. He was taken to Bo where he was questioned by Fofana as to his reasons for not killing Shekou Gbao.

(xiii) At the end of March 1998, Norman addressed approximately 200 civilians and 400 Kamajors at the Court Barri in Koribondo. Norman scolded the Kamajors for not having done the work he had told them to do, in particular to destroy all the houses, except for three. On this visit Fofana and Kondewa accompanied Norman but they did not attend this meeting.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

9171. para. 772: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable dloubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

9172. para. 773: We find that there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Fofana and Nallo and that Fofana had authority and control over Nallo's actions. By virtue of his de jure status as Director of War Fofana exercised this control over Nallo, who in the hierarchical structure of the CDF organisation was his subordinate as Deputy National Director of Operations and Director of Operations for the Southern Region. Fofana also had de facto control over Nallo. Fofana had the legal and material ability to issue orders to Nallo, both by reason of his leadership role at Base Zero, being part of the CDF High Command, and the authority he exercised in his position as Director of War.

9173. para. 774: Nallo regularlly brought frontline reports to Base Zero. These reports were brought to Fofana before being given to Norman. Further, Fofana and Nallo together planned and executed the war strategies. Fofana's authority at Base Zero was such that people would not approach him unless summoned by him. Finally, he acted as the overall boss of the commanders at Base Zero. The Chamber finds that Fofana had both the legal and material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by Nallo and other subordinates or to punish them for these acts.

9174. para. 775: Consonant with our earlier finding, Nallo in addition to being in charge of the commanders in the Southern Region in his capacity as Regional Director of Operations was also specifically assigned the responsibility for the Koribondo operation. Although Joe Tamidey was chosen by Norman to lead the attack on Koribondo, Nallo was the overall commander for this operation. We find that Nallo exercised command over Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker and Lahai George as well as the Kamajors under their immediate command.

9175. para. 776: The Chamber finds that the evidence of the local planning in Kpetewoma for the attack on Koribondo demonstrates not only the direct participation of Nallo in the preparation of this attack but also that his participation then ensured that the orders for the attack which the commanders received at Base Zero were implemented by the Kamajors on the ground. Prior to the attack Nallo acted as an intermediary between Base Zero (High Command) and Kpetewoma through bringing arms and ammunitions from Base Zero to Kpetewoma and bringing reports back to Base Zero from Kpetewoma and from Joe Tamidey. Despite the fact that there were 700 Kamajors involved in the attack and that not all of them came from Jaiama-Bongor Chiefdom, they were all placed under Nallo's command. Nallo knew how the attack would proceed and who would be involved in that attack.

ii. Knowledge – Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

9176. para. 777: Fofana knew that the attack on Koribondo would involve the commission of criminal acts by Nallo, Joe Tamidey, Bobor Tucker, Lamin Ngobeh and other commanders. He was present at the meetings at which the unlawful orders, namely, to take Koribondo "at all costs", kill everyone who was left in town for being "collaborators" and destroy or burn everything in Koribondo, except for a mosque, church, the Barri and the school, had been given to these Kamajor commanders by Norman. The Chamber further finds that the fact that Fofana met with Joe Tamidey together with Norman and Kondewa after the attack and questioned him as to his reasons for not killing Shekou Gbao, further shows that Fofana knew about the orders given by Norman to kill certain identified "collaborators" in Koribondo.

9178. para. 779: With respect to Count 6, the Chamber finds that it is not the only reasonable inference that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that his subordinates would commit criminal acts in Koribondo with the primary purpose of spreading terror, as the commission of such acts was not explicitly included in Norman's order.

9179. para. 780: Similarly, while some of the criminal acts which were committed subsequently by the Kamajors in Koribondo might have been committed with the primary purpose of spreading terror, the Chamber finds the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that such acts had been committed by his subordinates subsequently.

9180. para. 781: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts alleged in the Indictment, such as looting, were in fact committed in Koribondo. [1553] However, the Chamber finds that such acts were not included in Norman's order. Therefore, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that these other criminal acts would also be committed by the Kamajors in Koribondo.

iii. Failure to prevent / punish – Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

9181. para. 782: The Chamber finds that Fofana as a superior had a duty to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the criminal acts by his subordinates or to punish them. His duty to prevent arose from the moment he learnt that his subordinates received unlawful orders from Norman and were about to execute those orders. We find that Fofana's duty to prevent included both the obligation not to comply with the unlawful orders of Norman and the obligation to ensure that his subordinates did not obey those orders. We find, however, that he did nothing to prevent the commission of these criminal acts by his subordinates. As a result of this failure on his part the Kamajors under his effective control committed the criminal acts of killing, destruction and burning, which the Chamber found were committed by the Kamajors in Koribondo. Thus, he failed as a superior in the exercise of his duties to prevent the commission of these specific criminal acts by his subordinates. Under the sub-heading "Counts - Koribondo", the Chamber will examine only those particular criminal acts that were explicitly included in Norman's order.

b. Counts – Koribondo – Responsibility of Fofana

9183. para. 784: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Koribondo during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber will not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

i. Count 2: Murder – Counts – Koribondo – Responsibility of Fofana

9184. para. 785: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the unlawful killing of an unknown number of civilians or captured enemy combatants, committed by his subordinates on or about January and February 1998, in locations in Bo District, including Koribondo.[1554]

9185. para. 786: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 2, Murder:

(i) On 15 February 1998, the mutilation and killing at Koribondo junction of five Limba who had been accused of being collaborators.

(ii) On 15 February 1998, the mutilation and killing at Blama Road of two Limba civlians.

(iii) On 16 February 1998, the killing of eight people along the Blama Road: five men belonging to the junta and three soldier's wives.

(iv) On 16 February 1998, the killing and mutilation of Chief Kafala took place in the street opposite the hospital. Chief Kafala had been accused of collaboration; this killing took place in the presence of many people.

(v) After the capture of Koribondo, Lahai Bassie was arrested, beaten and accused of being a collaborator because his son was a soldier. He died of his wounds one week later.

9186. para. 787: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i) through (v) and concludes that all of the perpetrators were Kamajors under the effective control of Fofana. We find that individuals were intentionally killed; in the majority of cases they were specifically targeted because of the perpetrator's belief that they were "collaborators" or rebels. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 786(i)-(v) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to above in paragraph 786, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that they were killed and, furthermore, that the perpetrator knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9187. para. 788: In light of the findings set out above, the Chamber is satisfied that the general requirements of war crimes have been established with respect to each incident described in paragraph 786.

9188. para. 789: With respect to those incidents described in paragraph 786 (i)-(v), listed above, the Chamber is satisfied not only that the general requirements of war crimes have been established but also that the specific elements of murder have been established with respect to each incident.

ii. Count 4: Cruel Treatment – Counts – Koribondo – Responsibility of Fofana

9189. para. 790: The ProsecutIon alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the intentional infliction of serious mental harm and serious mental suffering on an unknown number of civilians by his subordinates in Koribondo and surrounding areas. These crimes are alleged to have occurred between November 1997 and December 1999, through the following acts:

- screening for collaborators;
- unlawfully killing suspected collaborators, often in plain view of friends and relatives;
- illegal arrest and unlawful imprisonment of collaborators;
- the destruction of homes and other buildings;

- looting and threats to unlawfully kill, destroy or loot.[1555]

9190. para. 791: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 4, Cruel Treatment:

(i) On 13 February 1998, TF2-032's nine-room house in Koribondo was set on fire by Kamajors. TF2-032 testified that he is still suffering from the loss: his children are scattered and, despite his advanced age, he currently sleeps in a kitchen.

(ii) Between 13 and 15 February 1998, after the capture of Koribondo, Kamajors went on a rampage and burned 25 houses. People felt helpless, discouraged, and feared for their lives.

9191. para. 792: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(ii) and concludes that all of the perpetrators of these acts were Kamajors under the effective control of Fofana. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 791(i)-(ii) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to in paragraph 791, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9192. para. 793: In light of the findings set out above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of cruel treatment have been established with respect to the burning of TF2-032's house described in paragraph 791(i) and the burning of many houses, described in paragraph 791(ii).

iii. Count 7: Collective Punishments – Counts – Koribondo – Responsibility of Fofana

9193. para. 794: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for committing the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 5, including threats to kill, destroy and loot, to punish the civilian population for their support to, or failure to actively resist, the combined RUF/ AFRC forces.[1556]

9195. para. 796: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced proves beyond reasonable doubt that the acts described in paragraph 786 [Count 2] and in paragraph 791 [Count 4] were perpetrated with the specific intent to punish the civilian population in Koribondo and the surrounding areas.

9196. para. 797: The Chamber is therefore satisfied, in relation to those acts described in paragraph 786 [Count 2] and in paragraph 791 [Count 4]' that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of collective punishments have been proved beyond reasonable doubt with respect to each incident.

c. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Koribondo

9197. para. 798: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the crimes committed in Koribondo as found under Counts 2, 4 and 7 above.

d. Responsibility of Kondewa – Koribondo

9198. para. 805: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Kondewa – Koribondo

9199. para. 806: We find that there is no evidence upon which to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had a superior-subordinate relationship with any of the Kamajors involved in the commission of criminal acts in Koribondo. Although he possessed command over all the Kamajors from every part of the country, this was, however, limited to the Kamajors' belief in mystical powers which Kondewa allegedly possessed. This evidence is inconclusive, however, to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had an effective control over the Kamajors, in a sense that he had the material ability to prevent or punish them for their criminal acts. The Chamber noted that Kondewa's de jure status as High Priest of the CDF gave him the authority over all the initiators in the country as well as put him in charge of the initiations. This authority did not give him the power to decide who should be deployed to go to the war front. He also never went to the war front himself. The evidence adduced, therefore, has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had any superior-subordinate relationship with the Kamajors who operated in Koribondo during the attack.

9200. para. 807: Since an essential element of superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Koribondo during the time. frame charged in the Indictment.

e. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Koribondo

9201. para. 808: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Koribondo during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

(v) Bo District

9202. para. 809: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii), (viii) and (ix) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections Y.2.2, V.2.5.2 and V.2.5.3, V.2.5.6 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) After a passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998 a subsequent commanders' meeting was held on the same day at the back of the field at Base Zero. At this meeting Norman ordered the Kamajor commanders James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017 to attack Kebi and Bo Towns. Norman gave specific orders to these commanders to kill enemy combatants and "collaborators", to burn down their houses and loot big shops, especially pharmacies. Fofana and Kondewa were both present at this meeting.

(ii) After the commanders' meeting Fofana provided arms, ammunitions and a vehicle to James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017.

(iii) In Dar-es-Salam TF2-017 presented a verbal situation report on the Kebi attack and handed over a captured soldier and two solar panels to Norman, in the presence of Fofana and Kondewa. Norman handed over the captured soldier to Kondewa who took him to Base Zero.

(iv) The order to attack Bo was reiterated by Norman to TF2-017 in Bumpeh, in the presence of the Director of War Fofana and the High Priest Kondewa. Kondewa renewed the initiation of certain Kamajors to prepare them for the attack.

(v) Norman met with Nallo before the Koribondo and Bo attacks at Base Zero and gave him specific instructions for these two attacks, while Fofana was present. Norman gave specific orders to Nallo to kill certain identified civilians in Bo who he labelled as "collaborators", loot and burn their houses, loot the Southern Pharmacy and bring the medicines to Norman. Specifically the name of MB Sesay was mentioned. Norman also ordered Nallo to kill the police officers.

(vi) The attack on Bo proceeded from four flanks. James Kaillie was the Battalion Commander and the commander of the group coming from the Tikonko road (Mattru). Joseph Lappia was his deputy. TF2-017 was part of this group with his 38 Kapras. Nallo, in his capacity as the Regional Director of Operations, was in charge of the commanders below him but could not exercise full or strict control over all of them because of their large numbers. In Bo operation specifically, he was regarded by TF2-017 as his "operational" or "division" commander.

(vii) In addition to the James Kaillie's group, there were at least three other groups of Kamajors who attacked Bo from Gerihun, Dambara and Moyamba-Bo Highway. At least 270 Kamajors participated in this attack. The tactical planning for the Bo' attack was done in Bumpeh, which was considered by Norman as a focal point for this attack. Nallo knew about the local planning in Bumpeh.

(viii) In April 1998, Norman, Fofana and Kondewa with other Kamajor leaders and initiators visited the New Police barracks in Bo Town. Norman complained that the Kamajor chiefs, in particular Fofana, had lied to him about the burnt down police barracks and policemen killed in Bo Town. Norman said that he felt deceived after having seen the barracks intact and the police at the parade.

(ix) Sometime after the attack on Bo in February 1998, a CDF office was set up in Bo. It was initially run by Alhaji Daramy Rogers, the Regional Coordinator for the Southern Region. Around June 1998, the position of Regional Coordinator was replaced by that of the District Administrator. Kosseh Hindowa occupied the latter position in Bo.

(x) After the dissolution of Base Zero, Fofana retained his position of Director of War. However, he was no longer responsible for the conduct of the war and the fighting forces. His duties included distribution of logistics to the various parts of the country. In mid-1999 he became the Director of the Peace Office in Bo.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

9203. para. 816: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

9205. para. 818: Nallo, in addition to being in charge of the commanders in the Southern Region in his capacity as Regional Director of Operations, was also specifically assigned the responsibility for the Bo operation. We find that he exercised command over the group of Kamajors led by James Kaillie, which included Joseph Lappia and TF2-017 as well as the Kamajors under their immediate command. Having received the specific instructions from Norman at Base Zero, in the presence of Fofana, Nallo ensured that his subordinates implemented those instructions. Indeed, as was found by the Chamber above, it was the group of Kamajors led by James Kaillie, who committed the criminal acts in Bo as specifically ordered by Norman. Thus, we find that the command and control exercised by Nallo over this group of Kamajors was effective.

9206. para. 819: However, there is no evidence from which the Chamber can conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Nallo did exercise the same degree of control over other Kamajor commanders and fighters who operated in Bo both during the attack and subsequently. By Nallo's own admission, he could not exercise full or strict control over all of the Kamajors in Southern Region due to their large numbers. Moreover, the evidence as to the local planning in Bumpeh for the attack in Bo is inconclusive as to the participation of Nallo in it. Hence, on the basis of this evidence it cannot be established beyond reasonable doubt that other Kamajors who participated in the Bo attack were also under the overall command of Nallo, as the group of James Kaillie. Finally, there is no evidence to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that these other Kamajors were present at the commanders' meeting at Base Zero in early January 1998.

9207. para. 820: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had a superior-subordinate relationship with all the Kamajors who operated in Bo District and who committed criminal acts during the attack on Bo as well as subsequently as found by the Chamber above, except those Kamajors who are specifically mentioned above. Since the first element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the two remaining elements with respect to the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District by other Kamajors during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

ii. Knowledge – Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

9208. para. 821: Fofana knew that the attack on Bo Town would involve the commission of criminal acts by Nallo, James Kaillie, Joseph Lappia and TF2-017. He was present at the meetings at which the unlawful orders, namely to kill "collaborators", burn their houses and loot, had been given to these Kamajor commanders by Norman. In Dar-es-Salam Norman in the presence of Fofana, received a situation report about the Kebi attack from TF2-0 17. The Chamber finds that the evidence of Fofana's presence at the third meeting held by Norman in Bo Town in April 1998, where Norman complained that Fofana lied to him about the killing of policemen and burning of their barracks in Bo Town because he could see them intact, further shows that Fofana knew about the orders given by Norman to kill policemen in Bo.

9210. para. 823: With respect to Count 6, the Chamber finds that it is not the only reasonable inference that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that his subordinates would commit criminal acts in Bo with the primary purpose of spreading terror, as the commission of such acts was not explicitly included in Norman's order.

9211. para. 824: Similarly, while some of the criminal acts which were committed subsequently by the Kamajors in Bo might have been committed with the primary purpose of spreading terror, the Chamber finds the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that such acts had been committed by his subordinates subsequently.

9212. para. 825: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts alleged in the Indictment, such as infliction of mental harm or suffering, were in fact committed in Bo. However, the Chamber finds that such acts were not included in Norman's order. Therefore, the Chamber finds that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that these other criminal acts would also be committed by the Kamajors in Bo.

iii. Failure to prevent / punish – Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

9213. para. 826: The Chamber finds that Fofana as a superior had a duty to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the criminal acts by his subordinates or to punish them. His duty to prevent arose from the moment he learnt that his subordinates received unlawful orders from Norman and were about to execute those orders. We find that Fofana's duty to prevent included both the obligation not to comply with the unlawful orders of Norman and the obligation to ensure that his subordinates did not obey those orders. We find, however, that he did nothing to prevent the commission of these criminal acts. As a result of this failure on his part the Kamajors under his effective control committed the criminal acts of killing, burning and looting, as will be found by the Chamber below. Thus, he failed as a superior in the exercise of his duties to prevent the commission of the criminal acts by his subordinates. Under the sub-heading "Counts - Bo District", the Chamber will examine only those particular criminal acts that were explicitly included in Norman's order.

9214. para. 827: Since the Chamber finds that Fofana failed his duty as a superior to prevent the commission of criminal acts by his subordinates, it is not necessary to examine whether Fofana also failed to punish those Kamajors for those same acts.

b. Counts – Bo District – Responsibility of Fofana

9215. para. 828: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Bo District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber will not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

i. Count 2: Murder – Counts – Bo District – Responsibility of Fofana

9216. para. 829: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the unlawful killing of an unknown number of civilians or captured enemy combatants committed by his subordinates on or about January and February 1998, in locations in Bo District, including the District Headquarters town of Bo, Kebi Town, Kpeyama, Fengehun and Mongere.[1558]

9217. para. 830: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 2, Murder:

(i) The killing of an unidentified woman who was alleged to have cooked for the rebels, by Kamajors, on the order of TF2-017.

(ii) The killing of John Musa, an alleged collaborator, by Kamajors under the control of Joseph Lappia.

9218. para. 831: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding both incidents set out above in points (i)-(ii) and concludes that all of the perpetrators were Kamajors under the effective control of Fofana. We find that individuals were intentionally killed; in both cases they were specifically targeted because of the perpetrator's belief that they were "collaborators". Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 830(i)-(i0 was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to above in paragraph 830, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that they were killed and, furthermore, that the perpetrator knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9220. para. 833: With respect to those incidents described in paragraph 830 (i)-OO the Chamber is satisfied not only that the general requirements of war crimes have been established but also that the specific elements of murder have been proved with respect to each incident.

ii. Count 4: Cruel Treatment – Counts – Bo District – Responsibility of Fofana

9221. para. 834: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the intentional infliction of serious mental harm and serious mental suffering on an unknown number of civilians by his subordinates in Bo and surrounding areas. These crimes are alleged to have occurred between November 1997 and December 1999, through the following acts:

- screening for collaborators;
- unlawfully killing suspected collaborators, often in plain view of friends and relatives;
- illegal arrest and unlawful imprisonment of collaborators;
- the destruction of homes and other buildings;
- looting and threats to unlawfully kill, destroy or loot.[1559]

9222. para. 835: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 4, Cruel Treatment:

(i) On 15 February 1998 OC Bundu was detained and beaten by Kamajors under the leadership ofNallo, Agbamu Murray and John Ngombeh.

(ii) On 16 February 1998, in Kandeyama, TF2-001 and other police were separated from other civilians on the order of Kamajor leaders including Agbamu Murray. The police were arrested.

9223. para. 836: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(ii) and concludes that all of the perpetrators of these acts listed above were under the effective control of Fofana. The Chamber finds that OC Bundu and TF2-001 were targeted by the Kamajors because of their status as police officers, a group that was considered by the Kamajors to have collaborated with the juntas. [1560] Furthermore, the incidents described immediately above occurred on the day the Kamajors entered Bo or the following day. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 835(i) - (ii) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. The Chamber finds that, in light of the circumstances under which these events occurred, it is a reasonable inference that the screening for collaborators experienced by OC Bundu and TF2-001 caused serious mental suffering. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to in paragraph 835, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9224. para. 837: In light of the findings set out above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of cruel treatment have been met with respect to each incident described paragraph 835.

iii. Count 5: Pillage – Counts – Bo District – Responsibility of Fofana

9225. para. 838: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the unlawful taking of civilian-owned property between about 1 November 1997 and 1 April 1998.[1561] These crimes are alleged to have occurred at various locations in Bo District, including the towns of Bo and the surrounding areas.[1562]

9226. para. 839: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 5, Pillage:

(i) On 15 February 1998, OC Bundu was forced to go to his house by Kamajors under the leadership of Nallo, Agbamu Murray and John Ngombeh. The Kamajors took ammunition which they found in OC Bundu's house.

(ii) On 15 February 1998, Kamajors under the control of TF2-017 looted MB Sesay's hotel on Sewa Road.

(iii) On 15 February 1998, Kamajors under command of TF2-017 looted medicine from two pharmacies in Bo.

(iv) On 16 February 1998, on the order of Kamajor leaders including Agbamu Murray, TF2-001 was searched; the Kamajors took his watch and 15,000 leones.

9227. para. 840: The Chamber has examined the facts surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(iv) and concludes that all of the perpetrators of these acts were Kamajors under the effective control of Fofana. The Chamber reiterates that the Kamajors entered Bo on 15 February 1998. Acts (i) through (iv), described immediately above, all occurred on the day the Kamajors entered Bo or on the day immediately following the capture of Bo. The Chamber recalls its findings that OC Bundu and TF2-001 were targeted by the Kamajors because of their status as police officers, a group the Kamajors considered to have collaborated with the juntas; similarly, the Chamber finds that MB Sesay and TF2-058 were targeted because they were considered collaborators. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 835(i)-(iv) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. The Chamber is also satisfied that none of the victims were persons taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9228. para. 841: In light of the findings set out above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of pillage as a war crime have been established with respect to the looting of ammunition from OC Bundu's house; the looting of various objects at MB Sesay's hotel; the looting of medicine from two pharmacies; and the looting of TF2-001's watch and money.

iv. Count 7: Collective Punishments – Counts – Bo District – Responsibility of Fofana

9229. para. 842: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for committing the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 5, including threats to kill, destroy and loot, to punish the civilian population for their support to, or failure to actively resist, the combined RUF/AFRC forces.[1563]

9230. para. 843: The Chamber reiterates that only those acts for which the Accused have been found to bear criminal responsibility under another count of the Indictment may form the basis of criminal responsibility for acts of terrorism. In this regard, the Chamber recalls that it has found that Fofana bears criminal responsibility as a superior under Counts 2, 4 and 5 in Bo.

9231. para. 844: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced proves beyond reasonable doubt that the acts described in paragraph 830 [Count 2], paragraph 835[Count 4] and in paragraph 839[Count 5] were perpetrated with the specific intent to punish the civilian population in Bo and the surrounding areas.

9232. para. 845: The Chamber is therefore satisfied, in relation to those acts described paragraph 830 [Count 2], paragraph 835[Count 4] and in paragraph 839 [Count 5], that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of collective punishments have been proved beyond reasonable doubt with respect to each incident.

c. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Bo District

9233. para. 846: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the crimes committed in Bo District as found under Counts 2, 4, 5 and 7 above.

d. Responsibility of Kondewa – Bo District

9234. para. 852: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bo District

9235. para. 853: We find that Kondewa had no superior-subordinate relationship with any of the Kamajors involved in the commission of criminal acts in Bo District. Although he possessed command over all the Kamajors from every part of the country, this was, however, limited to the Kamajors' belief in mystical powers which Kondewa allegedly possessed. This evidence is inconclusive, however, to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had an effective control over the Kamajors, in a sense that he had the material ability to prevent or punish them for their criminal acts. The Chamber noted that Kondewa's de jure status as High Priest of the CDF gave him the authority over all the initiators in the country as well as put him in charge of the initiations. This authority did not give him the power to decide who should be deployed to go to the war front. He also never went to the war front himself. The evidence adduced, therefore, has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had any superior-subordinate relationship with the Kamajors who operated in Bo District.

9236. para. 854: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

e. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bo District

9237. para. 855: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bo District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

(vi) Bonthe District

9238. para. 856: In addition to the facts, listed in in paragraphs 72 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2.6.2 and V.2.6.3 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) On 16 August 1997, a delegation from Bonthe Town was sent to Kondewa at the Kamajor base at Tihun Sogbini to discuss the continuing harassment of civilians by soldiers and the security of the island. Kondewa was considered the supreme head of Kamajors.

(ii) At Momaya Kamajors were shooting all around the delegation and threatening them. Kamajor Commander Sheku Kaillie ("Bombowai") pleaded on the delegation's behalf and led them, under his protection, to Kondewa, who by then was no longer in Tihun but in Talia. From Mattru Jong the delegation was led to Talia by Ngobeh, the district grand Kamajor commander.

(iii) The delegation arrived at Kondewa's house in Talia on 24 August 1997. A boy was playing guitar and percussion and singing about the greatness of Kondewa and the Kamajor society. Kamajors armed with rifles and guns were guarding the house. The delegation explained to Kondewa the dreadful effects of the war. In response Kondewa stated: "war means to know that you will die; to know that you have no control over your life; to know that you have no dignity; to know that your property is not yours". Kondewa then called a meeting at the Court Barri that was attended by all of the elders of the region, the paramount chiefs and Kamajor commanders. Kondewa said at the meeting that he was not going to give any of the areas under his control to a military government but to the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah. Kondewa agreed on the cessation of hostilities between the Kamajors and the Soldiers, the stopping of the harassment of civilians and the free movement of boats, and wrote a letter to this effect to all Kamajor commanders around Bonthe. The agreement did not work.

(iv) The delegation accompanied by Ngobeh was stopped in Tihun by a Kamajor who presented a letter, which he demanded to be read in the presence of Kondewa. The letter was written by a commander from Gambia and was accusing the delegation of bringing the soldiers to Bonthe. When the letter was read to Kondewa in Talia, he declared that if the information was true, all of the delegation would be killed; if it was not true, those responsible for the lie would experience a terrible death. In Gambia Kondewa ordered a court sitting and placed Pa Lewis, Ngobeh and Bombowai in charge of the investigation. Those responsible for the letter pleaded guilty. They were supposed to be killed, but the delegation pleaded with Kondewa to spare their lives and he agreed.

(v) The Kamajors operating in Bonthe were of the Shebro tribe and were referred to as the Kassilla Battalion. Baigeh was the Battalion Commander of the Kassilla Battalion.

(vi) On 15 February 1998 a group of approximately 300 to 500 Kamajors entered Bonthe. The Kamajors came from three chiefdoms, including Sittia and Nongoba Bullom.

(vii) From 15 February 1998, Bonthe Town was under the control of the Kamajors, headed by the District Battalion Commander, Morie Jusu Kamara. Commander Julius Squire was the second in command to Morie Jusu Kamara and was from Bendu Cha.

(viii) On 16 February 1998 Kamajors announced a meeting at the St. Patrick Parish's Compound. Morie Jusu Kamara, was present at the meeting together with Commander Julius Squire, the secretary and spokesman for the meeting.

(ix) Although Morie Jusu was a disciplinarian "in his own right", he did not punish his Kamajors. He promised that that no one else would be killed in Bonthe but demanded money from the civilians.

(x) On 15 February, Kamajors looked for Lahai Ndokoi Koroma, a Chiefdom Speaker, in the Catholic mission who was accused of being a junta collaborator. They threatened to kill everyone if they did not produce this person. Two delegations were sent to Bonthe from Base Zero under Kondewa's instructions. On 1 March 1998, a third group of Kamajors came to Bonthe under the leadership of Kondewa. At a public meeting Kondewa said that he had not allowed his men to enter Bonthe, but that they had not listened to his advice and had done what they had done. Kondewa apologized on their behalf. Kondewa also told those assembled that they should forget about ECOMOG, as they were not responsible for Bonthe. Kondewa said that it was the Kamajors who were responsible for security in the area. He told Father Garrick that he was aware of the atrocities committed by the Kamajors and for this reason he wanted to get Lahai Ndokoi Koroma out of the country. After getting paid 600,000 leones Kondewa took Lahai Ndokoi Koroma to Talia and later to Bo. Only Kondewa had authority to release Lahai Koroma and claimed to kill without restraint and to send people to Mecca.

(xi) Around 23 February 1998, Norman, accompanied by two ECOMOG officials, came to Bonthe. At a public meeting at the Bonthe town hall Norman said that any complaint against the Kamajors was useless as they had fought and saved the nation and that working with the Kamajors was like "working with the cutlass".

(xii) In March 1998 a letter from Soloman Berewa addressed to the Kamajors in Bonthe requesting them to stop looting and killing, was given to Commander Morie Jusu Kamara, who passed it on to his second in command, Julius Squire. Julius Squire said that he did not recognise the authority of the Attorney-General; he refused to accept the instructions in the letter, unless they came from Norman or Kondewa. Morie Jusu Kamara told Father Garrick that he was not able to control the Kamajors.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Bonthe District

9239. para. 860: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had a superior-subordinate relationship with any of the Kamajors who operated in Bonthe District and committed criminal acts during and after the attack on Bonthe Town or elsewhere in Bonthe District as found by the Chamber above. The Chamber reiterates its finding above that there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Fofana and Nallo, who at the relevant time was the Director of Operations for the Southern Region, which included Bonthe District, and that Fofana exercised effective control over Nallo, in a sense of having the material ability to prevent N aHo' s criminal acts or punish him for these acts.[1564]

9240. para. 861: The Chamber finds, however, that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt whether there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Nallo and the Kamajors who operated in Bonthe District and committed criminal acts during the time frame charged in the Indictment. The evidence has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Nallo exercised effective control over all the Kamajors in Bonthe District. By Nallo's own admission, he could not exercise full or strict control over all of the Kamajors in Southern Region due to their large numbers.

9241. para. 862: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Bonthe District

9242. para. 863: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

9243. para. 867: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Bonthe District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

9244. para. 868: We find that on the evidence adduced there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Kondewa and Morie Jusu Kamara, District Battalion commander of Bonthe District, Julius Squire, Kamara' s second in command and Kamajor Baigeh, Battalion commander of the Kassilla battalion. Kondewa had authority and control over the actions of these Kamajor commanders and the Kamajors under their immediate command. By virtue of his de jure status as High Priest Kondewa and his de facto status as a superior to these Kamajors in that District, Kondewa exercised effective control over them. Kondewa had the legal and material ability to issue orders to Kamara, both by reason of his leadership role at Base Zero, being part of the CDF High Command, and the authority he enjoyed in his position as High Priest in Sierra Leone and particularly so in Bonthe District.

9245. para. 869: Kondewa had exercised effective control over Kamajors in Bonthe District since before the establishment of Base Zero, as early as August 1997. As "the supreme head of Kamajors" in the area, the delegation from Bonthe chose to plead with him in order to cease hostilities between the Kamajors and the soldiers, stop the Kamajors from harassing civilians and from attacking Bonthe Town. At that time Kondewa had authority and power to issue oral and written directives to the Kamajors in that area, order investigations for misconduct and hold court hearings. He could threaten the imposition of sanctions of "a terrible death" on the Kamajors, if they lied to him. The Kamajor commanders, who the delegation met on its way to Talia, all recognised Kondewa's authority. Kondewa himself acknowledged his control over this area as he publicly refused "to give any areas under his control to a military government but to the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah." The authority and power of Kondewa is further demonstrated by the fact that it was only him who could "spare" lives of his own misbehaved Kamajors, to release Lahai Ndokoi, "to kill without restraint and to send people to Mecca".

9246. para. 870: The Chamber finds that Kondewa had both the legal and material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by his subordinate Morie Jusu Kamara and other subordinates and to punish them for those criminal acts.

9249. para. 873: The Chamber finds, however, that there is no evidence from which the Chamber can conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa did exercise the same degree of control over other Kamajor commanders and fighters who operated in the surrounding areas of Bonthe Town prior to the attack on Bonthe or subsequently.

ii. Knowledge – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

9250. para. 874: Kondewa knew that the attack on Bonthe Town involved the commission of criminal acts by the Kamajors under the command of Morie Jusu Kamara. On the basis of the evidence adduced it is not entirely clear when precisely Kondewa obtained the knowledge that his subordinates in fact were about to commit, were committing or had committed criminal acts.

9251. para. 875: The Chamber is satisfied, however, that Kondewa knew at least as of 15 February 1998, that the Kamajors were looking for Lahai Ndokoi Koroma in Bonthe Town, who was perceived to be a ‘collaborator’. Kondewa was informed about it at Base Zero, in response to which he sent two delegations to Bonthe Town under his instructions. Therefore, the Chamber concludes that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had reasons to know that the Kamajors under his effective control were about to commit or were committing criminal acts in Bonthe District, particularly that they were targeting suspected “collaborators”.

9252. para. 876: Furthermore, the Chamber observes that on 1 March 1998, Kondewa came to Bonthe Town himself leading the third delegation. At the meeting held by Kondewa in Bonthe

Town on the same day he publicly acknowledged that he had not allowed his men to enter Bonthe, but that they had not listened to his advice and had done what they had done. He also apologized on their behalf. When speaking to Father Garrick on the same day he also admitted that he was aware of the atrocities committed by the Kamajors during the attack and for this reason he wanted to get Lahai Ndokoi Koroma out of the country.

9253. para. 877: The Chamber, therefore, concludes that it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that at this stage Kondewa knew that the Kamajors under his effective control had in fact committed criminal acts in Bonthe District.

9254. para. 878: With respect to Count 7, the Chamber finds that it can reasonably be inferred from all the circumstances that Kondewa knew or had reasons to know that his subordinates were about to commit collective punishments or were committing them or had committed such acts in Bonthe Town.

9255. para. 879: With respect to Count 6, the Chamber finds, however, that while some of the criminal acts which were committed by the Kamajors in Bonthe Town might have been committed with the primary purpose of spreading terror among the civilian population, the Chamber finds on the totality of the evidence adduced that it has not been established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa knew or had reasons to know that such acts had been committed by his subordinates for the primary purpose of spreading terror.

iii. Failure to prevent / punish – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

9256. para. 880: The Chamber finds that Kondewa as a superior had a duty to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the criminal acts by his subordinates or to punish them. His duty to prevent arose from the moment he learnt that his subordinates were about to commit criminal acts. He should have exercised his duty to punish when he learnt that his subordinates did in fact commit criminal acts in Bonthe Town during and subsequently to the attack. He did not properly exercise his duty to prevent the commission of the criminal acts as a superior simply by telling his subordinate Kamajors that they were not allowed to enter Bonthe. His duty was to ensure that an effective mechanism was in place so that his subordinates would in fact comply with his orders. We find that Kondewa did nothing to prevent the commission of these criminal acts nor did he punish his subordinates for other criminal acts once he had been informed that they indeed had committed such other criminal acts. Thus, we find that he failed as a superior in the exercise of his duties to prevent or to punish the commission of the criminal acts by his subordinates.

d. Counts – Bonthe District – Responsibility of Kondewa

9257. para. 881: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber will not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

i. Count 2: Murder – Counts – Bonthe District – Responsibility of Kondewa

9258. para. 882: The Prosecution alleges that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the unlawful killing of an unknown number of civilians between October 1997 and December 1999 in locations in Bonthe District including Talia (Base Zero), Mobayeh, Makose and Bonthe Town.[1565]

9259. para. 883: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 2, Murder:

(i) On 15 February 1998, Kpana Manso was killed by Beigeh, a Kamajor Commander subordinate to Morie Jusu Kamara.

(ii) On 16 February 1998, Bendeh Battiama was accused of being a collaborator and was killed by a Kamajor named Rambo Conteh.

(iii) On 17 February 1998, Abu Conteh was killed at St. Joseph's Secondary School by one of Mori Jusu's Kamajors.

(iv) In early March 1998, a woman named Jitta was killed by a Kamajor named Beigeh between Sebongie and Bonthe.

(v) TF2-087's uncle was killed in Gambia Village by Kondewa's deputy Sheku Kallie, after having reported to Kondewa the misconduct of some of his boys.

(vi) During the same period of time, three pregnant women were killed in Gambia Village by Kondewa's boys before Norman's arrival in Gambia.

9260. para. 884: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i) through (vi) and concludes that all of the perpetrators were Kamajors under the effective control of Kondewa. We find that individuals were intentionally killed; in the majority of these cases they were specifically targeted because of the perpetrator's belief that they were "collaborators" or rebels. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 883 was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of these incidents, referred to above in paragraph 883, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that they were killed and also that the perpetrator knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9261. para. 885: In light of the above the Chamber is satisfied that the general requirements of war crimes have been established with respect to each incident described in paragraph 883.

9262. para. 886: With respect to those incidents described in paragraph 883 (i)-(iv), the Chamber is satisfied that Kamajors under the effective control of Kondewa intentionally caused the deaths of Kpana Manso, Bendeh Battiama, Abu Conteh and a woman named Jitta.

9263. para. 887: The Chamber is therefore satisfied not only that the general requirements of war crimes have been established but also that the specific elements of murder have been established with respect to the killing of Kpana Manso, Bendeh Battiama, Abu Conteh and Jitta.

9264. para. 888: The Chamber finds, however, that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the killings described in paragraph 883 (v) and (vi) occurred during the time period set out in the Indictment. The Chamber finds that Kondewa is not guilty with respect to these killings.

ii. Count 2: Cruel Treatment – Counts – Bonthe District – Responsibility of Kondewa

9265. para. 889: The Prosecution alleges that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the intentional infliction of serious mental harm and serious mental suffering on an unknown number of civilians by his subordinates in Bonthe District. These crimes are alleged to have occurred between November 1997 and December 1999, , through the following acts:

- screening for collaborators;
- unlawfully killing suspected collaborators, often in plain view of friends and relatives;
- illegal arrest and unlawful imprisonment of collaborators;
- the destruction of homes and other buildings;
- looting and threats to unlawfully kill, destroy or loot.[1566]

9266. para. 890: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 4, Cruel Treatment:

(i) On 15 February 1998, Kamajors captured Lahai Ndokoi Koroma. He was stripped naked and tied; three delegations came from Talia to investigate the matter.

(ii) On 16 February 1998, at a meeting at St. Patrick's Parish Compound in Bonthe Town, Juilus Squire announced that the Kamajors were looking for three collaborators. At the same meeting TF2-116 was singled out and his life was threatened because of alleged collaboration with the juntas.

(iii) At the same meeting, a boy named Bendeh Battiama was singled out and accused of being a collaborator. He was later killed by Rambo Conteh.

(iv) In early March 1998, TF2-086 was detained by Kamajors, including Baigeh, along the road between Sebongie and Bonthe. The Kamajors threatened her life, saying, "Look how dead you are."

9267. para. 891: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(ii) concludes that all of the perpetrators of these acts were Kamajors under the effective control of Kondewa. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 889 (i)-(v) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to in paragraph 889, the Chamber is also satisfied that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9270. para. 894: By contrast, the Chamber finds that the specific elements of the crime of cruel treatment have not been established with respect to paragraph 889 (0, as it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that those people whose homes were burnt endured serious mental suffering or injury.

iii. Count 5: Pillage – Counts – Bonthe District – Responsibility of Kondewa

9271. para. 895: The Prosecution alleges that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the unlawful taking of civilian-owned property between about 1 November 1997 and 1 April 1998.[1567] These crimes are alleged to have occurred at various locations in Bo District, including the towns of Talia (Base Zero), Bonthe Town, Mobayeh and the surrounding areas.[1568]

9272. para. 896: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following acts have been committed which are relevant for Count 5, Pillage:

(i) On 15 February 1998, Lamina Gbokambama and his men looted household items and equipment from a number of locations in Bonthe Town.

(ii) On 16 February 1998, Julius Squire and his troops looted a house in Bonthe and took 17,900,000 leones from TF2-116's house.

(iii) In early March 1998, a group of Kamajors including Baigeh took 140,000 leones from TF2-086 and her business partner Jitta on the road between Sebongie and Bonthe.

9273. para. 897: The Chamber has examined the facts and circumstances surrounding each incident set out above in points (i)-(iii) and concludes that all of the perpetrators of these acts were Kamajors under the effective control of Kondewa. The Chamber reiterates that the Kamajors entered Bonthe on the 15th of February 1998. Having considered the evidence in the context of the armed conflict that was then taking place in Sierra Leone, and having regard to all of the evidence adduced, the Chamber is satisfied that each of the acts described in paragraph 896 (i)-(iii) was sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. Having considered the particular facts and circumstances of each of the incidents referred to in paragraph 896, the Chamber is also satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the victims were persons not taking an active part in the hostilities at the time that the acts described above occurred and, furthermore, that the perpetrators knew that they were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

iv. Count 7: Collective Punishments – Counts – Bonthe District – Responsibility of Kondewa

9275. para. 899: The Prosecution alleges that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(3), for committing the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 5, including threats to kill, destroy and loot, to punish the civilian population for their support to, or failure to actively resist, the combined RUF/ AFRC forces.[1569]

9276. para. 900: The Chamber reiterates that only those acts for which the Accused have been found to bear criminal responsibility under another count of the Indictment may form the basis of criminal responsibility for acts of terrorism. In this regard, the Chamber recalls that it has found that Kondewa bears criminal responsibility as a superior under Counts 2, 4 and 5 in Bonthe.

9277. para. 901: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced proves beyond reasonable doubt that the acts described in paragraph 883 [Count 2] and in paragraph 889 [Count 4] and paragraph 896 [Count 5] were perpetrated with the specific intent to punish the civilian population in Bonthe District.

9278. para. 902: The Chamber is therefore satisfied, in relation to those acts described in paragraph 883 [Count 2] and in paragraph 889 [Count 4] and paragraph 896 [Count 5], that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of collective punishments have been proved beyond reasonabled doubt with respect to each incident.

e. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Bonthe District

9279. para. 903: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the crimes committed by Kamajors in Bonthe Town and the surrounding areas as found under Counts 2, 4, 5 and 7 above.

(vii) Kenema District

9280. para. 904: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2, V.2.7.2, V.2.7.3 and 2.7.8 of the Factual Findings, which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) Mohamed Bhonie Koroma, a Battalion Commander, led the attack on SS Camp. Other Kamajors that participated in this attack included Mohamed Swaray, a Battalion Commander from Kenema, Fallah Bindi, a Commander, CO Sahr, a Section CO and Stephen Lahai Fassay. SS Camp was taken approximately one week before Kenema.

(ii) Mohamed Bhonie Koroma left SS Camp to attack Kenema on 15 February 1998. When he left, Stephen Lahai Fassay replaced him as the Kamajor boss and maintained this position at least until May 1998.

(iii) Kamajors entered Blama on Sunday, 15 February 1998. Key commanders in this attack included Alhaji Bockarie, Sau Vibbie and Foday Saidu.

(iv) Kamajors took control of Kenema Town on Sunday, 15 February 1998. Mohamed Bhonie Koroma led the first battalion of Kamajors, which entered Kenema from the direction of SS Camp. Twenty to thirty units from different sections, comprising at least one thousand Kamajors, entered Kenema on the same day.

(v) ECOMOG arrived in Kenema approximately on 18 February 1998.

(vi) While at Base Zero Musa Junisa was the Director of Operations for the Eastern Region.

(vii) In mid-February 1998, TFUl79 and TF2-201 traveled from Base Zero to Bo and Kenema on the orders of Norman to set up a CDF office. At that time the CDF commanders in Kenema were KBK Magonna, Eddie Massallay and Arthur Koroma. George Jambawai, the Regional Coordinator for the Eastern Region became the head of the new administration; TF2-079 was also part of the executive. Jambawai's administration lasted until June 1998. He was succeeded by the District Administrator, Arthur Koroma. During the administration of Arthur Koroma a base was opened at SS Camp where civilians were taken for detention.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Kenema District

9281. para. 909: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had a superior-subordinate relationship with any of the Kamajors who operated in Kenema District and committed criminal acts during and after the attacks on Kenema Town, SS Camp and Blama as found by the Chamber above. The Chamber found that Musa Junisa was appointed to a position of Director of Operations for the Eastern Region at Base Zero and as such was a de jure subordinate of Fofana, the Director of War, in the hierarchical structure of the CDF organisation. However, the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that there was any superior-subordinate relationship, either de jure or de facto, between Musa Junisa and the Kamajors who operated in Kenema District and committed criminal acts during the time frame charged in the Indictment, such as to conclude that he could or did exercise effective control over those Kamajors.

9282. para. 910: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Kenema District

9283. para. 911: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Kenema District

9284. para. 916: The Chamber reiterates its earlier finding that although Kondewa had a de jure status as High Priest in the CDF and as such possessed command over all the Kamajors in the country, this was limited to the Kamajors' belief in mystical powers which Kondewa allegedly possessed. This evidence is inconclusive to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had an effective control over the Kamajors, in a sense that he had the material ability to prevent or punish them for their criminal acts in Kenema District. The Chamber further finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had any superior-subordinate relationship with any of the Kamajors who operated in Kenema District and committed criminal acts during and after the attacks on Kenema town, SS Camp and Blama as found by the Chamber above.

9285. para. 917: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

d. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Kenema District

9286. para. 918: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Kenema District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

e. Counts – Kenema District

9287. para. 919: The Chamber recognises that criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Kenema District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber did not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

(viii) Talia / Base Zero

9288. para. 920: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.8 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

(i) By late 1996 or early 1997 the Kamajors had taken over Talia from the rebels. The first Kamajor leaders who came to Talia were Ngobeh and Joe Tamidey. Kondewa, who was a herbalist, came two weeks later with his priests and was performing initiations in Mokusi. By the time of the coup the Kamajors were also in control of the surrounding villages around Talia.

(ii) After the coup and before the arrival of Norman to Talia around 15 September 1997, Fofana and Kondewa were both in Talia. Around July-August 1997 Kondewa was in Tihun performing initiations. At that time Kondewa was considered the supreme head of Kamajors in Bonthe District.

(iii) Fofana and Kondewa stayed in Talia for the entire period of time of the existence of Base Zero.

9289. para. 921: As set out above in the Factual Findings, the Chamber found that the following criminal acts have been committed in Talia / Base Zero, which the Chamber will consider for the purposes of making its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa in this area:

(i) TF2-134 was captured by Kamajors and forcefully brought to Talia. She was tied with FM rope and beaten until she vomited blood. She was then kept in a guardroom and released later in the day.

(ii) TF2-109 was captured by Kamajors along with other women and three men in her village of Mattru Jong and was taken to Talia by Kamajor Kamoh Bonnie. She was held in Talia for three days. The Kamajors also looted her property in Mattru, including furniture, household items and clothing.

(iii) Sometime towards the end of 1997, two "Town Commanders" were brought to Talia. Kondewa took a gun from Kamoh Bonnie, Kondewa's priest, shot and killed one of the town commanders. The next morning witness saw two graves where the bodies of the two town commanders were buried.

(iv) TF2-133 was captured and taken to Talia, where she stayed for one month. During that time, TF2-133 saw Kamajors kill her mother in the palm oil plantation.

(v) TF2-188 and her mother were captured and made to carry loads to Talia. In Talia, Kondewa told his boys to capture TF2-188's mother and kill her. TF2-188 saw the Kamajors kill her mother.

(vi) During the rainy season of 1997, TF2-189 was captured by Kamajors and taken to Talia. While in Talia, TF2-189's husband was captured, his throat was cut by Kamajors and he was decapitated.

(vii) Jusu Shalley, Baggie Vaiey and Lahai Lebbie were captured together and brought to Talia. They were killed in front of a large group of Kamajors and civilians. All three men were civilians. Next morning the Kamajors summoned civilians to a parade, which had Norman and Kondewa in attendance.

(viii) Sometime after 13 February 1998, a surrendered soldier, named Sgt. Kamanda was brought to Talia from Koribondo. Sgt. Kamanda was killed.

(ix) Kondewa's bodyguards Kafi Jini, Jahman, Junisa and Bokindeh accused TF2-096's friend, who was selling cassava, to be a rebel. Jahman reported TF2-096's friend to Kondewa and she was arrested and taken to Nyandehun. She was held in a cage and was not released until 40,000 leones were paid to Kondewa.

(x) Sometime between January and March 1998, Mustafa Fallon was killed at the Poro Bush in Talia as part of a Kamajor ritual. Mustafa Fallon was a fighting Kamajor who had been enlisted by Bobor Tucker. Norman, Fofana and Kondewa and many other Kamajors were present.

(xi) Sometime between December 1997 and January 1998, Alpha Dauda Kanu was killed in the palm oil plantation near Talia as part of a Kamajor ritual. Kanu was one of about 40 Kapras from Gbonkolenken Chiefdom in Tonkolili District who had come to Talia for training. Norman, Fofana and Kondewa approved the killing.

(xii) A truck carrying cocoa and coffee arrived in T alia. It was unloaded and the contents were given to the Director of War, Fofana and the High Priest, Kondewa. The truck was detained in Talia.

9290. para. 922: The Chamber notes that the allegations advanced by the Prosecution in relation to the alleged crimes in Talia / Base Zero include the following time frames: for Count 2 – between about October 1997 and December 1999, for Count 4 - between November 1997 and December 1999, for Count 5 - between about 1 November 1997 and about 1 April 1998 and for Counts 6 and 7 - as charged in the previous counts. These allegations are particularised in paragraphs 882, 889, 895, 899 above.[1570]

9291. para. 923: The Chamber finds that based upon the evidence adduced in support of the acts listed above under paragraph 921 (i), (iv), (v) and (ix) it cannot conclude beyond reasonable doubt what the timing of the occurrence of these incidents was. The incident described in paragraph 921 (vi) may have occurred any time during "the rainy season of 1997" which could have been between the months of June through September 1997. The Chamber also recalls that Kondewa arrived at Talia by late 1996 or early 1997. Both Kondewa and Fofana were in Talia before the arrival of Norman and the establishment of Base Zero around 15 September 1997. Therefore, the Chamber concludes that the evidence has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the incidents listed under paragraph 921 (i), (iv), (v), (vi) and (ix) had taken place within the time frame charged in the Indictment.

9292. para. 924: We find that the incident listed under paragraph 921 (viii) involves the killing of "a surrendered soldier" from Koribondo. While the Chamber recognises that this act may have constituted an unlawful killing, it holds that the Prosecution has limited the allegations in Count 2 for Talia / Base Zero to the unlawful killing of "an unknown number of civilians" only and not that of "captured enemy combatants".[1571]

9293. para. 925: The Chamber further finds that the incidents listed under paragraph 921 (x) and (xi) do not constitute a war crime since both Fallon and Kanu fighters and members of the CDF. Here the Chamber particularly recalls the final position of the Prosecution in respect of these two killings made during their closing arguments as follows:

> [Tlhe best approach is simply to see these two men's deaths as examples of where the three accused stood in the hierarchy, their ability to do acts without sanction from anyone else. In fact, it demonstrates that they were in absolute control of the CDF. That is, we would say, how the deaths of those two men fit into the Prosecution case.[1572]

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Talia / Base Zero

9294. para. 926: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3) for the acts listed by the Chamber above under paragraph 921 (ii), (iii), (vii) and (xii).

9295. para. 927: In relation to the acts described under paragraph 921 (ii), (iii) and (vii) above the Chamber finds that the presence of Fofana at Base Zero when these incidents took place is not sufficient by itself to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana had any involvement in the commission of these criminal acts under any of the modes of liability charged in the Indictment.

9296. para. 928: In relation to the incident described under paragraph 921 (xii) the Chamber finds that the fact that a truck was brought to Talia and the contents of it was given to Fofana is not sufficient to establish beyond reasonable doubt that either the truck might have been looted or that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that the truck might have been looted.

9297. para. 930: Likewise, the Chamber concludes that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) as a superior for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Talia / Base Zero by Kamajors during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

9298. para. 938: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraphs 721 (i) to (viii) and 765 (i) to (iii), (viii) and (ix) and 809 (vi) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.9 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(0 and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa:

> (i) Sometime after August 1997, the Kamajors returned to Moyamba in full strength under the leadership of Mustapha Ngobeh. Kenei Torma was the second-in-command to Mustapha Ngobeh. Sometime after Ngobeh's death, Torma became the first in command. In late 1997 and early 1998, Kenei Torma and Chuck Norris were in control of the Kamajors in Moyamba town.

(ii) Albert J Nallo in late 1997 was the Director of Operations for the Southern Province, which included Moyamba District. In this capacity Albert J Nallo had control over Moyamba District. When Albert J Nallo went to Moyamba Town he learned from Mustapha Ngobeh that four days earlier Abu Bawote, the Commander in the Ribbi area, had killed the Chiefdom Speaker. Mustapha Ngobeh related that he had seen Abu Bawote in Bradford with the severed hand of the Chiefdom Speaker; Bawote had dried the hand and tied to his neck as a necklace. Albert J Nallo reported this incident to Fofana and Norman and told Norman that this Chiefdom Speaker was a collaborator. Norman responded: "Well, a Collaborator deserves that. That was the standing order. You know that was the standing order I passed long ago."

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Moyamba District

9299. para. 941: The Chamber will now proceed to examine whether the evidence adduced has established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

i. Superior-subordinate relationship – Responsibility of Fofana – Moyamba District

9301. para. 943: The Chamber reiterates its finding above that there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Fofana and Nallo, who was Director of Operations for the Southern Region, which included Moyamba District, and that Fofana exercised effective control over Nallo, in a sense of having the material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by Nallo or punish him for these acts when he learnt of their commission.[1574] The evidence has established beyond reasonable doubt that this relationship between Fofana and Nallo existed at least from the time of the appointment of Nallo at Base Zero to the position of Deputy National Director of Operations for the CDF and Director of Operations for the Southern Region, until the dissolution of Base Zero. Although the Chamber found that Nallo had control over Moyamba District at least in late 1997, the evidence has not established beyond reasonable doubt that at that time Nallo's control was such as to be considered to be effective over all the Kamajors in Moyamba District. By Nallo's own admission, he could not exercise full or strict control over all of the Kamajors in Southern Region due to their large numbers.

9302. para. 944: In relation to the incident involving the killing of the chiefdom speaker the Chamber finds that the evidence has not established beyond reasonable doubt when exactly the killing took place. Furthermore as we found, the fact that Bawote was seen with a "dried" hand would indicate that the killing had taken place some time earlier but is not sufficient to conclude beyond reasonable doubt as to the timing of the occurrence of this killing. While noting that Nallo was informed of this killing sometime in late 1997, there is no evidence as to the timing of the killing itself. The Chamber takes the view that this evidence has not established beyond reasonable doubt that the killing took place either within the time frame of the Indictment or at the time when Nallo was in control of Moyamba District.

9303. para. 945: The evidence also does not establish beyond reasonable doubt whether there was any superior-subordinate relationship between Ngobeh and Bawote at the time when Ngobeh saw Bawote with a dried hand. The Chamber further finds that there is no evidence beyond reasonable doubt that the killing of the chiefdom speaker was done by a person who at the time of the commission of the killing was a subordinate of Fofana.

9305. para. 947: Since an essential element of a superior responsibility is not established, it is not necessary to examine the other remaining elements with respect to any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District by the Kamajors during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana – Moyamba District

9306. para. 948: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3) for any of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed in Moyamba District during the time frame charged in the Indictment.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Moyamba District

9307. para. 951: The Chamber reiterates its earlier finding that although Kondewa had a de jure status as High Priest in the CDF and as such possessed command over all the Kamajors in the country, this was limited to the Kamajors' belief in mystical powers which Kondewa allegedly possessed. This evidence is inconclusive to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa had an effective control over the Kamajors, in a sense that he had the material ability to prevent or punish them for their criminal acts in Moyamba District. The only incident in the Factual Findings made by the Chamber in Moyamba District and which could be attributable to Kondewa for Count 5, Pillage, is set out below as follows:

(i) In November 1997, Kamajors under the control of Kondewa took TF2-073's Mercedes Benz from his home in Sembehun. The Kamajors said that they were Kondewa's Kamajors and that they had come from Talia, Tihun, Gbangbatoke and other surrounding villages. Three of them introduced themselves as Steven Sowa, Moses Mbalacolor and Mohamed Sankoh. Mohamed Sankoh said he was Deputy Director of War under Norman. The car was eventually given to Kondewa, who kept the car and used it without permission.

(ii) On the same occasion these Kamajors also took a generator, car tires and other gadgets from TF2-073.

9308. para. 952: The Chamber has examined the facts surrounding each incident set out in both points above and is satisfied that, having regard to all the evidence adduced, each incidence of pillage is sufficiently related to the armed conflict to satisfy the nexus requirement for war crimes. The Chamber further finds, given the circumstances surrounding the occurrence of pillage as set out above, that the victims were persons not taking a direct part in the hostilities at the time of the commission of the crimes. The Chamber is additionally satisfied that the perpetrator knew that the victims were not taking an active part in the hostilities.

9309. para. 953: In the light of the above, the Chamber is satisfied that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of pillage have been met with respect to each incident described in paragraph 951.

9310. para. 954: This incident demonstrates that the looting was done by the Kamajors who operated under the direct orders of Kondewa. Kondewa's knowledge that his subordinates committed crimes of pillage can be established on the basis that the looted car was then given to him to be driven around. The Chamber finds that Kondewa not only failed in the exercise of his duties to punish his subordinates for looting, but chose to support their actions by using the looted vehicle himself.

d. Conclusion – Responsibility of Kondewa – Moyamba District

9311. para. 955: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa is individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3), for pillage as charged under Count 5 on the Indictment and as found by the Chamber above.

e. Counts – Moyamba District

9312. para. 956: The Chamber recognises that other criminal acts have been committed by Kamajors in Moyamba District during the time frame relevant to the Indictment. In the Chamber's opinion, having regard to all the evidence adduced, these criminal acts were either not charged in the Indictment or fall outside the time frame of the Indictment or there is no indication that the accused were involved in the commission of these crimes through any of the modes of liability alleged in the Indictment. Therefore, the Chamber did not examine these criminal acts for the purposes of making legal findings on the responsibility of each Accused.

(x) Count 8 – Child Soldiers

9313. para. 957: The Prosecution alleges that Fofana and Kondewa are individually criminally responsible, pursuant to Article 6(1) or 6(3), for enlisting children under the age of 15 years ("child soldiers") into armed forces or groups or using them to participate actively in hostilities at all times relevant to the Indictment throughout the Republic of Sierra Leone.[1575]

9314. para. 958: In addition to the facts, listed in paragraph 721 (i) to (viii) and 809(i) (iii) above, the Chamber outlines below the facts as found in Sections V.2.2 and V.2.10 of the Factual Findings, upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) and 6(3) of Fofana and Kondewa with respect to Count 8.

(i) A commanders' meeting was held by Norman after the passing out parade at Base Zero in early January 1998, which had in attendance, among others, Fofana, Kondewa and commanders for the Bo attack. Norman added that the adult fighters were doing less than the children, and just eating and looting.

(ii) Child fighters were present at various times at Base Zero.

a. Responsibility of Fofana – Count 8 – Child Soldiers

9315. para. 964: In addition to the facts, listed above in paragraph 958 the Chamber outlines below the fact upon which it will rely to make its legal findings on the individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 6(3) of Fofana with respect to Count 8:

> (i) In February 1998 TF2-140 passed through the town of Koribondo, he saw Joe Tamidey, a Kamajor commander [under the command of Fofana] being guarded by four small boys. The Witness estimated the boys to be younger than he was.

9316. para. 965: TF2-140 was 15 years old when he witnessed this event. The Chamber has accepted the credibility of TF2-140's statement on this event, however there is room for doubt that the boys referred to were actually younger than 15 years of age. It is conceivable that the boys were younger than the witness, but still older than 15 years. It is also conceivable that TF2-140 may have been incorrect in his estimation that the boys were younger than he. Aside from that, the evidence does not establish that Fofana was aware of the situation regarding his subordinate Joe Tamidey. In conclusion, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced does not prove beyond reasonable doubt the criminal liability of the Accused.

9317. para. 966: The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced does not prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) as a superior for the enlistment or use of child soldiers to participate actively in hostilities anywhere in the Republic of Sierra Leone during the time frame specified in the Indictment. Proof of knowledge alone is insufficient to establish the individual criminal responsibility of an Accused, and the Chamber is unable to conclude that Fofana's presence alone at this or other such meetings has either a condoning or encouraging effect upon the commission of any crimes by his subordinates relating to the enlistment or use of child soldiers.

b. Conclusion – Responsibility of Fofana 0 Count 8 – Child Soldiers

9318. para. 967: On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the evidence adduced has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible pursuant to either Article 6(1) or 6(3) for Count 8.

c. Responsibility of Kondewa – Count 8 – Child Soldiers

9319. para. 973: Having found the Accused liable under Article 6(1) if the Statute, the Chamber need not consider the Accused's liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute.

3. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, Judgment, 28 May 2008

(a) Findings and Conclusions

(i) Bonthe District

a. Kondewa – Bonthe District

9320. para. 171: Kondewa alleges that the Trial Chamber erred ill both law and fact in finding that he was responsible as a superior pursuant to Article 6(3) for the crimes committed in Bonthe District. It is evident, however, from the submissions that he does not challenge the Trial Chamber's articulation of the legal requirements for the establishment of superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute. Kondewa, therefore, does not allege an error of law, but is instead concerned with the way in which the Trial Chamber applied the law to the particular facts of his case. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that this submission, in essence, questions the inferences drawn from facts found by the Trial Chamber and is therefore factual in nature. Kondewa must therefore satisfy the standard of review for alleged errors of fact.

9321. para. 172: Kondewa's arguments concern the Trial Chamber's application of the effective control test in determining a superior-subordinate relationship between him and the perpetrators of certain criminal acts during the attack on Bonthe. Even though Kondewa disputes the totality of the Trial Chamber's findings regarding his role as a superior, he does not proffer any argument in support of other aspects of his ground of appeal.[348] Kondewa's arguments are specifically limited to the finding of the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship. Although Kondewa challenges the finding that he had both the legal and material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by his subordinate Morie Jusu Kamara and other subordinates and to punish them for those crimes, the Trial Chamber's finding that he knew or had reason to know that certain crimes were being committed or that he failed to prevent their commission or to punish the alleged perpetrators was not challenged as such.[349]

9322. para. 173: In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess a party's arguments on appeal, the party must set out its grounds of appeal clearly, logically and exhaustively and must support allegations of error with precise references to the trial judgment or other material that supports his appeal. The Appeals Chamber will not consider submissions which are obscure, contradictory, vague or suffer from formal or other deficiencies.[350] The Appeals Chamber will, therefore, only consider the Trial Chamber's application of the effective control test, and determine whether based on the findings of fact, a reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that a superior subordinate relationship existed between Kondewa and these Kamajors.

9323. para. 174: Both parties concur with the Trial Chamber's articulation of the legal requirements for the establishment of superior responsibility under Article 6(3). They differ, however, in the application of the effective control test to civilian as opposed to military superiors. Both parties agree that a superior-subordinate relationship may be of a military or civilian character and that individuals in positions of authority whether within civilian or military structures may incur criminal responsibility on the basis of their de facto and/or de jure positions as superiors.[351] Kondewa argues that for a civilian superior to be found to have effective control pursuant to Article 6(3), the superior must either exercise powers of control similar to or analogous to that of a military commander, or must be part of a formalized structure of command.[352] According to Kondewa, liability under Article 6(3) is more difficult to establish for civilian superiors because there is usually an absence of formal powers of control in such a case.[353]

9324. para. 175: As has been noted, the position taken by the Prosecution is that there is no distinction between the legal standards required for proof of a superior-subordinate relationship in the case of "civilian" as opposed to "military" superior. The Appeals Chamber holds that the test for establishing the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship is effective control for both military and civilian superiors.[354]

9325. para. 176: The Appeals Chamber will now determine whether it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Kondewa exercised the requisite degree of "effective control" over his alleged subordinates.

9326. para. 177: The Trial Chamber relied on the following facts to conclude that as of 15 February 1998, Kondewa exercised effective control over Kamara, Squire and Baigeh: (a) the de jure status of Kondewa as a High Priest; (b) an incident which occurred in August 1997, (c) events which occurred during the 15 February 1998 attack on Bonthe, and (d) a letter sent from the Attoney-General to Kamajors in Bonthe in March 1998.[355] These facts are discussed in detail below.

i. De jure status – Kondewa – Bonthe District

9327. para. 178: In finding that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between Kondewa and the Kamajor commanders responsible for the Bonthe attack, the Trial Chamber relied on what it describes as his de jure status as High Priest of Kamajors in Sierra Leone and particularly so in Bonthe District.[356] Kondewa submits that because the Trial Chamber found elsewhere in the Judgment that the command he had over the Kamajors by virtue of his position as High Priest did not amount to a relationship of effective control, it was "unclear how the Trial Chamber determined that [his] status as High Priest gave him any higher degree of authority in Bonthe."[357] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber indeed found that Kondewa's status as High Priest did not amount to effective control over the Kamajors.[358]

9328. para. 179: The Appeals Chamber notes, however, that the Trial Chamber did not base its findings on the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship for Bonthe District on Kondewa's de jure position as High Priest alone. In addition to Kondewa's de jure status, the Trial Chamber relied on his de facto status as a superior to his alleged subordinates, as disclosed by evidence of his actual exercise of effective control over Kamajors who committed crimes in Bonthe District.[359] Although his position as High Priest was one of several factors considered by the Trial Chamber in determining the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that this is not a material factor in view of the overwhelming evidence of his actual exercise of effective control. Such include evidence of the relationship with his alleged subordinates in Bonthe, including an incident occurring in August 1997, events occurring during the 15 February 1998 attack on Bonthe, and a reaction to a letter sent from the Attorney-General to Kamajors in Bonthe in March 1998.

ii. The August 1997 Incident – Kondewa – Bonthe District

9329. para. 180: The Trial Chamber also relied on an incident occurring in Bonthe in August 1997, prior to the setting up of Base Zero, which involved a delegation sent to Kondewa as "the supreme head of the Kamajors."[360] Kondewa submits that the evidence falls outside the time frame of the Indictment, and that such evidence may not be relied upon to find that he exercised effective control six months later.[361]

9330. para. 181: The Appeals Chamber concurs that effective control must be established at the time of commission of the alleged crimes.[362] The Appeals Chamber is of the view, however, that even though an accused cannot be convicted for criminal acts falling outside the period of the Indictment, evidence of matters occurring outside the timeframe of the Indictment may be taken into account where relevant and probative of the accused's responsibility as a superior.[363] The evidence was relied upon by the Trial Chamber to establish that at a time before the commission of the crimes, Kondewa had effective control and that he had authority and power to issue oral and written directives to the Kamajors in the area. He had the power to order investigations for misconduct, and to hold court hearings and to threaten the imposition of sanctions of "a terrible death" on the Kamajors if they lied to him.[364] The evidence also establishes Kondewa' s pre-existing relationship with Squire.[365]

9331. para. 182: Taken together with the events of February and March 1998, the evidence shows that a reasonable trier of fact could conclude that this effective control continued until at least 15 February 1998.

iii. Events occurring during 15 February 1998 Attack on Bonthe – Kondewa – Bonthe District

9332. para. 183: The Trial Chamber also relied on events that occurred during the 15 February 1998 attack itself.[366] Kamara, as the overall commander of the Bonthe attack[367] sent several reports to Kondewa at Base Zero about the situation in Bonthe.[368] Based on these reports, three delegations came to Bonthe from Base Zero to investigate the situation. The first two delegations acted under Kondewa's instructions and Kondewa himself was the leader of the third delegation that arrived in Bonthe on 1 March 1998.[369] Witness Father Garrick testified that Kondewa came to Bonthe on the request of Kamara who had been complaining about the attitude of the Kamajors towards the civilians, and especially regarding the plight of the chiefdom speaker, Lahai Ndokoi Koroma, who was being targeted by the Kamajors for allegedly being a "junta."[370] Only Kondewa had authority to release Lahai Koroma and Kondewa left with him to Talia and later to Bo.

9333. para. 184: This evidence shows that Kamara reported to Kondewa about events in Bonthe not in the latter's capacity as High Priest, but in his capacity as de facto commander of the Kamajors who carried out the attack. Furthermore, Kondewa said at a public meeting in Bonthe that he had not allowed his men to enter Bonthe but that they had not listened to his advice and had done what they had done. He apologised on their behalf and told the gathering that the Kamajors and not ECOMOG were responsible for security in the area.[371]

iv. Letter from the Attorney General in March 1998 – Kondewa – Bonthe District

9334. para. 185: In March 1998, a delegation came to Freetown from Bonthe to complain to the President and the Attorney-General about the looting and killing carried out by the Kamajors in Bonthe. A letter written by the Attorney-General was given to Kamara, who passed it on to Squire. The latter declared that he refused to recognise the authority of the Attorney-General, or to accept any instructions unless they came from Norman or Kondewa.[372]

v. Conclusion – Kondewa – Bonthe District

9335. para. 186: The Trial Chamber's findings on the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship in each location was based on the totality of the evidence in the case with regard to such location. In the case of Bonthe, Kondewa's position as High Priest, which gave him a certain status, was just one of several factors considered by the Trial Chamber. The Trial Chamber also found that Kondewa had authority and power to issue oral and written directives; that he could order investigations for misconduct and hold court hearings; and that he had the legal and material ability to issue orders to Kamara.[373] Furthermore, Kondewa himself acknowledged his authority and control over Bonthe by stating publicly that he refused "to give any areas under his control to a military government but to the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah."[374]

9337. para. 188: The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Kondewa has failed to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between him and his alleged subordinates in Bonthe District.

9338. para. 189: For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber, Justice King dissenting, dismisses Kondewa's First Ground of Appeal.

vi. Dissents – Justice King - Kondewa – Bonthe District

9339. para. 59: I shall now consider Counts 2 and 4 of the Indictment for which the majority of my learned colleagues affirm the Trial Chamber's finding of Guilt in respect of Fofana and the appellant Kondewa, (Fofana not appealing), under Article 6(3), for crimes committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District. Counts 2 and 4 of the Indictment charge both Fofana and Kondewa with Murder and Cruel Treatment respectively, as War Crimes punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute.

9340. para. 60: It will be recalled that the Trial Chamber, Justice Bankole Thompson dissenting, found Kondewa individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3) for crimes Committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District under Courts 2, 4, 5 and 7. As the Appeals Chamber has found Kondewa Not Guilty of Counts 5 and 7, I shall only deal with Counts 2 and 4.

9341. para. 61: Article 6(3) of the Statute reads

> "The fact that any of the acts referred in articles 2 to 4 of the present statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof."

Article 3 a. of the Statute referred to above states:

> "The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed or ordered the commission of serious violations of article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the protection of War Victims and of Additional Protocol 11 thereto of 8 June 1977. These violations shall include:
> a. Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment;

9342. para. 62: It is important to stress, in limine, that Kondewa was not found guilty of having personally committed any of the crimes stated in Article 3a. "He never went to the war front himself." He was found guilty because both the Trial Chamber and the majority of the Appeals Chamber found "that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between him and his alleged subordinates in Bonthe District."[1144] That is to say, although he himself was not physically present and did not personally commit the crimes, he is deemed to have done so because of an alleged superior/subordinate relationship with the actual perpetrators of the crimes. I agree with the Appeals Chamber's articulation of the law with respect to the concept of superior responsibility, but I differ from them in their application of the principle of effective control.

9343. para. 63: Kondewa's First Ground of Appeal challenges his conviction for crimes committed by Kamajors in Bonthe District on the basis of superior responsibility. He challenges the Trial Chamber's application of the 'effective control' test and the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship. He contends that the Trial Chamber erroneously misapplied the 'effective control' test in determining whether a superior-subordinate relationship existed between him and the alleged perpetrators of crimes in Bonthe District.

9345. para. 65: It follows, therefore, that "as long as a superior has effective control over subordinates, to the extent that he can prevent them from committing crimes or punish them after they committed the Crimes, he would be held responsible for the commission of the crimes if he failed to exercise such abilities of control."[1148] The superior must have the material ability of a superior to prevent or punish his subordinates' crimes.[1149] 'Substantial influence' or 'persuasive ability' does not constitute effective control for the purpose of command responsibility.[1150]

9346. para. 66: The Trial Chamber held with respect to Bonthe District that Kondewa "[b]y virtue of his de jure status as High Priest ... and his de facto status as a superior to these Kamajors in that District, Kondewa exercised effective control over them."[1151] It is evident from the Trial Chamber's findings that it relied significantly on Kondewa's de jure status as "High Priest" in finding effective control and consequently, his criminal responsibility as a superior under Article 6(3). Specifically, I refer to the Trial Chamber's finding that "Kondewa had the legal and material ability to issue orders to Kamara, both by reason of his leadership role at Base Zero, being part of the CDF High Command" and the authority he enjoyed in his position as High Priest in Sierra Leone and particularly so in Bonthe District."[1152] Emphasis added.

9347. para. 67: According to the evidence and the findings of the Trial Chamber:

> Kondewa in his capacity as High Priest was in charge of the initiations at Base Zero and was the head of all the CDF initiators in the country. The Kamajors believed in mystical powers of the initiators, especially Kondewa, and that the process of the initiation and immunisation would make them "bullet-proof". The Kamajors looked up to Kondewa and admired the man with such powers. They believed that he was capable of transferring his powers to them to protect them. By virtue of these powers Kondewa had command over the Kamajors in the country. He never went to the war front himself, but whenever a Kamajor was going to war, Kondewa would give his advice and blessings, as well as the medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against bullets. No Kamajor would go to war without Kondewa's blessings.[1153]

9348. para. 68: The Appeals Chamber seems to have given undue credence to that passage from the Trial Chamber's Findings when adumbrating on Kondewa's alleged superior-subordinate relationship. I am impelled, therefore, to analyse that finding, if only to dismiss it as of no evidential or credential value. I start with "High Priest": The evidence shows that Kondewa was not a priest, let alone a "High' one. A Priest, in the non-metaphorical sense, is an ordained minister or a person who performs religious ceremonies and duties in a non-Christian religion.[1154] Kondewa was none of these. He was, in fact, a 'juju man' or 'medicine man' or in local parlance 'meresin man'; he was a 'masked dancer' or in local parlance 'deble dancer' , a 'gorboi' dancer.[1155] It is ludicrous to say that Kondewa's so-called High Priest appellation is analogous to 'Chaplain' in an army. One Dr Hoffman testified that Kondewa would have knowledge of the forest, supernatural or superhuman knowledge which anthropologists prefer to call 'occult' and could protect the village from witches and bush devils.[1156] 9350. para. 70: In my opinion, the roles found to have been performed by Kondewa as "High Priest", are so ridiculous, preposterous and unreal as to be laughable and not worthy of serious consideration by right-thinking persons in civilised society. If the Kamajors believe in the mystical power of Kondewa as an initiator, his imaginary immunisation powers (as if it was scientific), do the Chambers of the Special Court also believe that Kondewa could make Kamajors "bullet-proof" and that Kondewa's "blessings" would make them impervious to machine-gun bullets? And on that basis find him to be a commander? Obviously not. On these grounds alone I opine that there is no foundation for the Trial Chamber's finding, and its endorsement by my erudite colleagues, that "Kondewa had both the legal and material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by Kamajors or to punish them for those criminal acts."[1157]

9351. para. 71: The Trial Chamber accepted evidence from Prosecution Witness Albert Nallo who testified that Kondewa did not at any time during the war command any troops. It would be recalled that the Trial Chamber found Nallo to be 'the single most important witness in the Prosecution evidence on the alleged superior responsibility of the Accused ...."[1158]

9352. para. 72: Third, the Trial Chamber found that Kondewa's de jure status as High Priest of the CDF gave him authority over all the initiators in the Country and put him in charge of initiations. This authority according to the Trial Chamber did not give Kondewa the power to decide who should be deployed to go to the war front. Kondewa also never went to the war front himself. [1159] And yet he is deemed to have a superior/ subordinate relationship with subordinates.

9353. para. 73: From the foregoing, I opine that the Trial Chamber committed an error of fact in relying on Kondewa's status as "High Priest" in the CDF, as a factor in determining the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship in Bonthe District.

9356. para. 76: The Trial Chamber in establishing Kondewa's effective control on the basis of his de facto command appears to rely on the following factors:

(i) Testimony that in Bonthe District Kondewa was regarded as the 'supreme head' of the Kamajors;[1165]

(ii) Kondewa's ability to release Lahai Ndokoi;[1166]

(iii) Kondewa's statement that "he was not going to give any of the areas under his control to a military government but to the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah;"[1167]

(iv) Kondewa's ability to stop the Kamajors from harassing civilians from attacking Bonthe Town and his power to issue oral and written directives; order investigations for misconduct and threaten imposition of sanctions;[1168]

(v) Kondewa's legal and material ability to prevent the commission of criminal acts by Morie Jusu Kamara and Kamajors under be command of Morie Jusu Kamara.[1169]

(vi) Morie Jusu Kamara and Julius Squire's refusal to recognise the authority of the Attorney-General and not to accept any instructions, unless they came from Norman or Kondewa.[1170]

9357. para. 77: In evaluating the above evidence, I find that no reasonable tribunal could conclude that Kondewa was a de facto superior for the purpose of establishing a superior-subordinate relationship in Bonthe District. First, the Trial Chamber's finding that Kondewa was criminally responsible as a superior in Bonthe District because he was regarded as 'the supreme head' of the Kamajors in the area, directly conflicts with the Trial Chamber's failure to find Kondewa responsible as a superior in Talia/Base Zero. This contradiction is highlighted by the fact that Talia/Base Zero is in Bonthe District and was, at all material times, the Headquarters of the Kamajors.

9358. para. 78: While the Trial Chamber and my learned Appeals Chamber colleagues are of the opinion that Kondewa had 'substantial influence' as a "High Priest" over the Kamajors (which I rejected earlier), this is not the same as demonstrating that Kondewa had the 'material ability to prevent or punish subordinates for the commission of crimes.' It does not necessarily follow that ability to secure the release of an individual, or to stop the Kamajors from harassing civilians, necessarily demonstrates a capability to prevent or punish criminal activity in a superior/subordinate context.

9359. para. 79: The Trial Chamber in arriving at its conclusion held that, based on the evidence adduced; there was a superior-subordinate relationship between Kondewa and Morie Jusu Kamara, District Battalion Commander of Bonthe District, Julius Squire, Kamara's second in command and Kamajor Baigeh, Battalion Commander of the Kassilla Battalion. According to the Trial Chamber, Kondewa had authority and control over the actions of these Kamajor commanders and the Kamajors under their immediate command.[1171]

9360. para. 80: In my view, such conclusion is fallacious Kondewa in his Appeal Brief submits, rightly, that that there is no direct evidence of any relationship between him and either Morie Jusu Kamara, Julius Squire or Baigeh ("the three Commanders''). If anyone had a superior/subordinate relationship with the perpetrators, it must be, according to the evidence, those three commanders and not Kondewa. Furthermore, there is no credible indirect evidence of any relationship between the three Commanders and Kondewa. The Trial Chamber in concluding that a superior-subordinate relationship existed appeared to have engaged in a speculative exercise. Even assuming, arguendo, that a superior-subordinate relationship did exist, it is still my view that no reasonable tribunal would conclude that Kondewa had authority and control over the actions of the Kamajors, who were not under his command or control, but under the immediate and direct command of the three Commanders. It is important to note that the Trial Chamber expressly found that in March 1998, Morie Jusu Kamara, who in fact was the commander and superior of the Kamajors at all material times in Bonthe District, and not Kondewa, was not able to control the Kamajors:

> When Father Garrick returned to Bonthe from Freetown in March 1998, Battalion Commander Morie Jusu Kamara told Father Garrick that he would stop the Kamajors from mistreating Chief George Brandon, one of the people hidden at Fathel Garrick's mission. However, he was not able to control the Kamajors.[1172]

(ii) Moyamba District

a. Kondewa – Moyamba District

9361. para. 212: The issue raised in this ground is whether, based on the evidence as a whole, a reasonable tribunal of fact could conclude that a superior-subordinate relationship existed between Kondewa and his alleged subordinates. In reaching its findings on the superior responsibility of Kondewa in respect of this incident, the Trial Chamber relied on the following evidence:

> "(i) that at the time the crime was committed, the Kamajors said they were "Kondewa's Kamajors";
> (ii) that they also said they had come from village; including Talia and Tihun both of which are in Bonthe District;
>
> (iii) that the vehicle was taken to Talia and given to Norman then to Kondewa; and

(iv) that Kondewa was subsequently seen driving the car around in Bo."[411]

9362. para. 213: Based on this evidence the Trial Chamber concluded that this particular crime in Moyamba District was carried out by Kamajors operating under the direct orders of Kondewa.[412]

9363. para. 214: It is evident that apart from Kondewa's de jure status as High Priest of all the Kamajors in the country, a status which the Trial Chamber found did not by itself give Kondewa effective control over the Kamajors, the only other evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber consisted of statements made by the alleged perpetrators and the use of the vehicle by Kondewa after it had first been given to Norman. The Appeals Chamber finds that the fact that the Kamajors in question identified themselves as "Kondewa's Kamajors" is insufficient to establish the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship beyond reasonable doubt, the statement having been made in the absence of Kondewa. Furthermore, the fact that they also stated that they had come from Talia and Tihun, among other villages, was insufficient. The Trial Chamber, in its findings on the responsibility of Kondewa in Bonthe District, found that apart from the Kamajors who carried out the 15 February 1998 attack on Bonthe, there was no evidence on which it could conclude beyond reasonable doubt that "Kondewa did exercise the same degree of control over other Kamajor commanders and fighters who operated in the surrounding areas of Bonthe Town, prior to the attack or subsequently."[413]

9364. para. 215: There was thus, insufficient evidence linking Kondewa to these particular Kamajors that could establish beyond reasonable doubt that he had a superior-subordinate relationship with them. The Appeal Chamber finds, therefore, that on the evidence it was not open to a reasonable tribunal of fact to conclude that Kondewa was individually criminally responsible as a superior for this particular act of pillage, a violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3.f. of the Statute in Moyamba District.

9365. para. 216: For the reasons set out above, the Appeals Chamber grants Kondewa's Third Ground of Appeal and reverses the verdict of guilt on Count 5 and substitutes a verdict of not guilty.

(iii) Acts of Terrorism

a. Fofana – Koribondo - Acts of Terrorism

9366. para. 338: The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in finding that the evidence adduced had not established beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana knew or had reasons to know that his subordinates would commit acts of terrorism in Koribondo or had already done so.[693] It argues that in arriving at its conclusion, the Trial Chamber relied exclusively on its finding that "the commission of such acts of violence with the primary purpose to spread terror was not explicitly included in Norman's order."[694] In so doing, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber failed to consider circumstantial evidence and therefore misapplied the law with respect to the mens rea required to establish superior responsibility.[695]

9367. para. 339: Relying on similar arguments made in relation to crimes committed in Tongo, the Prosecution lists several proven acts of violence committed in Koribondo and argues that such acts of violence can only reasonably lead to the conclusion that the perpetrators had the specific intent to spread terror.[696] The Prosecution further submits that several of Norman's instructions such as his statement in January 1998 in advance of the attack in Koribondo, that fighters not leave "any house, or any living thing there" and his instructions given to "Nallo in Fofana's presence to kill anybody in Koribondo" can only be reasonably interpreted as demonstrating the specific intent to spread terror amongst the civilian population.[697] The Prosecution submits that, at the very least, Norman's instructions placed Fofana on notice that acts of terrorism were about to be committed.[698] The Prosecution similarly relies on Fofana's alleged prior knowledge that civilians had been in the past terrorized in Tongo and the Trial Chamber's finding that there was a reporting system in place and that "Albert J Nallo did all the planning for the Koribondo attack and then submitted it to… Fofana."[699]

9368. para. 340: In response, Fofana relies on similar arguments raised in relation to criminal responsibility for acts of terrorism alleged in Tongo and submits that there is no evidence demonstrating that he knew or had reason to know that his subordinates were perpetrating acts of violence with the specific intent to spread terror.[700] Fofana refutes the Prosecution's submissions that Norman's instructions demonstrated the specific intent to spread terror and argues that other inferences than the spreading of terror may be drawn from the evidence, such as the primary purpose of the Kamajors was "to capture or take towns that were under rebel or Junta control."[701] Fofana submits that evidence as accepted by the Trial Chamber reveals that the reporting system and organisation of the CDF was poor[702] and that certain Kamajors acted 1m their own outside the knowledge of the CDF.[703]

9369. para. 341: He further argues that the Prosecution's argument that he had prior knowledge of crimes committed by Kamajors is flawed because "knowledge that previous instances of violence cannot amount to proof of knowledge beyond reasonable doubt that acts of terrorism would be committed in the future."[704]

9370. para. 371: To be held responsible as a superior for acts of terrorism in Koribondo, Fofana must have known or had reason to know that acts of terrorism were about to be committed or were committed by his subordinates with the specific intent to spread terror.[730]

9371. para. 372: The Prosecution relies on four principal arguments to establish that Fofana knew or had reason to know that acts of terrorism were committed in Koribondo. These are:

(i) Fofana had knowledge of previous criminal acts, including crimes that could have been qualified as terrorism;[731]

(ii) Norman's instructions in advance of the attack in Koribondo demonstrated an intent to spread terror; [732]

(iii) Acts of terrorism were perpetrated in Koribondo; and

(iv) The Trial Chamber's findings that a reporting system existed and that the planning of the attack in Koribondo was submitted by Nallo to Fofana, who submitted it to Norman.[733]

9372. para. 373: Although acts of terrorism may have been committed in Koribondo, the Prosecution does not demonstrate that Fofana knew or had reason to know that acts of terrorism would be or were committed there. The Prosecution only points to one finding of fact to suggest that Fofana may have learned, after the fact, that acts of terrorism were committed in Koribondo, however even this finding is far from conclusive. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber found that "Fofana received reports on any military operation, in particular when Nallo was involved."[734] In fact, in the relevant paragraphs, the Trial Chamber found that Fofana "received frontline reports, both written and verbal, from the commanders in the field and passed them on to Norman" and that the strategies for war operations planned by Nallo and Fofana "did not include the killing of innocent civilians, looting of property or raping of women."[735] Neither of these findings points ineluctably to the conclusion that Fofana knew or had reason to know that acts of terrorism were committed in Koribondo.

9373. para. 374: The real strength of the Prosecution's argument that Fofana must have known or had reason to know that acts of terrorism would be committed in Koribondo lies in his knowledge of Norman's orders, but even there the argument must fail. Although Norman's statement at the December 1997 Passing Out Parade contained illegal orders, it did not unambiguously indicate a specific intent to spread terror. In light of this ambiguity, a reasonable tribunal of fact could find that Fofana neither knew nor could have known of the specific intent.

9374. para. 375: The Prosecution's argument with respect to Fofana's superior responsibility for acts of terrorism in Koribondo must be rejected.

9375. para. 379: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds no reason to disturb the Trial Chamber's findings with respect to the criminal responsibility of Fofana and Kondewa for acts of terrorism under Article 6(1) and/or Article 6(3) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber rejects the Prosecution's Sixth Ground of Appeal in its entirety.

b. Kondewa – Bonthe District - Acts of Terrorism

9376. para. 342: The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in finding that the evidence adduced had not established beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa knew or had reason to know that his subordinates would commit acts of terrorism in Bonthe District or had already done so.[705] In support of its argument, the Prosecution similarly relies on Kondewa's alleged knowledge that civilians had been in the past terrorized in Tongo and proven acts of violence committed in Bonthe District.[706] The Prosecution further relies on Kondewa's admission that "he was aware of the atrocities committed by the Kamajors during the attack."[707]

9377. para. 343: In response, Kondewa relies on similar arguments raised in relation to acts of terrorism alleged in Tongo and submits that there is no evidence demonstrating that he knew or had reason to know that his subordinates were perpetrating acts of violence with the specific intent to spread terror. He argues that the "link between the acts of the subordinates and his knowledge regarding the specific act of terrorism is unfounded."[708]

9378. para. 376: The Appeals Chamber is not convinced by the Prosecution's submissions that the Trial Chamber erred in not finding that Kondewa knew or had reasons to know that acts of terrorism were about to be or had been committed in Bonthe District. A reasonable tribunal of fact could conclude, as did the Trial Chamber, that instructions given by Norman during the Passing Out Parades in December 1997 and in early January 1998 did not convey the specific intent to spread terror.

9379. para. 377: The additional submissions by the Prosecution also do not render the Trial Chamber's conclusion on Kondewa's lack of unreasonable. As discussed above, and contrary to the Prosecution's submission, the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that Kondewa was not aware that civilians had been terrorized in Tongo, although it found that he was aware that the Kamajors who operated in the towns of Tongo Field had committed crimes.[736] Further, Kondewa's admission that "he was aware of the atrocities committed by the Kamajors during the attack" on Bonthe[737] does not necessarily demonstrate that he was aware that his subordinates committed acts of terrorism. A reasonable tribunal of fact could have concluded that he had the requisite knowledge that some crimes had been committed in Bonthe, but lacked knowledge of the crime "acts of terrorism."

9380. para. 378: The Prosecution's argument with respect to Kondewa's superior responsibility for acts of terrorism in Bonthe must be rejected.

CHAPTER 14 - SENTENCING

A. CHARLES TAYLOR

1. Sentencing Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, SCSL-03-01-T, Judgement, 30 May 2012

(a) Applicable Law

(i) Applicable Provisions

9382. para. 6: Sentencing in the Special Court for Sierra Leone is governed by Article 19 of the Statute of the Special Court ("Statute") and Rule 10 1 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"). Article 19 of the Statute provides:

> 1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.
> 2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.
>
> 3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Rule 101 of the Rules provides:

> (A) A person convicted by the Special Court, other than a juvenile offender, may be sentenced to imprisonment for a specific number of years.
>
> (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:
>
> (i) Any aggravating circumstances;
>
> (ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;

(iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9(3) of the Statute.

(C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

(D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

9383. para. 7: According to the above provisions, the Trial Chamber is obliged to take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person. Aggravating and mitigating circumstances and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (lCTR) and the national courts of Sierra Leone shall, where appropriate, be taken into account. These requirements are not exhaustive and the Trial Chamber has the discretion to determine an appropriate sentence depending on the individual circumstances of the case.8

9384. para. 8: The Trial Chamber recognises the universally accepted principle that a person who has been convicted of many crimes should generally receive a higher sentence than a person convicted of only one of those crimes.[9]

9385. para. 9: According to Rule 101 (C) of the Rules, the choice as to concurrent or consecutive sentencing is a matter within the Trial Chamber's discretion.[10] Such discretion must be exercised with reference to the fundamental consideration that the sentence to be served by an accused must reflect the totality of the accused's criminal conduct.[11] In this respect, the Trial Chamber acknowledges that the sentence should be individualised and also proportionate to the conduct of the Accused, reflecting the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the convicted person, taking into consideration the particular circumstances of the case, the form and degree of participation of the Accused.[12]

9386. para. 10: The practice of imposing a single 'global' sentence for multiple convictions is well established in the jurisprudence of the international criminal tribunals,[13] as well as that of the Special Court.[14] The Trial Chamber has accepted the ICTR Appeal Chamber holding in Prosecutor v. Kambanda that it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to impose a global sentence in respect of all counts for which an accused has been found guilty.[15] The governing criteria is that the final or aggregate sentence should reflect the totality of the criminal conduct, or generally that it should reflect the gravity of the offence and the overall culpability of the offender, so that it is both just and appropriate.[16]

9387. para. 11: In the present case, the Trial Chamber finds that it is appropriate to impose a global sentence for multiple convictions in respect of Mr Taylor.

(ii) Sentencing Objectives

9388. para. 12: The Trial Chamber notes the content of the Preamble of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000) establishing the Court which recognises that [...] in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace.[17]

9389. para. 13: The SCSL Appeals Chamber has stated that, in relation to legitimate sentencing purposes, "the primary objectives must be retribution and deterrence".[18] This is also acknowledged by the ICTY Appeals Chamber which stated that "it is well established that at the ICTY and the ICTR, retribution and deterrence are the main objectives in sentencing".[19] In the context of international criminal justice, retribution is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge, but as duly expressing the outrage of the international community at these crimes,[20] and it is meant to reflect a fair and balanced approach to punishment for wrongdoing. The penalty imposed must be proportionate to the wrongdoing. In other words, the punishment must fit the crime.[21]

9391. para. 15: Although rehabilitation is considered as an important objective of punishment, it is more relevant in domestic jurisdictions than in international criminal tribunals.[24]

9392. para. 16: The Trial Chamber endorses the principle that: One of the main purposes of a sentence is to influence the legal awareness of the accused, the surviving victims, their relatives, the witnesses and the general public in order to reassure them that the legal system is implemented and enforced. Additionally, sentencing is intended to convey the message that globally accepted laws and rules have to be obeyed by everybody.[25]

9393. para. 17: In deciding the appropriate sentences, the Trial Chamber has taken into account all the factors that are likely to contribute to achievement of these objectives.

(iii) Sentencing Factors

a. Gravity of Offence

9394. para. 19: The gravity of the offence is the primary consideration in imposing a sentence,[27] and is the "litmus test" in determination of an appropriate sentence.[28] The gravity of the offence is determined by assessing the inherent gravity of the crime and the criminal conduct of the accused,[29] a determination that requires consideration of the particular circumstances of the case and the crimes for which the person was convicted, as well as the form and degree of participation of the Accused in the crime.[30]

9395. para. 20: In assessing the gravity of the offence, the Trial Chamber has taken into account such factors as (i) the scale and brutality of the offences committed;[31] (ii) the role played by the Accused in the commission of the crime;[32] (iii) the degree of suffering, impact or consequences of the crime for the immediate victim in terms of physical, emotional and psychological effects;[33] (iv) the effects of the crime on relatives of the immediate victims and/or the broader targeted group;[34] (v) the vulnerability and number ofvictims;[35] and (vi) the length of time during which the crime continued.[36]

9396. para. 21: With respect to the assessment of the criminal conduct of the convicted person, the Trial Chamber has taken into account the mode of liability under which the Accused was convicted, as well as the nature and degree of his participation in the offence.[37] In this regard, the Trial Chamber adopts the jurisprudence of ICTY and ICTR that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that to be imposed for more direct forms of participation.[38] However, the Trial Chamber will also take into account the unique circumstances of this case in applying this principle and determining an appropriate sentence.

b. Individual Circumstances of the Convicted

9397. para. 22: The Trial Chamber notes that "the individual circumstances of the convicted person" can be either mitigating or aggravating. Family concerns should in principle be a mitigating factor. [39] The convicted person's behaviour before, during and after the offence, his motives for the offence and demonstration of remorse thereafter are all factors that can be taken into account.[40] The purpose of taking the individual circumstances of the convicted person into account is to individualise the penalties concerned. For this purposes, the unfettered discretion of judges to evaluate the facts and attendant circumstances should enable them to take into account any other factor that they deem pertinent.[41]

9398. para. 23: As a general principle, a convicted person's motive can be considered as a factor in sentencing, either as an aggravating factor or a mitigating factor.[42] Among those motives that have been considered as aggravating factors are enjoyment of criminal acts, sadism and desire for revenge, group hatred or bias, and a desire to cause terror. Desire for pecuniary gain, desire to inflict pain or harm and a desire to escape punishment may also be considered aggravating circumstances.[43] The Appeals Chamber opined that while as a general principle a convicted person's motive can be considered a mitigating factor, it does not amount to a legal excuse for criminal conduct.[44] It held that:

> allowing mitigation for a convicted person's political motives, even where they are considered by the Chamber to be meritorious, undermines the purposes of sentencing rather than promotes them. In effect, it provides implicit legitimacy to conduct that unequivocally violates the law.[45]

c. Aggravating Circumstances

9399. para. 24: It is a widely accepted practice that aggravating factors should be established by the Prosecution beyond reasonable doubt,[46] and that only circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged, and for which the Accused has been convicted, can be considered to be aggravating.[47]

9400. para. 25: The Statute and the Rules do not provide an enumeration of the circumstances that the Trial Chamber may consider as aggravating.[48] Thus, the Trial Chamber is tasked with weighing the individual circumstances of each case and has discretion to identity the relevant factors. Based on the established jurisprudence, the Trial Chamber may consider factors such as:

> (i) the position of the accused, that is, his position of leadership, his level in the command structure, or his role in the broader context of the conflict [...]; (ii) the discriminatory intent or the discriminatory state of mind for crimes for which such a state of mind is not an element or ingredient of the crime; (iii) the length of time during which the crime continued; (iv) active and direct criminal participation, if linked to a high-rank position of command, the accused's role as fellow perpetrator, and the active participation of a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates; (v) the informed, willing or enthusiastic participation in crime; (vi)

> premeditation and motive; (vii) the sexual, violent, and humiliating nature of the acts and the vulnerability of the victims; (viii) the status of the victims, their youthful age and number, and the effect of the crimes on them; (ix) the character of the accused; and (x) the circumstances of the offences generally.[49]

9401. para. 26: In addition to the above aggravating factors, the Trial Chamber has also taken into account the fact that attacks committed in traditional places of civilian sanctuary such as churches, mosques, schools, and hospitals are generally considered as being more serious.[50]

9402. para. 27: The Trial Chamber has also taken into account as an aggravating factor the extraterritoriality of the criminal acts of the Accused. The International Court of Justice has held that acts of intervention by a State in support of an opposition within another State constitute "a breach of the customary principle of non-intervention and will also, if they directly or indirectly involve the use of force, constitute a breach of the principle of non-use of force in international relations".[51] The International Court of Justice also held that support given to military and paramilitary activities including "financial support, training, supply of weapons, intelligence and logistic support constitutes a clear breach of the principle of non-intervention".[52] While these provisions of customary law govern conduct between States, the Trial Chamber considers that the violation of this principle by a Head of State individually engaging in criminal conduct can be taken into account as an aggravating factor.

9404. para. 29: The Trial Chamber is of the view that the position of leadership of an accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute can be considered to be an aggravating circumstance.[57] Furthermore, breach of trust or authority, where the accused was in a position that carries with it a duty to protect or defend the victims, such as in the case of a government official, police chief or commander, can be an aggravating factor.[58]

9405. para. 30: The Trial Chamber notes the Defence submission that a Trial Chamber may only consider aggravating circumstances that have been pleaded in the Indictment.[59] However, the line of authority cited for this assertion begins with the ICTR in the Simba Appeal Judgement,[60] which cites in support of this assertion a number of earlier precedents, which state much more broadly that aggravating circumstances are "those circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged".[61] The Trial Chamber notes that in accordance with these precedents, specifically the Delalic Appeal Judgement and the Kunarac Trial Judgement, it is only the circumstances and their direct relation to the offences charged, and not necessarily their statement in the Indictment, that is required for them to be considered as aggravating factors. The RUF Sentencing Judgement, which is also cited by the Defence, does not mention the Indictment in this regard, and is in line with the Delalic and Kunarac precedents. Moreover, the Trial Chamber notes that these precedents are drawn from the ICTR and the ICTY where judgement and sentencing are consolidated, whereas in this Court sentencing is the subject of a separate proceeding subsequent to delivery of the judgement.

d. Mitigating Circumstances

9406. para. 31: Mitigating circumstances need only be proven on a balance of probabilities, and need not be related to the offence.[62]

9407. para. 32: The Trial Chamber notes that neither the Statute nor the Rules define the factors that may be considered to be mitigating. Accordingly, what constitutes a mitigating factor is a matter for the Trial Chamber to determine in the exercise of its discretion.[63]

9408. para. 33: Under Rule 101(B), the only mitigating circumstance that the Trial Chamber is required to consider is the substantial cooperation of the Accused with the Prosecutor.[64]

9409. para. 34: It is generally within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to determine whether or not a factor will be accepted as a mitigating circumstance, and what weight the factor should be granted. Such factors include but are not limited to (i) the expression of remorse or acknowledgement of responsibility;[65] (ii) good character with no prior convictions;[66] (iii) personal and family circumstances;[67] (iv) the good behaviour or conduct of the accused subsequent to the conflict, particularly with respect to promoting peace and reconciliation;[68] (v) good behaviour in detention;[69] (vi) assistance to detainees and victims;[70] (vii) the accused's lack of education or training;[71] (viii) the advanced age of the accused;[72] (ix) voluntary surrender;[73] (x) duress and indirect participation;[74] and (xi) in exceptional circumstances poor or frail health.[75]

9410. para. 35: The Trial Chamber considers that certain factors do not constitute mitigating circumstances and will therefore not take them into account. These include but are not limited to (i) the fact that convictions relate to crimes committed in less districts than those particularised in the Indictment in no way lessens the seriousness of the offences;[76] (ii) the fact that a sentence is to be served in a foreign country should not be considered in mitigation;[77] (iii) the guerrilla nature of the conflict does not lessen the grievous nature of the offences,[78and] (iv) whilst motive may shade the individual perception of culpability, it does not amount to a legal excuse for criminal conduct.[79]

e. Sentencing Practice in the National Courts of Sierra Leone and other International Tribunals

i. Sentencing Practice at other International Tribunals

9411. para. 36: Article 19(1) of the Statute directs the Trial Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices adopted at the ICTR.[80] The Trial Chamber will also consider the sentencing practice of the ICTY as its statutory provisions are analogous to those of the Special Court and the ICTR.[81] The Trial Chamber is of the view that the sentencing practices of ICTR and ICTY are instructive and has considered these practices where appropriate. The Trial Chamber notes that the jurisprudence of the ICTR and ICTY holds that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that imposed for more direct forms of participation.[82] The Trial Chamber further notes that the pronouncement of global sentences is a well established practice at those tribunals.[83] The mitigating and aggravating factors that the Trial Chamber has considered in the instant case have also been widely considered by the ICTR and ICTY.[84]

ii. Sentencing Practice in Sierra Leone

9412. para. 37: Article 19(1) of the Statute directs the Trial Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean national courts. This does not oblige the Trial Chamber to conform to that practice, but rather to take into account that practice as and when appropriate.[85] In the present case, the Trial Chamber notes that Mr Taylor was not indicted for, nor convicted of, offences under Article 5 of the Statute in the Sierra Leonean law. Nevertheless, it has noted with regard to its consideration of the appropriate relative penalties for different modes of liability that the law of Sierra Leone provides that an accessory to a crime "may be indicted, tried, convicted and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon".[86]

(b) Determination of Sentence

(i) Gravity of the Offences

9413. para. 70: The Accused has been found responsible for aiding and abetting as well as planning some of the most heinous and brutal crimes recorded in human history. The Trial Chamber is of the view that the offences for which the Accused has been convicted - acts of terrorism, murder, rape, sexual slavery, cruel treatment, recruitment of child soldiers, enslavement and pillage - are. of the utmost gravity in terms of the scale and brutality of the offences, the suffering caused by them on victims and the families of victims, and the vulnerability and number of victims.

9414. para. 71: In determining an appropriate sentence for the Accused, the Trial Chamber has taken into account the tremendous suffering caused by the commission of the crimes for which the Accused is convicted of planning and aiding and abetting, and the impact of these crimes on the victims, physically, emotionally and psychologically. The Trial Chamber recalls the tremendous loss of life - innocent civilians burned to death in their homes, or brutally killed by maiming and torture. The amputation of limbs was a hallmark of terror and cruelty visited upon innocent civilians. For those who survived these crimes, the long-term impact on their lives is devastating - amputees without arms who now have to live on charity because they can no longer work; young girls who have been publicly stigmatized and will never recover from the trauma of rape and sexual slavery to which they were subjected, in some cases resulting in pregnancy and additional stigma from the children born thereof; child soldiers, boys and girls who are suffering from public stigma, highlighted by the identifying marks carved on their bodies, and enduring the after-effects of years of brutality, often irreparable alienation from their family and community, all as a consequence of the crimes for which Mr. Taylor stands convicted of aiding and abetting and planning. The Defence aptly described "the pain of lost limbs, the agony of not only rape in its commonly understood sense, but also the rape of childhood, the rape of innocence, possibly the rape of hope".[132] The Trial Chamber witnessed many survivors weeping as they testified, a decade after the end of the conflict. Their suffering will be life-long.

9415. para. 72: In assessing the gravity of the crimes committed, the Trial Chamber recalls the evidence of several witnesses whose testimony highlights the brutality of the crimes committed, the suffering caused by these crimes on the victims, and their vulnerability. Witness TF1-064 was forced to carry a bag containing human heads to Tombodu.[133] On the way, the rebels ordered her to laugh as she carried the bag dripping with blood. TF1-064 testified that when they arrived at Tombodu, the bag was emptied and she saw the heads of her children.[134] Witness TFI-143 was 12 years old [135] when he and 50 other boys and girls were captured by RUF rebels in September 1998 in Konkoba. The rebels turned him into a child soldier after carving the letters "RUF" on his chest.[136] Having been told to amputate the hands of those who resisted him, this 12 year-old subsequently used a machete to amputate the hands of men who had refused to open the door of their shop.[137] When ordered on a food-finding mission to rape an old woman they found at a farmhouse, the boy cried and refused, for which he was punished.[138] The Trial Chamber recalls the testimony of TFI-358, who treated a young nursing mother whose eyes had been pulled out from their sockets after she was gang raped by seven armed rebels, so that she would not be able to later identify them.[139]

9416. para. 73: The scale and brutality of the crimes committed in Sierra Leone, as demonstrated by these individual incidents, is also clearly demonstrated by the code names given by the perpetrators to the military campaigns in which the crimes were committed. Names such as Operation Spare No Soul and Operation No Living Thing, indicating the indiscriminate killing of anything that moved, speak for themselves as to the gravity of the crimes committed.

9417. para. 74: The Trial Chamber notes that the effects of these crimes on the families of the victims, as well as the society as a whole, are devastating. A large number of physically handicapped Sierra Leoneans have been left unable to do the simplest tasks we take for granted as a direct result of amputation. Many of the victims were productive members of society, breadwinners for their families, and are now reduced to beggars, unable to work as a result of the injuries inflicted on them. They are no longer productive members of society.

9418. para. 75: Particularly reprehensible were the crimes committed against vulnerable groups. Girls and women, were raped, subjected to sexual slavery, and in many cases unwanted pregnancy. Pregnant women were cut open to settle bets as to the sex of the unborn child. Child soldiers, both boys and girls, had their innocence stolen and were forced to commit murders, rapes and mutilations at a very young age, their lives permanently marred by these traumatic experiences. Elderly men and women, a particularly vulnerable group, were also affected by the crimes committed, their dignity violated by brutal attacks and cruel treatment.

9419. para. 76: In assessing the role of Mr. Taylor, the Trial Chamber has considered the modes of liability under which he was convicted, as well as the nature and degree of his participation. The Trial Chamber recalls that Mr. Taylor's conviction for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes by the AFRC/RUF is based on a number of interventions. In addition to supplying arms and ammunition, and providing military personnel, Mr. Taylor provided various forms of sustained operational support, including communications and logistical support. In addition to this practical assistance, Mr. Taylor also provided encouragement and moral support through ongoing consultation and guidance. The cumulative impact of these various acts of aiding and abetting heightens the gravity of Mr. Taylor's criminal conduct, in the view of the Trial Chamber. Moreover, the steady flow of arms and ammunition that he supplied extended the duration of the Sierra Leone conflict, and the commission of crimes it entailed. Had the RUF/AFRC not had this support from Mr. Taylor, the conflict and the commission of crimes might have ended much earlier.

9420. para. 77: With regard to Mr. Taylor's conviction for planning the commission of crimes in the attacks on Kono and Makeni, and in the invasion of and retreat from Freetown between December 1998 and February 1999, the Trial Chamber notes the submission by the Defence distinguishing the design of the overall operation from the planning of the actual crimes that were perpetrated.[140] The Trial Chamber does not accept this distinction and recalls its finding that having drawn up the plan with Bockarie, Mr. Taylor followed its implementation closely via daily communications, either directly or through Benjamin Yeaten.[141]

9421. para. 78: The Prosecution argues that the length of time over which the crimes were committed, spanning up to five years, should be taken into account as an aggravating factor. The Trial Chamber has considered this issue in the context of its consideration of the gravity of the offence rather than as an aggravating factor. With regard to the duration of the crimes committed, the Defence submits that the bulk of crimes occurred within an eighteen month period in 1998 and 1999, not the longer period of five years set forth by the Prosecution.[142] The Trial Chamber notes that the Prosecution has outlined various time periods for various crimes, with the time periods as a whole spanning five years.[143] The Trial Chamber notes the Defence acknowledgement that the full time span of crimes committed is five years, as documented on its own chart of the temporal range of counts.[144] In the Trial Chamber's view, it is clear from the evidence, as supported by the submissions of both Parties, that the length of time over which the crimes were committed was five years, with a concentration of the crimes having been committed during an eighteen month or two year period within the five year time span. In the Trial Chamber's view, the length of time over which the crimes continued heightens the gravity of the offence.

(ii) Individual Circumstances of the Convicted

9422. para. 79: The Defence submits that Mr. Taylor's age, health and family circumstances "constitute the essence of the individual circumstances contemplated in Article 19(2) of the Statute" and that they may be regarded as mitigating factors.[145] Mr. Taylor is 64 years old. The Trial Chamber is not aware of any serious concerns relating to Mr. Taylor's health, and no medical evidence has been submitted relating to his health. The Trial Chamber notes that Mr. Taylor has and will continue to have access to medical attention as needed throughout the period of his sentence. His age and the fact that he is married with children are not, in the Trial Chamber's view, mitigating factors in this case. Further, his social, professional and family background, which the Defence submits shows the likelihood of rehabilitation,[146] is· not a mitigating factor in the Trial Chamber's view. The Trial Chamber recalls that the SCSL Appeals Chamber, as well as the ICTY Appeals Chamber, has held that the primary objectives in sentencing must be retribution and deterrence".[147] Moreover, in the absence of Mr. Taylor's acceptance of responsibility or remorse for the crimes committed, the Trial Chamber does not consider the likelihood of rehabilitation to be significant, nor is it demonstrated by his social, professional and family background.

9423. para. 80: In light of these considerations, the Trial Chamber finds that nothing in Mr. Taylor's personal circumstances justifies any mitigation of his sentence.

(iii) Alleged Selective Prosecution

9424. para. 8l: The Defence and Mr. Taylor have both highlighted their contention that the Accused was singled out for selective prosecution. The Trial Chamber has addressed this issue in its Trial Judgement and found that Mr. Taylor was not singled out for selective prosecution.[148] In the Trial Chamber's view, this issue is not relevant to sentencing.

(iv) Time Served

9425. para. 82: On 7 March 2003, the Indictment against Mr. Taylor was approved by the Special Court under seal, and a warrant for Mr. Taylor's arrest was issued. On 4 June 2003, the Indictment and Warrant of Arrest were publicly disclosed, and formally unsealed one week later.[149] On II August 2003, Mr. Taylor stepped down from the Presidency. He went into exile to Nigeria where he remained until 29 March 2006 when he was arrested by Nigerian authorities, following a request by Liberian President Johnson Sirleaf that he be surrendered to the Special Court pursuant to his Warrant of Arrest. On the same day he was handed over to the Liberian authorities who in turn transferred him to the custody of the Special Court. For security reasons, by order of the President of the Court, in June 2006 Mr. Taylor was transferred from Freetown to The Netherlands to stand trial in The Hague, where he has been on remand since.[150]

9426. para. 83: The Defence submits that in addition to the time he has spent in the custody of the Court, Mr. Taylor should be credited for time that he spent in Nigeria prior to his transfer, an additional 2 years and 7 months.[151] The Defence submits that during this time Mr. Taylor was effectively under house arrest and that the time therefore constitutes detention, highlighting the conditions of his stay in Nigeria as set forth in Exhibit D-406.[152] The Prosecution submits that Mr. Taylor was not under house arrest, highlighting his own testimony that he was free to go where he wanted during this time.[153]

9427. para. 84: Rule 10l(D) of the Special Court's Rules of Procedure and Evidence provides that credit for time served shall be taken into consideration for any period "during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal " [emphasis added].[154] The Trial Chamber notes that house arrest has been recognized as a form of detention pending surrender which might be considered for purposes of crediting a convicted person for time served.[155] However, in the case of Mr. Taylor, the period of time he spent in Nigeria cannot be considered, in the Trial Chamber's view, as having taken place pending his transfer to the Court and therefore does not fall within the scope of Rule 101(D). Mr. Taylor's time in Nigeria was not unrelated to his effort to avoid the jurisdiction of the Court, and during his time in Nigeria, the Court was in no way involved in the conditions governing his stay there. It is from 29 March 2006 that Mr. Taylor was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Court.

9428. para. 85: The Trial Chamber further notes, as highlighted by the Prosecution, that Mr. Taylor himself testified that he was not under house arrest during the period of time he was in Nigeria following his departure from Liberia. Exhibit 0-406 is cited by the Defence as listing the conditions of his stay in Nigeria and including serious restrictions on his movement and liberty.[156] The Trial Chamber notes that the conditions listed in Exhibit 0-406 are set forth as "Conditions of Asylum for Former President Charles Taylor". They list a number of obligations of Mr. Taylor, and of Nigeria. The obligations of Mr. Taylor include his abstention from subversive activities against Nigeria, and from political activities in or military incursions into Liberia. The restrictions on his movement are the requirement that he obtain clearance to leave the city limits of Calabar and that he be accompanied on any travel outside Calabar by a Nigerian escort officer. Security is listed as an obligation of Nigeria, to provide protection to Mr. Taylor.[157] The Trial Chamber does not find that these conditions governing the asylum offered to Mr. Taylor by the Government of Nigeria can be considered to constitute "house arrest", as alleged by the Defence.

9429. para. 86: In light of these considerations, for reasons of fact and law, the Trial Chamber does not credit Mr. Taylor for the period of time he spent in Nigeria prior to his arrest and finds that his detention for the purpose of credit for time served commenced on 29 March 2006.

(v) Mitigating Circumstances

9430. para. 87: The Defence has set forth a number of factors to be considered in mitigation of sentence, while the Prosecution submits that there are no significant mitigating factors.

9431. para. 88: The Trial Chamber has addressed the role of Mr. Taylor in the peace process for Sierra Leone at length in its Judgement, finding that while Mr. Taylor publicly played a substantial role in this process, including as a member of the ECOWAS Committee of Five, later Committee of Six, secretly, he was fuelling hostilities between the AFRC/RUF and the democratically elected authorities in Sierra Leone, by urging the former not to disarm and by actively providing them with arms and ammunition. For this reason, the Trial Chamber does not find Mr. Taylor's role in the peace process to be a mitigating factor in sentencing. The Trial Chamber notes the constructive role Mr. Taylor played in the release of UN peacekeepers and other hostages, but in light of the gravity of the crimes does not consider this intervention a significant mitigating factor.

9433. para. 90: The Defence suggests that the cooperation of Mr. Taylor with the Prosecution and the Court should be considered in mitigation. The Trial Chamber recalls that Mr. Taylor directed his counsel to disregard orders of the Trial Chamber and does not consider that Mr. Taylor cooperated with the Prosecution and the Court. For this reason cooperation cannot be considered a mitigating factor for sentencing.

9434. para. 91: The Defence submits that expressions of sympathy and compassion by Mr. Taylor for the victims of the crimes committed should be taken into account as a mitigating factor.[158] Although the Defence accepted that crimes were committed in Sierra Leone, it nevertheless put the Prosecution to proof beyond reasonable doubt of the crimes charged in the Indictment, necessitating the testimony of numerous victims who relived in this Court the pain and suffering they experienced. In his statement to this Court, Mr. Taylor stated that "Terrible things happened in Sierra Leone and there can be no justification for the terrible crimes."[159] Mr. Taylor has not accepted responsibility for the crimes of which he stands convicted, and the Trial Chamber does not consider this statement, and the other comments made by Mr. Taylor, to constitute remorse that would merit recognition for sentencing purposes.

9435. para. 92: The Defence submits that Mr. Taylor's lack of a prior criminal record and his good conduct in detention should be considered as mitigating factors. The Trial Chamber notes the report submitted by the Defence of Mr. Taylor's good conduct in detention and has taken this report into account, although it does not consider this factor to have great significance in light of the gravity of the crimes committed. Similarly, with regard to Mr. Taylor's lack of a prior criminal record, in light of the gravity of the crimes committed, this is not, in the Trial Chamber's view, a significant factor. Moreover, the Trial Chamber notes the question raised by the Prosecution - who was in a real position of power or authority to prosecute the President of Liberia.[160] The Trial Chamber considers that while not impossible, it is difficult to prosecute a Head of State.

9436. para. 93: The Defence submits that the hardship on Mr. Taylor of serving a sentence outside his country of origin should be a mitigating factor. The Trial Chamber notes that the determination as to where Mr. Taylor will serve his sentence shall be made by the President of the Court following sentencing, pursuant to Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence,[161] and recalls the determination of the Appeals Chamber that the fact that a sentence is to be served in a foreign country should not be considered in mitigation.[162]

9437. para. 94: The Trial Chamber recalls that Mr. Taylor was found not guilty of participation in a joint criminal enterprise, and not guilty of superior responsibility for the crimes committed. A conviction on these principal or significant modes of liability might have justified the sentence of 80 years' imprisonment proposed by the Prosecution. However, the Trial Chamber considers that a sentence of 80 years would be excessive for the modes of liability on which Mr. Taylor has been convicted, taking into account the limited scope of his conviction for planning the attacks on Kono and Makeni in December 1998 and the invasion of and retreat from Freetown between December 1998 and February 1999.

(vi) Aggravating Factors

9438. para. 95: The Prosecution argues that Mr. Taylor's "willing and enthusiastic participation" in the crimes constitutes an aggravating factor, citing his detailed knowledge of the crimes that were committed.[163] The Defence contends that to consider this an aggravating factor would amount to "double counting" elements of the offences for which Mr. Taylor was convicted.[164] The Trial Chamber agrees that Mr. Taylor's knowledge of the crimes is an element of his conviction and cannot be considered an aggravating factor.

9439. para. 96: The Prosecution argues that Mr. Taylor's leadership role, as President of Liberia and as a member of the ECOW AS Committee of Five, imbued him with inherent authority, which he abused to "fan the flames of conflict".[165] The Defence contends that this argument fails the pleading requirement and cites jurisprudence which the Trial Chamber has considered in its discussion of Applicable Law.[166] The Trial Chamber notes that the precedents cited state, more broadly than suggested by the Defence, that aggravating circumstances are "those circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged".[167] As the leadership role of Mr. Taylor during the Indictment period is directly related to the commission of the offences with which he was charged, the Trial Chamber has considered this role as an aggravating factor.

9440. para. 97: The Trial Chamber notes that as President of Liberia, Mr. Taylor held a position of public trust, with inherent authority, which he abused in aiding and abetting and planning the commission of the crimes for which he has been convicted. As a Head of State, and as a member of the ECOW AS Committee of Five and later the Committee of Six, Mr. Taylor was part of the process relied on by the international community to bring peace to Sierra Leone. But his actions undermined this process, and rather than promote peace, his role in supporting the military operations of the AFRC/RUF in various ways, including through the supply of arms and ammunition, prolonged the conflict. The lives of many more innocent civilians in Sierra Leone were lost or destroyed as a direct result of his actions. As President and as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of Liberia, Mr. Taylor used his unique position, including his access to state machinery and public resources, to aid and abet the commission of crimes in Sierra Leone, rather than using his power to promote peace and stability in the subregion. The Trial Chamber finds that Mr. Taylor's special status, and his responsibility at the highest level, is an aggravating factor of great weight. There is no relevant sentencing precedent for Heads of State who have been convicted of war crimes and crimes against humanity, but as Mr. Taylor himself told the Trial Chamber "I was President of Liberia.1 was not some petty trader on the streets of Monrovia".[168]

9442. para. 99: The Trial Chamber found that there was a continuous supply by the AFRC/RUF of diamonds mined from areas in Sierra Leone to Mr. Taylor, often in exchange for arms and ammunition. Mr. Taylor repeatedly advised the AFRCIRUF to capture Kono, a diamondiferous area, and to hold Kono and to recapture Kono, so that they would have access to diamonds which they could use to .obtain from and through him the arms and ammunition that were used in military operations to target civilians in a campaign of widespread terror and destruction. Mr. Taylor benefited from this terror and destruction through a steady supply of diamonds from Sierra Leone. His exploitation of the conflict for financial gain is, in the view of the Trial Chamber, an aggravating factor.

9443. para. 100: The Trial Chamber notes that although the law of Sierra Leone provides for the sentencing of an accessory to a crime on the same basis as a principal, the jurisprudence of this Court, as well as the ICTY and ICTR, holds that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that imposed for more direct forms of participation.[169] While generally, the application of this principle would indicate a sentence in this case that is lower than the sentences that have been imposed on the principal perpetrators who have been tried and convicted by this Court, the Trial Chamber considers that the special status of Mr. Taylor as a Head of State puts him in a different category of offenders for the purpose of sentencing.

9444. para. 101: Although Mr. Taylor has been convicted of planning as well as aiding and abetting, his conviction for planning is limited in scope. However, Mr. Taylor was functioning in his own country at the highest level of leadership, which puts him in a class of his own when compared to the principal perpetrators who have been convicted by this Court.

9445. para. 102: Leadership must be carried out by example, by the prosecution of crimes not the commission of crimes. As we enter a new era of accountability, there are no true comparators to which the Trial Chamber can look for precedent in determining an appropriate sentence in this case. However, the Trial Chamber wishes to underscore the gravity it attaches to Mr. Taylor's betrayal of public trust. In the Trial Chamber's view this betrayal outweighs the distinctions that might otherwise pertain to the modes of liability discussed above.

9446. para. 103: Accordingly, the Trial Chamber is of the view that his unique status as Head of State, and the other aggravating factors set forth above, should be reflected in his sentence.

(c) Disposition

2. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, Judgment, 26 September 2013

9447. para. 646: The Trial Chamber sentenced Taylor to a single term of imprisonment of fifty (50) years for all the Counts on which he was found guilty.[1901] Both Parties challenge the Sentence.

(a) The Law of Sentencing

9448. para. 661: The Appeals Chamber has earlier in this Judgment discussed the object and purpose of the Statute and recalls its conclusions regarding Article 6(1).[1934] With respect to the law of sentencing, Article 19(2) of the Statute provides that, in imposing the sentence upon a convicted person, the Trial Chamber "should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person." Article 19 further provides that the Trial Chamber should, as appropriate, also have recourse to the sentencing practices of the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone. Rule 101(B) provides that, in applying Article 19(2) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber shall take into account aggravating and mitigating circumstances when determining the appropriate sentence. The Statute does not establish minimum or maximum sentences of imprisonment in any respect.

9449. para. 662: Applying the Statute and the Rules, the Appeals Chamber has held that sentences must be determined in accordance with the "totality principle":

> A Trial Chamber must ultimately impose a sentence that reflects the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct. This principle, the totality principle, requires that a sentence must reflect the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused, giving due consideration to the particular circumstances of the case and to the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crimes.[1935]

The "totality principle" embodies and gives effect to the mandate of the Court, the object and purpose of the Statute, principles of individual criminal liability and the rights of the accused, as established in the Statute and Rules.

9450. para. 663: The Statute provides for the prosecution and punishment of persons who bear the greatest responsibility and establishes individual criminal liability under Articles 6(1) and 6(3). If the accused's guilt under Article 6 is proved beyond a reasonable doubt for a crime in Articles 2-5 of the Statute and charged in the Indictment, the Trial Chamber must then determine the appropriate sentence reflecting "the inherent gravity of the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct." Consistent with the object and purpose of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber has held that the paramount consideration in sentencing at the Special Court is to impose sentences that reflect the revulsion of mankind, represented by the international community, to the crime and the convicted person's participation in the crime.[1936]

9451. para. 664: As expressed in the totality principle, Article 19(2) and Rule 101(B) establish that in determining an appropriate sentence, the Trial Chamber must consider and weigh all relevant facts,[1937] including the gravity of the offence, the convicted person's criminal conduct and the convicted person's individual circumstances.[1938] This is in accordance with principles of individual criminal liability as established in the Statute and Rules.[1939] An appropriate sentence should reflect the gravity of the crime and its effects, and should also be individualised so as to hold a convicted person responsible for what he himself has done or failed to do.[1940] It should be a sentence that reflects the gravity of the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.[1941] The gravity of the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct, including "the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crimes," must be determined by the particular circumstances of the case: the actual conduct, role and mental state of the convicted person as proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

9452. para. 665: The Appeals Chamber recalls that in determining matters of guilt and punishment, the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber must be guided by the interest of justice and the rights of the accused, and avoid formulaic analysis that is not faithful to the whole of the circumstances and the facts of individual cases.[1942] Trial Chambers have wide discretion as to the particular methodology they adopt.[1943] What is critical is that the Trial Chamber considered all facts relevant to determining the gravity of the offence and the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct, and did not allow the same factor to detrimentally influence the convicted person's sentence twice.[1944]

9453. para. 666: In the Appeals Chamber's view, the Trial Chamber's holding that aiding and abetting generally warrants a lesser sentence than other forms of participation is not consistent with the Statute, the Rules and this Appeals Chamber's holdings.[1945] First, the plain language of Article 6(1) of the Statute clearly does not refer to or establish a hierarchy of any kind.[1946] Second, a hierarchy of gravity among forms of criminal participation in Article 6(1) is contrary to the essential requirement of individualisation that derives from the mandate of the Court, principles of individual criminal liability and the rights of the accused. Presumptions regarding the gravity of forms of participation in the abstract preclude an individualised assessment of the convicted person's actual conduct and may result in an unjust sentence that may be either overly punitive or overly lenient. Third, the totality principle requires an individualised assessment of the total gravity of the convicted person's conduct and individual circumstances. A general presumption for sentencing purposes expressed in terms of forms of participation is thus both unnecessary and unhelpful: unnecessary because the totality principle already provides that the sentence must reflect the gravity of the convicted person's actual conduct; and unhelpful because it either improperly directs the trier of fact's attention to forms of participation in the abstract rather than actual conduct, or is a vague and extraneous statement devoid of legal meaning.

9454. para. 667: The Appeals Chamber has considered the ICTY/ICTR jurisprudence cited by the Defence and adopted by the Trial Chamber,[1947] which is based on the holding of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Vasiljević.[1948] This Appeals Chamber does not consider that holding persuasive. A number of the national laws relied on in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgment do not support the principle that aiding and abetting as a form of criminal participation warrants a lesser punishment, but only establish that an accused's minor participation in the commission of the crime may be a mitigating circumstance.[1949] For example, United States federal criminal law specifically provides that "[w]hoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal.[1950] Likewise, the Austrian Penal Code is consistent with the approach that the sentence is determined based on the accused's individual conduct, not the form of participation.[1951] Similar provisions can be found in a number of other civil law jurisdictions, including Brazil,[1952] Costa Rica,[1953] Puerto Rico,[1954] France[1955] and Italy.[1956] It is unclear from its reasoning whether the ICTY Appeals Chamber presumed that aiding and abetting liability constitutes minor participation in the commission of a crime, or if its holding was only limited to the facts of the case before it and was not a statement of general principle. This Appeals Chamber notes that the Vasiljević Appeals Chamber did not declare its holding reflective of customary international law, nor did it pronounce it a general principle of law.

9455. para. 668: The Appeals Chamber notes that Sierra Leonean law provides that there is no distinction between principal and accessory liability for sentencing purposes.[1957] The Defence submits that the Trial Chamber erred in referring to this law. The Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber only noted this law and did not apply it. The Appeals Chamber, moreover, does not agree that the Trial Chamber would have erred had it applied it. The Appeals Chamber's holding in Fofana and Kondewa addressed sentencing considerations for the gravity of the crime, not the form of participation which constitute the convicted person's criminal conduct.[1958] With respect to the convicted person's participation in the crime, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is appropriate to have recourse to Sierra Leonean law. In this respect, Sierra Leonean law and the jurisprudence of this Court regarding the punishment of convicted persons are consistent.

9456. para. 669: The Post-Second World War caselaw further illustrates that sentencing for international crimes has historically relied on the totality principle, and that there is no hierarchy or distinction for sentencing purposes between forms of criminal participation established in customary international law.[1959] The tribunals sentenced aiders and abettors to the most severe punishment where warranted, and did not distinguish between forms of criminal participation in the abstract in relation to sentencing, but looked rather to the gravity of the offence, the convicted person's actual conduct and the convicted person's individual circumstances.[1960] The Appeals Chamber does not accept the argument that variations in domestic law,[1961] applicable to domestic crimes, establish contrary state practice relevant to sentencing for international crimes.[1962] Accused persons are presumed to be aware that under customary international law, the most serious violations of international humanitarian law are punishable by the most severe of penalties,[1963] with sentences determined on the basis of the gravity of the offence and the totality of their culpable conduct, without regard to the provisions of domestic law or established sentencing tariffs.[1964]

(i) Conclusion

9457. para. 670: In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber holds that the totality principle exhaustively describes the criteria for determining an appropriate sentence that is in accordance with the Statute and Rules, and further holds that under the Statute, Rules and customary international law, there is no hierarchy or distinction for sentencing purposes between forms of criminal participation. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber erred in law by holding that aiding and abetting liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than other forms of criminal participation.

9458. para. 671: In regard to Ground 43, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err by noting the law of Sierra Leone on sentencing practice. Accordingly, Defence Ground 43 is dismissed in its entirety.

(b) Alleged Lack of Notice of Aggravating Factors

9459. para. 674: Every accused person has the right to be heard under Article 17(2) of the Statute, which provides that "the accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to measures ordered by the Special Court for the Protection of victims and witnesses."[1970] Rule 100(A) and (B) provide that the Parties shall submit any relevant information in writing,[1971] and make oral submissions at a sentencing hearing that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence.[1972] The Parties filed their Sentencing Briefs on 3 and 10 May 2012, and the Trial Chamber heard oral arguments at a Sentencing Hearing on 16 May 2012. The Trial Chamber further accorded Taylor the opportunity to address the Court personally during the Sentencing Hearing, which he did for thirty minutes.[1973] The Appeals Chamber finds that the Defence was provided a full opportunity to be heard.

9460. para. 675: It is well-established that Trial Chambers have considerable discretion in identifying and then weighing facts due to their obligation to individualise the penalty when determining an appropriate sentence.[1974] The Appeals Chamber holds that a Trial Chamber is not limited to considering factors identified by the Parties in their sentencing submissions. The Parties' submissions may be of assistance, but the Trial Chamber is ultimately responsible for identifying and weighing relevant facts from the entire evidentiary record, of which the convicted person has notice. In the instant case, the Prosecution and Defence made written and oral submissions. The Trial Chamber had the assistance of those submissions, but was not limited to the facts raised in them. The Trial Chamber identified facts it considered relevant to its sentencing decision based on the entire evidentiary record of the trial. The Appeals Chamber sees no error.

9461. para. 676: Defence Ground 44 is dismissed in its entirety.

(c) Aggravating Factors

(i) Extraterritoriality of Taylor's Acts

9462. para. 682: The Appeals Chamber notes that in assessing the ―gravity of the offence as part of its determination of the appropriate sentence, the Trial Chamber took into account the consequences of the crimes on the immediate victims, the relatives of the victims and/or the broader targeted group.[2000] In assessing additional facts, the Trial Chamber further took into account the extraterritorial nature and consequences of Taylor's acts and conduct.

9463. para. 683: The Appeals Chamber considers that it was unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to refer to public international law in order to take into consideration the extraterritorial nature and consequences of Taylor's acts and conduct. The Appeals Chamber accepts the Trial Chamber's finding that the extraterritorial nature and consequences of Taylor's acts and conduct are directly related to Taylor and the gravity of his culpable conduct, justifying holding him responsible.[2001] As the Trial Chamber found, before the invasion of Sierra Leone in March 1991, Taylor publicly threatened on the radio that "Sierra Leone would taste the bitterness of war"[2002] because it was supporting ECOMOG operations in Liberia impacting Taylor's NPFL forces.[2003] That Taylor's acts and conduct throughout the Indictment Period "left a heavy footprint" in Sierra Leone and had extraterritorial consequences is confirmed by the United Nations Security Council's determination in October 1997 that "the situation in Sierra Leone constitutes a threat to international peace and security in the region."[2004] Taylor's acts and conduct did not only harm the victims of the crimes and their immediate relatives, but fuelled a conflict that became a threat to international peace and security in the West African sub-region. The Appeals Chamber concludes that it was proper for the Trial Chamber to consider the extraterritorial nature and consequences of Taylor's acts and conduct in assessing the gravity of the totality of his culpable conduct.

(ii) Breach of Trust

9464. para. 684: Immediately after he was elected President of Liberia in August 1997, Taylor was appointed to the ECOWAS Committee of Five, which was established to help restore peace to Sierra Leone.[2005] The members of the Committee decided to put Taylor ―in the front line‖ of their peace mandate, because of his experience in dealing with insurgency groups and also because Sierra Leone and Liberia shared a common border.[2006] Taylor admitted in his testimony that he got involved in the Committee of Five because:

> it became a duty and a responsibility to help in whatever way that I could to help end this conflict in Sierra Leone, because unless it ended, Liberia would never move. That's why I got involved.[2007]

On becoming a member of the Committee of Five, Taylor understood that he had assumed a responsibility towards the Sierra Leonean people to assist in ending the civil conflict. He was also relied on by the international community to help bring peace to Sierra Leone. Yet, rather than end the civil war in Sierra Leone, as he had undertaken to do, he helped to fuel it in various ways, including, inter alia: (i) while he was participating in ECOWAS efforts to promote peace in Sierra Leone, Taylor continued to provide arms and ammunition to the RUF/AFRC[2008] in exchange for diamonds;[2009] (ii) Taylor ―was engaged in arms transactions at the same time that he was involved in the peace negotiations in Lomé, publicly promoting peace at the Lomé negotiations, while privately providing arms and ammunition to the RUF/AFRC;[2010] and (iii) from the time Issa Sesay assumed leadership of the RUF, Taylor began advising him not to disarm, even though Issa Sesay himself was enthusiastic about disarmament at that time.[2011] In light of its findings of fact, the Trial Chamber found that Taylor's abuse of the trust of the Sierra Leonean people and the international community was a personal characteristic increasing the gravity of his culpable conduct.

9465. para. 685: The Appeals Chamber does not accept the Defence submission that Taylor did not have a position of public trust and authority in relation to the people of Sierra Leone. Taylor himself admitted that he did, and that the people of Sierra Leone and the international community trusted him to encourage the RUF/AFRC to participate in peace negotiations and accept a peaceful resolution of the conflict. The Appeals Chamber considers that in this case breach of trust concerns matters of fact, not legal duties.[2012] The Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber was not required to identify an enforceable legal duty in order to recognise that in fact the international community and Sierra Leoneans placed their trust in Taylor to help end the conflict. The Appeals Chamber further accepts the Trial Chamber's findings that Taylor publicly purported to accept that trust and work in the interest of peace, while he in reality abused that trust by aiding and abetting the widespread and systematic commission of crimes against the civilian population of Sierra Leone throughout the Indictment Period and planning the attack on Freetown. The Appeals Chamber thus concludes that the Trial Chamber reasonably and properly considered Taylor's abuse of trust in assessing the gravity of the totality of his culpable conduct.

(iii) Double-Counting

9466. para. 686: The Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber must ensure that it does not allow the same factor to detrimentally influence the convicted person's sentence twice.[2013] An appellant bears the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber impermissibly double-counted the factor at issue.[2014]

9467. para. 687: The Appeals Chamber does not accept the Defence submission that the Trial Chamber impermissibly double-counted Taylor's role as Head of State. Taylor's position as Head of State was multifaceted, involving distinct aspects including his leadership role, his further role as a direct participant in the peace process in a position of public trust and his special status as a Head of State who aided and abetted and planned the commission of crimes. The Appeals Chamber concludes that it was proper for the Trial Chamber to consider the different aspects of Taylor's acts and conduct in assessing the gravity of the totality of Taylor's culpable conduct, and that the Trial Chamber did not impermissibly double-count the same factor.

9468. para. 688: The Appeals Chamber concludes, therefore, that the Defence does not demonstrate an error in the Trial Chamber's identification and assessment of facts relevant to the totality of Taylor's culpable conduct.

(d) Mitigating Factors

9469. para. 694: The Defence misapprehends the Appeals Chamber's holding in Sesay et al. In that Judgment, the Appeals Chamber noted that it is common practice that convicted persons from international criminal tribunals serve their sentences in foreign countries, and that there is no jurisprudence that such circumstances qualify as a mitigating factor.[2029] The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber did not abuse its discretion in considering that serving a sentence in a foreign country is not a fact in mitigation.

9470. para. 695: The Appeals Chamber further holds that in order for remorse to be considered as a mitigating factor, it must be real and sincere.[2030] A Trial Chamber is not required to find that every acknowledgement that crimes were committed or expression of sympathy for the victims establishes real and sincere remorse constituting a fact in mitigation.[2031] It is always within the Trial Chamber's discretion to determine whether or not real and sincere remorse is demonstrated, including when the convicted person does not accept responsibility for the crimes.[2032] In the instant case, the Trial Chamber acknowledged that Taylor accepted that crimes were committed in Sierra Leone, but did not find that he demonstrated real and sincere remorse meriting recognition for sentencing purposes.[2033] The Appeals Chamber accepts the Trial Chamber's finding as a proper exercise of its discretion.

9471. para. 696: The Appeals Chamber rejects the Defence submission in Ground 42 that serving a sentence abroad is a fact in mitigation. The Appeals Chamber affirms the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Taylor did not demonstrate real and sincere remorse warranting recognition in mitigation. Defence Ground 45 is dismissed in its entirety.

(e) Alleged Errors in the Exercise of Discretion

(i) The Sentencing Practice of the Special Court

9472. para. 705: In accordance with the totality principle, a Trial Chamber is required to impose a sentence reflecting the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused.[2057] The totality principle requires an individualised assessment of the particular circumstances of the case. As such, any attempt to compare an accused's case with others that have already been the subject of final determination is of limited assistance in challenging a sentence.[2058] As the Appeals Chamber held in Sesay et al.:

> The relevance of previous sentences is however often limited as a number of elements relating inter alia to the number, type and gravity of the crimes committed, the personal circumstances of the convicted person and the presence of mitigating and aggravating circumstances, dictate different results in different cases such that it is frequently impossible to transpose the sentence in one case mutatis mutandis to another. This follows from the principle that the determination of the sentence involves the individualisation of the sentence so as to appropriately reflect the particular facts of the case and the circumstances of the convicted person.[2059]

9473. para. 706: In the instant case, the Trial Chamber properly referred to the gravity of the crimes for which Taylor was convicted and considered his role in their commission. Further, the Trial Chamber compared the circumstances of Taylor's case to other cases that have been determined by this Court. It noted that Taylor's status as a Head of State puts him in a different category of offenders, stating that "there are no true comparators to which [it] can look for precedent in determining an appropriate sentence in this case."[2060] In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Defence fails to demonstrate any discernible error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion in sentencing.

(ii) The Totality of Taylor's Culpable Conduct

9474. para. 707: The Appeals Chamber recalls its conclusion that the Trial Chamber erred in law by holding that aiding and abetting liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than other forms of criminal participation.[2061] The Appeals Chamber has further rejected the Parties' other challenges to the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber. The remaining issues are first, whether, as the Prosecution submits, the Trial Chamber's error of law sufficiently impacted its determination of the appropriate sentence as to result in a discernable error, and second, whether the Prosecution has otherwise demonstrated that the Trial Chamber failed to exercise its discretion properly in determining the sentence. The Appeals Chamber also recalls that it has revised Taylor's conviction for planning crimes.[2062]

9475. para. 708: Defence Ground 42 is dismissed in its entirety. Prosecution Ground 4 is dismissed in its entirety. In light of the above considerations, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber is fair and reasonable in light of the totality of the circumstances.

(f) Disposition

For the foregoing reasons, THE APPEALS CHAMBER

PURSUANT to Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 106 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;

NOTING the written submissions of the Parties and their oral arguments presented at the hearings on 22 and 23 January 2013;

SITTING in open session;

UNANIMOUSLY;

WITH RESPECT TO THE DEFENCE'S GROUNDS OF APPEAL;

NOTES that Ground 35 has been withdrawn;

ALLOWS Ground 11, in part, REVISES the Trial Chamber's Disposition for planning liability under Article 6(1) of the Statute by deleting Kono District under Counts 1-8 and 11, and DISMISSES the remainder of the Ground;

DISMISSES the remaining Grounds of Appeal;

WITH RESPECT TO THE PROSECUTION'S GROUNDS OF APPEAL;

ALLOWS Ground 4, in part, HOLDS that the Trial Chamber erred in law in finding that aiding and abetting liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than other forms of criminal participation, and DISMISSES the remainder of the Ground;

DISMISSES the remaining Grounds of Appeal;

AFFIRMS the sentence of fifty (50) years imprisonment imposed by the Trial Chamber;

ORDERS that this Judgment shall be enforced immediately pursuant to Rule 119 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;

ORDERS, in accordance with Rule 109 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, that Charles Ghankay Taylor remains in the custody of the Special Court for Sierra Leone pending the finalization of arrangements to serve his sentence.

B. RUF

1. Sentencing Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-T, Sentencing Judgement, 8 April 2009

(a) Convictions and Form of Liability

(i) Sesay

9476. para. 3: Issa Hassan Sesay was found guilty of the crimes, set out below, by participating in a joint criminal enterprise, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute:

9483. para. 10: Additionally, Augustine Gbao was found guilty, pursuant to Anicle 6(1) of the Statute, in relation to events in Bombali District of aiding and abetting attacks on peacekeepers, an other serious violation of International Humanitarian Law, punishable under Article 4(b) of the Statute (Count 15).

(b) Applicable Law

9484. Applicable provisions para. 11: Article 19 of the Statute and Rules 100 and 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules") provide as follows:

> Article 19- Penalties
>
> 1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate , have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national Courts of Sierra Leone.
>
> 2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.
>
> Rule 100 - Sentencing Procedure
>
> (A) If the Trial Chamber convicts the accused or the accused enters a guilty plea, the Prosecutor shall submit any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence no more than 7 days after such conviction or guilty plea. The defendant shall thereafter, but no more than 7 days after the prosecutor's filing submit any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence
>
> (B) Where the accused has entered a guilty plea, the Trial Chamber shall hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing. Where the accused has been convicted by a Trial Chamber, the Trial Chamber may hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing.
>
> (C) The sentence shall be pronounced in a judgement in public and in the presence of the convicted person, subject to Rule 102(8).
>
> Rule 101 - Penalties
>
> (A) A person convicted by the Special Court, other than a juvenile offender, may be sentenced to imprisonment for a specific number of years.
>
> (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:
>
> (i) Any aggravating circumstances;
>
> (ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;
> (iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9(3) of the Statute

(C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

(D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

(i) Sentencing objectives

9485. para. 12: It is settled law that the goals and objectives of sentencing in the sphere of international criminal law derive essentially from the doctrines underlying penal sanctions in the domestic or national law setting.

9486. para. 13: The SCSL Appeals Chamber has stated that, in relation to legitimate sentencing purposes, "[t]he primary objectives must be retribution and deterrence."[3] The ICTY Appeals Chamber has further stated that "[i]t is well established that, at the [ICTY] and at the ICTR, retribution and deterrence are the main objectives in sentencing."[4] In its simplest formulation, retribution implies that punishment must be proportionate to guilt and the gravity of the offence.[5] Elsewhere it has been stated that "[t]his is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge but as duly expressing the outrage of the international community at these crimes."[6] Deterrence is both general, referring to the notion that a convicted person who is punished can serve as an example to others, who will then desist from committing or will be unlikely to commit the said crimes for fear of being punished, and also specific deterrence or incapacitation, which describes the objective of preventing future criminal conduct by restraining or incapacitating convicted persons.

9487. para. 14: Other sentencing objectives recognised under international criminal law are (i) prevention; (ii) rehabilitation; and, (iii) stigmatisation.[7]

9488. para. 15: In relation to the commission of international crimes, it such as crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, is our opinion that the punishment of the offender must also adequately reflect the revulsion of the international community to such conduct, and denounce it as unacceptable. The Chamber endorses the following rationale:

> One of the main purposes of a sentence imposed by an international Tribunal is to influence the legal awareness of the accused, the surviving victims, their relatives, the witnesses and the general public in order to reassure them that the legal system is implemented and enforced. Additionally, the process of sentencing is intended to convey the message that globally accepted laws and rules have to be accepted by everyone.[8]

9489. para. 16: Rehabilitation as a goal of punishment means the restoration of the convicted person to a state of physical, mental and moral health through treatment and education, so that he can become a useful and productive member of society.[9] However, the Chamber recognises that despite its importance as an objective of punishment, rehabilitation is more relevant in the context of domestic criminality than international criminality.

(ii) Sentencing factors

9490. para. 17: The Chamber notes that Article 19 and Rule 101(B) stipulate that certain factors have to be considered in determining an appropriate sentence. These include the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the Accused, any aggravating and mitigating factors, and where appropriate, the general sentencing practices of the ICTR and of the national courts of Sierra Leone.

9491. para. 18: In this regard the Chamber recognises that it is necessary to impose a sentence which reflects the totality of the convicted person's criminal conduct.[10] Furthermore we note that it is universally recognised and accepted that a person who has been convicted of many crimes should generally receive a higher sentence than a person convicted of only one of those crimes.[11] By parity of reasoning, the Chamber acknowledges that the sentence should be individualised and also proportionate to the conduct of the Accused,[12] reflecting the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the convicted person, taking into consideration the particular circumstances of the case and the form and degree of the participation of the accused.[13] Within these parameters, and provided that the factors which have been considered are made clear, a Trial Chamber has a broad discretion to choose between the imposition of either a single "global" sentence or separate sentences for each count on which the Accused was found guilty.[14] After having carefully considered the issue, the Chamber deems it more appropriate to address each count separately. Where the Chamber so exercises its discretion to impose separate sentences, it must indicate whether those sentences should be served concurrently or consecutively.[15]

a. Gravity of the offence

9492. para. 19: The Chamber acknowledges that Article 19(1) of the Statute imposes the obligation, when determining an appropriate sentence, to take into account the "gravity of the offence." It has been held that the gravity of the offence is the "litmus test for the appropriate sentence",[16] and that it requires a "consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of participation of the Accused in the crime".[17] In assessing the gravity of the offence, the Chamber has taken into account such factors as:

i) the scale and brutality of the offences committed;[18]

ii) the role played by the Accused in their commission;[19]

iii) the degree of suffering or impact of the crime on the immediate victim, as well as its effect on relatives of the victim;[20] and,

iv) the vulnerability and number of victims.[21]

9493. para. 20: Furthermore, in determining the role of the Accused in the crime, the Chamber may take into account the mode of liability under which the Accused was convicted, as well as the nature and degree of his participation in the commission of the offence. The Chamber may also consider whether the Accused was held liable as an indirect or a secondary perpetrator.[22] In this respect, we have found that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that imposed for a more direct form of participation.[23]

9494. para. 21: The Chamber acknowledges that it is also settled law that in assessing the gravity of the offences for which the Accused was convicted as a superior, it should consider the gravity of the underlying offence and the gravity of the conduct of the Accused in failing to prevent or punish the crimes committed by his subordinates.[24]

9495. para. 22: We also endorse the view that where the Accused has been convicted as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise, the level of contribution as well as the category of joint criminal enterprise under which responsibility attaches are to be considered in assessing the appropriate sentence.[25] As stated in Brdjanin, the doctrine of joint criminal enterprise:

> […] offers no formal distinctions between JCE members who make overwhelmingly large contributions and JCE members whose contributions, though significant, are not as great. However, the Appeals Chambers recalls that any such disparity is adequately dealt with at the sentencing stage.[26]

9496. para. 23: The Chamber is cognisant of the impermissibility of "double-counting", meaning that the factors considered in assessing the gravity of the offence, cannot be used or considered as aggravating circumstances.[27] The Appeals Chamber has however endorsed the view that there is no double-counting merely because a Trial Chamber considers the impact of the crimes on the victim in one section and the vulnerability of the victims in the other section.[28] In this regard, this Chamber takes the view that factors which it considers and accepts as lessening the gravity of the offence, cannot be taken into account as mitigating circumstances.

9497. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 6: The Chamber has been cautious to reiterate its adherence to the Rule against "Double Counting" which could, if contravened, prejudice, or violate the rights of the Accused.

9499. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 8: In principle and in Common Law driven judiciaries, the gravity or seriousness of the offence is properly distinguished by a categorization of offences, generally into 4 broad categories namely: Felonies, Misdemeanors, Simple Offences and lastly, Contraventions, in that order of their importance, and I would say, in that order of their gravity.

9500. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 9: What is also prevalent in these systems is that even within the confines of the categories, in any system the gravity of felonious is measured by the penalty that is, of life imprisonment as is the case with some International Criminal Tribunals, and in some cases within those systems, with the death penalty which is quite apart and different from some other felonies of lesser gravity that are characterised by sentences which are statutorily fixed within a discretionary range and whose minimum and maximum at times vary.

9501. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 10: In Sierra Leone, offences are classified as Treasons, Felonies and misdemeanors,[3] the sentences attached to them creating the main distinction as to their gravity.

9502. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 11: As I have already mentioned, all offences such as those that feature in the Statutes of International Criminal Tribunals, by their very nature, enjoy the same status in terms of the possible term of imprisonment to be meted out upon a conviction, a fortiori, in terms of their gravity.

9503. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 12: Notwithstanding this Statutory equality in status and in gravity that is attributed to these offences however, an examination of Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Statute of the Special Court and the offences provided for and defined therein, makes it evident that some of these offences do not, in reality, carry the same status nor do they highlight the same characteristics of seriousness in terms of gravity particularly when one looks at of high profile offences such as murder, extermination, abduction, killing and mistreatment of U.N. Peacekeepers, Torture, rape, sexual slavery or other sexually related offences or inhumane acts provided for in Article 2 of the Statute; or those provided for in Articles 3 such as violence to life, health and physical or mental well being in particular, murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment, acts of terrorism, to mention just these, as compared to other with a relatively low profile like pillage, Persecution on political, rational, ethnic or religious grounds and threats to commit any of the foregoing acts.

9504. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 13: In fact the provision in Article 18 (2) of the Statute that the sentence should reflect the gravity of the offence is in itself a recognition of the fact that all the offences defined in to Statute do not enjoy the same status in terms of gravity, and that it is left to the Judges for purposes of sentences to determined this element having regard to the nature of the offence and the circumstances surrounding its commission.

9506. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 15: In considering what I term the" basic" and "aggravated" forms of offences, it is pertinent to observe and to state that the role of legislator of Penal instruments and Statutes is to define and spelt out conduct which is considered to be dangerous and disruptive of social harmony, peace, cohesion, and human and proprietary rights with a view to proscribing them by envisaging penalties in various forms and scales of imprisonment or fines or both, for the offenders.

9507. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 16: In this process, crimes generally are categorized on the scale of their gravity, all of them sharing the common characteristic of prescribing a sanction.

9508. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 17: In any opinion, what is legislated upon in Criminal Codes, in Penal Codes, in Statutes or other Instruments regulating criminal conduct which defines criminal offences their ingredients and their penalties is the "basic form" of the offences provided for and defined therein. It is in this form that the category and gravity of the offence is determined.

9509. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 18: In International Criminal Tribunals for instance, and particularly the Special Court for Sierra Leone, all the crimes that are stipulated in the Statute are spelt out but not defined in terms of specifying their constitutive elements or ingredients in their basic form. However, the penalty of 'imprisonment for a specified number of years' as provided for in the Article 19(1) of the Statute is already indicative of the high profiled nature and gravity of those offences should any Accused such as the 3 before us, be found guilty of them'.

9510. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 19: Even though Article 19 (2) provides that in imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take in to account, such factors as the gravity of the offences and the individual circumstances of the convicted person, I am by the opinion that a finding of guilt for any of the offences defined in the Statute and for which the Accused has been indicted, is already indicative of the fact that he has been found guilty, not just for an ordinary offence, but, indeed for one which is viewed with extreme gravity because it attracts an incarceration for a considerable and an unspecified number of years.

9511. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 20: What is true however, is that the legislator of penal Statute, like those of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, gives to the Trial Chamber, some wriggling room to determine the sentence to be imposed, due consideration being given, as is stated in the Statute to the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person and I would add, the constitutive elements of the offence whose ingredients are defined by the Chamber in its judgment on the subject of the "Law on the Crimes Charged" and as has been held by other ad hoc International Tribunals whose practices, Article 19(2) of the Statute recommends that we have recourse to 'where appropriate'.

9512. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 21: In its delineation of the general requirements and the ingredients of the offence charged in order to base and define the crimes enumerated in the Statute, the Chamber has, highlighted all the factors that enable it to determine the liability or not, of the Accused. Some of these elements, I would observe, are clearly very indicative of the gravity of the offences charged and for which the Accused Persons have been found guilty.

9513. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 22: In these circumstances, and as we have opined following the Blaskic precedent, if a particular circumstance is an element of the underlying offence, it cannot and in fact should not be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[4]

9514. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 23: It is therefore my considered opinion, as we have already indicated in the Judgment, that the gravity of the offence, in our analysis of what may be considered as a constitutive element of the offence cannot, under the risk of violating the principle of 'Double Counting' or indeed, the Rule against 'Double Jeopardy', also be considered under the rubric of the gravity of the offence as provided for under the provisions of Article 19 (2) of the Statute.

9515. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 38: What I say here is that there is no doubt that besides what is proven in terms of the required elements of each of these offences which I have characterised as constitutive, elements of considerable gravity in their "basic form", there are some other acts which the Accused person committed in addition to, and beyond those envisaged in the basic form as defined in the "Law Applicable on the Crimes Charged". In such a case, it cannot be contested that these acts which are committed in addition to and beyond those required to establish the basic constitutive elements of the 'basic offence', give the offence another grave indeed, a graver dimension.

9516. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 39: For instance, there is no offence known as gang rape. In this context, gang rape is not an ingredient to be proven in establishing the constitutive elements of the basic offence of rape as defined by the Chamber. In a case therefore against the Accused person for rape, it is not necessary for the Prosecution to prove the fact of a commission of the offence of rape by a gangraping team to establish the ordinary elements of the 'basic offence' of rape as defined by the Chamber in the judgment.[11]

9517. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 40: However, if the Prosecution in establishing the basic form of rape, also elicits, as it has done in some instances in this case, evidence of gang raping, this should, in my view, be considered more as an aggravating factor even though I concede that it could also logically constitute an additional element which certainly enhances the basic offence and thereby impacts on the process of determining the gravity of the offence as required by Article 19 (2) of the Statute of the Special Court.

conduct and the aggravating circumstances in making the determination on which of them should apply and to which situation. This, to my mind should have been avoided in our analysis on the gravity of the offences on the one hand and on the aggravating circumstances of the offences as we appear to have done in this Decision. I say this because the raison d'etre of the rule against 'double counting' is to shield the convicted person from incurring a severer sentence than is ordinarily necessary and further, to rescue him from the hazards of the double jeopardy rule for the same offence and in relation to the same conviction.

9519. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 42: Even though the Statute, in its Article 19 (2), mandates the Chamber to take in to account, the gravity of the offence in determining a sentence, it is my considered opinion, as I have already stated, that all the offences provided for therein, in their very basic form, are offences of extreme gravity particularly given their constitutive elements and as they are defined and set out by the Chamber in the 'Law applicable to the crimes charged".

9520. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 43: For instance the offence of murder as a crime against humanity is stipulated in Article 2 of the Statute. The general requirements, which reveal the gravity and indeed seriousness of the office, are that there must be an attack and that it must be widespread or systematic and directed against any civilian population. The term widespread, this Chamber has held, refers to the large scale nature of the attack and the number of victims.[13] This obviously, and without more, in my opinion, denotes the gravity of such an offence, particularly where such attacks, as we have found proven, were systematic in terms of the organized nature of the acts of violence and the improbability of their random occurrence.[14]

9521. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 44: The trend of our analysis is the same for the other offences on this same chapter on the "Gravity of Offences" in relation to Sexual Crimes, Physical Violence, (counts 1-2 and 10-11), Enslavement, (Counts 1 and 13), Pillage and Burning crimes (Counts 1-2 and Count 14), Use of Child Soldiers (Counts 12) Crimes against UNAMSIL Personnel (Counts 15 and 18).

9525. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 48: In the definition of an offence in the creating Statute, it can also take an aggravated dimension in its "basic form" and definition. For instance, ordinary theft in the creating Statute which has a lesser gravity and of course a maximum penalty of 10 years cannot be compared to the offence in its basic form of aggravated theft which is punishable with the death penalty.[15]

9526. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 49: In its ordinary basic form, an offence such as rape can assume aggravating proportions even if this were not envisioned by its definition in the creating Statute. In this regard, and as I have already opined, the Prosecution does not need to prove the aggravating gang-raping element to establish the offence of Rape as a Crime against Humanity. The Prosecution can however, adduce evidence of gang-raping in order to establish the ordinary and basic offence of Rape as defined in the Statute. Where this is done it is my view that it enhances the gravity of the offence of rape and to my mind and considered opinion, only for purposes of a finding of aggravating circumstances with a view to securing a higher sentence.

b. Aggravating factors

9527. para. 24: The Chamber opines that it is an accepted practice that aggravating factors should be established by the Prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt[29] and that only circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged, and for which the Accused has been convicted, can be considered to be aggravating.[30] Hence, when a particular circumstance is an element of the underlying offence, it cannot be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[31]

9528. para. 25: The Chamber acknowledges that the Statute and the Rules do not provide an exhaustive enumeration of the circumstances that the Trial Chamber may consider to be aggravating. Based on the established jurisprudence, factors considered as aggravating in other international criminal jurisdictions, however, include the leadership role of the Accused,[32] premeditation and motive,[33] a willing and enthusiastic participation in the crime,[34] the length of time during which the crime was committed,[35] the location of the attacks – attacks committed in traditional places of civilian sanctuary such as churches, mosques, schools and hospitals being generally considered as more serious,[36] sadism and a desire for revenge,[37] abuse of trust or official capacity,[38] "total disregard for the sanctity of human life and dignity." The Chamber takes the view that deceptive behaviour such as luring others into a false sense of security through fraudulent offers to discuss or negotiate and subsequently taking advantage of the others revealed weakness may also amount to aggravating circumstances. The Prosecution submitted that bad behaviour of an accused during trial might constitute and aggravating factor, however the Chamber does not accept that argument.

9529. para. 26: Furthermore, the Chamber opines that the position of leadership of an Accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute, may constitute an aggravating circumstance.[39] However, it has been held that if an Accused has been found liable under Article 6(3), his leadership position cannot be considered by the Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is in itself a constitutive element of the offence.[40] It has also been held that where the Accused has actively abused his position of command or participated in the crimes of his subordinates, however, such conduct can be considered to be aggravating.[41]

c. Mitigating factors

9530. para. 27: The Chamber recalls that neither the Statute nor the Rules exhaustively define the factors that may be considered to be mitigating. As a consequence, we opine that the category of mitigating circumstances is not closed. Accordingly, "what constitutes a mitigating factor is a matter for the Trial Chamber to determine in the exercise of its discretion."[42]

9531. para. 28: It has been held that the burden of proof on the Accused with regard to mitigating circumstances is that of a balance of probabilities, meaning that it is more probable than not that the circumstances in question did exist. Therefore, it is a much lower burden of proof than that required by the Prosecution.[43] Unlike aggravating factors, mitigating factors may be taken into account regardless of whether or not they are directly related to the alleged offence.[44]

9532. para. 29: However, the Chamber notes that under Rule 101(B), it is mandatory to consider as a mitigating circumstance the substantial cooperation of the Accused with the Prosecutor.

Further, the Chamber has the discretion to consider other factors or circumstances in mitigation, such as:

i) the expression of remorse or acknowledgement of responsibility;[45]

ii) lack of education or training;[46]

iii) good character with no prior convictions;[47]

iv) personal and family circumstances;[48]

v) behaviour and conduct subsequent to the conflict, particularly with respect to promoting peace and reconciliation;[49]

vi) good behaviour in detention;[50] and,

vii) assistance to detainees or victims.[51]

9533. para. 30: The Chamber may also consider the motive of the Accused in either aggravation or mitigation of sentence. However, whilst "motive may shade the individual perception of culpability, it does not amount to a legal excuse for criminal conduct".[52] In addition, "allowing mitigation for a convicted person's political motives, even where they are considered by the Chamber to be meritorious, undermines the purposes of sentencing rather than promotes them".[53]

(iii) Sentencing practice of other tribunals and courts

9534. para. 31: Article 19(1) empowers the Chamber to consider as appropriate the practice regarding sentencing at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("ICTR"). The Chamber also considers as appropriate the jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY"), which shares a common Appeals Chamber with the ICTR, to be instructive, and has also considered this as appropriate. The Chamber has also considered the sentencing practice of this court, to the limited extent possible.

9535. para. 32: Article 19(1) authorises the Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean domestic courts. However, as none of the Accused was charged for offences under Sierra Leonean law, the Chamber deems it unnecessary to make this enquiry.[54]

(c) Gravity of Offences

9536. General comments para. 103: We consider that some factors and considerations may overlap in the analysis. It is been held in the ICTY that:

> The Appeals Chamber is of the view that, while a Trial Chamber should strive to distinguish between the gravity of the criminal conduct and the aggravating circumstances, it might be difficult or artificial to separate the two in some cases. For instance, in the present case, Krajisnik's contribution to the JCE is precisely his abuse of powers and public positions; this element arguably concerns both the 'gravity of the criminal conduct' and the 'aggravating circumstances'. What is important is to avoid double counting (i.e. no factor should be taken into account twice in sentencing);[192]
> Where a factor could equally be considered under either the "gravity of the criminal conduct" or under aggravating circumstances, the Chamber has opted to consider it under the former.

9537. para. 104: The Chamber recalls its findings that Sesay, Kallon and Gbao, Justice Boutet dissenting in relation to the finding on Gbao, have been found guilty of a high number of crimes against humanity and war crimes. The Chamber also observes that some of these crimes were particularly heinous and brutal, and were committed over a long period of time and a large geographical area. Much human suffering resulted from the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise, of which we have found all the accused, Justice Boutet dissenting in relation to the finding on Gbao, to be joint participants.

9538. para. 105: We have concluded that the crimes show a systematic targeting of civilians and a wanton disregard for life, property and collective well-being. These crimes were, in many instances, intended to force the civilian population into submission and dissuade them from collaborating with what they considered to be the enemies of the Junta.

9539. para. 106: The Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, is of the view that, where a particular act amounting to criminal conduct within the jurisdiction of the Court, such as murder or rape as a crime against humanity has also, because of the additional element of intent necessary for a conviction for acts of terrorism or collective punishments as a war crime, amounted to a crime as alleged in Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment, for purposes of sentencing we will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

9540. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 30: The second arm of my Dissent is grounded on the other decision which contextually says the following in a number of paragraphs;[9] and I quote:

> Where murder or rape has been found to amount to an act of terrorism or collective punishment, for purposes of sentencing we will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.[10]

9541. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 31: The first comment I would like to make here to support the Dissenting position I have taken is that the indictment on which the Accused Persons have been found guilty comprised 18 counts. It is my view that in law, each of those counts, provided they were not charged in the alternative with another, stands or falls on its own and on the evidence that the prosecution has adduced to prove it.

9542. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 32: If the prosecution succeeds in establishing the guilt of the Accused on all or some of the Counts, it appear to me, legally anomalous, in the sentencing process, to decide or to direct that the gravity of one offence should aggravate or enhance the gravity of the other which stands independently on its own, and this, notwithstanding, as one will expect in a multi-dimensional indictment, that all the offences charged do not have the same status in terms of their gravity, and that the same evidence may overlap or may be adduced to prove more than one of the Counts.

9544. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 34: In my opinion, it is and should be the legal position as well, and I so opine, that what the Chamber Majority Judgment has decided on the process of now making a determination on the sentences to be handed down to the Accused Persons, should have been explained and served or notified to them at the time that they were being served with the Indictment or during the exchange of trial briefs or even in the course of the trial, so as to enable them to plan and pattern their defence strategies accordingly and well in advance.

9545. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 35: This was not done during the opening of these RUF proceedings on the 4th day of July 2004. In was not the case either even as the trial proceeded all along because the Accused Persons have never been informed that if they were convicted of acts of rape and it turned out that the evidence adduced to establish that offence contained elements or ingredients of offences of terrorism or of collective punishments, the gravity of that offence of the rape will be increased, meaning of course, that the sentence for those offences will be higher and severer than they ordinarily would have been, or should be.

9546. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 36: Consequentially and inferentially, therefore, what I read in this is that this Chamber is technically and legally convicting and sentencing the Accused Persons for an unknown and a more serious offence for which they have neither been indicted nor tried, and imposing an arbitrary and imaginary sentence which is not fixed by law, thereby violating the nolle poena sine lege, and at the same time, the nullum crimen sine lege principles.

9547. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 37: Since the Chamber Majority Judgment, in my opinion, seriously undermines and compromises the legal rights of the Accused Persons at this sentencing stage where they come into grips for the first time and are confronted with a novel decision which I respectfully consider prejudicial to their judicial interests, I am constrained to accompany the said Chamber Majority judgment in this regard, with an unfavourable expression of dissent and disapproval.

9548. See above: Sentencing – RUF – Sentencing Judgment – Applicable Law – Sentencing factors – Gravity of the offence – Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe – paras. 6-23, 38 – 49 [9497].

(i) Unlawful killings

a. Nature of the offence

9549. para. 107: The Chamber takes the view that the unlawful killings for which the Accused have been found guilty are of the utmost gravity. For instance, civilians – including babies, children, women and men of all ages – were murdered in diverse brutal ways. Many civilians were targeted on suspicion that they were Kamajors or Kamajor collaborators.[193] The rebels showed a general disregard for civilians. They sometimes dressed in ECOMOG uniforms so as to deceive the civilians.[194] Civilians were shot, beaten to death, burned alive and hacked to death, often indiscriminately and in large numbers.[195]

9550. para. 108: The Chamber also recalls it's finding that in Penduma, Staff Alhaji allowed the killing of the wife of TF1-217, after he organised, supervised and presided over her brutal rape by eight rebels.[196]

b. Scale and brutality

9552. para. 110: The Chamber further recalls that in Bo District, the unlawful killings were committed during attacks on Tikonko, Sembehun and Gerihun all between 15 and 30 June 1997. At least 207 people were killed by rebels who, at times, used anti-aircraft weapons on the civilians.[202] The rebels discharged their weapons indiscriminately, committing these murders in homes and at a school.[203] All the killings in Bo District, given amongst others their public nature were found to constitute acts of terrorism and that the massive killing in Tikonko was found to constitute extermination.[204]

9553. para. 111: We found that in Kenema Town and Tongo Field in Kenema District, the unlawful killings occurred between 25 May 1997 and about February 1998. At least 82 people were then murdered, of which 63 were found to have been exterminated, 72 died as a result of acts of terrorism and 11 from collective punishments on suspicions of collaborating with the Kamajors.[205] We also found that the massacres at Cyborg Pit in Tongo Field, in particular, highlight the scale and brutality of the killings of civilians who complained of the very treatment they were being subjected to in furtherance of the Junta's quest for diamonds.[206]

9554. para. 112: The Chamber has found that Kono District was the site of some of the most extensive and brutal massacres committed in Sierra Leone during the period of the Indictment. Between 14 February and 30 April 1998 at least 317 civilians, plus an unknown number of civilians, were murdered in Koidu Town, Tombodu, Yardu and Penduma. Of those 317 murders, at least 280 were acts amounting to extermination and 230 were considered to be the result of collective punishment. All of the killings for this time period were considered to be acts of terrorism, including the killings at the Sunna Mosque in Koidu committed by CO Rocky as he forced a man to pray. Similarly, the killings done by Savage and Staff Alhaji show the brutality and scale of the murders – such was the magnitude of the killings that the diamond pit where corpses and severed heads were dumped became known as "Savage Pit".[207]

9555. para. 113: Between May 1998 and June 1998, after the JCE had ceased to exist, an additional 29 murders were committed in Kono District at PC Ground, Koidu Buma and Wendedu. 8 of these murders, committed by Captain Banya on Superman's orders, were an act of terrorism. We recall in particular the brutal killing of 15 civilians by RUF Rambo and a group of rebels, who "felled the victims with a cutlass."[208]

9556. para. 114: We have found that on 19 February 1998, 63 civilians were murdered in Kailahun Town, Kailahun District, on the orders of Sam Bockarie. This extermination, one of the worst single incidents during the war, also constituted an act of terrorism and collective punishment. It shocked the conscience of the town and of all those present.[209]

c. Impact on victims and society

9557. para. 115: The Chamber observes that the killing of civilians in such circumstances brings along with it a lot of suffering on families and on the community. In several of these incidents the Chamber made findings as to the grief of the civilian populations and their ordeal in burying the corpses, estimated in the hundreds. Some were exposed to the decomposing bodies, left in the streets for days, or to the severed heads of victims, also left on the street. Many were subjected to the ordeal of observing one or several family members killed in their presence.[210]

d. Conclusion

9558. para. 116: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of unlawful killings as we have found in the Judgement (Counts 3 to 5 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high. Where those acts have also been found to constitute either Acts of Terrorism or Collective Punishments (Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

(ii) Sexual violence

a. Nature of the offence

9560. para. 117: In this case, the sexual violence crimes that we found were committed by the AFRC/RUF as a tactic of war was often perpetrated with impunity to humiliate, dominate and instil fear in victims, their families and communities during the armed conflict.[211]

9561. para. 118: The Chamber observes that the gravamen of crimes of sexual violence involves physical aggression on the most private and intimate parts of an individual's body. The Chamber found ample evidence of gruesome crimes of sexual violence which were perpetrated exclusively and disproportionately against unknown number of the female population throughout the territory of Sierra Leone, in locations including but not limited to, Tombodu, Sawao, Penduma, Bumpeh, Wendedu and Bomboafuidu in Kono District[212] and in locations within Kailahun District. For instance, a group of captured civilians in Bumpeh were stripped naked and forced to laugh and line-up before the rebels molested and defiled them.[213] A husband and wife and their daughter were overtly selected from a group of civilians and the couple was ordered to have sexual intercourse in public or otherwise face death. The couple's 10 year old daughter was then forced to wash her father's penis.[214]

9562. para. 119: In another instance, a rebel armed with a gun and knife, threatened to kill TF1-218 as he lifted and opened her legs before penetrating her. She described her condition stating "I was trembling, so I got up. I stood there for some time trembling."[215] The rapes were sometimes followed with further violence to the victims. TF1-218 managed to escape after she was raped but got shot in her hand. She was naked oozing with blood everywhere, from her vagina and her hand."[216] Similarly, in Sawao, as in Penduma, the multiple rapes of women were committed simultaneously as men were killed or had their limbs amputated.[217]

9563. para. 120: The Chamber has found that the AFRC/RUF systematically rampaged through towns and villages, armed and dangerous on missions to demolish and despoil the civilian population. In Bomboafuidu about 50 armed men, captured TF1-192 and approximately 20 civilians who were then paired up, male and female, and ordered to have sexual intercourse with each other.[218] The violent sexual acts were also indiscriminately perpetrated against the civilians regardless whether they were nursing mothers, pregnant women or children. In Tombodu, Staff Alhaji pointed a gun at the head of a woman carrying a child and commanded her to put the child down and undress. He touched her private part and then raped her in front of her child.[219]

9564. para. 121: We have also found that the public manner in which the crimes of sexual violence were committed was a deliberate tactic on the part of the perpetrators to instil fear into the civilians.[220]

9565. para. 122: In addition, as we have found, many women and girls were forcibly made 'wives' of RUF commanders and rebels in Kono and Kailahun District. These "wives" were "married" against their will, forced to engage in sexual intercourse and perform domestic chores, and were unable to leave their "husbands" for fear of violent retribution.[221] Many of these women were under the control of the Commanders for prolonged period of time, "serving them as their wives,"[222] and for sex. An unknown number of women were forced into sexual slavery for protracted period of time in Koidu and Wendedu, in Kono District[223] and also in Kailahun District.[224]

b. Scale and brutality

9566. para. 123: The Chamber considers that the crimes of sexual violence for which the accused stand convicted are of an extremely serious nature and were committed in conspicuously brutal manner as demonstrated in the Factual Findings of the Trial Judgement. We have also found as already stated that these crimes were committed with the further intent to terrorise the civilian population.[225]

9567. para. 124: The Chamber has found that sexual violence was rampantly committed against the civilian population in an atmosphere in which violence, oppression and lawlessness prevailed.[226] The Chamber notes that armed RUF rebels paraded through towns and villages, threatening women and girls, and in some instances capturing, assaulting or killing them.

9569. para. 126: We have also found that several other victims faced brutal multiple rapes. For example TF1-195 was raped fives times[229] and a stick was inserted into her vagina[230] and since this treatment she has experienced physical pain. TF1-218 was raped twice and another victim in

Bomboafuidu had a pistol driven into her vagina and left inside of her.[231] In addition, at least 20 captured civilians were forced to engage in sexual intercourse with each other, slitting the genitalia of several males and females persons.[232]

9570. para. 127: The Chamber has concluded that the AFRC/RUF also systematically and arbitrarily continued to capture and abduct an unknown number of women and girls, forcibly labeled 'wives' in Koidu and Wendedu camps in Kono District. For instance, TF1-314 was captured and abducted at the tender age of 10 and forcibly married to an RUF fighter in Kailahun District and so was TF1-093. Both victims and an unknown number of other women were forcibly married to RUF fighters and Commanders for a protracted period of time in Kailahun District.[233] The Chamber considers the brutal and large scale manner in which crimes of sexual violence were perpetrated increases the gravity of these offence.

9571. Vulnerability of victims para. 128: With specific regard to the crimes of sexual violence, the Chamber observes that many of the victims were particularly young and vulnerable; several of them after arbitrary abductions were held in captivity for prolonged periods of time. This was the situation particularly in Kailahun District which was the RUF stronghold and headquarters, an area where crimes of sexual violence were so prevalent that the victims suffered immensely because the RUF closely exercised territorial dominance and physical control over them. TF1-314 at the tender age of 10 and TF1-093 at 15 were abducted and forcibly married to an RUF fighter in Kailahun District.[234] The Chamber found that the majority of the victims of forced marriages, rapes and sexual slavery were young girls of school going age or village women, who were petty traders or farmers.[235]

9572. para. 129: The Chamber has found that the crimes of sexual violence specifically targeted the female population regardless of age or status, whether pregnant or not, it was done to effectively to disempower the civilian population, and it had the direct effect of instilling fear in communities.[236] Accordingly, for purposes of sentencing, the Chamber concludes that this practice by the rebels of using sexual violence to terrorise the civilian population increases the gravity of the underlying offence.

c. Number of victims

9573. para. 130: Although it may be problematic to give an exact or approximate number of victims of the crimes of sexual violence, we have found that the crimes were committed over a long period of time and a large geographical area. We have further found that on numerous occasions an unknown number of women were raped and/or taken as 'wives'. For instance, in

Tombodu, Staff Alhaji pointed a gun at the head of a woman carrying a child on her back, made her undress, and then raped her.[237] TF1-217's wife was gang-raped.[238] In Bumpeh, a rebel ordered a couple to have sexual intercourse in front of the other captured civilians, stating that he would kill them if they did not comply. The rebels then forced the man's daughter to wash her father's penis.[239] In Bomboafuidu, a woman had a pistol driven into her vagina and left inside of her.[240] An unknown number of women and girls including TF1-314 and TF1-093 were held captive in sexual slavery for prolonged periods of time and as 'wives' in Kailahun District.[241]

9574. para. 131: The Chamber emphasises that all rapes and forced marriages were found also to constitute acts of terrorism and outrages against personal dignity.[242] Accordingly, the Chamber concludes that for purposes of sentencing the practice of using rapes and forced marriage to terrorise the civilian population increases the gravity of the underlying offence.

9575. Impact on victims and degree of suffering para. 132: In our view, the degree of suffering that was endured by victims of sexual violence still continues. Some victims of forced marriage, sexual slavery and rape borne children of their ordeal. The Chamber considers that the crimes of sexual violence also inflicted physical and psychological pain on the victims. The victims continued to live with their captors in a hostile and coercive environment[243], unable to break away from such desperate circumstances. The Chamber recalls the demeanour and testimonies of various victims of sexual violence who expressed deep shame and stigma which they feel and face to date, several years after the abuse. The Chamber specifically recalls Witness TF1-305, the victim of a violent gang rape, who, as a result of the rape, sustained injuries which left her genitally impaired and incontinent. The Witness required frequent rest breaks during her testimony as a result of her condition. As we have found, the victims of sexual violence continue to live their lives in isolation, ostracized from their communities and families, unable to be reintegrated and reunited with their families and /or in their communities.[244] Many of these victims of sexual violence were ostracised or abandoned by their husbands, and daughters and young girls were unable to marry within their community.[245]

d. Impact on relatives and society

9576. para. 133: The Chamber further considers that the crimes of sexual violence were committed in a society where cultural values greatly dictate the sacred manner in which any form of sexual acts take place. Such violations in a society where the sexual lives of women and girls are strictly scrutinised would have an adverse impact on the family as a whole and the society at large.

9577. para. 134: We therefore recall our finding that the brutal manner in which women and girls were debased and molested, in the naked view of their protectors, the fathers, husbands and brothers deliberately destroyed the existing family nucleus, and flagrantly undermined the cultural values and relationships which held the societies together.[246] The Chamber observes that the shame and fear experienced by victims of sexual violence, alienated and tore apart communities, creating vacuums where bonds and relations were initially established.

9578. para. 135: In the Chamber's view the AFRC/RUF inflicted physical and psychological pain and harm which transcended the individual victim and relatives to an entire society. These acts of sexual violence left several women and girls extremely traumatised and scarred for life, consequently destroying the bearers of future generations. The Chamber infers that crimes of sexual violence further erode the moral fibre of society.

e. Conclusion

9579. para. 136: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of sexual violence as we have found in the Judgement (Counts 6 to 9 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high. Where those acts have also been found to constitute Acts of Terrorism (Count 1 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

9580. See above: Sentencing – RUF – Sentencing Judgment – Gravity of Offences – General Comments - Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe – paras. 30 – 37 [9540].

(iii) Physical violence

9581. para. 137: In evaluating the gravity of the offence, the Chamber considers that the crimes of physical violence include mutilations, carvings, amputations and beatings.

9582. para. 138: In this regard, and for the purposes of determining the gravity of these offences for which the Accused have been convicted, the Chamber deems it necessary to take into consideration, the extent to which these offences consequentially amounted to acts of terrorism and of collective punishment.

9583. para. 139: We take this stand because the Accused persons by their criminal acts as we have found intended and meted out to the victims, not only collective punishments but also terrorised them and the population at large with a view to subdue and to intimidate those who they and their fighters perceived as being hostile to them and to the fulfilment of the ideals and ideology of their movement, with a clear message and signal that a similar fate awaits those who do not embrace their cause.

9584. para. 140: The Chamber considers that where it has found that crimes of physical violence were committed with the intent to terrorise the population, or were committed as collective punishments, that for purposes of sentencing it increases the gravity of the underlying offence.

a. Nature of the offence

9585. para. 141: The Chamber is cognisant that the crimes of physical violence were perpetrated against innocent civilians in a cruel manner. We have found that victims were physically mutilated; some had inscriptions of the letters "RUF" with hot irons into their flesh while others were relentlessly beaten by rebels with the view to collectively punish or terrorise them. We further found that the physical and psychological ill-treatment left many victims permanently disfigured, unconscious or dead.[247]

9586. para. 142: The Chamber considers that the cruel manner in which these crimes of physical violence were carried out in absolute disregard for the sanctity of life or respect for human life or human dignity are factors which increase the gravity of the offence.

b. Scale and brutality

9587. para. 143: The Chamber recalls that several innocent civilians suspected of being collaborators were arbitrarily detained, tied up, ill-treated and thoroughly beaten in Kenema District. We recall in this regard that B.S. Massaquoi was beaten and tortured over a period of many days until he was unconscious.[248]

9588. para. 144: The Chamber has also found that in Kono District, several civilians were blindfolded and severely beaten with gun butts, and some were held down in nests of black ants. Rebels fired a gun between the legs of victims.[249] TF1-197 was beaten with sticks and stabbed in the head by rebels whilst other victims were tied on mango trees and mercilessly beaten with wires.[250]

9589. para. 145: The Chamber also considers as particularly brutal, insensitive and inhumane manner in which Major Rocky, an RUF commander shoved a board into the mouth of TF1-015, knocking out his teeth.[251]

9590. para. 146: We have found that victims were subjected to gruesome amputations in Kono District, some of which were committed simultaneously or successively with other crimes. For instance, TF1-195's right arm was severed by a small boy[252] after she was raped five times by rebels. TF1-197's arm was amputated and he was told to go to get extra hands from President Kabbah.[253] Victims were mutilated by rebels; at least 16 victims in Kayima were ordered to undress while a surgical blade was used to carve the letter "RUF" and/or "AFRC" into their bodies;[254] more victims in Tomandu suffered the same fate when a rebel named Soh carved "RUF" into their backs and arms using a razor blade.[255]

9591. para. 147: The Chamber recalls that in Penduma in Kono District, civilians who had been placed in three lines were tied up and locked in a house that was set ablaze.[256] The Chamber also recalls that more than 8 men at the Penduma Primary School were beheaded by Staff Alhaji and his men. The Chamber further recalls that Staff Alhaji and his rebels amputated the hands of the first two men in the line of men where TF1-217 was standing.[257]

9592. para. 148: The Chamber takes particular note of the manner in which TF1-217 was subjected to physical violence in the presence of his children. TF1-217 and his children after bearing the ordeal of watching his wife gang raped was subjected to physical injury. His feet were tied up to a tree, and Staff Alhaji hit his head with a cutlass so that it bled. His wrist watch was taken from him and his left hand was amputated in the presence of his children.[258] TF1-217 stated that:

> My children were sitting in front of me. Where they were put, they were sitting and they were looking –seeing me, because they didn't hide them. They were in the open and they were seeing what was happening […][259]

9593. para. 149: Even whilst TF1-217 tried to reclaim his amputated hand, he was stabbed in the back by Staff Alahaji stating;

> It is this hand that we want […] go to Tejan Kabbah for him to give you a hand because he has brought ten containers load [sic] of arms. Now that you say you don't want our military rule, then go to your civilian rule.[260]

9594. para. 150: The Chamber recalls its finding regarding physical violence inflicted on a 15 year-old boy in Koidu, whose hands were amputated at the wrist and both his legs were amputated at the ankle. He was then thrown alive into a latrine. The boy was still crying as the rebels walked away.[261]

9595. para. 151: The Chamber considers that the crimes of physical violence were perpetrated on a large scale and in a brutal manner and that this elevates the gravity of the offence. Furthermore, where the Chamber has found that such crimes also amounted to collective punishments,[262] the Chamber considers that for purposes of sentencing this further increases the gravity of the underlying offence.

9596. Vulnerability of victims para. 152: The Chamber observes that the majority of the victims of these crimes of physical violence were particularly vulnerable. Many of them were very young children, women or men who were unarmed and incapable of defending themselves against such brutal violence. Moreover, the armed rebels used intimidation, threats, coercion and terror to break the will of the people, thereby making civilians more vulnerable.

c. Number of victims

9597. para. 153: The Chamber found that a countless number of persons were victims of crimes of physical violence. It is noteworthy to recount the victims who were mentioned on record. However, this is not intended to minimize the actual vast number of victims. The Chamber notes that 3 civilians were amputated on the orders of Staff Alhaji in Tombodu,[263] TF1-197 suffered an amputation and his brother was flogged,[264] at least 3 men suffered amputations in Penduma,[265] 5 victims of amputations in Sawao[266] and also an unknown number of civilians were beaten with sticks and with guns.[267] In Wendedu, TF1-015's teeth were knocked out of his mouth[268] and at Kayima at least 18 civilians had "RUF" and/or "AFRC" carved into their flesh.[269] At least 13 civilians in Tomandu in Kono District suffered the same fate. In Kenema District there were several victims including TF1-122, TF1-129, 9 suspected collaborators and 6 detained civilians all of whom were severely beaten. The Chamber notes that at least 16 of the acts of physical violence perpetrated in Kenema were also found to constitute acts of terrorism and collective punishment. Where this is the case, the Chamber, for purposes of sentencing, considers that it further increases the gravity of the underlying offence.

9598. para. 154: The Chamber notes that while it is not possible to make an accurate numerical estimate of the victims of crimes of physical violence, the victims were evidently in large numbers.

9599. Impact on victims and degree of suffering para. 155: The Chamber considers that these crimes had a significant adverse physical and psychological effect on the victims. Many victims of these crimes of physical violence have found themselves permanently disfigured and incapacitated. For instance, during his oral testimony, TF1-015 mentioned that he still feels the pain in his mouth, and that he is still unable to chew any food.[270] The Chamber particularly notes the cruel suffering imposed upon those civilians who had hands, feet, or limbs amputated. The immediate degree of suffering involved in amputations is immense. Amputees are also left to bear the consequences of a permanent and serious physical disability, which in many cases has led to a degree of dependency upon family, and in some cases total and permanent reliance upon others for their every need. The Chamber notes the lasting effects of these crimes on victims, on their dependants and relatives.

9600. para. 156: The Chamber observes that many of these victims endured severe pain and suffering as a result of the physical violence. Some victims have lost the ability to work or the capacity to earn a living. Hence these victims have become dependants in their families, further making the victims feel like burdens to their impoverished families. Victims have lost their mobility and capacity to undertake simple daily tasks. Most victims who were once able persons are now disabled and forced to beg for a living.

9601. Impact on relatives and society para. 157: The Chamber also considers these crimes had a significant adverse impact not only on the immediate victims but also on their relatives and upon the society. Many relatives lost members of their families as a consequence of such physical injury inflicted. The number of dependants in already impoverished families has increased. The Chamber notes that the immediate victims, their relatives and the society as a result of these acts continue to endure serious suffering. The several victims of crimes of physical violence live amidst their relatives and in their communities, permanently scarred, serving as a constant reminder to all of these sufferings.

d. Conclusion

9602. para. 158: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of physical violence as we have found in the Judgement (Counts 10 and 11 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high. Where those acts have also been found to constitute either Acts of Terrorism or Collective Punishments (Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

(iv) Enslavement

a. Nature of the offence

9604. para. 159: The Chamber has considered that the enslavement crimes for which the accused have been found guilty are of the utmost gravity. We found that hundreds of civilians throughout Kenema, Kono and Kailahun Districts were enslaved and forced to farm, mine for diamonds, carry loads, train for war and generally serve to support the RUF war effort. We recall that deprivation of their liberty, the conditions under which they worked and the harassments and threats they constantly faced symbolise a system designed to exploit civilians, without any regard for their safety or well-being, being focused solely on furthering the accused's criminal objective.

9605. Scale and brutality para. 160: The Chamber recalls that at Tongo Fields in Kenema District hundreds of civilians were enslaved and forced to mine for diamonds. Civilians were captured from surrounding villages and taken to the mines, sometimes tied to ropes. They were given orders by AFRC/RUF Commanders. Those who attempted to escape from the forced mining sites were stripped and left naked so that they would not be able to hide or take diamonds, others were beaten or killed.[271]

9606. para. 161: Again, in Kono District, from about 14 February to 30 April 1998, the Chamber found that there was unknown numbers of civilians enslaved in camps and forced to participate in food-finding missions and used to carry loads of food, ammunition and looted property between Kono and Kailahun Districts.[272] Those who attempted to escape were punished with beatings or given extra work. The use of enslaved civilians to collect and transport goods continued throughout Kono District between May and December 1998 under the same inhumane treatment, in coercive and oppressive conditions.[273] Civilians were organised into so called RUF Camps at Kaidu, Wendedu and Kunduma where they were held with no possibility of escaping and lived under harsh conditions with no adequate access to food and medicines.[274]

9607. para. 162: We found that civilians abducted were from far-away towns and transported to the diamond pits like slaves tied together with ropes and chains, and were arbitrarily removed from their communities and support systems.[275] Under the guise of 'protecting' the civilians, they were kept in camps and had their movement and well-being severely limited.[276]

9608. para. 163: The Chamber also found that the RUF established well-organised extensive diamond mining operations in Kono District in which hundreds of civilians were forced to mine under the guard of armed men and child soldiers. Civilians who refused to mine were beaten, mining conditions were appalling with no pay, housing, food or medical treatment.[277] Civilians worked from sunrise to sunset, tirelessly digging pits with shovels, pickaxes, sieves and pans. Miners were inhumanely treated, forced to dig while dressed only in their underpants to discourage those who attempted to escape.

9609. para. 164: The mining was characterised by further brutality, when diamonds were not found they would be branded witches and wizards then undressed and severely flogged, stabbed or restrained in cells.[278]

9610. para. 165: We recall that in Kailahun District, enslavement was an institutionalised system in which civilians were screened and enslaved, forced to farm, mine, perform domestic chores, train for combat, work as porters and engage in other forms of forced labour.[279] Civilians were commonly subjected to arbitrary violence and physical retribution. Civilians had to walk several miles to RUF farms, and received no payment or food in return. Some commanders owned private farms cultivated by forced civilian labour and some engaged in private mining under the watchful eyes of child soldiers or other armed security.[280] The rebels guarded the mining pit with guns in order to prevent any of the civilians from escaping.[281]

9611. para. 166: The Chamber notes that the arbitrarily abducted civilians were particularly vulnerable. The circumstances under which the civilians were enslaved rendered the victims powerless and vulnerable. These victims were rampantly abducted often in situations of extreme violence, tied up with ropes and chained like chattels, to be used as slaves, working long hours under oppressive conditions with no adequate food or medicines. Many victims lived under strict control and guard, fear of being killed hence unable to escape. As a result, the victims resigned to their fate, living lives of slaves for prolonged periods of time.

b. Number of victims

9612. para. 167: The Chamber observes that to make an accurate assessment of the number of enslaved civilians forced to mine, train, fish, hunt, farm, and cook, carry loads and/or engage in any other forms of forced labour would be difficult. The Chamber recalls that from the totality of evidence, a massive number of civilians in hundreds were enslaved in one or more ways. It is noteworthy to state that these acts of enslavement were continual, perpetrated on a large scale and for prolonged periods of time.

9613. Impact on victims and degree of suffering para. 168: The Chamber considers that the manner in which innocent civilians were abducted from their settled homes, restrained by ropes and chains and forced to live in camps manned by armed guards was cruel and degrading. Victims lived under humiliating conditions of complete submission, and resistance to RUF control and dominance brought severe punishment, often death.

9614. para. 169: The Chamber concludes that the enslavement caused its victims immense suffering and pain.

c. Impact on relatives and society

9615. para. 170: The Chamber considers that enslavement removed people from their families and communities and caused psychological injury to the relatives and to the broader community.

9616. Conclusion para. 171: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of enslavement killings as we have found in the Judgement (Count 13 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high. Where those acts have also been found to constitute either Acts of Terrorism or Collective Punishments (Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

(v) Pillage and Acts of burning as Terrorism

9618. Nature of the offence para. 172: The Chamber found that the crime of pillage predominantly relates to the looting of civilian property in Bo and Kono Districts. The Chamber notes that the looting of property was often accompanied by the setting of many houses and buildings on fire in a chaotic war environment with the intent to instil fear and terror.[282]

9619. Scale and brutality para. 173: The Chamber did find that the destruction of property was committed on a large scale and in an indiscriminate manner, and also as a means to terrorise the civilian population. In Bo District, the fighters looted Le 800, 000 from one Ibrahim Kamara. The Chamber notes that the destruction of property occurred amidst violent attacks, which were accompanied by the setting of houses in towns on fire. The burning of 500 houses in Tikonko and 30 houses in Sembehun clearly sowed fear and terror among the civilian population.[283] Further, the burning of civilian property during the attacks on Koidu and Tombodu were perpetrated as a means to collectively punish the civilian population for allegedly failing to support AFRC/RUF.[284]

9620. Vulnerability of victims para.174: The Chamber further considers that the attacks on Koidu Town and on Bo District which led to the extensive destruction of civilian property were so violent and rampantly perpetrated, to the extent that they rendered all civilians in the vicinity vulnerable.

9621. Number of victims para. 175: The Chamber considers that the indiscriminate manner in which civilian property was destroyed affected several unknown number of civilians. Sometimes towns were set ablaze, as was the case during the attack on Koidu Town. The Chamber recalls that hundreds of civilians became victims of such widespread destruction in Koidu town.

9622. Impact on victims and degree of suffering para. 176: In addition, the Chamber notes that many victims suffered emotional and psychological harm because they powerlessly had to watch their homes and livelihood arbitrarily taken from them or burned as a means of creating immeasurable fear amidst them. Many victims were deprived of property with no remedy for reclaiming it. The Chamber considers that in such impoverished communities, where victims lived on a subsistence basis, all forms of appropriation or destruction by fighters adversely impacted the victims.

a. Impact on relatives and society

9623. para. 177: The Chamber considers that the widespread destruction of property through burning[285] has manifestly had a substantial negative impact on the economy of these communities and stifled their further development. Family ties were broken because many victims fled from their homes and became displaced persons in their own land.

b. Conclusion

9624. para. 178: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of pillage as we have found in the Judgement (Count 14 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is high. Having in addition carefully considered the instances of burning where we have found that they constitute acts of terrorism, we consider that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is high. Hon. Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissents from the Chamber's conclusion in this regard.

9625. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 24: In our sentencing judgment, the following decision has been made and adopted by a chamber majority decision which reads as follows and I quote,

> The Chamber has found that the crime of pillage predominately relates to the looting of civilian property in Bo and Kono Districts. The Chamber notes that the looting of property was often accompanied by the setting of many houses and buildings on fire in a chaotic war environment with intent to instil fear an terror.

9626. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 25: The Chamber did find that the destruction of property was committed on a large scale and in an indiscriminate manner, and also as a means to terrorize the civilian population.[5] Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of pillage as we have found in the Judgment (count 14 of the Indictment) the Chamber concluded that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is high. Having in addition carefully considered the instances of burning where we have found that they constitute acts of terrorism, we consider that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is high. Hon. Justice Benjamin Itoe dissents[6] from the Chamber conclusion in the regard.

9627. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 26: I respectfully dissent from this opinion and findings of my Distinguished Colleagues on the nexus which they have created between crimes of Pillage and Acts of Burning as Terrorism.[7]

9628. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 27: In this regard, I would like to observe that pillage is a War Crime provided for, in Article 3 of the Statute. We, as a Chamber, have determined and defined the ingredients of the offence of pillage as a war crime.[8] They include:

i) The accused unlawfully appropriated the property;

ii) The appropriation was without the consent of the owner; and

iii) The Accused intended to unlawfully appropriate the property.

9629. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 28: The Prosecution in the exercise of their prosecutorial prerogative which, in my opinion, is very extensive and elastic, has the latitude to prefer charges in the same indictment alleging both the crimes of pillage under Article 3 of the Statute and of burning under Article 5 of the said statute. The prosecution did not. It only opted to indict the Accused persons for pillage as a war crime and decided, in the exercise of this discretion not to indict the convicts for the crimes of burning under Sierra Leonean Law as envisaged in Article 5 of the Statute.

9630. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 29: I would like to add here, our Chamber finding that some of the offences charged in the indictment overlapped in terms of the commonality of their constitutive elements as well as of the evidence adduced to prove them.

It is my considered opinion that if the prosecution, intended that the offence of pillage should overlap with that of the crimes of burning, they should also have included the offence of burning as a count in the indictment as this would have made the present Chamber Majority Decision to have a semblance of any credibility at all appear credible at all at this stage and particularly so because as the Appeals Chamber, has held, the definition of the offence of pillage does not include burning.

(vi) Child soldiers

9632. para. 179: In considering the gravity of this offence, the Chamber has taken into account the organised, widespread and institutionalised practice by the RUF of recruiting, conscripting and in particular using persons under 15 to actively participate in hostilities.[286]

a. Scale and brutality

9633. para. 180: The Chamber has found that the offences relating to the use of child soldiers, who were known within the context of the war as SBUs/SGUs, were committed throughout the territory of Sierra Leone on a large scale and with a significant degree of brutality. Large numbers of children under 15 years were rampantly abducted from their families, often in a belligerent environment.[287] These child soldiers were subjected to cruel and harsh military training in Yengema, Camp Lion, Bunumbu and Bayama. Those who were unable to endure the training regime were often summarily shot and killed.[288] Children as young as 10 years old were armed with light weapons, rocket launchers and grenades. They were also used to mount ambushes, for instance against the UNAMSIL peacekeepers on the road from Lunsar to Makeni.[289] Some children were armed and used as bodyguards to commanders including Sesay and Kallon, others such as 14 year old Vandy were used during armed patrol which inevitably put the childrens' lives in danger.

9634. para. 181: The Chamber found that very young children were used to engage in the perpetration of gruesome crimes directed against innocent civilians. Armed children manned mining sites[290] in Tombodu, Tongo Fields and Cyborg Pit, guarding civilians who were forced to mine, and indiscriminately beating and killing those who would not perform mining activities. The Chamber also found that the RUF fighters habitually drugged these children with alcohol, cocaine and marijuana which made the children fearless to kill and to perpetrate other violent and heinous crimes.[291] Children became notorious killing machines, some aged between 8 and 14 actively participating in hostilities by killing and raping civilians;[292] others amputated civilians and burned houses and cars. Children also beheaded corpses of civilians in Koidu following the killings by Rocky of 30 to 40 civilians, and that the 12 year-old child soldier Samuel shot Chief Sogbeh.

b. Vulnerability of victims

9635. para. 182: The Chamber further observes that children were recruited on the basis of their age. The Chamber takes the view that the exceptionally young age of those who were abducted and conscripted rendered them vulnerable. Children as young as 8 or 9 years old[293] were forcibly taken for military training, some barely able to lift the guns they were to shoot. For instance the AFRC/RUF forces forcibly abducted TF1-141 and TF1-263 ages 12 and 14 years respectively in Kono District between February and April 1998.[294]

c. Number of victims

9636. para. 183: The Chamber has found that a large number[295] of children under the age of 15 were arbitrarily recruited and used as child soldiers by the AFRC/RUF on a large scale throughout the territory of Sierra Leone. Therefore, the Chamber's position is that the phenomenon of recruitment of child soldiers by the RUF was so ordinary and vastly practiced that it affected a large number of victims and this increases the gravity of the offence.

d. Impact on victims and degree of suffering

9637. para. 184: The Chamber recalls that child soldiers were arbitrarily abducted from their families, forced into the RUF forces for a protracted period of time and further deprived of a normal childhood and education. Many children were shot and killed during training and in combat activities. Some of the abducted children had the letters "RUF" carved into their bodies[296] essentially branding them as RUF property. The Chamber opines that the use of children under the age of 15 years in this manner considerably increases the gravity of the offence.

9638. para. 185: The Chamber's view is that the psychological impact of the recruitment on these children is particularly evidenced by the fact that in various Interim Care Centres (ICCs) established by UNICEF, the majority of the 'separated' children including child soldiers suffered from war-related stresses which persisted long after the war ended. Hence, the Chamber considers that the use of children under 15 to actively participate in hostilities had severe physical and psychological impact on the victims and their families due to the separations.

e. Impact on relatives and society

9639. para. 186: The Chamber notes that some former child soldiers have never re-established contact with their families and many who have been re-integrated into society or reunited with their families have inevitably been deprived of a normal childhood, education, physical and psychological development. Most families are in no position to cater for the needs of these children affected by the effects of war. Furthermore, the Chamber considers that because most of these children were forced into the ideology of the RUF, the development of their own identities and understanding of social dynamics are thereby impaired, particularly where no mechanisms are in place to re-channel them and thereby to make positive contributions to development.

f. Conclusion

9640. para. 187: Having carefully considered the instances of crimes of the use of children to actively participate in hostilities as we have found in the Judgement (Count 12 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high.

(vii) Crimes against UNAMSIL personnel

9641. para. 188: The Chamber recalls irs findin s with regard to crimes committed against UNAMSIL peacekeepers in Bombali, Port Loko an Tonkoltll Districts in relation ro Counts 15 and 17.[297]

9642. para. 189: As a preliminary obseveration, we hold thar the deployment of UN peacekeepers in troubled regions is an important IOstument used by rhe international community for the maintenance of international peace an security and therefore that adequate protection must be granted to peacekeepers deployed i such missions. Consistent wirh the foregoing, we rake cognisance that Resolution 1270 of 22 October 1999 was passed by rhe UN Security Council authorising the esrabllshmenr of UNA SIL as a peacekeeping force ro be deployed with the consent of the warring parties because the situation in Sierra Leone was deemed to constitute a threat to internationa] peace and security.[298]

9643. para. 190: The Chamber further recalls that Article XVI of the Lome Peace Agreement of 7 July 1999 between the Government of Sierra Leone and the RUF provided for the creation of a neutral peacekeeping force to disarm a fighters belonging to the RUF, CDF, SLA and orher paramilitary groups. UNAMSIL peace eepers were Therefore acting in fulfilment of rheir mandate, that is, to asslsr with the recess of disarming, demobilising and re-integrating combatants, as well as monitoring a ceas fire and facilitating humanitarian assistance.[299]

a. Scale and brutality Vulnerability of victims

9644. para. 191: The Chamber also recalls that in a short period or rime the RUF directed 14 attacks against the UNAMSIL peacekeepers. We further recall that these arracks were characterised by abductions, captures, brutality, threats of death and the disarming of UNAMSIL peacekeepers.

9645. para. 192: We found that the RUF fighters assaulred individual members of the peacekeeping force, such as Salahuedin, Jaganathan, Maroa's group, Odhiarnbo's group and Rona's groups. The RUF fighters even used dishonest means to lure the peacekeepers, pretending to display interest in resolving the situation but only to seize and capture them. Several peacekeepers were detained in small filthy rooms with no food to eat at Teko barracks, some peacekeepers were photographed as they were forced to rand behind dead bodies covered with blood stained blankets. Six peacekeepers were stripped to thelr underwear, hands tied to their backs with electrical wire; some were severely beaten and slapped. Many captured peacekeepers were recklessly transported in trucks from one location to another, guarded by armed RUF fighters. At least 10 peacekeepers were seriously injured in an accident during snch transfers.

9646. para. 193: We also recall that the fighters also staged ambushes and launched violent offensive against the peacekeepers, even childre under the age of 15 years armed with grenades and rockets where used to ambush peacek pets on the Makeni-Magburaka highway. Kasoma and 10 of his men from the Zambian Battlion (ZAMBATT) were then captured and held captive for 23 days. Three other peacekeepers were attacked in Lunsar and two of them disappeared never to be seen again. Approximately 100 peacekeepers in convoy were surrounded and forcibly disarmed by 1000 RUF fighters. Some peacekeepers were deprived of their liberty, constantly confined under guard, their passports and money confiscated, stripped naked. The fighters further launched attacks by opening gunfire on UN helicopters in Yengema and engaging peacekeepers in crossfire in Magburaka.

b. Vulnerability of victims

9647. para. 194: The Chamber recalls that the andare of the peacekeepers and the purpose of their deployment was to facilitate peace an security with the objective of bringing an end to the protracted conflict.

9648. para. 195: Due to the limited nature of their mandate, peacekeeping forces are inevitably placed in a vulnerable position when deployed in a situation where the peace itself is fragile, and are often situated in the midst of ongoing or protracted violence. We recall that we found that in May 2000 that UNAMSIL peacekeepers consistently conveyed their peaceful intent and interest in maintaining the peace, and engaged in negotiations wirh the RUF leadership. Nevertheless, the RUF fighters engaged the UNAMSIL peacekeepers. In the Chamber's view, this heightens the gravity of the crime.

c. Number of Victims

9649. para. 196: The Chamber recalls its finding that several peacekeepers were captured, injured or killed as a result of these attacks. The Chamber recalls that these included, KENBATT peacekeeper Private Yusif and one Wanyama who died as a result of injuries inflicted during the attacks, two unidentified KENBATT peacekeepers, three peacekeepers in Lunsar went missing and two never returned and were declared dead. In addition, a vast majority of peacekeepers suffered physical assault and were forcibly detained these included Kasoma and ten ZAMBATT's who were detained for 23 days, 100 UNAMSIL peacekeepers were captured by approximately 1000 RUF fighters.[300]

d. Impact on victims and degree of suffering

9650. para. 197: The Chamber further considers that the peacekeepers suffered severe physical and psychological pain and injury as a direct consequence of the attacks by the RUF fighters, The peacekeepers intended to maintain the peace but found themselves as victims of such violent attacks.

9651. para. 198: Salahudein was punched in the face by Kallen, who then attempted to stab him. Jaganarhan was beaten and forcibly abducted in a vehicle and taken to different locations where he was held for approximately three weeks. Maroa and three other peacekeepers were shot at, disarmed, beaten and consequently detained. Gjellsclad and Mendy were detained for several weeks. Rona and three others suffered the same fate.[301] The conditions of detention were very poor and unsuitable for their purpose. The Chamber concludes that the attacked and captured UNAMSIL peacekeepers suffered physical and psychological harm, as well as humiliation and degrading treatment.

e. Impact of attacks on the UNAMSIL peacekeeping force and the international community

9652. para. 199: The international community unequivocally condemned the deliberate and unprovoked attacks by the RUF fighters on the UNAMSIL peacekeepers. It was viral for the UN and the international community to continue the process of peace and reconstruction in Sierra Leone alter such a devastating decade long strife.

9653. para. 200: The suffering of the Sierra Leoean people was no longer limited to internal security concerns but extended to regional and international focus.

> The international community should not lose sight of the overarching objective of helping the pe pie and Govemmeor of Sierra Leone to esrabllsh a durable peace in their co nrrv and rekindling their hope. Their plight has become a crucial rest of th1 solidarttv of the international community, tisiog above race and geograghy, which is a basic gUiding principle of this Organisation. The UN has not abandoned and will not abandon Sierra Leone. It should coruhiue to provide humanitarian aid and the required assistance in taking the many steps needed on the path TO peace, national reconciliation and development.[302]

9654. para. 201: In due regard, regional leaders of the ECOWAS nations like Ghana, Burkina Paso, Liberia, Mali, Guinea, Nigeria and Togo convened meetings to thwart the situation.[303] A joint Implementation Committee meeting was also held to exert strong diplomatic pressure on the RUF and increase the military capacity of UNAMSIL to enhance its operational capablities.[304] This meeting, chaired by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Mali was attended by representatives from Ghana, Guinea Libya, Sierra Leone, Canada, UK, USA, the then Organisation of African Unity (now Afican Union) and UNAMSIL.[305]

9655. para. 202: It was of utmost international interest that all the UNAMSIL peacekeepers were safely returned, those detained, wounded or injured, death or alive and all the missing peacekeepers.[306] The political effort to assist the Sierra Leonean people should be supplemented by a credible military force. The UK decided to deploy their spearhead battalion to restore relative calm in Freetown, Lungi and the Peninsula areas.

9656. para. 203: The objective of the intenational community was to assist in creating conditions for the establishment of lasring peace. At the 4139th meeting of rhe Security Council on 11 May 2000, many member states advocated that UNAMSIL should be given a strong peace enforcement mandate under Chapter VII of the Charter.[307] The Under-Secretary-General deemed it essential for the intemational community to show the necessary will and resolve to sustain such a commirment to impose peace in Sierra Leone and called on member states with ready capacity and necessary resources to assist.

f. Conclusion

9657. Having carefully considered the instances of crimes against UNAMSIL personnel as we have found in the Judgement (Counts 5 and 17 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high.

(d) Individual Circumstances of the Accused

(i) Applicable to all Accused

a. Sentence possibly to be served outside of Sierra Leone

9658. para. 205: Having considered the submissions of the Parties in relation to serving a sentence in a foreign country,[308] as well as the submissions of the Registrar in this regard,[309] the Chamber notes that whilst it seems more likely than not at this stage that the convicted persons in this trial will serve sentences outside of Sierra Leone,[310] this is a decision that ultimately lies within the discretion of the President of the Court, based upon agreements concluded by the Registrar.[311] The Chamber is unable to speculate on the result of these negotiations and decision making processes, upon which it has no conclusive information, and which lie outside of its control. It therefore notes for purposes of record that it has not given any weight to this factor in the consideration of the sentences of any of the convicted persons in this case.

9659. para. 206: The Chamber however wishes to recognise that, in general terms, sentences served abroad, where family visits are likely to be few, may be harder to bear. Such circumstances would normally amount to a factor in mitigation of sentence.

b. References in submissions to evidence adduced during trial

9660. para. 207: Although both the Prosecution and the Defence teams referred to evidence adduced at trial in support of their arguments on sentencing, the Chamber has not given this evidence substantial consideration unless such evidence resulted in a finding of fact in the Judgement. The Chamber had determined that some of the evidence adduced at trial was found to be not credible and therefore attached no probative value to it. In making its findings on the individual circumstances of the Accused for the purposes of sentencing, the Chamber has relied upon the findings in the Judgement, the arguments of the parties including any information adduced specifically in support thereof and the procedural history of the case.

(ii) Sesay

a. Convictions and form of liability

9661. para. 208: The Chamber recalls the crimes for which Sesay has been convicted, and the form of liability for each crime, as set out above in Section II of this Sentencing Judgement.

b. Form and degree of responsibility

i. Personal Commission

9662. para. 209: The Chamber further recalls its finding in the Judgement that the illicit sale of diamonds was the RUF's primary means of financing its operations, and that the mining system in Kono District was designed and supervised at the highest levels.[312] The overall mining commander reported to Sesay, and Sesay received mining commanders at his house in Koidu town. He visited the mines, ordered that more civilians be captured, and arranged for the transportation of civilians to the mines.[313] The Chamber concluded that Sesay's conduct was a significant contributory factor to the perpetration of enslavement, and that he, acting in concert with other senior members of the RUF, designed the abduction and enslavement of hundreds of civilians for diamond mining throughout Kono district.[314] On the basis of these findings, the Chamber concluded that Sesay was liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for the planning of enslavement, as charged in Count 13 of the Indictment.[315]

9663. para. 210: Referring to the Chamber's finding that the "primary purpose behind commission of abductions and forced labour was not to spread terror among the civilian population, but rather was primarily utilitarian or military in nature" and also that "[e]ven where abductions and forced labour occurred simultaneously with other acts of violence otherwise examined by this Chamber with regards to the crime of terror"[316] the Defence submits that these findings are relevant to an assessment of gravity.[317] The Chamber accepts that this is a factor which is relevant to the consideration of the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct. It is precisely because the Chamber has not made the finding that Sesay's conduct in this respect amounts to an act of terror that the Chamber will not thereby increase the gravity of the offence for which he has been convicted for purposes of sentencing. Clearly however this does not in any way decrease the gravity of the offence- enslavement- for which he has been convicted.

9664. para. 211: Recalling its findings above in relation to the nature and physical impact of the crime of enslavement,[318] and noting that Sesay was directly involved in the planning of the crime of enslavement, the Chamber concludes that the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct reaches the highest level.

9665. para. 212: The Chamber recalls its finding in the Judgement that the RUF routinely used persons under the age of 15 to actively participate in hostilities between November 1996 and September 2000 in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts.[319] We have found that conscription of child soldiers was conducted on a massive scale.[320] We recall our finding that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF Commanders, had a substantial involvement to the planning of this system of conscription, and he interacted directly with the child soldiers on a regular basis: some of his own personal bodyguards were child soldiers and participated in hostilities. He gave orders that "young boys" should be trained at Bunumbu and Yengema training bases, he told trainees that if they failed to comply with orders they would be executed. He distributed drugs as "morale boosters" for these fighters.[321] At a meeting in Makeni, Sesay expressed his concern that child combatants were being removed from the RUF, and RUF were thereby losing "their fighters".[322] On the basis of these findings, the Chamber concluded that Sesay was liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities in Kailahun, Kenema, Kono and Bombali between 1997 and 2000, as charged in Count 12.[323] Recalling its findings above in relation to the nature and physical impact of the crime of use of child soldiers,[324] and noting that Sesay was directly involved in the planning of the crime of use of persons under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities, the Chamber concludes that the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct reaches the highest level.

ii. JCE

9666. para. 213: The Chamber recalls its findings above in relation to the nature and physical impact of the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise, including unlawful killings, sexual violence crimes, physical violence crimes, enslavement, and crimes of pillage and acts of burning.[325] Where those acts have also been found to constitute either Acts of Terrorism or Collective Punishments (Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

9667. para. 214: With respect to the form and degree of Sesay's participation in the joint criminal enterprise, the Chamber recalls its findings that at time of the commission of these crimes, Sesay held a very high position of authority within the RUF, as a Vanguard, Lieutenant Colonel and Battle Group Commander. During the currency of the joint criminal enterprise, from May 1997 until the end of April 1998, Sesay was effectively the second highest senior RUF officer after Sam Bockarie.[326] Sesay was a member of the AFRC Supreme Council, and participated in the meeting of this body throughout the Junta regime. Within the RUF, Sesay, together with Bockarie, approved the appointment of senior RUF Commanders to deputy ministerial positions within the Junta government, in order to integrate the RUF into the AFRC regime.[327] The Chamber concluded that given his position of power, authority and influence, including his role, rank and relationship with Bockarie, Sesay contributed significantly to the joint criminal enterprise.[328]

9668. para. 215: The Chamber further recalls that the crimes committed in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise, which "intended through the spread of extreme fear and punishment to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over the captured territory"[329] were crimes of a shocking nature, deserving of condemnation in the strongest terms possible. Considering Sesay's hugely influential role within the enterprise as a senior military leader and member of the Supreme Council, who "by his personal conduct furthered the common purpose by securing revenues, territory and manpower for the Junta Government and by aiming to reduce or eliminate the civilian opposition to the Junta regime".[330] The Chamber concludes that Sesay's level of participation in the joint criminal enterprise was key to the furtherance of the objectives of the joint criminal enterprise. In addition, by his hands-on approach, including acting as an architect of the scheme by planning in the enslavement of civilian miners and the use of child soldiers to guard mining sites, we likewise conclude that his level of participation in the joint criminal enterprise was key to the furtherance of the objectives of the joint criminal enterprise. Considering also the fact that the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise engulfed scores of civilians, spread over several Districts, and were perpetrated over an extended period of time, the Chamber concludes that Sesay's conduct seriously increased the gravity of the offences committed, and his culpability thus reaches the highest level.

iii. Command responsibility

9670. para. 216: The Chamber recalls its findings in relation to the nature and physical impact of the crimes of Enslavement as well as crimes against UNAMSIL personnel.[331] The Chamber found Sesay liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for crimes under Counts 13, 15 and 17 of the Indictment. These crimes included Enslavement in relation to events in Kono District, as well as attacks committed against UNAMSIL Peacekeepers in Bombali, Port Loko, Kono and Tonkolili Districts.

9671. para. 217: The Chamber found that at the time the RUF directed attacks against the UNAMSIL peacekeepers, Sesay was the Battle Field Commander, effectively that he was the most senior and overall military commander of the RUF on the ground.[332] Sesay in his leadership role gave orders to all commanders, in relation to the dismantling of checkpoints and also on operational issues. These commanders included Kallon.[333] The Chamber recalls its finding that Sesay was in full command of the operations of the RUF troops in relation to UNAMSIL peacekeeping personnel in later April and May 2000, and that he was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of the attacks directed against UNAMSIL personnel in May 2000.[334] The Chamber consequently found Sesay liable for failing to prevent or punish his subordinates for directing 14 attacks against UNAMSIL personnel and killing four UNAMSIL personnel in May 2000, as charged in counts 15 and 17.

9672. para. 218: The Chamber considers it utterly reprehensible that such a senior military commander, who was in a position of authority and had effective control of subordinate commanders and troops, would allow, or would allow to go unchecked, attacks directed against a UN Peacekeeping Force that had been deployed as a result of the Lomé Peace Accord, to which the RUF was one of the signatories. UN Peacekeepers act at the behest of the international community in order to preserve the peace for the benefit of ordinary civilians. Sesay's conduct as overall military commander can only be condemned in the strongest terms possible, and the Chamber considers the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct in this regard to reach the highest level.

c. Aggravating factors – Sesay – Individual Circumstances of the Accused 9673. para. 219: The Chamber finds that, beyond those general and individual circumstances already considered by the Chamber under the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct,[335] the Prosecution has not established beyond a reasonable doubt any additional aggravating factors as to Sesay's conduct for the crimes for which we have convicted him.

d. Mitigating circumstances – Sesay – Individual Circumstances of the Accused

i. Forced recruitment

9674. para. 220: The Chamber notes that Sesay was 19 years old at the time he was forcibly recruited into the RUF. The Chamber is of the opinion that this forced recruitment cannot mitigate the crimes which Sesay later committed, as we consider that he could well have chosen another path.

ii. Lack of prior criminal conduct

9675. para. 221: The Chamber has duly noted that it has not been demonstrated that Sesay has any prior criminal convictions. Although the Chamber has considered this factor we are of the opinion that only very limited weight can be given to it.

iii. Substantial cooperation

9676. para. 222: Whilst Sesay initially gave statements to the Prosecution, the Chamber recalls that, after a lengthy voir dire proceeding during the course of the trial, it ruled that the statements taken from Sesay were not given freely and voluntarily.[336] At the request of the Defence, the Chamber expunged the statements from the record.[337] The Chamber is of the opinion that Sesay has already been accorded an adequate judicial remedy.

9677. para. 223: In the alternative, the Sesay Defence argues that by his treatment at the hands of the Prosecution, Sesay was effectively deprived of the real possibility of cooperation with the Prosecution. The Chamber does not accept this argument. It has been open to Sesay at any time since that episode to offer his cooperation. However, and quite understandably, he has chosen to vigorously defend himself against the charges which he faced. The Chamber finds that the Sesay Defence has not demonstrated on a balance of probabilities that Sesay either substantially cooperated with the Prosecution, or was unduly deprived of that possibility.

iv. Good character and contributions

9678. para. 224: In its submission, the Sesay Defence requested that the Chamber reviews the evidence which shows that Sesay made contributions that improved the lives of many civilians, in particular in Kailahun District and in Makeni. The Chamber made no findings in the Judgement in this regard. We observe however that it appears Sesay on occasion gave assistance to civilians.

Such a conclusion however would do little in our opinion to show Sesay's good character. The Chamber considers that any assistance he gave civilians on occasion, in the circumstances we found to exist then, should not be given undue weight in mitigation.

v. Facilitation of the peace and reconciliation process

9679. para. 225: The Chamber recognises that in situations of protracted armed conflicts where peace can be fragile, all efforts must be made to encourage its preservation. We cannot and do not say that the law should forgive past criminal conduct, however we do agree that in exceptional cases, mitigation of sentence may be offered as an exceptional benefit to those convicted criminals who despite their past actions have, subsequent to their crimes, made a critical and decisive contribution to the peace process. Sesay submits that he is such a person.

9680. para. 226: The Defence submits that at the time he became interim leader, the RUF was in control of approximately half of the territory of Sierra Leone, including the diamond mines in Kono District, and had every reason and ability to fight for its survival. The Sesay Defence presents the Chamber with several witness statements lending support to the suggestion that Sesay made a critical contribution to the peace process. Among them is a statement of the former Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the UN to Sierra Leone ("SRSG") from 1999-2003 (and subsequently Chair of the African Union), Oluyemi Adeniji, where he states that:

> As the peace process progressed to the disarmament stage, Sesay showed that he was able to make promises and keep them. He was, undoubtedly, directing a lot of his energies towards bringing the RUF to disarmament in the face of internal opposition […][338]
>
> In another attached statement, by the former President of ECOWAS from 1999-2000 and the former President of Mali, Alpha Konaré, reads:
> He [Sesay] was always very correct in his dealings with the ECOWAS leaders and his actions demonstrated that he was committed to fulfilling the RUF's part of the [Lomé] Accords. Sesay was always very honest and reliable. He never created any preconditions for the RUF's disarmament. This was in contrast to some of the other senior commanders who did not want the RUF to disarm unless Sankoh was released from prison. While Sesay was loyal to Sankoh, as all the RUF were, he did no attempt to use the disarmament process as a tool to secure Sankoh's freedom. Neither did he seek personal gain for himself. He behaved at all times in a straightforward and honourable way. He appeared to be such a contrast to the other commanders and indeed Sankoh himself, that he appeared to be an anomaly in the RUF movement.[339]

> Sesay also points to the fact that according to an attached letter from a former Senior Legal Adviser at UNAMSIL that in 2003 Sesay and Kallon informed the SRSG of an imminent coup d' état by some elements in the military.[340]

9681. para. 227: Standing in contrast to these clear statements describing Sesay as a reliable partner in the peace process however are his convictions by this Chamber for his part in the attacks directed against the UNAMSIL peacekeepers in May 2000. To this, the Sesay Defence submits that

> Sesay's failure to prevent or punish the perpetrators of the attacks is not inconsistent with the determination to disarm and bring the RUF through the peace process: his efforts were directed to disarming the RUF, rather than run the risks of causing further schisms by acting precipitously against key members of the RUF. Whilst this omission has been judges to be criminal, this failure to act arose through the determined intention to bring peace and reconciliation to Sierra Leone, rather than reflecting any disregard for the international community. There is nothing to suggest that Sesay used his leadership position, after the abductions, except to try and ameliorate the overall situation and thereafter bring the conflict to an end.[341]

9682. para. 228: The Chamber finds that the Defence have proved mitigating circumstances on the basis of a balance of probabilities in relation to Sesay's real and meaningful contribution to the peace process in Sierra Leone following his appointment as interim leader of the RUF, however, the Chamber does not accept Sesay's explanation of his reasons for failing to prevent or punish the perpetrators of the attacks against the UNAMSIL personnel, a direct affront to the international community's own attempts to facilitate peace in Sierra Leone.

9683. para. 229: Hon. Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissents on the Chamber's conclusions in relation to Sesay's contribution to the peace process in Sierra Leone.

9684. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 56: I highlight here for the purpose of this Dissent, Sesay's plea for mitigation in relation to his Facilitation of the Peace and Reconciliation Process.

9685. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 57: In this regard, the Chamber made the following unanimous findings:

> The Defence have proved mitigating circumstances on the basis of a balance of probabilities in relation to Sesay's real and meaningful contribution to the peace process in Sierra Leone following his appointment as interim leader of the RUF.

9686. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 58: The dissent is based on the Chamber Majority decision that follows the unanimous decision of the Chamber and states as follows after the word 'RUF'. It reads as follows:

> However, the Chamber does not accept Sesay's explanation of his reasons for failing to prevent or to punish the perpetrators of the attacks against UNAMSIL personnel, a direct affront to the International Community's own attempts to facilitate peace in Sierra Leone.[20]

9687. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 59: The Majority Judgment in this regard very conspicuously fails to make any mention of whether this mitigating circumstance which the Chamber found was proved, on the balance of probabilities, entitles Mr. Sesay to take the benefit of mitigating circumstances with a view to reducing the sentences which we have impose on him.

9688. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 60: Since I consider this silence to which I made no contribution, on the part of the Chamber Majority to make a pronouncement on this issue, as a rejection of Sesay's plea for mitigation which I find very deserving and well founded on this ground, I would like to dissent from that decision rejecting or refusing to grant mitigating circumstances in his favour after the Chamber had unanimously found, that Sesay's defence have proved mitigating circumstance on the 'Facilitation of the Peace and Reconciliation Process' ground in question.

9690. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 62: I entirely believe the evidence of Sesay when he testified that some of the top ranking officers of the RUF were against disarmament just as they were against Sesay for disarming without making the release of Sankoh from prison as a condition precedent. I believe that Sesay, in such circumstances took a grave risk in the light of the discontent and unhappiness of some of his colleagues at his ascension to the top position of leadership of the RUF after Foday Sankoh and after Bockarie abandoned the movement in December 1999.

9691. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 63: In fact, I believe the statement of H.E. Alpha Konare, the former President of Mali in which he said.

> In contrast, there were some of the other Senior Commanders who did not want to disarm unless Sankoh was released from prison.

9692. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 64: I also entirely attach credit to and believe the statement of the former SRSG Oluyemi Adeniji who reinforces the testimonial of Ex President Konare and also recognizes Sesay's contribution in the following words:

> As the peace process progressed to disarmament stage, Sesay showed that he was able to make promises and keep them. He was, undoubtedly directing a lot of his energies towards bringing the RUF to disarmament in the face of internal opposition[21]

9693. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 65: I can indeed attest to the fact that the Chamber unanimous Decision on this issue was influenced by the testimonies of these two dignitaries.

9694. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 66: In the light of the foregoing analysis, Sesay, in my opinion, more than deserves to be accorded mitigating circumstances on these score, for his positive involvement in the facilitation of the peace and reconciliation process in Sierra Leone that was championed and patronised by some Heads of State of the West African Region, including Ex President Alpha Konare of Mali.

9695. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 67: There may well have been no peace if Sesay did not embrace the peace process and take the bold and risky initiative to encourage disarmament. If Sesay were not on board the peace process, peace would in any event, have certainly been achieved in Sierra Leone but, I dare say, at a renewed, continued, and bloody cost, which, we must admit, Sesay pre-empted and prevented.

9696. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 68: In this regard, and to demonstrate that Sesay took a risk to facilitate the peace process even when Sankoh was still in detention, I again entirely believe Sesay's evidence when in his testimony he told the Chamber of how he was rebuffed by Sankoh when he paid him a visit at a time he was hospitalized in the Choithram Hospital.

9697. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 69: Accordingly, I, for my part, and in light of the foregoing, do clearly find and conclude that Sesay is entitled to benefit from mitigating circumstances in this sentencing judgment for his positive of contribution to the restoration of peace in Sierra Leone.

vi. Family circumstances

9698. para. 230: The Chamber finds that nothing in Sesay's family situation that would necessitate mitigating his sentence.

vii. Remorse

9699. para. 231: The Chamber considers that Sesay's statement of remorse was not sincere. Sesay essentially emphasised what he considered were his moderate attributes as a leader, which he claimed propelled the regional ECOWAS leaders to appoint him as the Interim leader of the RUF.

9700. para. 232: The Chamber does accept however that Sesay has expressed empathy with the victims of the conflict, and to this extent will grant him a very limited mitigation in respect of his sentence.

e. Disposition, p. 93-94:

9701. For the foregoing reasons, the Chamber hereby sentences Issa Hasan Sesay to the following:

> For Count 1: Acts of Terrorism, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(d) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 52 years;
>
> For Count 2: Collective Punishments, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(b) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 45 years;
>
> For Count 3: Extermination, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(b) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 33 years;
>
> For Count 4: Murder, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 40 years;
>
> For Count 5: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 40 years;
>
> For Count 6: Rape, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF 45 YEARS;

For Count 7: Sexual slavery, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 45 years;

For Count 8: Other inhumane acts, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(i) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 40 years;

For Count 9: Outrages upon personal dignity, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(e) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 35 years;

For Count 10: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular mutilation, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(a) of the Statute, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF 50 YEARS;

For Count 11: Other inhumane acts, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(i) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 40 years;

For Count 12: Conscripting or enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups, or using them to participate actively in hostilities, an Other Serious Violation of International Humanitarian Law, punishable under Article 4(c) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 50 years;

For Count 13: Enslavement, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(c) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 50 years;

For Count 14: Pillage, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(f) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 20 years;

For Count 15: Intentionally directing attacks against personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, an Other Serious Violation of International Humanitarian Law, punishable under Article 4(b) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 51 years;

For Count 17: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 45 years;

Orders that these sentences shall run and be served concurrently.

(iii) Kallon

a. Convictions and form of liability

9702. para. 233: The Chamber recalls the crimes for which Kallon has been convicted, and the form of liability for each crime, as set out above in Section II of this Sentencing Judgement.

b. Form and degree of responsibility

i. Personal commission

9703. para. 234: The Chamber recalls its findings above in relation to the nature and physical impact of crimes of unlawful killings, use of child soldiers and committing attacks against peacekeepers.[342]

9704. para. 235: Kallon's personal conduct and interaction with his subordinate RUF Commander Rocky prompted Rocky to order the death of a Nigerian female called Waikyoh in Wendedu in Kono District.[343] Kallon's involvement in the murder of the woman was direct and serious, and the Chamber notes that she was killed because Kallon was concerned that if Waiyoh escaped she would disclose information on RUF positions to ECOMOG and, as Kallon's subordinate Rocky later told the civilians, if she escaped she would disclose their position to ECOMOG and the camp would be bombarded by ECOMOG jets.[344]

9706. para. 237: In relation to Kallon's liability for attacks on UNAMSIL peacekeepers, the Chamber recalls its findings that Kallon was directly involved in many of those attacks. For instance, we have found that Kallon struck Major Salahuedin in the face and attempted to stab him with a bayonet. He was also involved in five other separate attacks, including ordering an attack against a convoy of 100 Zambian Peacekeepers resulting in their capture by approximately 1000 RUF fighters.[346] In addition to his direct involvement, his participation was characterised by a heightened level of aggression. Considering the exceptional gravity of the crimes, condemned in the strongest terms by the UN Security Council in Resolution 1313,[347] and Kallon's primary role in their commission, the Chamber concludes that the gravity of Kallon's criminal conduct reaches the highest level.

ii. JCE

9708. para. 239: With respect to the form and degree of Kallon's participation in the joint criminal enterprise, the Chamber recalls its findings that Kallon was one of the few RUF commanders to be a member of the AFRC Supreme Council, which was a privileged position in the Junta governing body, and that he attended meetings on a fairly regular basis.[349] The Chamber recalls that it was satisfied that his involvement in the governing body of the Junta substantially contributed to the joint criminal enterprise, as this body was involved in the decision-making processes through which the Junta regime determined how best to secure power and maintain control over the territory over Sierra Leone.[350] The Chamber recalls that Kallon was also directly involved in crimes committed in the diamond mining areas of Kenema District. He used his bodyguards to force civilians to mine diamonds at Tongo Field, a practice which was prevalent among senior RUF and AFRC Commanders.[351] The Chamber also found that on two occasions, Kallon was present at the mining pits in Tongo Field when SBUs and other rebels shot into the pits, killing unarmed enslaved civilian miners.[352] The Chamber held in the Judgement that Kallon endorsed the enslavement and the killing of civilians in order to control and exploit natural resources vital to the financial survival of the Junta Government.[353]

9709. para. 240: We recall that the crimes committed in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise, which "intended through the spread of extreme fear and punishment to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over the captured territory"[354] and concludes they were crimes of a shocking nature, deserving of condemnation in the strongest terms possible. Considering our findings regarding Kallon's important role within the enterprise as a senior military leader and member of the Supreme Council, the Chamber concludes that Kallon's level of participation in the joint criminal enterprise was that of a Senior Commander, whose participation in important decision making processes and personal involvement in the commission of crimes made him a key player in the regime. Considering also that the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise engulfed scores of civilians, spread over several Districts, and were perpetrated over an extended period of time, the Chamber concludes that Kallon's contribution to the offences committed was substantial, and his culpability thus reaches a high level.

iii. Command responsibility

9711. para. 241: The Chamber has found Kallon liable pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for Counts 1, 7-9, 13, 15 and 17. The Chamber recalls its findings in relation to the nature and physical impact of these crimes including unlawful killings, sexual violence crimes, enslavement, and crimes against UNAMSIL personnel.[355] Where those acts have also been found to constitute either Acts of Terrorism or Collective Punishments (Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment) the Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.

9712. para. 242: We recall that in Kono District in February/March 1998, Kallon as a superior officer of the RUF had the capacity to give orders to his subordinates.[356] However, by virtue of the complex culture of status, assignment and rank within the RUF there were senior RUF Commanders in Kono District over whom Kallon did not have effective control, such as Superman, Isaac Mongor and RUF Rambo.[357]

9713. para. 243: As an operational commander, he ordered the fighters under his command to lay ambush at the Guinea-Highway,[358] to maintain contact with Battalion commanders. He had personal bodyguards and addressed muster parades in his leadership role.[359] In addition, Kallon held a supervisory role at the RUF run camps in which hundreds of civilians were detained.[360] He also had the authority to grant permission to civilians to obtain travel passes.[361] In his leadership role, Kallon had the ability to assign commanders for missions.[362] He was further found liable pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for events relating to the attacks directed against the UNAMSIL peacekeepers by the RUF fighters.

9714. para. 244: The Chamber further recalls that as a superior, Kallon was found liable for eight attacks and the killing of four UNAMSIL peacekeepers.[363] At the time of commission of these crimes, as the BGC, Kallon was the de jure and de facto third in command in the whole RUF hierarchy. He was also the second in command and deputy to Sesay, who was then the most senior military commander of the RUF. He had the responsibility for the Makeni-Magburaka area where the UNAMSIL events predominately occurred.[364] 9715. para. 245: The Chamber recalls its findings that during the events following the attacks on UNAMSIL peacekeepers, Kallon was the senior RUF Commander on 3 May 2000 at Moria near Makeni when children were used to ambush the UNAMSIL forces.[365] The Chamber observes that Kallon as one of the most superior commanders in that area, at that particular time, issued and addressed orders to commanders regarding the events leading to the attacks on the UNAMSIL peacekeepers. These orders were implemented by Kallon's subordinates who in turn reported and sought further instructions from him. We recall that Kallon also maintained direct contact with Sankoh who passed orders to him.[366] The Chamber further notes that Kallon in his position as a senior commander had the authority and capacity to punish his subordinates, for instance on one occasion he punished an unidentified RUF fighter for his involvement in an accident. By virtue of his position, Kallon also received communications and regular reports regarding the UNAMSIL peacekeepers,[367] however he made no attempt to prevent and punish the perpetrators of the attacks on the peacekeepers.

9716. para. 246: Considering his position as a superior commander, his high ranking, his status as a Vanguard and his real authority and power to control all subordinate commanders in the area at that time, and his personal involvement and failure to prevent or punish the crimes of subordinates, the Chamber concludes that the gravity of Kallon's criminal conduct in relation to his 6(3) responsibility is of the highest level, for which appropriate punishment shall be issued.

c. Aggravating factors

9718. para. 247: The Chamber recalls its findings that in April 1998, during the AFRC/RUF retreat from Koidu, RUF Commander Major Rocky and a group of rebels arrived at the Sunna Mosque in Koidu and captured a large group of civilians. The civilians were taken away, some were executed and beheaded. TF1-015 was ordered to accompany the rebels back to the Sunna Mosque. Upon arrival at the Mosque, he met 30 Commanders, including Kallon and Rambo.[368] Rambo was not happy that TF1-015 was still alive and proposed that the other Commanders vote on whether or not he should be killed. The rebels, including Kallon, voted on TF1-015's life, with the result being that he was allowed by a majority of one vote, to live.[369] The Chamber finds that the fact that civilians were abducted from a Mosque- a traditional place of civilian safety and sanctuary- and that the same site was further used by the rebels, including Kallon, in voting on TF1-015's life, constitutes an aggravating factor.

9719. para. 248: Aside from this, the Chamber finds that, beyond those general and individual circumstances already considered by the Chamber under the gravity of Kallon's criminal conduct,[370] the Prosecution has not established beyond a reasonable doubt any additional aggravating factors as to Kallon's conduct for the crimes for which we have convicted him.

i. Accused's conduct during trial

9720. para. 249: The Chamber does not accept the Prosecution's submission that Kallon's "defiant attitude" during trial is an aggravating circumstance, indeed we consider that it has not been established that Kallon acted in such a manner. We have made no such findings and we add that at no time did Kallon exhibit such an attitude in court.

d. Mitigating circumstances

i. Forced recruitment

9721. para. 250: The Chamber is of the opinion that Kallon's forced recruitment into the RUF cannot mitigate the crimes which Kallon later committed, since in our opinion he could instead have chosen another path.

ii. Lack of prior criminal conduct

9722. para. 251: The Chamber has duly noted that it has not been demonstrated that Kallon has any prior criminal convictions. Although the Chamber has considered this factor we are of the opinion that only very limited weight can be given to it.

iii. Good character and contributions

9723. para. 252: The Chamber notes that the Kallon Defence presented Kallon's efforts in the improvement of the well-being of the civilian population by providing social amenities like schools, mosques churches and markets. The Chamber observes that this evidence demonstrates that Kallon on occasion gave assistance to civilians. Such a conclusion however would do little in our opinion to show Kallon's good character, as it simultaneously demonstrates his ability to influence RUF systems in relation to the well-being of civilians, but did not use it consistently. The Chamber considers that the assistance he gave on occasion should not be given undue weight in mitigation.

iv. Amnesty

9724. para. 253: The Chamber reaffirms that amnesty is no bar to prosecution for the crimes Kallon stands convicted. The Chamber considers Kallon's submission on the issue moot and finds that it cannot be taken into account as a mitigating factor.

v. Family circumstances

9725. para. 254: The Kallon Defence submits that the fact that Kallon is married with three wives and nine children should be considered as a mitigating factor. The Chamber is aware that punishment has an impact on the lives of persons other than the convicted person. The relatives of the convicted person, in particular are likely to suffer from the consequences of the sentence. However, considering the gravity of the crimes for which Kallon has been convicted, the Chamber finds that Kallon's personal family circumstances can have only a minimal impact on his sentence.

vi. Remorse

9726. para. 255: At the sentencing hearing, Kallon personally delivered a statement of remorse, an extract of which has been set out above in Section IV.3. To the knowledge of this Chamber, it is uncommon that a convicted person standing before an international court makes a statement of genuine remorse. In his statement, Kallon also recognised that he played a role in the conflict and sought forgiveness for his actions which claimed the lives of unknown number of civilians. He further apologised to the victims of the war and their relatives, his family, his country, ECOWAS, UNAMSIL and the international community as a whole. Kallon clearly recognises the pain and suffering borne by all the persons affected by the war, and accepts his own role within the conflict.

9727. para. 256: For the Chamber to admit remorse as a mitigating factor in the determination of an appropriate sentence, it must be satisfied that the remorse expressed was sincere.[371] The Chamber is thus satisfied, and Kallon's sincere acknowledgement of his role in the conflict and his apology to the people for the role that he played has been taken into account as a mitigating factor to reduce his sentence.

vii. Executing orders

9728. para. 257: The Chamber notes that the Kallon Defence advanced duress and acting under superior orders as separate mitigating factors in support for Kallon. The Chamber shall consider these factors under the above heading 'Executing Orders,' however, this does not necessarily imply that they are the same.

9729. para. 258: The Kallon Defence submits that Kallon was acting under duress with specific regard to the UNAMSIL events. They submit that Kallon was under threat and forced to obey Sankoh's orders to arrest the peacekeepers. The Kallon Defence further avers that since his recruitment, Kallon found himself in an organisation that operated in an atmosphere of duress and fear. The Kallon Defence have consider as superior orders, the orders given by Sankoh as the RUF leader and orders by Sam Bockarie's as de facto RUF leader, and claim these orders were 'ultimatums that carried severe penalties upon default.'[372]

9730. para. 259: As a preliminary note, the Chamber notes that Kallon has not established on balance of probabilities, Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissenting, that in fact his life was under actual threat in event that he failed to obey these orders. With specific regard to the UNAMSIL events for which Kallon claims he was acting under duress and superior orders, the Chamber emphasises that Kallon was found liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for these acts. Kallon was personally in a superior position, issuing orders. The Chamber, Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissenting, finds that Kallon's liability under Article 6(3) of the Statute negates him from raising these defences.

9731. para. 260: On a balance of probabilities, the Chamber finds, Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissenting, that the Kallon Defence submission does not establish that Kallon was acting under duress and/or pursuant to a superior's orders.

9732. para. 261: The Chamber has further addressed itself to the provision of Article 6(4) of the Statute which provides that:

> 'The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation or punishment if the Special Court determines that justice so requires.'

9733. para. 262: Cautious of the above provision, the Chamber emphasises that it is implausible that Kallon acted under duress and/or superior orders with respect to the UNAMSIL events. The Chamber further recalls that the evidence on record indicates that in early 2000 Sankoh appointed Kallon the Battle Group commander,[373] a couple of months after Sankoh was arrested in Freetown on treason [charges374] and Sam Bockarie had left the RUF membership in December 1999.[375] As we have stated earlier, the Chamber considers that Kallon was one of the most superior commanders in the area, and who was in effective control.[376] In light of the foregoing reasons, the Chamber, Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe dissenting, considers that the Defence has not established, on a balance of probabilities, that this is a factor in mitigation of sentence.

9734. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 70: Kallon, the 2nd accused, makes a plea, amongst other grounds and reasons he has advanced, that mitigating circumstances be accorded to him under Article 6(4) of the Statute which provides as follows:

> The fact that an Accused person acted pursuant to an order of a government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of Criminal responsibility but may be considered in mitigation or punishment if the Special Court determines that justice so requires.

9735. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 71: The Chamber is accordingly empowered, if it so decides in the interests of justice, to accord Kallon, the mitigating circumstances he is soliciting.

9736. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 72: On the Kallon submission and plea, I observe that an analysis of the evidence and the Command Structure of the RUF shows that even though Kallon, at the time of the UNAMSIL Personnel incident, was the Battle Group Commander, he was under the orders of Sesay who was the Battle Field Commander. In addition and on the other hand, he also received instructions at times directly from Foday Sankoh. Indeed, as we have learnt from the testimony of the Defence witnesses, Sankoh could communicate directly with any commander at whatever level and issue instructions to him directly without passing through his superior in hierarchy, and vice versa.

9737. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 73: As I have mentioned in the Sesay analysis, all the RUF Commanders were not in favour of disarmament. Foday Sankoh himself who had earlier consented to disarmament was beginning to retract from the process.

9738. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 74: What is in fact also established from the records is the fact that Kallon was quite closed and faithful to Sesay. He was in fact on his side during the RUF leadership race where Sesay faced opposition from formidable front line aspirants like Mike Lamin, who conditioned RUF disarmament to Sankoh's release from prison.22

9739. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 75: In fact, from the communications between Sankoh and Officers on the ground like Kallon, it was clear, and I make that inference and conclusion from the surrounding circumstances and comportment of the Commanders on the grounds that he gave them instructions not to cooperate and longer in the process and that if they did, they would incur severe penalties.

9740. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 76: Such instructions, coming from Sankoh, their leader who was described as being very erratic and who even executed close associates like Mohamed Tarawally23 had to be taken seriously.

9741. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 77: From the build up of events from mid April 2000, it was clear, and I again make this conclusion through an inference from the facts and situation on the ground, that the RUF no longer wanted to continue with the disarmament process and that they had received instructions in this regards from the hierarchy to stop the process. The violent Gbao eruption and intrusion as we have found, in the DDR Camp, demanding the release of disarmed Child Soldiers, followed by the RUF attacks on UNAMSIL Staff in Makump, was as a result, in my considered opinion, of orders received from their superiors, which orders obliged to carry out under pain of severe penalties, not excluding that of his execution which in the circumstances and having regard to the command discipline in there movement, was not a strange phenomenon in the RUF Organisation.

9742. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 78: It is therefore, my finding, and in so doing, I dissent from the Majority Chamber judgment rejecting it, that the plea for executing 'Executive Orders' put up by Kallon is very well founded and that he is further, in addition to the benefit that has been accorded to him for his expression of remorse which the Chamber has endorsed and found as sincere and credible, also entitled to take the benefit of further mitigating circumstances under Article 6(4) of the Statute, in the light of the argument advanced in this regard.

9743. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 79: Very contrary to the Majority finding24 that Kallon has not established on the balance of probabilities, that his life was under actual threat in the event that he failed to obey these Orders from which I, very respectfully dissents, I on the contrary, and from the above analysis, do find that he was acting under duress, and pursuant to superior orders and that he faced a real and indeed, a possible execution if he had not executed those orders.

9744. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 80: I agree with our general approach in this judgment to highlight the gravity of some of the offences for which the Accused have been convicted by alluding to the scale of their commission and their impact on the victims, particularly on their vulnerability and their pain and suffering for purposes of determining the sentence to be imposed. As I have already mentioned however, extreme caution must be exercised to avoid "double Counting" because the gravity of these offences is, and relying on the jurisprudence of International Criminal Tribunal, clearly defined in the ingredients of the offence which we have found established and proven before arriving at a verdict of guilty.

Orders that these sentences shall run and be served concurrently.

(iv) Gbao

i. Convictions and form of liability

9746. para. 263: The Chamber recalls the crimes for which Gbao has been convicted, and the form of liability for each crime, as set out above in Section II of this Sentencing Judgement.

b. Form and degree of responsibility

i. Personal commission

9747. para. 264: The Chamber recalls its findings in relation to the nature and physical impact of crimes against UNAMSIL Personnel.[377] Gbao was found guilty by the Chamber of aiding and abetting the attacks directed against Salahuedin and Jaganathan on 1 May 2000 and found that he deliberately fomented an atmosphere of hostility and orchestrated an armed confrontation at that Makump DDR camp.[378] The gravity of this crime is high. However the Chamber recognises that Gbao was not primarily responsible for the attack, and may not have been able to prevent it,[379] although he remains criminally responsible for his direct involvement in it.

ii. JCE

9749. para. 266: The Chamber recalls its finding that Gbao's status, assignment, rank and personal relationship with Sankoh, as well as his knowledge of the RUF's ideology were all factors demonstrating that Gbao had considerable prestige and power within the RUF in Kailahun District.381 Gbao's supervisory role entailed the monitoring of the implementation of the ideology.[382] We also recall that we found that the RUF ideological objective of toppling the "selfish and corrupt" regime by eliminating all those who supported that regime and who, a fortiori, were considered as enemies to the AFRC/RUF Junta alliance.[383] The Chamber, by a majority, Justice Boutet dissenting, found that:

> […] Gbao was an ideology instructor and that ideology played a significant role in the RUF movement as it ensured not only the fighters' submission and compliance with the orders and instructions of the RUF leadership but also hardened their determination, their resolve and their commitment to fight to ensure the success and achievement of the ideology of the movement. It was in this spirit that the crimes alleged in the Indictment and for which the Accused are charged, were committed. Given this consideration, it is undeniable therefore, that the ideology played a central role in the objectives of the RUF.[384]

9750. para. 267: The Chamber recalls that Gbao was also directly involved in the planning and enslavement of civilian labour on RUF government farms in Kailahun District, and worked very closely with the G5 in Kailahun Town to manage the large-scale, forced civilian farming that existed in Kailahun between 1996 and 2001, including the period between 25 May 1997 and 14 February 1998.[385] Furthermore, Gbao's involvement in designing, securing and organising the forced labour of civilians to produce foodstuffs significantly contributed to maintaining the strength and cohesiveness of the RUF fighting force.[386] Despite having knowledge that crimes were being committed by RUF fighters on a large scale, Gbao continued to pursue the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise.[387]

9751. para. 268: The Chamber recalls however that Gbao did not have direct control over fighters. He was not a member of the AFRC/RUF Supreme Council, and he remained in Kailahun during the Junta regime.[388] He did not have the ability to contradict or influence the orders of men such as Sam Bockarie. He was not directly involved and did not share the criminal intent of any of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema or Kono Districts.[389]

9752. para. 269: The Chamber has found that crimes committed in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise, which "intended through the spread of extreme fear and punishment to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over the captured territory"[390] were crimes of a shocking nature, deserving of condemnation in the strongest terms possible.

9753. para. 270: We have also found that Gbao's personal role within the overall enterprise was neither at the policy making level, nor was it at the "fighting end" where the majority of the actual atrocities were committed. Indeed, as the Gbao Defence pointed out in its closing submissions, Gbao "has not been found to have ever fired a single shot and never to have ordered the firing of a single shot".[391] Gbao was a loyal and committed functionary of the RUF organisation, whose major contributions to the joint criminal enterprise can be characterised by his role as an ideology instructor and his planning and direct involvement in the enslavement of civilians on RUF government farms within Kailahun District.

9754. para. 271: Whilst the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise for which Gbao has been convicted are vast and atrocious, the Chamber recognises that Gbao's involvement within the overall scheme, whilst sufficient in law to attract criminal liability, was more limited than that of his co-defendants. The Chamber thus finds Gbao's individual contribution to the joint criminal enterprise, and his own particular criminal responsibility, to be on the lower end of the continuum, and considers his role as diminishing his responsibility for sentencing purposes.

9755. See above: Sentencing – RUF – Sentencing Judgment – Gravity of Offences – General Comments - Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe – paras. 30-37 [9540].

9756. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 86: In the submissions of the Defence Teams and in particular, those of the Gbao Defence Team, it has been argued to support their plea for mitigating circumstances that in our CDF decision, we admitted and validated the argument that the liability and penalty to be inflicted on indirect perpetrator, like was found in favour of Accused Persons in the CDF case, should indeed be less than that of the direct perpetrators of the crimes charged under the Joint Criminal Enterprise liability.

9757. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 87: Paradoxically, I still have to use here, the recurring example of the horrendous crimes which were committed by Staff Alhaji and the insurgent rebel fighters who were under his control and command at the time of the commission, and which the Chamber has reflected and narrated in both the main and the sentencing judgment in the case and do relate the Staff Alhaji situation to the precedent of the CDF case.

9758. Separate concurring opinion and Dissents – Justice Itoe, para. 88: I consider and am respectfully of the pinion that the same measure of mitigating should, in this regard, and on this score, be accorded to the three Convicts in this case.

c. Aggravating factors

9759. para. 272: Gbao was convicted by the Chamber of aiding and abetting the attacks directed against Salahuedin and Jaganathan at the Makump DDR camp on 1 May 2000, where he was "the senior RUF Commander present until Kallon's arrival and he remained the Commander with the largest number of fighters present".[392] The Chamber finds that Gbao's abuse of his position of leadership and authority to be an aggravating factor in his criminal conduct on that occasion.

9760. para. 273: The Prosecution submits that Gbao's education, training as a police office and experience serve as aggravating factors to the offences for which he has been convicted. The Chamber does not agree, and sees nothing extraordinary in Gbao's prior education, training and experience which should properly be considered as aggravating factors.

9761. para. 274: The Prosecution further submits that the Chamber should consider Gbao's desire for pecuniary gain as an aggravating factor, and highlights the fact that Gbao was convicted for participation in a joint criminal enterprise with regard to enslavement in Kenema, Kailahun and Kono district, and that civilians were forced to work on Gbao's personal farm in 1997 and 1998, the produce of which was for his own personal use. The Chamber understands that the desire for pecuniary gain can be considered as an aggravating factor for some offences, however for the offence of enslavement, where the circumstances consisted of forcing civilian labour on farms, there is always going to be an element of pecuniary gain, and this in itself cannot be considered as an aggravating factor in these circumstances.

9762. para. 275: Gbao's behaviour during trial has been cited as an aggravating factor by the Prosecution, his "lack of respect for the judicial process in his refusal to attend court" as well as the fact that for a significant period of time Gbao refused to recognise the jurisdiction of the court.[393] The Chamber recalls that the jurisdiction of the court is itself a question which the Chamber and the Appeals Chamber have been called to pronounce upon in the past and legitimately so. We are therefore of the opinion that challenging the Court's jurisdiction is always a justiciable issue and cannot be considered an aggravating factor in sentencing because it is a fundamental legal right of an accused to raise any legal issue he considers valid to ensure his defence. The Chamber would therefore be contravening his universally accepted fundamental right if we were to uphold the Prosecution's thesis in this respect because such submission is clearly misconceived and fundamentally flawed in law.

9763. para. 276: In the same vein, the Chamber opines that Gbao's refusal at one stage to attend trial cannot be considered an aggravating circumstance. Rule 60 empowers the Chamber to continue the proceedings in the absence of an accused. Indeed, the Chamber proceeded in his absence when Gbao exercised his right own not to attend the proceedings.

d. Mitigating circumstances

i. Remorse

9764. para. 277: The Chamber is unable to conclude that Gbao has demonstrated genuine remorse for the crimes for which he has been convicted, and thus gives no weight in mitigation of sentence in this respect.

ii. Advanced age

9765. para. 278: The Chamber does not accept the Defence's submission that life expectancy is a relevant factor in sentencing;394 however it does accept that a lengthy sentence can be harder to bear in older age. Gbao's age of 60 years has thus been taken into account as a relevant factor in mitigation of sentence.

iii. Lack of prior criminal conduct

9766. para. 279: The Chamber has duly noted that it has not been demonstrated that Gbao has any prior criminal convictions, and that the Chamber is obliged to consider this as a factor in mitigation of sentence. The Chamber has done so, however we are of the opinion that only very limited credit for this factor can be given where the crimes committed are of a very serious nature, such as in this case.

e. Dissents – Justice Boutet:

9767. Dissents – Justice Boutet – para. 1: I regret that I am not able to support the sentence the Chamber has imposed upon the Accused Augustine Gbao.

9768. Dissents – Justice Boutet – para. 2: In the Judgement rendered on 25 February 2009, I dissented on the conviction of Gbao in relation to Counts 1 to 11 and Count 14. As mentioned in my dissenting opinion I would have found Gbao only individually responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute for the planning of enslavement in Kailahun District, as charged under Count 13 of the Indictment, and for aiding and abetting the attacks against peacekeepers, as charged under Count 15 of the Indictment.1

9769. Dissents – Justice Boutet – para. 3: I respectfully dissent from the sentence imposed by my learned colleagues for Gbao's convictions on these two counts in the Sentencing Judgement. In my opinion, my learned colleagues have overstated the culpable criminal conduct of Augustine Gbao.

9770. Dissents – Justice Boutet – para. 4: Having carefully considered the gravity of the crimes for which I found Gbao to be criminally responsible, as well as his form and degree of participation in these crimes, his responsibility and his individual circumstances, I consider that a sentence of 15 years imprisonment for Count 13 of the Indictment, and 15 years imprisonment for Count 15 of the Indictment, sentences to run concurrently, would be appropriate.

f. Disposition, p. 96-98:

9771. Sentences Augustine Gbao, Justice Pierre Boutet dissenting, to the following:

> For Count 1: Acts of Terrorism, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(d) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 25 years;

For Count 2: Collective Punishments, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(b) of the Statute, term of imprisonment of 20 years;

For Count 3: Extermination, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(b) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 15 years;

For Count 4: Murder, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 15 years;

For Count 5: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 15 years;

For Count 6: Rape, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 15 years;

For Count 7: Sexual slavery, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 15 years;

For Count 8: Other inhumane acts, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(i) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 10 years;

For Count 9: Outrages upon personal dignity, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(e) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 10 years;

For Count 10: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular mutilation, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(a) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 20 years;

For Count 11: Other inhumane acts, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(i) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 11 years;

For Count 13: Enslavement, a Crime Against Humanity, punishable under Article 2(c) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 25 years;

For Count 14: Pillage, a Violation of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, punishable under Article 3(f) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 6 years;

For Count 15: Intentionally directing attacks against personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, an Other Serious Violation of International Humanitarian Law, punishable under Article 4(b) of the Statute, a term of imprisonment of 25 years;

Orders that these sentences shall run and be served concurrently.

2. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao, SCSL-04-15-A, Judgment, 26 October 2009

(a) Cumulative convictions

(i) Applicable law

9772. para. 1190: The jurisprudence on cumulative convictions has been thoroughly addressed at the international tribunals. The test to determine the permissibility of cumulative convictions was set out in the Čelebići Appeal Judgment, which stated:

> Having considered the different approaches expressed on this issue both within this Tribunal and other jurisdictions, this Appeals Chamber holds that reasons of fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions, lead to the conclusion that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.
> Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.[3300]

9773. para. 1191: The test applied is therefore two-part: first, it is permissible to enter cumulative convictions under different statutory provisions for the same criminal act if each statutory provision has a "materially distinct element" that is not contained in the other statutory provision.[3301] Second, if this is not the case then the conviction for the criminal act should be upheld under the "more specific provision."[3302] It is the legal elements of each statutory provision, and not the acts themselves that must be considered when applying this test.[3303] The issue of whether the same act can lead to a conviction under multiple statutory provisions is a question of law.[3304]

(ii) Cumulative convictions for extermination as a crime against humanity (Count 3) and murder as a crime against humanity (Count 4)

9774. para. 1192: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber correctly stated the law on cumulative convictions with respect to Counts 3 and 4 when it held that "it is impermissible to convict for both murder as a crime against humanity and extermination as a crime against humanity under Count 4 and Count 3 based on the same conduct. What makes a statutory provision materially distinct is whether "it requires proof of a fact not required by the other."[3305] Murder as a crime against humanity does not contain a materially distinct element from extermination as a crime against humanity; they are only distinguished by the fact that extermination requires killings "on a massive scale."[3306] The crime of murder is therefore subsumed in the crime of extermination and consequently convictions under Counts 3 and 4 for the same underlying acts are impermissibly cumulative.

9775. para. 1193: Turning to the second prong of the test, since the first part of the Čelebići test was not met, we now turn to the issue under which count the convictions should be upheld. Following the principle in Čelebići the statutory provision that is more specific, that is, "contains an additional materially distinct element" should stand.[3307] Extermination as a crime against humanity contains the additional element that the crime must be committed on a massive scale, which murder as a crime against humanity does not contain. Therefore, extermination as a crime against humanity is the more specific statutory provision and convictions for the above noted criminal conduct[3308] should stand under Count 3, but not under Count 4.

9776. para. 1194: The Appeals Chamber also notes that some of the conduct resulting in convictions under Count 4 is not part of the conviction under Count 3,[3309] and therefore the convictions for these underlying acts are not cumulative. These convictions therefore stand under Count 4 since it is permissible to convict on both counts if each count is based on distinct conduct.[3310]

9777. para. 1195: Having found that the Trial Chamber impermissibly entered cumulative convictions, the Appeals Chamber will take this holding into consideration in its determination of the sentence imposed under Count 4 for each of the Appellants.

(iii) Cumulative convictions for acts of terrorism (Count 1) and collective punishments (Count 2) with the war crimes of murder (Count 5), outrages upon personal dignity (Count 9), mutilations (Count 10) and pillage (Count 14)

9778. para. 1196: Kallon's second submission is that the war crimes of acts of terrorism (Count 1) and collective punishment (Count 2) are impermissibly cumulative with the convictions for war crimes of murder (Count 5), outrages upon personal dignity (Count 9), mutilations (Count 10) and pillage (Count 14).[3311] Kallon argues that the crimes of acts of terrorism and collective punishments have materially distinct elements, the intent to terrorise and the intent to punish, but the other war crimes that underlie these crimes do not have materially distinct elements "when they are encompassed within" the crimes of collective punishment and acts of terrorism.[3312] For example, Kallon explains if murder is included in the crime of collective punishment then the elements of murder becomes a part of the crime of collective punishment and "there is no added element of the death of the victim that is part of murder, but not part of the collective punishment when murder is a form of collective punishment."[3313]

9780. para. 1198: The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Trial Chamber's finding that the definition of the war crimes of collective punishment and acts of terrorism both contain materially distinct elements not present in the definitions of the crimes of murder, outrages upon personal dignity, mutilation and pillage.[3316] The crime of acts of terrorism requires proof of an intention to spread terror among the civilian population,[3317] and collective punishment requires proof of an intention to punish collectively.[3318] These elements are not contained in the war crimes of murder, outrages upon personal dignity, mutilations and pillage.[3319] Conversely, the war crime of murder requires proof of the death of the person,[3320] outrages upon personal dignity requires proof of humiliation, degradation or otherwise violation of the dignity of the person,[3321] mutilations requires proof of permanent disfigurement or disablement[3322] and pillage requires proof of unlawful appropriation of property,[3323] which the crimes of collective punishment and acts of terrorism do not contain.[3324] Consistent with the case law on cumulative convictions, the Appeals

Chamber upholds the Trial Chamber's findings that each crime requires proof of a materially distinct element, and therefore cumulative convictions are permissible for the war crimes of collective punishment and acts of terrorism with the war crimes of murder, outrages upon personal dignity, mutilations and pillage.[3325]

(iv) Conclusion

9781. para. 1199: The Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber erred in entering cumulative convictions under Counts 3 and 4 for the following acts:

> (i) in Bo District: the unlawful killings of an unknown number of civilians at Tikonko Junction; the unlawful killings of 14 civilians at a house in Tikonko; the unlawful killings of three civilians on the street in Tikonko; the unlawful killings of approximately 200 other civilians during an attack on Tikonko on 15 June 1997;
>
> (ii) the unlawful killings of over 63 civilians at Cyborg Pit in Tongo Field in Kenema District;
>
> (iii) in Kono District: the unlawful killings of about 200 civilians in Tombodu between February and March 1998; the unlawful killings of about 47 civilians in Tombodu between February and March 1998; the unlawful killings of three civilians in Tombodu sometime in March 1998; the unlawful killings of an unknown number of civilians by burning them alive in a house in Tombodu about March 1998; the unlawful killings of 30 to 40 civilians in April 1998 in Koidu Town; and
> (iv) the unlawful killings of three civilians by Bockarie and the ordered unlawful killings of 63 civilians in Kailahun Town, Kailahun District.

9782. para. 1200: The Appeals Chamber holds that the verdict of guilt under Count 4, murder as a Crime against Humanity, shall be reversed for these offences and the verdict of guilt under Count 3, extermination as a Crime against Humanity, shall be sustained.

(b) Standard of review for appeals against sentences

9783. para. 1201: The Appeals Chamber has previously set out the standard of review for appeals against sentences and hereafter reiterates the applicable principles.[3326] The relevant provisions on sentencing are set out in Article 19 of the Statute and Rules 99 to 105 of the Rules. According to Article 19, a Trial Chamber must take into account the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.[3327] The Statute also provides that in determining the term of imprisonment the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone, as appropriate.[3328] According to Rule 101 of the Rules, aggravating and mitigating circumstances, inter alia, shall be taken into account.[3329] Rule 101(c) of the Rules provides that the Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.[3330]

9784. para. 1202: Appeals against sentence, as appeals from a judgment of a Trial Chamber, are appeals stricto sensu. They are not trials de novo.[3331] Trial Chambers are vested with broad discretion in determining an appropriate sentence due to their obligation to individualise the penalties to fit the circumstances of the accused and the gravity of the crime.[3332] The Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings relevant to sentencing by the Trial Chamber.[3333] As a general rule, the Appeals Chamber will not revise a sentence unless the Appellant demonstrates that the Trial Chamber has committed a "discernible error" in exercising its discretion or has failed to follow the applicable law.[3334]

9785. para. 1203: In the Brima et al. and Fofana and Kondewa Appeal Judgments, the Appeals Chamber explained that to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion:

> the Appellant has to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber gave weight to extraneous or irrelevant considerations, failed to give weight or sufficient weight to relevant considerations, made a clear error as to the facts upon which it exercised its discretion, or that the Trial Chamber's decision was so unreasonable or plainly unjust that the Appeals Chamber is able to infer that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly.[3335]

(c) Sesay

(i) The form and degree of Sesay's participation in the crimes

9786. para. 1229: A Trial Chamber must ultimately impose a sentence that reflects the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct.[3420] This principle, the totality principle, requires that a sentence must reflect the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused, giving due consideration to the particular circumstances of the case and to the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crimes.[3421]

9787. para. 1230: Sesay contests the Trial Chamber's evaluation of his role in the crimes. To do so, he draws comparisons with the criminal conduct of others, but he does not directly challenge or address the Trial Chamber's numerous findings of the specific roles that he played. For example, Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber should have considered that his role was "remote" and "minimal," but he fails to address the extensive findings of his direct participation in crimes, such as his liability for planning enslavement and the use of children under the age of 15 to participate actively in hostilities, his superior responsibility for enslavement, attacks against peacekeepers and murder of peacekeepers. He also ignores the Trial Chamber's findings that at all relevant times he was an influential senior RUF commander and that during the JCE he was a member of the Supreme Council who furthered the Common Criminal Purpose by securing revenues, territory and manpower for the Junta government and by using criminal means to reduce or eliminate the civilian opposition to the Junta regime.

9788. para. 1231: The Appeals Chamber endorses the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that a Trial Chamber is not required to assess the participation of an accused in a JCE relative to the participation of other perpetrators when determining the overall level of the accused's participation.[3422] Sesay's reliance on the Krstić Appeals Judgment for this proposition is inapposite. The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Krstić held that:

> Radislav Krstić's guilt should have been assessed on an individual basis. The Appeals Chamber further agrees that the comparative guilt of other alleged co-conspirators, not adjudicated in this case, is not a relevant consideration.[3423]

9789. para. 1232: The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Krstić merely allowed that the Trial Chamber there "was entitled" to consider the accused's guilt "in context of the conduct of any alleged co-perpetrators."[3424] In the present case, the Trial Chamber specifically addressed Sesay's role with respect to Bockarie and Sesay's role in relation to others within the JCE and to his subordinates who committed the crimes for which he was convicted under Article 6(3) of the Statute. It noted Sesay's "very high position of authority within the RUF" and considered that he was "effectively the second highest senior RUF officer after Sam Bockarie."[3425] It further recalled its findings that:

> Sesay was a member of the AFRC Supreme Council, and participated in the meetings of this body throughout the Junta regime. Within the RUF, Sesay, together with Bockarie, approved the appointment of senior RUF commanders to deputy ministerial positions within the Junta government, in order to integrate the RUF into the AFRC regime. The Chamber concluded that given his power, authority, and influence, including his role, rank, and relationship with Bockarie, Sesay contributed significantly to the JCE."[3426]

9790. para. 1233: The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds no error in the Trial Chamber's assessment that Sesay's "level of participation was key to the furtherance of the objectives of the JCE" and that "his culpability reaches the highest level."[3427]

(ii) Double-counting the mens rea of acts of terrorism and collective punishments

9791. para. 1234: We endorse the ICTY Appeals Chamber's holding that with respect to alleged errors concerning the gravity of the offence or aggravating factors, an appellant must demonstrate that the Trial Chamber impermissibly double counted the factor in question.[3428]

9792. para. 1235: A Trial Chamber must ensure that they do not allow the same factor to detrimentally influence the Appellant's sentence twice. In the present case the Trial Chamber stated:

> The Chamber, Justice Itoe dissenting, is of the view that, where a particular act amounting to criminal conduct within the jurisdiction of the Court, such as murder or rape as a crime against humanity has also, because of the additional element of intent necessary for a conviction for acts of terrorism or collective punishments as a war crime, amounted to a crime as alleged in Counts 1 and 2 of the Indictment, for purposes of sentencing we will consider such acts of terrorism or collective punishment as factors which increase the gravity of the underlying offence.[3429]

9793. para. 1236: The Trial Chamber thus considered that the additional mens rea of specific intent which transformed an underlying offence into an act of terrorism or collective punishments increased the gravity of the underlying offence and it took this additional gravity of the offence into account for the purposes of determining the appropriate sentences under Counts 3-11, 13 and 14. In addition, the Trial Chamber entered a sentence for the convictions under Counts 1 and 2. By so doing, the Trial Chamber double-counted the specific intent of the offences of acts of terrorism and collective punishments: first, as increasing the gravity of the underlying offences, and second, as part of the offence of acts of terrorism and collective punishments. Both are reflected in the sentences imposed. Where a factor is not an element of a crime, that factor may be considered in aggravation of sentence. However, where a factor is an element of an offence for which a sentence is imposed, it cannot also constitute an aggravating factor for the purposes of sentencing.[3430]

9794. para. 1237: Having found that the Trial Chamber impermissibly double-counted the specific intent of acts of terrorism and collective punishments as increasing the gravity of the underlying offences, the Appeals Chamber will revise the sentences as appropriate.

(iii) Sesay's contribution to the peace process

9795. para. 1238: Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law in failing to attach any noticeable weight to Sesay's post-conflict conduct. Sesay contends that the test of whether his post-conflict conduct warranted mitigation is whether his contribution to the peace process amounted to a considerable contribution. If this considerable contribution standard was met, then, Sesay asserts, the Trial Chamber was required to attach weight to this factor in mitigation of his sentence. According to Sesay, the fact that he was convicted under Counts 15 and 17 for a failure to prevent and punish the perpetrators of attacks against UNAMSIL peacekeepers is irrelevant to the Trial Chamber's consideration of how much weight to attach to Sesay's post-conflict conduct as a mitigating factor. Sesay contends the Plavšić case indicates he is entitled to mitigation, notwithstanding his role in the UNAMSIL attacks.

9796. para. 1239: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay "proved mitigating circumstances on the balance of the probabilities in relation to Sesay's real and meaningful contribution to the peace process in Sierra Leone following his appointment as interim leader of the RUF."[3431] The Trial Chamber's consideration of post-conflict conduct as a mitigating factor for sentencing purposes is consistent with prior cases at this court and other international criminal tribunals.[3432] Despite finding that Sesay established a mitigating circumstance, however, the Trial Chamber did not state what weight it attached to this factor. By failing to do so, the Trial Chamber erred in law in failing to provide a reasoned opinion in writing. Instead, it stated that it "did not accept Sesay's explanation of his reasons for failing to prevent or punish the perpetrators of the attacks against the UNAMSIL personnel, a direct affront to the international community's own attempts to facilitate peace in Sierra Leone."[3433] Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber was not entitled to consider his liability for crimes against peacekeepers in relation to his post-conflict conduct for the purposes of sentencing. The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, disagrees. The Trial Chamber could reasonably have considered that Sesay's failure to punish his subordinates for crimes against UNAMSIL peacekeepers, including while he was interim leader of the RUF, undermined the international community's attempts to facilitate peace in Sierra Leone. As the Trial Chamber held:

> it is utterly reprehensible that such a senior military commander, who was in a position of authority and had effective control of subordinate commanders and troops, would allow, or would allow to go unchecked, attacks directed against a UN Peacekeeping Force that had been deployed as a result of the Lomé Peace Accord, to which the RUF was one of the signatories. UN Peacekeepers act at the behest of the international community in order to preserve the peace for the benefit of ordinary civilians. Sesay's conduct as overall military commander can only be condemned in the strongest terms possible, and the Chamber considers the gravity of Sesay's criminal conduct in this regard to reach the highest level.[3434]
>
> The Appeals Chamber endorses the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that "proof of mitigating circumstances does not automatically entitle an appellant to a 'credit' in the determination of the sentence."[3435] The weight to be attached to a mitigating circumstance is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber,[3436] and an Appellant bears "the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion" in the weight it attached.[3437] Sesay has not fulfilled this burden on appeal, and his submissions are therefore rejected.

9797. Dissents – Justice Fisher, para. 55, p. 527: The Trial Chamber found that Sesay's contribution to the peace process in Sierra Leone was a mitigating factor.[76] The Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber erred in law by failing to state what weight it attached to this mitigating factor.[77] Nonetheless, the Majority dismisses Sesay's claim that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to attach any weight to this factor because, it holds, Sesay fails to meet "the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion."[78]

9798. Dissents – Justice Fisher, para. 56, p. 527: I concur with the Majority that the Trial Chamber erred in law. I am unable to agree with the manner in which it then disposes of the issue. I fail to see how Sesay could have demonstrated how the Trial Chamber abused its discretion when the Trial Chamber itself did not state how, or even if, it used its discretion in weighing the effect of Sesay's post-conflict conduct once it found that conduct to be a mitigating factor in determining Sesay's sentence. Sesay cannot be expected to demonstrate an error in a finding the Trial Chamber did not make.

9799. Dissents – Justice Fisher, para. 57, p. 527-528: The Trial Chamber considered "several witness statements lending support to the suggestion that Sesay made a critical contribution to the peace process."[79] Among them were statements by the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the UN to Sierra Leone from 1999-2003 (and subsequently Chair of the African Union), Oluyemi Adeniji, and by the President of ECOWAS from 1999-2000 and former President of Mali, Alpha Konaré.[80] Mr. Adeniji stated that Sesay "undoubtedly, directed a lot of his energies towards bringing the RUF to disarmament in the face of internal opposition." For his part, Mr. Konaré stated that Sesay "never created any preconditions for the RUF's disarmament" and "appeared to be such a contrast to the other commanders and indeed Sankoh himself, that he appeared to be an anomaly in the RUF movement."[81]

9800. Dissents – Justice Fisher, para. 58, p. 528: The Trial Chamber's failure to explain how it weighed this and other evidence regarding Sesay's post-conflict conduct in mitigation, or if it weighed it at all, was a legal error. Having found that this conduct constituted a mitigating factor, the Trial Chamber was obliged to take it into account[82] and provide a reasoned opinion as to how it took it into account. Rather than hypothesizing on how the Trial Chamber approached this issue,[83] the Appeals Chamber should itself have considered Sesay's mitigating post-conflict conduct when reconsidering his sentence.

9801. Dissents – Justice Winter, para.5, p. 482-483: In addition to this clarification, I also wish to express my complete agreement with the reasoning and conclusions expressed by Hon. Justice Fisher in her Partially Dissenting and Concurring Opinion insofar as it pertains to Gbao's Sub-Grounds 8(j) and 8(k), Gbao's Sub-Ground 8(i), Sesay's Grounds 33 and 46 (…)

(iv) Sesay's character and protection of civilians during the conflict

9802. para. 1240: With respect to Sesay's contention that the Trial Chamber should have taken into account "numerous witnesses who provided evidence of Sesay's reputation as a moderate," the Appeals Chamber notes that Sesay does not support his allegation by identifying the names of particular witnesses or referencing any arguments as to why the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in failing to consider Sesay's reputation as a moderate is a mitigating circumstance. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds that Sesay has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in this regard.

9803. para. 1241: With regard to the evidence of Defence witnesses of Sesay's good character which the Trial Chamber deemed not credible at trial, Sesay argues that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in failing to accord weight to this evidence in relation to Sesay's good character because the witnesses' testimonies were relevant and probative of Sesay's character, even if the Trial Chamber found their evidence was not reliable in relation to other facts.[3438]

9804. para. 1242: The Appeals Chamber notes that some of the witness evidence that Sesay contests was disregarded by the Trial Chamber because it found that the witnesses[3439] "testified out of loyalty to RUF and their superior commanders, and evidently were trying to assist Sesay and Kallon in this trial, and not necessarily to assist this Chamber in the search for the truth."[3440] Sesay fails to explain how the Trial Chamber's reasoning, which he does not challenge, would not also pertain to their testimony concerning Sesay's character. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no error in the Trial Chamber's holding that "it attached no probative value to" this evidence.[3441]

9805. para. 1243: The Appeals Chamber also observes, in relation to Sesay's argument that the evidence he annexed to his sentencing brief and provided at trial was erroneously disregarded in sentencing because it was repetitive,[3442] and that the Trial Chamber in fact expressly considered this evidence at the sentencing stage in paragraphs 70 and 224 of the Sentencing Judgment. The Trial Chamber considered these submissions and held that although "Sesay on occasion gave assistance to civilians.... this would do little in our opinion to show Sesay's good character ... in the circumstances found to exist then, and therefore it should not be given undue weight in mitigation."[3443] Sesay fails to show error in this regard.

(v) Alleged coercive treatment by the Prosecution - Sesay

9806. para. 1244: The Appeals Chamber is of the view that, contrary to Sesay's argument, the Trial Chamber took into account Sesay's argument that the Prosecution's "coercive conduct" during his arrest and "interview process" denied him of the real possibility of cooperation with the Prosecution. These circumstances were the subject of the "lengthy voir dire process," and Sesay's submissions were noted in paragraph 72 of the Sentencing Judgment.[3444] In the context of considering "Substantial cooperation" with the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber found that Sesay's treatment by the Prosecution during the six day period after his arrest did not preclude him from cooperating with the Prosecution at any point since that episode, and thus it did not warrant additional relief beyond that already afforded to Sesay, namely, that the Trial Chamber expunged from the record the statements obtained by the Prosecution during this six day period.[3445] On appeal, Sesay has not shown any error and, therefore, his submission is untenable.

(vi) Likelihood of serving sentence abroad - Sesay

9807. para. 1245: The Trial Chamber found that:

> [W]hilst it seems more likely than not at this stage that the convicted persons in this trial will serve sentences outside Sierra Leone, this is a decision that ultimately lies within the discretion of the President of the Court, based upon agreements concluded by the Registrar. The Chamber is unable to speculate on the result of these negotiations and decision-making processes, upon which it has no conclusive information, which lie outside of its control. It therefore notes for purposes of record that it has not given any weight to this factor in the consideration of the sentences of any of the convicted persons in this case.
> The Chamber, however, wishes to recognize that, in general terms, sentences served abroad, where family visits are likely to be few, may be harder to bear. Such circumstances would normally amount to a factor in mitigation.[3446]

9808. para. 1246: The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's decision not to mitigate the Appellants sentences as a consequence of the fact that they will likely be served outside of Sierra Leone. As discussed in the Mrđa case, which is relied upon by Sesay, it is common practice that convicted persons from international criminal tribunals serve their sentences in foreign countries.[3447] Sesay does not refer to any case in which serving the sentence in a foreign country has been considered as a mitigating factor for sentencing purposes.[3448]

(vii) Statement of remorse

9809. para. 1247: Although the Trial Chamber found Sesay's statements of remorse were generally "not sincere," it accepted that his expression of empathy toward the victims of the conflict were in fact sincere.[3449]

9810. para. 1248: With regard to any further mitigating weight, Trial Chamber exercised its discretion to find that Sesay's statements, apart from his empathy toward victims of the conflict, did not show any real remorse.[3450] Sesay, however, relies on the ICTY Trial Chamber case of Brđanin to assert that in order to constitute a mitigating circumstance "it is sufficient for the accused to extend his sympathy for victims of the conflict."[3451] The Appeals Chamber finds that this is a mischaracterisation of the law. In Fofana and Kondewa, the Appeals Chamber observed that only in a minority of cases have Trial Chambers found that an accused's expressions of regret or empathy for victims, without acknowledgement of responsibility for the crimes, constituted a mitigating factor. The Appeals Chamber acknowledged that it is: > aware of only two cases at the ad hoc Tribunals in which the Chamber considered whether an accused's expressions of regret or empathy for victims without acknowledgement of responsibility for the crimes could constitute a mitigating factor. In Vasiljević, the ICTY Appeals Chamber opined that an accused can express sincere regrets without admitting his participation in a crime, and that this could be a factor taken into account by the Trial Chamber.3452 However, in Vasiljević, the Appeals Chamber declined to consider Vasiljević's expressions of regret to be a mitigating circumstance.[3453]

> The ICTY Trial Judgment in Orić is the only case in which a convicted person received credit for expressions of empathy for the victims without acknowledging responsibility.3454 In Blaškić, the accused attempted to express remorse while denying accountability and the Trial Chamber refused to take it into account because, after establishing the facts, it felt his remorse was not sincere.[3455]

9811. para. 1249: In Fofana and Kondewa we held that the Trial Chamber did not err in taking such an expression into account, but we did not hold that the Trial Chamber must in all circumstances do so. The circumstances of the Brđanin case, relied upon by Sesay, are readily distinguished from the present case. In Brđanin, the ICTY Trial Chamber allowed expressions of regret for the suffering of victims as a mitigating factor although Brđanin did not express remorse for his own responsibility. The Trial Chamber expressly recognised that Brđanin, through his counsel, told victims he felt sorry for what they had suffered.[3456] Sesay has not pointed to any similar facts in this case. His submission is rejected.

(viii) Conclusion

9813. Disposition, p. 479: In respect of Sesay, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Sesay in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Sesay's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1 through 14. The Appeals Chamber therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1 through 14 of fifty-two (52) years imprisonment. The Appeals Chamber affirms the sentence of fifty-one (51) years imprisonment under Count 15 and forty-five (45) years imprisonment under Count 17.

(d) Kallon

(i) Gravity of the offences

9814. para. 1272: Kallon contests the Trial Chamber's assessment of the form and degree of his participation in the crimes, but he fails to address the facts considered by the Trial Chamber, let alone show that consideration of those facts or the failure to consider other facts amounted to an abuse of discretion. For example, Kallon does not address the Trial Chamber's finding that he was "one of the few RUF commanders to be a member of the AFRC Supreme Council," and that "his involvement in the governing body of the Junta substantially contributed to the JCE, as this body was involved in the decision making processes through which the Junta regime determined how best to secure power and maintain control over the territory of Sierra Leone."[3512] He also does not address the Trial Chamber's consideration of his direct involvement in the crimes committed in the diamond mining areas, including his use of "his bodyguards to force civilians to mine diamonds in Tongo Field" and his presence "at the mining pits in Tongo Field when SBUs and other rebels shot into the mining pits killing unarmed, enslaved civilian miners."[3513] Based on these findings, among others, the Trial Chamber concluded that "Kallon's level of participation in the JCE was that of a Senior Commander, a "key player in the regime."[3514] Kallon's submissions are therefore rejected.

(ii) Double-counting the mens rea for acts of terrorism and collective punishments

9815. para. 1273: Kallon's submissions do not extend those raised by Sesay, discussed above.[3515] The Appeals Chamber recalls its reasons there and allows this part of Kallon's Ground 31 for the same reasons.

(iii) Aggravating factors in relation to crimes at Sunna Mosque in Koidu Town

9816. para. 1274: The Trial Chamber found that:

> [T]he fact that civilians were abducted from a Mosque – a traditional place of civilian safety and sanctuary – and that the same site was further used by the rebels, including Kallon, in voting on TF1-015's life, constitutes an aggravating factor.[3516]

9817. para. 1275: The Appeals Chamber finds that the location of an attack, as in places of civilian sanctuary such as churches, mosques, schools, and hospitals, may be considered as part of the gravity of the offence or an aggravating factor, and this is consistent with the case law of Trial Chambers at the Special Court and ICTR.[3517] In part, Kallon contends that the Trial Chamber erred in considering Rocky's actions at the Sunna Mosque, which occurred prior to the arrival of Kallon, as an aggravating factor for Kallon's sentence.[3518]

9818. para. 1276: Article 19 of the Statute provides that "[i]n imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person." The individual circumstances of the convicted person include the aggravating and mitigating factors,[3519] which must therefore relate to the offender himself.[3520] The Appeals Chamber adopts the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that the fact that the aggravating circumstances "must relate to the offender himself is not to be taken as a rule that such circumstances must specifically pertain to the offender's personal characteristics. Rather, it simply reflects the general principle of individual responsibility that underlies criminal law: a person cannot be held responsible for an act unless something he himself has done or failed to do justifies holding him responsible."[3521]

9819. para. 1277: In this case, the first attack on civilians at the Sunna Mosque in which Kallon did not participate could not be an aggravating factor for purposes of Kallon's sentence. The Trial Chamber rightly noted, however, that "the same site was further used by the rebels, including Kallon, in voting on TF1-015's life, constitutes an aggravating factor."[3522]

9820. para. 1278: Although we find error in the holding that Rocky's conduct at the Sunna Mosque constituted an aggravating factor for Kallon, the Appeals Chamber finds no reason to interfere in the sentence. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the weight to be attached to an aggravating circumstance is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber,[3523] and an Appellant bears "the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion" in the weight it attached.[3524] In view of the Trial Chamber's proper consideration of Kallon's use of the Sunna Mosque as an aggravating circumstance, the Appeals Chamber considers that Kallon has not shown that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in determining the weight to be given to this aggravating circumstance. Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

(iv) Duress and superior orders

9821. para. 1279: In regard to factors of duress and acting under superior orders, Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in considering these two separate arguments as one mitigating factor.[3525] The Appeals Chamber notes, however, that the Trial Chamber acknowledged that Kallon submitted at trial that these factors were separate mitigating factors and it explained that even though it was considering these factors under the heading "Executing Orders" it did not imply that these factors are the same.[3526] The Trial Chamber committed no error in this regard.

9822. para. 1280: Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he had failed to establish that with respect to the UNAMSIL events his life was under threat if he failed to obey Sankoh's orders. According to Kallon, the Trial Chamber "ignored the power that Sankoh could still exert even from prison."[3527] He also contends that his post-conflict conduct came at personal risk because it contravened Sankoh's orders.

9823. para. 1281: Beyond mere assertions, Kallon provides no support for these contentions. He simply states that Sankoh could exert power from prison, Sankoh issued the order in relation to the UNAMSIL events, and that Prosecution Witness TF1-362 testified that disobeying Foday Sankoh could lead to death. But he fails to cite any Trial Chamber finding or other evidence which could sustain such assertions. His submissions are undeveloped and therefore rejected.

(v) Conclusion

9825. Disposition, p. 479-480: In respect of Kallon, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Kallon in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Kallon's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1 through 14. The Appeals Chamber therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1 through 14 of thirty-nine (39) years imprisonment. The Appeals Chamber affirms the sentence of forty (40) years imprisonment under Count 15 and thirty-five (35) years imprisonment under Count 17.

(e) Gbao

(i) Gravity of offences committed pursuant to the JCE

9826. para. 1303: Gbao contends that the Trial Chamber erroneously aggregated the gravity of all of the crimes, including those for which he was not convicted, when assessing the gravity of his conduct. He submits that the Trial Chamber thereby failed to take into account that Gbao was not convicted of Counts 1 and 2 in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts. To the contrary, the Trial Chamber expressly listed each of the crimes for which Gbao was found guilty, including the Districts where they were committed. In this list, the Trial Chamber properly limited Gbao's liability for acts of terrorism and collective punishments to Kailahun District, whereas the liability for Sesay and Kallon also includes crimes committed in Bo, Kenema and Kono Districts. The Trial Chamber's subsequent analysis of the gravity of the offences is not ascribed to any accused – it is strictly an analysis of the gravity of the offences - and it contains no indication that the Trial Chamber erroneously considered the gravity of offences of acts of terrorism and collective punishments committed outside Kailahun District in relation to Gbao's sentence. Gbao's submissions are, therefore, untenable.

(ii) Consideration of findings not proved beyond reasonable doubt

9827. para. 1304: Gbao contends the Trial Chamber increased his sentence based in part on findings not proved beyond reasonable doubt and he supports his argument with three references to the Sentencing Judgment. The first two references do not evince error. He argues the Trial Chamber found that civilians in Kailahun District were "restrained in ropes and chains"[3583] and "forced to live in camps manned by armed guards"[3584] and that no such findings were made for Kailahun District; however, there is no indication that the Trial Chamber made these statements in the Sentencing Judgment in relation to Kailahun District. In fact, it would appear that the first quotation pertains to Tombodu in Kono District and the second to Tongo Fields in Kenema District, and findings in the Trial Judgment support each statement.[3585]

9828. para. 1305: The third statement pointed to by Gbao suggests the Trial Chamber may have misstated in a limited instance the district in which child soldiers stood guard at a mining site, but the conduct relates to forced mining in Kono District for which Gbao was not found liable and there is no indication that the Trial Chamber erroneously considered this conduct in relation to Gbao's sentence.

(iii) The form and degree of Gbao's participation in the JCE

9829. para. 1306: As noted above, a Trial Chamber must ultimately impose a sentence that reflects the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct.[3586] This requires that a sentence must reflect the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused, giving due consideration to the particular circumstances of the case and to the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crimes.[3587] In its assessment of the form and degree of Gbao's participation in the JCE, the Trial Chamber considered the following significant:

> 266. The Chamber recalls its finding that Gbao's status, assignment, rank and personal relationship with Sankoh, as well as his knowledge of the RUF's ideology were all factors demonstrating that Gbao had considerable prestige and power within the RUF in Kailahun District. Gbao's supervisory role entailed the monitoring of the implementation of the ideology. We also recall that we found that the RUF ideological objective of toppling the 'selfish and corrupt' regime by eliminating all those who supported that regime and who, a fortiori, were considered as enemies to the AFRC/RUF Junta alliance. The Chamber, by a majority, Justice Boutet dissenting, found that:
> … Gbao was an ideology instructor and that ideology played a significant role in the RUF movement as it ensured not only the fighters' submission and compliance with the orders and instructions of the RUF leadership but also hardened their determination, their resolve and their commitment to fight to ensure the success and achievement of the ideology of the movement. It was in this spirit that the crimes alleged in the Indictment and for which the Accused are charged, were committed. Given this consideration, it is undeniable therefore, that the ideology played a central role in the objectives of the RUF.
> 267. The Chamber recalls that Gbao was also directly involved in the planning and enslavement of civilian labour on RUF government farms in Kailahun District, and worked very closely with the G5 in Kailahun Town to manage the large-scale, forced civilian farming that existed in Kailahun between 1996 and 2001, including the period between 25 May 1997 and 14 February 1998. Furthermore, Gbao's involvement in designing, securing and organising the forced labour of civilians to produce foodstuffs significantly contributed to maintaining the strength and cohesiveness of the RUF fighting force. Despite having knowledge that crimes were being committed by RUF fighters on a large scale, Gbao continued to pursue the common purpose of the joint criminal enterprise.

> 268. The Chamber recalls however that Gbao did not have direct control over fighters. He was not a member of the AFRC/RUF Supreme Council, and he remained in Kailahun during the Junta regime. He did not have the ability to contradict or influence the orders of men such as Sam Bockarie. He was not directly involved and did not share the criminal intent of any of the crimes committed in Bo, Kenema or Kono Districts.
> 269. The Chamber has found that crimes committed in furtherance of the joint criminal enterprise, which 'intended through the spread of extreme fear and punishment to dominate and subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over the captured territory' were crimes of a shocking nature, deserving of condemnation in the strongest terms possible.
>
> 270. We have also found that Gbao's personal role within the overall enterprise was neither at the policy making level, nor was it at the 'fighting end' where the majority of the actual atrocities were committed. Indeed, as the Gbao Defence pointed out in its closing submissions, Gbao 'has not been found to have ever fired a single shot and never to have ordered the firing of a single shot'. Gbao was a loyal and committed functionary of the RUF organisation, whose major contributions to the joint criminal enterprise can be characterised by his role as an ideology instructor and his planning and direct involvement in the enslavement of civilians on RUF government farms within Kailahun District.
> 271. Whilst the crimes committed pursuant to the joint criminal enterprise for which Gbao has been convicted are vast and atrocious, the Chamber recognises that Gbao's involvement within the overall scheme, whilst sufficient in law to attract criminal liability, was more limited than that of his co-defendants. The Chamber thus finds Gbao's individual contribution to the joint criminal enterprise, and his own particular criminal responsibility, to be on the lower end of the continuum, and considers his role as diminishing his responsibility for sentencing purposes.[3588]

9830. para. 1307: As is abundantly clear from this passage, the Trial Chamber considered that the form and degree of Gbao's participation in the crimes for which he was held liable pursuant to the JCE are: (i) his role as an ideology instructor and (ii) his planning and direct involvement in the enslavement of civilians on RUF government farms within Kailahun District.[3589] The Appeals Chamber recalls its holding that the finding that Gbao contributed to the JCE in his role as an ideology expert and instructor violated his right to a fair trial. As a result, the finding was disallowed.[3590] This conduct also cannot be considered as part of the form and degree of Gbao's conduct for sentencing purposes. The Appeals Chamber will determine the consequences of this holding in its revision of the sentences imposed for crimes Gbao committed pursuant to his participation in the JCE.

(iv) Gravity of offences against UNAMSIL peacekeepers

9831. para. 1308: Gbao contends that the Trial Chamber erroneously aggregated all of the offences committed against UNAMSIL peacekeepers when assessing the gravity of the offences for which he was convicted under Count 15. The Appeals Chamber recalls that it has allowed Gbao Ground 16, in part, and reversed the verdict of guilt for Gbao for aiding and abetting the attack directed against Salahuedin. We will therefore only consider Gbao's submissions here in relation to his sentence for aiding and abetting the attack against Jaganathan.

9833. para. 1310: It determined that the "gravity of this crime is high."[3592] However, the Trial Chamber's analysis of the gravity of the offences committed against UNAMSIL peacekeepers makes it difficult, in relation to one of the factors considered, to determine how the gravity of the two offences for which Gbao was convicted is distinguished from the additional 12 offences for which Sesay and Kallon were found guilty. The Trial Chamber initially noted that the RUF directed 14 attacks against UNAMSIL peacekeepers,[3593] and it identified many of the victims of these assaults by name, including Jaganathan.[3594] It then considered the scale and brutality of the offences, the vulnerability of the victims, the number of victims, the impact on victims and the degree of suffering. The Trial Chamber's analysis of these considerations expressly addresses the gravity of the attacks in relation to the victims as identified, and therefore the gravity relevant to Gbao's offences can be ascertained from the Sentencing Judgment. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in this reasoning.

9834. para. 1311: In considering the impact of the attacks on the UNAMSIL peacekeeping force and the international community, the Trial Chamber's reasoning leaves unclear the extent to which it considered this factor in relation to Gbao's offences. For example, it is unclear to what extent the Trial Chamber considered the attack on Jaganathan to have disrupted the peace process in Sierra Leone and to have caused a response in the international community.[3595]

9835. para. 1312: The Appeals Chamber is of the view that although the Trial Chamber's reasoning could have been clearer, its analysis concerned the general conduct of attacks against peacekeepers in the context of the conflict in Sierra Leone to aggravate all of the attacks including the attack for which Gbao was found liable. By doing so, the Trial Chamber did not aggravate

Gbao's sentence for crimes he did not commit. Rather, it considered that he participated in an attack that was part of 14 attacks committed "in a short period of time" which threatened, inter alia, the international community's efforts to assist Sierra Leone. The Appeals Chamber does not find this constitutes error in the Trial Chamber's exercise of its sentencing discretion.

(v) Consideration as an aggravating factor that Gbao was "the senior RUF commander" with "the largest number of fighters" at Makump DDR camp 9836. para. 1313: Gbao contends that the Trial Chamber erred when it considered his position of authority as an aggravating factor for his conviction for aiding and abetting the assault on Jaganathan. He contends that his position of authority was already accounted for by the Trial Chamber when it found that he aided and abetted by tacit encouragement. Gbao's submissions are misconceived. Gbao's position of authority was a factor in the Trial Chamber's determination that he tacitly approved Kallon's assault on Jaganathan and thereby aided and abetted Kallon's conduct, however the Trial Chamber did not, and need not have, relied upon findings that he was "the senior RUF commander" (i.e., as Gbao states, the most senior RUF commander[3596] with "the largest number of fighters" at the Makump DDR camp in order to find that his conduct amounted to aiding and abetting.

9837. para. 1314: Gbao's contention that the Trial Chamber erred by taking into account his leadership role rather than any abuse of that role as an aggravating factor is similarly unavailing. The relevant passage of the Sentencing Judgment must be read in conjunction with the Trial Chamber's findings on Gbao's role in the attack on Jaganathan in paragraphs 2261 through 2265 of the Trial Judgment.

9838. para. 1315: In the Sentencing Judgment, the Trial Chamber noted that Gbao was convicted of aiding and abetting the attacks directed against Jaganathan at the Makump DDR camp "where he was the senior RUF Commander present at the time of Kallon's arrival and he remained the RUF Commander with the largest number of fighters present." As the senior RUF Commander until Kallon's arrival representing the RUF, a signatory to the Lomé Accord, he had a duty to support UNAMSIL personnel who were tasked with bringing peace to the population of Sierra Leone. Thus, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that Gbao had abused his position of authority, including by (i) demanding, with the support of thirty to forty armed RUF subordinates, that UNAMSIL give him back his five fighters, (ii) fomenting an atmosphere of hostility and (iii) orchestrating an armed confrontation at the Makump DDR camp.[3597]

(vi) Serving sentence in a foreign country

9839. para. 1316: The Appeals Chamber recalls its holding that the Trial Chamber did not error in declining to mitigate the sentences of the Accused in light of its finding that they will likely serve their sentences in a foreign country.[3598] Gbao does not extend the argument made previously by Sesay, and therefore the Appeals Chamber dismisses his argument for the same reasons.

(vii) Disproportionate sentence for aiding and abetting an attack against a UNAMSIL peacekeeper

9840. para. 1317: We endorse the view of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that sentences of like individuals in like cases should be comparable.[3599] The relevance of previous sentences is however often limited as a number of elements, relating, inter alia, to the number, type and gravity of the crimes committed, the personal circumstances of the convicted person and the presence of mitigating and aggravating circumstances, dictate different results in different cases such that it is frequently impossible to transpose the sentence in one case mutatis mutandis to another.[3600] This follows from the principle that the determination of the sentence involves the individualisation of the sentence so as to appropriately reflect the particular facts of the case and the circumstances of the convicted person.[3601]

9841. para. 1318: As a result, previous sentencing practice is but one factor among a host of others which must be taken into account when determining the sentence.[3602] Nonetheless, as held by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Jelisić, a disparity between an impugned sentence and another sentence rendered in a like case can constitute an error if the former is out of reasonable proportion with the latter. This disparity is not in itself erroneous, but rather gives rise to an inference that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly in applying the law on sentencing.[3603]

9842. para.1319: In the instant appeal, none of the cases cited by Gbao are instructive because the crimes for which the accused were convicted and the individual circumstances of the accused are readily and significantly distinguished from the present case. Importantly, Gbao fails to address the fact that, unlike any of the cases he relies upon, he is convicted of aiding and abetting an attack against a UN peacekeeper. Gbao's submissions are therefore rejected.

(viii) Conclusion

9843. para. 1320: For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber erred in double-counting the specific intent of acts of terrorism and collective punishments as increasing the gravity of the underlying offences, and erred in finding that Gbao's role as an ideology expert and instructor contributed to the form and degree of Gbao's conduct in relation to crimes he committed pursuant to the JCE. The Appeals Chamber will revise the sentences as appropriate. The remaining submissions in Gbao Ground 18 are rejected.

9844. Disposition, p. 480: In respect of Gbao, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Gbao in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Gbao's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1, 3 through 11 and 13. The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1, 3 through 11 and 13 of twenty-five (25) years imprisonment. Taking into account that Gbao's Ground 16 has been allowed, in part, the sentence of twenty-five (25) years imprisonment under Count 15 is decreased to twenty (20) years imprisonment.

9846. Dissents – Justice Fisher, para. 43, p. 524: My disagreement with the Majority is therefore not about whether Gbao is guilty of some crimes, but rather, whether Gbao is guilty of all the crimes for which he was convicted by the Trial Chamber pursuant to his alleged participation in the JCE. As I find that the Trial Chamber erred in holding Gbao personally liable under JCE, I respectfully dissent from the Majority's decision to confirm those convictions.

9847. Dissents – Justice Winter, para. 5, p. 482-483: In addition to this clarification, I also wish to express my complete agreement with the reasoning and conclusions expressed by Hon. Justice Fisher in her Partially Dissenting and Concurring Opinion insofar as it pertains to Gbao's Sub-Grounds 8(j) and 8(k), Gbao's Sub-Ground 8(i), Sesay's Grounds 33 and 46, and her opinion regarding the failure to plead locations with sufficient specificity. In particular, I join her dissent from the Majority's decision to confirm Gbao's conviction under JCE liability, given the Trial Chamber's findings that he did not share the Common Criminal Purpose with the other participants in the case before us.

(f) Disposition

CONSEQUENTLY REVISES the sentences as follows:

In respect of Sesay, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Sesay in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Sesay's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1 through 14. The Appeals Chamber therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1 through 14 of fifty-two (52) years imprisonment. The Appeals Chamber affirms the sentence of fifty-one (51) years imprisonment under Count 15 and forty-five (45) years imprisonment under Count 17;

In respect of Kallon, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Kallon in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Kallon's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1 through 14. The Appeals Chamber therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1 through 14 of thirty-nine (39) years imprisonment.

The Appeals Chamber affirms the sentence of forty (40) years imprisonment under Count 15 and thirty-five (35) years imprisonment under Count 17;

In respect of Gbao, taking into account the Grounds of Appeal which have been allowed, the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of Gbao in the crimes, and the seriousness of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that the effective sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber reflects the totality of Gbao's culpable conduct for the crimes under Counts 1, 3 through 11 and 13. The Appeals Chamber, Justices Winter and Fisher dissenting, therefore imposes a global sentence for Counts 1, 3 through 11 and 13 of twenty-five (25) years imprisonment. Taking into account that Gbao's Ground 16 has been allowed, in part, the sentence of twenty-five (25) years imprisonment under Count 15 is decreased to twenty (20) years imprisonment;

ORDERS that the sentences shall run concurrently;

ORDERS that Issa Hassan Sesay shall serve a TOTAL TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FIFTY-TWO (52) YEARS, subject to credit being given under Rule 101(D) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the period for which he has already been in detention;

ORDERS that Morris Kallon shall serve a TOTAL TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FORTY (40) YEARS, subject to credit being given under Rule 101(D) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the period for which he has already been in detention;

ORDERS that Augustine Gbao shall serve a TOTAL TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF TWENTY-FIVE (25) YEARS, subject to credit being given under Rule 101(D) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the period for which he has already been in detention;

ORDERS that this Judgment shall be enforced immediately pursuant to Rule 119 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;

ORDERS, in accordance with Rule 109 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence that Issa Hassan Sesay, Morris Kallon and Augustine Gbao remain in the custody of the Special Court for Sierra Leone pending the finalization of arrangements to serve their sentences.

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-T, Judgement, 19 July 2007

(a) Preliminary Considerations

9849. para. 2: The "Prosecution Submission Pursuant to Rule 100(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence" ("Prosecution Sentencing Brief,)"[2] was filed on 28 June 2007…..

9850. para. 6: The Kanu Defence objected to the documents annexed to the Prosecution Sentencing Brief on the grounds that (1) the Prosecution purported to introduce new evidence through these documents;[11] (2) the Prosecution did not comply with its disclosure obligations under the rules in relation to (Annex G); the expert report was not objective and the Defence was not in a position to call their own expert in rebuttal on such short notice;[12] (3) the introduction of new Prosecution evidence would amount to an abuse of process;[13] (4) the witness statements provided by the Prosecution are inadmissible, or alternatively, the Defence should have had an opportunity to cross-examine the proposed witnesses;[14] and (5) other material submitted by the Prosecution is irrelevant.[15]

9851. para. 7: In its oral arguments, the Prosecution submitted that it is allowed to introduce additional evidence at the sentencing stage. The Prosecution argued that since the Special Court has two distinct procedures it was not necessary for it to adduce such evidence at the trial stage.[16]

9852. para. 8: The Trial Chamber upholds the Defence objections and has not taken into consideration the documents annexed to the Prosecution Sentencing Brief.

9853. para. 9: The Trial Chamber recalls the general principle that only matters proved beyond reasonable doubt against the Accused are to be considered against him at the sentencing stage.[17] Aggravating circumstances must be proved beyond reasonable doubt[18], whilst mitigating circumstances need only be proved on a balance of probability.[19]

(b) Applicable Law

(i) Applicable Provisions

9854. para. 10: Sentencing in the Special Court is regulated by the provisions of Article 19 of the Statute of the Special Court ("Statute") and Rule 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"). Article 19 of the Statute provides:

> 1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.
> 2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.
>
> 3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.quote .

Rule 101 of the Rules provides:

> (A) A person convicted by the Special Court, other than a juvenile offender, may be sentenced to imprisonment for a specific number of years.
>
> (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:

(i) Any aggravating circumstances;

(ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;

(iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9(3) of the Statute.

(C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

(D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

9855. para. 11: According to the above provisions the Trial Chamber is obliged to take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person. Aggravating and mitigating circumstances and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) and the domestic courts of Sierra Leone shall, where appropriate, be taken into account. These requirements are not exhaustive and the Trial Chamber has the discretion to determine an appropriate sentence depending on the individual circumstances of the case.[20]

9856. para. 12: The Trial Chamber agrees with the holding of the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Prosecutor v. Kambanda, that "[...] the Statute is sufficiently liberally worded to allow for a single sentence to be imposed. Whether or not this practice is adopted is within the discretion of the Chamber".21 The governing criteria is that the final or aggregate sentence should reflect the totality of the culpable conduct, or generally, that it should reflect the gravity of the offences and the overall culpability of the offender, so that it is both just and appropriate. [22] In the present case the Trial Chamber finds it is appropriate to impose a global sentence for the multiple convictions in respect of Brima, Kamara and Kanu.

(ii) Sentencing Objectives

9857. para. 13: The preamble of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000)[23] recognises > that [...] in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace.[24]

9858. para. 14: Retribution, deterrence and rehabilitation have been considered as the main sentencing purposes in international criminal justice.[25]

9859. para. 15: Furthermore, international criminal tribunals have held that retribution is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge but rather as duly expressing the outrage of the national and international community at these crimes,[26] and that is meant to reflect a fair and balanced approach to punishment for wrongdoing. The penalty imposed must be proportionate to the wrongdoing. In other words, the punishment must fit the crime.[27]

9860. para. 16: International criminal tribunals have held further that the element of deterrence is important in demonstrating "that the international community is not ready to tolerate serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights".[28] It follows that the penalties imposed by the Trial Chamber must be sufficient to deter others from committing similar crimes.[29] In the context of international criminal justice, it is recognised that one of the main purposes of a sentence is to "influence the legal awareness of the accused, the surviving victims, their relatives, the witnesses and the general public in order to reassure them that the legal system is implemented and enforced. Additionally, sentencing is intended to convey the message that globally accepted laws and rules have to be obeyed by everybody".[30]

9861. para. 17: International criminal tribunals have noted that unlike the case in domestic courts, rehabilitation cannot be considered as a predominant consideration in determining a sentence, as the sentencing aims of national jurisdictions are different from the aims of international criminal tribunals.[31]

9862. para. 18: In deciding appropriate sentences, the Trial Chamber has taken into account all the factors likely to contribute to the achievement of the above objectives.

(iii) Sentencing Factors

a. Gravity of Offence

9863. para. 19: In determining an appropriate sentence, the gravity of the crime is the primary consideration or "litmus test".[32] The determination of the gravity of the crime must be individually assessed.[33] In making such an assessment, the Trial Chamber may examine, inter alia, the general nature of the underlying criminal conduct;[34] the form and degree of participation of the Accused[35] or the specific role played by the Accused in the commission of the crime;[36] the degree of suffering, impact or consequences of the crime for the immediate victim in terms of physical, emotional and psychological effects;37 the effects of the crime on relatives of the immediate victims and/or the broader targeted group;[38] the vulnerability of the victims;[39] and the number of victims.[40]

9864. para. 20: Where an Accused has been found liable as a commander pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, two levels of consideration are necessary in determining the gravity of the offence: (l) the gravity of the underlying crime committed by a subordinate under the effective control of the Accused, and (2) the gravity of the Accused's own conduct in failing to prevent or punish the crimes committed by that subordinate.[41]

b. Aggravating Circumstances

9865. para. 21: The aggravating and mitigating circumstances to be taken into account by the Trial Chamber are not exhaustively set out in the Rules.[42] Thus, the Trial Chamber is tasked with the charge of weighing the individual circumstances of each case and has discretion to identify the relevant factors. The Trial Chamber may consider, for example,

> (i) the position of the accused, that is, his position of leadership, his level in the command structure, or his role in the broader context of the conflict [...]; (ii) the discriminatory intent or the discriminatory state of mind for crimes for which such a state of mind is not an element or ingredient of the crime; (iii) the length of time during which the crime continued; (iv) active and direct criminal participation, if linked to a high-rank position of command, the accused's role as fellow perpetrator, and the active participation of a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates; (v) the informed, willing or enthusiastic participation in crime; (vi) premeditation and motive; (vii) the sexual, violent, and humiliating nature of the acts and the vulnerability of the victims; (viii) the status of the victims, their youthful age and number, and the effect of the crimes on them; (ix) the character of the accused; and (x) the circumstances of the offences generally.[43]

9866. para. 22: The Trial Chamber may also consider the fact that attacks directed against protected persons were carried out in places of religious worship or sanctuary, to be an aggravating factor in sentencing.

9867. para. 23: Facts which go to proof of the gravity of the offence and facts which constitute aggravating factors may overlap.[44] The practice of some Trial Chambers has been to consider the gravity of the offence together with aggravating circumstances.[45] The Trial Chamber considers that, regardless of the approach, where a factor has already been taken into account in determining the gravity of the offence, it cannot be considered additionally as an aggravating factor and vice versa.[46] Similarly, if a factor is an element of the underlying offence, then it cannot be considered as an aggravating factor. [47]

9868. para. 24: The Trial Chamber may consider the abuse of a position of power by an accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute to be an aggravating factor. [48] Where an accused has been found liable for the crimes of a subordinate under Article 6(3) of the Statute his/her mere position of command will not be considered by the Trial Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is an element of liability.[49] However, where it has been proved that an accused actively abused his/her command position or otherwise promoted, encouraged or participated in the crimes of his/her subordinates, such conduct may amount to an aggravating circumstance. [50]

c. Mitigating Circumstances

9869. para. 25: Under Rule 101(B) any substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction must be considered as a mitigating circumstance.51 In addition, the Trial Chamber has the discretion to identify and weigh other mitigating factors according to the circumstances of each case, including, but not limited to (i) expression of remorse or a degree of acceptance of guilt; (ii) voluntary surrender; (iii) good character with no prior criminal convictions; (iv) personal and family circumstances; (v) the behaviour or conduct of the accused subsequent to the conflict; (vi) duress and indirect participation; (vii) diminished mental responsibility; (viii) the age of the accused; (ix) assistance to detainees or victims; and (x) in exceptional circumstances, poor health. [52]

(iv) Sentencing Practice In The National Courts of Sierra Leone and Other Ad Hoc Tribunals

a. Deliberations

i. Sentencing Practice in Sierra Leone

9870. para. 32: Article 19(1) states that as appropriate, the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the national courts of Sierra Leone as and when appropriate. This does not oblige the Trial Chamber to conform to that practice, but rather to take into account that practice as and when appropriate. [66] The Trial Chamber finds that it is not appropriate to adopt the practice in the present case since none of the Accused was indicted for, nor convicted of, offences under Article 5 of the Statute.

ii. Sentencing Practice at other International Tribunals

9871. para. 33: Article 19(1) of the Statute provides that the Trial Chamber shall, where appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR in determining the terms of imprisonment. The Trial Chamber will also consider the sentencing practice of the ICTY as its statutory provisions are analogous to those of the Special Court and the ICTR. The Trial Chamber is therefore guided by the sentencing practices at both the ICTR and the ICTY. The Chamber further notes that the pronouncement of global sentences is a well established practice at those tribunals.[67] The mitigating and aggravating factors that the Trial Chamber has considered in the instant case have also been widely considered by the ICTR and ICTY.[68]

(v) Determination of Sentences

a. Alex Tamba Brima

i. Gravity of the Offences

9872. para. 40: The Trial Chamber considers that the crimes for which Brima was convicted were heinous, deliberate, brutal and targeted very large numbers of unarmed civilians and had a catastrophic an irreversible impact on the lives of the victims and their families.

9873. para. 41: Brima was convicted under Article 6(1) and under Article 6(3). Specifically, the Trial Chamber found Brima responsible under Article 6(1) for:

1. committing extermination in Karina, Bombali District;

2. committing the murder of five civilians at State House, Freetown, Western Area;

3. committing the mutilation of one civilian in Freetown, Western Area;

4. ordering the terrorisation of the civilian population in:

   a. Karina, Bombali District;

   b. Rosos, Bombali District; and

   c. Freetown, Western Area;

5. ordering the collective punishment of the civilian population in Freetown, Western Area;

6. ordering and planning the recruitment and use of child soldiers in:

a. Freetown, Western Area; and

b. Rosos, Bombali District;

7. ordering the murders of civilians at:

a. Mateboi, Bombali District;

b. Gbendembu, Bombali District;

c. State House, Freetown, Western Area;

d. Kissy Mental Home, Freetown, Western Area; and

e. Rogbalan Mosque, Freetown, Western Area;

8. ordering and aiding and abetting the murders of civilians in Fourah Bay, Freetown, Western Area;

9. ordering and planning the enslavement of civilians in Freetown, Western Area;

10. ordering the looting of civilian property; Freetown, Western Area;

11. planning the commission of outrages upon personal dignity in the form of sexual slavery in Bombali District and the Western Area;

12. planning the enslavement of civilians in Bombali District.

9874. para. 42: Brima was further found liable under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates throughout Bombali District and Freetown and the Western Area.

9876. para. 44: With regards to the recruitment and use of child soldiers, the Trial Chamber recalls that the young victims were abducted from their families, often in situations of extreme violence, often drugged and forcibly trained to kill and to commit crimes against innocent civilians. These children were robbed of their childhood and many lost the chance of an education.

9877. para. 45: With regards to the crimes for which Brima is responsible under Article 6(3) the Trial Chamber has examined the gravity of the crimes committed by subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, detailed in the Trial Chamber's Factual Findings are of a particularly heinous nature. The Trial Chamber recalls in particular that in Karina, Brima's subordinates unlawfully killed children by throwing them into the flames of burning houses. [74] In Rosos, five of Brima's subordinates beat and orally and vaginally gang-raped a civilian[75] and another four raped a civilian so brutally that she was in great pain, could not stand up and testified that "it seemed as though all my guts were coming out".[76] With regards to the sexual crimes in general, the Trial Chamber notes that many of the victims were particularly young and vulnerable, were held in captivity for protracted periods, often coupled with unwanted pregnancy/miscarriages and endured social stigma.

9878. para. 46: The Trial Chamber considers the crime of mutilation was particularly grotesque and malicious. Victims who had their limbs hacked off not only endured extreme pain and suffering, if they survived, but lost their mobility and capacity to earn a living or even to undertake simple daily tasks. They have been rendered dependent on others for the rest of their lives. The Trial Chamber dismisses the Defence arguments that the guerrilla nature of the conflict lessens the grievous nature of the offences.

ii. Individual Circumstances of Brima

9879. para. 51: The Trial Chamber finds that nothing In Brima's personal circumstances justifies any mitigation of his sentence.

9880. para. 52: The Trial Chamber considers that Brima was a professional soldier whose duty it was to protect the people of Sierra Leone. The fact that he instead attacked innocent and unarmed civilians is considered by the Trial Chamber to be an aggravating factor.

iii. Aggravating Circumstances

9881. para. 55: The Trial Chamber agrees that all the factors submitted by the Prosecution are aggravating factors. Moreover, the Trial Chamber finds that Brima's position as overall commander of the troops is an aggravating factor in relation to the crimes for which he is responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute. The use by Brima of tactics of extreme coercion, illustrated by the use of the infamous phrase "minus you, plus you", to force his subordinates to engage in criminal conduct constitutes an abuse of his position of power which is an aggravating factor in his case.[87]

9882. para. 56: The Trial Chamber also finds that Brima was a zealous participant in some of the crimes for which he has been found liable. This factor will be considered as an aggravating circumstance.

9883. para. 57: The Trial Chamber further finds that the prolonged period of time over which the enslavement crimes were committed, the vulnerability of the victims and the targeting of places of worship or sanctuary are all aggravating factors.

iv. Mitigating Circumstances

9884. para. 64: The Trial Chamber does not consider Brima's service in the Army without incident to be a mitigating factor 96 as this was merely his duty.

9885. para. 65: The Trial Chamber further finds that Brima's alleged acts of philanthropy and alleged involvement in the Commission for the Consolidation of Peace are not mitigating factors.

9886. para. 66: The fact that Brima's convictions relate to crimes committed in two districts, as opposed to the seven districts particularised in the Indictment, in no way lessens the seriousness of the offences.

v. Remorse

9887. para. 67: The Trial Chamber finds that the statement made by Brima at the sentencing hearing, whilst containing a fleeting reference to "remorse to the victims of this situation,"[7] cannot be accepted as an expression of genuine remorse. This fact cannot therefore be taken as mitigating his sentence.

b. Ibrahim Bazzy Kamara

i. Gravity of the Offences

9888. para. 70: The Trial Chamber found Kamara responsible under Article 6(1) for:

1. ordering the murder of five civilians in Karina, Bombali District;

2. planning the abduction and use of child soldiers in Bombali District and the Western Area;

3. planning the commission of outrages upon personal dignity in the form of sexual slavery in Bombali District and the Western Area;

4. planning the enslavement of civilians in Bombali and Western Area;

5. aiding and abetting the murder/extermination of civilians at Fourah Bay, Freetown, Western Area;

6. aiding and abetting the mutilation of civilians in Freetown, Western Area.

9889. para. 71: Kamara was further found liable under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates at Tombodu, Kono District and throughout Bombali District, the Western Area and Port Loko District.

9890. para. 72: The crimes for which Kamara was convicted were heinous, deliberate, brutal and targeted very large number of unarmed civilians and had a catastrophic and irreversible impact on the lives of the victims and their families.

9891. para. 73: In relation to his criminal responsibility the Trial Chamber finds that the crimes committed by his subordinates were crimes of the most serious gravity and Kamara's failure to prevent or punish the commission of these crimes must be considered correspondingly grave. The Trial Chamber recalls its factual finding that in Tombodu, Kamara's subordinates purposely trapped some 68 people in a house and burned them alive. [100] And that another 47 people were beheaded and thrown into a diamond pit. [101]

9892. para. 74: The Trial Chamber is satisfied that the crimes committed by Kamara or by his subordinates affected a very large number of victims. With regards to the recruitment and use of child soldiers, the Trial Chamber recalls that the victims were abducted from their families, often in situations of extreme violence, often drugged and trained to kill and forced to commit crimes against innocent civilians. These children were robbed of their childhood and many lost the chance of an education.

9893. para. 75: With regards to the crimes for which Kamara is responsible under Article 6(3) the Trial Chamber has examined the gravity of the crimes committed by subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, detailed in the Trial Chamber's Factual Findings are of a particularly heinous nature. The Trial Chamber recalls in particular that in Karina, Kamara's subordinates unlawfully killed children by throwing them into the flames of burning houses.[102] In Rosos, five of Kamara's subordinates beat and orally and vaginally gang-raped a civilian [103] and another four raped a civilian so brutally that she was in great pain, could not stand up and testified that "it seemed as though all my guts were coming out".[104] With regards to the sexual crimes in general, the Trial Chamber notes that many of the victims were particularly young and vulnerable, were held in captivity for protracted periods, often coupled with unwanted pregnancy/miscarriages, and endured social stigma.

9894. para. 76: The Trial Chamber considers the crime of mutilation was particularly grotesque and malicious. Victims who had their limbs hacked off not only endured extreme pain and suffering if they survived, but lost their mobility and capacity to earn a living or even to undertake simple daily tasks.

9895. para 77: All of the above factors point to the gravity of the offences.

ii. Individual Circumstances of Kamara

9896. para. 80: The Trial Chamber finds that nothing in Kamara's personal circumstances justifies any mitigation of his sentence.

9897. para. 81: The Trial Chamber considers that Kamara was a professional soldier whose duty it was to protect the people of Sierra Leone. The fact that he instead attacked innocent and unarmed civilians is considered by the Trial Chamber to be an aggravating factor.

iii. Aggravating Circumstances

9898. para. 85: The Trial Chamber agrees that all of the factors submitted by the Prosecution are aggravating factors. Moreover, the Trial Chamber has given consideration to the vulnerability of some of the victims of the crimes for which Kamara was convicted with regards to the gravity of the offence and will not consider this factor additionally as an aggravating circumstance.

9899. para. 86: The Trial Chamber also finds that the killing of civilians deliberately locked in their homes and set ablaze, as was ordered by Kamara and carried out by his subordinates, is a violent and cruel circumstance of the offence amounting to an aggravating factor. Further, this particular incident shows that Kamara was a violent and active participant in the crimes, contrary to the Defence assertions.

9900. para. 87: The Trial Chamber further finds that the prolonged period of time over which the enslavement crimes were committed, the vulnerability of the victims and the targeting of places of worship or sanctuary are all aggravating factors.

9901. para. 88: The Trial Chamber does not consider Kamara's position in the AFRC government prior to the commission of the offences to be an aggravating factor. However, the Trial Chamber considers his position of command authority in relation to the crimes for which he has been found liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute to be an aggravating factor.

iv. Mitigating Circumstances

9902. para. 91: The Trial Chamber finds that there are no mitigating circumstances in Kamara's case. In particular, although Kamara chose to address the Trial Chamber at the sentencing hearing, he failed to express any genuine remorse whatsoever for his crimes. [118]

c. Santigie Borbor Kanu

i. Gravity of the Offences

9903. para. 94: The Trial Chamber found Kanu responsible under Article 6(1) for:

i. committing the mutilation of civilians in:
   a. Kissy, Freetown; and
   b. Upgun, Freetown;
ii. committing the looting of civilian property in Freetown;
iii. ordering the murder of persons hors de combat at State House in Freetown;
iv. ordering the murder of civilians at Rogbalan Mosque in Freetown;
v. ordering the mutilations of civilians at:
   a. Ferry Junction, Freetown; and
   b. Upgun, Freetown;
vi. planning the abduction and use of child soldiers in Bombali District and the Western Area;
vii. planning the commission of outrages upon personal dignity in the form of sexual slavery in Bombali District and the Western Area;
viii. planning the enslavement of civilians on numerous occasions in Bombali District and the Western Area;
ix. instigating the murder of civilians in Freetown; and

x. aiding and abetting the murder/extermination of civilians at Fourah Bay in Freetown, and the Western Area.

9904. para. 95: Kanu was further found liable under Article 6(3) for crimes committed by his subordinates throughout Bombali District and Freetown and the Western Area.

9906. para. 97: The Trial Chamber considers the cnme of mutilation was particularly grotesque and malicious. Victims who had their limbs hacked off not only endured extreme pain and suffering if they survived, but lost their mobility and capacity to earn a living or even to undertake simple daily tasks.

9907. para.98: The Trial Chamber dismisses the Defence arguments that the RUF was responsible for the bulk of human rights violations in Sierra Leone and finds that this allegation cannot be a mitigating factor.

9908. para. 99: The Trial Chamber found that Kanu was a direct participant in unlawful killings, mutilations, the recruitment and use of the child soldiers, outrages on personal dignity, and enslavement.

ii. Individual Circumstances of Kanu

9909. para. 105: The Trial Chamber finds that nothing in Kanu's personal circumstances justifies any mitigation of his sentence.

9910. para. 106: The Trial Chamber considers that Kanu was a professional soldier whose duty it was to protect the people of Sierra Leone. The fact that he instead attacked innocent and unarmed civilians is considered by the Trial Chamber to be an aggravating factor.

iii. Aggravating Circumstances

9911. para. 109: The Trial Chamber agrees that all of the factors submitted by the Prosecution are aggravating factors.

9913. para. 111: However, the Trial Chamber does consider Kanu's leadership positions in Bombali and Freetown and the Western Area to be an aggravating factor with regards to his Article 6(1) liability for unlawful killings and mutilations.

9914. para. 112: Furthermore, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that Kanu's demonstration of amputations in Freetown and his order to commit killings at Rogbalan Mosque, a place of worship, are aggravating factors with regard to those crimes.

iv. Mitigating Circumstances

9915. para. 115: The Kanu Defence submits that Kanu had a relatively low position throughout the conflict, even in Freetown being only third in command and consequently he bore less responsibility. The Kanu Defence recalls Article 1 (1) of the Statute, which empowers the Special Court to prosecute persons bearing the greatest responsibility for the crimes committed in Sierra Leone.[139] The Kanu Defence argues that although the Trial Chamber has found that this is not a jurisdictional requirement, it is a principle which should nevertheless be reflected in sentencing. [140]

9916. para. 116: The Trial Chamber considers that Kanu's position as third in command of armed forces was not a lowly one. He was not a foot soldier nor was he subject to duress. The fact that there were two persons superior to him does not lessen his culpability for crimes committed and does not mitigate his sentence.

9917. para. 117: The Kanu Defence emphasises that the responsibility of Kanu under Article 6(3) for rape is limited to the failure to prevent or punish the crimes and his sentence must reflect his culpability for this omission, rather than for the crimes themselves. [141]

9918. para. 118: The Trial Chamber takes into consideration that Kanu was convicted for rape pursuant to Article 6(3) and not Article 6(1). Nonetheless, this distinction does not mitigate in his favour.

9919. para. 119: The Kanu Defence contends that Kanu has a girlfriend who wishes to marry him and this family consideration should be taken into account. In addition, the Kanu Defence submits that the "harsh environment of this specific armed conflict as a whole" is a mitigating factor. [142]

9920. para. 120: The Trial Chamber finds nothing in Kanu's family background that would mitigate his sentence.

9921. para. 121: The Kanu Defence recalls the Trial Chamber's findings that on several occasions Kanu followed or reiterated the orders of Brima, submitting that this lesser culpability is relevant to sentencing. [143]

9922. para. 122: There is no evidence that Kanu acted under duress. The fact that Kanu voluntarily reiterated criminal orders previously issued by Brima cannot be considered as mitigation.

9923. para. 123: The Kanu Defence submits that the increasing chaotic climate prevailing in Freetown after the troops lost State House during the January 1999 invasion affected Kanu's culpability in relation to the crimes committed subsequently. The Kanu Defence submits that the difficult circumstances in which a convicted person operates is a mitigating factor, citing the Grit Trial Judgement in support of this proposition. [144]

9924. para. 124: The Trial Chamber found that despite the deterioration of the situation in Freetown following the loss of State House by the renegade SLA, Kanu maintained effective control over his troops, he was aware of the crimes committed by his troops, and he took no steps to prevent or punish the troops under his command for the crimes they committed. [145] The battlefield is always chaotic and therefore this fact cannot be considered as mitigating.

9925. para. 125: The Kanu Defence contends that Kanu joined the military at 25 years of age and only received six months training. The Kanu Defence argues that limited military experience is a mitigating factor. [146]

9926. para. 126: The Trial Chamber finds that limited or lack of military training is not a mitigating factor.

9927. para. 127: In relation to Kanu's conviction on Count 12 (recruitment and use of child soldiers), the Kanu Defence refers to expert evidence heard during the trial establishing that the use of children under the age of 15 in the Sierra Leonean military in recent decades was widespread and a normal practice and there was no proper training given to servicemen to make them aware of the international prohibition on such conduct. While the Kanu Defence accepts that mistake of law is not a defence, it submits that Kanu's absence of knowledge of the criminality of the conduct is a substantial mitigating factor. [147]

9928. para. 128: The Trial Chamber found in the instant case that young children were forcibly kidnapped from their families, often drugged and forcibly trained to commit crimes against civilians. In those circumstances, the Trial Chamber cannot accept that Kanu did not know that that he was committing a crime in recruiting and using these children for military purposes.

9929. para. 129: The Kanu Defence reiterates its argument, presented throughout the trial, that Kanu's responsibilities towards civilians m the jungle entailed their protection and this should be considered a mitigating factor. [148]

9930. para. 130: This submission is contrary to the Trial Chamber findings and is without merit.

9931. para. 131: The Kanu Defence submits that the Trial Chamber's delay until the Judgement in deciding that joint criminal enterprise was not properly pleaded made the proceedings against Kanu unnecessarily long, as it resulted in additional evidence and occupied a substantial amount of time in preparation and the presentation of the parties' cases. The Kanu Defence recalls that it raised objections concerning the deficiency of the Indictment in that respect on several occasions from pre-trial proceedings until the submission of Final Briefs; and argues that disproportionately lengthy proceedings are a recognised mitigating factor in the jurisprudence of the ICTY and the European Court of Human Rights. [149]

9932. para. 132: The Trial Chamber holds that the appropriate time to consider its finding on joint criminal enterprise at the end of the trial when all the evidence and final submissions had been considered. The Trial Chamber therefore finds the Defence argument without merit.

9933. para. 133: The Kanu Defence submits that Kanu's "loyal and faithful" service to the Army, described in his discharge booklet (exhibit D-ll), and absence of prior convictions are mitigating factors. [150] In addition, the Kanu Defence submits that Kanu was a person of good character who assisted vulnerable people in the jungle, referring to evidence to this effect contained in an unsworn, signed witness statement annexed to the Sentencing Brief. [151]

9934. para. 134: The Trial Chamber does not consider Kanu's service in the Army without incident to be a mitigating factor. [152] This was merely his duty.

9935. para. 135: The Kanu Defence recalls evidence at trial to the effect that the overthrow of the AFRC Government and the reinstatement of the Kabbah Government in Freetown in February 1998 was in breach of the Conakry Accord signed between ECOWAS and Johrmy Paul Koroma, which provided for a peaceful handover of power to Kabbah in May 1998. The Kanu Defence submits that this breach put Kanu, as a member of the AFRC Government, "in a dilemma" which mitigates his role in subsequent events. [153]

9936. para. 136: The Trial Chamber finds no merit whatsoever in the Defence submissions with regard to the alleged breach of the Conakry Accord.

9937. para. 137: The Kanu Defence submits that Kanu's trial by the Special Court has "circumvented" the amnesty granted to him as an ex-combatant and this factor should be taken into account as mitigation. [154]

9938. para. 138: The Trial Chamber notes that Article 10 of the Statute states that "an amnesty granted [...] shall not be a bar to prosecution". The Trial Chamber recalls that the Appeals Chamber has addressed legality of amnesties for international crimes and found that the grant of such amnesties violates erga omnes obligations under international law. [155] The Trial Chamber therefore finds no merit in the Defence submission.

d. Remorse

9939. para. 139: The Trial Chamber finds that the statement made by Kanu at the sentencing hearing failed to express any remorse whatsoever for his crimes. [156]

(c) Disposition

9940. FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, THE TRIAL CHAMBER UNANIMOUSLY

> SENTENCES Alex Tamba Brima to a SINGLE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FIFTY YEARS for all the Counts on which he has been found GUILTY. Credit shall be given to him for any period during which he was detained in custody pending this trial;

> SENTENCES Ibrahim Bazzy Kamara to SINGLE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FORTY FIVE YEARS for all the Counts on which he has been found GUILTY. Credit shall be given to him for any period during which he was detained in custody pending this trial;
> SENTENCES Santigie Borbor Kanu to SINGLE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FIFTY YEARS for all the Counts on which he has been found GUILTY. Credit shall be given to him for any period during which he was detained in custody pending this trial.

2. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara, and Santigie Borbor Kanu, SCSL-2004-16-A, Judgement, 22 February 2008

(a) Standard of Review on Appeals Relating to Sentence

9941. para. 308: Article 19 of the Statute limits the penalty that a Trial Chamber can impose upon a convicted person (other than a juvenile) to "imprisonment for a specified term of years." It further provides that the Trial Chamber shall, in determining the "terms of imprisonment," as appropriate, have recourse to the sentencing practices of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("ICTR") and the national courts of Sierra Leone. The Statute requires the Trial Chamber to take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person in imposing sentences.[470]

9942. para. 309: The determination of an appropriate sentence being at the discretion of the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber will only revise a sentence where the Trial Chamber has committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion or has failed to follow the applicable law. To show that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion:

> "the Appellant has to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber gave weight to extraneous or irrelevant considerations, failed to give weight or sufficient weight to relevant considerations, made a clear error as to the facts upon which it exercised its discretion, or that the Trial Chamber's decision was so unreasonable or plainly unjust that the Appeals Chamber is able to infer that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly."[471]

(b) Excessive Sentences: Ground Twelve of Brima's Appeal and Ground Ten of Kamara's Appeal

9943. para. 310: Brima alleges that the Trial Chamber erred by imposing a global sentence of fifty years, that it is "excessively harsh and disproportionate," and that it is inconsistent with the sentencing guidelines of the ICTY and the ICTR.[472] Kamara's Tenth Ground of Appeal argues that the Trial Chamber was required by Article 19(1) of the Statute to consider the sentencing practices in the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone.[473] Kamara further argues that a sentence of 45 years is inconsistent with the penalties that have been imposed by the ICTR.[474]

9944. para. 311: Article 19(1) of the Statute provides that the "Trial Chamber, as appropriate, shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone." The phrase "where appropriate" shows that the Trial Chamber has a discretion in determining when to have recourse to sentencing practices in the two courts.

(c) Mitigating Factors: Ground Nine of Kamara's Appeal and Grounds Eleven, Fifteen, Sixteen, Seventeen and Eighteen of Kanu's Appeal

9945. para. 312: The Appellants make two distinct submissions with regard to mitigating factors. First, that the Trial Chamber did not consider mitigating factors and second, that particular mitigating factors were not given adequate weight.[475]

9946. para. 313: Rule 101(B) of the Rules provides that the "Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19(2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as: …any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction." Brima and Kanu argue that the Trial Chamber failed to consider mitigating factors.[476]

9947. para. 314: In the view of the Appeals Chamber an appellant challenging the weight given by a Trial Chamber to a particular mitigating circumstance has the duty of showing that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion.

9948. para. 315: The mere recital of mitigating factors, as the Appellants have done, without concrete arguments, does not suffice to discharge the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion.[477]

(d) Double-Counting, Gravity of the Offence and Aggravating Factors: Ground Twelve of Brima's Appeal

9949. para. 316: Brima submits that the Trial Chamber erred by considering the following factors in determining the gravity of the offence as well as aggravating factors:

> "The brutality and heinousness of the crimes such as the drugging of child soldiers, brutal gang rapes, lengthy periods of enslavement, the burning alive of civilians and amputations."

9950. para. 317: Although the issue of double-counting was only raised by Brima, it is in the interest of justice for the Appeals Chamber to consider the issue in relation to Kanu and Kamara as well. As the Trial Chamber notes in the Sentencing Judgment, "where a factor has already been taken into account in determining the gravity of the offence, it cannot be considered additionally as an aggravating factor . . . ."[478] This prohibition is well established in the case law of the international criminal tribunals.[479]

9951. para. 318: In Nikolić, the ICTY Appeals Chamber determined that the Trial Chamber had double-counted by repeating facts concerning the accused's general role in the offences.[480] However, the Appeals Chamber determined that there was no double-counting where the Trial Chamber considered the impact of the crimes on the victim in one section and the vulnerability of the victims in the other section.[481]

9952. para. 319: The Appeals Chamber notes that there were instances of double-counting in the Sentencing Judgment.[482]

9953. para. 320: Although the Trial Chamber made an error by double-counting, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that this error had a significant impact upon the Appellants' sentences.

(e) Kanu's Eighth Ground of Appeal: Cumulative Convictions and Sentence

(i) Submissions of the Parties

9954. para. 321: In his Eighth Ground of Appeal, Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in imposing a global sentence of fifty years. He argues that the term of imprisonment shows that the cumulative convictions entered against him were not discounted for sentencing purposes [483] and that the sentence imposed on him reflects the number of convictions rather than the underlying criminal conduct.[484] Kanu further submits that a more appropriate penalty that reflects his criminal conduct and not the number of convictions should replace the sentence imposed on him. In response, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber was under no obligation to discount the cumulative convictions entered against Kanu for sentencing purposes.[485]

(ii) Discussion

9955. para. 322: The Trial Chamber stated that the Special Court Statute permits it to impose a single sentence. It added that in exercising its discretion whether to impose a single sentence, the governing criteria is that the final or aggregate sentence should reflect the totality of the culpable conduct, or generally, that it should reflect the gravity of the offences and the overall culpability of the offender, so that it is both just and appropriate."[486] The Trial Chamber then explained that "in the present case the Trial Chamber finds it is appropriate to impose a global sentence for the multiple convictions in respect of Brima, Kamara and Kanu."[487]

9956. para. 323: In the Sentencing Judgment, the Trial Chamber enumerated all criminal acts for which Kanu was found responsible under Article 6(1) of the Statute and also referred to the gravity of the criminal conduct of his subordinates throughout Bombali District, Freetown and other parts of the Western Area for which he was found liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute. The emphasis placed on Kanu's criminal acts demonstrates that the Trial Chamber ascertained the gravity of the offences in light of the individual criminal acts rather than in light of the multiple Counts for which Kanu was convicted. This approach ensured that the sentence encompasses Kanu's, overall, criminal conduct.

9957. para. 324: The Appeals Chamber finds that in imposing sentence, the Trial Chamber considered the overall criminal conduct of Kanu, rather than the number of convictions entered against him.

9958. para. 325: The Appeals Chamber thus finds no error in the Trial Chamber's approach that would warrant its interference with the sentence imposed. Ground Eight of Kanu's Appeal therefore fails.

(iii) Sentence: General Conclusion

9959. para. 326: Having considered all the Grounds of Appeal relating to the Sentencing Judgment of the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber has overall properly exercised its discretion within the provisions of the Statute of the Court.

9960. para. 327: Article 19(2) of the Statute states as follows:

> In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person (emphasis added).

9961. para. 328: The Trial Chamber, in applying this provision to the case, had this to say:

> Brima, Kamara and Kanu have been found responsible for some of the most heinous, brutal and atrocious crimes ever recorded in human history. Innocent civilians – babies, children, men and women of all ages – were murdered by being shot, hacked to death, burned alive, beaten to death. Women and young girls were > gang raped to death. Some had their genitals mutilated by the insertion of foreign objects. Sons were forced to rape mothers, brothers were forced to rape sisters. Pregnant women were killed by having their stomachs slit open and the foetus removed merely to settle a bet amongst the troops as to the gender of the foetus. Men were disembowelled and their intestines stretched across a road to form a barrier. Human heads were placed on sticks on either side of the road to mark such barriers. Hacking off the limbs of innocent civilians was commonplace. The victims were babies, young children and men and women of all ages. Some had one arm amputated, others lost both arms. For those victims who survived an amputation, life was instantly and forever changed into one of dependence. Most were turned into beggars unable to earn any other living and even today cannot perform even the simplest of tasks without the help of others. Children were forcibly taken away from their families, often drugged and used as child soldiers who were trained to kill and commit other brutal crimes against the civilian population. Those child soldiers who survived the war were robbed of a childhood and most of them lost the chance of an education.[488]

The Appeals Chamber is, therefore, satisfied that having regard to that finding, the Trial Chamber was justified in imposing a prison sentence of fifty (50) years on the Appellant Alex Tamba Brima, forty-five (45) years on the Appellant Brima Bazzy Kamara, and fifty (50) years on Santigie Borbor Kanu.

9962. para. 329: The Appeals Chamber finds no cause to interfere with the exercise by the Trial Chamber of its discretion in sentencing the Appellants.

9963. para. 330: In the result the Appellants Appeal against sentence fails.

(f) Disposition

9964. For the foregoing reasons, THE APPEALS CHAMBER

D. CDF

1. Sentencing Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-T, Sentencing Judgement, 9 October 2007

(a) Preliminary Issues

9965. para. 11: The Chamber, in this process, was seized of the Defence Request for Leave to Supplement the Fofana Sentencing Brief,[6] filed on the 14th of September 2007, in which the Fofana Defence requested leave to substitute a signed version of a statement given by Simon Arthy for the unsigned version of this statement that it had appended as Annex A of its Sentencing Brief. The Chamber grants this request.

9966. para. 12: During the Sentencing Hearing on the 19th of September 2007, the Chamber noted that it was seized of the Prosecutor's Response to Defence Request for Leave to Supplement the Fofana Sentencing Brief.[7] The Chamber gave the Parties the opportunity to make oral submissions on this issue, in which the Defence sought to have admitted six statements and to call one witness, Frances Fortune, to attest to the good character of Moinina Fofana.[8] The Prosecution objected to the admission of these statements on the basis that they introduced new evidence, much of which went to proof of the acts and conduct of the Accused, and that it would be prejudiced as it would have no opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses.[9] It also objected to the calling of Frances Fortune as a witness on the basis that her affidavit was taken from a bail application in 2004 and raised an issue of bias.[10] The Fofana Defence submitted that the statements related to the conduct of Fofana in promoting peace and reconciliation which occurred during the post mid-1998 era, and therefore after the commission of the crimes for which he has been convicted.[11]

9967. para. 13: The Chamber made an oral ruling that the documents annexed to both the Prosecution and Defence Briefs were to be admitted insofar as they assisted the Chamber to establish the character of the Accused. However, the Chamber further ruled that any statements included in those documents that go to the acts and conduct of the Accused, as they relate to the subject of the Judgement, were inadmissible and would be disregarded by the Chamber in the process of evaluating the said documents. The Chamber also ruled that it did not deem it necessary for witnesses to be called at this stage, and accordingly, denied the Fofana Defence application to call Frances Fortune.[12]

(b) Applicable Law

(i) Applicable Provisions

9968. para. 25: Article 19 of the Statute and Rules 100 and 101 of the Rules contain provisions relevant to guiding the Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence. They provide as follows:

> Article 19- Penalties
>
> 1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.
>
> 2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.
>
> Rule 100 - Sentencing Procedure
>
> (A) If the Trial Chamber convicts the accused or the accused enters a guilty plea, the Prosecutor shall submit any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence no more than 7 days after such conviction or guilty plea. The defendant shall thereafter, but no more that 7 days after the Prosecutor's filing submit any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence.
>
> (B) Where the accused has entered a guilty plea, the Trial Chamber > shall hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing. Where the accused has been convicted by a Trial Chamber, the Trial Chamber may hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing. (C) The sentence shall be pronounced in a judgement in public and in the presence of the convicted person, subject to Rule 102(B).
>
>
>
> (A) A person convicted by the Special Court, other than a juvenile offender, may be sentenced to imprisonment for a specific number of years.
>
> (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:
>
> (i) Any aggravating circumstances;
>
> (ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;

(iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9 (3) of the Statute.

(C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

(D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

(ii) Sentencing Objectives

9969. para. 26: According to the jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunals on this subject, the primary objectives of sentencing are retribution, deterrence and rehabilitation.[39] In the context of international criminal justice, retribution should:

> not be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge, but as duly expressing the outrage of the international community at these crimes.[...] Accordingly, a sentence of the International Tribunal should make plain the condemnation of the international community of the behaviour in question and show that the international community was not ready to tolerate serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.[40]

9970. para. 27: The Chamber here refers and adopts the definition of retribution provided by Lamer J. of the Supreme Court of Canada, who held that:

> Retribution, in a criminal context, by contrast [to vengeance) represents an objective, reasoned and measured determination of an appropriate punishment which properly reflects the moral culpability of the offender, having regard to the international risk-taking of the offender, the consequential harm caused by the offender, and the normative character of the offender's conduct. Furthermore, unlike vengeance, retribution incorporates a principle of restraint; retribution requires the imposition of a just and appropriate punishment, and nothing more.[41]

9971. para. 28: Although rehabilitation is considered as an important element in sentencing, it is of greater importance in domestic jurisdictions than in International Criminal Tribunals.[42]

9972. para. 29: The Chamber notes the content of Security Council Resolution No. 1315 (2000), which provides as follows:

> [...] in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace.43 The Chamber takes these objectives into consideration in determining the sentences to be meted out to the Accused.

9973. para. 30: The Chamber also endorses the principle that:

> One of the main purposes of a sentence imposed by an international Tribunal is to influence the legal awareness of the accused, the surviving victims, their relatives, the witnesses and the general public in order to reassure them that the legal system is implemented and enforced. Additionally, the process of sentencing is intended to convey the message that globally accepted laws and rules have to be accepted byeveryone.[44]

9974. para. 31: In fact, the sentence imposed must be individualized and proportionate to the conduct of the Accused.[45]

(c) Sentencing Factors

9975. para. 32: The Chamber notes that Article 19 and Rule 101(B) stipulate that certain factors have to be considered in determining an appropriate sentence. These include the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the Accused, any aggravating and mitigating factors, and where appropriate, the general sentencing practices of the ICTR and of the national courts of Sierra Leone.

(i) Gravity of Offence

9976. para. 33: The Chamber is of the view that the "gravity of the offence" is an important principle in determining the sentence to be imposed by the Court. The determination of the gravity of the offence, which has been regarded as the "litmus test for the appropriate sentence",[46] requires a "consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of participation of the Accused in the crime".[47] In considering the gravity of the offence, the Chamber has taken into account such factors as the scale and brutality of the offences committed,[48] the role played by the Accused in their commission,[49] the degree of suffering or impact of the crime on the immediate victim, as well as its effect on relatives of the victim,[50] and the vulnerability and number of victims.[51]

9977. para. 34: In assessing the role of the Accused in the crime, the Chamber has taken into account the mode of liability under which the Accused was convicted, as well the nature and degree of his participation in the offence. In particular, the Chamber has considered whether the Accused was held liable as an indirect or a secondary perpetrator.[52] In assessing the gravity of offences for which the Accused was convicted as a superior, the Chamber has considered the gravity of the underlying offence and the gravity of the conduct of the Accused in failing to prevent or punish the crimes committed by the subordinate.[53]

9978. para. 35: The Chamber is of the opinion however, that the factors it has taken into account in assessing the gravity of the offence, cannot, in addition, be taken into account as aggravating circumstances.[54] Similarly, the Chamber takes the view that factors which it considers and accepts to lessen the gravity of the offence, cannot be taken into account as mitigating circumstances.

(ii) Aggravating Circumstances

9979. para. 36: Aggravating factors must be shown to have been established by the Prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt.[55] Only circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged, and for which the Accused has been convicted, can be considered to be aggravating.[56] If a particular circumstance is an element of the underlying offence, it cannot be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[57]

9980. para. 37: We observe that since the Statute and the Rules do not exhaustively list the circumstances that the Chamber may consider to be aggravating, the courts have, through their Decisions and Judgements, developed jurisprudence on the factors that may be considered as aggravating. These include the leadership role of the Accused,[58] premeditation and motive,[59] a willing and enthusiastic participation in the crime,[60] and the length of time during which the crime was committed.[6l]

9981. para. 38: The Chamber is of the view that the position of leadership of an Accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute, can be considered to be an aggravating circumstance.[62] However, if an Accused has been found liable under Article 6(3), his leadership position cannot be considered by the Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is in itself a constitutive element of the offence.[63] Where the Accused has actively abused his position of command or participated in the crimes of his subordinates however, such conduct can be considered to be aggravating.[64]

9982. para. 39: Breach of trust or authority, where the Accused was in a position that carries with it a duty to protect or defend the victims, such as in the case of a government official, police chief or commander, can be an aggravating factor, and even where the Accused held no official position of authority, it is an aggravating factor, if he held a position of prominence or trust in the community.[65]

(iii) Mitigating Circumstances

9983. para. 40: Mitigating factors must be established by the Defence on a balance of probabilities.66 Under Rule 101(B), the only mitigating circumstance that the Chamber is required to consider is the substantial cooperation of the Accused with the Prosecutor. The Chamber, however, has the discretion to consider other factors or circumstances in mitigation, such as the expression of remorse,[67] good character with no prior convictions,[68] personal and family circumstances,[69] behaviour and conduct subsequent to the conflict, particularly with respect to promoting peace and reconciliation,[70] good behaviour in detention,[71] and assistance to detainees or victims.[72] The Chamber has also considered the prevailing circumstances operating at the time of the commission of the crimes, and the motive of the Accused in determining whether there should be a mitigation of the sentence.

(d) Sentencing Practice of Other International Tribunals

(i) Sentencing Practice at other International Tribunals

9984. para. 41: Article 19(1) directs the Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices adopted at the ICTR. In their written and oral submissions, the Parties also drew the Chamber's attention to jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY").[73] The Chamber is of the view that the sentencing practice of both international tribunals is instructive, and has considered these practices where appropriate. However, it is also aware of the limitations of the use that can be made of the sentencing practices of these tribunals. In particular, it notes that the practice of imposing global sentences at both tribunals makes it difficult to ascertain the sentence imposed for each individual crime. Moreover, the Chamber notes that many of the sentences at the ICTR were imposed in relation to the crime of genocide, which is not an offence within the jurisdiction of the Special Court.

(ii) Sentencing Practice in Sierra Leone

9985. para. 42: Article 19(0 authorizes the Trial Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean domestic courts. The Prosecution contends that in determining the gravity of the offence, the Chamber should consider that the offences for which the Accused have been found guilty, would attract the death penalty or life imprisonment under Sierra Leonean law.[74] Both Fofana and Kondewa submit that given that the Accused were not convicted of any offences under Article 5 of the Statute which incorporates offences under Sierra Leonean legislation, the court should not consider Sierra Leonean sentencing practice.[75]

9986. para. 43: In this regard, the Chamber notes that the Accused were neither indicted nor convicted for any of the offences enumerated under Article 5 of the Statute. Furthermore, the Statute of the Special Court does not provide for either capital punishment or imposition of a "life sentence", which are the punishments that the most serious crimes under Sierra Leonean law attract. For these reasons, the Chamber finds that it would be inappropriate to rely on the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean Courts in determining the punishment to be imposed on either Fofana or on Kondewa.

(e) Determination of Sentence

(i) Deliberations

9987. para. 44: The Chamber has considered both the Parties' written briefs and their oral submissions, made in court during the Sentencing Hearing, as they relate to the gravity of the offence, as well as any aggravating or mitigating circumstances. Only those factors that the Chamber has found to be relevant in the determination of sentence, however, have here been explicitly discussed by the Chamber.

(ii) Gravity of the Offences – Fofana

9988. para. 45: Fofana was convicted on the basis of Article 6(1) and Article 6(3). Specifically, the 9989. Chamber found him guilty of the following:

1. Aiding and abetting pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute for Counts 2, 4 and 7 for the Tongo Crime Base;

2. Failure to prevent pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for Counts 2, 4 and 7 for the Koribondo Crime Base; and

3. Failure to prevent pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for Counts 2, 4, 5 and 7 for the Bo District Crime Base.[76]

9990. para. 46: With respect to the crimes for which Fofana was found liable under Article 6(3), the Chamber has examined the gravity of the crimes committed by subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, as described in the Judgement, were of a very serious nature, and were committed against innocent civilians. The Chamber considers actions such as the mutilation and the targeted killing of Umba civilians77 and the killing and mutilation of Chief Kafala (whom the CDF/Kamajors considered a collaborator) in Koribondo,[78] to be indicative of the brutality of the offences committed by Fofana's subordinates. The Chamber also notes the gruesome murder of two women in Koribondo who had sticks inserted and forced into their genitals until they came out of their mouths. The women were then disembowelled, and while their guts were used as checkpoints, parts of their entrails were eaten.[79]

9991. para. 47: The Chamber also finds that many of the offences for which Fofana was convicted under Article 6(1) were committed on a large scale and with a significant degree of brutality. In particular, the Chamber notes the murder of 150 Loko, Limba and Temne tribe members in Talama,[80] the killings of 20 men on the 15th of January 1998 at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo, who were hacked to death with machetes,[8l] and the killing of 64 civilians in Kamboma, who were placed in two separate lines and killed, after which their corpses were rolled into a swamp,[82] as indicative of the scale and brutality of the crimes that Fofana was found to have aided and abetted in the Tongo Field area. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that the crimes were particularly serious insofar as they were committed against unarmed and innocent civilians, solely on the basis that they were unjustifiably perceived and branded as "rebel collaborators".

9992. para. 48: The Chamber notes that many of the victims of these crimes were young children and women, and therefore belong to a particularly vulnerable sector of society. For instance, we note our findings of the hacking to death by the CDF/Kamajors of a boy named Sule at a checkpoint in the Tongo area,[83] the murder of a 12 year old boy in Talama[84], the murder of an unidentified woman who was alleged to have cooked for the rebels in Bo, and the atrocious murder of the two women in Koribundo as described earlier.[85]

9993. para. 49: The Chamber considers these crimes to have had a significant physical and psychological impact on the victims of such crimes, on the relatives of the victims, and on those in the broader community. The testimony of witnesses heard by the Chamber during the trial, and appended to the Prosecution Brief in Annex D, indicates the impact which events such as amputations and the loss of family members have had on the lives of victims and witnesses.[86] As appropriately described and summarized by our sister Trial Chamber II, "victims who had their limbs hacked off not only endured extreme pain and suffering, if they survived, but lost their mobility and capacity to earn a living or even to undertake simple daily tasks. They have been rendered dependent on others for the rest of their lives".[87] In particular, the Chamber notes the lasting effect of these crimes on victims such as TF2-0 15, who was the only survivor of an attack on 65 civilians who were hacked to death by machetes or shot, and who was himself hacked with a machete and rolled into a swamp on top of the dead bodies in the belief that he was dead.[88]

9994. para. 50: With respect to the form and degree of Fofana's participation, the Chamber notes that he was found liable for the crimes in Tongo Field as an aider and abettor under Article 6(1) of the Statute. The jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR indicates that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that to be imposed for more direct forms of participation.[89] The Chamber also notes that while Fofana was found liable for aiding and abetting, he was not present at the scenes of the crimes and that the degree of his participation amounted only to encouragement.[90]

9995. para. 51: With respect to the crimes for which Fofana was convicted under Article 6(3), the Chamber has considered the gravity of Fofana's conduct in failing to prevent the crimes. It finds that the gravity of the offence committed by Fofana given his leadership role as a superior who failed to prevent his subordinates from committing crimes, is greater than that of the actual perpetrators of the crimes.[91] In this case, the fact that Fofana's failure to prevent was ongoing, rather than an isolated occurrence, had the implicit effect of encouraging his subordinates to believe that they could commit further crimes with impunity. This factor therefore, in our opinion, increases the seriousness of the crimes for which he has been convicted.[92]

(iii) Gravity of the Offences – Kondewa

9996. para. 52: Kondewa was convicted under Article 6(1) and under Article 6(3). Specifically, the Chamber found him guilty of the following:

4. Aiding and abetting pursuant to Article 6(0 of the Statute for Counts 2, 4 and 7 for the Tongo Crime Base;

5. Failure to prevent pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for Counts 2, 4, 5 and 7 for the Bonthe and Moyamba Crime Bases;

3. Commission (murder) pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute for Count 2 for the Talia/Base Zero Crime Base;

4. Commission (enlisting child soldiers) pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute for Count 8.

9997. para. 53: With respect to the crimes for which Kondewa was found liable under Article 6(3), the Chamber has examined the gravity of the crimes committed by the subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, as described in the Judgement, were of a serious nature. The Chamber notes, in particular, that the CDF/Kamajors in Bonthe stripped Lahia Ndokoi Koroma naked and tied him,[93] a particularly humiliating and degrading act. With respect to Kondewa's liability under Article 6(1), he was convicted for the same crimes as Fofana in the Tongo area; the scale and the barbaric nature of such crimes has been described above.[94]

9998. para. 54: As is the case with Fofana, the Chamber notes that many of the victims of these crimes were young children and women, and were therefore particularly vulnerable. It notes, in particular, the two incidents involving children in the Tongo area described above with respect to Fofana,[95] and the killing of a boy called Bendeh Battiama by Rambo Conteh in Bonthe.[96]

9999. para. 55: With respect to the offence of the enlistment of child soldiers for which Kondewa was convicted, the Chamber notes the particular vulnerability of TF2-021, who was eleven years old when he was captured by the CDF/Kamajors and forcibly trained to kill and to commit crimes against innocent civilians.[97] At the age of eleven, Witness TF2-021 was initiated into the Kamajor society and, at the age of thirteen, he was initiated by Kondewa into the "Avondo Society", a notorious group of Kamajors.[98] The Chamber notes the commentary of the ICRC that "child soldiers are deprived of a family, deprived of an education and all the advantages that would otherwise help them be children and prepare them for adulthood [...] In the end, child soldiers will suffer deep trauma, which persists long after the fighting has stopped".[99]

10000. para. 56: Further, as noted by the Chamber with respect to Fofana, it considers these crimes to have had a significant physical and psychological impact on the victims of such crimes, on the relatives of the victims, and on those in the broader community.[100]

10001. para. 57: With respect to the form and degree of Kondewa's participation in the crimes committed, the Chamber finds that while he was held liable on the basis of aiding and abetting under Article 6(1) and as a superior under Article 6(3), he was also held liable for the direct perpetration of some acts, including the shooting of a town commander in Talia/Base Zero, and for committing the offence of the enlistment of child soldiers.

10002. para. 58: Furthermore, with respect to his liability under Article 6(3), the Chamber finds, as it did with Fofana, that given his leadership role as a superior who failed to prevent his subordinates from committing crimes, the gravity of the offence committed by Kondewa is greater than that of the actual perpetrators of the crimes. The Chamber finds that in this case, the fact that Kondewa's failure to prevent was ongoing, rather than an isolated occurrence, had the implicit effect of encouraging his subordinates to believe that they could commit further crimes with impunity, and therefore increases the seriousness of the crimes for which he has been convicted.

(iv) Aggravating Circumstances

a. Fofana

10003. para. 59: The Chamber has found that Fofana played a central role in the CDF organization.[101] In his capacity as Director of War at Base Zero, he planned war strategies, selected commanders to go to battle, and on occasion, issued orders to such commanders. He also received frontline reports, which went through him before he passed them to Norman. He was also responsible for the receipt and provision of ammunition at Base Zero.[102] The Chamber has found that Fofana was seen as having power and authority at Base Zero and to be the "overall boss of the commanders".[103]

10004. para. 60: The Chamber considers that, given his role as a former Chiefdom Speaker, a community elder and the CDF National Director of War, Fofana breached a position of trust in committing the offences for which he has been convicted.

b. Kondewa

10005. para. 61: The Chamber has found that, as the High Priest of the CDF organization, Kondewa played an essential role in the leadership of the CDF.[104] He was in charge of initiations, and was held in respect and fear by the Kamajors, who believed that he could protect them from harm. The Chamber has found that no Kamajor would go to war without his blessing.[105] He was one of those who made decisions determining when and where to go to war. He also attended passing out parades and signed the certificates of trainees.[106]

10006. para. 62: The Chamber finds that given the cultural context, Kondewa, in his role as High Priest who blessed the CDF/Kamajors before they went to battle, and as someone widely respected for his mystical powers and abilities to immunize people against harm, held a unique and prominent position in the community. The Chamber therefore finds that he also breached a position of trust in committing the crimes for which he was convicted.

(v) Mitigating Circumstances

a. Fofana - Remorse

10007. para. 63: During the Sentencing Hearing, Counsel for Fofana stated, at the specific request and on behalf of his client:

> [...] Mr Fofana accepts that crimes were committed by the CDF during the conflict in Sierra Leone. Indeed, at least one witness was called on behalf of the Fofana defence, Joseph Lansana, accepting and attesting to crimes committed by the CDF. Mr Fofana deeply regrets all the unnecessary suffering that has occurred in this country.[107]

10008. para. 64: Although Fofana by this statement does not expressly acknowledge his personal participation in the crimes for which the Chamber has convicted him, the Chamber finds that he has clearly expressed empathy with the victims of those crimes.[108]

b. Kondewa - Remorse

10009. para. 65: During the Sentencing Hearing, Kondewa addressed the court and the public in the following terms, "Sierra Leoneans, those of you who lost your relations within the war, I plead for mercy today, and remorse, and even for yourselves."[109] The Chamber finds that although Kondewa did not expressly recognise his own participation in the crimes for which he has been found guilty, the empathy he has shown is real and sincere.

(vi) Lack of Formal Education or Training

10010. para. 66: The Chamber does not consider lack of formal education per se, to be an excuse which would mitigate the severity of punishment. However, the Chamber is aware that both men were propelled in a relatively short period of time, from civilian life to an effective position of authority in a very brutal and bloody conflict, with no adequate training for the roles which they were to play. The Chamber finds that it is only reasonable to take account of the fact that inexperience in difficult situations, does increase the likelihood of making the wrong decisions. Whilst this in no way reduces the gravity of the crimes which were committed, the Chamber recognises it as a factor in mitigation of sentence.

(vii) Subsequent Conduct

10011. para. 67: The Chamber has examined the evidence filed by the Fofana Defence regarding Fofana's conduct subsequent to the time frame in which the crimes he committed occurred. In particular, the Chamber notes the submission of the Defence in relation to Fofana's commitment to and observance of the Lome Peace agreement,[110] and the unchallenged evidence presented by the Defence in relation to his efforts subsequent to that agreement to work without any pay with the NGO community in ensuring that members of the CDF remained committed to the peace process within Sierra Leone.[111] The Chamber also notes the contents of the certificate of good conduct filed by the Officer in Charge of the SCSL Detention Facility, attesting to Fofana's exemplary behaviour whilst in custody during the course of trial.[112] The Chamber commends Fofana's subsequent conduct in fostering the peace process, and recognises it as a factor in mitigation of his sentence.

(viii) Lack of Prior Convictions

10012. para. 68: The Chamber notes that neither Fofana nor Kondewa has any previous convictions. For purposes of sentencing, a clean slate in terms of their criminal records, can be considered as a mitigating circumstance.[113]

(ix) Mitigating Circumstances

a. Necessity as a Mitigating Factor

10013. para. 69: In the course of the Sentencing Hearing, Mr Powles, Learned Counsel for the Defence of Fofana, invited the Chamber to consider the Honourable Justice Thompson's findings on "Necessity" and to factor the same into the Sentencing Judgement as a mitigating circumstance. Mr Powles had this to say:

> [...] the findings and views of Your Brother Judge Bankole Thompson are at the very least a persuasive mitigating factor when considering sentence [...][114]

10014. para. 70: We observe, as Mr. Powles later admitted at this hearing, that the defence of Necessity was never raised by the Defence nor did its applicability to the circumstances of this case, feature for a determination at any stage before the delivery of the Judgement on the 2nd of August 2007.[115] In addition, it is our opinion, that the facts which we have accepted as proven and which form the basis of our findings of guilt against the two Accused in the Judgement, as well as the circumstances surrounding the commission of these offences, do not support nor do they give rise to a defence of Necessity.

(x) Honourable Justice Thompson's Dissenting Opinion

10015. para. 71: In the process of our deliberations for the issuance of this Sentencing Judgment, our colleague and brother, the Honourable Justice Bankole Thompson, provided us with an advance copy of his dissent where he reiterates his stand and upholds the defence of Necessity and in which he had this to say:

> I most respectfully dissent from the said Judgment predicated upon my firm Judicial position taken in my Separate Concurring and Partially Dissenting Opinion (Annex C thereof) delivered on the 2nd day of August 2007, and based specifically on the analysis, considerations, and reasons advanced in Parts Eight and Nine of the said Opinion and consistent with the Dispositions made in Part Ten therein, acquitting the Accused on all Counts of the Indictment.[116]

10016. para. 72: The Chamber observes here that Parts Eight and Nine referred to by the Honourable Justice Thompson relate to the defence of 'Necessity' and that of "Salus Civis Suprema Lex Est' on which he based the acquittal of the Accused Persons; Moinina Fofana on Counts 2, 4, 5 and 7, and Allieu Kondewa on Counts 2, 4, 5,7 and 8 of the Indictment. The Chamber could and would have addressed these defences and their applicability adequately and in greater detail, if as we have already indicated, these issues had been raised by the Parties in the course of the trial proceedings or at any stage before delivering our Judgement. This would have provided the Chamber the opportunity to address the defences so raised in the Dissenting Opinion in the said Judgement.

10017. para. 73: In this regard, and without going into a detailed analysis at this sentencing stage on the defence of Necessity and its applicability, the Chamber, in arriving at this conclusion, has based its Decision on the fact that the constitutive elements of the defence of Necessity have not been established to sustain it as a defence, as we have found, particularly in this case.[117] The Chamber in this regard and again in arriving at this conclusion, further relies on the law on this subject as applied to the facts and principles established in the celebrated English case of R. v. Dudley and Stephens.[118] In that case, which has served as a foundation for the defence of Necessity in the common law, the Learned Justices decided that the defence of Necessity was unfounded, and sentenced both Accused Persons to death.

10018. para. 74: Applying the precedent of Dudley and Stephens, and the law on this defence, the Chamber, considering the facts and circumstances of this case, concludes that Necessity cannot be sustained as a defence in this case and that by a parity of reasoning, cannot be considered either for purposes of mitigating the sentences because the Chamber opines that it either stands as a defence, or fails on all other grounds or circumstances.

10019. para. 75: The Chamber notes and observes here that Dudley and Stephens was footnoted by the Honourable Justice Thompson in his Dissenting Opinion.[119] In addition and in the same Dissenting Opinion, the Chamber further notes that the Honourable Dissenting Judge himself, quoting from his own book, concedes that "the defence of Necessity bristles with conceptual and doctrinal difficulties" and that "these controversies are still unsettled".[120] According to Stephen, the Honourable Justice Thompson continues, the defence of Necessity is "a subject on which the law of England is so vague" and is "essentially a matter of judicial expediency".[121]

10020. para. 76: The above comments confirm the fragility of this defence in municipal or national systems where it may be applicable. The Chamber considers that it is reinforced and supported in its decision to rule against the propriety and applicability of Necessity as a defence to criminal liability in this case for the reasons that we advanced earlier in this regard and for the considerations that follow with respect to its pertinence and applicability in the domain of International Humanitarian Law.

(xi) Necessity as a Defence in International Humanitarian Law

10021. para. 77: Further to our finding that Necessity is not and cannot be a sustainable defence nor is it a mitigating factor in this case, it is equally the Chamber's view, suffice to say for our purposes here, that it cannot be accepted either, as a defence in cases where Accused Persons are indicted for serious violations of International Humanitarian Law as is the case with the two Accused Persons who we have convicted.

10022. para. 78: In this regard, it is the Chamber's considered opinion that accepting the applicability of the defence of Necessity in prosecutions involving either war crimes or crimes against humanity, would negate the norms and fundamental principles protecting persons not taking part in hostilities and the victims of armed conflicts and consequently, compromise the objectives which International Humanitarian Law seeks to achieve through International instruments and in particular, the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocols I and II.

10023. para. 79: The Chamber further opines that validating the defence of Necessity in International Criminal Law would create a justification for what offenders may term and plead as a 'just cause' or a 'just war' even though serious violations of International Humanitarian Law would have been committed. This, we observe, would negate the resolve and determination of the International Community to combat these crimes which have the common characteristics of being heinous, gruesome or degrading of innocent victims or of the civilian population that it intends to protect.

10024. para. 80: It is further our view, that the argument of fighting the enemy, the AFRC, as the two Accused Persons indisputably did, in order to restore the ousted democratically elected Government of President Kabbah which we hold is rather a mitigating circumstance, but on which the defence of Necessity has been found to be grounded by the Honourable Justice Thompson in his Dissenting Opinion, we conclude were carefully planned and premeditated killings of innocent and unarmed civilians for which we have found the two Accused Persons guilty. In these circumstances, the Chamber cannot but conclude that such an argument is meretricious and without any foundation.

10025. para. 81: Furthermore, the Chamber is of the opinion that the principle of 'Salus Civis Suprema Lex Est', is more an appropriate concept in legal philosophy on society and the law that neither occupies a visibly recognisable place in criminal proceedings as a defence, nor does it feature as a legal defence that is established and properly recognised as such under the law.

(xii) Prevailing Circumstances

10026. para. 82: The Chamber has taken note of some significant and enlightening precedents on sentencing principles from sister International Criminal Tribunals of the ICTY and ICTR that have been cited by the Parties. However, even though the statutorily oriented sentencing principles in those cases remain relevant in guiding and assisting us to arrive at a decision in this case, it is pertinent to note that there is an important factual and contextual difference and distinction that the Chamber would like to draw between those cases as against this one which we consider relevant and pertinent in scaling the sentences that we are about to hand down on the Accused Persons in relation to the Counts for which we have found them guilty.

(xiii) Historical Background/Prevailing Circumstances

10027. para. 83: The main distinguishing factor is that the acts of the Accused and those of the CDF/Kamajors for which they have respectively been found guilty, did not emanate from a resolve to destabilise the established Constitutional Order. Rather, and on the contrary, the CDF/Kamajors was a fighting force that was mobilised and was implicated in the conflict in Sierra Leone to support a legitimate cause which, as we have already seen, was to restore the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah which had been illegally ousted through a Coup d'Etat orchestrated and carried out on the 25th of May 1997, by a wing of the Sierra Leone Armed Forces that later constituted and baptised itself as the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC).

(xiv) Kamajors alongside the Sierra Leonean Armed Forces

10028. para. 84: The Chamber also finds it necessary to consider a further and additional element on the role of the Kamajors, from the outset of the war in Sierra Leone. In effect, these historically traditional hunters,[123] from the evidence adduced, were comrades in arms with the regular Sierra Leone Armed Forces as early as from the outbreak of the rebel war.[124] They acted as guides to the regular Army and facilitated the war against the rebels.[125] Indeed, even the military regime of the NPRC that seized power in a military Coup in 1992,[126] used them to fight against the rebels and to protect the Constitutional Institutions of Sierra Leone. In this process, and in defence of their communities, the local Chiefs mobilised, enlisted and initiated their young and fit ones, into the Kamajor Society with the sole objective of combating the rebels and preventing the brutal killings of their kith and kin and other atrocities, in addition to protecting their lands and their properties.[127]

10029. para. 85: In executing this legitimate mission however, at a later stage that appears in the Indictment, and instead of limiting themselves and directing these attacks on legitimate military targets and objectives where collateral damage, if any ensued at all, could be perceived as justifiable, the Accused Persons and their Kamajors, as has been elucidated in the factual and legal findings of the Judgement, went beyond these acceptable military and legal limits and carried out killings and other atrocities against unarmed civilians who they characterised and designated as 'rebel collaborators'. We find that these atrocities were perpetrated, even though the evidence clearly established, and we so found, that the victims in fact, were disarrayed Sierra Leoneans including children fleeing for their lives and for safety from the bloody exchange of enemy fire, and further, that these civilian captives or fugitives, were unarmed and were not in the least, participating in hostilities. In fact, we note here that the crimes for which they have been found guilty were perpetrated by the Accused Persons and CDF/Kamajor fighters when combat activities and operations against the enemy AFRC forces were already over.

10030. para. 86: However, although the commission of these crimes transcends acceptable limits, albeit in defending a cause that is palpably just and defendable, such as acting in defence of constitutionality by engaging in a struggle or a fight that was geared towards the restoration of the ousted democratically elected Government of President Kabbah, it certainly, in such circumstances, constitutes a mitigating circumstance in favour of the two Accused Persons.

10031. para. 87: It should be recognised however, that the crimes for which the Chamber has convicted them are grave and very serious, but what, in a sense, atones for this vice is the fact that the CDF/Kamajor fighting forces of the Accused Persons, backed and legitimised by the Internationally deployed force, the ECOMOG, defeated and prevailed over the rebellion of the AFRC that ousted the legitimate Government. This achievement, the Chamber notes, contributed immensely to re-establishing the rule of law in this Country where criminality, anarchy and lawlessness, which the United Nations sought to end and was determined to achieve in adopting Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000),[128] had become the order of the day.

10032. para. 88: We recall here in this regard, that the Learned Lead Counsel for the Defence Team of Allieu Kondewa, Mr Charles Margai, himself a well-informed citizen of this Country, in his submission at the Sentencing Hearing on the 19th of September 2007, re-echoed these sentiments of appreciation for the positive contribution of the Kamajors in ending the rebellion and for facilitating the restoration of democracy, peace and security in this Country.

10033. para. 89: Mr. Margai, in a plea for a lenient sentence for his client Kondewa, and also for Moinina Fofana, had this to say:

> We thank God, My Lords, that the war is over, but this war was described and has been described as the most brutal known to mankind. We should not lose sight of that. If it were not for the sacrifice of the CDF, God knows whether some of us, including my learned friend Kamara, would be here today. That, I submit, My Lord, is a factor to be considered, because, otherwise, if a sentence is severe and there occurs a rebel war, whether in Sierra Leone or elsewhere, government militias are going to ask themselves the question: Is it advisable for us to intervene. If we do, might we not be treated in the same manner as Allieu Kondewa and others.[129]

10034. para. 90: He also stated:

> I believe that what is contained in our brief is comprehensive enough, coupled with the authorities which have been cited, to assist Your Lordships in arriving at a fair, just sentencing that will address future occurrences of a similar nature in a positive light. [....] Considering that he has spent over four years in detention, I believe that a sentence of three years will not be unreasonable. If he had not spent four years, I'm sure Seven years would be appropriate. But having spent four years, I believe three years would be appropriate, at least for the Court not to be seen to act in vain.[130]

10035. para. 91: In this context, the contribution of the two Accused Persons to the establishment of the much desired and awaited peace in Sierra Leone and the difficult, risky, selfless and for a very sizeable number of their CDF/Kamajors, the supreme sacrifices that they made to achieve this through a bloody conflict, is in itself a factor that stands significantly in mitigation in their favour. In fact, the medal awarded to Moinina Fofana after the restoration by the reinstated President Kabbah, is a testimony of gratitude and appreciation of Sierra Leonean society, which the President incarnates.[131]

(xv) Motive of Civic Duty

> Firstly, the CDF was established with the sole aim of protecting the civilian population and restoring the democratically elected Government. These were, similarly, Moinina Fofana's sole reasons and motivating factors in joining the CDF movement.[132]

10037. para. 93: Kondewa, for his part, vowed never to give up any territory under his control to any military government, bur only to the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah.[133] In his allocutus to the Judges during the sentencing hearing, Allieu Kondewa, addressing the Judges directly in his native Mende language after Learned Counsel Margai had addressed the Court on his behalf, had this to say:

> As we were fighting, we fought so that civilians would be secured and democracy would be restored and the staff be given back to President Tejan Kabbah. We all fought for that [...][134]

10038. para. 94: The Chamber is of the opinion that there is nothing in the evidence which demonstrates that either Fofana or Kondewa joined the conflict in Sierra Leone for selfish reasons. In fact, we have found that both Fofana and Kondewa were among those who stepped forward in the efforts to restore democracy to Sierra Leone, and, for the main part, they acted from a sense of civic duty rather than for personal aggrandisement or gain. This factor in addition to others that have been raised in this Judgement has, for each of them, significantly impacted to influence the reduction of the sentence to be imposed for each count.

(f) Conclusion

10039. para. 95: It is our view that a manifestly repressive sentence, rather than providing the deterrent objective which it is meant to achieve, will be counterproductive to the Sierra Leonean society in that it will neither be consonant with nor will it be in the overall interests and ultimate aims and objectives of justice, peace, and reconciliation that this Court is mandated by UN Security Council Resolution 1315,[135] to achieve. The motivation of the Accused in this case, where they fought to reinstate democracy, and the prevailing circumstances in which their crimes were committed, has therefore been taken into consideration by the Chamber in arriving at an appropriate sentence.

10040. para. 96: We again observe, however, that the crimes for which the Accused were tried and convicted remain very serious crimes, and both Fofana and Kondewa will bear the stigma of a conviction after we have pronounced their sentences. The Chamber hopes that this Judgement will send a message to future pro-democracy armed forces or militia groups that notwithstanding the justness or propriety of their cause, they must observe the laws of war in pursuing or defending legitimate causes, and that they must not recruit or use children as agents or instruments of war. It will, in addition, remind them of their obligation to protect civilians who are unarmed and not participating in hostilities, and whose aspiration is only to protection, regardless of their perceived affiliation.

10041. para. 97: The Chamber notes that both the Prosecution and the Fofana Defence recommended that a global sentence be imposed, rather than a separate sentence for each crime.[136]

It further notes that while the Kondewa Defence submitted that separate sentences should be imposed, it recommended a single sentence.[137] While the Chamber recognizes that it has the discretion to impose a global sentence,[138] it has chosen to impose separate sentences for each of the crimes for which Fofana and Kondewa have been convicted because it is our view that this better reflects the culpability of the Accused for each offence for which they were convicted, given that distinct crimes were committed by each Accused in discrete geographical areas.[139]

(g) Disposition

10042. FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, THE CHAMBER:

SENTENCES Moinina Fofana to the following:

For Count 2 - Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF SIX YEARS;

For Count 4 - Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular cruel treatment, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF SIX YEARS;

For Count 5 - Pillage, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF THREE YEARS;

For Count 7 - Collective Punishments, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FOUR YEARS;

ORDERS that these sentences shall run and be served concurrently.

SENTENCES Allieu Kondewa to the following:

For Count 2 - Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF EIGHT YEARS;

For Count 4 - Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular cruel treatment, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF EIGHT YEARS;

For Count 5 - Pillage, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF FIVE YEARS;

For Count 7 - Collective Punishments, a Violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF SIX YEARS;

For Count 8 - Enlisting children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups and/or using them to participate actively in hostilities, an other serious violation of international humanitarian law, a TERM OF IMPRISONMENT OF SEVEN YEARS;

ORDERS that these sentences shall run and be served concurrently;

ORDERS that for both Fofana and Kondewa, the sentences shall run from the date each was taken into custody; and, in this regard,

ORDERS that Moinina Fofana shall serve a TOTAL TERM OF IMPRISONMENT of SIX YEARS, and that this takes effect from the 29th of May 2003, when he was arrested and taken into the custody of the Special Court; and further, ORDERS that Allieu Kondewa (also known as Allieu Musa) shall serve a total TOTAL TERM OF IMPRISONMENT of EIGHT YEARS and and that this takes effect from the 29th of May, 2003, when he was arrested and taken into the custody of the Special Court.

10043. Hon. Justice Bankole Thompson appends a Dissenting Opinion to this Judgement, in which he has indicated that he makes no pronouncement as to the sentence and reaffirms that the defence of Necessity is valid in the peculiar circumstances of this case. The said Opinion is attached to this Judgement as Annex A.

(h) Disposition - Dissenting Opinion Of Hon. Justice Bankole Thompson From Sentencing Judgement Filed Pursuant To Article 18 Of The Statute

10044. Justice Thompson-Dissent, para. 6: I have had the benefit of reading and digesting the Sentencing Judgement in this case, for which opportunity I am immensely grateful to my learned and distinguished colleagues. I commend them for it.

10045. Justice Thompson-Dissent, para. 7: I most respectfully dissent from the said Judgement predicated upon the firm judicial positions taken in my separate Concurring and Partially Dissenting Opinion (Annex C thereto) delivered on the 2nd day of August 2007, and based specifically on the analyses, considerations, and reasons advanced in Parts Eight and Nine of the said Opinion and consistent with the Disposition made in Part Ten therein, acquitting the Accused on all Counts of the Indictment.

(i) Disposition

10046. I, accordingly, make no pronouncement as to sentences.

2. Appellate Judgment

The Prosecutor v. Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, SCSL-04-14-A, Judgment, 28 May 2008

(a) Standard of Review on Appeals Relating to Sentence

10047. para. 465: The relevant provisions on sentencing are Article 19 of the Statute and Rules 99 to 105 of the Rules. Both Article 19 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules contain provisions for sentencing. According to the provision of Article 19, a Trial Chamber must take into account the gravity of the offence[897] and the individual circumstances of the convicted person. [898] The Statute also provides that in determining the term of imprisonment the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone, as appropriate. According to Rule 101 of the Rules, aggravating and mitigating circumstances shall, inter alia, be taken into account. [899] Rule 101(c) of the Rules provides that the Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

10048. para. 466: Appeals against sentence, as appeals from a judgement of a Trial Chamber, are appeals stricto sensu. They are not trials de novo.[900] Trial Chambers are vested with broad discretion in determining an appropriate sentence due to their obligation to individualise the penalties to fit the circumstances of the accused and the gravity of the crime.[901] The Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings relevant to sentencing by the Trial Chamber.[902] As a general rule, the Appeals Chamber will not revise a sentence unless the Appellant demonstrates that the Trial Chamber has committed a "discernible error" in exercising its discretion or has failed to follow the applicable law.[903]

10049. para. 467: In the AFRC Appeal Judgment, the Appeals Chamber explained that to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion:

> The Appellant has to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber gave weight to extraneous or irrelevant considerations, failed to give weight or sufficient weight to relevant considerations, made a clear error as to the facts upon which it exercised its discretion, or that the Trial Chamber's decision was so unreasonable or plainly unjust that the Appeals Chamber is able to infer that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly.[904]

(b) Prosecution's Tenth Ground of Appeal: Sentencing

(i) Alleged Refusal to Consider Sentencing Practices of the National Courts of Sierra Leone

10050. para. 468: Article 19(1) of the Statute states: "the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.[905]

10051. para. 469: The Trial Chamber held that it would not give consideration to the sentencing practice in Sierra Leone because Fofana and Kondewa had not been convicted of any crime under Sierra Leone law and because the sentencing practice of Sierra Leone for the convictions in this case would indicate either sentence of death or life imprisonment.[906]

a. Discussion

10052. para. 475: The Appeals Chamber notes that at the time the ICTY Statute took effect, the former Yugoslavia had domestic legislation criminalizing "acts against humanity and international law."[919] Similarly, at the time the ICTR Statute took effect, Rwmda had domestic legislation criminalizing war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.[920] In contrast, Sierra Leone has not criminalized war crimes and crimes against humani1y as such, and consequently there is no specifically relevant sentencing practice for a Trial Chamber to refer to.

10054. para. 477: In the result, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err in holding that it will not consider the sentencing practice of Sierra Leone.

(ii) Alleged Error in Considering Mitigating Factors

a. Fofana's and Kondewa's Statements at the Sentencing Hearing

10055. para. 478: Under the heading "Remorse," the Trial Chamber stated the following:

> "During the Sentencing Hearing, Counsel for Fofana stated, at the specific request and on behalf of his client: '[...] Mr Fofana accepts that crimes were committed by the CDF during the conflict in Sierra Leone. Indeed, at least one witness was called on behalf of the Fofana defence, Joseph Lansana, accepting and attesting to crimes committed by the CDF. Mr Fofana [...] deeply regrets all the unnecessary suffering that has occurred in this country.[921] Although Fofana by this statement does not expressly acknowledge his personal participation in the crimes for which the Chamber has convicted him, the Chamber finds that he has clearly expressed empathy with the victims of those crimes."[922]

10056. para. 479: In support of this approach to "remorse" as a mitigating circumstance, the Trial Chamber cited the Grit Trial Judgement, noting that in that case:

> "the Chamber held that 'the Appeals Chamber bas held that an accused can express sincere regrets without admitting his participation in a crime, and that this is a factor which may be taken into account. This can be done without an accused having to give evidence or being cross-examined by the Prosecution. In this case, the Accused made no such statement, but throughout the trial, there were a few instances when Defence counsel on his behalf expressed compassion to witnesses for their loss and suffering. The Trial Chamber does not doubt the sincerity of the Accused in expressing empathy with the victims for their loss and suffering, and has taker this sincerity into consideration as a mitigating factor."[923]

10057. para. 480: In relation to Kondewa, the Trial Chamber stated:

> "During the Sentencing Hearing, Kondewa addressed the court and the public in the following terms, 'Sierra Leoneans, those of you who lost your relations within the war, I plead for mercy today, and remorse, and even for yourselves.' The Chamber finds that although Kondewa did not expressly recognise h s own participation in the crimes for which he has been found guilty, the empathy he has shown is real and sincere."[924]

b. Discussion

10058. para. 486: This sub-ground of the Prosecution appeal against sentence presents two questions: (1) must an accused acknowledge his participation in a crime for his statements to be considered real and sincere remorse; and (2) if not, did the Trial Chamber err in considering Fofana's and Kondewa's statements as genuine regret which could mitigate the sentence?

10059. para. 487: The Appeals Chamber is aware of only two cases at the ad hoc Tribunals in which the Chamber considered whether an accused's expressions of regret or empathy for victims without acknowledgement of responsibility for the crimes could constitute a mitigating factor. In Vasiljevic, the ICTY Appeals Chamber opined that an accused can express sincere regrets without admitting his participation in a crime, and that this could be a factor taken into account by the Trial Chamber.[934] However, in Vasiljevic, the Appeals Chamber declined to consider Vasiljevic´s expressions of regret to be a mitigating circumstance.[935]

10060. para. 488: The ICTY Trial Judgment in Oric is the only case in which a convicted person received credit for expressions of empathy for the victims without acknowledging responsibility.[936] In Blaskic, the accused attempted to express remorse while denying accountability and the Trial Chamber refused to take it into account because, after establishing the facts, it felt his remorse was not sincere.[937]

10061. para. 489: An accused's acknowledgement of responsibility can be a mitigating circumstance in sentencing because it makes an important contribution to establishing the truth and, thereby, an accurate and accessible historical record. Moreover, such an acknowledgement of responsibility may contribute to peace and reconciliation, may set an example for other persons to make the same moral choice, and alleviate the pain and suffering of victims.[938] Further, acknowledgement of responsibility is part of the rehabilitative purpose of smtencing,[939] and therefore an accused who acknowledges responsibility can properly be credited with a reduced sentence.[940]

10062. para. 490: The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Trial Chamber could consider genuine and sincere expressions of empathy for the victim' s suffering or regret for crimes committed, without an acknowledgement of responsibility as a mitigating circumstance. The Appeals Chamber opines that the Prosecution has not shown that the Trial Chamber erred in considering that the statements made by Fofana's counsel and Kondewa were, in fact, sincere expressions of their empathy for the victims, and as such they could be considered as mitiga1:ing circumstances. The Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err in accepting the expression of remorse in mitigation.

(iii) Fofana's and Kondewa's Lack of Training

10063. para. 491: Under the heading "Lack of Formal Education or Training," the Trial Chamber stated that it was:

> "aware that both men were propelled in a relatively short period of time, from civilian life to an effective position of authority in a very brutal and bloody conflict, with no adequate training for the roles which they were to play. The Chamber finds that it is only reasonable to take account of the fact that inexperience in difficult situations, [sic] does increase the likelihood of making the wrong decisions. Whilst this in no way reduces the gravity of the crimes which were committed, the Chamber recognises it as a factor in mitigation of sentence."[941]

10064. para. 492: At the Sentencing Hearing, counsel for Fofana stated that "Fofana may not necessarily have been young, but he certainly lacked experience and was thrown into the desperate situation and asked to act."[942]

a. Discussion

10065. para. 498: As far as mitigating circumstances are concerned, Article 19(2) of the Statute provides that the Trial Chamber should take into account the individual circumstances of the convicted persons. The Appeals Chamber considers that the level of education and training of a convicted person is part of his individual circumstances which the Trial Chlll1ber is required to take into consideration as an aggravating or mitigating circumstance.

10066. para. 499: Accepting that, as a matter of law, the surrounding conditions including the convicted person's lack of training can be a mitigating circumstance, the Appeals Chamber opines that the Prosecution has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in considering Fofana's and Kondewa's individual circumstances, namely: their inadequate relevant preparation and training for their roles in the armed conflict as a mitigating circumstance.

(iv) Conduct Subsequent to the Conflict

10067. para. 500: Under the heading "Subsequent Conduct," the Trial Chamber stated it had examined evidence submitted by Fofana regarding his conduct subsequent to the conflict.[952] In particular, the Trial Chamber noted the submission regarding "Fofana's commitment to and observance of the Lomb Peace agreement",[953] the "unchallenged evidence ... in relation to his efforts subsequent to that agreement to work without any pay with the NGO community in ensuring that members of the CDF remained committed to the peace process within Sierra Leone",[954] and "the certificate of good conduct filed by the Officer in Charge of the SCSI. Detention Facility, attesting to Fofana's exemplary behaviour whilst in custody."[955] The Trial Clamber "commended Fofana's subsequent conduct in fostering the peace process, and recognises it as a factor in mitigation of his sentence."[956]

10068. para. 501: The Trial Chamber considered as a mitigating factor "evidence filed by the Fofana Defence regarding Fofana's conduct subsequent to the time frame in which the crimes he committed occurred."[957] Specifically, the Trial Chamber considered "Fofana's commitment to and observation of the Lome Peace agreement."[958]

a. Preliminary Issue

10069. para. 504: Fofana argues that this sub-ground was not included in the Prosecution's Notice of Appeal and therefore should be disregarded.[961] Rule 108 of the Rules states in sub-paragraph (A) that "a party. . . shall. . . file with the Registrar and serve upon the other parties a written notice of appeal setting forth the grounds of appeal."[962] The requirements of "setting forth the grounds of appeal" is neither elaborated upon in the Rules nor in a practice direction.

10070. para. 505: The Prosecution's Notice of Appeal stated in relevant part, "in the Sentencing Judgment, the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact, and committed a procedural error (in that there has been a discernible error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's sentencing discretion), in sentencing Fofana to a total and concurrent term of imprisonment of six (6) years. . .."[963] The Prosecution elaborated that "in particular, the Trial Chamber erred in treating as mitigating circumstances matters which it was wholly improper to regard as such. and/or by giving weight to extraneous and irrelevant considerations that it considered as mitigating circumstances. These include its determination that the Respondents might have acted out of a sense of allegiance to a democratically elected government, rather than out of self-interest; treating as expressions of remorse statements of the Respondents which did not express any remorse at all; and lack of formal education."[964]

10071. para. 506: The Prosecution did not state that it would appeal consideration of Fofana's and Kondewa's post-conflict conduct as a mitigating factor. The Appeals Chamber will, therefore, decline to enter into the merits of this aspect of the Prosecution's submission.

(v) Lack of Previous Convictions

10072. para. 507: The Trial Chamber noted that neither Fofana nor Kondewa had any previous convictions, and summarily stated that "for purposes of sentencing, a clean slate in terms of their criminal records, sic can be considered as a mitigating circumstance."[965]

a. Discussion

10073. para. 511: Good character with no previous convictions cm be considered as a mitigating factor.[973] However, in certain circumstances even when prior good conduct is found, it may be given little weight in light of the gravity of the criminal conduct. Each case has to be determined in the light of its own circumstances.

10074. para. 512: The Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber did not err in taking a lack of previous convictions into consideration.

(vi) CDF's Alleged "Just Cause" and Fofana's and Kondewa's Motive of Civic Duty

10075. para. 513. The Trial Chamber found, Justice Thompson dissenting, that there is no defence of "necessity" in international law, and that "necessity" cannot be taken into account as a mitigating factor in sentencing.[974] It was of the opinion that "validating the defence of Necessity in International Criminal Law would create a justification for what offenders may term and plead as a 'just cause' or a 'just war' even though serious violation of International Humanitarian Law would have been committed."[975] It considered that this would "negate the resolve and determination of the International Community to combat" the "heinous, gruesome or degrading" crimes against innocent victims which international humanitarian law intends to protect.[976]

10076. para. 514: Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber took into account as mitigating factors that Kondewa and Fofana and the "CDF/Kamajors" were fighting "to support a legitimate cause which ... was to restore the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah", [977] that the Kamajors "were comrades in arms with the regular Sierra Leone Armed Forces as early as from the outbreak of the rebel war," that the crimes were committed "in defending a cause that is palpably just and defendable",[979] that Kondewa's and Fofana's "CDF/Kamajor fighting forces ... , backed and legitimised by ... ECOMOG, defeated and prevailed over the rebellion of the AFRC that ousted the legitimate Government",[980] and that this "contributed immensely to re-establishing the rule of law" in Sierra Leone.[981] The Trial Chamber concluded that "the contribution of the two Accused Persons to the establishment of the much desired and awaited peace in Sierra Leone and the difficult, risky, selfless and for a very sizeable number of their CDF/Kamajors, the supreme sacrifices that they made to achieve this through a bloody conflict, is in itself a factor that stands significantly in mitigation in their favour."[982]

10077. para. 515: In regard to the motive of civic duty, the Trial Chamber held that:

> "there is nothing in the evidence which demonstrates that either Fofana or Kondewa joined the conflict in Sierra Leone for selfish reasons. In fact, we have found that both Fofana and Kondewa were among those who stepped forward in the efforts to restore democracy to Sierra Leone, and, for the main part, they acted from a sense of civic duty rather than for personal aggrandisement or gain. This factor in addition to others that have been raised in this Judgement has, for each of them, significantly impacted to influence the reduction of the sentence to be imposed for each count."[983]

a. Discussion

10078. para. 521: The Trial Chamber held that "although the commission of these crimes transcends acceptable limits, albeit in defending a cause that is palpably just and defendable, such as acting in defence of constitutionality by engaging in a struggle or a fight that was geared towards the restoration of the ousted democratically elected Government of President Kabbah, it certainly, in such circumstances, constitutes a mitigating circumstance in favour of the two Accused Persons."[999]

10079. para. 522: The Appeals Chamber considers that examination of motive for the purposes of sentencing presents significant problems. As one commentator has noted, inquiry into motive opens the door to speculation about the general moral worth of the convicted person, a task for which courts are ill-equipped.[1000] Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber is of opinion that evaluation of the motivation, background., and character of the convicted person is part of any system that aims to make punishment proportional to blameworthiness.

10080. para. 523: The Appeals Chamber is of the view that consideration of motive for the purposes of sentence is not to regard motive as a defence. Although motive may shade the individual perception of culpability, it does not amount to a legal excuse for criminal conduct. Therefore, any consideration here of Fofana's and Kondewa's 'just cause" as a motive for the purposes of sentencing should not be considered as a defence against criminal liability for their conduct.

10081. para. 524: As a general principle, the Appeals Chamber opines that a convicted person's motives can be considered for sentencing purposes.[1001] Other international criminal tribunals have recognized motives as aggravating factors, such as enjoyment of criminal acts,[1002] sadism and desire for revenge,[1003] group hatred or bias,[1004] and a desire to cause terror.[1003] There may be several other motives that may be considered to be aggravating circumstances, such as a desire for pecuniary gain, a desire to inflict pain or harm, and a desire to avoid detection or escape punishment.

10082. para. 525: Fofana and Kondewa have also argued that motive should be considered as a mitigating factor. The Appeals Chamber has not been directed to any case at an international criminal tribunal in which such an argument has been accepted on the merits. In Simba, the ICTR Trial Chamber, in the context of mitigating circumstances, examined evidence that may have "implied that his participation in the massacres resulted from misguided notions of patriotism and government allegiance rather than extremism or ethnic hatred;" however, the Trial Chamber did not indicate whether it gave that evidence any weight.[1006] For all factors considered, the Trial Chamber concluded that "limited mitigation was warranted."[1007] On appeal, the ICTR Appeals Chamber suggested this passage "was merely speculation on the part of the Trial Chamber and did not reflect a finding that this motive was itself a separate mitigating factor" but did not state whether it would have considered it an error if the Trial Chamber had treated political motive as a mitigating factor.[1008]

10083. para. 526: In the Media Case, the ICTR Appeals Chamber noted that a defendant argued on appeal that he should receive a mitigated sentence because his actions were performed within a legitimate, democratic and pacific context.[1009] The ICTR Appeals Chamber ambiguously dismissed the argument on grounds that it was not convinced that the facts argued by the appellant constituted mitigating circumstances or that these facts had played a significant role in the determination of the sentence, and specifically suggested that it dismissed the appellant's democratic motive because he made no reference to any part of the case-file to sustain 1he arguments .[1010]

10084. para. 527: In Kordic and Cerkez, the ICTY Appeals Chamber rejected Kordic's argument that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to consider "that his primary motivation was to assist his community" as a mitigating circumstance.[1011] However, rather than stating that the factor was irrelevant or impermissible as a matter of law, the Appeals Chamber ruled that Kordic had "not demonstrated that his motivation to become engaged in politics ... warranted mitigation in the light of the seriousness of the offences of which the Trial Chamber found him guilty."[1012] Similarly, the Prosecution there apparently argued that Kordic's political motivation was "insignificant when considered against the extreme gravity of the offences of which he was charged."[1013]

10085. para. 528: In the view of the Appeals Chamber, as a general principle, a convicted person's motive can be considered as a mitigating factor.

10086. para. 529: The Appeals Chamber turns to the question of whether the particular motive of ''just cause" may be considered as a mitigating factor.

10087. para. 530: International humanitarian law specifically removes a party's political motive and the "justness" of a party's cause from consideration. The basic distinction and historical separation between jus ad bellum and jus in bello underlies the desire of States to see that the protections afforded by jus in bello (i.e., international humanitarian law) are "fully applied in all circumstances to all persons who are protected by those instruments, without any adverse distinction based on the nature or origin of the armed conflict or on the causes espoused by or attributed to the Parties to the conflicts."[1014] The political motivations of a combatant do not alter the demands on that combatant to ensure their conduct complies with the law.

10088. para. 531: Any trial chamber considering punishment must weigh its obligations to the individual accused in light of its responsibility to ensure that it is upholding the purposes and principles of international criminal law. Consideration of political motive by a court applying international humanitarian law not only contravenes, but would undermine a bedrock principle of that law.

10089. para. 532: Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that any motive taken into consideration as a mitigating factor must be consistent with sentencing purposes. The following have been recognized by the ICTY as legitimate sentencing purposes: (i) individual and general deterrence concerning the accused and, in particular, commanders in similar situations in the future;[1015] (ii) individual and general affirmative prevention aimed at influencing the legal awareness of the accused, the victims, their relatives, the witnesses, and the general public in order to reassure them that the legal system is being implemented and enforced; (iii) retribution;[1016] (iv) public reprobation and stigmatisation by the international community;[l017] and (v) rehabilitation.[1018] The primary objectives must be retribution and deterrence.[1019]

10090. para. 533: The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that a convicted person's motivation of "just cause" contravenes the sentencing purpose of affirmative prevention:

> "The sentencing purpose of affirmative prevention appears to be particularly important in an international criminal tribunal, not the least because of the comparatively short history of international adjudication of serious violations of international humanitarian and human rights law. The unfortunate legacy of wars shows that until today many perpetrators believe that violations of binding international norms can be lawfully committed, because they are fighting for a 'just cause'. Those people have to understand that international law is applicable to everybody, in particular during times of war. Thus, the sentences rendered by the International Tribunal have to demonstrate the fallacy of the old Roman principle of inter arma silent leges (amid the arms of war the laws are silent) in relation to the crimes under the International Tribunal's jurisdiction."[1020]

10091. para. 534: The Appeals Chamber concurs with this view, Justice King dissenting. Allowing mitigation for a convicted person's political motives, even where they are considered by the Chamber to be meritorious, undermines the purposes of sentencing rather than promotes them. In effect, it provides implicit legitimacy to conduct that unequivocally violates the law-the precise conduct this Special Court was established to punish.[1021]

10092. para. 535: The Appeals Chamber, Justice King dissenting, upholds the Prosecution's submission on this respect of the Prosecution's Tenth Ground of Appeal.

(vii) The Purpose of Reconciliation

10093. para. 536: In the conclusion to the Sentencing Judgment, the Trial Chamber found that:

> "a manifestly repressive sentence, rather than providing the deterrent objective which it is meant to achieve, will be counterproductive to the Sierra Leonean society in that it will neither be consonant with nor will it be in the overall interests and ultimate aims and objectives of justice, peace, and reconciliation that this Court is mandated by UN Security Council Resolution 1315, to achieve. The motivation of the Accused in this case, where they fought to reinstate democracy, and the prevailing circumstances in which their crimes were committed, has therefore been taken into consideration by the Chamber in arriving at an appropriate sentence."[1022]

a. Preliminary Issue

10094. para. 541: The Prosecution did not state that it in its Notice of Appeal that it would challenge the Trial Chamber's appeal consideration of Fofana's and Kondewa's post-conflict conduct as a mitigating factor. The Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, will, therefore, decline to enter into the merits of this aspect of the Parties' submission.

(viii) Alleged Error in Considering the Sentences Would run Concurrently Without Adequate Consideration

10095. para. 542: The Trial Chamber stated that despite its discretion to impose global sentences, it chose to impose separate sentences for each of the crimes for which Fofana and Kondewa were convicted because it "better reflected their culpability ... for each offence for which they were convicted, given that distinct crimes were committed by each accused in discrete geographical areas."[1040] Without reasoning, the Trial Chamber then ordered that "the sentences shall run and be served concurrently."[1041]

a. Discussion

10096. para. 546: Rule 101(c) of the Rules states "the Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently." The discretion conferred upon the Trial Chamber to choose between consecutive and concurrent sentences is not unchecked, because the Trial Chamber ultimately must impose a sentence that reflects the totality of the convicted person's culpable conduct. The totality principle is, in fact, recognized by all Parties and firmly supported in the case law of the international criminal tribunals. The totality principle requires that a sentence must reflect the inherent gravity of the totality of the criminal conduct of the accused, giving due consideration to the particular circumstances of the case and to the form and degree of the participation of the accused.[1050]

10097. para. 547: The following examination of several legal traditions demonstrates that Trial Chambers typically enjoy broad discretion to choose between concurrent and consecutive sentences. However, as at the other tribunals, this discretion is restricted by the requirement that the sentence reflect the gravity of the crime and the culpability of the convicted person.

10098. para. 548: In Australia, courts have generally held that it is "impracticable and undesirable to attempt to lay down comprehensive principles according to which a sentencing judge may determine, in every case, whether sentences should be ordered to be served concurrently or consecutively."[1051] Australian courts have recognized that "the practice of imposing either concurrent or consecutive sentences cannot avoid creating anomalies, or apparent anomalies, from time to time. What must be done is to use the various tools of analysis to mould a just sentence for the conduct of which the prisoner has been guilty."[1052] Generally, courts consider that consecutive sentences are appropriate when there are "truly two or more incursions into criminal conduct."[1053] However, where, "whatever the number of technically identifiable offences committed, the prisoner was truly engaged upon one multi-faceted course of criminal conduct, the judge is likely to find concurrent sentences just and convenient."[1054]

10099. para. 549: In the United Kingdom (England and Wales), courts consider the "sentencer is entitled in his discretion to follow the course of imposing concurrent sentences, provided that the gravity of the criminal conduct ... is properly reflected in the principal sentence."[1055]

10100. para. 550: Likewise, in Canada, courts give the sentencing judge discretion to set the duration and type of sentence due to his or her first-hand knowledge of the case.[1056] The decision to impose concurrent or consecutive sentences is accorded the "same deference as the length of sentences ordered"[1057] and a reviewing court defers to the decision to impose consecutive or concurrent sentences so long as the "global sentence" (e.g., the ultimate sentence) "does not offend the totality principle"[1058] or the "transaction concept."[1059] The transaction concept is similar to the Australian notion that consecutive sentences are appropriate where there are two or more incursions into criminal conduct, and at least one Canadian court has found error when a sentencing judge issued consecutive sentences for crimes that were "part of the same transaction" (e.g., part of the same event).[1060]

10101. para. 551: In the United States, a federal statute gives courts discretion to impose consecutive or concurrent sentences when "multiple terms of imprisonment are imposed on a defendant at the same time, or if a term of imprisonment is imposed on a defendant who is already subject to an undischarged term of imprisonment."[1061] The same statute mandates that the "court, in determining the particular sentence to be imposed, shall consider ... the need for the sentence imposed ... to reflect the seriousness of the offence, to promote respect for the law, and to provide just punishment for the offences ...."[1062]

10102. para. 552: The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not give reasons for its preference for concurrent sentences. However, the relevant question for the Appeals Chamber is not whether the choice of concurrent or consecutive sentences itself represented an error, but whether that choice resulted in sentences that fail to reflect the totality of Fofana's and Kondewa's criminal culpability. Accordingly, the merits of this sub-ground will be considered in the Prosecution's subground alleging that the "manifest inadequacy of the sentence" demonstrates that it is "so unreasonable or plainly unjust" that the Trial Chamber must have erred.[1063]

(ix) Manifest Inadequacy of the Sentence

10103. para. 553: In view of the findings that the Trial Chamber bas taken into consideration factors which it should not have considered in the exercise of its sentencing discretion, the Appeals Chamber will substitute its own discretion without the need to pronounce on the Prosecution's complaint that the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

(x) Conclusions on Sentencing

10104. para. 554: The Appeals Chamber recalls the standard of review of sentencing decisions that have earlier been set out in this Judgement. Relying on those standards, the Appeals chamber notes that it has decided that the Trial Chamber was in error in taking into consideration "just cause" and motive of civic duty in exercising its sentencing discretion.

10105. para. 555: A careful perusal of the sentencing judgement shows clearly that those considerations formed the most important factors that influenced the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion. Indeed, the Trial Chamber stated that the fact that Fofana and Kondewa "stepped forward in the efforts to restore democracy to Sierra Leone, and, for the main part, they acted from a sense of civic duty ... significantly impacted the influence to the reduction of the sentences to be imposed for each count."[1064] In the circumstances, the Appeals Chamber comes to the conclusion that the Trial Chamber proceeded on an erroneous basis and that it is entitled to revise the sentences handed down by the Trial Chamber.

10107. para. 557: The Appeals Chamber gratefully adopts these findings, while having regard to such instances in which the Appeals Chamber has set aside the convictions of Kondewa. To put the exercise of its discretion in proper perspective, and for ease of reference, the Appeals Chamber deems it fit to quote, albeit at some length, some of the significant findings of the Trial Chamber that the Appeals Chamber cannot ignore.

10108. para. 558:. Such findings are as follows:

> 46. With respect to the crimes for which Fofana was found liable under Article 6(3), the Chamber has examined the gravity of the crime; committed by subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, as described in the Judgement, were of a very serious nature, and were committed against innocent civilians. The Chamber considers actions such as the mutilation and the targeted killing of Limba civilians and the killing and mutilation of Chief Kafala (whom the CDF/Kamajors considered a collaborator) in Koribondo, to be indicative of the brutality of the offences committed by Fofana's subordinates. The Chamber also notes the gruesome murder of two women in Koribondo who had sticks inserted and forced into their genitals until they came out of their mouths. The women were then disembowelled, and while their guts were used as checkpoints, parts of their entrails were eaten.
>
> 47. The Chamber also finds that many of the offences for which Fofana was convicted under Article 6(1) were committed on a large scale and with a significant degree of brutality. In particular, the Chamber notes the murder of 150 Loko, Limba and Temne tribe members in Talama, the killings of 20 me1 on the 15th of January 1998 at the NDMC Headquarters in Tongo, who were hacked to death with machetes, and the killing of 64 civilians in Kamboma, who were placed in two separate lines and killed, after which their corpses were rolled into a swamp,1065 as indicative of the scale and brutality of the crimes that Fofana was found to have aided and abetted in the Tongo Field area. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that the crimes were particularly serious insofar as they were committed against unarmed and innocent civilians, solely on the basis that they were unjustifiably perceived and branded as rebel collaborators.
> 48. The Chamber notes that many of the victims of these crimes were young children and women, and therefore belong to a particularly vulnerable sector of society. For instance, we note our findings of the hacking to death by the CDF/Kamajors of a boy named Sule at a checkpoint in the Tongo area, the murder of a 12 year old boy in Talama, the murder of an unidentified woman who was alleged to have cooked for the rebels in Bo, and the atrocious murder of the two women in Koribundo as described earlier.

49. The Chamber considers these crimes t01ave had a significant physical and psychological impact on the victims of such crime s, on the relatives of the victims, and on those in the broader community. The testimony of witnesses heard by the Chamber during the trial, and appended to the Prosecution Brief in Annex D, indicates the impact which events such as amputations and the loss of family members have had on the lives of victims and witnesses. As appropriately described and summarized by our sister Trial Chamber II, victims who had their limbs hacked c ff not only endured extreme pain and suffering, if they survived, but lost their mobility and capacity to earn a living or even to undertake simple daily tasks. They have been rendered dependent on others for the rest of their lives. In particular, the Chamber notes the lasing effect of these crimes on victims such as TF2-015, who was the only survivor of an attack on 65 civilians who were hacked to death by machetes or shot, and who WLS himself hacked with a machete and rolled into a swamp on top of the dead bodies in the: belief that he was dead.

50. With respect to the form and degree of Fofana's participation, the Chamber notes that he was found liable for the crimes in Tongo Field as an aider and abettor under Article 6(1) of the Statute. The jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR indicates that aiding and abetting as a mode of liability generally warrants a lesser sentence than that to be imposed for more direct forms of participation. The Chamber also notes that while Fofana was found liable for aiding and abetting, he was not present at the scenes of the crimes and that the degree of his participation amounted only to encouragement.

51. With respect to the crimes for which Fofana. was convicted under Article 6(3), the Chamber has considered the gravity of Fofana's conduct in failing to prevent the crimes. It finds that the gravity of the offence committed by Fofana given his leadership role as a superior who failed to prevent his subordinates from committing crimes, is greater than that of the actual perpetrators of the crimes. In this case, the fact that Fofana's failure to prevent was ongoing, rather than an isolated occurrence, had the implicit effect of encouraging his subordinates to believe that they could commit further crimes with impunity. This factor therefore, in our opinion, inc "eases the seriousness of the crimes for which he has been convicted.

53. With respect to the crimes for which Kondewa was found liable under Article 6(3), the Chamber has examined the gravity of the crimes committed by the subordinates under his effective control. Many of these crimes, as described in the Judgement, were of a serious nature. The Chamber notes, in particular, that the CDF/Kamajors in Bonthe stripped Lahia Ndokoi Koroma naked and tied him, a particularly humiliating and degrading act. With respect to Kondewa's liabilit:1 under Article 6(1), he was convicted for the same crimes as Fofana in the Tongo area; the scale and the barbaric nature of such crimes has been described above.

54. As is the case with Fofana, the Chamber notes that many of the victims of these crimes were young children and women, and were therefore particularly vulnerable. It notes, in particular, the two incidents involving children in the Tongo area described above with respect to Fofana, and the killing of a boy called Bendeh Battiama by Rambo Conteh in Bonthe.

58. Furthermore, with respect to his liability under Article 6(3), the Chamber finds, as it did with Fofana, that given his leadership role as a superior who failed to prevent his subordinates from committing crimes, the gravity of the offence committed by Kondewa is greater than that of the actual perpetrators of the ;rimes. The Chamber finds that in this case, the fact that Kondewa's failure to prevent was ongoing, rather than an isolated occurrence, had the implicit effect of encouraging his subordinates to believe that they could commit further crimes with impunity, and therefore increases the seriousness of the crimes for which he has been convicted.

60. The Chamber considers that, given his roe as a former Chiefdom Speaker, a community elder and the CDF National Director of War, Fofana breached a position of trust in committing the offences for which he has been convicted."

62. The Chamber finds that given the cultural context, Kondewa, in his role as High Priest who blessed the CDF/Kamajors before they \Vent to battle, and as someone widely respected for his mystical powers and abilities to immunize people against harm, held a unique and prominent position in the community. The Chamber therefore finds that he also breached a position of trust in committing the (rimes for which he was convicted.

85. In executing this legitimate mission however, at a later stage that appears in the Indictment, and instead of limiting themselves and directing these attacks on legitimate military targets and objectives where collateral damage, if any ensued at all, could be perceived as justifiable, the Accused Persons and their Kamajors, as has been elucidated in the factual and legal findings of the Judgement, went beyond these acceptable military and legal limits and carried out killings and other atrocities against unarmed civilians who they characterised and designated as 'rebel collaborators'. We find that these atrocities were perpetrated, even though the evidence clearly established, and we so found, that the victims in fact, were disarrayed Sierra Leoneans including children fleeing for their lives and for safety from the bloody exchange of enemy fire, and further, that these civilian captives or fugitives, were unarmed and were not :n the least, participating in hostilities. In fact, we note here that the crimes for which they have been found guilty were perpetrated by the Accused Persons and CDF/Kamajor fighters when combat activities and operations against the enemy AFRC forces were already over."

10109. para. 559: Notwithstanding these findings and the significant finding that the accused persons and their subordinates went beyond "acceptable military and legal limits" the Trial Chamber, importing a consideration of "just cause" and "civic duty" into the exercise of its discretion concluded that their sentences deserved to be reduced.

10110. para. 560: The Appeals Chamber has already decided that these were inappropriate considerations and will now review the sentences, taking into consideration the gravity of the offences as found and described by the Trial Chamber and taking note of legitimate mitigating circumstances which the Trial Chamber has taken note of and the fact that in the case of Kondewa, the Appeals Chamber, Justice Winter dissenting, had not found any allegation of "committing" established against him.

10111. para. 561: In exercising its sentencing discretion, the Appeals Chamber re-emphasizes that it is an international court with responsibility to protect and promote the norms and values of the international community, expressed not only as part of customary international law but also, in several international instruments.

10112. para. 562: Shortly after the Special Court was established, the Appeals Chamber had occasion to pronounce on its character and decided, without hesitation, that it is an international court. In the Decision of Constitutionality and Lack of Jurisdiction, [1066] the Appeals Chamber stated that the Special Court "is an international tribunal exercising its jurisdiction in an entirely international sphere and not within the system of the national courts of Sierra Leone ..."[1067] The Appeals Chamber came to the same conclusion in the Decision all Immunity from Jurisdiction. [1068]

10113. para. 563: The Appeals Chamber here emphasizes that the crimes of which the accused have been convicted are international crimes and not political crimes, in which consideration of national interest may be a relevant issue. What has to be paramount are international interests in protecting humanity. Such offences as Fofana and Kondewa have been convicted of are of the nature of such "offences that do not affect the interests of one State alone, but shock the conscience of mankind."[1069] They are not political offences. The Appeals Chamber gratefully adopts the opinion of the Supreme Military Tribunal of Italy quoted in Tadic (Jurisdiction) as follows:

> Crimes against the laws and customs of war cannot be considered political offences, as they do not harm a political interest of a particular State, nor a political right of a particular citizen. They are, instead, crimes of lese-humanite (reatu di lesa umanita) and, as previously demonstrated, the norms prohibiting them have a universal character, not simply a territorial one. Such crimes, therefore, due to their very subject matter and particular nature are precisely of a different and opposite kind from political offences. The latter generally, concern only the States against whom they are committed; the former concern all civilised States, and are to be opposed and punished, in the same way as the crimes of piracy, trade of women and minors, and enslavement are to be opposed and punished, wherever they may have been committed ... "[1070]

10114. para. 564: What should be one of the paramount considerations in the sentencing of an accused person convicted of crimes against humanity and war crimes is the revulsion of mankind, represented by the international community, to the crime and not the tolerance by a local community of the crime; or lack of public revulsion in relation to the crimes of such community; or local sentiments about the persons who have been found guilty of the crimes. In describing what it described as the "Justice Phase" of the armed conflict that took place in Sierra Leone, the Appeals Chamber stated this in "Decision on Immunity from Jurisdiction": The Justice Phase is that phase in which participants in the armed conflict have to answer for crimes committed in the course of the armed conflict. The Justice Phase itself involves separating what is in the exclusive domain of the municipal authority to be resolved under municipal law from what is in the concurrent jurisdiction of that authority and of the international community to be resolved by application purely of international law."[1071] The Appeals Chamber had earlier stated in that Decision that: "The parties, whether from the Government side or the insurgents, were ... subjected to the obligations imposed by international law in a situation of internal armed conlicts."[1072]

10115. para. 565: In assessing the appropriate sentence, the obligation of the Appeals Chamber is, therefore, to impose sentences that reflect the revulsion of the international community to such crimes as those for which the accused persons have been convicted, after taking into consideration all factors that may be considered, legitimately, in mitigation as well as in aggravation.

10116. para. 566: In revising the sentences, the Appeals Chamber, Justice King and Justice Kamanda dissenting" takes into consideration those factors tha1 the Majority of the Trial Chamber have, legitimately, taken into consideration. It also takes note of the opinion of the Majority of the Trial Chamber that Fofana and Kondewa have been found responsible mainly as aiders and abettors and the gravity of their respective responsibility as superior: in respect of some of the crimes.

10117. para. 565: Having taken all the circumstances of the case into consideration, the Appeals Chamber, Justice King and Justice Kamanda dissenting, revises the sentences on Fofana and Kondewa in respect of Counts 2, 4, and 5 and imposes sentences on Fofana and Kondewa on Counts 1 and 3 as follows:

i. In respect of Moinina Fofana the sentences of six (6) years imposed by the Trial Chamber on each of Counts 2 and 4 are increased to fifteen (15) years imprisonment on each of those Counts, and the sentence of three (3) years imposed on Count 5 is increased to five 5 years imprisonment;

ii. In respect of Allieu Kondewa, the sentences of eight (8) years imposed by the Trial Chamber on each of Counts 2 and 4 are increased to twenty (20) years imprisonment on each of those Counts, and the sentence of five (5) years imposed on Count 5 is increased to seven (7) years imprisonment;

iii. In respect of Counts 1 and 3, the Appeals Chamber, Justice King and Justice Kamanda dissenting, imposes sentences of 15 years imprisonment on Fofana on each of those Counts and sentences of 20 years imprisonment on Kondewa on each of those Counts;

10118. The Appeals Chamber orders that the sentences imposed on Fofana, and Kondewa respectively, shall run concurrently;

(c) Disposition

CONSEQUENTLY REVISES, Justice King and Justice Kamanda dissenting, the sentences in respect of Counts 2, 4, and 5 as follows:

In respect of Moinina Fofana the sentences of six (6) years imposed by the Trial Chamber on each of Counts 2 and 4 are increased to fifteen (15) years imprisonment on each of those Counts, and the sentence of three (3) years imprisonment on Count 5 is increased to five (5) years imprisonment;

In respect of Allieu Kondewa, the sentences of eight (8) years imposed by the Trial Chamber on each of Counts 2 and 4 are increased to twenty (20) years imprisonment on each of those Counts, and the sentence of five (5) years imposed on Count 5 is increased to seven (7) years imprisonment;

(d) Dissenting Opinion of Justice King from Sentencing Judgment

10119. para. 98: It is my misfortune to have to dissent, once again, from my learned colleagues. With respect, I believe that they went outside the ambit of the relevant statutory provisions relating to Penalties and Sentencing and, in my opinion, interfered, unjustifiably, with the unfettered discretion to the Trial Chamber.

10120. para. 106: The Appeals Chamber states that "the Trial Chamber was in error in taking into consideration 'just cause' and motive of civic duty in exercising its sentencing discretion."[1189] I disagree. It states further that the Trial Chamber proceeded on an erroneous basis and that it is entitled to revise the sentences handed down by the Trial Chamber.[1190] I disagree.

10121. para. 107: With the greatest respect to my learned colleagues, at no time did the Trial Chamber take into consideration 'just cause' in the way my colleagues put it, in exercising its sentencing discretion. This is palpably and factually incorrect. What in fact, the Trial Chamber took into account as a mitigating factor is the plea that:

> "[t]he acts of the Accused and those of the Kamajors for which they have respectively been found guilty, did not emanate from a resolve to destabilise the established Constitutional Order. Rather, and on the contrary, the CDF/Kamajors was a fighting force that was mobilised and was implicated in the conflict in Sierra Leone to support a legitimate cause which, as we have already seen, was to secure the democratically elected Government of President Kabbah, which had been illegally ousted through a Coup d'Etat orchestrated and carried out on the 25th of May 1997, by a wing of the Sierra Leone Armed Forces that later constituted and baptised itself as the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC)."[1191]

10122. para. 108: In the above quote, there is no mention of 'just cause' which only appears when the Trial Chamber was commenting on the defence of 'Necessity' which had been propounded by Justice Bankole Thompson in his Dissenting Opinion. This is what the Trial Chamber said:

> "The Chamber further opines that validating the defence of Necessity in International Criminal Law would create a justification for what offenders may term and plead as a 'just cause' or a 'just war' even though serious violations of International Humanitarian Law would have been committed. This we observe, would negate the resolve and determination of the International Community to combat these crimes which have the common characteristics of being heinous, gruesome or degrading of innocent victims or of the civilian population that it intends to protect."[1192]

10123. para. 109: At the trial, the Accused did not put forward a defence of necessity – it was raised by Justice Thompson in his Dissenting Opinion. In any event, it is my considered opinion that it was wrong for the majority of the Trial Chamber to purport to sit, as if it were an Appeals Chamber, in judgement of Justice Thompson's Opinion as to Necessity as a defence. That right and privilege belong exclusively to the Appeals Chamber. All the Judges of the Trial Chamber are of coeval jurisdiction and they are, therefore, not competent to pass judgement on each other's opinion.

10124. para. 110: At the trial, the Accused did not put forward a defence of necessity – it was raised by Justice Thompson in his Dissenting Opinion. In any event, it is my considered opinion that it was wrong for the majority of the Trial Chamber to purport to sit, as if it were an Appeals Chamber, in judgement of Justice Thompson's Opinion as to Necessity as a defence. That right and privilege belong exclusively to the Appeals Chamber. All the Judges of the Trial Chamber are of coeval jurisdiction and they are, therefore, not competent to pass judgement on each other's opinion.

10125. para. 111: In paragraph 98 supra, I referred to Article 19(1) and 19(2) of the Statute. The Trial Chamber, in determining the terms of imprisonment shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR and national courts of Sierra Leone. It should take into account, not only the gravity of the offence, but also, the individual circumstances of the convicted person. Emphasis added.

10126. para. 112: Significantly, unlike Article 20(3) of the Statute, which provides that Appeals Chamber shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY and the ICTR, there is no requirement in Article 19(1) that the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in ICTY.

10127. para. 113: It follows, therefore, that in exercising its sentencing discretion the Trial Chamber shall have recourse, not to ICTY, but to ICTR and Sierra Leone national courts, where appropriate and consider, inter alia, the individual circumstances of the Accused.

10128. para. 114: Having considered the individual circumstances of the Accused[1195] such as: remorse, lack of formal education or training, subsequent conduct, lack of prior convictions and historical background, the Trial Chamber found as follows:

> (i) "There is nothing in the evidence which demonstrates that either Fofana or Kondewa joined the conflict in Sierra Leone for selfish reasons. In fact, we have found that both Fofana and Kondewa were among those who stepped forward in the efforts to restore democracy to Sierra Leone and for the main part, they acted from a sense of civic duty, rather than for personal aggrandisement or gain. This factor in addition to others that have been raised in this Judgment has for each of them, significantly impacted to influence the reduction of the sentence to be imposed for each count."[1196]
> (ii) "The acts of the Accused and those of the CDF/Kamajors for which they have respectively been found guilty did not emanate from a resolve to distabilise the established Constitutional Order."[1197]
>
> (iii) "These historically traditional hunters, from the evidence adduced, were comrades in arms with the regular Sierra Leone Armed Forces as early as from the outbreak of the rebel war. They acted as guides to the regular Army and facilitated the war against the rebels. Indeed, even the military regime of the NPRC that seised power in a military Coup in 1992, used them to fight against the rebels, and to protect the Constitutional Institutions of Sierra Leone. In this process and in defence of their communities, the local chiefs mobilised, enlisted and initiated their young and fit ones, into the Kamajor Society with the sole objective of combating the rebels and preventing the brutal killings of their kith and kin, and other atrocities, in addition to protecting their land and their properties."[1198]
> (iv) "It should be recognized however, that the crimes for which the Chamber has convicted them are grave and very serious, but what, in a sense atones for this vice is the fact that the CDF/Kamajors fighting forces of the Accused persons, backed and legitimized by the internationally deployed force, the ECOMOG, defeated and prevailed over the rebellion of the AFRC that ousted the legitimate Government. This achievement, the Chamber notes, contributed immensely to re-establishing the rule of law in this Country where criminality, anarchy and > lawlessness, which the United Nations sought to end and was determined to achieve in adopting Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000), had become the order of the day."[1199]

10129. para. 115: I opine that from the passages quoted, a reasonable person will inevitably come to the conclusion that the Trial Chamber meticulously, exhaustively, comprehensively, justly and even-handedly 'took into account', not only the gravity of the offence, but 'the individual circumstances' of the convicted person.[1200]

10130. para. 116: The Trial Chamber correctly applied the provisions of Article 19 of the Statute. This is why it is impossible for me to agree with my learned colleagues when they say: "in view of the findings that the Trial Chamber has taken into consideration factors which it should not have considered in the exercise of its sentencing discretion, the Appeals Chamber will substitute its own discretion without the need to pronounce on the Prosecution's complaint that the sentence was manifestly inadequate."[1201]

10131. para. 117: With respect, I do not agree that the Trial Chamber did any such thing. On the contrary, having regard to the provisions of Article 19(1) of the Statute, it is my learned colleagues who, contrary to those provisions, went on to conduct "examination of several legal traditions"[1202] in Australia, United Kingdom and Canada. In effect, what my learned colleagues have done is, with respect, to usurp the discretionary powers of the Trial Chamber, when the Appeals Chamber says it will substitute its own discretion for that of the Trial Chamber's.

10132. para. 118: It follows from all I have said that I find the Prosecution's Ground of Appeal against sentence untenable and I dismiss it.

10133. I accordingly disagree with the Decision of the majority to increase the terms of imprisonment of Fofana and Kondewa.

(e) Partially Dissenting Opinion of Justice Winter

(i) Whether Reconciliation Can Be Considered In Sentencing

10134. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 90: I agree with aspects of the Majority decision on sentencing and therefore I only address here those parts with which I disagree. As a preliminary matter, I note that the Majority declined to consider the Trial Chamber's patently erroneous treatment of reconciliation as a mitigating factor because it was not properly noticed by the Prosecution. Conversely, the Majority, in another context, endeavoured to correct a legal error in the interests of justice when it was not even mentioned by the Parties, namely concerning the findings of Fofana's and Kondewa's guilt for collective punishments.[1339]

10135. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 91: I agree with the Majority, in principle, that reconciliation can be a mitigating circumstance. Indeed, the concepts of reconciliation, justice and peace are inextricably linked in post-conflict societies, and the case is no different in Sierra Leone. The Security Council recognized this when it stated:

> "Recognizing that, in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace,
> ... 1. Requests the Secretary-General to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court consistent with this resolution, ... "[1340]

10136. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 92: However, some basic conditions connecting the purpose of reconciliation to the perpetrator of the crime must be met in order to make it possible that members of the same society can live again together in peace:

> (i) The perpetrator must admit guilt or at least acknowledge responsibility for what he/she has done.
>
> (ii) The perpetrator must submit excuses for what he/she has done (to the individual victims if possible, in general if not).
> (iii) The perpetrator must be prepared to assist in the reconciliation or peace process of the given community.

10137. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 93: Fofana submits that the Trial Chamber rightly concluded that "a manifestly repressive sentence ... would not be in the overall interests and ultimate aims and objectives of justice, peace and reconciliation, as mandated by the [sic] UN Security Council Resolution 1315."[1341]

10138. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 94: The necessity of credible justice for reconciliation and peace has been the raison d'etre of this Special Court since its conception.[1342] The belief of the victims that justice in whatever form (e.g., retributive, restorative, etc.) has been done or will be done is of paramount importance to the credibility of justice. This forms the foundation for the social trust upon which reconciliation can be built.

10139. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 95: It is axiomatic that justice cannot be done unless it is seen to be done. In my view, it is unchallengeable that justice will not be seen to be done, and therefore will not be credible, if the sentence imposed is so lenient that victims cannot accept or even understand it.

10140. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 96: Kondewa submits that "purpose of reconciliation has however started to gain prominence in international criminal law"[1343] and argues, therefore, that the Trial Chamber correctly held that "a repressive sentence against him would be counter-productive."[1344] He further argues that the calls for justice by victims as well as the call of the international community to end impunity would not have been answered by a harsh sentence.[1345]

10141. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 97: I consider, first, that a sentence which adequately reflects the harm caused to victims is not "harsh" and will not be perceived as such. A sentence that adequately reflects the harm caused to victims is a just sentence. Second, an extremely lenient sentence fails to demonstrate to putative subsequent criminals that impunity will end. This principle of affirmative prevention cannot be outweighed by any purpose of reconciliation.[1346]

10142. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 98: Turning to the requisite conditions for considering reconciliation as a mitigating factor for Fofana and Kondewa, I do not find them satisfied in this case.

10143. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 99: I cannot see any remorse in the statement that Fofana made through his defence lawyers, (not even personally by himself):

> "Mr Fofana accepts that crimes were committed by the CDF during the conflict in Sierra Leone. Indeed, at least one witness was called on behalf of the Fofana defence, Joseph Lansana, accepting and attesting to crimes committed by the CDF. Mr Fofana deeply regrets all the unnecessary suffering that has occurred in this country."[1347]

10144. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 100: Fofana's counsel did not express remorse (i.e., acknowledgement of personal responsibility) or even regret for the suffering of the victims. Rather, he expressed global regret for the situation in Sierra Leone, without connecting this situation to himself in any way.

10145. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 101: Kondewa's statements are equally lacking. Kondewa simply said, "Sierra Leoneans, those of you who lost your relations within the war, I plead for mercy today, and remorse, and even for yourselves."[1348] His address to "Sierra Leoneans" writ large can in no way be understood as meaning that he felt remorse. To the contrary, Kondewa. had the audacity to ask Sierra Leoneans to have remorse and even if the translation has to account for this wording, nothing indicates any personal remorse.

10146. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 102: Neither Fofana nor Kondewa has ever acknowledged their own responsibility. In fact, the record on appeal demonstrates to me that they only claim their criminal culpability could not be proved, not that it did not exist. I am unaware of any instance in which Fofana or Kondewa claimed they did not commit a crime.

10147. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 103: In my view, empathy with victims as has been accepted as mitigation by the Majority can only be accepted as real and sincere regret in limited circumstances.[1349] These circumstances are indicated in the facts of the Oric case cited by the Trial Chamber and relied upon by Fofana and Kondewa. Critically, in that case, Oric expressed empathy several times before he was found guilty.[1350] The two convicted persons here only found it worth mentioning that they felt empathy – if they even did that – after they were convicted. From this, it is clear to me that their statements were not expressions of remorse or empathy, but rather were simply calculated to achieve a reduced sentence. I therefore hold that the statements of the two convicted were neither real nor sincere.

10148. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 104: Moreover, nothing in the statements of the two convicted persons pointed to any excuse for their criminal conduct or the harm they caused. In my view, the absence of this accounting, demonstrates that little weight, if any, could be given to their statements. The weight given to real and sincere expressions of empathy or remorse is evaluated case by case. When a rather cursory, indirect statement is made, it certainly does not show the required state of mind of a convicted person that he/she is prepared to contribute to reconciliation within his/her community, which would merit a mitigated sentence.

10149. Justice Winter-Dissent, para. 105: Under certain circumstances, a convicted person's post-conflict conduct, such as assisting in restoring peace, in addition to showing remorse, can be considered in mitigation.[1351] The fact that Fofana demonstrated "commitment to and observance of the Lome Peace agreement, and ... worked without any pay with the NGO community in ensuring that members of the CDF remained committed to the peace process within Sierra Leone"[1352] indicates that he tried to assist in the reconciliation process of his country. I therefore come to the conclusion that mitigating circumstances, albeit to a very limited amount, can be credited to Fofana. Not having found anything similar in this regard concerning Kondewa, I hold that reconciliation cannot be a reason to reduce: his sentence.

(f) Partially Dissenting Opinion On Sentencing of Justice Kamanda

10150. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 1: I have in this Judgment concurred with the majority view of my distinguished colleagues in the main Judgment in this case. I have, nonetheless, disagreed with the majority on the question of SENTENCE. I have, in consequence, had recourse to writing a partially dissenting opinion. Briefly stated, my position is that the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber are fair and adequate because it is my view that the said Chamber considered all the relevant parameters in arriving at fair and just sentences, all the circumstances considered. Except in those areas where I have joined my learned colleagues to overturn the verdicts pronounced by the Trial Chamber, I have left the sentences undisturbed.

10151. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 2: The two Accused, Moinina Fofana and Alieu Kondewa were each charged on 8 Counts of offences pursuant to crimes that could broadly be categorised under three heads, that is:

(a) Crimes against Humanity (Counts I and 3)

(b) War Crimes (Counts 2, 4,5,6 and 7)

(c) Other Serious Violations Of International Humanitarian Law (Count 8)

10152. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 3: The Accused were charged pursuant to Article 6(l) and/or 6(3) of the Statute for the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

10153. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 4: Article 6(1) of the Statute provides:

> "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for he crime."

10154. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 5: Article (6)(3) provides:

> "The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 and 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done do and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts of to punish the perpetrators thereof.."

10155. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 6: I have quoted these Articles in extenso to show that the Accused were not charged as persons who themselves committed these acts directly. Criminal responsibility was thrust upon these two men by the operation of the Statute. I have mentioned the import of these assumed criminality because it is my considered view that this factor must be viewed from the perspective that these lowly-placed men could be clothed with the garment of major players in a very confused warfare where fighters were more often than not on frolic of their own. Since the law holds them culpable in any case, it is my strong view that that same law should in an even-handed manner operate also as a mitigating factor on the accused men's behalf.

10156. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 7: The Trial Chamber found Fofana guilty on Courts 2, 4, 5, 7 with respective prison terms of 6 years, 6 years, 3 years and 4 years passed on him, to run concurrently. This in effect gave Fofana a maximum prison term of 6 years, inclusive of the time he had spent in the custody of the Special Court He was found not guilty on Counts 1, 3, 6 and 8.

10157. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 8: Kondewa was found guilty on Counts 2, 4, 5, 7, 8 with respective prison terms of 8, 8, 5, 6 and 7 years passed on him, to run concurrently. His maximum prison term was 8 years.

10158. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para.9: Kondewa appealed his conviction. Fofana did not. The Prosecution, among other grounds, appealed against the Counts on which the Accused were acquitted.

10159. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 10: At the completion of the hearing, the Appeals Chamber, by a majority, overturned the not guilty verdict on the two Accused on Counts 1 and 3, entered a conviction on both Counts and imposed sentences in excess of the highest imposed on any Count by the Trial Chamber. The rest of the convictions passed by the Trial Chamber were confirmed and sentences revised upwards.

10160. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 11: Having taken all the circumstances of the case into consideration, I pass the following sentences:

10161. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 12: With respect to Fofana's convictions on Counts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5: I pass sentences of 6, 6, 5, 6 and 3 years respectively, the terms to run concurrently. Maximum term to be served being 6 years.

10162. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 13: With respect to Kondewa's convictions on Counts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5: I hereby pass sentences of 8, 8, 5, 8, 5 years, the terms to run concurrently. Maximum term to be served being 8 years.

10164. Justice Kamanda-Dissent, para. 15: I have had the benefit of reading the Partially Dissenting Opinion on Sentencing by my Learned and Distinguished Colleague, The Honourable Justice Gelaga King, and I most respectfully adopt it as part of this Opinion.

ANNEX A – OFFENCES AGAINST UNAMSIL PERSONNEL

Prosecutor v. Sesay, Morris Kallon and Augustine Gbao, Indictment, SCSL - 2004-15-PT

(RUF)

Offenses against UNAMSIL Personnel were charged only in one case (RUF), and thus fail to meet the commonality criteria for inclusion in the main body of the Compilation. However, because of the importance of these crimes in the jurisprudence of the SCSL, Annex A recites the charges as they appear in the Indictment and provides an annotated guide to the paragraphs and pages of the RUF Appellate, Trial, and Sentencing Judgments where those charges were adjudicated. Annex A also provides an online link for access directly to each of the Judgments and is meant to be a roadmap for navigating references to offenses against UNAMSIL personnel where they appear in each Judgement.

1. RUF Amended Consolidated Indictment

Prosecutor v. Sesay, Morris Kallon and Augustine Gbao, Indictment, SCSL - 2004-15-PT, Indictment, 13 May 2004

COUNTS 15 - 18: ATTACKS ON UNAMSIL PERSONNEL

10165. Between about 15 April 2000 and about 15 September 2000, AFRC/RUF engaged in widespread attacks against UNAMSIL peacekeepers and humanitarian assistance workers within the Republic of Sierra Leone, including, but not limited to locations within Bombali, Kailahun, Kambia, Port Loko, and Kono Districts. These attacks included unlawful killing of UNAMSIL peacekeepers, and abducting hundreds of peacekeepers and humanitarian assistance workers who were then held hostage.

By their acts or omissions in relation to these events, ISSA HASSAN SESAY, MORRIS KALLON and AUGUSTINE GBAO, pursuant to Article 6.1. and, or alternatively, Article 6.3. of the Statute, are individually criminally responsible for the crimes alleged below:

Count 15: Intentionally directing attacks against personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or peacekeeping mission, an OTHER SERIOUS VIOLATION OF INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN LAW, punishable under Article 4.b. of the Statute;

In addition, or in the alternative:

Count 16: For the unlawful killings, Murder, a CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY, punishable under Article 2.a. of the Statute;

In addition, or in the alternative:

Count 17: Violence to life, health and physical or mental well-being of persons, in particular murder, a VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS AND OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, punishable under Article 3.a. of the Statute;

In addition, or in the alternative:

Count 18: For the abductions and holding as hostage, taking of hostages, a VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 COMMON TO THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS AND OF ADDITIONAL PROTOCOL II, punishable under Article 3.c. of the Statute.

ANNEX B – EVALUATION OF EVIDENCE

Annex B is a summary of the Special Court's approach to the principles and application of evidence as digested and abridged from the Taylor appeal judgment. Although the wording of the judgment has not been altered, Annex B extracts from that judgment, where possible, principles that are not case specific, and omits the facts in dispute unless they are intrinsic to the understanding of the section. For citation purposes, the actual judgment and footnotes should be consulted at: Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, SCSL-03-01-A, Judgment, 26 September 2013 ('Charles Taylor Appeal Judgment')

HEADINGS

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

10629. para. 68: A Trial Chamber undertakes two principal mandatory functions regarding evidence: to determine whether or not to admit it, and, if admitted, to evaluate it.[146]

10630. para. 69: The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court contain, in Section 3, the rules of evidence that govern the proceedings before the Chamber. Specifically, Rule 89(A) provides that "[t]he rules of evidence set forth in this Section shall govern the proceedings before the Chambers. The Chambers shall not be bound by national rules of evidence." However, Rule 89(B) also provides that: "In cases not otherwise provided for in this Section, a Chamber shall apply rules of evidence which best favour a fair determination of the matters before it and are consonant with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law."

10631. para. 70: Rule 89(C) sets out an overarching rule of admission of evidence when it provides that: "A Chamber may admit any relevant evidence."[147] It is evident that Rule 89 is in consonance with the recognition that flexibility in admitting and evaluating evidence in trials for violations of international criminal law is justified by the sui generis nature of these trials.[148]

1. Corroboration

(a) Discussion

10632. para. 73: The Appeals Chamber considers it apt to note at the threshold that technical rules prescribing what constitutes corroboration, and rules requiring technical corroboration for certain classes of witnesses in order to establish their credibility, are an anachronism, abandoned by most domestic jurisdictions[156] and renounced by this and other international tribunals.[157]

10633. para. 74: The maxim "one witness is no witness"[158] has no place in the prosecution of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Since the post-Second World War cases, such as the Werner Rohde Case, it has been recognised that "common-law rules as to the necessity of corroborating accomplices amount only to a caution and not to a command."[159] In the General Tomoyuki Yamashita Case, the Commission reversed a ruling in which it had previously been unwilling to consider affidavits without corroboration by witnesses on any item in the Bills of Particulars,[160] and affirmed its prerogative of receiving and considering affidavits or depositions, if it chose to do so, "for whatever probative value the Commission believes they may have, without regard to the presentation of some partially corroborative oral testimony."[161]

10634. para. 75: The Appeals Chamber recalls that corroboration of witnesses and evidence is not a legal requirement in international criminal law.[162] In the Tadić Appeal Judgment, the ICTY Appeals Chamber decided that a conviction may be based on the testimony of a single witness on a material fact without the need for corroboration.[163] In that case, the evidentiary record was minimal: the appellant's conviction for two murders was based solely on the testimony of one witness,[164] and the reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's finding turned only on the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility and reliability of that single witness.[165] The Appeals Chamber affirmed the Trial Chamber's finding, holding that "[t]he task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left to the Judges sitting in a Trial Chamber."[166] Similarly, the accused in Furundžija was convicted based on the evidence of only two witnesses, who largely provided separate testimony regarding separate events.[167]

10636. para. 77: There is likewise no technical definition of the word ―corroboration in the jurisprudence of the Special Court.[171] The SCSL Trial Chambers and the Appeals Chamber have consistently relied on the plain meaning of "corroboration" as "evidentiary support."[172] There are no rules specifying the form or substance that such support must take.[173] The Appeals Chamber agrees with the opinion of the ICTR Appeals Chamber that "corroboration is simply one of many potential factors in the Trial Chamber's assessment of a witness's credibility."[174] It also agrees with the opinion held in several cases that a Trial Chamber "has the discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony."[175]

(b) Conclusion

10637. para. 78: The Appeals Chamber holds that corroboration of witnesses and evidence is not a mandatory legal requirement in international criminal law or in the jurisprudence of the Special Court. Corroboration is only one of many factors which the Trial Chamber rightly considers when assessing the credibility of witnesses and the reliability and weight to be accorded to evidence. The Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber correctly relied on the plain meaning of the term "corroboration," and that there was no need for it to provide a definition of the word "corroboration" or regard it as a technical concept.

2. Uncorroborated Hearsay Evidence

(a) Discussion

10638. para. 81: The Defence contends that "it is legally impermissible to base a particular conviction only on uncorroborated hearsay."[178] For this submission it relies on the ICTY Appeals Chamber Prlić et al. Decision Relating to Admitting Transcript, quoting a passage in the decision wherein that Appeals Chamber stated:

> A different matter is, of course, what weight a trier of fact is allowed to give to evidence not subjected to the testing of cross-examination. It is in this matter that the jurisprudence of the ECHR is valuable, as it has authoritatively stated the principle that 'all evidence must normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There are exceptions to this principle, but they must not infringe the rights of the defence.' Unacceptable infringements of the rights of the defence, in this sense, occur when a conviction is based solely, or in a decisive manner, on the deposition of a witness whom the accused has no opportunity to examine or have examined either during the investigations or at trial.[179]

10639. para. 82: The Appeals Chamber does not accept that as a general principle of law applicable to international criminal proceedings, uncorroborated hearsay evidence can never be the sole or decisive basis for a conviction.[181]

10640. para. 83: The Appeals Chamber notes that the discussion in the Prlić et al. Decision, "concerned 'depositions' elicited by a judicial officer or lawyer, under oath, and recorded by stenographers."[182] It is worth noting that Rule 92*quater* of the Rules provides as follows:

> (A) The evidence of a person in the form of a written statement or transcript who has subsequently died, or who can no longer with reasonable diligence be traced, or who is by reason of bodily or mental condition unable to testify orally may be admitted, whether or not the written statement is in the form prescribed by Rule 92bis, if the Trial Chamber:
> (i) is satisfied of the person's unavailability as set out above; and
>
> (ii) finds from the circumstances in which the statement was made and recorded that it is reliable.
> (B) If the evidence goes to proof of acts and conduct of an accused as charged in the indictment, this may be a factor against the admission of such evidence, or that part of it.

10641. para. 84: The Prlić et al. Decision related to such a written statement. The Prlić et al. Decision expressly and solely relied on rulings of the European Court of Human Rights.[183] The Appeals Chamber notes that ECtHR decisions have been recognised by international criminal tribunals as a source of guidance regarding fair trial rights.[184] Their decisions regarding hearsay evidence can be of particular guidance to the Appeals Chamber because the European Convention contains identical language to the fair trial provisions of Article 17(4)(e) of the Statute for the protection of the right of an accused to examine witnesses against him.[185] The findings challenged in this case, however, are not based on written statements made for the purpose or in anticipation of proceedings (now usually referred to in some decisions as "testimonial hearsay");[186] or the circumstances in which the Prlić et al. Decision arose, which concern what may be described as the right of "confrontation".[187]

10642. para. 85: The Appeals Chamber considers that the issue in this case in regard to hearsay evidence turns on whether reliance on uncorroborated hearsay evidence as the sole or decisive basis for incriminating findings of fact leading to a conviction amounted to an error in law. It is, therefore, in this context relevant and instructive to note that the ECtHR in the case of Al Khawaja and Tahery, decided on 15 December 2011, considered and expressly rejected a similar view. In Al Khawaja and Tahery, the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR held that reliance on an uncorroborated hearsay statement as the sole or decisive basis for a conviction is not precluded as a matter of law and does not per se violate the accused's right to a fair trial.[189]

10643. para. 86: The opinion of the ECtHR in Al Khawaja and Tahery applying Article 6 of the European Convention was that there is no technical rule of law requiring "corroboration" or any other specific type of verification for hearsay evidence, but that the trier of fact must undertake a "fair and proper assessment of the reliability of [hearsay] evidence," and only where "such evidence is sufficiently reliable given its importance in the case" may that evidence be the basis for a conviction.[190] This is in consonance with the intent of Rule 89(B) and (C) of the Rules of the Special Court which the Appeals Chamber is bound to follow. In accordance with the Statute and Rules, the Trial Chamber admitted the evidence proffered before it, notwithstanding that it may have been hearsay or uncorroborated hearsay, as long as such evidence was relevant. Evidence does not become irrelevant because it is hearsay. It is instructive that only Rule 95 of the Rules expressly excludes the admission of evidence when it provides that: "No evidence shall be admitted if its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute."

Court safeguards designed to ensure the accused's rights of fair hearing and to ensure that evidence can be fairly challenged at trial.[192]

10645. para. 89: It is fitting to note that while written statements that could be a substitute for trial testimony may be subject to formal legal framework and safeguards, the abiding and lasting safeguard that what may be called "non-testimonial" hearsay evidence has is at the point of assessment of its reliability. It is at that point that a careful appellate review of the Trial Chamber's evaluation becomes imperative in the interest of justice and fair hearing. Several factors would go into the review of such evaluation. It is in that process that pronouncement is made on the test of reliability, by inquiry into whether or not the Trial Chamber tested the reliability of hearsay evidence, using corroboration as a factor.[195]

10646. para. 90: The Appeals Chamber having considered the submissions of the Parties, its jurisprudence and its Statute and Rules regarding the use of hearsay evidence, and noting the counterbalancing protection of the rights of the accused,[196] finds no merit in the argument that it is "legally impermissible" to base a particular conviction only on uncorroborated hearsay evidence. It is important, however, that a trier of fact should carefully evaluate the reliability of such evidence and bear in mind the safeguards designed to ensure fairness.[197]

(b) Conclusion

10647. para. 91: Given the safeguards provided by the Statute and the Rules of the Special Court, as interpreted in the jurisprudence of the Court, there is no prohibition against the use of uncorroborated hearsay evidence, even if such hearsay is the basis of the conviction, provided that the Trial Chamber has subjected the hearsay evidence to a fair and proper assessment of its reliability.[198]

3. Adjudicated Facts

(a) Discussion

10648. para. 108: Rule 94(B) provides:

> At the request of a party or of its own motion, a Chamber, after hearing the parties, may decide to take judicial notice of adjudicated facts or documentary evidence from other proceedings of the Special Court relating to the matter at issue in the current proceedings.[227]

10649. para. 109: The legal effect of taking "judicial notice" of adjudicated facts pursuant to Rule 94(B) is that it creates a rebuttable presumption in favour of the accuracy of those facts. Unlike facts of common knowledge admitted under Rule 94(A), the accuracy of facts admitted under Rule 94(B) may be challenged.[228]

10650. para. 110: It is commonly accepted that adjudicated facts are creations of international tribunals introduced through their Rules to increase efficiency and assist in factual harmonisation. Often they do neither. The amount of time consumed in their submission, evaluation and review can be substantially greater than the time necessary to introduce testimonial or documentary evidence and subject it to cross-examination and scrutiny. Likewise, harmonisation of facts is not always desirable. Investigations and issues change, depending on the focus of successive cases, and new facts that were either unavailable or irrelevant in previous trials come to light. A risk in the application of Rule 94(B) is that the understanding of facts, which should be evolving in the interest of justice, can instead be calcified in the interest of harmony.

10651. para. 113: The Trial Chambers of the Special Court have interpreted adjudicated facts introduced under Rule 94(B) as evidence, to be weighed with all of the evidence at the time of deliberation.[234] As stated by Trial Chamber I: "In its final deliberations, the Trial Chamber is judicially obligated to assess the weight of any adjudicated facts that are judicially noticed in light of all the evidence presented in the case."[235] The extent to which contrary evidence, regardless of when it is received, undermines the adjudicated fact with its rebuttable presumption of accuracy is a matter to be determined by the trier of fact when viewing it in the context of the evidence as a whole, and evaluated after all of the evidence has been received.[236] It is this position which is set out in the jurisprudence of the Special Court.

10652. para. 114: On appeal, the Defence, citing an ICTY Trial Chamber ruling,[237] now urges this Chamber to find error in this Trial Chamber's adherence to the practice of the Special Court. The Defence now argues that an adjudicated fact is not in itself evidence that can be weighed against evidence of facts contrary to it. Rather "contrary evidence is to be understood as a step to reopen the evidentiary debate on the fact the Chamber took judicial notice of."[238]

10653. para. 115: The difference between the two approaches is clear. According to the approach now argued on appeal, the adjudicated fact cannot be weighed against conflicting evidence at the conclusion of the case, but disappears entirely once the Trial Chamber considers that conflicting evidence has been introduced. At this point, the trier of fact must make a judicial decision regarding the reliability of the adjudicated fact based solely on the evidence for and against it. This will necessarily require notice to the proponent of the fact and the opportunity to present evidence in support of the factual accuracy of the proposition contained in the challenged adjudicated fact. Accordingly, on that approach the adjudicated fact, once challenged, has no evidential value whatsoever.

weighed against the evidence as a whole during deliberations. Under this approach, there is no point at which the Trial Chamber could advise that the fact had been successfully challenged because it can only make that determination, if at all, when it deliberates on the evidence in its entirety.

(b) Conclusion

10655. para. 118: The Appeals Chamber holds that once admitted by the Trial Chamber, an adjudicated fact, with its attending presumption of accuracy, is a piece of evidence that can be considered and weighed by the Trial Chamber, along with all the other evidence as well as the presumption of innocence, during the deliberation process.

B. ASSESSMENT OF CREDIBILITY

1. Enhanced Assessment of the Credibility of Challenged Witnesses

(a) Discussion

10656. para. 122: The credibility of witnesses is within the Trial Chamber's discretion,[252] and the credibility and reliability of the evidence is a matter for the Trial Chamber to assess in view of the circumstances of the case.[253] This is because the "Trial Chamber has the advantage of observing witnesses in person and so is better positioned than the Appeals Chamber to assess the reliability and credibility of the evidence."[254] The Appeals Chamber in Brima et al. held that a Trial Chamber must look at the totality of the evidence on record in evaluating the credibility of a witness, and that a party who alleges on appeal that a Trial Chamber has made a finding as to the credibility of a witness without considering the totality of the evidence on record must show clearly that such error occurred.[255]

10657. para. 123: The Trial Chamber explained in detail in its Judgment its approach to assessing credibility.[256] The Trial Chamber articulated the factors it considered as to each witness, including their demeanour, conduct and character (where possible).[257] It also considered their knowledge of the facts to which they testified, their proximity to the events described, the plausibility and clarity of their testimony, their impartiality, the lapse of time between the events and the testimony, their possible involvement in the events and the risk of self-incrimination, inconsistencies in their testimony and their ability to explain such inconsistencies, any motivations to lie and their relationship with Taylor.[258]

10658. para. 124: In addition to explaining its credibility analysis for all witnesses, the Trial Chamber explained in greater detail its assessment of the credibility of 22 witnesses. The Trial Chamber stated in the Judgment that it provided greater detail for its reasoning for these witnesses because they were significant witnesses whose credibility had been challenged by the Parties.[259]

Of the 22 witnesses, the Trial Chamber found 16 witnesses "generally credible,"[263] and did not find the other six to be so.[264] The designation "generally credible" does not reflect the Trial Chamber's misgivings as to the witnesses' credibility, but rather recognises that not everything every generally credible witness said would be accepted, and not everything said by witnesses who were not found to be generally credible would be rejected.[265] The general credibility of a witness, as determined by the observation of his entire testimony, is a factor which the Trial Chamber could and did properly consider when analysing the reliability of individual aspects of the witness's testimony.

(b) Conclusion

10659. para. 125: The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's approach to its assessment of the credibility of witnesses, its application of the law, as established in this Court's jurisprudence, governing the evaluation of the credibility of witnesses to all witnesses or its selection and assessment of the 22 witnesses for whom fuller explanations of its reasoning was provided.

2. Accomplice Witnesses

(a) Discussion

10660. para. 129: The Appeals Chamber considers that, as with any other witness, a Trial Chamber may convict on the basis of a single accomplice witness if the Trial Chamber finds the witness credible and his evidence reliable.[275] The Appeals Chamber further affirms that the Trial Chamber is in a far better position than the Appeals Chamber to decide whether alleged participation in the commission of crimes affects the credibility and the reliability of the witness's testimony.[276]

10661. para. 130: In keeping with the jurisprudence of the Special Court, the Trial Chamber in this case stated that in assessing the credibility of accomplice witnesses, it specifically considered whether or not the accomplice had an ulterior motive to testify as he did.[277] Its credibility assessments included discussions of witnesses' potential ulterior motives due to their prior relationship with Taylor or role in the RUF/AFRC, and the related challenges at trial.[278] The Trial Chamber found some accomplice witnesses to be generally credible and others not.[279]

10662. para. 133: The Appeals Chamber opines that accomplices are neither inherently incredible nor inherently unreliable witnesses.[285] As participants in the crimes and insiders, they may provide false testimony due to ulterior motives. They may also provide credible and reliable testimony due to their intimate knowledge of the crimes.[286] A determination must be made on a witness-by-witness basis.

(b) Conclusion

10663. para. 135: The Trial Chamber acknowledged the jurisprudence of this Court in assessing accomplice evidence and followed it in its Judgment, explaining how it had applied the law with care to the analyses of the credibility of individual accomplice witnesses. The Trial Chamber recognised that the majority of the witnesses were "insiders" who fit within this Court's use of the term "accomplice", and engaged in careful analysis of their credibility in conjunction with all the other evidence on the record. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the cautious approach articulated by the Trial Chamber or its application of that approach to individual accomplice witnesses, on a witness-by-witness basis.

3. Witnesses who Received Benefits

(a) Discussion

10664. para. 139: The Appeals Chamber has had occasion to hold "that [the] allocation of payment, allowances or benefits may be relevant to assess the credibility of witnesses testifying before the Court."[303] In Sesay et al., considering a challenge to the Trial Chamber's assessment of witness credibility in this regard, the Appeals Chamber held that the Trial Chamber had met its obligation to consider and evaluate the credibility of the witness, in light of the evidence of payments made by the Registry's Witness and Victim's Section (WVS) and the Prosecutor's Witness Management Unit, by explaining its approach and by giving three examples as to how it undertook its evaluation.[304]

10665. para. 140: In the present case, the Trial Chamber took into account the following:

(i) The costs of allowances necessarily and reasonably incurred by witnesses as a result of testifying before a Chamber are met by the Special Court in accordance with the "Practice Direction on Allowances for Witnesses and Expert Witnesses," issued by the Registrar on 16 July 2004.[305] No distinction is made between witnesses for the Prosecution and Defence.[306]

(ii) Records of disbursements to witnesses for both parties were fully disclosed, and disbursement forms concerning witnesses for both parties were admitted in evidence,[307] and used to cross-examine witnesses.[308]

(iii) Information regarding Special Measures taken by the prosecutor in connection with the support and assistance of witnesses according to Rule 39(ii)[309] was disclosed to the Defence, admitted in evidence,[310] and used to cross-examine Prosecution witnesses.[311]

(iv) Article 16(4) of the Statute and Rule 34 of the Rules authorize WVS to provide short and long-term protection and support, including relocation, to witnesses and victims who appear before the Special Court.[312]

(v) The Prosecution's disclosure that indemnity letters were provided to some witnesses by the Prosecution,[313] as were offers to release witnesses from prison.[314]

10666. para. 141: In assessing the credibility of witnesses who received benefits in connection with their testimony, the Trial Chamber stated that it took into account information about witness payments made both by the WVS and by the Prosecution, on a witness-by-witness basis, and considered any cross-examination of the witness in relation to those benefits.[315] It considered whether the benefit conferred upon and/or payment made to each witness went beyond that "which is reasonably required for the management of a witness."[316] In assessing whether such a payment was "reasonably required," the Trial Chamber also noted that it took into account the cost of living in West Africa and the station in life of the witness receiving the payment.[317] The Trial Chamber stated that it had also taken into consideration evidence that witnesses were promised relocation or had already been relocated at the time they gave evidence, and the effect that such promises may have had on their testimony.[318] It also considered cross-examination in relation to those issues.[319]

10667. para. 142: The Trial Chamber acknowledged the jurisprudence of the Special Court[320] and followed it in its assessment of each witness who received any form of consideration from the Court or from the Prosecutor.[321]

(b) Conclusion

10668. para. 143: From a scrutiny of the Trial Judgment it is evident that for each witness who received any benefit or promise of benefit in connection with his or her testimony, the Trial Chamber carefully and systematically considered evidence relevant to the benefit and made a careful assessment as to the effect that the receipt or promise of the benefit had on the individual witness's credibility. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the cautious approach articulated by the Trial Chamber or its application of that approach to individual witnesses, on a witness-by-witness basis.

4. General Conclusion on Credibility

Chamber's findings on issues of credibility unless it finds that no reasonable tribunal could have made the impugned finding.[323]

10670. para. 145: In this case, the Trial Chamber not only articulated a careful and cautious approach to determining the credibility of all witnesses, but carefully provided additional details in articulating the factors it took into consideration in the assessment of the credibility of witnesses who fell within the enumerated categories: (i) witnesses whose veracity was challenged during closing argument; (ii) accomplice witnesses; and (iii) witnesses who had received some form of benefit in connection with testifying before the Special Court. In singling out these three categories, the Trial Chamber did not deviate from its general credibility analysis, but articulated specifically how its general analysis applied to these witnesses whose credibility had been particularly challenged or who fell into categories presenting apparent questions of veracity. The Appeals Chamber holds that in resolving those questions, the Trial Chamber properly articulated and correctly applied the relevant factors established in the jurisprudence of the Special Court.[324]

C. ASSESSMENT OF RELIABILITY

10671. para. 146: Whereas credibility relates to the veracity of the witness generally, reliability relates to the individual facts to which the witness testifies.

1. The Reliability of Hearsay Evidence

(a) Discussion

10672. para. 149: Hearsay is an out of court statement used for the truth of the matter asserted. The Special Court's jurisprudence recognises that hearsay evidence may be used by the Trial Chamber in reaching its conclusions on the guilt of the accused.[331] In this regard, the jurisprudence of the Special Court is consistent with the practice of the post-Second World War courts,[332] and the other ad hoc tribunals.[333] It is equally well established that care needs to be taken when relying upon hearsay evidence.[334] Establishing the reliability of hearsay evidence is of paramount importance because hearsay evidence is admissible as substantive evidence in order to prove the truth of its contents.[335] Caution in the reliance on hearsay evidence, however, does not imply a formulaic application of set rules, but rather a holistic analysis of the reliability of the out of court statement, the factors for which will differ according to the evidence and the context.[336]

10673. para. 150: The Trial Chamber comprehensively set out its approach to the evaluation of hearsay evidence, acknowledging in its Judgment that in addition to evidence of facts within a witness's own knowledge, it had also considered hearsay evidence,[337] which it noted it had broad discretion to do.[338] It stated that before determining whether or not to rely on hearsay evidence, it examined such evidence with caution, as the weight to be afforded to such evidence will usually be less than that accorded to the evidence of a witness who has given the evidence under oath or solemn declaration and who has been tested in cross-examination.[339] In so doing, the Trial Chamber took into account whether or not the hearsay evidence was voluntary, truthful, and trustworthy, and considered both its context and the circumstances under which it arose.[340]

10674. para. 151: In addition, the Trial Chamber explained the factors that it took into account in assessing the reliability of the hearsay evidence, including whether it was first-hand or removed,[341] whether it emanated from identified or unidentified/anonymous sources,[342] the opportunity to cross-examine the person who made the statement,[343] whether the hearsay statement was corroborated,344 the potential for errors of perception and the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness surrounding the statement.[345] The Trial Chamber noted that when assessing the evidence, it considered any motivation to lie as well as the declarant's relationship with Taylor.[346]

(b) Conclusion

10675. para. 152: In conclusion, the Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber properly considered the law and practice of the Special Court, cautioned itself and carefully articulated the factors it considered in assessing the reliability of hearsay evidence.

2. Reliability of Alleged Uncorroborated Hearsay Evidence

(a) Discussion

10676. para. 156: The Appeals Chamber reiterates that there is no general principle of law precluding the use of uncorroborated hearsay evidence as a sole or decisive basis for a "specific incriminating finding of fact" or for a conviction.[351]

10677. para. 166: The Appeals Chamber reviewed the Trial Judgment for any examples of the Trial Chamber's reliance on uncorroborated hearsay evidence for the Trial Chamber's findings and found none. That review, on the contrary, reveals that the Trial Chamber on several occasions declined to make findings where the only evidence adduced was unsupported or uncorroborated hearsay evidence, including uncorroborated hearsay evidence that arose in the testimony of witnesses it otherwise found generally credible.[387]

(b) Conclusion

10678. para. 167: The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber properly applied the law in regard to the assessment of the reliability of hearsay evidence, including consideration of the presence or absence of other evidentiary support as one of many factors in making its assessment.

3. Reliability of the Sources of Hearsay Evidence

(a) Discussion

10679. para. 171: Benjamin Yeaten, Daniel Tamba, Ibrahim Bah and Sam Bockarie did not testify at the trial. They played significant roles in the acts about which the Trial Chamber received direct testimony. They also appear in the Trial Judgment as persons whom witnesses testified made representations as to Taylor's words and actions.[392] The Appeals Chamber notes that it is not the Defence case that the Prosecution could have reasonably called these individuals but failed to do so. Rather, the Defence avers that the Trial Chamber neglected to analyse their reliability, and that therefore evidence contained in the testimony of witnesses that ascribe statements implicating Taylor to these four declarants is not reliable.

10680. para. 172: On a review of the Trial Judgment, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber specifically reasoned why it accepted or rejected individual hearsay statements allegedly emanating from these four declarants.

10681. para. 174: Because the Defence alleges that this error was "systematic," the Appeals Chamber reviewed the Trial Judgment for hearsay evidence of which these four declarants were the source but which the Defence did not cite. The review reveals nothing "systematic." In fact, not all statements attributed by witnesses to Bockarie and Yeaten were, after analysis of all the evidence, considered by the Trial Chamber to be reliable as to the truth of their content or the fact that they were uttered.[406]

(b) Conclusion

10682. para. 176: The Trial Chamber considered the reliability of the sources of hearsay evidence as one of the factors it considered in its assessment of the reliability of the hearsay statement itself, and decided, based on all of the evidence, whether or not to accept the hearsay and use it in its findings. The evaluation of hearsay evidence by the Trial Chamber was careful and cautious, and in keeping with the rights of the parties preserved by the letter and spirit of the Statute.

4. Inferences drawn from Circumstantial Evidence

(a) Discussion

10683. para. 180:. Consistent with the Special Court's jurisprudence in Fofana and Kondewa it is permissible to base a conviction solely on circumstantial evidence, provided that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from such evidence leads to the guilt of the accused.[420] When the evidence is capable of supporting a reasonable inference consistent with innocence, the accused must be acquitted.[421] As stated in Sesay et al., the standard of proof at trial is the same regardless of the type of evidence, direct or circumstantial.[422] The principle of presumption of innocence, as protected by the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, underpins the requirement that convictions based on inferences drawn exclusively from circumstantial evidence are proper only if the evidence is incapable of giving rise to a reasonable inference consistent with innocence.[423] If the circumstantial evidence on which the inference supporting the conviction relies also gives rise to a reasonable inference consistent with innocence, then there is obviously a reasonable doubt.[424]

10684. para. 181: The Prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the offence charged. However, the Prosecution need not prove every disputed fact beyond a reasonable doubt. It is settled law that "not each and every fact in the Trial Judgement must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but only those on which a conviction or the sentence depends."[425]

(b) Conclusion

10685. para. 182: The principle of law is that it is permissible to base a conviction solely on circumstantial evidence, provided that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from such evidence leads to the guilt of the accused. That principle does not require that circumstantial evidence on disputed facts that are not decisive to the determination of guilt yield only one reasonable inference.

D. ASSESSMENT OF THE WEIGHT OF THE EVIDENCE

(a) Discussion

10686. para. 191: The Appeals Chamber has repeatedly affirmed that the weight to be given to the evidence is within the Trial Chamber's discretion.[456] Trial Chambers enjoy broad discretion in their assessment of evidence and determination of the weight to accord testimony.[457] This is appropriate since, under the trial system adopted by the Special Court, the ICTY and the ICTR, it is the judges of the Trial Chamber who see and hear the witnesses and can best evaluate the evidence that they experience firsthand.[458] The Trial Chamber's assessment as to whether the weight of the evidence is sufficient to support a particular finding will only be disturbed if the Appeals Chamber determines that no reasonable trier of fact could reach the same conclusion.[459]

10687. para. 192: As the Appeals Chamber has previously emphasised, "an appellant must contest the Trial Chamber's findings and conclusions, and should not simply invite the Appeals Chamber to reconsider issues de novo."[461] Where an appellant merely seeks to substitute his own evaluation of the evidence for that of the Trial Chamber, such submissions may be dismissed without detailed reasoning.[462]

10688. para. 193: Determining the weight to be given to discrepancies between a witness's testimony and his prior statements is part of the Trial Chamber's discretion to assess the weight of the evidence.[463] "It is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether discrepancies discredit a witness' testimony and, when faced with competing versions of events, to determine which one is more credible."[464] A Trial Chamber may accept only part of a witness's testimony.[465] The Trial Chamber set out in its Judgment the method by which it determined and weighed discrepancies between witnesses and within individual witnesses' testimony. It also explained some of the factors it considered when making those determinations.[466]

10689. para. 195: The Appeals Chamber notes that a Trial Chamber is not required to refer to the testimony of every witness or every piece of evidence on the trial record.[469]

(b) Conclusion

10690. para. 196: A Trial Chamber should not abuse its broad discretion in weighing evidence by making findings determinative of guilt in the absence of evidence, or in the absence of reasoned acknowledgment of evidence contrary to the findings. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber supported its findings with evidence. It identified contradictory evidence, while providing reasons why it was not persuasive.

E. BURDEN OF PROOF

(a) Discussion

10691. para. 200: Article 17(3) of the Statute enshrines the principle of the presumption of innocence in providing that an accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty.[480] The principle is reflected in Rule 87(A), which establishes that a finding of guilty may be reached only when a majority of the Trial Chamber is satisfied that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. In keeping with the spirit of the Statute, the accused has no obligation to prove anything and may rely on the presumption of innocence throughout the trial and the Judges' deliberations; and the burden is placed on the Prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the crimes and the forms of criminal participation charged.[481]

10692. para. 201: In its Judgment, the Trial Chamber recalled the Statute and the applicable rules establishing the presumption of innocence, the standard of proof and the burden of proof required of the Prosecution.[482] It stated:

> [I]n respect of each count, the Trial Chamber has determined whether it is satisfied, on the basis of the whole of the evidence, that every element of that crime and the criminal responsibility of the Accused for it have been established beyond reasonable doubt. There is no burden on an accused to prove his innocence. Article 17(4)(g) of the Statute provides that no accused shall be compelled to testify against himself or confess guilt.[483]

10693. para. 202: In addition, it explicitly emphasized that the burden never shifts to the accused:

> The Accused elected to testify in his own defence. In accordance with Rule 85(C) of the Rules, he gave his evidence under oath and thereafter called other witnesses in his defence. By electing to testify and to call witnesses in his Defence, the Accused did not thereby assume the burden of proving his innocence.[484]

10694. para. 203:. The Appeals Chamber holds that these statements are a transparent declaration of the standard applied to determine whether Taylor is guilty as to each element of each count charged. The Trial Chamber need not repeat the law each time it makes a finding that an essential element of the offense or criminal responsibility has been proved.

F. STANDARD OF PROOF BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT

(a) Discussion

10695. para. 227: As the Appeals Chamber stated above,[539] the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt is applied to the elements of the crime or the form of responsibility alleged against the accused, as well as with respect to the facts which are indispensable for entering a conviction.[540] Consequently, not every fact in the Trial Judgement must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but only those facts on which a conviction or the sentence depends.[541].

(b) Conclusion

10696. para. 235: The Appeals Chamber concurs with the ICTY Appeals Chamber that:

> The task of a trier of fact is that of assessing all the relevant evidence presented with a holistic approach and that a trier of fact should render a reasoned opinion on the basis of the entire body of evidence and without applying the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt with a piecemeal approach.[553]

G. REASONED OPINION

10697. para. 246: A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 20 to review the Parties' appeals.[569] In general, a Trial Chamber "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes, nor is it required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."[570] Nonetheless, in this case, the Trial Judgment extensively set out the Parties' submissions at trial on each allegation (in the sections entitled "Submissions of the Parties"),[571] the evidence relevant to each allegation (in the sections entitled "Evidence"),[572] the Trial Chamber's evaluation of that evidence (in the sections entitled "Deliberations")[573] and the Trial Chamber's ultimate findings based on its assessment of the relevant evidence (in the sections entitled "Findings").[574] This deliberate and detailed approach has unquestionably facilitated the Appeals Chamber's review of the Trial Chamber's reasoning and findings in light of the Parties' submissions,[575] and the Appeals Chamber commends the Trial Chamber's methodology as a best practice.

10698. para. 247: An appellant claiming an error of law on the basis of lack of a reasoned opinion must identify the specific issues, factual findings or arguments which the appellant submits the Trial Chamber omitted to address and explain why this omission invalidated the decision.[576] As a general rule, a Trial Chamber is only required to make findings on those facts that are essential to the determination of guilt in relation to a particular count.[577]

H. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS ON EVIDENCE

10699. para. 250: The Statute and Rules create a framework for evidentiary assessment that is flexible while principled. Under this Court's jurisprudential application of the constitutive framework, the Trial Chamber has the primary obligation to assess and weigh evidence, and is given broad discretion to do so. However, that discretion is not limitless, as the Trial Chamber is required to carefully and cautiously assess the totality of the evidence on the record, in accordance with the fundamental principles of the presumption of innocence and the fairness of the proceedings. It is the Trial Chamber's essential obligation to rigorously evaluate evidence for its credibility and reliability, and strictly apply the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt when determining the sufficiency of the evidence supporting a conviction. Flexibility in evidentiary assessment places the responsibility on the Trial Chamber to approach all evidence cautiously and carefully, and to reason its evaluation of evidence cogently, rather than relying on formulas and proscriptions that lead to unreasoned or categorical acceptance or rejection of evidence.
